The Buckinghamshire petition has been mentioned. It was brought up to London, seven days after the attempt upon Hampden and Pym, by upward of 4000 freeholders, who had ridden up from their county, each with a copy of the recent protestation of the Commons in his hat, to show their devotedness to the Parliament, and to Hampden, their beloved representative. They complained of the "very being of Parliaments endangered by a desperate and unexampled breach of privilege;" and concluded, "in respect of that latter attempt upon the honourable House of Commons, we are now come to offer our service to that end, and resolved in their just defence to live and die." Subsequently a deputation of these bold brave men carried a petition in defence of Hampden to the king himself. A great effect was produced by the timely demonstration.‡

The war began, and Hampden was one of the first in the field. He hastened to Buckinghamshire, and "under the woody brows of his own beauteous Chilterns," published the ordinance to marshal the militia of his native county. He was received with enthusiasm. The only persons who fell from his side were some members of his own family. This is ever one of the greatest miseries of civil war, terrible as it is for every kind of misery. In a curious pamphlet of the day, a "Discovery of Mysteries," I find the following living and mournful picture of England in her present extremity: "A most unnatural war, the son against the father, and the father against the son: the Earle of Warwicke fighteth for the Parliament, and my Lord Rich, his son, is with the king; the Earle of Dover is with the king, and my Lord Rochford, his son, is with the Parliament: so one brother against another, as the Earle of Northumberland with the Parliament, and his brother with the king; the Earle of Bedford with the Parliament, and his brother with the king; Master Perpoint with the Parliament, and the Earle of Newark with the king; Devereux Farmer with the Parliament, and his brother, Thomas Farmer, together with his brother-in-law, my Lord Cockain, with the king, and the like: and of cosens without number, the one part with the king, and the other with the Parliament: and if they do this in subtilty, to preserve their estate, I say it is a wicked policie to undoe the kingdom, which all wise men should consider." This is indeed a fearful realization of the poet's fancy!

But Hampden himself was the first, in this great hour, to throw aside every relation save those in which he stood to his country, and upon the issue of the contest which had now arrived he cheerfully ventured all. He spared neither purse nor person. He subscribed £2000 to the wants of the Parliament, and accepted the commission of a colonel. A passage from one of Doctor Heylin's articles, however, published in the Mercurius Aulicus on his death, conveys a feeling of the time which was entertained on both sides. "It was advertised this day, that on the death of Mr. Hampden, whom the lower House had joynd as a coadjutor with the Earle of Essex, or rather placed as a superintendent over him, to give them an account of his proceedings, they had made choice of Sir Henry Vane the younger to attend that service, who, having had a good part of his breeding under the holy ministers of New-England, was thought to be provided of sufficient zeale not only to inflame his excellencie's cold affections, but to kindle a more fiery spirit of rebellion in his wavering souldiers." Be his position what it might, it is certain that he had not been many days in the field before he showed himself a thorough master of the military duties, and "performed them on all occasions most punctually." The regiment of infantry with which he entered the war was soon considered to be one of the best in the service of the Parliament.

"The raising of troops," says Lord Nugent, "and the garrisoning and fortifying of towns, proceeded with rapidity. The new levies were formed into regiments and brigades. Sir Thomas Fairfax, who had been sent down to assist Sir John Hotham, began, but with small success, to collect a force which was destined to make head against the Marquis of Newcastle in the north. On Sir William Waller,

* Clarendon.

* I refer at present to certain pamphlets which followed the appearance of a review of the "Memorials" in the Quarterly, and in which, I think, to almost every other advantage, Mr. Southey added the eminent one of temper.

† Parl. Hist., vol. x., p. 169.

‡ Hence the Royalist falsehoods respecting it have been numerous. They are all embodied in one of the political lampoons of the day:

"Did I for this my county bring
To help their knight against their king,
And raise the first sedition?
Though I the business did decline,
Yet I conceived the whole design,
And sent them their petition."

In the same generous spirit Hampden's visits to Scotland are construed:

"Did I for this bring in the Scot?
(For 'tis no secret now) the plot
Was Say's and mine together.
Did I for this return again,
And spend a winter there in vain?
I went more to invite them hither.

"Though more our money than our cause
Their brotherly assistance draws,
My labour was not lost;
At my return I brought you thence Necessity, their strong pretence,
And this shall quit the cost."

who had the command at Exeter, devolved a like charge in the west, where Sir Ralph Hopton, Slanning, and Grenvil occupied the greater part of the country, and some of the small seaports, for the king. Lord Brooke in Warwickshire, Lord Say and his sons in Northamptonshire, the Earl of Bedford in Bedfordshire, Lord Kimbolton and Cromwell in Huntingdon and Cambridgeshire, and Lord Wharton, Arthur Goodwin, Mr. West, Mr. Bulstrode, Mr. Tyrell, and Mr. Richard Grenvil the high sheriff, in Buckinghamshire; Skippon, and Hollis, and Stapleton in Middlesex; and the sheriffs of Essex, Surrey, and Berkshire in their respective counties, formed the militia re-enforcements for the army, which was placed under the chief direction of the Earl of Essex. This became soon the main army of the Parliament; and, in the course of less than a month after the raising of the king's standard, the Parliamentary force throughout England amounted to about 25,000 men. The whole was at the disposal of the committee of public safety. The divisions were generally placed under the command of such of the chiefs as had served in the wars of Gustavus Adolphus, and a few French and German engineers were engaged to superintend the fortifications and the drilling of the artillery. The brigades and single regiments were raised and led by such of the noblemen and country gentlemen as were found combining with their local influence, activity, courage, and genius enough for military affairs to be intrusted with commands. The regiments of infantry, as their clothing became more complete, assumed the colours of their respective leaders—generally such as had been worn by the serving men of the families. Hollis's were the London red-coats; Lord Brooke's the purple; Hampden's the green-coats; Lord Say's and Lord Mandeville's the blue. The orange, which had long been the colour of Lord Essex's household, and now that of his body-guard, was worn in a scarf over the armour of all the officers of the Parliament army, as the distinguishing symbol of their cause. Each regiment also carried a small standard, or cornet, with, on one side, the device and motto of its colonel, and, on the other, the watchword of the Parliament—"God with us." The Earl of Essex's bore the inscription, "Cave, adsum," words not well chosen, as, in the course of the wars, they sometimes afforded occasion for jest among the Cavaliers, when his regiment chanced to be seen in retreat, or engaged in levying contributions, or in some such other duties which were distasteful to the parts of the country over which it was moving, and which thus gave a somewhat whimsical air to the warning.* Some of these mottoes were better chosen and better justified. In the third year of the war, the second son of the Earl of Leicester, Algernon Sidney, inscribed his standard with the words, "Sanctus amor patriæ dat animus;" and the motto which was borne at the head of Hampden's regiment resolutely indicated its great leader's course, "Vestigia nulla retrorsum."

It appears, from the returns of Lord Essex's army, that soon after the outbreak of the war, it must have consisted of, in the whole, nearly 15,000 infantry and 4500 horse. Of the former there were twenty regiments: the lord-general's body-guard, and the regiments of the Earl of Peterborough, the Earl of Stamford, Viscount Say, Viscount Rochford, Viscount St. John, Lord Kimbolton, Lord Brooke, Lord Roberts, Lord Wharton, John Hampden, Denzil Hollis, Sir John Meyrick, Sir Henry Cholmley, Sir William Constable, Sir William Fairfax, Charles Essex, Thomas Grantham, Thomas Ballard and William Bamfield. The cavalry were in seventy-five troops. These were all raised, as were many of the infantry regiments, at the charge of their commanders. They were the lord-general's life-guard of gentlemen, and the troops of the Earls of Bedford, Peterborough, and Stamford, Viscounts Say, St. John, and Fielding, Lords Brooke, Wharton, Willoughby of Parham, Hastings, Grey of Groby, Sir William Balfour, Sir William Waller, Sir Arthur Hazlerig, Sir Walter Erle, Sir Faithful Fortescue, Nathaniel, Francis, and John Fiennes, Oliver Cromwell, Valentine Waughton, Henry Ireton, Arthur Goodwin, John Dalbier, Adrian Scroope, Thomas Hatcher, John Hotham, Sir Robert Pye, Sir William Wray, Sir John Saunders, John Alured, Edwyn Sandys, John and Thomas Hammond, Alexander Pym, Anthony and Henry Mildmay, James and Thomas Temple, Arthur Evelyn, Robert Vivers, Hercules Langrishe, William Pretty, James Sheffield, John Gunter, Robert and Francis Dowett, John Bird, Matthew Draper, Henry Dimmocke, Horatio Carey, John Neale, Edward Ayscough, John and Francis Thompson, Edward Keighley, Alexander Douglas, Thomas Lydcott, John Fleming, Richard Grenvil, Thomas Tyrell, John Hale, William Balfour, George Austin, Edward Wingate, Edward Bainton, Charles Chichester, Walter Long, Edward West, William Anselm, Robert Kirle, and Simon Rudgeley. Sir John Meyrick was, according to the military phrase then in use, sergeant-major-general of this army, the Earl of Peterborough general of the ordnance, and the Earl of Bedford of the horse.

* I have found several of these jests in the Mercurius Aulicus.

It was not so easy to equip the men as to raise them. Matchlocks, pikes, and poleaxes supplied, however, the greater number of the infantry; and the cavalry were altogether better provided. The steel cap and gorget, the back and breast plates, the tassets descending to the knees, the long sword, carbine, and pistols—and, occasionally, the long lances—presented an unobjectionable setting out. The completeness of the defences of Hazlerig's regiment won them the name of the "lobsters;" and that of "ironsides" has been immortally appropriated by Cromwell's men.

Hampden's first muster of his levies was made on the fatal field of Chalgrove, where he afterward received his death wound. While engaged on this his earliest military duty, he illustrated the promptness and decision of his character. On hearing that some of the king's commissioners of array were in the neighbourhood, he suddenly, without dissolving the meeting, withdrew a small detachment from it, surprised the commissioners, and sent them prisoners to London.

The king had found himself, meanwhile, at the head of about 10,000 foot, 1500 dragoons, and 2000 ordinary horse. On first raising his standard at Nottingham he had but a "ragged array" of followers; but, having gone back to York, and traversed Derbyshire, Leicestershire, and Nottinghamshire, commanding the attendance of the trained bands, levying forced loans, and gathering to his "array" all the lowest and most dependant classes of the community, he found himself, on halting at Shrewsbury, in possession of the force I have named. It has never been denied that, as opposed to the great bulk of Charles's army, that of the Parliament was infinitely more "substantial" and intelligent, consisting of almost all the inferior gentry, freeholders, yeomen, and the sober and wealthy inhabitants of towns; in a word, of men who had best reason to know the value of those rights of liberty and property for which they now prepared to shed their blood. On the other hand, Charles had the Church, or, rather, those still surviving influences which constituted its power before Pym and Hampden had razed the power itself to the dust; he had all the Roman Catholic party; he had the universities also; and, on either wing, as it were, of his army, he held a majority of the nobility and the old gentry of England. Many of the latter, indeed almost all, had joined him from no other feeling than that subtle and delicate sense of honour which the term loyalty implies, and out of the indescribable instinct of which—misplaced surely towards any but an absolute sovereign—they argued, that while their voices were their own in the great Parliamentary struggle for the liberties and laws, their swords were the king's alone. "I am much unsatisfied with the proceedings here," wrote Lord Robert Spencer to his wife from the king's camp, in the first months of the war; "nor is there wanting daily handsome occasion to retire, were it not for grinning honour. For, let occasion be never so handsome, unless a man were resolved to fight on the Parliamentary side, it will be said, without doubt, that a man is afraid to fight. If there could be an expedient found to solve the punctilio of honour, I would not continue here an hour." The writer's scruples were speedily solved, for he fell fighting under the royal standard. To the same class of agonizing doubts, notwithstanding all the protesting eloquence of Clarendon, belong those shrill and sad accents wherewith Falkland so often ingeminated the word peace, peace! He was not less weary of the times than of the position in which he found himself, and he had his passionate prayer of being "soon out of" them both. So, too, with Sir Edmund Verney, the first standard-bearer to Charles. He disapproved of the cause in which he had engaged, as Clarendon confesses; but "he had eaten of the king's bread," and honour bound him to the service. He fell in the first battle.

But if "honour" was the bond of this section of the king's party, the faster and firmer bond of liberty held together the army of the Parliament, massing, in one compact array, all the substantial yeomanry, the merchants, the men of the towns, and a very large and formidable minority of the peerage and landed gentry of England. No doubts or scruples attended upon this cause. It gave a common and elevated object to the sympathies of all. It gave "life in death" to all the owners of it and sufferers for it.

The civil war had now fairly begun, and much blood was shed in occasional skirmishes on both sides. Hampden was in Northamptonshire with a small brigade of infantry and some guns, accompanied by his fellow-representative for Buckinghamshire, Arthur Goodwin, and his regiment of cavalry. News reached him that Lord Brooke, who had been threatened with a siege in his own castle, was suddenly very close pressed in Warwickshire, and he instantly hastened to his aid. Meanwhile the gallant Brooke, after a noble and high-spirited triumph,* had begun a march on Northamptonshire, and Hampden's brigade met him at Southam. A little army was thus formed—acting as the right wing to Essex—and the first strong division openly in action. Lord Say, Lord Grey, Denzil Hollis, and Cholmley, were in command along with Brooke and Hampden.

In the middle of the night, the force of Lord Northampton, much more considerable in numbers, approached within two miles of Southam, and the drums beat to arms. "Upon hearing whereof, the soldiers, possessed with joy that their enemies, the Cavaliers, were so near, gave a great shout, flinging up their hats and clattering their arms till the town rang again; and, casting aside all desire of meat and lodgings provided for them, went immediately into the field adjoining to the town, ready for battle, where they continued till the morning."† The enemy appeared at daybreak on the Dunsmore road and lanes adjoining. At eight o'clock the fight began. Hampden, who had taken post with his brigade on some rising ground, charged first; and, after a hot skirmish, the royal troops gave way, and were pursued to the river. This was the first serious skirmish of the war, and Hampden was the first to charge in it.

Essex's movements were, meanwhile, wavering and compromising; and irrevocable mischief might have been done, even thus early, to the cause, but for the wonderful energy of Hampden and Lord Brooke. The eloquence of the latter nobleman's addresses to his soldiers pierced through the mailed bosoms of the dullest among the troops, and inspired them with an ever lively enthusiasm. "If the nobility and bravery of the cause," he told some raw re-enforcements in the hall of his noble old fortress at Warwick, "be not sufficient to animate cowards, and make even the meanest spirits courageous, I know not what possibly can stir up mortal men to put on undaunted resolutions." These young troops marched to the assistance of the main army at Northampton, and were the bravest there! Hampden's activity and unwearied energy were surprising: now at the headquarters of Essex; now leading his brigade in the general advance upon Worcester; now present at the committee of public safety in London; again, in a few days, at Aylesbury, near which, supported by Denzil Hollis, he gave sharp fight to a detachment of the enemy, repulsed and pursued them to Oxford, and then rejoined Essex. In every action or skirmish, Hampden, perhaps too boldly, exposed his person with such a daring intrepidity as, among thousands of men, raised him to a conspicuous mark above them all.

* See Nugent's Memorials, vol. ii., p. 224. A most interesting passage.

† "A true and perfect relation," &c., quoted in Lord Nugent's Memorials, vol. ii., p. 225.

The first great pitched battle now approached. On a bright and cold morning, the 23d of October, 1642, the King of England found himself, for the first time, opposite the thick and dark masses of the army of the Parliament of England. He was on the brow of a hill, and separated from his enemy by a plain called the "Vale of the Red Horse," at Keynton Field, or Edge Hill, in Warwickshire. He addressed his officers in his tent eloquently and bravely: "If this day shine prosperous unto us," said he, "we shall all be happy in a glorious victory. Your king is both your cause, your quarrel, and your captain. The foe is in sight. Now show yourselves no malignant parties, but with your swords declare what courage and fidelity is within you. I have written and declared that I intended always to maintain and defend the Protestant religion, the rights and privileges of Parliament, and the liberty of the subject; and now I must prove my words by the convincing argument of the sword. Let Heaven show his power by this day's victory, to declare me just, and as a lawful, so a loving king to my subjects. 'The best encouragement I can give you is this, that, come life or death, your king will bear you company, and ever keep this field, this place, and this day's service in his grateful remembrance.'" He then rode along the lines, clad in steel armour, and wearing a black velvet mantle over it, on which glittered his brilliant star and George. Never did Charles I. seem so respectable as when about to shed the blood of the bravest and most conscientious of his subjects.

Old Lord Lindsey, his general-in-chief, disgusted with the overbearing insolence of Prince Rupert, acted as though only nominal commander, and put himself at the head of his regiment, with this fervent prayer, "Oh Lord! thou knowest how busy I must be this day. If I forget Thee, do not thou forget me. March on, boys!" When old Major-general Skippon, some days after, was in a similar position, he used language to the troops of the Parliament which was as homely, and proved more effective. "Come, my boys, my brave boys, let us pray heartily, and fight heartily. I will run the same fortunes and hazards with you. Remember the cause is for God, and for the defence of yourselves, your wives, and children. Come, my honest, brave boys, pray heartily, and fight heartily, and God will bless us."

The armies had confronted each other—10,000 on the side of the Commons, and 12,000 on that of the king—from ten o'clock in the morning, but the fight did not begin till two. The Royalists would not leave their position. The Parliamentarians were the first to advance; and the enemy then gallantly descending into the plain, the battle soon hotly raged on both sides. In the front, with each a pike in his hand, Essex and Lindsey fought with heroic gallantry. Suddenly Prince Rupert made a desperate and impetuous charge, and broke the left wing of the Parliamentarians, who immediately fled. The braver regiments of the right wing and centre held their ground, charged gallantly in return, and took several of the king's guns. Rupert meanwhile pushed on after the fugitives with his characteristic love of plunder, even as far as Keynton itself, a distance of three miles; when two regiments, led by Hampden, were seen hastening across the enclosures to support the mangled squadrons of flying horse. He had left Stratford-on-Avon the night before, and pushed on with Grantham's regiment, his own green-coats, and five guns, which the men had dragged with difficulty through the deep roads. He formed instantly, and, opening fire on Rupert, obliged him to turn in great confusion. Hampden could not follow.

The king's army were sorely pressed at the time of Rupert's re-arrival among them, and, night closing in, both parties left the field. Lord Lindsey had fallen covered with wounds. Sir Edmund Verney was also slain, and the royal standard was taken and retaken. On the side of the Parliament, two colonels, Charles Essex and Lord St. John, perished; and the entire number of men left dead upon the field is said to have been about 5000. Charles Pym behaved most gallantly. A Parliamentary soldier, dying of his wounds, declared that his deepest grief was having received his death from the hand of his brother. He had recognised him among the royal troops, and turned aside, but not in time to avoid the fatal carbine, which was impetuously discharged from the hand that had never before been raised but in affection.* Both sides claimed the victory.

Hampden joined Essex early on the following morning, and implored him earnestly to press forward, force the king's position, relieve Banbury, and throw himself at once on the contested line of the road to the capital. Essex was timid and indecisive; he marched, in preference, on Coventry, while the king, taking Banbury in his way without resistance, marched to Oxford, where he halted.

The next movement of Essex, after considerable sluggishness, was upon Northampton, Hampden and Arthur Goodwin leading the advanced guard. Lord Nugent has produced a letter which during the march Hampden wrote from Northampton to the lieutenants of Buckinghamshire to encourage them:

"To my noble friends, Colonel Bulstrode, Captain Grenvil, Captain Tyrell, Captain West, or any of them.

"Gentlemen,—The army is now at Northampton, moving every day nearer to you. If you disband not, we may be a mutual succour to each other; but if you disperse, you make yourselves and your country a prey.

"You shall hear daily from your servant,
"JOHN HAMPDEN.

"Northampton, Oct. 31."

"I wrote this enclosed letter yesterday, and thought it would have come to you then, but the messenger had occasion to stay till this morning. We cannot be ready to march till to-morrow, and then, I believe, we shall. I desire you will be pleased to send to me again as soon as you can, to the army, that we may know what posture you are in, and then you will hear which way we go. You shall do me a favour to certify me what you hear of the king's forces, for I believe your intelligence is better from Oxford and those parts than ours can be. "Your humble servant,

"JOHN HAMPDEN.

"Northampton, Nov. 1, 1642."

Brentford, meanwhile, was occupied by Hollis's regiment only. A numerous force of cavalry, with some pieces of artillery, under the command of Rupert, unexpectedly fell upon them. Essex was in the House of Lords when the roaring of the cannon reached him. He mounted horse instantly, and rode to the scene of action, where he found the regiments of Hampden and Lord Brooke already to the rescue, and the Royalists retiring, after having done some serious mischief. Five times had Hampden and Brooke charged the streets to open passage for retreat to Hollis's brave and suffering men, and five times were repulsed by overwhelming numbers and with great carnage.

A re-enforcement arrived on the following morning. Hampden proposed then to march 3000 men to Hounslow, and cut off the king's retreat on Oxford, while Essex and the main army attacked him in front. This was agreed to; but he had not proceeded a mile on his gallant errand when he was overtaken by counter orders. Here was another great error. Hampden was obliged to direct his march to Reading. Clarendon himself admits, "There had been, in the secret committee for the carrying on the war, forming those designs, and administering to the expenses thereof, a long debate, with great difference of opinion, whether they should not march directly with their army to besiege Oxford, where the king and the court was, rather than Reading; and, if they had taken that resolution, as Mr. Hampden, and all they who desired still to strike at the root, very earnestly insisted upon, without doubt they had put the king's affairs into great confusion; for, besides that the town was not tolerably fortified, nor the garrison well provided for, the court, and multitude of nobility, and ladies, and gentry, with which it was inhabited, bore any kind of alarm very ill."*

These words of Clarendon, "strike at the root," explain the cause of these unhappy differences. Essex remained unimpeached in honour, but he never was for "striking at the root." He had not, like Hampden, when he drew his sword, cast away the scabbard. He never saw himself near to a great victory that he did not tremble; in defeat and disaster alone he stood erect and gallantly.

Hampden, mortified and sorrowful, sat down with his forces before Reading. Some few short months before he had brought home a bride from that pleasant town! This very fact, coupled with a knowledge that the majority of the inhabitants were really well affected to the cause, probably guided him in his course of only firing a few shots into the town, though commanding a view of almost every street. Colonel Lewis Kirke, the father of the infamous Kirke, commanded the Royalist garrison there; and Colonel Urrie, so soon after a renegade, seconded Hampden with a small body of cavalry. Kirke attempted several sallies, and was repulsed with loss; and at daybreak on the third morning, Hampden and Urrie, judging the garrison fatigued and dispirited, determined to attempt the walls by assault. Accordingly, advancing silently from the trenches with 400 picked men, Hampden, in the gray twilight of the morning, passed the outer and second ditch, and, mounting the rampart, threw himself into the northernmost bastion. A desperate resistance was made, and terrible slaughter accompanied it. Then Hampden, calling forward the reserves, placed himself at the head of a second attack, and again, with fresh men struggling up the walls, renewed the fight on the breast of the main work. Kirke, upon this, drew out the whole garrison, and the "conflict came to push of pike," chief to chief, each at the head of his party, and each cheering his men by desperate achievement. Hampden, however, overpowered by force, must have retired, when Urrie, who had detached himself to the right, pushed between the Cavaliers and the town. The fire from the inhabitants at once ceased; and, after four hours' terrible struggle, and 400 men of the garrison left dead in the place, Kirke abandoned the defence and escaped to Oxford. Hampden remained master of Reading, of many stores, much baggage, and a large number of prisoners.*

And so closed the first year of the war—brilliant successes, on a comparatively small scale, by Hampden—great opportunities lost by Essex! The king might be said to be victor, because he ought to have been, and was not, vanquished.

Meanwhile Hampden had become more than ever dear to the popular party, and hateful to the court at Oxford. The filth of the "Mercurius Aulicus," poured out upon him by its religious editors, testified to both feelings. About this time I find the following in that loyal publication: "It is advertized by some who have been curious in the observation, that Mr. Hampden, one of the five members so much talked of, hath had many great misfortunes since the beginning of these present troubles, whereof he hath been a principall mover, particularly that he hath buried since that time two of his daughters, one grandchild which he had by a daughter married to Sir Robert Pye the younger, his owne eldest sonne and heir; there being two onely sonnes surviving, whereof the one is said to be a cripple, and the other a lunatike; of which, whatever use may be made by others, 'tis not unfit but that the party whom it most concerns would lay it close unto his heart, and make such use thereof as the sad case invites him to."† Anything more

* Lord Nugent's Memorials, vol. ii., p. 348. Kingdom's Weekly Intelligencer.

† Mercurius Aulicus, 15th week. The same brutal writer observed, on the news of the patriot's early death: "Saturday, June 24. This day we were advertized that Master John Hampden (the principal member of the five) was dead of those wounds he received on Sunday last. If so, the reader may remember, that in the 15th weeke of this 'Mercurius,' we told the world what faire warning Master Hampden had received since the beginning of this rebellion (whereof he was a chiefe incendiary), how he had buried his sonne and heir and his two daughters, two onely sonnes surviving, whereof one was a cripple and the other a lunatike," which, though this desperate man was unwilling to make use of, yet sure it may startle the rest of his faction, especially if they consider that Chalgrove Field horrible than such an attack as this (supposing it true) could scarcely be conceived. It was a gross falsehood, with only so much truth as to give bitter pain to its illustrious object. He had indeed lost his eldest son, and his favourite and beloved daughter, Mrs. Knightley. He was seldom known to smile afterward.

* Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, vol. iv., p. 30, 40.

Nothing, however—not even such sorrows—could quench his indomitable activity. He was now almost daily on the road between the advanced posts of the army and London, and was frequently able to discharge, in the same day, his double duties at the army and with Pym in the public committee. The poet Denham, then in the king's service, thus described it, at this time, in one of the lampoons from which I have already quoted :

"Have I so often passed between Windsor and Westminster unseen,
And did myself divide,
To keep his excellence in awe,
And give the Parliament the law,
For they knew none beside !"

Fortunately for Denham and his party, this was not altogether true. Hampden was not able to "keep his excellence in awe." His excellency's timidity still forced him into every kind of error; and so manifest, especially to the Royalists, was the superiority of Hampden, that they attempted, with daring artfulness, to sow dissensions in the troops of the enemy by plain statements of a rivalry for the Parliamentary command. I find the following in the "Mercurius Aulicus:" "It was this day reported exceedingly confidently, by some who came from London lately, how it was noised in the citie that the Earle of Essex was to leave the place of generall unto Mr. Hampden, as one more active, and so, by consequence, more capable of the style of excellencie; which, though it proved not so in the event (as it is not likely), yet shows it clearly what an ill opinion the principall maintainers of this rebellion have of this said earle, and with how little confidence the common soldiers will be brought to spend their lives under the colours and command of such a generall, of whom they have so manifested a distrust by their common talke, and whom they have so publicly exposed to contempt and scorn in abusive pictures." No doubt it was from this authority that Anthony Wood derived his statement of such an intention of placing Hampden in chief command having been entertained at the commencement of the war. No good authority ever existed for it, happy as the issue might have been for England.

On the occurrence and disclosure of the Waller plot, in which a cousin of Hampden was found dishonourably implicated, a base advantage was taken of the name by the slavish scribes at Oxford, to throw out the vilest insinuations against Hampden's honesty and virtue. I find this alluded to in one of the journals of the Parliament; and the extract is curious and valuable, since it supplies, what has more than once been questioned, the real relationship of Waller's fellow-conspirator to the patriot. "In this place, that I may not exceed the length of my semanick intelligence, I should return again to speake somewhat more of the discoverie of the plot which I made mention of before; the malevolents cannot endure to heare of any at all, yet some would seeme to admit of it upon condition that Colonell Hampden might be involved as a conspirator therein; and, therefore, hearing that one Hampden was intrusted about it, they have reported that it was Colonell Hampden, or his brother, Mr. Richard Hampden. And lest this report should breed any mistake abroad, and so derogate from the worth of these noble and faithfull gentlemen, I will be bold to speake a word or two of their pedigree, so farre onely as will cleare the matter. Mr. Alexander Hampden that is committed was sonne to Sir Edward Hampden of Northamptonshire, and, travelling into the Low Countries, became cross-bearer to the Queen of Bohemia, and since the warres came over into England, and remained in the king's armie till hee was sent with a message to the Parliament, and before hee was returned back with an answer the plot was discovered. It is true they were brothers' children, and it is too frequent, in these times especially, that those which are neare of blood are one against another.*"

Meanwhile Hampden had just achieved one of his most valuable services to the cause, in forming with Pym that celebrated association of counties to which Cromwell was afterward chiefly indebted for his most brilliant successes. At this time, suddenly, Lord Northampton attacked his regiment, and was repulsed with loss. The next affair he was engaged in—the assisting Grenvil to recover Brill Hill, a post of great strength, between Aylesbury and Thame—was unsuccessful. "Mercurius Aulicus" made much of this; and, returning to the subject a second and third time, I find every week some correction of an error he had fallen into in describing the "businessse and successe" at Brill. "For whereas, by the first intelligence which was given from thence, it was advertized that the forces brought before the towne were conducted by Mr. Arthur Goodwin, and that Captain Grenville, the last yeare's sheriff of Buckinghamshire, had been killed in the enterprize; it proved, on further information, that the commander of the rebels was not Colonell Goodwin, but one as good as hee, per omnia, viz., Mr. Hampden, the other of the two excepted in his majestie's pardon for the countie of Buckingham; and that Grenville was not killed out right, but mortally wounded in the belly, so that it was conceived he could hardly escape it."

The Royalists had now a series of successes: Lord Wentworth, the young and gallant son of the great Lord Strafford, distinguished himself; and the noble and good Lord Brooke was slain by a musket shot in the brain, fired from the Cathedral tower of Litchfield, as he was directing the advance of a body of troops up a street leading towards the close. This was an irreparable loss; and a loss more fatal still was now near at hand.

Some serious discontents occurred about this period in the regiments which held Reading, in consequence of an ague breaking out in that town. Hampden's regiment took part in them. He hurried instantly from Westminster, where he was at the time, and, by his prompt boldness and frank courage, reduced the mutineers to perfect discipline.* His spirit wearied, however, after some great enterprise, which Essex dared not attempt. Deeply sorrowful, yet quiet in obedience, as became the place he filled, he waited on in hope. The soldiers are said, and with much probability, to have now clamoured for him as their leader; but the only notice Hampden took of this was worthy of his noble and generous mind. He placed himself in more frequent communication with Essex, and seemed to counsel him and promote his views. But counsel from Hampden continued vain in that quarter still; vain as when, on four different occasions—after Edgehill, after Brentford, after the attack on Reading, and now after the fall of Reading—its rejection had possibly baffled the immediate and final decision of the war. The time had now come when no more counsel could be given, and none rejected more.

(where he now received this mortal wound) was the self-same place where he first mustered and drew up men in armes to rebell against the king. But whether the life and death of the Lord Brooke or Master Hampden be the better lesson against treason and rebellion, let posteritie judge."

* King's Pamphlets, 117, 4to.

The renegade Urrie, thoroughly versed in the country and the habits of the Parliamentary army, now planned the expedition which ended in the eventful fight of Chalgrove. He gave the treacherous information that two regiments of the forces he had left lay exposed to attack at Wickham. Prince Rupert, acting on this, attacked those regiments unexpectedly—at Postcombe first, and then at Chinnor; slew or took them "to a man," committed infinite cruelties, and marched back upon Oxford. Hampden had, on the preceding day, strongly represented to Essex the danger to which this part of the line was exposed, and urged the necessity of strengthening it by calling in the remote pickets from Wycombe.

It was now too late for this, but not too late, in Hampden's active and resolute thought, to prevent farther danger. "He had obtained in early life," says Lord Nugent, "from the habits of the chase, a thorough knowledge of the passes of this country. It is intersected in the upper parts with woods, and deep, chalky hollows, and in the vales with brooks and green lanes, the only clear roads along the foot of the hills from east to west, and these not very good, being the two ancient Roman highways, called the Upper and Lower Ickenild Way. Over this district he had expected that some great operation would be attempted on the king's part, to force the posts round Thame, and turn the whole eastern flank of the army. To this neighbourhood he had, the evening before, repaired, and had lain that night in Watlington.† On the first alarm of Rupert's irruption, he sent off a trooper to the lord-general at Thame, to advise moving a force of infantry and cavalry to Chiselhampton Bridge, the only point at which Rupert could recross the river. Some of his friends would have dissuaded him from adventuring his person with the cavalry on a service which did not properly belong to him, wishing him rather to leave it to those officers of lesser note, under whose immediate command the pickets were. But, wherever danger was, and hope of service to the cause, there Hampden ever felt that his duty lay. He instantly mounted, with a troop of Captain Sheffield's horse, who volunteered to follow him; and, being joined by some of Gunter's dragoons, he endeavoured, by several charges, to harass and impede the retreat, until Lord Essex should have had time to make his dispositions at the river. Towards this point, however, Rupert hastened, through Tettsworth, his rear-guard skirmishing the whole way. On Chalgrove Field the prince overtook a regiment of his infantry; and here, among the standing corn, which covered a plain of several hundred acres (then, as now, unenclosed), he drew up in order of battle. Gunter, now joining three troops of horse and one of dragoons, who were advancing from Easington and Thame over Golder Hill, came down among the enclosures facing the right of the prince's line, along a hedgerow which still forms the boundary on that side of Chalgrove Field. The prince, with his life-guards and some dragoons, being in their front, the fight began with several fierce charges. And now, Colonel Neale and General Percy coming up, with the prince's left wing on their flank, Gunter was slain, and his party gave way. Yet every moment they expected the main body, with Lord Essex, to appear. Mean while Hampden, with the two troops of Sheffield and Cross, having come round the right of the Cavaliers, advanced to rally and support the beaten horse. Every effort was to be made to keep Rupert hotly engaged till the re-enforcements should arrive from Thame. Hampden put himself at the head of the attack; but, in the first charge, he received his death-wound. He was struck in the shoulder with two carbine balls,* which, breaking the bone, entered

* "On the king's part, in this action, were lost, besides few common men, no officers of note, but some hurt: on the enemy's side, many of the best officers, more than in any battle they fought; and among them (which made the news of the rest less inquired after by the one, and less lamented by the other) Colonel Hampden, who was shot in the shoulder with a brace of pistol bullets, of which wound, with very sharp pain, he died within ten days, to as great a consternation of all that party as if the whole army had been defeated and cut off."—Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, vol. iv., p. 81, 82, restored text. In a second passage of this restored text, portions of which seem to have been struck out by Clarendon himself, there is a second allusion to the wounded, after which the writer proceeds. "Of which Mr. Hampden was one, who would not stay that morning till his own regiment came up, but put himself a volunteer in the head of those troops who were upon their march, and was the principal cause of their precipitation, contrary to his natural temper, which, though full of courage, was usually very wary; but now, carried on by his fate, he would by no means expect the general's coming up, and he was of that universal authority that no officer paused in obeying him. And so in the first charge he received a pistol shot in his shoulder, which broke the bone, and put him to great torture; and after he had endured it about three weeks, or less time, he died, to the most universal grief of the Parliament that they could have received from any accident: and it equally increased the joy for the success at Oxford, and very reasonably; for the loss of a man, which would have been thought a full recompense for a considerable defeat, could not but be looked upon as a glorious crown of a victory." Is it possible, after this, to credit

* Lord Nugent's Memorials, vol. ii., p. 412. Coates's Papers, May 26.

† "It is traditionally said that a military chest of money was left at the house of one Robert Parslow, where Hampden lay that night, and that it was never called for after, by which means Parslow was enabled to bequeath a liberal legacy to the poor of that parish. On every anniversary of his funeral, November 19th, a bell tolls in Watlington from morning till sunset, and twenty poor men are provided with coats. These particulars I derive from the intelligent Mr. John Badcock, for forty years a resident at Pyrton and its neighbourhood, but now of St. Helen's, who wrote in 1816 a very ingenious little history of Watlington."

his body, and his arm hung powerless and shattered by his side. Sheffield was severely wounded, and fell into the hands of the enemy. Overwhelmed by numbers, their best officers killed or taken, the great leader of their hopes and of their cause thus dying among them, and the day absolutely lost, the Parliamentarians no longer kept their ground. Essex came up too late; and Rupert, though unable to pursue, made good his retreat across the river to Oxford."

Immediately after this melancholy day, "a true relation" of the affair was published in London. I present it, without abridgment, from the king's collection of pamphlets. When it appeared Hampden yet lived, and hope was entertained of his recovery:

"Upon Monday last it was informed, by divers letters, and severall persons that came from the armie, to this effect, namely, That on Saturday last, three or four troopes of the king's forces having wheeled about from Abington to Wallingford, and from thence towards Stoken Church, under the hills neare to Tetsworth, they came unto a towne three miles from Thame, called Chinner (at which place the lord-generall, with his maine forces, consisting, as it is credibly informed, of very neare 30,000 able fighting men, were quartered), it being upon the edge of Buckinghamshire, at which place were quartered about 400 of the Parliament's forces, the greatest part whereof were forces that lately came to assist his excellencie in the Parliament's service, which came out of Bedfordshire and Essex; and missing of the Parliament's scouts, they came to the said towne, and gave a sudden assault against the Parliament's forces there, and cut off some of their sentinells, and entered the towne, and, according to their barbarous and destructive manner, fired the same in divers places. But, before I proceed in the further relation of this businesse, I may not forget the valour and courage of the Parliament's forces which were in this towne; for they charged the enemy with as much courage and resolution as could be expected or performed by men being unexpectedly assaulted, and continued fighting with them many houres. Upon this assault of the enemy, an alarm was given at the lord-generall's quarters at Thame, upon which divers troopes of horse were designed to sally forth upon this expedition; and amongst those colonells and commanders that were, at an instant, willing to hazard their lives upon this designe, Colonell Hampden (who is a gentleman that hath never beene wanting to adventure his life and fortunes for the good and welfare of his king and countrey) may not be forgotten, who, finding of a good troope of horse (whose captaine was at that time willing), desired to know whether they would be commanded by him upon this designe; whereupon the officers and common souldiers freely and unanimously consented, and proffered to adventure their lives with this noble gentleman, and showed much cheerfulness that they could have the honour to be led by so noble a captaine. And so the said Colonell Hampden, and some other colonells and captaines, came with a considerable partie of horse with all expedition, to assist the rest of their forces, which as aforesaid were quartered at Chinner; and as soon as the Cavaliers perceived that some of the lord-generall's forces were come in from Thame, they presently fled from Chinner backe againe towards Tetsworth, and were then pursued by Colonell Hampden and the rest of the lord-generall's forces that came upon this designe about two miles, in which pursuit there were many of the king's forces killed and taken prisoners. In which retreat this is observable, that the Cavaliers (as it appeared afterwards) had plotted, in a perfidious manner, to have intrapped the Parliament's forces, and to have killed or taken them all prisoners. But it pleased God to prevent their plot; for in the way, Prince Rupert, who, with about 1000 horse, lay in ambush readie to fall upon the Parliament's forces, as they were in pursuit of the first victory, appeared, and gave a hot charge upon the Parliament's forces; but, although the Earle of Essex's forces were scarce ten for one that were at this time in the battel, yet they gave them a brave volly of shot, and slew many of the enemy's forces as well at this place, which was neare Tetsworth, as at Chinner, and for some time, it being Sunday morning, held them fight without the losse of many men; but at last, the enemy having intelligence that some regiments of foot were coming from Thame of the lord-generall's forces, they retreated towards Abington, and durst not fight till they came in, for the foot forces are a great amazement unto them.

"Having thus farre in a generall manner declared the truths of this businesse, it rests, in the next place, that I enter into some particulars concerning the same, for the better satisfaction of the kingdome, whose expectation thirsteth after the same. I dare not delude with false and fabulous matter, and therefore I shall (being the first relater hereof) omit uncertaine reports, rather than commit that to writing which hereafter may be questionable; and therefore I shall be more sparing therein, and write onely those things which are authenticke; which that I may doe, First, it is certaine that Colonell Hampden, that noble and valiant gentleman, received a shott with a bullet behind in the shoulder, which stuck between the bone and the flesh, but is since drawne forth, and himself very cheerfull and heartie, and is, through God's mercy, more likely to be a badge of honour than any danger of life.

"Serjt. Major Gunter, a gentl. of the Parliament's side, was slaine, and Capt. Buller (as it is thought) taken prisoner: some other prisoners were taken on the Parliament's side; but, in regard the particulars of the fight were not knowne when the intelligence came from the armie, I shall omit to particularize any more of them.

"On the enemy's side was slaine Capt. Legge (who was once taken prisoner by the Parliament's forces, and made an escape); and it is said that Col. Urrie, which was heretofore employed in the Parliament's service, and was the last weeke in London, is either killed or taken prisoner. Thomas Howard is also taken prisoner by the Parliament's forces, with divers the statement which has been made of Charles's affected sympathy, and offer to send his own surgeon to Hampden?

other gent. of qualitie, besides common soul-diers.

"The certaine number that were slaine on either side I shall not at this time relate, for that it was not knowne in the armie when the post that brought this tidings came from thence; but it is reported that there was an equal losse on both sides, there being 400 slaine on both sides.

"A great part of the towne of Chinner was burnt by the king's forces; by which doings, compared with what hath beene certified out of other parts, we may see that killing, burning, and destroying of all that is deare to us, is the religion, lawes, and propertie of the subject they seeke for."

Essex himself immediately wrote to the speaker of the House of Commons; and, anxious to preserve the immediate records of this memorably mournful event, I have extracted this letter, dated the day after Hampden received his wound, from the same sources:

"Sir,—There being some of my horse that had an encounter with the enimie yesterday, being Sunday, I have thought fit to give the House an account of the particulars of it, knowing howe apt many are to report things to our disadvantage.

"About two of the clock on Sunday morning, the enimie, with about 1200 horse, and a great bodie of dragoons, felle into a towne called Poreham [Postcombe], where one troope of horse (being Col. Morley's) was quartered, of which they took the greatest part, and from thence went not farre to another village called Chinner, where they beate up some of the new Bedfordshire dragoons, and took some of them prisoners, and three of their colours; and some of the officers behaving themselves very well, and defending the houses wherein they were, they set fire to the towne. These being out quarters, the alarm came where Major Gunter lay with three troopes, viz., his owne, Captaine Sheffield's, and Captaine Crosse's, whom he presently drew out, and marched towards the enimie. Colonell Hampden being abroad with Sir Samuel Luke, and onely one man, and seeing Major Gunter's forces, they did go along with them. Col. Dabier, the quartermaster-generall, did likewise come to them. With these they drew neare the enimie, and finding them marching away, kept still upon the reare for nearely five miles. In this time there joyned with them Captaine Sander's troope, and Captaine Buller, with fiftie commanded men, which were sent to Chinner by Sir Philip Stapleton (who had the watch here that night at Thame), when he discovered the fire there, to know the occasion of it; he likewise sent one troope of dragoons under the command of Capt. Dundasse, who came up to them. There were likewise some of Col. Melve's dragoons that came to them. At length our men pressed them so neare, that, being in a large pasture ground, they drew up, and notwithstanding the inequality of the numbers, we having not above 300 horse, our men charged them very gallantly, and slew divers of them; but while they were in fight, the enimie, being so very strong, kept a bodie of horse for his reserve, and with that bodie wheeled about and charged our men in the reare, so that, being incompassed and overborne with multitudes, they broke and fled, though it was not very farre; for when I hearde that our men marched in the reare of the enimie, I sent to Sir Philip Stapleton, who presently marched towards them with his regiment, and though he came somewhat short of the skirmish, yet seeing our men retreat in that disorder, he stopt them, caused them to draw into a bodie with him, where they stood about an houre, whereupon the enimie marched away. In this skirmish there were slaine fortie and five on both sides, whereof the greater part were theirs.

"They carried off the bodies of divers persons of qualitie. On our side Major Gunter was killed, but some say he is prisoner, and so hurt; a man of much courage and fidelitie, his bravery engaging him and his small partie too farre. Col. Hampden put himselfe in Captaine Crosse his troope, where he charged with much courage, and was unfortunately shott through the shoulder. Sir Samuel Luke thrice taken prisoner, and fortunately rescued. Capt. Crosse had his horse killed under him in the midst of the enimie, and was mounted by one of his owne men, who quitted his owne horse to save his captaine.

"Capt. Buller was shott in the neck, who showed very much resolution in this fight, taking one prisoner after he was shott. Monsieur Dalbier, with Captaine Bosa, and Capt. Ennis, did likewise carry themselves very well. Wee likewise lost two colours, Major Gunter's and Captaine Sheffield's. No prisoners of qualitie were taken by the enimie but Capt. Sheffield's brother. Prince Rupert was there in person, and the renagado Urrie. Wee took prisoner one of the Earle of Berk's sonnes; Capt. Gardiner, the late recorder's sonne of London; and Capt. Smith, with some others of qualitie, and divers prisoners.

"Sir, this is the true relation of what passed in this businesse. I rest

"Your assured friend,

"ESSEX.

"Thame, 19th of June, 1643."

The graphic touches of the following, taken from one of the Parliament newspapers, will complete the sad narrative: "In the late skirmish with the Cavaliers between Thame and Oxford, my lord-generall's owne letter, in print, expresses the particulars where five troopes of the Parliament's forces charged fifteen troopes of the enimie's, and did, with their pistols and carbines, at the first charge, doe great execution; but the enimie, when they begun to close, having long rapiers and swords, a foot and halfe longer than ordinary, did therewith much annoy the Parliament souldiers, except that great-spirited little Sir Samuel Luke, who so guarded himselfe with his short sword that he escaped without hurt, though thrice taken prisoner, yet rescued, and those to whom he was prisoner slaine. The third time he was taken prisoner, one of his owne men, seeing two lead away his master a-foot, with his carbine he killed one of them, and runne the other through with his sword, and mounted Sir Samuel upon one of their horses, and brought him cleare off, for which his noble master gave him £100, as he well deserved it. Colonell Hampden and Sergeant-major Gunter were hurt at the first charge, Colonel Urrie, that renegade, crying, 'That's Hampden,' 'That's Gunter,' 'That's Luke,' which made the enemy so fierce upon our commanders. This false-hearted Urrie, that hath so long served the Parliament under pretence of affection, and hath been privy so much to the counsells of the army, communicating from time to time to the Cavaliers at Oxford the designs of the Earle of Essex, about three or four days after he runne away to Oxford, knowing the quarters of the Parliament's army, commanded a partie of the Cavaliers, and so betrayed the Parliament's forces in the said skirmish."

The Royalists soon received the welcome news of this dreadful day. "One of the prisoners," says Lord Clarendon, "who had been taken in the action, said 'that he was confident Mr. Hampden was hurt, for he saw him ride off the field before the action was done, which he never used to do, and with his head hanging down, and resting his hands upon the neck of his horse,' by which he concluded he was hurt." It is a tradition, Lord Nugent adds, in an affecting passage of his Memorials, "that he was seen first moving in the direction of his father-in-law's (Simeon's) house at Pyrtou. There he had in youth married the first wife of his love, and thither he would have gone to die. But Rupert's cavalry were covering the plain between. Turning his horse, therefore, he rode back across the grounds of Hazeley in his way to Thame. At the brook which divides the parishes he paused a while; but it being impossible for him, in his wounded state, to remount, if he had alighted to turn his horse over, he suddenly summoned his strength, clapped spurs, and cleared the leap. In great pain, and almost fainting, he reached Thame, and was conducted to the house of one Ezekiel Browne, where, his wounds being dressed, the surgeons would, for a while, have given him hopes of life. But he felt that his hurt was mortal; and, indulging no weak expectations of recovery, he occupied the few days that remained to him in dispatching letters of counsel to the Parliament in prosecution of his favourite plan. While the irresolute and lazy spirit which had directed the army in the field should continue to preside in the council of war, Hampden had reason to despair of the great forward movement to which he had throughout looked for the success of the cause; and now the reinforcements which were pouring into Oxford from the north, and the weakened condition of the Parliament, made the issue of this more doubtful. His last urgent advice was to concentrate the position of the army covering the London road, and provide well for the threatened safety of the metropolis, and thus to rouse the troops from the mortifying remembrance of their late disasters to vigorous preparations, which yet might lead, by a happier fortune, in turn to a successful attack."

But, after nearly six days of cruel suffering, his bodily powers no longer sufficed to pursue or conclude the business of his earthly work. About seven hours before his death he received the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, declaring that "though he could not away with the governance of the Church by bishops, and did utterly abominate the scandalous lives of some clergymen, he thought its doctrine in the greater part primitive and conformable to God's word, as in Holy Scripture revealed." He was attended by Dr. Giles, the rector of Chinner, with whom he had lived in habits of close friendship, and Dr. Spurstow, an independent minister, the chaplain of his regiment. At length, being well-nigh spent, and labouring for breath, he turned himself to die in prayer. "O Lord God of hosts," said he, "great is thy mercy, just and holy are thy dealings unto us sinful men. Save me, O Lord, if it be thy good will, from the jaws of death. Pardon my manifold transgressions. O Lord, save my bleeding country. Have these realms in thy special keeping. Confound and level in the dust those who would rob the people of their liberty and lawful prerogative. Let the king see his error, and turn the hearts of his wicked counsellors from the malice and wickedness of their designs. Lord Jesu, receive my soul!" He then mournfully uttered, "O Lord, save my country. O Lord, be merciful to . . ." and here his speech failed him. He fell back in the bed and expired.*

He was buried among the hills and woods of the Chilterns. Many troops in the neighbourhood followed the beloved body to its grave, in the parish church adjoining his mansion. With arms reversed, drums and ensigns muffled, and heads uncovered, they marched with what remained of the illustrious patriot to his last resting-place, singing the 90th Psalm as they went, and the 43d as they returned.

The "Weekly Intelligencer" published an interesting article the week after his death, which is here subjoined: "The losse of Colonel Hampden goeth neare the hearte of every man that loves the goode of his king and country, and makes some conceive little content to be at the armie now that he is gone. It offers me an opportunitie to present you with some more weekly intelligence, which I intend to continue. The memorie of this deceased colonell is such that in no age to come but it will more and more be had in honour and esteeme: a man so religious, and of that prudence, judgement, temper, valour, and integritie, that he hath left few his like behind him. His bitterest enemies could never fasten any action of disrepute upon him, but one (as they called it), which I conceive was for his eternall honour, that he was too zealous a Christian (as by their pamphlets at Oxford appeares), which, if it be a sinne, then of all sinnes in this world the Cavaliers are least guiltie of it. What man of this kingdome deserved more of the Commonwealth (when it was almost treason to say I will stand for my libertie) than this gent. did, when he (alone) stood for the subject's libertie and propertie, choosing, rather than to pay 40s. to the prejudice of the subject, to spend £1000 in the lawfull defence thereof, viz., in the great intollerable tax of ship-money (in the times of peace, when there was no need of it, but that the designs of the times were to break the ice to drive us under an arbitrary government); and I appeal to the consciences of the malignants

* Clough's Narration.—[In the Ashmole Museum is a locket of plain cornelian, which, it is said, Hampden wore on his breast. On the silver rim these words are inscribed:

"Against my king I never fight,
But for my king and country's right."—C.]

if they did not honour him then above all the subjects in the kingdome? Master Hoborne (though now through other respects of another minde) was then one of his chiefe champions to pleade his and the kingdome's case; for his temper and prudence in the carriage of that businesse he was admired of all men, and God (contrary to the designes of man, and the countenance of great lords and courtiers now at Oxford, then present to awe the judges at the time of the argument of that case) produced good effects to the kingdome, and damned ship-money in the opinion of the people, whatever the opinion of some of the judges were. Howe hath this gentleman carried himselfe since this Parliament begun! Constant to defend our religion and libertie, for which cause alone (for no other cause yet appeares to the world) he with four others was accused of high treason by Master Herbert, first the queene's attorney, then the king's, who, being afterwards questioned for it in the presence of both houses of Parliament, did publicly declare that though he accused them of high treason, whereby their lives lay at stake, their estates might become forfeit, and their posteritie branded with infamy, yet he had no more cause, prooffe, or reason to accuse Master Hampden, or any of the other four members, than to accuse the child unborne; onely his master commanded him to do it, and the king offered to pass a bill to cleare him and them, though since refused; and by his last proclamation of the 16th of June instant to dissolve this Parliament, passes by one of the five members in the particular exception, notwithstanding the said accusations. I will add onely a worde more concerning him (though too much of his worth cannot be said), that his whole indeavours since the Parliament begun was for the publike, not regarding his private in any kinde. He wisely foresaw the designes of the counsell about the king to introduce a tyrannicall government, and thereby to set up poperie, and was sensible of the correspondency of counsells in the distractions of the three kingdomes (as both houses have voted); and that, all former plots and designes against Scotland and this present Parliament failing, the said counsells resolved on the bloodie rebellion in Ireland, and the destroying this Parliament by the sword, as their last refuge to bring to pass their designes, which encouraged him timely to contribute his advice to the kingdome to be in a posture to defend themselves; and least it should be thought to oppose the king or to injure him, these wordes have I seene in writing, which upon an occasion he used in Parliament, viz., "Perish may that man and his posteritie that will not deny himselfe in the greatest part of his fortune (rather than the king shall want) to make him both potent and beloved at home, and terrible to his enemies abroad, if he will be pleased to leave those evill counsells about him, and take the wholesome advice of his great counsell the Parliament!" And with this dutifull and loyall hearte to his prince, and indeavour to bring him to his Parliament for his countrey's good, he sacrificed his life; and said, before he died, that if he had twentie lives, all should goe this way, rather than the Gospell of our salvation (nowe so much fought against) should be trampled under foot."

And in an article of the "Weekly Account," written on the same sad occasion, some circumstances are added to our previous knowledge of the patriot: "Speaking of the affaires of Buckinghamshire, it puts me in remembrance of Master Hampden, that noble patriot of his countrey, whose losse is infinitely lamented in all places; for it is well knowne to the whole kingdome howe much he suffered for the good of his countrey, and that he endured for a long time together (about sixteen yeares since) close imprisonment in the Gatehouse about the loane money, which indangered his life, and was a very great meane so to impair his health that he never after did looke like the same man he was before. And did he not spend a great summe of money out of his owne estate in defence of the kingdome's right in that great case of ship-money? And, to be briefe, as he was indueed with more than ordinary parts of wisdom, knowledge, and understanding, so was he as careful to improve and make a right use of them, so that (like Zachary and Elizabeth) he walked unblameable in all his conversation. That very day which he received that fatall wound he was just fiftie yeares of age. During the time that he lived after, which was just a weeke, he showed a wonderfull measure of patience and meaknesse, being full of divine sentences, speaking as if he felt no pain; saying it was nothing but what he dayly expected, and that he had long prepared against that time; and continued of perfect memorie, cheerefull spirit, constant in the cause, and encouraging others unto the last; and departed without feeling any pain at all, going out of a sweet slumber into a quiet sleepe. He was carried from Thame to Hampden, and interred in his father's tomb."

These extracts from the now scarce and valuable records of the time may be closed with some lines from an "elegie," not utterly unworthy of the theme, written by a friend and "fellow-soldier" of Hampden. They embody a picture of the great soldier himself in the excitement of battle.

"Though my malicious fate debarred my will
From waiting on your valour, when the shrill
And hasty trumpet bade your honour goe
With disadvantage 'gainst the subtle foe;
When treacherie and odds, crowned with successe,
Did triumph over our unhappinesse:
Yet give me leave, Renowned Dust, to send My gratefull muse in mourning to attend,
And strew some cypresse on your martial hearse.

Was he not pious, valiant, wise, and just,
Lovell and temperate? Everything that must Make up a perfect harmonie? Yee know
His constant actions have declared him so.

So was he truly valiant. I have seene
Him i' the front of 's regiment in greene,
When death about him did in ambush lye,
And whizzing shott like showres of arrowes flye, Waving his conqu'ring steale, as if that he
From Mars had got the sole monopolie
Of never-failing courage: and so cheare
His fighting men!

Farewell, beloved in Parliament and field,
Farewell, thy souldier's faithfull broken shield!"

And now, to complete the information which has been collected in these pages concerning one of the greatest men of the English history, the character which Clarendon has drawn of him in unfading colours may, without hesitation, be added. No one who has glanced through this work can be at a loss to separate the just from the unjust.

"He was a gentleman of a good family in Buckinghamshire, born to a fair fortune, and of a most civil and affable deportment. In his entrance into the world he indulged to himself all the license in sports, and exercise, and company which was used by men of the most jolly conversation. Afterward he retired to a more reserved and melancholy society,* yet preserving his own natural cheerfulness and vivacity, and, above all, a flowing courtesy to all men; though they who conversed nearly with him found him growing into a dislike of the ecclesiastical government of the Church, yet most believed it rather a dislike of some churchmen and of some introducements of theirs, which he apprehended might disquiet the public peace. He was rather of reputation in his own country than of public discourse or fame in the kingdom before the business of ship-money; but then he grew the argument of all tongues, every man inquiring who and what he was, that durst, at his own charge, support the liberty and property of the kingdom, and rescue his country, as he thought, from being made a prey to the court. His carriage throughout this agitation was with that rare temper and modesty, that they who watched him most narrowly to find some advantage against his person, to make him less resolute in his cause, were compelled to give him a just testimony, and the judgment that was given against him infinitely more advanced him than the service for which it was given. When this Parliament begun (being returned knight of the shire for the county where he lived), the eyes of all men were fixed on him as their patria pater, and the pilot that must steer the vessel through the tempests and rocks which threatened it; and I am persuaded his power and interest at that time were greater to do good or hurt than any man's in the kingdom, or than any man in his rank hath had in any time; for his reputation of honesty was universal, and his affections seemed so publicly guided, that no corrupt or private ends could bias them.

"He was of that rare affability and temper in debate, and of that seeming humility and submission of judgment, as if he brought no opinion of his own with him, but a desire of information and instruction; yet he had so subtle a way of interrogating, and, under the notion of doubts, insinuating his objections, that he left his opinions with those from whom he pretended to learn and receive them; and even with them who were able to preserve themselves from his infusions, and discerned those opinions to be fixed in him with which they could not comply, he always left the character of an ingenuous and conscientious person. He was, indeed, a very wise man, and of great parts, and possessed with the most absolute spirit of popularity—that is, the most absolute faculties to govern the people—of any man I ever knew. For the first year of the Parliament he seemed rather to moderate and soften the violent and distempered humours than to inflame them; but wise and dispassioned men plainly discerned that that moderation proceeded from prudence, and observation that the season was not ripe, rather than that he approved of the moderation; and that he begat many opinions and notions, the elucidation whereof he committed to other men, so far disguising his own designs that he seemed seldom to wish more than was concluded; and in many gross conclusions, which would hereafter contribute to designs not yet set on foot, when he found them sufficiently backed by majority of voices, he would withdraw himself before the question, that he might seem not to consent to so much visible unreasonableness, which produced as great a doubt in some, as it did approbation in others, of his integrity. What combination soever had been originally with the Scots for the invasion of England, and what farther was entered into afterward in favour of them, and to advance any alteration of the government in Parliament, no man doubts was at least with the privacy of this gentleman.

"After he was among those members accused by the king of high treason, he was much altered, his nature and carriage seeming much fiercer than it did before. And without question, when he first drew his sword, he threw away the scabbard; for he passionately opposed the overture made by the king for a treaty from Nottingham, and as eminently any expedients that might have produced any accommodations in this that was at Oxford; and was principally relied on to prevent any infusions which might be made into the Earl of Essex towards peace, or to render them ineffectual if they were made, and was, indeed, much more relied on by that party than the general himself. In the first entrance into the troubles, he undertook the command of a regiment of foot, and performed the duty of a colonel on all occasions most punctually. He was very temperate in diet, and a supreme governor over all his passions and affections, and had thereby a great power over other men's. He was of an industry and vigilance not to be tired out or wearied by the most laborious, and of parts not to be imposed upon by the most subtle or sharp, and of a personal courage equal to his best parts, so that he was an enemy not to be wished wherever he might have been made a friend, and as much to be apprehended where he was so as any man could deserve to be, and therefore his death was no less congratulated in the one party than it was condoled in the other. In a word, what was said of Cinna might well be applied to him: 'he had a head to contrive, and a tongue to persuade, and a hand to execute any mischief.' His death, therefore, seemed to be a great deliverance to the nation."

In other words, the death of the noble and fearless Hampden, while it plunged every honest English heart into the depths of sorrow, revived in the tyrant Charles and his slavish ministers their hope of being able to trample into the dust once more the laws and liberties of England.

* [This has been already alluded to, and probably refers to his devotion to legal pursuits.—C.]

SIR HENRY VANE THE YOUNGER.—1612-1662.

HENRY VANE, the eldest son of Sir Henry Vane, of Hadlow, in Kent, was borne in the year 1612. His family could trace itself back to the earliest times of the English history.* They sprang from Howel ap Vane, of Monmouthshire, whose son, Griffith ap Howel Vane, married Lettice, daughter of Bledwin ap Kenwyn, lord of Powis. Six generations after this mark the date of the battle of Poitiers, where the then representative of the family, Henry Vane, received knighthood on the field as the reward of great bravery. After the lapse of five more generations, one of the branches of the family altered the name to Fane, which was retained by the descendants of his second son, while the issue of his fourth son, John, who had inherited the manor of Hadlow, and other estates in Kent and elsewhere, in consequence of the eldest son dying without issue, resumed in the second generation the old name of Vane. The eldest son of this last-named John was unwarily drawn into Sir Thomas Wyatt's insurrection, but pardoned, on the score of youth, by Mary, and afterward elected to two of Elizabeth's Parliaments. Henry Vane, the father of the subject of this memoir, was his eldest grandson, and it was by him the ancient name was resumed.

Sir Henry Vane the elder is described by Clarendon as a busy and a bustling man, and a rapid glance over the chief incidents of his life will show the correctness of the description. He was born in 1589, and received knighthood from James I. in 1611. He travelled afterward for three years, and mastered many foreign languages. On his return to England, he was elected to the Parliament of 1614 by the city of Carlisle, and from this period, during many years, exerted considerable influence in the cabinets of James and Charles. James had appointed him, soon after his entry into the House of Commons, cofferer to the prince, who continued him in the same office on his own accession to the throne, and made him one of his privy council. In the Parliaments of 1620 and 1625, he continued to sit for Carlisle; and he served in every subsequent Parliament to the time of his death, having been elected for Thetford in Norfolk, Wilton in Wiltshire, and for the county of Kent. As a diplomatist, he appears justly entitled to high praise; in other matters, it may not be unjust to use the words of Clarendon, that he had "credit enough to do his business in all places, and cared for no man, otherwise than as he found it very convenient for himself."† In 1631 he had been appointed ambassador extraordinary to renew the treaty of friendship and confederacy with Christian of Denmark, and also, in a similar character, to conclude on a firm peace and alliance with Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden. Both these treaties were of great importance to the power and the commercial interests of England, and he concluded both auspiciously. He returned home in 1632, and in 1633 gave a princely entertainment, at his castle of Raby, to Charles, then on his way to Scotland to be crowned, as he did again on a more fatal occasion, in 1639, when the king was marching with his melancholy "expedition to Scotland," in which Sir Henry Vane himself had the command of a regiment. In the latter year he was made comptroller of the household, and some months after this appointment received the highest seat in Charles's administration, that of principal secretary of state. The latter years of his life associate themselves with the fortunes of his illustrious son.

The mother of the famous Sir Henry Vane was Frances Darcy, of an old family in Essex. She had many other children, of whom the second son, Sir George Vane, was knighted in 1640, and seated himself in retirement at Long Melton, in the county of Durham, while Charles distinguished himself as a diplomatist under the Commonwealth, when envoy to Lisbon. One of her daughters married Sir Thomas Honeywood,* of Essex, a man of learning and a good soldier; another, Sir Francis Vincent, of Surrey; a third married Sir Thomas Liddel, of Ravensworth, an ancestor of the present Earl of Ravensworth; while the eldest became the wife of Sir Thomas Pelham, the ancestor of those families which are now represented by the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of Chichester, and Lord Yarborough. It may be worth adding, that the present earldom of Westmoreland is held by the lineal descendant of that branch of the Vane family who retained the assumed name of Fane, and that the present Duke of Cleveland, William Harry Vane, is the lineal descendant of the great statesman whose life will occupy these pages. A dukedom was given, in 1632, as the reward of a disinterested advocacy of popular principles—rewarded, in 1662, by a scaffold!‡

Such were the brilliant auspices which ushered Henry Vane into the world. The representative of a long line of illustrious ancestors, the immediate heir to great wealth, and, as it were, to the favour of the princes whom his father served, a broad and bright path stretched itself out before him, lighted by honours and enjoyments, and leading to luxury and power.

* See Wood's Fasti Oxoniensis, part ii., p. 167, ed. Bliss.

† It is scarcely necessary to say that allusion is here made to William Harry Vane, baron Raby of Raby Castle, and duke of Cleveland, known, before the accession of his present titles, as the Earl of Darlington, and also as the Marquis of Cleveland. He had an enormous interest at stake in the existence of the rotten boroughs, and yet voted in the House of Lords for their extinction on the memorable 4th of June, 1632, when that great measure of reform was consummated which his illustrious ancestor—the statesman whose life is written in these pages—had been the first to propose to Parliament. He received his dukedom early in the following year, with the addition of the very barony of Raby, in appropriating which, two centuries before, Lord Strafford had given such mortal offence to the elder Sir Henry Vane. The authorities for the pedigree of the Vanes will be found in the Biog. Brit., vol. vi., p. 3989; and in Collins's Peerage, vol. iv., p. 290.

* Ludlow states them to have been originally of the diocese of Durham. Memoirs, vol. ii., p. 110.

† History of the Rebellion, vol. i., p. 216, Oxford, 1826 (the only correct edition).

He received his education at Westminster school, under the care of Lambert Osbaldiston, and was school-fellow with Arthur Hazlerig, Thomas Scot, and others whom active participation in public affairs subsequently rendered famous.* Here, yielding for a time to the impulses of his youth and station, he entered wildly into the gayeties of both, and they soon showed him, by the light of sudden and awful contrast, a fiery sincerity in his soul, which had nothing in common with such things, but marked its owner out for serious and great achievements, and whispered to him, even then, of the possible regeneration of mankind. He shall describe the first dawning of this change in his own words, as he described it in after years to the multitudes who had assembled to see him die: "I was born a gentleman; had the education, temper, and spirit of a gentleman, as well as others; being, in my youthful days, inclined to the vanities of this world, and to that which they call good fellowship, judging it to be the only means of accomplishing a gentleman. But, about the fourteenth or fifteenth year of my age, which was about thirty-four or five years since, God was pleased to lay the foundation or groundwork of repentance in me, for the bringing me home to himself, by his wonderful rich and free grace, revealing his Son in me, that, by the knowledge of the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent, I might, even while here in the body, be made partaker of eternal life, in the first fruits of it."† His father appears to have remonstrated bitterly against his unwelcome change. "Yea," observes Sikes, "this change and new steering of his course contracted enmity to him in his father's house." And in the year after its occurrence he was sent as a gentleman commoner to Magdalen College, Oxford, where it is possible his father may have hoped that in such a nursery of dissipation and fantastic forms the youth might be induced to abandon his untoward turn for seriousness and the realities.

Such a hope, if ever entertained, was doomed to very decisive disappointment. "At about sixteen years of age," says Anthony à Wood, "he became a gentleman commoner of Magdalen Hall, as his great creature, Henry Stubbe, hath several times informed me; but, when he was to be matriculated as a member of the University, and so consequently take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, he quitted his gown, put on a cloak, and studied, notwithstanding, for some time in the said hall." He then quitted Oxford for the Continent, and, passing through France, spent some time in Geneva,* where his strong tendency to the dispute and discussion of spiritual matters, it will readily be supposed, found little check or hindrance. He brought back with him to England, Clarendon tells us, "a full prejudice and bitterness against the Church, both against the form of the government and the liturgy, which was generally in great reverence, even with many of those who were not friends to the other."

Great was the consternation, meanwhile, of the now worthy comptroller of his majesty King Charles's household, the elder Vane. The open disaffection of his son in matters of religion could be concealed no longer: useless had been all threats and persuasions on that score; still more useless the endeavour to tame a yet stronger tendency to Republicanism, by bringing the youth within reach of the king. The presence chamber of Charles† had no charms for one to whom the house and heart of Pym were open. A last effort was made, and with a like result. The bishops took the matter in hand. "It was suggested," says his friend Sikes,‡ "by the bishops to the then king, concerning him, 'that the heir of a considerable family about his majesty was grown into dislike of the discipline and ceremonies of the Church of England, and that his majesty might do well to take some course about him.' On this, the then Bishop of London took him to task, who seemed to handle him gently in the conference, but concluded harshly enough against him in the close." Such a conference, and such a close to it, may be well imagined. The supreme self-confidence of Laud, lashing itself into imperious and passionate wonder against the calm and immovable reason of the young Republican recusant, is precisely what was likely to have been, and was also an exhibition in no way likely to increase the Church's claims to obedience or respect in the person of her most eminent prelate.

These opening passages of the life of Vane are decisive evidences of his greatness. What

* Wood's Ath. Ox., vol. iii., p. 578, ed. Bliss.

† Vane's speech on the scaffold, from a pamphlet "printed in the year 1662." A very extraordinary publication of the same year, to which I shall have very frequent occasion to refer, and which was written by one of Vane's associates, thus described this change in his habits and way of life: "He was born a gentleman. My next word is so much too big for that, that it may hardly seem decorous to stand so near it. He was a chosen vessel of Christ, separated (as Paul) from his mother's womb, though not actually called till 14 or 15 years' standing in the world ('twas longer ere Paul was called); during which time, such was the complexion and constitution of his spirit, through ignorance of God and his ways, as rendered him acceptable company to those they call good fellows (yet, at his worst, restrained from that lewdness intemperance sometimes leads into, which he hath been oft heard to thank God for), and so long he found tolerable quarter amongst men. Then God did, by some signal impressions and awakening dispensations, startle him into a view of the danger of his condition. On this, he and his former jolly company came presently to a parting blow." The title-page of the very singular and valuable book from which the above extract is taken runs in these words: "Life and Death of Sir Henry Vane, Knight; or, a short Narration of his earthly Pilgrimage, together with a true Account of his purely Christian, peaceable, spiritual, Gospel Principles, Doctrine, Life, and Way of worshipping God, for which he suffered Contradiction and Reproach from all sorts of Sinners, and at last a violent Death, June 14, Anno 1662. To which is added, his last Exhortation to his Children, the Day before his death. Printed in the Year 1662." The author was George Sikes, a bachelor in divinity, and fellow of Magdalen, in Oxford, where Vane studied, and, it may be supposed, their intimacy commenced. He was a thorough enthusiast, with all the sincerity and faith, though without the knowledge and various power, of Vane himself.

* Clarendon, vol. i., p. 326, Oxford edition of 1826.

† A favourite story of the ribald Royalist prints against young Vane had its origin in these efforts of his father to conquer his popular and Republican tastes, by bringing him into personal contact with the king. On one occasion, the youth was left alone by his father (purposely, no doubt) in the royal presence chamber, when Charles suddenly approaching, Vane as suddenly, resolute to avoid him, hid himself behind the arras. Charles, perceiving a motion in the hangings, poked with the stick he always carried at that part of the room, till Vane was obliged to come forth, and "retired in confusion." This was an insult, say the selfishly judging Royalist writers, which the young Republican never forgave.

‡ In the publication referred to above Life and Death of Sir Henry Vane.

he afterward became he had evidently willed already. To the mind of such a man, what is Temptation, or what Chance? In no case would they seem to have gone so nearly to overrule and determine the destiny of a man as in this case of the "son and heir" of the favourite minister of Charles I. But the power of Genius is the greatest power that the world has tested yet, and this Vane had. Impelled and sustained by it, he "waved and whistled off ten thousand strong and importunate temptations," and dashed the "dice-box of Chance" from her jewelled hand.

While his father, ignorant what course to hold with him, looked round in fear lest a hostile position, maintained resolutely, might ultimately weaken and embarrass his own influence at court, young Vane suddenly announced his determination at once to leave his country, and seek the liberty of conscience denied him here in the new world that had risen beyond the waters of the wide Atlantic. Shortly after, the Rev. Mr. Garrard had a choice piece of news to write to the lord-deputy of Ireland, which he worded thus, with his usual gossiping mixture of truth and falsehood: "Mr. Comptroller Sir Henry Vane's eldest son hath left his father, his mother, his country, and that fortune which his father would have left him here, and is, for conscience' sake, gone into New-England, there to lead the rest of his days, being about twenty years of age. He had abstained two years from taking the sacrament in England, because he could get nobody to administer it to him standing. He was bred up at Leyden; and I hear that Sir Nathaniel Rich and Mr. Pym have done him much hurt in their persuasions this way. God forgive them for it, if they be guilty!"*

When, twenty-seven years having passed, Sir Henry Vane addressed the English people and posterity from a scaffold, he thus described, in words never to be forgotten, the cause which moved him to this voluntary exile: "Since my early youth, through grace, I have been kept steadfast, desiring to walk in all good conscience towards God and towards man, according to the best light and understanding God gave me. For this, I was willing to turn my back upon my estate; expose myself to hazards in foreign parts; yea, nothing seemed difficult to me, so I might preserve faith and a good conscience, which I prefer before all things; and do earnestly persuade all people rather to suffer the highest contradictions from man, than disobey God by contradicting the light of their own conscience. In this it is I stand with so much comfort and boldness before you all this day."

America then stood forward, to the imaginations of the enthusiastic and the young, no less than to the oppressed consciences of worn and persecuted men, in the light of a promised land. The progress of her colonization had excited the utmost interest and curiosity throughout Europe; the fortunes of her first emigrants, glimmering back into the world they had left through the infinite wildernesses and over the vast and dismal ocean which now divided them from it, were strained after by their friends with painful earnestness and wonder; and, at each successive ship that left with pilgrim passengers to her shores, the admiration and amazement of men increased, that not of the poor, the unfortunate, or the lowly were these voluntary exiles, but rather, in the majority of instances, the most refined and accomplished examples of the civilization of the age. Not alone the scholar and the philosopher, but the wealthy, the high born, and the nobly bred, were thus seen willingly abandoning the classic quiet, the splendour, the refinement of their homes, urged and sustained by those grand designs and hopes which, having told them that mankind were born for a better system of government and a purer shape of society than existed in the Old World, now pointed out to them an opportunity of testing these exalted aspirations in the new and strange lands which had started up so suddenly beyond the vast and dismal ocean. The work, thus begun by pure philanthropists, was carried out to an extraordinary extent by Laud's terrible system of Church government; and, for many months before Vane so suddenly formed his resolution of exile, successive multitudes of sufferers for conscience' sake had been driven from their native country to take refuge in New-England, as the last home that was left for religion or for liberty.

In glancing at the infancy of the American colonies, even thus briefly, several considerations of great interest suggest themselves as to the peculiar forms and habits of society which were of necessity incident to that early state, and the intellectual influences which again, as a matter of course, sprang out of these forms. It will be a matter of importance to follow them, as far as we may, in their probable or possible effects upon the mind of Vane. The extraordinary spectacle of two extreme points of human progress brought back into direct contact, which awaited his landing on the American shores, could hardly be presented to such a mind without an effect scarcely less extraordinary. There he had to see a reunion of the city and the wilderness; a junction in the same men of the habits which belong to the highest advances of refinement, and to the most rude and primitive condition of humanity. In log-houses he would have to seek, not vainly, the most studiously polished manners of civilization; for "the same person whose evenings were spent in the studies of philosophy, learning, and religion, was engaged during the day in the midst of the forest, or floating in a bark canoe;"* toiling in labours which were the occupations of the rudest and most barbarous ages, the employments of the period when

"Nature first made man,
And wild in woods the noble savage ran."

Vane was not suffered to depart without many peevish remonstrances from his father; but it is said the king interfered at last, and intimated a wish for the absence of the young Republican.†

A characteristic circumstance awaited his presence on board the passage-ship. The Puritans and Nonconformists already assembled

* Sparks's American Biography.

† Neal's History of New-England, vol. i., p. 144. Neal adds, that Vane's design, "as he pretended," was to begin a settlement on the banks of the river Connecticut. And see Mather, book iii., p. 77.

* Strafford's Letters, vol. i., p. 463.

for the same distant voyage, instead of welcoming their illustrious fellow-exile, shrank from him with coldness and suspicion. He was the son of a minister of the king; he had a face that beamed with lustrous imagination; and he wore long hair! "His honourable birth," says his friend Sikes, "long hair, and other circumstances of his person, rendered his fellow-travellers jealous of him, as a spy to betray their liberty, rather than any way like to advantage their design." The old, vulgar, and never-failing resource, when we can find no better objection to a man! Clarendon has a remark of the same kind in his history: "Sir Harry Vane had an unusual aspect, which, though it might naturally proceed both from his father and mother, neither of which were beautiful persons, yet made men think there was somewhat in him of extraordinary; and his whole life made good that imagination."* A few short and pithy words out of Sikes's rhapsody furnish no bad result to that style of objection in the case of the Puritan voyagers: "But he that they thought at first sight to have too little of Christ for their company, did soon after appear to have too much for them."

Vane landed at Boston, in New-England, in 1635, and was admitted to the freedom of Massachusetts on the 3d of March in the same year. Whatever his first reception by the colonists may have been, his character and his powers very speedily attracted universal attention; and it became the theme of wonder and admiration with them all, that such a man, so fitted by his talents and his position to sway the destinies of men in courts and palaces, should "choose the better part" with the remote and unfriended exiles of the obscure wildernesses of Massachusetts. In 1636, after a very short residence among them, and while he had not yet completed his twenty-fourth year, "Mr. Vane" was elected governor of the colony.

Clarendon describes the population of Massachusetts at this time, garbling truth with falsehood, as "a mixture of all religions, which disposed the professors to dislike the government of the Church; who were qualified by the king's charter to choose their own government and governors, under the obligation 'that every man should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy,' which all the first planters did, when they received their charter, before they transported themselves from hence; nor was there, in many years after, the least scruple among them of complying with those obligations: so far men were, in the infancy of their schism, from refusing to take lawful oaths." In the same passage of the history, Vane's election and government are thus described: "He was no sooner landed there but his parts made him very quickly taken notice of; and very probably his quality, being the eldest son of a privy-counsellor, might give him some advantage, insomuch that, when the next season came for the election of their magistrates, he was chosen their governor, in which place he had so ill fortune (his working and unquiet fancy raising and infusing a thousand scruples of conscience, which they had not brought over with them, nor heard of before), that, he unsatisfied with them, and they with him, he transported himself into England, having sowed such seed of dissension there as grew up too prosperously, and miserably divided the colony into several factions, and divisions, and persecutions of each other, which still continue, to the great prejudice of that plantation; insomuch as some of them, upon the ground of their first expedition, liberty of conscience, have withdrawn themselves from their jurisdiction, and obtained other charters from the king, by which, in other forms of government, they have enlarged their plantation, within new limits adjacent to the other."* Nor by Clarendon alone has Vane's administration been thus spoken of, but by writers of better faith and a nobler purpose, whom it is difficult to imagine wilfully lending themselves to the propagation of error.†

A simple detail of the short administration of Vane, derived from various sources, all of them above suspicion,‡ will be the best answer to statements of this kind. It is true that that administration was in its duration brief and stormy, and not successful in its result; but greatness, truth, and goodness are of more value than length of years, than quiet, or success.

Vane had many serious difficulties to contend against, even before a single act of his government was known. The principal persons in the colony had been already gravely prejudiced against him by the extraordinary enthusiasm he had called forth among the great and general body of the settlers; for there is no worse crime than the power of awakening the enthusiasm of multitudes, in the eyes of those who have no such power. The day on which he assumed office saw a formidable party arrayed against him, determined, on no better grounds than this, to embarrass his government at every step. The influences which operated at that early time in the annals of Massachusetts, and particularly disposed the people, always prone to controversy, to be torn and divided by the factions and intrigues which might be set afloat in the young colony, were, of course, favourable to the success of the design.

Nevertheless, in Vane's discharge of the first and most ordinary duties of the station of chief magistrate, he manifested a firmness, energy,

* History of the Rebellion, vol. i., p. 327, 328.

† See Mather, book iii., p. 77; Neale, vol. i., p. 144; and the works of R. Baxter, passim. Mather has the following remark: "Mr. Vane's election will remain a blemish to their judgment who did elect him while New-England remains a nation; for, coming from England a young, unexperienced gentleman, by the industry of some who thought to make a tool of him, he was elected governor; and, before he was scarce warm in his seat, fell in with the sectaries, and sacrificed the peace of the state to them, leaving us a caveat that all good men are not fit for government." Baxter, in his life, after speaking of Vane in the thoughtless phrase he too often adopted towards him, indulges the following utterly fictitious statement of his unpopularity in New-England: "He was fain to steal away by night, and take shipping for England, before his year of government was at an end." (Abridgment, p. 98.) The entire untruth of this will be shown.

‡ Winthrop's History of New-England, the edition by Savage; Hutchinson's Collection of Original Papers; the second series of an extensive American work of history, called the "Massachusetts Historical Collections," and including, in its 6th and 7th volumes, Hubbard's "General History of New-England;" and, lastly, a Life of Vane, as "fourth governor of Massachusetts," by an eloquent and accomplished American writer, Mr. Charles Wentworth Upham, published a few years since in the course of a series of American biographies, and to which I feel most happy in confessing several important obligations. His admirable sketch of the Hutchinson controversy has been, in particular, a great assistance to me.

and wisdom truly remarkable in one of his early age and previous history. "He adapted himself," says Mr. Upham, "readily to his situation; made himself acquainted with the interests and relations of the colony; and concerted the operations of the government, which, in reference to the Indians, were particularly interesting at that period, with promptitude, skill, and effect." Men of great learning and old experience surrounded him; but in every measure of resource or ready practical wisdom he rose above them all; while in the intricate and profound discussions that occurred during his administration, embracing as they did the most perplexed questions of theological metaphysics, he bore his part in a manner which at once placed him on a level with the first divines of that age, and well deserved the praise of "wisdom and godliness," which his famous competitor and successor in the government, Winthrop, unreservedly bestowed upon him.*

The announcement of his election had been received with immense enthusiasm by the people; and, to increase the demonstrations of popular satisfaction, a salute was fired by the shipping in the harbour. Fifteen large vessels were at that time in port. Some few days after the firing of this salute, a deputation of the leading men of the colony waited on Vane, and represented to him that the presence of such a large force of foreign vessels was in itself a formidable and disagreeable circumstance in the condition of a feeble settlement, which could not rely on the sympathy of the mother-country any more than it could upon the friendship of other powers. Whatever the motives for such a representation may have been, there was justice in it, and this Vane acknowledged at once. It was at least a matter of no doubt with every reflecting person, that the influence of the manners and habits of the officers and men of these ships could not be other than injurious to the morals and social condition of the inhabitants of the town.

A prevention of the evils, therefore, that might have sprung from such a source, was the first act of the government of Vane. Within a week after his election, he took measures to this end, which decidedly illustrate his tact in affairs, and his "skill and success in managing men." He invited all the captains of the ships to dine with him; and, taking advantage of the generous dispositions that are born of a good dinner, laid the whole case before them. The conversation is described to have been conducted with infinite frankness and the friendliest spirit on both sides; and the natural result was, that the captains consented, "readily and cheerfully," to the agreement proposed by Vane, and which ran thus: "First, that all inward-bound vessels should come to anchor below the fort, and wait for the governor's pass before coming up to the town; secondly, that, before discharging their cargoes, their invoices should in all cases be submitted to the inspection of the government; and, thirdly, that none of their own crews should ever be permitted to remain on shore after sunset, except under urgent necessity.†

The very next incident of Vane's government furnishes a striking illustration of his own character, no less than the character of the men he had to deal with, and who were necessarily associated with him in the government. It was in itself of little intrinsic importance, but it afforded the first occasion of active opposition to the young governor.

The mate of an English ship, called the Hector, then lying at anchor in Boston harbour, in an excess of loyal indignation because the king's colours were not displayed at the fort (which was not then the custom), declared, one day, on the deck of his vessel, and in the presence of many of the inhabitants of the town, then visiting her, that the colonists were all "traitors and rebels." The expression was quickly communicated from the ship and circulated through the town: a violent excitement against the mate was the immediate and very natural consequence; and so high did it run at last, that it became necessary to take official cognizance of the offence that had provoked it. Vane accordingly sent for the captain of the ship, and, after acquainting him with the affair, despatched a marshal, accompanied by other officers of the law, to arrest the offender. The crew, however, refused to deliver up the mate in the captain's absence, upon which the captain himself accompanied the marshal to the vessel, when the mate was at once surrendered, and made an ample and satisfactory apology to the civil authorities. But, the dignity of the colony vindicated, another care presented itself to the scrupulous thoughts of Governor Vane, scarcely less important than that called forth by the insult so atoned for, since it involved what might possibly be the just and well grounded feelings of conscientious men.

He had seen that some circumstances connected with the transaction I have just described had been "taken very much to heart" by the general body of officers of British vessels in the port, and he now at once summoned them to a conference with himself and the magistrates of the colony, in which he requested a free expression of whatever had occurred to them. They observed, in reply, with much courtesy and temper, that it was more than likely the circumstances of the recent dispute might be made known to the authorities in England, and represented there in such a manner as to create a prejudice against the colony, and bring its loyalty into suspicion; and that, therefore, as sincere friends of the colony, it would be very agreeable to them could they be enabled to say that they had seen the king's colours flying in Boston.

For the captains a courteous and fair request, but for the conscience-suffering, recusant Puritans a most distressing dilemma! On the one hand, it was clear, as Mr. Upham urges, that for a colony, holding its very being under a charter from the crown, to refuse to acknowledge the king's sovereignty by displaying his flag, and that, too, when it was requested for the purpose of rescuing its loyalty from misrepresentation, would look like a very unreasonable procedure, and almost seem to justify the expressions for which the mate had been humbled and punished.* But then, on the other hand, it would have filled the whole country with horror had the flag been hoisted, for on that flag was represented the PAPAL CROSS—an abomination no Puritan could bear; and Endicott himself, one of the leading emigrants, whose daring hand had before torn it from the royal ensign,* was one of the board of magistrates who were so politely requested to hoist that very ensign, cross and all!

* Upham, p. 109.

† Winthrop's History of New-England, Savage's ed., vol. i., p. 187. Upham's Life, p. 111.

* American Biography, p. 113.

A lucky accident seemed to offer the hope of escaping both horns of this dilemma; they could not hoist the king's flag, for there were no such colours in the whole colony.† The captains, unfortunately, had a resource at hand. They offered to lend or give a set of the king's colours to the colony to be displayed on the occasion. Vane now saw that all chance of evading the question was quite shut out, and urged upon the magistrates the necessity of meeting it fairly and openly. This reasonable answer was accordingly returned: that although they were fully persuaded that the cross in the colours was idolatrous, yet, as the fort belonged to the king, they were willing that his own flag should fly there.

The conference thus closed, however, was doomed to be reopened the following day with greater violence. The case and its result had been submitted in the evening to the consideration of the clergy, a practice exacted from the government on all disputed questions, and the proceedings of Vane and the magistrates did not meet their approbation. It was thought a grave error to have sanctioned, upon any terms whatever, the display of the king's flag, that badge of Romish superstition, over Puritan soil; and the court was therefore again assembled, and the captains summoned to appear next morning, when the previous minute of the board was reconsidered, and, after a stormy debate, a majority of the magistrates voted to refuse what they had granted the day before. Vane now interfered with his authority as governor of the colony; and in a temperate but earnest remonstrance, after vindicating the strength and purity of his own religious faith, pointed out to the assembled magistrates that that must be a very far-fetched and excessive scruple, not to say an absurd or capricious one, which would induce them to refuse to recognise the king's authority in his own dominions, on his own fort, by a ceremony innocent in itself, and which was requested for the avowed purpose of preserving peace and harmony, and preventing a misunderstanding between the colony and the people of England, under circumstances that would certainly be highly injurious, and, it was possible, might become even ruinous to the colony. The magistrates, with one exception, remained unmoved by this appeal; the jealousy of Vane, which had for some time rankled in the breasts of the leading settlers, had now found an outlet; and even Winthrop, the founder and patriarch of the colony, a man of eminence and excellent dispositions, was induced to place himself at the head of the obstinate objectors. Upon this, Vane, supported only by the magistrate alluded to, Mr. Dudley, announced his determination to avail himself of his privilege as governor, and, under a protest against acknowledging the idolatrous sign upon the flag, to display it from the fort on his own personal responsibility and that of Mr. Dudley.*

This was the commencement of that hostility to the young governor which, availing itself not long after of the fury of a theological controversy, ultimately brought his administration to a close. But will it now be doubted, in these days of reason and toleration, which of the parties were in the right? which course was the fairest, the most just, the most enlightened? It appears to me, that by the light which is thrown on Vane's character, even thus early, by an incident of this sort, we may reduce to fine and eloquent sense many passages in Sikes's tribute to his friend, which have hitherto passed for absurd and incoherent rhapsodies. Two may be quoted here.

"His principles, light, and wisdom were such, that he found the bare relation of his utmost aims among his fellow-labourers would in all probability so expose him to censure from all parties and sizes of understanding, as would disable him for doing anything at all. He was therefore for small matters rather than nothing, went hand and hand with them, step by step, their own pace, as the light of the times would permit. He was still for quitting the more gross disorders in church and state, corruptions in courts of judicature, popish and superstitious forms in religion and ways of worship, for what he found more refined and tolerable. But he ever refused to fix his foot, or take up his rest, in any form, company, or way, where he found the main bulk of professors avowedly owning but such outward principles of life and holiness as to him evidently lay short of the glory, righteousness, and life hid with Christ in God. He was still for pressing towards the mark. He was more for things than persons, spirit than forms. This carriage of his, all along in New-England and in Old, exposed him as a mark for the arrow from almost all sorts of people, rendering him a man of contention with the whole earth. Yet was he all along a true son of peace, a most industrious and blessed peacemaker to the utmost of his power, for the reconciling all sorts of conscientious men, whatever variety of persuasion or form he found them in, to one another and to Christ." Refuting again, in another passage, the common report and "general reproach" that was cast upon Vane, that "he was a man of con-

* American Biography, p. 113.

† Mr. Upham remarks, upon the curious circumstance that not a single royal ensign could be found in Massachusetts in 1636, that it indicates the substantial independence of the colony at that early period. It did not attract the notice, and was therefore out of the reach of the royal power; and not merely of the royal power, but of the very insignia of that power. The people would not have anything among them which would tend in the least degree to remind them of the hierarchy or the throne. Mr. Upham adds: "When, in the course of the present year (1834), a British vessel of war arrived in the harbour of Salem, in Massachusetts, and it was proposed, according to international usage, to observe the civility of displaying from the vessel the flag of the United States, and from the town the flag of Great Britain, it was found necessary to borrow colours for the occasion from the British vessel herself. This circumstance was noticed as indicating the absence of all relations between the port of Salem and Great Britain at the time of its occurrence. A similar indication was given, as just related, in 1636; and the inference is more than fanciful; it is just and obvious, that the actual connexion between the colony of Massachusetts and the mother-country, at the beginning, was scarcely greater than that of the town of Salem with England at the present day."

* Savage's edition of Winthrop, i., 187. Upham's Life.

tention from his youth up, wherever he came or had to do, in New-England or in Old," Sikes thus continues: "He was no humoursome, concealed maintainer of any perverse or irrational opinions, but a most quiet, calm, composed speaker forth of the words of truth and soberness at all seasons, upon all occasions, and in all companies. He was full of condescension and forbearance, hating nothing more in his very natural temper than wrangling and contention. He would keep silence even from good (though his sorrow was stirred by it, and the fire burned within while he was musing) in case that either wicked or but shortsighted good men were before him that he perceived could not bear more spiritual and sublimated truths. He became all things to all men, that he might by all means save some. His heart was of a right scripture latitude; stood fair and open for any good, but no evil. All sorts of conscientious inquirers after truth found a friendly reception with him; yea, he was in a constant readiness to perform any warrantable civilities to all men. Anything that was good he owned and cherished in the honest moral heathen, legal Christian, or spiritual believer; and he sought opportunity by honest insinuations to 'catch them with guile,' and lead them forward into more excellent truths."

In such passages as these, a divinely beautiful character is depicted, and one which the reality will not be found to fall short of.

Vane's great influence with the people of the colony enabled him for some time to withstand effectually the hostility of its chiefs; and we find that early in July he started on a tour through the towns on the northern and eastern parts of the Bay, and made a public entrance into Salem on the 9th of that month, amid every demonstration of affection and enthusiasm. Mr. Upham states that he sought upon the spot in vain for any records of this great event, as no doubt it was considered by the people of that ancient town; but in their absence he indulges a picture of the scene, as fancy and probability might delineate it.* Such a picture would have little interest for the English reader, uninstructed in the distant locality, but the simple idea which suggests itself to the mind of the general character of a progress such as this of Vane must have been, includes many considerations of interest. We cannot refrain from speculating on the effect likely to have been produced on the extraordinary mind of the chief actor in the pageant, as he moved along the winding streets of a succession of straggling quiet villages, then for the first time, perhaps, alive and stirring with a great emotion—all eyes gazing—and all hearts excited—as the son of the chief minister of the English king, self-banished from a palace to a wilderness, thus passed along, invested with all the power that the dwellers in his chosen exile had to give; "old men and matrons, young women and children of every age, thronging round the door-stones and gathered at the windows," before which the procession pursued its line of march; while, through the slight breaks of the surrounding woods, might be caught glimpses of the neighbouring Indians, assembled at intervals to watch the passing show, and gazing at all its strangeness with an interest and wonder but poorly concealed beneath the constrained and sullen silence which resented the white men's intrusion.

Soon after Vane's return to Boston, the occurrences which led to what is called the Pequot war commenced, of which it is only necessary to observe, that by the influence of Vane, exerted in various ways, many of the Indian tribes were withheld from joining in hostilities against the English. In nothing were Vane's wisdom and benevolence more strikingly illustrated than in the course of justice and conciliation he invariably pursued towards that noble race of men. We find that on his invitation, on the 21st of October in this year, the sachem of the Narragansetts came to Boston, accompanied by two sons of Canonius, Cutshamakin, another sachem, and twenty other Indians, and that these gallant sons of the forest were treated by Governor Vane with marked kindness and attention. They dined in the same room and at the same table with himself, and after a long and friendly conference, the result was a treaty of peace and amity with the English. When the object of their visit was accomplished, they marched back to their native wilds, having been attended to the borders of the town, at the order of Governor Vane, by a file of soldiers, who were instructed to give them at parting the salute of a volley of musketry.*

Meanwhile, the religious controversy, to which allusion has been made, raged to an extraordinary extent, and assumed a more and more serious aspect. Before proceeding to its description, it may be as well to state, that in the latter part of the summer letters had been received from Vane's family in England, urgently pressing his immediate return, and that he had laid them before the council, with a request that he might be permitted to resign office. He discerned then, no doubt, to what the religious controversy was fast tending. But such obstacles appear to have been thrown in his way, and especially by the remonstrances of the Boston Church, of which he was a member, that he abandoned his purpose, and consented to remain in the government.

In describing that fierce religious dispute, the Antinomian controversy, which was now suddenly seen raging with a passionate fury throughout the colony, that swept away every other interest from the feelings and thoughts of the people, I shall chiefly avail myself of the facts that have been collected with so much knowledge and zeal by the American biographer of Vane.† The few writers who have alluded to it, with the single exception of the latter, in despair of explaining the dispute, have been fond of passing it over as an absurd and unmeaning strife about words, altogether unworthy of the regard of posterity. It is very true that, as the controversy grew hot, new points were developed, new aspects of the question presented, and new terms introduced, so that, to a merely superficial observer, the whole affair might seem at last to have become enveloped in impenetrable clouds of technical phraseology and unintelligible distinctions. But to the wise and studious inquirer it is scarcely necessary to observe that there has seldom been such a dispute merely about words, or that men have not almost always meant something, and understood what they meant, in matters about which they have been, as in this case, deeply and zealously affected. In the case before us, Mr. Upham truly observes, "principles of the highest consequence were involved, much light was elicited, and a great progress made by some of the parties in Christian knowledge; and it is due to the fame of our ancestors to rescue this controversy from the charge of being a ridiculous and stupid war of words, and to vindicate the claim it justly presents to the character of a dignified and important discussion." It is more especially due to the truth and intelligibility of the picture I am anxious to present of the character and intellect of Vane.

* Savage's edition of Winthrop, i., 198. Upham's Life.—[This is a model book for the biography of past days. Its research, candour, and discrimination entitle it to general confidence. Mr. Upham's book should be in the hands of every student of American and English history.—C.]

† American Biography, p. 122, 140.

* American Biography, p. 118-120.

During his administration, Mrs. Anne Hutchinson, a very remarkable and accomplished woman, arrived from England, and became a member of the Boston Church. Her husband was a gentleman of respectable standing; and her brother-in-law, who accompanied her, Mr. Wheelwright, bore a highly estimable character as a Christian minister. "She was possessed of extraordinary talents, information, and energy. Her mind was prone to indulge in theological speculations, and the happiness of her life consisted in religious exercises and investigations. She was perfectly familiar with the most abstruse speculations of the theology of the day. In keenness of perception and subtlety of reasoning she had no superiors, and her gifts as a leader of devotional exercises were equally rare and surprising." It was the fortune of this singular woman to kindle a religious strife in the infant Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which has secured to her name a lasting memory there, and rendered her the heroine of a passage in the American history as wonderful and tragical as any it contains.

It was the custom in Boston at the period of her arrival for the brethren of the church to meet every week for the purpose of impressing still more deeply upon their minds the discourses and other exercises of the previous Sunday. Following out this custom, Mrs. Hutchinson very soon instituted weekly religious meetings for females; and so attractive and interesting did she make them, that almost all the ladies in the place attended. The exercises were conducted and superintended by Mrs. Hutchinson herself, and it soon followed, as a matter of course, that she exerted a controlling and almost irresistible influence upon the whole community.*

The clergy of the colony, startled at first, were not long in discovering the danger that threatened them. Here was a power suddenly brought to bear upon the religious feelings and views of the people, irresponsible to them, wholly beyond their control, and withdrawing from their reach that very portion of society which is always, perhaps, the chiefest source of such authority and influence as theirs. Of the religious opinions which prevailed generally among these clergy, it will be enough to say that the doctrines, as professed by the Reformed churches, were received with almost unanimous consent by their order throughout New-England, while they permitted themselves to regard with very great jealousy and aversion the exercise of free inquiry, whenever it in any way threatened to lead to results different from their own. Their views of Mrs. Hutchinson's particular case were not likely to be propitiated by the very disagreeable comparisons, to say the least of them, which her powers and talents were likely to provoke among the people.

Mrs. Hutchinson, in her turn, was neither wise nor considerate in the style and manner she adopted. To say nothing of the somewhat unbecoming position in which, as a woman, she placed herself, it soon became obvious that one of her great objects in these weekly audiences was to utter disparaging criticisms upon the discourses of the preceding Sunday or lecture-day, to circulate imputations against the learning and talents of the clergy, and even to start suspicions respecting the soundness of their preaching. Anything like moderation, where a system of personality has been once adopted, is a thing vainly looked for, and now not a day passed which did not, in the matter of these attacks, add to Mrs. Hutchinson's offences and indiscretions, and tend to drive beyond all fair and reasonable ground the hostilities of which she had become the object. The ministers, the magistrates, all the leading men in the colony, rose in array against her, and, not confining their animosity to the point on which she was in the wrong, and might easily have been shown to be in the wrong; not satisfied with proceeding against her as a contentious and busy calumniator and disturber of the peace, they imputed to her grossly and openly what was then considered the darkest crime in the catalogue of depravity, and demanded against her criminal penalties of the deepest dye. She was a HERETIC, they said, and must be crushed by the punishment due to heresy. At this point Vane interfered—the ever gallant and generous defender of the rights of faith and conscience—and a sharp religious controversy was soon fairly developed, which of course led to crimination and recrimination, "introduced innumerable questions of doubtful disputation, and finally wrapped the whole country in the raging and consuming flames of a moral and religious conflagration."*

The real and substantial points at issue, in the discussion of the truth or falsehood of her doctrines, shall now be laid before the reader, apart from the cloud of words and (not to speak it irreverently) cant phrases which enveloped them. Mrs. Hutchinson's opponents were doubtless the aggrieved parties, and might as surely have kept that vantage ground; but they surrendered it when they chose to impugn her doctrines rather than her conduct; and it is no matter of difficulty to us, profiting by the diffusion of the blessed principles of religious liberty and toleration, to determine on which side of the controversy truth and justice lay. Vane and Mrs. Hutchinson were far in advance of their age.

* Upham, p. 124.

* Upham, p. 127.

One of her favourite topics ("whether selected with a design, at the beginning, of diminishing the confidence of the people in their ministers cannot now be determined"), on which, in her weekly meetings, she dwelt very often and very largely, was the proposition that the existence of the real spirit of the Gospel in the heart of a man, even if that man should happen to be a minister of extraordinary gifts, could not be inferred with certainty from the outward displays of sanctity. She simply paraphrased, in fact, the language of the apostle, who hath told us that a man may speak with the tongue of angels, and have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and have all faith so as to remove mountains, and bestow his goods to feed the poor, and give his body to be burned, and still be nothing in a religious and spiritual view. The Saviour himself hath said that men may prophesy and cast out devils, and do many more wonderful works in his name, and be rejected and disowned by him at last.

But it was soon suspected, and it is to be feared, says Mr. Upham, "upon too good grounds, that Mrs. Hutchinson was aiming at a particular object in dwelling so pointedly and so much upon this proposition. And when it once became a prevalent opinion that she was actuated by personal designs, it can be easily conceived how intolerably provoking her discourses must have been. It was a period of great formality and austerity in religion. The outward manifestations of piety were much greater than they have been since. Every minister and every professor of religion was expected to give evidence in his whole manner of life, in his most familiar conversation, in his movements, dress, countenance, and even in the tones of his voice, that he was not of the world. It followed of course—it would have been unjust had it not—that the evidence thus demanded by public opinion was very much relied on by the people. The praise of holiness and spirituality was freely and confidently bestowed upon the sanctimonious and austere. But Mrs. Hutchinson's doctrine cut up the whole matter by the roots, destroyed the very foundation upon which her reputation had been made to rest, poisoned the fountains of confidence, and, in consequence of the personal and satirical design imputed to her, had a direct tendency to make men suspect of hypocrisy all whom they had before been disposed to revere for their piety." Most true is all this, and most grave and difficult of answer must have been a charge founded on improprieties of conduct which were evidently fraught with mischief to many of the best interests of the colony,* but such a charge would not satisfy her unwise opponents, who, eagerly seizing a remote and very false pretext for the accusation of heresy, prosecuted her for maintaining (to use the formal terms in which the complaint was laid) that "sanctification is no evidence of justification."

Never was the natural tendency of angry disputants to push each other to extremes so fully exemplified as on this occasion. From the proposition that the outward expressions of sanctity are not infallible evidences of the in-

Antinomians, Familists, and Libertines that infected the Churches of New-England," and ascribed to a clergyman (the Rev. Thomas Weld, of Roxbury) of great influence at the time. It conveys some idea—though, of course, a partial one—of the form in which the controversy was conducted, the origin of the difficulty, the charges alleged against Mrs. Hutchinson and her followers, and the spirit of the parties: "But the last and worst of all, which most suddenly diffused the venom of these opinions into the very veins and vitals of the people in the country, was Mistress Hutchinson's double weekly lecture, which she kept under a pretence of repeating sermons, to which resorted sundry of Boston and other towns about, to the number of fifty, sixty, or eighty at once; where, after she had repeated the sermon, she would make her comment upon it, vent her mischievous opinions as she pleased, and wreath the Scriptures to her own purpose; where the custom was for her scholars to propound questions, and she (gravely sitting in the chair) did make answers thereto. The great respect she had at first in the hearts of all, and her profitable and sober carriage of matters for a time, made this her practice less suspected by the godly magistrates and elders of the church there, so that it was winked at for a time (though afterward reproved by the Assembly and called into court); but it held so long until she had spread her heaven so far, that, had not Providence prevented, it had proved the canker of our peace and ruin of our comfort. These opinions being thus spread, and grown into their full ripeness and latitude, through the nimbleness and activity of their fomenters, began now to lift up their heads full high, to stare us in the face, and to confront all that opposed them; and that which added vigour and boldness to them was this, that now by this time they had some of all sorts and quality, in all places, to defend and patronize them; some of the magistrates, some gentlemen, some scholars and men of learning, some burgesses of our General Court, some of our captains and soldiers, some chief men in towns, and some men eminent for religion, parts, and wit, so that whosoever the case of the opinions came in agitation, there waited not patrons to stand up to plead for them; and if any of the opinionists were complained of in the courts for their misdemeanors, or brought before the churches for conviction or censure, still some or other of that party would not only suspend giving their vote against them, but would labour to justify them, to side with them, and protest against any sentence that should pass upon them, and so be ready not only to harden the delinquent against all means of conviction, but to raise a motiny, if the major part should carry it against them; so in town meetings, military trainings, and all other societies, yea, almost in every family, it was hard if that some or other were not ready to rise up in defence of them, even as of the apple of their own eye. Now, oh their boldness, pride, insolency, and alienations from their old and dearest friends; the disturbances, divisions, contentions they raised among us, both in church and state; and in families, setting division betwixt husband and wife! Oh the sore censures against all sorts that opposed them; and the contempt they cast upon our godly magistrates, churches, ministers, and all that were set over them, when they stood in their way! Now the faithful ministers of Christ must have dung cast upon their faces, and be no better than legal preachers, Bala's priests, popish factors, scribes, pharisees, and opposers of Christ himself! Now they must be pointed at, as it were with the finger, and reproached by name. Such a church-officer is an ignorant man, and knows not Christ; such a one is under a covenant of works; such a pastor is a proud man, and would make a good persecutor, &c. Now, after our sermons were ended at our public lectures, you might have seen half a dozen pistols discharged at the face of the preacher (I mean, so many objections made by the opinionists in the open assembly against the doctrine delivered, if it suited not their new fancies), to the marvellous weakening of holy truths delivered. Now you might have seen many of the opinionists rising up, and contemptuously turning their backs upon the faithful pastor of that church, and going forth from the assembly when he began to pray or preach."—See also Baxter's Life, p. 74, and Somers's Tracts, vii., 109.

* In such a state of society as these colonies presented, it was beyond everything expedient to impress the people with an implicit veneration and respect for their ministers, and this had been done to a degree altogether unreasonable and excessive, and far beyond the point to which it was really and justly merited by that, on the whole, pious and excellent class of men. To have gone against Mrs. Hutchinson for disturbing, as it were, this necessary equilibrium in the government, would have been the wise course, and, in the main, impossible of resistance; but the accusation of heresy, on the other hand, raised up defenders of her doctrines everywhere throughout the colony, among people even who understood them least, and carried agitation and division into every church and family throughout the province. Mr. Upham gives the following extract from a pamphlet entitled "A short Story of the Rise, Reign, and Ruin of the ward residence of the Christian spirit, Mrs. Hutchinson was driven to speak disparagingly of external and visible morality, and her opponents, on the other hand, to assign too high a value to it; until at last the two watchwords or countersigns of the controversy became, in theological phrase, a covenant of faith and a covenant of works.*

Nor was this all. Mrs. Hutchinson availed herself of some points of difference between the two ministers of the Boston Church, Mr. Cotton and Mr. Wilson; and either because there was a corresponding peculiarity in the preaching, or by an adroit stroke of policy aimed at securing the support of the most powerful minister in the colony, this ingenious and extraordinary woman used to explain what her distinguishing principle was, by saying that Mr. Cotton preached a covenant of faith, but that Mr. Wilson and the other ministers were under a covenant of works. The result may be easily imagined. Mr. Cotton, whether from a motive of flattered vanity or sincere preference, continued Mrs. Hutchinson's faithful and zealous champion till she left the province, while Mr. Wilson and the other ministers, not caring to confine their rage within the bounds of a decent or Christian propriety, went about inflaming the people with the most dreadful invectives against their antagonist, and impressing upon them, in many instances not without success, that such blows aimed at their ministers inflicted a serious stain on the character of their parishioners.

One other opinion fastened on Mrs. Hutchinson in the course of the controversy, and this the most important, as it was the most alarming to the faith of the churches, remains to be explained. She was charged with entertaining the doctrine that "the Holy Spirit dwells in every believer." She held that by the expression Holy Spirit or Holy Ghost, as used in the Scriptures, is meant such an actual communication of the Spirit of God to the believer's heart, that it becomes the abode of those sentiments of love, truth, purity, and piety, which bear the impress of a divine source, and constitute those who experience them sons of God, as partakers of the divine nature, and one with God, as the Saviour was one with him. As this idea was sifted during the course of the controversy, it became apparent that it would necessarily end in the belief that the Holy Spirit was not so much a divine person as a divine influence; and the dread which was entertained of such a consequence increased very much the general impatience to bring the controversy to a close as speedily as possible, by putting down Mrs. Hutchinson with the strong arm of law. Winthrop, in his journal, tells us that "the question proceeded so far by disputation (in writing, for the peace' sake of the Church, which all were tender of), as at length they could not find the person of the Holy Ghost in Scripture, nor in the primitive churches three hundred years after Christ."[†]

Mr. Upham very truly observes that it is important to connect this latter and more formidable proposition with Mrs. Hutchinson's views of the worth of outward expressions of sanctity.

They seem to explain each other, and to interpret jointly that elemental system of faith which the modern term of Christianity will perhaps best comprehend, and which, however unpalatable to a formal and sanctimonious condition of society and manners, would provoke no hostility from enlightened Christians now, of whatever denomination. Mrs. Hutchinson believed, in fact, that it was the dwelling of the Holy Spirit in the believer's heart—that is, the possession and exercise of the pure, and genuine, and divine spirit of Christianity in the soul itself—which constituted justification, or made a person acceptable to God; that the external and formal indications of piety, or sanctification, might appear where this inward spirit was not experienced, and that, in such cases, they were utterly worthless; and, lastly, that the great end of the religion revealed in the Scriptures was not so much to make our conduct sanctimonious, our outward deportment correct, or to bring us under a covenant of works, as to include us under a covenant of grace, by imparting to our souls the Holy Spirit of God.

A discussion which embraced the truth or falsehood of such doctrines as these could not but be felt of serious importance by a man of Vane's pure mind and lofty character; for, in fact, considered thus, the questions at issue embraced the primary and essential principles of Christianity, and under one form or other, have constituted the leading topics of investigation and debate in every age of the Church, from the gathering of the first general councils in the primitive centuries up to the present hour. It is useless to attempt to ridicule the "Hutchinsonian or Antinomian discussion," or to express astonishment that "men of sense and learning could ever have been engaged in it." Many of the doctrines it implied were the ruling principles of the life and the faith of Vane, and it is by the affected contempt of such things that his intellect and character have hitherto suffered in the shortsighted estimation of our historians. Let me pause for an instant to prove this to the reader.

Sir Henry Vane the younger was, in the only true and comprehensive sense of that word, a Christian. A master of all the abstrusest points of the science of religion, his intellect and frame of mind were of that enlarged description, that, while he held his own views in a high and spiritual sense, "he sought to imbibe truth from every system of faith and every form of religion." "Christian faith was not to him a mere intellectual and barren system of speculative opinions; not one article of faith was permitted to be of that character in his mind. But around every doctrine of Scripture his noble genius, exuberant imagination, and hallowed affections gathered a living and life-giving spirit of warmth, and love, and energy." He was a zealous man; but knowledge regulated his zeal, and charity tempered it. He was called a fanatic, because he was the most strenuous advocate that religious liberty ever possessed. He was called a wild, unintelligible visionary, because through life he never ceased to urge, with all the strength of his passions and the subtlety of his intellect, a UNIVERSAL TOLERATION of sects and opinions. It was his profound and all-wise maxim, whether in civil or religious polity, that every one should be perfectly free, and every one perfectly equal, in the eye of the law. All exclusive privileges, whether of church or state, he utterly abhorred; and equally did he abhor every form of bigotry or persecution, whether "exercised by political or ecclesiastical institutions, by societies or individuals," while of all these principles he emphatically proved the sincerity by carrying them out into practice, "without partiality or exception, even when their operation was in favour of those whose sentiments he most disliked;" for, dreading the power of the pope, great in that day, and opposed to the Church of Rome, he yet flung all his energies into the support of Catholic emancipation, careless of the rage of his Protestant contemporaries, and of the denunciations of Richard Baxter himself: nor be it ever forgotten, that when John Biddle, the founder of the denomination of Unitarian Christians throughout England, was arraigned for publishing his opinions, the younger Sir Harry Vane, the enthusiastic champion of the Genevan Calvinists, stepped forth in his defence, and laboured with untiring zeal to protect him from the blind intolerance of the age.* To the last hour of his life, as through all its changes and vicissitudes, he maintained the same faith which in her days of danger and persecution threw its shield before Mrs. Hutchinson.

* American Biography, p. 136.

† Savage's edition of Winthrop, i., 206.

Observe the following description of the divisions and conflicting parties in Christendom, which is quoted by Sikes from one of Vane's religious essays: "There are many churches in the world that make a profession of the name of Christ, under several forms and denominations, according to the variety of judgments, and interests of the rulers and members thereof. There is a church called catholic or universal, headed by the pope, who pretends to be Christ's vicar. There are also national churches, headed either by a civil magistrate, as the Church of England, or by general assemblies, as the Church of Scotland hath been, with other reformed churches. There are also particular, independent congregational churches, distinguishing themselves into a variety of sects, and diversity of judgments and opinions, as well about the way and order of the word in matters of worship, and the service of God, as in what they hold fundamental in matters of faith. These all make up one body as to the owning and upholding a church in some outward visible form, who, notwithstanding all their differences, and protestings against one another, do generally agree together in one mind as to the preferring of the church in name, show, and outward order, before what it is in spirit and truth, as it is the real and living body of Christ. Hence it is that the true Church indeed, the very living, real, spiritual members of Christ's body, have been for many hundred years a dispersed, captivated people, under all worldly powers, civil or ecclesiastical, and never been suffered to use or enjoy a freedom in their communion together, and in the purity of God's service and worship, but are upon one pretence or other restrained by human laws, and suppressed as heretics, schismatics, fanatics, and such as turn the world upside down; while those that have the repute and credit to be the church or churches of Christ, under some one of the forms and outward orders before mentioned, have the powers of the world on their side, and are contending one with another who shall be uppermost, and give the rule of conformity in doctrine, worship, and church order to all the rest, by compulsion and persecution! But the days are now hastening apace wherein the living members of Christ's body shall be made manifest, in distinction from all those that have the name to live but are dead."*

I have described this great statesman's faith as that of UNIVERSAL TOLERATION. Not to Christian sects and professors alone did he extend his charity, but to men of all opinions and all religions; to the "honest moral heathen," as we have seen his friend Sikes express it, no less than to the "legal Christian." And he did this because Christianity was with him a spiritual religion, the vital essence of which can live in the hearts of its followers alone. To him the substance of true religion was moral and spiritual excellence; and, wherever he could find that, wherever that appeared, whether in the minds and characters of Gentiles or of Jews, he recognised a fellow-Christian, although its possessor lived in an age or country which had not known or heard of the very name of Christ. Men enrolled in the same political struggle with himself would ask him the meaning of such latitudinarian backsliding, and were answered by the startling but most noble question, How dared he to exclude the heathen from his charity, since in doing that he might shut out those whom Christ, the great head of the Church, would possibly, at the final day, acknowledge and welcome as his own? Let the reader take to his heart the following divine passage of the "Retired Man's Meditations," a work which will be described hereafter: "But, indeed, this assertion is so far from straitening or lessening the number of those that are the true heirs of salvation, that it rather discovers how they may lie hid, as they did in Elijah's time, out of the observation of visible professors (AMONG THOSE THAT THEY EXCLUDE AS HEATHENS), and be comprehended by Christ, their spiritual head, when as yet they may not have their spiritual senses brought forth into exercise, so as to apprehend him, but may be babes in Christ, walking as men undistinguished from the rest of the world; and although they may, in that respect, seem to be men in the flesh, yet they may live according to God in the spirit, and find acceptance in the beloved one, while they themselves may either be WITHOUT LAW, EXERCISING A CHASTE NATURAL CONSCIENCE, or may be, under the law, believers so zealous of the law as to fly in the face of Paul himself for witnessing a higher light than they have yet experience of or can bear.*

* Upham's Life. Orme's Life of Baxter, i., 82. Toulmin's Life of Biddle, 33; and see the 13th and 18th volumes of that admirable periodical, the Monthly Repository, p. 257 and 347, which now, under the accomplished management of Mr. Leigh Hunt, a writer of genius, and the most Christian-hearted of men, sustains the reputation it acquired under the editorship of one of the most eloquent and philosophical writers of the day, the Rev. Mr. Fox.

* In another passage of a similar kind the same faith receives emphatic illustration: "These keen concessionists, that cannot afford a good word for the true circumcision, are eager about the outward circumstances of worship, time, place, and the like. Christ reproves them in his answer to the woman of Samaria at Jacob's well: 'neither in this mountain, nor at Jerusalem, shall ye worship the Father, but in spirit and in truth.' Neither in this form nor that, but excluded out of all synagogues has the true Church and spouse of Christ been worshipping God this twelve hundred years and upward, in a mourning, persecuted, wilderness condition."

And as these principles guided him when his life began, and through all the hard years of his public struggles sustained him, so in the hour of death they were his comfort and refuge. "Whatever you do," he said to his children, on their last interview with him in the Tower, the evening before his execution, "whatever you do, be not conformed to this world in the spirit, way, principles, affections, no, nor religion thereof. Amid the great variety of churches and ways of worship that this world abounds with, be not by any means induced or forced to observe and become subject to the ordinances of man in things pertaining unto God. Give unto God the things that are God's. Give also unto Cæsar the things that are his. If he unlawfully require more, do you lawfully refuse to obey him. Let him then take his course; wherein any deal proudly, God will be above them. If one church say, 'Lo, here is Christ;' another, 'Lo, there!' and the trumpet that's blown in both give but an uncertain sound, look up to Christ himself with the spouse in the Canticles, and say, 'O thou, whom our souls do love, tell us where thou feedest, and makest thy flock to rest at noon, under the scorching heat of man's persecuting wrath.' If rightly sought to and waited on, he will by his spirit infallibly direct you to the true shepherds' tents; to those spiritual pastors and assemblies that walk in the footsteps of his ancient flock, even in the faith, spirit, and way of Abraham. . . . And, as I would have you to quit all false churches, whatever curious dress, insinuating appearance, or refined form they shine forth in, so much more yet would I have you to loathe and depart from all manner of profaneness and common debauchery, whatever countenance or encouragement it may have round about you in the land of your nativity!†" Through the prison walls that then encompassed Vane, the barbarous dissonance of Bacchus and his revellers had already reached, even as it pierced the blind solitude that compassed Milton round!

Vane's advocacy of Mrs. Hutchinson, then, was only in accordance with the principle which governed every passage in his life; it was no "working and unquiet fancy," as Clarendon describes it, nor humour of "young inexperience," as better friends to truth than Clarendon have been induced to urge; it was simply the result of those settled philosophical convictions which, thus early developed, remained with him his whole life after, that forced Vane into the front rank of this religious controversy, as the chief friend and supporter of the remarkable woman with whom it originated. He espoused her cause, and defended her with all the warmth and enthusiasm of his own character.‡

* Retired Man's Meditations, 4to, 213.

† I shall have to return to this affecting address, which there is reason to suppose was taken down by Sikes at the moment of its delivery. He appears to have been the only person present besides the family of Vane.

‡ I need scarcely add, that, supposing his opinions had

So supported, and with the additional aid of the Rev. Mr. Cotton's zeal, Mrs. Hutchinson for a time held equal ground with her enemies; but as the contest proceeded, the proportion of numbers turned out heavily against her. The celebrated founder, father, and first governor of the colony, Winthrop, conducted the opposition, and was supported with the hottest zeal by Mr. Wilson and all the other ministers of the country, by all the churches but that of Boston, and by a considerable and very active minority there. With every day that passed, her position, including that of her supporters, became more and more dangerous. She had provoked, in all its most fearful fires, the odium theologicum, and it burned with an equal fury against all who dared to countenance or to tolerate the opinions she was charged with holding.

The crisis arrived at last. The day of the annual election came round; and the party always hostile to Vane, re-enforced in strength and numbers by the party whose hostility he had brought down in his support of Mrs. Hutchinson, all assembled, and massed themselves together at the appointed place and time. A terrible storm of excitement was the result. Among other notable circumstances, the Rev. Mr. Wilson clambered up into a tree, and harangued the electors in a speech which, as it is described, could surely never have been endured in those grave times, and in one of his calling, except during the prevalence of a most engrossing and almost maddening excitement. The end was, that Winthrop was elected governor, and Vane, and all Vane's friends, left out of office.

The Boston people, ever devotedly attached to Vane, at once declared their unmovable confidence and faith in him by electing him, with others of his most zealous friends, to represent them in the general court. More passionate than discreet, the Winthrop party in the Assembly pronounced the election void. The people of Boston, spirited and independent then as they have been ever since, with indignation at such a gross outrage on their rights of suffrage, returned the same men back to the House by a new election the very next day. The successful party, meanwhile, once seated in the colonial government, lost not a day in beginning in fearful earnest to put down by main force the Hutchinsonian heresy, and to cut off been less in accordance, or even utterly at variance, with her own, he would yet have been bound, by his theory of non-interference in matters of religious belief, to take part with her against her prosecutors. "He was always," says his friend Sikes, "against the exercise of a coercive magistratical power in religion and worship, because of the single rule, power, and authority that Christ himself claims as his peculiar prerogative in and over the hearts and consciences of all men. How grossly inconcinnous must it needs appear even to the common reason of all mankind, that such as take upon them to be magistrates and rulers, whether the people will or no (as it often falls out), yes, or though freely chosen, should give the rule to all others' consciences in point of religion, when they many times have no religion at all in themselves, nor any other conscience but a dead or seared one, hardened in the most brutish villainies that the basest of men can be guilty of. But if the magistrate do plausibly pretend to something of religion, what a changeable thing will religion be at this rate! as fickle as the magistrate's judgment, at least as his person, for the next ruler may be of another persuasion; as this nation hath experienced off and on, between popery and the Protestant profession, in Henry VIII., Edward VI., and in the two queens Mary and Elizabeth."

forever all means of its farther growth. The first step taken with this view was a startling one—no less than to prevent, by absolute means, the introduction into the colony of persons who were at all likely to favour Mrs. Hutchinson or her doctrines. Many such persons being expected to arrive from England about that time, a law was passed which imposed a heavy penalty upon any person who should receive into his house a stranger coming with intent to reside, or let to such a one a lot or habitation, without, in every instance, obtaining particular permission of one of the standing council, or two of the assistant magistrates; and, by the same act, a large fine was to be levied upon any town which should, without such permission, allow strangers a residence.

A grosser violation of the rights of the colonists, considered in the abstract, could not be imagined than under such a law as this. Vane at once declared against its injustice and enormity, and appealed to the people. The inhabitants of Boston, with whom his influence always bore its natural and fair proportion to their own independence, took up the matter so warmly, that they refused to meet Governor Winthrop, after the usual customs of respect, when he entered the town on his return from the session of the Legislature; and at last the public mind generally, and in all parts of the colony, showed so much discontent on the subject of the law, that Governor Winthrop was driven to the necessity of a formal public appeal in its behalf and his own. A warm controversy ensued, in which Vane was his chief and most formidable opponent.

This discussion is only to be alluded to here in so far as it illustrates the character of Vane as a statesman, so long misunderstood, and, by writers of English history, so unjustly handled. It is in proof, during its progress, that he was the first to declare, at this early period of his life, and at the greatest personal hazard, that the theory on which New-England had been planted and was proposed to be maintained was absolutely visionary and impracticable. We shall find always, in the course of this memoir, that he whose wildness and enthusiasm are the favourite topics of the history of the time, was, in strict truth, the most clear-headed and the most practical of politicians. He could never understand what was meant, as applied to the case of New-England, by a settlement of religious liberty in a peculiar sense alone, and subject to conditions which destroyed it in fact.* He held that they who in a large society had contended for the rights of conscience when they were themselves sufferers, could not, upon any pretext, in a society however small, turn against others, and, upon points of speculative difference, violate their rights of conscience because they had acquired the power and the opportunity to do it. The result proved Vane to have been right. He had hit the true principle of religious liberty, which, in its great and comprehensive wisdom, never dawned upon the minds of the first planters of New-England; and he was the first English statesman to declare and to act upon that principle up to its very fullest extent. He heralded the way for Milton, for William Penn, for Locke, for the great Fox, and for his noble kinsman (in our own time, the most generous and constant asserter of the rights of conscience) Lord Holland.*

A few extracts from Vane's answers to Winthrop will satisfactorily establish this. The latter having issued an elaborate "Defence of an Order of Court made in the year 1637," explaining its "intent" and illustrating its "equity," Vane at once published a reply, under the title of "A brief Answer to a certain Declaration, made of the Intent and Equity of the Order of Court, that none should be received to inhabit within this Jurisdiction but such as should be allowed by some of the Magistrates."

The introduction of Winthrop's argument consisted of the following definition of a "com-

cred purpose to rear up their children in the faith they cherished; and they rejoiced in having, as they thought, devised a scheme of society, in which, far removed from all who differed from them, they might enjoy their own institutions and profess their own principles, without giving or suffering molestation, and free from all division or dissent. But, without considering the difficulty of excluding persons of discordant opinions coming from abroad, it was utterly in vain to attempt to bring any system of education to bear with such complete effect upon a whole people as to prevent difference of opinion among their descendants. It was, however, a beautiful vision, and, upon the whole, very creditable to those who indulged it. While we cannot lament that it failed of being realized, it is impossible not to sympathize with our fathers in the disappointment they so bitterly experienced, when, after all their sacrifices, and toils, and privations, and sufferings, and before they had got comfortably settled in their new abode, they discovered, to their amazement, that they had not escaped the differences and dissensions which they so much dreaded. It seemed hard that, after having left Christendom, country, and home itself, and effected a lodgment in a far-off wilderness, where their only hope was a peaceful harmony of opinion, beyond the reach of oppression, and rescued from all temptation to oppress—it was indeed hard to be pursued and tormented by those very disputes which they had sacrificed their very all to avoid. It ought not to be wondered at, as a strange or inconsistent thing, that they used every effort to drive from their territory those who advocated discordant opinions, and that they employed every device to prevent their introduction. In so doing they did not violate, but, on the contrary, fully acted out the principles upon which they emigrated to America and planted the colony. The law to which we have just referred [the law described in the text] was but an expression of those principles, and indicated the only probable policy by which they could be developed and preserved."

* As this volume is passing through the press, Lord Holland's signature again appears alone to one article of a protest on the subject of religious liberty, which appears to me to condense into a few words its most comprehensive principles. His lordship protests against the municipal officers' Declaration Bill (as he had ten years before protested against the bill it proposed to remedy the defects of) because he "cannot directly or indirectly sanction the opinion that any particular faith in matters of religion is necessary to the proper discharge of duties purely political or temporal." A collection of Lord Holland's protests would be an invaluable text-book of statesman-like reasoning, of pure constitutional doctrine, and of the most generous and ennobling sentiments.

* The best statement of the case in that view, and the most enlightened defence of Winthrop's policy, are given by Mr. Upham. We quote it in justice to both parties: "In their own country they were oppressed and in various ways afflicted in the exercise of their consciences, and in the expression and enjoyment of their own religious principles and way of worship. They saw no prospect of a remedy, because it was then universally supposed that, in order to live in peace and liberty, Christians must agree in sentiment and speculation. Such an agreement was manifestly impossible in the Old World. They were therefore led to conceive the plan of withdrawing from Christendom into a wilderness beyond the ocean, where, without disturbing others, they themselves might enjoy 'freedom to worship God.' It did not occur to their imaginations that any, besides those who sympathized with them in views and feelings, would voluntarily join them in encountering the perils of the deep and the sufferings of a new settlement on a foreign and savage shore. It was their solemn and most samon weale or body politike," such as the colony of Massachusetts was: "the consent of a certain company of people to cohabit together under one government, for their mutual safety and welfare." To this, however, Vane decisively interposes a mention of the restrictions which limit so convenient a definition, and render it by no means so apt a plea for the arbitrary legislation of such a "government." He reminds Winthrop that his definition is at the best but a description of a commonwealth at large, and not such a commonwealth as this (as is pretended), which is not only CHRISTIAN, but dependant upon the grant also of our sovereign; for so are the express words of that order of court to which the whole country was required to subscribe. "Now," he continues, "if you will define a Christian commonwealth, there must be included such a consent as is according to God; a subjecting to such a government as is according to Christ. And if you will define a corporation incorporated by virtue of the grant of our sovereign, it must be such a consent as the grant requires and permits, and in that manner and form as it prescribes, or else it will be defective. The commonwealth here described [in Winthrop's definition] may be a company of Turkish pirates as well as Christian professors, unless the consent and government be better limited than it is in this definition; for sure it is that all pagans and infidels, even the Indians here among us, may come within this compass. And is this such a body politic as ours? Our Commonwealth, we fear, would be twice miserable, if Christ and the king should be shut out so. Reasons taken from the nature of a commonwealth not founded upon Christ, nor by his majesty's charters, must needs fall to the ground, and fail those that rely upon them. Members of a commonwealth may not seek out all means that may conduce to the welfare of the body, but all lawful and due means, according to the charter they hold by, either from God or the king, or from both; nor may they keep out whatsoever may appear to tend to their damage (for many things appear which are not), but such as, upon right and evident grounds, do so appear and are so in truth."

Winthrop had insisted very strongly on the following argument as decisive in his favour: "The churches take liberty (as lawfully they may) to receive or reject at their discretion; yea, particular towns make orders to such effect; why, then, should the Commonwealth be denied the like liberty, and the whole more restrained than any part?" To this Vane replied, in the true spirit of the great founder of Christianity: "Though the question be here concluded, yet it is far from being soundly proved; yea, in truth, we much wonder that any member of a church should be ignorant of the falseness of the groundwork upon which this conclusion is built; for, should churches have this power, as you say they have, to receive or reject at their discretion, they would quickly grow corrupt enough. Churches have no liberty to receive or reject at their discretions, but at the discretion of Christ. Whatsoever is done in word or deed, in church or commonwealth, must be done in the name of the Lord Jesus. Neither hath church nor commonwealth any other than ministerial power from Christ, who is the head of the Church, and the prince of the kings of the earth. After that Cornelius and his company had received the Holy Ghost, whereby the right which they had to the covenant was evidenced, it is not now left to the discretion of the Church whether they would admit them thereunto or not. But can any man forbid them water? saith Peter. He commanded them to be baptized. There is the like reason of admission into churches. When Christ opens a door to any, there's none may take liberty to shut them out. In one word, there is no liberty to be taken, neither in church nor commonwealth, but that which Christ gives, and is according unto him." Carrying out these noble and exalted views, Vane thus described what ought to be, by statesmen, the proper treatment of heretics: "As for scribes and Pharisees, we will not plead for them; let them do it who walk in their ways; nor for such as are confirmed in any way of error; though all such are not to be denied cohabitation, but are to be pitied and reformed. ISHMAEL SHALL DWELL IN THE PRESENCE OF HIS BRETHREN."

Then, towards the conclusion of this very striking pamphlet, he sums up his argument in these words: "This law we judge to be most wicked and sinful, and that for these reasons: 1. Because this law doth leave these weighty matters of the Commonwealth, of receiving or rejecting such as come over, to the approbation of magistrates, and suspends these things upon the judgment of man, whereas the judgment is God's. This is made a groundwork of gross popery. Priests and magistrates are to judge, but it must be according to the law of God. THAT LAW WHICH GIVES THAT, WITHOUT LIMITATION, TO MAN WHICH IS PROPER TO GOD, CANNOT BE JUST. 2. Because here is liberty given by this law to expel and reject those which are most eminent Christians, if they suit not with the disposition of the magistrate; whereby it will come to pass that Christ and his members will find much worse entertainment among us than the Israelites did among the Egyptians and Babylonians, than Abraham and Isaac did among the Philistines, than Jacob among the Shechemites; yea, even than Lot among the Sodomites. These all gave leave to God's people to sit down among them, though they could not claim such right as the king's subjects may. Now that law, the execution whereof may make us more cruel and tyrannical over God's children than even these, must needs be most wicked and sinful."

The profound and generous spirit of these passages, the force and beauty of their scripture illustration, cannot be admired too highly. But Winthrop, strongly supported by the most powerful influences in the colony, was enabled to hold his ground, and Vane, baffled in his best hopes and purposes, resolved for England.* He took his passage in August, 1637; not "fain to steal away by night," as Baxter would have it, but openly, nay, with marks of honour from his friends, which even his enemies were obli-

* "He had not been long in New-England," says his friend Sikes, "before he ripened into more knowledge and experience of Christ than the churches there could bear the testimony of. Even New-England could not bear all his words, though there were no king's court or king's chapel. Then he returns for Old England."

ged to take part in, and accompanied by the young Lord Ley, son and heir of the Earl of Marlborough, who had come over a short time before to see the country. A large concourse of the people of Boston attended him, with every form of affectionate respect, to the vessel's side, which he ascended amid the strongest demonstrations of love and esteem for his person, and admiration for his character and services. A parting salute was fired from the town, and another from the castle; and as he sailed from the shores of New-England, he left behind him a name which, as years went on, became more and more endeared to the people; a name which is venerated there to this day; and gives a kind of religious interest to the small house in Boston which is still pointed out as one of his places of residence with an honourable gratitude and pride.*

Nor did Vane's interest in America, any more than the better influences of his character and name, pass away with his passage from her shores. During the remainder of his life, through all its power and all its suffering, he forgot not her. By his aid, when governor of Massachusetts, the famous Roger Williams had succeeded in obtaining a deed of Rhode Island from the native princes, and one of his first acts after his return to England was to exert himself to procure the first charter of that colony. "It was not price and money," says that most celebrated Puritan, "that could have purchased Rhode Island, but it was obtained by love—that love and favour which that honoured gentleman, Sir H. Vane, and myself had with the great sachem Miantonomo, about the league which I procured between the Massachusetts English and the Narragansetts in the Pequot war. This I mention, as the truly noble Sir H. Vane had been so good an instrument in the hand of God for rescuing this island from the barbarians, as also for procuring and confirming the charter, that it may be recorded with all thankfulness."† And not in words alone did Roger Williams exhibit his gratitude; he gave more solid and enduring proofs of it in carrying out Vane's own great principles of religious liberty in the settlement of the colony of Rhode Island, which soon presented, single and alone, faithful among the faithless, the grand example of Christian toleration in its only complete and wise aspect, as applied not only to Christians, but to all men, of whatever religion or form of faith. Deep was the interest Vane thenceforth took in that colony; and when, in long after years, at the very busiest and most anxious period of his public life, he had received reason to suspect that something of a contentious and intolerant spirit was stealing insensibly into the hearts of some of its active leaders, he at once wrote them a letter (dated the 8th of February, 1653), expressing his regret at the intelligence, and urging them to a more consistent practice of the great principles upon which their society was founded. An answer was drawn up by Roger Williams, and signed by the principal people of Providence, which shows with what truly Christian sentiments Sir Henry's friendly and faithful remonstrances were received. It concludes by expressing the hope "that, when we are gone and rotten, our posterity, and children after us, shall read, in our town records, your pious and favourable letters and loving kindness to us."*

In these after years he wrote to Winthrop too, his old and active enemy, in the same spirit as to those who had supported him. From the high places of political influence and power, as in his young and uninfluential days, he used the same arguments to Winthrop to induce him to save the country he presided over from the destructive effects of religious bigotry and intolerance. He wrote to him entreating him to

* Hist. Coll., x., 20, note.

† This letter will be found in Hutchinson's Collections, p. 137. I cannot refrain from adding here, while yet detained on the subject, an admirable sketch, which is furnished by Mr. Upham, of the closing passages of Mrs. Hutchinson's life, after the departure of Vane. It cannot fail to have a melancholy interest for those who are interested in the great statesman her fortunes connected her with, and who, admiring, as they must, her genius, her firmness, and perseverance, must deplore her sufferings, and the bloody tragedy which brought those sufferings to a close. After Vane's departure, the controversy he had taken part in was, by the direct application of more power, extinguished and extirpated. Mr. Wheelwright was banished, and the same sentence was carried into execution against Mrs. Hutchinson, after an examination and trial, in which she exhibited the most extraordinary degree of talent, learning, skill, and fortitude. She at once removed after this with her family to Rhode Island, where, under the protection of Roger Williams, her conduct did not incur reproach, although she continued faithful to her principles; neither did any injury or inconvenience, as Williams wrote to Vane, result from her influence there. "How clearly," justly pursues Mr. Upham, "does this illustrate the important maxim, that no heresy need be regarded as dangerous to the state when the state does not meddle with it! Upon the death of her husband she transferred her residence to Long Island, where, in the year 1643, her sufferings and persecutions were brought to an end in a manner as awful and tragical as would have softened the hearts, we might suppose, of the bitterest foes, and have buried forever all feelings of anger and bigotry in one wide-spread and profound sentiment of pity and sorrow. She and all her family, consisting of sixteen persons, were murdered by the Indians, with the exception of one daughter, who was carried into captivity. Such was the fate of Anne Hutchinson, one of the most remarkable persons of her age and sex—learned, accomplished, and of an heroic spirit. Her genius was as extraordinary as her history was strange and eventful. Her abilities were equalled only by her misfortunes. With talents and graces which would have adorned and blessed the private spheres, within which they ought to have been confined, she aimed to occupy a more public position, and to act upon a more conspicuous theatre; and the consequence was, that she was hated where she would otherwise have been loved; a torrent of prejudice and calumny was made to pour over her; an entire community was thrown into disorder and convulsions for years; a most cruel persecution drove her from the pale of civilization; and she fell, at last, beneath the bloody tomahawks of murderous savages. Immediately after her exile from Massachusetts, the floodgates of slander were opened against her character. Every species of abuse and defamation was resorted to, and tales of calumny were put into circulation so extravagant, disgusting, loathsome, and shocking, that nothing but the blackest malignity could have fabricated, or the most infuriated and blinded bigotry have credited them. (Mather's "Magnalia," book vii., c. iii., § xi.) Every mouth seemed to be open to asperse her, and every heart hardened against her; and when the news of her tragical death arrived, it was readily believed and proclaimed that it was a judgment of God upon her sinful heresies, and the people seemed almost to take satisfaction in reflecting upon the dreadful fate which had befallen her in the distant wilderness to which she had been driven by their intolerance. In contemplating the furious and desperate virulence of the colonists towards

* Mr. Upham tells us that "Governor Vane's house stood, as we are informed by Hutchinson (i., 55, note), on the side of the hill above Queen-street," between the sites of the houses of Mr. Jonathan Phillips and the late Mr. Gardiner Greene. On his departure from America he presented the estate to Mr. Cotton, in whose family he had resided, and with whom he had formed a "great friendship," founded upon sympathy of opinions and congeniality of spirit. It has been supposed that Sir Henry Vane assisted Mr. Cotton in preparing the "Abstract of the Laws of New-England," published at London in 1641.—Hist. Coll., v., 172, note.

† Mr. Upham, Hist. Coll., ix., 194, 2d series.

exhort the Congregational churches in America to exhibit such an example of the spirit of peace, charity, and forbearance as would alone tend to promote the great cause of Christian liberty and truth in the older world. Winthrop himself appears by this time to have become sensible of the greatness, justice, and truth of Vane's character; and we find him, accordingly, in speaking of a difficulty in which, in 1645, some New-England men were involved in the admiralty courts in London on account of their connexion with certain proceedings of the government of Massachusetts, and which was of such moment that the bonds they were required to give amounted to four thousand pounds, seizing the opportunity of doing honour to certain active and disinterested exertions of Sir Henry Vane in their behalf, and adding that, "although he might have taken occasion against us for some dishonour which he apprehended to have been unjustly put upon him here, yet both now and at other times he hath showed himself a true friend to New-England, and a man of a noble and generous mind."*

Such is a faithful history of Vane's colonial residence and administration; and it may be safely left thus to the impartial and just-minded to determine whether, far from depreciating his powers as a public man, as hath been too rashly concluded, it does not, on the contrary, give additional interest and lustre to all that is great, or noble, or wise in the history of his life. He now appears upon a wider scene once more, and Garrard thus writes to the lord-deputy: "Henry Vane, the comptroller's eldest son, who hath been governor in New-England this last year, is come home; whether he hath left his former misgrounded opinions for which he left us, I know not."†

Nor could the gossiping Garrard, with all his zealous curiosity, ascertain for many months any better knowledge on this point. Vane lived in retirement for a considerable time after his return. The interval not unfitly prepares us, after the strange and turbulent scenes we have just gone through, for that resolved and deliberate strengthening of his purposes and powers which, in hours of quiet retreat and lofty study, we may suppose to have been now his principal aim, and his noblest preparation for that glorious career of suffering and of service on which he was soon to enter in his native country. In this interval, too, "with his father's approbation," he married Frances, the daughter of Sir Christopher Wray, of Ashby, in Lincolnshire.

Public affairs had meanwhile advanced to the crisis which forced the king once more upon the detested resource of a Parliament, in April, 1640, and in this Parliament, influenced secretly, it is supposed, by Pym, "young Mr. Vane" consented to sit. He was at once returned for the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull—worthiest predecessor, in the representation of that place, to honest Andrew Marvel.

This step appears to have given great alarm at court, both to his father and the king. Means were at once taken to propitiate the possible hostility of the young and resolute statesman. "By his father's credit with the Earl of Northumberland, who was lord-high-admiral of England," says Clarendon, "he was joined presently and jointly with Sir William Russel in the office of treasurer of the navy (a place of great trust and profit), which he equally shared with the other."* His father's credit may indeed have had some share in this appointment, but the manifest purpose for which that credit had been called into request, and the eager sanction the appointment received from the king, were displayed in an additional honour conferred on him two or three months afterwards, when he received the dignity of knighthood from the hands of Charles. From this time he generally passed by the title which he has made so famous, Sir Harry Vane the younger, or the more formal one of Sir Henry Vane, of Raby Castle, knight.†

Still no movement appeared on the part of the newly-appointed minister of co-operation in the principles of the government. He was frequently observed, on the contrary, in the society of Pym and Hampden, and it is a remark of Clarendon that at this time "nothing was concealed from him, though it is believed that he communicated his own thoughts to very few." He was waiting his time, now very near.

In November, 1640, again elected for the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull, Sir Henry Vane the younger sat down at Westminster, a member of the ever-memorable Long Parliament. From that instant his course was plain, and never swerved from. "In the beginning of the great Parliament," says one who had watched him well, the honest and able Ludlow, "he was elected to serve his country among them, without the least application on his part to that end; and in this station, he soon made appear how capable he was of managing great affairs, possessing, in the highest perfection, a quick and ready apprehension, a strong and tenacious memory, a profound and penetrating judgment, a just and noble eloquence, with an easy and graceful manner of speaking. To these were added a singular zeal and affection for the good of the Commonwealth, and a resolution and courage not to be shaken or diverted from the public service."‡ Soon, indeed, were these great characteristics made manifest.

* Vol. i., 328.

† Anthony à Wood, iii., 579.

‡ I may in this place subjoin what is said of his general conduct henceforward, in the extraordinary "life" by Sikes. "This worthy patriot was freely chosen, without any seeking of his, to serve as a Burgess for the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, in that Parliament which sat down November 3, 1640. About thirteen years did he indefatigably labour therein for his country's relief, against manifest oppressions and public grievances that were upon it, and wellnigh ten years more he hath patiently suffered, as either a useless or pernicious person, because of his destructive constitution to the peace and interest of tyranny. During the Long Parliament, he was usually so engaged for the public, in the House and several committees, from early in the morning till very late at night, that he had scarce any leisure to eat his bread, converse with his nearest relations, or at all to mind his family affairs. Were I indeed furnished with the tongue of the learned, the pen of a ready writer, I should think it advisable to let the usefulness and success of his

Mrs. Hutchinson, we discern a striking illustration of the destructive influences of bigotry and persecution upon all the finer and more amiable sentiments of humanity. The very virtues which are justly lauded in our fathers serve to prove and demonstrate the lesson which it becomes us to draw from this passage of their history. Indeed, no excellence of nature or of principle, no strength or refinement of character, is proof against the debasing power of intolerance. To be bigoted is to be cruel. To persecute another is to barbarize one's self."

* Savage's Winthrop, vol. ii., p. 248.

† Strafford's Letters and Despatches, ii., 116.

His conduct in the affair of Lord Strafford's trial has been alluded to in a previous memoir.* He furnished the most material evidence against the earl. The circumstance may be stated here in the words which, according to Clarendon, were used by Pym, in describing it to the House of Commons. "That, some months before the beginning of this Parliament, he had visited young Sir Henry Vane, eldest son to the secretary, who was then newly recovered from an ague; that they being together, and condoling the sad condition of the kingdom, by reason of the many illegal taxes and pressures, Sir Harry told him, if he would call upon him the next day, he would show him somewhat that would give him much trouble, and inform him what counsels were like to be followed to the ruin of the kingdom; for that he had, in perusal of some of his father's papers, accidentally met with the result of the cabinet council upon the dissolution of the last Parliament, which comprehended the resolutions then taken. The next day he showed him a little paper of the secretary's own writing, in which was contained the day of the month, and the results of several discourses made by several counsellors, with several hieroglyphics, which sufficiently expressed the persons by whom those discourses were made. The matter was of so transcendent a nature, and the counsel so prodigious with reference to the Commonwealth, that he desired he might take a copy of it, which the young gentleman would by no means consent to, fearing it might prove prejudicial to his father.' But when he (Mr. Pym) informed him that it was of extreme consequence to the kingdom, and that a time might probably come when the discovery of this might be a sovereign means to preserve both church and state, he was contented that Mr. Pym should take a copy of it, which he did in the presence of Sir Henry Vane, and, having examined it together, delivered the original again to Sir Henry Vane."†

This famous paper, it is scarcely necessary to repeat in this place, contained old Vane's notes of a council, at which Strafford had recommended the introduction of the Irish army to reduce England to obedience. When they were produced by Pym in Westminster Hall, an extraordinary sensation was created, and the public actings all along that Parliament, till forcibly dissolved, speak for themselves. That race of action being run, not without much struggling, contradiction, and misreports the while, he comes to his suffering scene. He was for several years rejected, persecuted, and imprisoned by his apostatized friends, that had gone to the house of God in company with him, who at length, to complete their persecuting work upon him, delivered him up, to be hunted to death by his professed foes, enemies of all righteousness, God's and man's too."

* Life of Strafford, p. 125.
† Clarendon's History, i., 399-400, Oxford ed. of 1826. It is an extraordinary instance of Mr. D'Israeli's forgetfulness, where his violent partialities intrude, that in characterizing the statement in the text as an artfully-turned party tale, got up to infer that there was "no premeditated plot" in this case between the Vanes to revenge a family hatred against Strafford (a charge which the Royalist writers are very fond of), he endeavours to cast doubt and reproach upon the allegations of the "severe indisposition" of the younger Vane, and his alleged "reluctance" in suffering Pym to take a copy, by saying that he can find no authority for them excepting in Brodie's History of the British Empire! "Mr. Brodie," remarks Mr. D'Israeli, "is my sole authority for this statement!" Yet Clarendon must have been turned over, page by page, sentence by sentence, with infinite and most curious zeal by Mr. D'Israeli! Clarendon is the very text on which the "commentaries" are written.

cause of Strafford was, for the first time, felt to be hopeless. It is, perhaps, worth while adding the sequel of the scene in the House of Commons after Pym's announcement, always bearing in mind that it rests on no better authority than Clarendon's. Sir Henry Vane the younger, he says, rose after Mr. Pym, corroborated his statement, and added "that his father, being in the North with the king the summer before, had sent up his keys to his secretary, then at Whitehall, and had written to him (his son) that he should take from him those keys which opened his boxes where his writings and evidences of his land were, to the end that he might cause an assurance to be perfected which concerned his wife; and that he having perused those evidences, and despatched what depended thereupon, had the curiosity to desire to see what was in a red velvet cabinet which stood with the other boxes, and thereupon required the key of that cabinet from the secretary, as if he still wanted somewhat towards the business his father had directed; and so, having gotten that key, he found, among other papers, that mentioned by Mr. Pym, which made that impression in him, that he thought himself bound in conscience to communicate it to some person of better judgment than himself, who might be more able to prevent the mischiefs that were threatened therein, and so showed it to Mr. Pym, and being confirmed by him that the seasonable discovery thereof might do no less than preserve the kingdom, had consented that he should take a copy thereof, which to his knowledge he had faithfully done, and thereupon had laid the original in its proper place again, in the red velvet cabinet. He said he knew this discovery would prove little less than his ruin in the good opinion of his father; but, having been provoked by the tenderness of his conscience towards his common parent, his country, to trespass against his natural father, he hoped he should find compassion from that House, though he had little hopes of pardon elsewhere." The elder Vane, who had, throughout the whole of this scene, shown extraordinary symptoms of pain and vexation, now rose, remarked severely on the conduct of his son, and added "that it was true, being in the North with the king, and that unfortunate son of his having married a virtuous gentlewoman, daughter to a worthy member then present, to whom there was somewhat in justice and honour due, which was not sufficiently settled, he had sent his keys to his secretary, not well knowing in what box the material writings lay, and directed him to suffer his son to look after those evidences which were necessary; that by this occasion, it seemed, those papers had been examined and perused which had begot much of this trouble."* This scene, adds Clarendon, whose object throughout is to leave an impression that the elder Vane had secretly supplied the papers to his son for the mere purpose of revenging himself of a private spleen against Strafford, "was so well acted, with such passion and gestures between the father and the son, that many speeches were made in commendation of the conscience, integrity, and merit of the young man, and a motion made 'that the father might be enjoined by the House to be friends with his son; but for some time there was, in public, a great distance observed between them.* The distance which was observed between them is spoken of by other writers, of better faith and purer purpose than Clarendon, as the result of sincere dissatisfaction on the part of the elder Vane at the course to which his son had now irrevocably pledged himself; and of the exact truth of the details given in the preceding speeches, no writer of authority has ventured to express a doubt.* The only remaining matter that is in any way questionable may be safely left to the judgment of the reader—whether young Vane was strictly authorized in the step he took, upon discovering, by the indulgence of a pardonable curiosity, the memorable paper in question. Not only, it appears to me, was he fully justified in the course he followed, but none other was open to him, save at the peril of betraying the best interests of his country. So it was considered then by the most rigidly conscientious men,† and so all right-judging men must consider it now. The truth of the contents of that memorable paper is not disputed by Clarendon himself, and was confirmed by the evidence of Northumberland and Bristol, and even of Usher and Juxon.‡

* Clarendon, i., 403, 404.

In every great measure of the Commons the name of the younger Vane now prominently appears; and, pending the trial of Strafford, he had carried up the impeachment§ which disabled the power of Laud, the once terrible enemy of toleration. In all matters of religious reform he more especially distinguished himself: he was one of the greatest supporters of the famous "root and branch" petition against prelacy; in the committee of which Hyde was chairman he spoke with masterly effect in favour of the bill against episcopal government;|| and when the famous Assembly of Divines assembled at Westminster to deliberate on the state of the Church and the interests of religion, being requested by the House of Commons to take upon himself the duty of one of its lay members, he rendered himself conspicuously eminent in the consultations of that most grave and learned body,¶ not only by his theological attainments, but by the singular subtlety and skill with which he addressed them to the loftier purposes of government; and, in the faith of those opinions which have already received such striking illustration in these pages, sought to impress upon his more sectarian colleagues the necessity of associating with the popular principle in civil affairs, an extreme and universal toleration of religious differences. In this noble policy, by his powers of irresistible persuasion, he eventually won over some of the most celebrated of these men.*

The progress of public affairs, up to the erection of Charles's standard at Nottingham, has been discussed in detail in the memoir of Pym. The extraordinary legislative achievements that had already distinguished the hitherto short existence of this immortal Parliament shed no small portion of their lustre on the name of the younger Vane. In the impeachments which broke down the terrible power of Strafford and of Laud, and which disabled forever such men as Bishop Wren, Bishop Pierce, Secretary Windebank, Lord-keeper Finch, and the slavish judges of ship-money, their meaner associates, young Vane had made his powers conspicuous. In the triennial bill, the constitutional settlement of taxation, the destruction of despotic courts, the abolition of the king's prerogative of dissolution, in all those potent measures which, with a terrible hand, had driven out from the English government "evil counsellors, profligate judges, arrogant bishops, and sycophant churchmen," young Vane had gone hand in hand with the man from whom he had received his first political lessons, and on whose pure and lofty principles, on whose long life devoted with unequalled fidelity and virtue to the service of his country, he desired to model his own. The period to Pym's exertions was fast arriving, but they had found their worthiest "supplement and completion" in the younger Sir Harry Vane.†

When the final appeal to arms was made, he surrendered the patent of office he held from Charles, but he was reappointed treasurer of

* Clarendon (vol. v., p. 15, 16) speaks of the growing influence of the Independents in the Assembly of Divines.

† In the discussions respecting the command of the militia, which immediately led to the civil war, Vane showed remarkable activity and determination; and a curious anecdote is told by Echard (p. 527) on that head, which, without vouching for its authenticity, it may be worth while to subjoin. He took it, he says, "from an anonymous writer of noted curiosity and reputation." It occurred on the occasion of the last message from the Parliament respecting the militia, delivered to the king at Theobalds, and to which he returned the passionate and fiery answer which forbade all further accommodation. Young Vane was one of the committee of the two Houses appointed to deliver the message. The answer, says Echard, "being suddenly and with unusual quickness spoken by the king, they were much daunted; and presently retired themselves to take into consideration the terms of it, that there might be no difference in the reporting it to the several houses. As soon as the committee was set, the Earl of Newport called out his brother, the Earl of Warwick, to speak with him, who speedily returned with this account from the Earl of Newport, 'That the king was then too pressed to give a more satisfactory answer; but that he was confident they should have such a one, if they would but defer their departure for a small time.' To this the whole company seemed to assent with much cheerfulness, when suddenly young Sir Henry Vane, a dark enemy to all accommodation, declared himself to wonder at it, and said, 'Is there any person here who can undertake to know the Parliament's mind; whether this which we have, or that which is called a more satisfactory answer, will be more pleasing to the Houses? For my part, I cannot; and if there be any that can, let him speak.' To this no man was so bold as to give an answer; and so, having agreed upon their report, they departed; which shows how easily one subtle ill-disposed person may overthrow a general good intention."—(P. 527, 528.)

* Whitlocke, who was intimately acquainted with all the circumstances, and by no means a violent enemy to Strafford, or a violent friend to the Vanes, distinctly corroborates every part of Pym's statement. "Secretary Vane being out of town, sent a letter to his son, Sir Henry Vane the younger, then in London, with the key of his study, for his son to look in his cabinet for some papers there to send to his father. The son looking over many papers, among them alighted upon these notes, which being of so great concernment to the public, and declaring so much against the Earl of Strafford, he held himself bound in duty and conscience to discover them. He showed them to Mr. Pym, who urged him and prevailed with him that they might be made use of in the evidence against the Earl of Strafford, as being most material and of great consequence in relation to that business."—Memorials, April 12, 1641.

† The old covenanter Baillie describes young Vane's conduct throughout with fervent praise, and says his manner was remarkable, and that of a most "gracious youth."

‡ See Hallam's Const. Hist., ii., 145 (note).

§ See Laud's Diary—Rushworth's Collections, iii., 1087.

|| The report which remains of this speech is obviously imperfect and unsatisfactory, but is given, as it stands in the pamphlets of the day, in the appendix (D) at the end of this article.

¶ Biog. Brit., art. Vane, vi., 3991; and see Scobell's Collection of Acts, p. 43.

the navy by the Parliament; and its duties, which he had before transacted jointly with Sir William Russel, were now committed to him alone.* Sir Gilbert Gerard, the member for Middlesex, was appointed at the same time treasurer to the army. The orderly conduct of the affairs of Parliament required these appointments; and it is not one of the least memorable characteristics of the time, that it was only in such cases of absolute necessity that any appointments by the Parliament were made. Those particulars only were meddled with that were indispensable to the objects they had in view, and everything else was left as it stood.

A memorable circumstance is to be noted in connexion with this reappointment. The fees of Vane's office were great in the time of peace, but in war he had found them enormous. They are stated by many writers to have been little less than thirty thousand pounds per annum.† Yet now, on surrendering the patent which he had received for life from Charles I. (and for the purpose of enabling him to do so, Whitelocke tells us, the House passed an ordinance at his own earnest request), he stipulated, in regard to the great necessities of his country, that a thousand a year should be secured to the deputy who executed the ordinary routine of the office ("an agent he had bred up to the business"), and that the rest of its emoluments should be paid in to the public treasury. From this rare and most virtuous act of self-denial we date the method of a fixed salary, which was afterward continued in that office. Of its author, who practised many more such actions,‡ most truly it has been remarked that he was no less superior to the allurements of ambition; and it may perhaps be ascribed to the entire absence of such views that another person in the sequel (Cromwell), "fitted better for the rude intercourse and the sordid dispositions of the mass of mankind," got the start of him in the political race. In goodness, in real greatness, Vane had the advantage still.

The severe reverses suffered by the Parliament during the second year of the civil war are known to the reader.‖ Hampden slain, the strength of Pym declining with almost every hour, the train of disasters which had followed each other upon the field—everything seemed to render it not impossible to the superficial observer that the Parliament might soon be laid prostrate at the feet of the king. Yet let it not be imagined that the men on whom the chief conduct of affairs had now devolved, the Vanes, the Cromwells, the Martens, the St. Johns, ever for an instant seemed to dread this, or lost even momentarily their presence of mind, or any of the resources which depend on that greatest endowment of statesmen. They had a glorious faith in the cause they had embarked in, and they knew the wonderful aid which, in the very last resort, might still be relied on in such a cause. The defence of the liberties of a country is never to be despaired of. Even at this time in question, when brilliant successes waited on Charles, the astonishing power of the Parliamentarians appeared to guaranty a certainty of ultimate victory on their side. They would not be defeated. Bands and regiments of armed men sprang up in succession as if out of the earth. "The fervour and determination of the adherents of the Parliament was so intense as to assume, in a great degree, the features of gayety and hilarity. The sentiments of the adverse party, arising from an implicit veneration for monarchical institutions, or bent to take a prey, could not enter into rivalry with the emotions of men, and in some measure of women, engrossed in the cause of their religion, and fighting for everything that elevates the human heart, and makes life worth the possessing." They shrank abashed from the comparison.

For the immediate necessities of the hour, however, one expedient, it was evident, must now be adopted. Scotland had been hitherto kept aloof from the English quarrel, in which it was well known she sympathized (for it was in its material features the same as that she herself had been so recently and so successfully engaged in), and to which, indeed, she had openly manifested no slight leaning. But up to this time the pride and delicacy of the English patriots withheld them, for obvious reasons, from claiming her assistance. Had it been possible, they would still have desired to engage no distant party in this great domestic struggle; but when the present unexpected crisis arrived, which involved the possible defeat of the liberal cause in England, and, by consequence, its imminent endangerment in the neighbour countries, these considerations were laid aside, and the chief leaders of the Parliament resolved upon an embassy to the North, to bring the Scottish nation into the field.

The conduct of this embassy was a matter of the highest difficulty and danger. The Scots were known to be bigoted to their own persuasions of narrow and exclusive church government, while the greatest men of the English Parliament had proclaimed the sacred maxim that every man who worshipped God according to the dictates of his conscience was entitled to the protection of the state. But these men, Vane, Cromwell, Marten, and St. John, though the difficulties of the common cause had brought them into the acknowledged position of leaders and directors of affairs, were in a minority in the House of Commons, and the party who were their superiors in number were as bigoted to the most exclusive principles of Presbyterianism as the Scots themselves. Denzil Hollis

* Journals of August 8-10, 1642.

† See Biographia Britannica, vi., 3991; Ludlow's Memoirs, ii., 111; Collins's Peerage (art. Earl of Darlington), v., 303. ‡ Memorials, p. 232.

§ "In the beginning of that expensive war (as unwilling to make a prey of his country's necessities), he resigned his treasurership for the navy, causing the customary dues of that office to be converted into a salary of a thousand per annum. The bare poundage of all expenses that way, which in times of peace came to about three thousand, would have amounted to near twenty thousand by the year during the war with Holland. Were his personal circumstances, and the condition of his family affairs at that season and since, well known, it would render this piece of self-denial the more memorable. Some inconsiderable matter, without his seeking, was allotted to him by the Parliament in lieu thereof. He had also long before this, upon the self-denying ordinance (little observed by others), refunded five-and-twenty hundred pounds for public uses, being the moiety of his receipts in the said office from such time as the Parliament had made him sole treasurer, who, before the war, was joined with another person." Such is the mention of some of these acts of true patriotism by Vane's intimate friend, Sikes, who had the best opportunities of knowing all the circumstances, and of appreciating the extent of the noble self-denial. || See Life of Pym, p. 223-229.

stood at the head of this inferior class of patriots; Glyn, the recorder of London, and Maynard, were among its ablest supporters. Waller and Massey in the army, Sir Philip Stapleton and Sir John Clotworthy, ranged themselves under the same banners; and the celebrated Prynne, and Clement Walker, his inseparable and not less libellous associate, were "flaming Presbyterians." The most eminent of the Parliamentary nobility, particularly Northumberland, Essex, and Manchester, belonged also to this body; while the London clergy, and the metropolis itself, were almost entirely Presbyterian. These things considered, there was, indeed, great reason to apprehend that this party, backed by the Scots, and supported with a Scottish army, would be strong enough to overpower the advocates of free conscience, and "set up a tyranny not less to be deplored than that of Laud and his hierarchy, which had proved one of the main occasions of bringing on the war."* Yet, opposing to all this danger only their own high purposes and dauntless courage, the smaller party of more consummate statesmen were the first to propose the embassy to Scotland.

"The idea of such an embassy," says Mr. Godwin, "had been brought forward in the lifetime of Hampden; and on the 20th of July, 1643, the commissioners set out from London. They were four; and the man principally confided in among them was Vane. He indeed was the individual best qualified to succeed Hampden as a counsellor in the arduous struggle in which the nation was at this time engaged. In subtlety of intellect and dexterity of negotiation he was inferior to none; and the known disinterestedness of his character, and his superiority to the vulgar temptations of gain, gave him the greatest authority."† It is worth notice, that on the very same day on which Vane set out for Scotland, St. John was named to be added as a member to the committee of government, commonly called the committee for the safety of the kingdom, and this has suggested the idea that he was selected as a person on whom Vane could peculiarly depend. The shortsighted Presbyterians knew not the formidable power insensibly making head against them.

Clarendon, while he eulogizes Vane's genius in describing this embassy, uses all his insidious artifice to blacken its motives and its character: "Sir Harry Vane," he says, "was one of the commissioners, and therefore the others need not be named, since he was all in any business where others were joined with him. He was indeed a man of extraordinary parts, a pleasant wit, a great understanding, which pierced into and discerned the purposes of other men with wonderful sagacity, while he had himself vultum clausum, that no man could make a guess of what he intended. He was of a temper not to be moved, and of rare dissimulation, and could comply when it was not seasonable to contradict, without losing ground by the condescension; and if he were not superior to Mr. Hampden, he was inferior to no other man in all mysterious artifices. There need no more be said of his ability than that he was chosen to cozen and deceive a whole nation, who excel in craft and cunning, which he did with notable pregnancy and dexterity, and prevailed with a people, that could not otherwise be prevailed upon than by advancing their idol Presbytery, to sacrifice their peace, their interest, and their faith to the erecting a power and authority that resolved to persecute Presbytery to an extirpation, and very near brought their purpose to pass.*

A serious difficulty occurred in Vane's departure from London. He was obliged, with the other commissioners, to proceed for Scotland by sea, probably in consequence of the defeat of Lord Fairfax, and the temporary ascendancy of the Earl of Newcastle in the north of England. He was dismissed in London on the 20th of July, and did not reach Edinburgh before the 9th of August following.† Thus for twenty days he was perhaps out of the reach of any intelligence respecting the affairs of the Commonwealth. This was the most critical period in the whole history of the war; the period in which there was, for the moment, the greatest appearance that Charles would gain decisively the advantage over the Parliament, and be able effectually to extinguish the cause of liberty in this country. Vane had sailed to negotiate an aid for the English Legislature engaged in hostilities against their prince, and it was not certain that the first news that would reach him when he entered the harbour of Leith might not be that he had no constituents to represent. In these anxious and critical circumstances, Mr. Godwin has speculated on the character of his thoughts and resolutions. "During this suspense," says that historian, "he seems to have preserved all his serenity. He did not believe that, judged as the cause of Charles had been, and condemned by the most sober and enlightened portion of the people of England, it would be possible to put down the spirit of liberty. He persuaded himself that, even if the Cavaliers gained possession of the metropolis and dispersed the Parliament, their triumph would be short. And we may be very sure that he was sustained through all by the verdict of his conscience, and the holy zeal he entertained for a cause which, as he believed, comprised in it everything that was valuable to the existence of man."

Immediately on his arrival in Edinburgh the negotiation commenced, and what Vane seems to have anticipated at once occurred. The Scots offered their assistance heartily on the sole condition of an adherence to the Scottish religious system on the part of England. After many long and very warm debates, in which Vane held to one firm policy from the first, a solemn covenant was proposed, which Vane insisted should be named "a solemn league and covenant," while certain words were inserted in it on his subsequent motion, to which he also adhered with immovable constancy,‡ and

* Vol. iv., p. 292.

† Other accounts state the 7th. See Biog. Brit., vi., 399; and Rushworth, v., 466.

‡ I subjoin an account of these debates from Echard, who never gives authorities, and is therefore seldom to be relied on. The spirit attempted to be fixed on Vane in the present account is merely a paltry imitation of Clarendon; but the facts may be correct enough: "The main of it was managed by the superior cunning and artifice of Sir Henry which had the effect of leaving open to the great party in England, to whose interests he was devoted, that last liberty of conscience which man should never surrender, and which he had from the first resolved that nothing in this agreement should exclusively withhold them from. In the clause relating to the "preservation of the king's person," he inserted the words "in preservation of the laws of the land and liberty of the subject;"* and by a simple phrase in the memorable article relating to religion, effected a saving retreat for the supporters of a just toleration.

* Godwin's Hist. of Com., i., 176.

† Hist. of Com., i., 121.

The treacherous intrigues of the Duke of Hamilton were equally foiled on this remarkable occasion by Vane. He and some of his brother Royalists had secretly stimulated the more enthusiastic Covenanters to stieckle for extreme conditions. They insisted, in consequence, according to Clarendon, on a committee to be selected from the Parliament of both kingdoms, to whom was to be intrusted the conduct of the war: it was imagined that the pride of the English nation would never subscribe to this stipulation. The friends of Hamilton were completely outwitted here, as on every other point. Vane offered no objection, secure in the harmlessness of such a stipulation before the energy and power of his own dauntless party, which he knew, as long as the war lasted, would sustain itself in that place of supremacy which in times of danger and doubt is ever conceded to superior minds.

The famous article respecting religion ran in these words: "That we shall sincerely, really, and constantly, through the grace of God, endeavour, in our several places and callings, the preservation of the Reformed religion in the Church of Scotland, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, against our common enemies; the reformation of religion in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, ACCORDING TO THE WORD OF GOD, and the example of the best Reformed churches; and we shall endeavour to bring the churches of God in the three kingdoms to the nearest conjunction and uniformity in religion, confessing of faith, form of church government, directory for worship, and catechizing; that we, and our posterity after us, may as brethren live in faith and love, and the Lord may delight to dwell in the midst of us. That we shall, in like manner, without respect of persons, endeavour the extirpation of popery, prelacy (that is, church government by archbishops, bishops, their chancellors and commissaries, deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, and all other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy)." Vane, by this introduction of "according to the Word of God," left the interpretation of that word to the free conscience of every man. On the 17th of August the solemn league and covenant was voted by the Legislature and the assembly of the Church at Edinburgh. The king, in desperate alarm, sent his commands to the Scotch people not to take such a covenant. In reply, they "humbly advised his majesty to take the covenant himself."*

The surpassing service rendered by Vane on this great occasion to the Parliamentary cause, exposed him to a more violent hatred from the Royalists than he had yet experienced, and Clarendon has used every artifice to depreciate his motives and his sincerity. In various passages of his history he adverts to the subject. In the following, the truth is very evasively stated: "Sir Harry Vane (who equally hated Episcopacy and Presbytery, save that he wished the one abolished with much impatience, believing it much easier to keep the other from being established, whatever they promised, than to be rid of that which was settled in the kingdom) carefully considered the covenant, and after he had altered and changed many expressions in it, and made them doubtful enough to bear many interpretations, he and his fellow-commissioners signed the whole treaty;" but shortly after we have this distinct falsehood deliberately given: "And he who contributed most to it, the league and covenant, and, in truth, was the principal contriver of it, and the man by whom the committee in Scotland was entirely and stupidly governed, Sir Harry Vane the younger, was not afterward more known to abhor the Covenant and the Presbyterians than he was at that very time known to do, and laughed at them then as much as ever he did afterward."

Vane never "abhorred" the Covenant, though he abhorred the paltry advantages and tyrannies which were afterward, under its sanction, sought to be practised by the Presbyterians. He held the league and covenant in its only true and just acceptation, to be ever sacred—a mutual guaranty between two nations, that for one great common object each should sustain the rights of the other until perfect liberty had been gained for both.† Till the very close of his life he professed a devotion he had never swerved from to all that was noble, and just, and good in that memorable league, while he never scrupled to record his impressive dissent from the numerous and desperate endeavours that were made by the Scots and the Presbyterians to wrest it to "other ends than itself warranted." "Nor will I deny," he said to his judges in the course of his melancholy trial, "nor will I deny but that, as to the manner of the prosecution of the Covenant to other ends than itself warrants, and with a rigid oppressive spirit (to bring all dissenting minds and tender consciences under one uniformity of church discipline and government), it was utterly against my judgment; for I always esteemed it more Vane, who, as Dr. Gumble tells us, was very earnest with the Scots to have the whole called a league as well as a covenant, and argued it almost all night, and at last carried it. He held another debate about Church government, which was to be according to the example of the best Reformed Churches; he would have it only according to the Word of God; but after a great contest, they joined both, and the last had the precedence. One of his companions afterward asking him the reason why he should put them to so much trouble with such needless trifles, he told him, "he was mistaken, and did not see enough into that matter, for a league showed it was between two nations, and might be broken upon just reasons, but not a covenant. For the other, that Church government according to the Word of God, by the difference of divines and expositors, would be long enough before it be determined, for the learned held it clearly for Episcopacy; so that when all are agreed, we may take in the Scotch Presbytery."—P. 585.

* Ludlow's Memoirs, i., 79.

* Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 77.

† Henry Marten, it will be found, held the same opinion though in his case perhaps the opinion was pushed to the extreme. See post, Life of Marten.

agreeable to the Word of God, that the ends and work declared in the Covenant should be promoted in a spirit of love and forbearance to differing judgments and consciences, that thereby we might be approving ourselves in doing that to others which we desire they would do to us, and so, though upon different principles, be found joint and faithful advancers of the Reformation contained in the covenant, both public and personal." Beautiful, indeed, and conceived in the only true Christian spirit, is this definition of the Covenant—in that divine and tolerant faith it was projected and signed by Vane. Some of the last words spoken by him on the scaffold, and in which he made a most touching allusion to the Marquis of Argyle, show even more deeply that among the last and strongest feelings left to him in this world was the desire that, in reference to this great action of his life, he should leave behind him an unstained name.*

Vane did not return to London after his mission until October 26.† In the interval he had formed a very great intimacy and confidence with the Marquis of Argyle. Clarendon has celebrated this friendship, and makes out that their sudden attachment had its origin in the strong sympathy felt by each for a like depth and mystery of purpose he discovered in the other. It is certain that a subtler or more refined spirit than Argyle's existed only in the breast of Vane, and though the Scottish statesman was a staunch friend to Presbytery, yet he and the great English leader had soon discovered one point in which they fully agreed; a repugnance to half measures, an aversion to the conducting the war in an irresolute and temporizing spirit, and "a determination to push the advantages obtained in the field as far as they would go."

The solemn league and covenant remained to be adopted in England. The Scottish form of giving it authority was followed as far as possible. It was referred by the two Houses to the Assembly of Divines, which had commenced its sittings on the 1st of the preceding July, being called together to be consulted with by the Parliament for the purpose of settling the government and form of worship of the Church of England. This assembly, already referred to, consisted of 121 of the clergy; and a number of lay assessors were joined with them, consisting of ten peers, and twenty members of the House of Commons. All these persons were named by the ordinance of the two Houses of Parliament, which gave birth to the assembly. The public taking of the Covenant was solemnized on the 25th of September, each member of either House attesting his adherence by oath first, and then by subscribing his name.* The name of Vane, subscribed immediately on his return, appears upon the list next to that of Cromwell.†

The results of this masterly effort of statesmanship were soon manifest. An army of 20,000 men was raised and marshalled in Scotland, and crossed the Tweed on the 19th of January following, to act with the forces of the Parliament.

The disastrous loss to the popular party of the great services of Pym (the last of which had been the introduction of the system of excise into this country,‡ an idea borrowed from the financial proceedings in Holland) had now devolved upon Vane the chief conduct of civil affairs. His energy was remarkable: in public and in private, on the floor of the House and in its committees, in council with the committees at Derby House, or in watchful earnestness on the field of battle, Sir Harry Vane the younger was acknowledged the foremost man of the time.

At the opening of the campaign in 1644, strengthened by the accession of the army from Scotland, 14,000 men had been raised under the Earl of Manchester, and his lieutenant-general Cromwell, for the associated counties in the eastern quarter of England. Upon these forces, Vane, distrustful of the power, if not of the sincerity of Essex,§ fixed hopes of the most sanguine kind. We find him upon the scene of action with Manchester in June, 1644, assisting him with his advice, and urging movements of policy which soon won for that division of the army the peculiar confidence of the people. Vane had already in his view an army of a "new model." An interesting remark is made by Mr. Godwin on the presence of the statesman thus in the camp of Manchester. "It gives," he says, "an additional quickness to our feelings, in the midst of these warlike proceedings, to look into the camp of the Parliamentarians, to draw back the canvass of their tents, and contemplate the soldier and the statesman, busied as they were in anticipating the future, in providing for all occasions, and endeavouring to place the mass of yet unformed events under the guidance of human prudence and intellect. In this camp, which was now traversing Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire, and proceeding to York, we might see, among others, Manchester, deficient neither in the qualities of a gentleman nor the valour of a soldier, the most well-tempered and courteous of mankind, firm in purpose, yet ever gentle and conciliating in his manners; Cromwell, the future guide and oppressor of the Commonwealth, daring everything, and accomplishing whatever he dared to desire; and Vane, ever

* "My life, estate, and all, is not so dear to me as my service to God, his cause, to the kingdom of Christ, and to the future welfare of my country; and I am taught according to the example, as well as that most Christian saying, of a noble person that lately died after this public manner in Scotland: 'How much better is it to choose affliction and the cross, than to sin or draw back from the service of the living God into the ways of apostasy and perdition.' That noble person, whose memory I honour, was with myself at the beginning and making of the solemn league and covenant, the matter of which, and the holy ends therein contained, I fully assent unto, and have been as desirous to observe; but the rigid way of prosecuting it, and the oppressing uniformity that hath been endeavoured by it, I never approved."—Speech upon the scaffold.

† Commons' Journals.

* Godwin, i., 181. Journals of Commons, Sept. 22. Whitelocke, p. 74.

† Rushworth, v., 480. Echard, p. 585.

‡ See Journals, May 17, 1643. Dugdale, View of the Troubles, p. 120. Godwin, iii., 486. This circumstance had escaped me when engaged on the life of that great statesman.

§ Essex well knew this, and that the influence of Vane was undermining his hold upon the Parliament. Clarendon remarks (iv., 524-5), "The Lord Roberts, though inferior in the army, had much greater credit in the Parliament than the Earl of Essex; and the earl did not think him very kind to him, he being then in great conjunction with Sir Harry Vane, whom of all men the earl hated, and looked upon as an enemy."

profound in thought and sagacious in purpose, desiring the true advantage and happiness of all within the sphere of his influence, and embracing in his capacious mind all the elements of public safety and substantial improvement. These men, now so cordially united, were in no long time to be shaken asunder, each actuated with different sentiments, each pursuing an object which the other two regarded with fixed disapprobation."

Vane seldom remained long from the seat of government, however, for there his presence was daily becoming more and more essential. The Presbyterians, rallying with the better aspect of affairs in the field, once more showed a formidable front of remonstrance and discontent in the debates of the House of Commons. He was not daunted by this; he had already looked greater dangers in the face on the eve of the league and covenant, and yet dared to proceed. He knew from the first the consequences of that great measure which he would sooner or later have to cope with, and he was prepared for the struggle now.

The Presbyterians declared their resolution to stand upon uniformity in church government. Laud and his system had passed away, and they now came forward with their own. The excommunicating canons of diocesan Episcopacy had been driven out of England; the pillories of the Archbishop of Canterbury reeked no more with human mutilations; but now came in the Presbyterians, not less exclusive or intolerant, and impressed with no less horror of the blasphemy and perniciousness of sects, than the former. Its chief distinctions were the comparative moderation of its emoluments, and the plainness of its garb. The clergy of the Church of Scotland were habited with something of the same unambitious sadness as we see in paintings of the fathers of the Inquisition. "But this," says the historian of the Commonwealth, with earnest and impressive eloquence, "is in certain respects a disadvantage. He that lords it over me, and would persuade me that he is not of the same ignoble kind as myself, ought, perhaps, to be clad in robes, and covered with ermine and gold. It is some mitigation of my sufferings. I should be glad to be deluded and dazzled to the last. It seems natural that human beings should prefer, like the widow of Benares, to die amid the clangour of trumpets, and the soft breathing of recorders, to the perishing by the deformed and withering blow of undisguised cruelty."

And so might Vane have thought, and Cromwell, and Milton; for on that principle they acted, in a resolute opposition to the Presbyterian policy. It is a mistake, however, to suppose that these great men were what is called "Independents," or to be considered as belonging in themselves merely to another Christian sect; for Vane himself, in matters appertaining to religion, was indeed, what Clarendon has striven to convert into a term of reproach, "a man above ordinances." His pure religious faith has already received illustration in these pages—the extraordinary incidents of his early life must be supposed to have acted with corresponding force upon his imagination—and now, having risen with the dangers of the time—the most eminent statesman of an age remarkable for greatness—the acknowledged leader of the English House of Commons—the sole forms of religious or intellectual contest or controversy that he would acknowledge were those in which the truth bade fair to be separated from falsehood, and in which a perfect and uncontrolled liberty of disquisition might possibly some day, with God's sanction, elevate men into the highest and most sublime regions of pure and perfect intellect—into a station little lower than the angels.

Nothing has been so misunderstood by even the most liberal thinkers, nothing has been so carefully avoided by the greatest admirers of the younger Vane, as the nature of his peculiar opinions in religion. But these shall not be avoided here, and, if possible, not misunderstood. Nor is this an improper period for the introduction of them, since, standing thus on the threshold of the greatest events and exertions of his political life, each may serve to illustrate the other.

When he retired for a time from public life, in disgust at the usurpation of Cromwell, he occupied his leisure with religious and political writing. In politics, he wrote with the clear and impressive reason, the simple and masterly style, of a consummate statesman. In religion, he indulged occasionally those wild and visionary thoughts which have seldom failed to visit all strong and fervent spirits of the earth, when they have flung themselves passionately into the profounder questions of man's existence and destiny. In those moments his own divinely elevated fancies assumed to him the forms of "angels of light," and the very presence of Christ himself, "coming in the clouds," was not far distant from his rapt and excited vision.

In the Retired Man's Meditations he thus speaks of the Fall of Man: "In this tree of knowledge of good and evil, man had the sight of himself, in the exercise of his natural life and the operations appertaining unto him, as he became a living soul; in the well or evil use whereof he might arrive unto the experience of the supreme good held forth to him as the end of his creation, the endless life that was to follow; or else he might come, by the forfeiture of the present good he enjoyed, to know the evil of a much worse condition than at first he had; for the avoiding of which, and to continue in a posture meet to receive the other, God required him in the state of innocency to abide in a waiting frame of spirit, as a sojourner and stranger in the midst of his present enjoyments in the earthly paradise, that so through his patient forbearance from taking up his rest, or terminating his delight in seen things, he might preserve in himself an unengaged, unprejudiced spirit to what was yet behind of the counsel of God to be communicated to him, as to a more excellent attainment and inheritance to be exhibited to him in the light of the approaching day of the Lord, the beamings forth whereof, as considered in type, were already present."

Here, it seems to me, is the expression of a sense equally subtle and noble. The pause before the accession of all the divinity of intellect that the Creator had designed for man—the rest which was intended before its gradual fulfilment—the waiting frame of spirit—the patient forbearance—the unengaged, unprejudiced soul—conceived in that divine sense of Milton,

“God doth not need

Either man's work or his own gifts; who best
Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best: his state
Is kingly; thousands at his bidding rest,
And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
They also serve who only stand and wait”— all this, with the vision in the distance of a “more excellent attainment and inheritance” in the realization of all man's intellectual powers, expresses most surely a great imaginative conception, which may be non-accordant with a simpler faith, but is neither unintelligible nor obscure. The fervent writer proceeds thus:

“Now man (being furnished with a reasonable soul, and all the excellencies of its operations, with freedom of will to choose the good and refuse the evil, honoured also with the sovereignty over the creatures), in this fair posture of preparation to receive more, was nevertheless seduced, ensnared, and made a prey of by Satan, sin, and death, to the rendering (as it were) abortive all that work which was already passed upon him, and to the letting in of sin and death, with the deserved curse and wrath of God, through him, as through a door, upon all his posterity.

“The occasion of this was twofold: first, the present enjoyment of good from God under the ministry of the first covenant, the fruit of which, to the eye of flesh and blood even at its best, was so glorious, and appeared so beautiful and desirable, that man was easily persuaded that it was the best and highest attainment he needed to look after; and thereby, through Satan's subtlety, rendered secure and negligent as to the use of means given by God to carry him on, pass him through, and conduct him out of this his corruptible state, as from glory to glory, into the power of an endless life (without the intervening of sin), to the full and perfect securing of man's nature from all prevailing power of sin's assaults forever, which was not done by creation.

“The second occasion of man's fall was the freedom of his will, wherein the judging and desiring faculties of his mind were entirely committed by God to his own free motion and operation, upon the terms of the covenant he was brought into with God, which was to be dealt with according unto his works—to be rewarded with life or with death, as he should rightly order or abuse this liberty of action, with which God had invested him by way of trial and probation. That man had such a power of free will as this,

“First, the nature and tenor of the covenant he was taken into doth demonstrate, which is conditional in reference to the works of man; and God throughout deals with man under that covenant according to his works, strongly thereby asserting them to be man's own; so as the very reward which comes thereby is accounted to him of debt, even the thing which his own action (as left alone unto himself therein) hath brought upon him, and entitled him unto.

“Secondly, without such a power of free will, man's first estate could not have been mutable, at least could never have changed into corruption; for if it had been necessary to him to have stood, he could not have fallen; and if it had been necessary to him to fall, God had thereby made himself the author of sin, which could not be.

“That which Adam was forbidden was not simply to forbear the use of his free will, but the evil and unlawful use of it, as (through an unwise discerning, and erroneous judging between the present temporary good which he saw, and the future durable excellency of the things unseen and but in hope) there did spring up an inordinate coveting and desire in him after the retaining of the first, to the despising and rejecting of the second.”

What is the meaning of this rich vein of spiritual argument and subtlety, divested of the thin veil of theological phrase which is flung around it, if it be not only another form of those purest aspirations which should be the glory of our nature, teaching us that there is a something within us that was designed for nobler purposes and achievements than have fallen to it in this world, and that, having for a time forfeited these blessings, still the liberty of free will and independent action remains, which, wisely directed, and regulated by the higher uses and refinements even of our imperfect intellect, will in the end bring Christ himself upon the earth, by raising the minds and thoughts of men up to within the level of his own? The reign of the saints Vane looked for was the perfection of the intellect of man. The de amendatione intellectus of Bacon might have been construed by Clarendon into another reign of saints of a similar description. For this great purpose, with an ever present view to that possible reign of wisdom upon earth, keeping constantly before him the sense that in the mission of Christ had been fulfilled the gracious purpose of the Creator of offering to man the redemption of his former shortsightedness and error, Sir Henry Vane passed his life in one unending strife with what he believed to be the temporal and the spiritual enemy of man; in the one case, to prevent the subjection of his powers to that tyranny of bad government which must deprave his will, and in the other, to unloose his conscience from those secular chains which must take from him eventually the liberty of thought and action by which only his spirit could aspire. This I believe to have been Vane's great theory—these the thoughts which, carried out into all their various and richest forms by the beauty and power of his genius, filled and stirred his mind when he spoke of the coming of Christ upon the earth, and his reign here in goodness and in glory.

In the night before his death he prayed in his prison with his children, and this was a portion of his prayer:

“The day approaches in which thou wilt decide this controversy, not by might nor by power, but by the spirit of the living God. The spirit will make its own way, and run through the whole earth. Then shall it be said, Where is the fury of the oppressor? Who is he that dares or can stand before the spirit of the Lord, in the mouth of his witnesses? Arise, O Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered. Thy poor servant knows not how he shall be carried forth by thee this day, but, blessed be thy great name, that he hath whereof to speak in this great cause. When I shall be gathered to thee this day, then come thou in the ministry of thy holy angels that excel in strength. We have seen enough of this world, and thou seest we have enough of it. Let these my friends, that are round about me, commit me to the Lord, and let them be gathered into the family of Abraham, the father of the faithful, and become faithful-witnesses of those principles and truths that have been discovered to them, that it may be known that a poor weak prophet hath been among them, not by the words of his mouth only, but by the voice of his blood and death, which will speak when he is gone." Here is the same lofty spirit, the same hope of the tranquil elevation of intellect in the world above the old influences of might and power.

When his friends were weeping around him on the morning of his execution, he bade them have faith and patience, for that the realization of all the Creator's promises held out for fulfilment in the world would surely come, when a sufficient number of the spirits of the just should have ascended into heaven. "Weep not," he said; "I have not the least reluctance or struggling in my spirit against death. I desire not to live; but my will is resigned up to God in all. Why are you troubled? I am not. You have need of faith and patience to follow the Lord's call. This ought chiefly to be in our eye, the bringing glory to our heavenly Father. Surely God hath a glorious design to carry on in the world, even the building up of David's throne to all generations; for he is completing all his precious stones, making them heaven-proof, and then laying them together in the heavenly mansions, with the spirits of the just, till it be a complete city. When the top stone thereof is laid, then will he come in all his glory." What is the groundwork of this noble idea, but that which I have described to be his pervading philosophical sense of the Messiah's advent, the gradual perfection of the moral and intellectual powers of mankind?

On the scaffold itself, these were among the latest words of his prayer: "Let thy servant speak something on the behalf of the nation wherein he hath lived. Lord, did we not exceed other nations in our day? Great things have been done by thee in the midst of us. O that thou wouldst look down in pity and compassion, and pardon the sins of this whole nation, and lay them not to their charge; show them what is thy good and acceptable will, and bring them into subjection thereunto. We humbly pray thee, O Lord, look down with compassion upon this great and populous city; cleanse away the impurity, sinfulness, and defilements thereof; cause their souls to delight in thy word, that they may live. Let a spirit of reformation and purity spring up in and among them with power; make them willing to lay down all that is dear to them for thee, that thou mayest give them a crown of life; that they may always desire and choose affliction, and to be exposed to the worst condition and hardest circumstances that can be brought upon them in this world, rather than sin against him that hath loved them and bought them with a price, that they might live to him in their bodies and in their spirits." Again, in these memorable and most touching words, the passionate yearning for that perfecting of his beloved country by the "spirit of reformation and purity" surmounts every other emotion.

With such aids as these, and considering the subject, so far as we may feel it practicable, in a congenial spirit, we do not find much difficulty in comprehending even Vane's theology! And this is what Baxter ridicules*—Hume finds "absolutely unintelligible," and "exhibiting no traces of eloquence or common sense"†—Anthony Wood foams in the mouth at, when he even mentions;—Bishop Burnet professes an utter bewilderment about;—Clarendon, in va-

* The terms of Baxter's ridicule are worth giving. The closing passage may perhaps divest it of its sting! "His unhappiness lay in this, that his doctrines were so cloudily formed and expressed that few could understand them, and therefore he had few true disciples. The Lord Brookes was slain before he had brought him to maturity. Mr. Sterry is thought to be of his mind, as he was his intimate; but he hath not opened himself in writing, and was so famous for obscurity in preaching (being, said Sir Benj. Rudyard, too high for this world, and too low for the other), that he thereby proved almost barren also, and vanity and sterility were never more happily conjoined. Mr. Sprig is the chief of his more open disciples (too well known by a book of his sermons). This obscurity by some was imputed to his not understanding himself, but by others to design, because he could speak plainly when he listed: the two courses in which he had most success and spake most plainly were, his earnest plea for universal liberty of conscience, and against the magistrates' intermeddling with religion, and his teaching his followers to revile the ministry, calling them ordinarily black coats, priests, and other names which then savoured of reproach; and those gentlemen that adhered to the ministry, they said were priest-ridden."—(Life, p. 75.) The "earnest plea for universal liberty of conscience" I regret to say I have not seen. No doubt it was one of the noblest of his works.

† This is Hume's deliberately recorded opinion. "This man, so celebrated for his Parliamentary talents, and for his capacity in business, has left some writings behind him. They treat, all of them, of religious subjects, and are absolutely unintelligible. No traces of eloquence or even of common sense appear in them."

‡ A short specimen will serve: "In sum, he was the Proteus of the times, a mere hotchpotch of religion, chief ringleader of all the frantic sectarians, of a turbulent spirit and working brain, of a strong composition of choler and melancholy, an inventor not only of whimsies in religion, but also of crotchets in the state (as his several models testify), and composed only of treason, ingratitude, and baseness."—Ath. Ox., iii., 580.

§ His words are: "For though he set up a form of religion in a way of his own, yet it consisted rather in a withdrawing from all other forms, than in any new or particular opinions or forms; from which he and his party were called Seekers, and seemed to wait for some new and clearer manifestations. In these meetings he preached and prayed often himself, but with so peculiar a darkness, that, though I have sometimes taken pains to see if I could find out his meaning in his works, yet I could never reach it. And since many others have said the same, it may be reasonable to believe that he hid somewhat that was a necessary key to the rest. His friends told me he leaned to Origen's notion of a universal salvation of all, both of devils and the damned, and

* Immediately before he prayed he had addressed the people, and expressed to the same effect, but by a stronger paraphrase, this impression of the advent of a better day: "I shall not desire in this place to take up much time, but only, as my last words, leave this with you: 'That as the present storm we now lie under, and the dark clouds that yet hang over the Reformed churches of Christ, which are coming thicker and thicker for a season, were not unforeseen by me for many years passed, as some writings of mine declare; so the coming of Christ in these clouds, in order to a speedy and sudden revival of his cause, and spreading his kingdom over the face of the whole earth, is most clear to the eye of my faith, even that faith in which I die, whereby the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.'" rious passages, studiously endeavours to misrepresent or laugh at*—and all modern writers, with one single exception,† have either studiously evaded, or spoken of with ingenuous pity or a wholesale contempt. The candid critic in the Spectator, who "had read Aristotle, and found him not such a fool as he thought him," showed greater ability and much more honesty than these critics of Sir Henry Vane.

But this subject cannot be brought too distinctly before the reader in an endeavour to do tardy justice to the memory of one of the greatest men of our history. He will bear inquiry best into the matters for which he has been the most vehemently assailed.

The peculiar action of the will in Vane's argument upon the fall of man receives illustration from another passage in his writings upon the relation of the will to all that is noblest in man's soul. "The will only is truly man's own, and the considerable part of the reasonable soul. On it depend the issues of good or evil, life or death. All the rest of a man, his understanding, memory, imagination, may be taken from him, altered, troubled by a thousand accidents. But the will is so much in our own power that it cannot be taken away, though its action may be hindered. 'Tis our own will we knowingly and freely give it away, which may be. And he that hath once absolutely given up his will to another is no more his own man. He hath left himself nothing of his own. 'Tis by the will we are good or evil, happy or unhappy."

His enthusiasm was indeed highly and passionately wrought on many incidental points of faith, but the character of his mind in all the practical applications of those exalted views was infinitely sober, subtle, well regulated, and exact. No worldly failures in his own case had the power of disheartening the great reliance with which "to the mark" he still pressed forward. "The goodness of any cause is not merely to be judged by the events, whether visibly prosperous or unprosperous, but by the righteousness of its principles; nor is our faith and patience to fail under the many fears, doubts, wants, troubles, and power of adversaries in the passage to the recovery of our long-lost freedom; for it is the same cause with that of the Israelites of old, of which we ought not to be ashamed or distrustful."

And in another most wise and tender passage of philosophy he speaks thus:

"Evils themselves, through the wise overruling providence of God, have good fruits and effects. The world would be extinguished and perish if it were not changed, shaken, and decomposed by a variety and interchangeable course of things, wisely ordered by God, the best physician. This ought to satisfy every honest and reasonable mind, and make it joyfully submit to the worst of changes, how strange and wonderful soever they may seem, since they are the works of God and nature, and that which is a loss in one respect is a gain in another.

"Let not a wise man disdain or ill resent anything that shall happen to him. Let him know those things that seem hurtful to him in particular, pertain to the preservation of the whole universe, and are of the nature of those things that finish and fill up the course and office of this world."

Of his views in regard to the necessity of that preparation of man for his better and wiser state, which has already been explained in a former passage to imply in its results that divine advent which his imagination took such fervent delight in, the following most striking passage from the Retired Man's Meditations will afford a farther illustration and example:

"But there is a duty of the day, a generation-work, respecting the time and circumstances of action, in which the lot of our life is cast, which calls upon us to use all lawful and righteous means that are afforded by the good hand of God, through the inward light and knowledge he vouchsafes, and outward providences and helps which he casts in, whereby to make way for, and to be hastening unto, the coming of that day of God wherein the old heavens and earth shall be rolled away as garments, yea, with the works that are therein, be burned up, and the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness, shall be brought forth in their room.

"Our part is the same, therefore, in this, as in the practice of other righteous duties appertaining to us, the perfection whereof we cannot expect until the redemption of the body; and yet we are to be using all lawful means and endeavours to come as near the primitive pattern and rule as we can, in our whole practice throughout.

"So that when once we have well considered what rule Christ himself, if he were on earth, would exercise over men in protecting those that do well, and being a terror to evil works, as also in distributing righteousness equally and impartially unto all upon the grounds of right and just (which every one, in the measure of light they have attained, are acquainted with, and do acknowledge for the

to the doctrine of pre-existence."—(Hist. of his own Time, fol. 1724, i., 164.)

* "Vane was a man not to be described by any character of religion, in which he had swallowed some of the fancies and extravagances of every sect or faction, and was become (which cannot be expressed by any other language than was peculiar to that time) a man above ordinances, unlimited and unrestrained by any rules or bounds prescribed to other men, by reason of his perfection. He was a perfect enthusiast, and, without doubt, did believe himself inspired, which so far corrupted his reason and understanding (which, in all matters without the verge of religion, was inferior to that of few men), that he did at some time believe he was the person (!) deputed to reign over the saints upon earth for a thousand years."—(Hist. of Rebellion, vi., 373.) I need not quote, as I might, fifty similar passages from his history: in charity it is right to add, that in private intercourse with his friends, even Clarendon could moderate something of the inveterate hostility with which, to the scaffold, he pursued Vane. In some remarks on "Cressy's answer to Stillingfleet" (reported in the Biog. Brit.), he thus speaks, with half candour, of one of his religious books: "Which when I had read, and found nothing of his usual clearness and ratiocination in his discourse, in which he used much to excel the best of the company he kept, and that the style thereof was very much like that of Sancta Sophia, and that in a crowd of very easy words the sense was too hard to find out, I was of opinion that the subject-matter of it was of so delicate a nature that it required another kind of preparation of mind, and it may be another kind of diet, than men are ordinarily supplied with." This is more true than the writer intended, as applied to his own "preparation of mind," and that gross "diet" which withheld the pampered chancellor from sympathy with such a spirit as that of Sir Harry Vane.

† In an early number of the Westminster Review a very able notice appeared under the title of "Vane and Bunyan," which was written in the best spirit.

rule which they are willing to be concluded under, as to all their outward concerns), we ought in the way of Christ, and in the use of all lawful means, to be as near this in our practice as possible we may, in the rule over men, which we shall be either as principals or accessories in setting up, holding ourselves obliged in heartiness and freedom of mind to maintain."

In a previous memoir in this series I spoke of the extraordinary influence which the translation of the Bible had exerted in the world. To Vane it was, indeed, what Plato's "original type" may have been to the enfeebled and restless man of civilization, who wished, by such a comparison, to ascertain his precise position in the moral or intellectual scale. What he knew of its own original language* gave additional strength to his passion for its study, and in the leisure he could abstract from public affairs it was seldom out of his hands.† It is no matter of surprise that such a mind as his should wander occasionally out of the rich treasures of thought, fancy, imagination, and feeling disclosed in that favourite study in their highest and most passionate forms, into fancies and speculations of its own on the various wonders of those primeval days when inspired teachers walked upon the earth, and angels are recorded to have sat down with men.

Even in such speculations observe still the pervading sense of what has been so variously exhibited in passages already given. He speaks of the creation, the nature, and the ministry of angels:

"These in their creation are described by the light which God made on the first day, Gen., i., 3, 4, when he said, 'Let there be light, and there was light; and God saw the light, that it was good;' approving this first work of his hands in the beginning of that day: and God, by his dividing the light from the darkness, signified the heavenliness of their frame and constitution, as they stand exalted and separate in their beings from all sensual life, in the form of invisible spirits, whereof the material heavens in their creation are the first shadow; which are called, Prov., viii., 26, 'the highest part of the dust of the world;' as David also (giving account of both their creations together), Psalm civ., 2-4, saith, 'Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment; who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain; who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters; who maketh the clouds his chariots; who walketh upon the wings of the wind; who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flaming fire:' in which posture and preparation, the Psalmist describes the word as he proceeds to the rest of the creation, vers. 5, 6, &c., intimating that as man in his bodily state was made dust of the ground, so the angels were made a flame of fire in their natural constitution."

He follows this up in a passage of rapt poetical fervour that would have been worthy of Milton:

"As thus they are this heavenly building, they are the first heavens, the tabernacle and clouds of heaven, or the air, for the daybreak and glorious sun of God's first appearance to run his race and finish his course in, whereby to enlighten the ends of the earth, and all things under heaven. These sons of this morning are the first light-bearers to the inhabitants of the first world, and therein are covering cherubs unto the Son in his own proper glory; and that they may be enabled to bear light, or the similitude of Christ in his first appearance, unto others, they are first the receivers of that light in themselves, in a spirituality of being and form fitted and suited thereunto, which accommodates them with the exercise of senses merely spiritual and inward, exceeding high, intuitive, and comprehensive: a manner of life, shadowing out the divine life in the name of the Father, whose voice is not heard at any time, nor shape seen, but is like a consuming fire, to burn up and slay whatever natural organ is conversant about it, or stands before the beams and rays of its most pure and invisible glory."

And into the exercise of even such senses, "spiritual and inward, high, intuitive, and com-

* "Hebrew words were fitted to the things they signified; there was a certain connexion between things and words. All other words, as they come less or more near to the Hebrew, do more or less significantly represent the things meant by them. The more any language recedes from the Hebrew, the more it is confounded by human changes and additions, the more obscure and difficult means are the words thereof for conveying the knowledge of things to us. Homer and other Greek poets and philosophers set themselves therefore to etymological learning, by reducing the primitive words in other languages to their Hebrew roots, and then the derivative to those principles. This they laboured in, as the most notable means conducive to the knowledge of things. Then Chrysippus, Demetrius, and abundance of others, wrote books of etymology. Then the Latins, receiving learning as well as the empire from the Greeks, steer the same course, in order to etymological discipline, as the choicest means to lead men into the knowledge of things. Cato, Varro, and other ancient and famous Latins, wrote many volumes to this purpose. Of later times, on the same account, did Julius Caesar, Scaliger, compose a hundred and ten books de originibus. Then Joseph Scaliger, son of Julius, Lipsius, Casaubon, and many others, steered the same course."—Sikes's Thoughts of Vane.

† Sikes thus describes one of Vane's domestic practices: "The usual practice of this sufferer was to spend an hour or two every evening with his family, or any other that were providentially there, and as much both morning and evening on the first day. He was of that truly bounteous, princely, communicative spirit noted in the Spouse: rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, to make manifest the favour of the knowledge of Christ, that himself had deep and large experience of, in every place. His gravity, purity, and chasteness of spirit were very exemplary. He held out in the midst of all the late apostacies and changes. He was steadfast and immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, and his labour was not in vain, as he well knew. So assiduous was he in continual searching of the Scriptures, waiting upon the Lord in faith and prayer for more full discoveries of his mind therein, that it was said of him, put him where you will, if he may have but a Bible, he is well enough; as Jansen (of whom the Jansenists in France) reckoned himself with Austin." In a subsequent passage Sikes farther illustrates the beautiful toleration of Vane, in describing his views of the institution of the Sabbath. They who so busily trouble themselves in legislating for "bitter observance" of that day, and would bestow upon mankind no portion of their care on any other, may read the passage with great advantage: "He accounted the Jewish Sabbath ceremonious and temporary, ending upon the coming of the Son of Man, who was Lord of the Sabbath day. And if he had thought that which is commonly observed in the room thereof to be rather a magistratral institution among Christians in imitation of the Jewish, than that which hath any clear appointment in the Gospel, the apostle would not have him judged for it. 'One man,' says he, 'esteems one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth a day, regardeth it unto the Lord, and he that regardeth not the day to the Lord, he doth not regard it.' This I can say, he usually took the opportunity of spending more time in exercise and prayer in his family, or other Christian meetings, on that day than on any other. And will any yet say he was a Sabbath-breaker? If they do, see what company we may find for him under that imputation."

prehensive," it was the ardent hope of this great lover of his fellow-men to see even them one day conducted by the exercise of a purity of intellect and righteousness of will. Such also was the faith of Milton, expressed in later years, when of men and angels the "winged hierarch" spoke to Adam, as "More refined, more spirituous and pure,

As nearer to Him placed; or nearer tending,
Each in their several active spheres assign'd,
Till body up to spirit work, in bounds
Proportioned to each kind. So from the root Springs lighter the green stalk, from thence the leaves
More airy, last the bright consummate flower
Spirits odorous breathes: flow'rs and their fruit,
Man's nourishment, by gradual scale sublimed,
To vital spirits aspire, to animal,
To intellectual; give both life and sense,
Fancy and understanding: whence the soul
Reason receives, and reason is her being,
Discursive, or intuitive; discourse
Is oftentimes yours, the latter most is ours,
Differing but in degree, of kind the same.
Wonder not, then, what God for you saw good
If I refuse not, but convert, as you,
To proper substance: *time may come when men
With angels may participate, and find
No inconvenient diet, nor too light fare.* . . .
To whom the patriarch of mankind replied:
O favourable spirit! propitious guest!
Well hast thou taught the way that might direct
Our knowledge, and the scale of nature set
From centre to circumference, whereon
In contemplation of created things
By steps we may ascend to God."

These illustrations of the religious writings and speculations of Vane shall here be closed, for the present, with some extracts that bring us immediately back to the consideration of the subject which first led to their introduction. All Vane's enthusiasm, all his faith, only rendered him unboundedly tolerant of creeds the most opposed to his own.* In the "Retired Man's Meditations," one of the most rigidly theological of his works, the direct assertion of perfect liberty of conscience is a pervading doctrine throughout; and he thus, in the chapter on magistracy, defines what the authority of a civil magistrate should be restricted to, as opposed to the exclusive and intolerant policy of the Presbyterians.

"When the Scripture saith that the rule of magistracy is over men, we are to understand by this term the proper sphere, bounds, and limits of that office, which is not to intrude itself into the office and proper concerns of Christ's inward government and rules in the conscience, but is to content itself with the outward man, and to intermeddle with the concerns thereof in reference to the converse which man ought to have with man, upon the grounds of natural justice and right, in things appertaining to this life.

"Magistracy, then, is the rule which God hath ordained to be exercised over the outward man, by man himself qualified thereunto, to act in righteousness and in the fear of the Lord in discharge of this his high and great trust; and so is an office merely respecting rule and government over men in their outward concerns, which is capable to be rightly used or not, according as the persons intrusted therewith are qualified and do exercise the same, the office of itself being good, and the end for which it is set up being according to God's ordinance and institution for the ministering of punishment to them that do ill, and encouragement and protection to them that do well.

"And men may lawfully arrive and attain unto this office and dignity either in an ordinary way, through the endeavours and free choice of men, or extraordinarily, by the immediate call of God himself to the exercise thereof, making those that are to obey 'willingly subject in that day of his power.'

"For the office itself, it is (as we have showed), in God's institution, a rule that is set up over the outward man in righteousness and in the fear of the Lord, obliging the persons intrusted with this power to put forth righteousness in all their actings that appertain to their public charge."

He afterward, in pursuing the subject, reverts to his old faith of the necessity of "working up to God" by constant changes, and improvements, and efforts to bring the institution to purity and perfection.

"And as in this, the principle of natural justice and right, in their highest improvement, is to be their rule, so the fear of the Lord should oblige them, in an humble dependency upon him, and trembling posture of mind before him, to be watchful in not suffering anything to be done by them that may carry in it hindrance or opposition to the breaking in of higher discoveries upon them as to the very exercise of the magisterial office, in the purity and perfection wherein it is promised to be brought forth in the last days by Christ himself, unto which they should always have willing and ready minds to make way and to submit, so that, considered such as God requires it to be, it is man's ruling over men in righteousness, and in the true fear of the Lord.

"And this Christ, in his own person, as the Son of Man, is perfectly qualified to do, whose right also it is, having all power in heaven and in earth put into his hands. And his saints, when fitted by him to sit upon the throne of the same glory with him, shall likewise be found prepared to bring forth even magistracy itself in its right exercise, exactly answering the end for which it was set up by God."

Where this aim is not followed, he shows the necessary tendency to corruption inherent in the offices of magistracy; and, as with a prophecy of some of the magistrates in these latter times, ends it thus: "We have already considered magistracy as in its corrupted, degenerated use: it is, in a manner, the throne and seat of the beast, serving to promote and advance the great design and interest of the devil in the world, whereby it doth become part of his kingdom, and hath its place and use in the government that anti-Christ keeps up, to the oppressing and keeping under the dear saints and holy ones of the true and living God."

The last extract, from the same chapter of the Retired Man's Meditations, presents a view of the grand object of his whole political life, in direct association with his religious creed. At the period when this was written Cromwell held the government.

* "A man may be orthodox and sound in his judgment as to the principles of religion, and yet, wanting sincere love to Christ and his people, may fall short of heaven; and, on the contrary, another Christian may err and mistake in many points; and yet, having sincere love to the truths of Christ, according to that measure of light which God hath vouchsafed unto him, he may be saved. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth." This was ever his divine principle.

"For if once the Lord be pleased so far to enlighten the minds of men in these nations, governors, and people, as to show them the good of magistracy, as it is in its primitive institution, and is held forth in promise to be restored in the last days, it will then be their desire and delight to inquire and consider, in a way of free debate and common consent, on behalf of the good people of these nations (who in all these great trials have stood faithful and unshaken as to the known cause they have been engaged in), how the rule over them may be brought nearest to its first institution and original pattern in the exercise and practice thereof among them (founded, as we have seen, upon the principles of natural right and just, and so exclusive to all private interest and personal concern of any singulars that shall be found to stand in competition with, or preference to, the good of the whole), and how that which is the ordinance and institution of God may become also the ordinance and statute of man, established in a free and natural way of common consent, to the reuniting of all good men as one man in a happy union of their spirits, prayers, and counsels to resist all common danger and opposition which by devils or men may be raised against them."

A wide gulf, then, it has been seen, separated Vane from the Presbyterian party on many of the most important questions of civil policy, but on the side of toleration with him stood also Cromwell, Marten, and St. John, such men as Whitelocke and Selden, and, indeed, the majority of the lawyers, who held with the Erastian doctrines. Milton, too, lent to that great cause the astonishing force of his genius; and in furtherance of its virtuous objects of freedom of speech and of the press, which were held to be the safest guarantees for a perfect freedom of conscience, published at this period his immortal "Areopagitica," and there anticipated, in words of fire, the defeat of the sect of Presbyterians: "Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation, rousing herself, like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks. Methinks I see her, as an eagle, mewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam; purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms."

Lastly, with these great leaders were associated the sect of the Independents. These men had arrived, by somewhat different means, at the same result on the question of liberty of conscience. Their religious zeal was intensely fervid, but they disapproved equally the Presbyterian and Episcopal systems. They held that a church was a body of Christians assembled in one place, appropriated for their worship, and that every such body was complete in itself; that they had a right to draw up the rules by which they thought proper to be regulated, and that no man not a member of their assembly, and no body of men, was entitled to interfere with their proceedings. Demanding toleration on these grounds, they felt that they were equally bound to concede and assert it for others; and they preferred to see a number of churches with different sentiments and institutions within the same political community, to the idea of remedying the evil and exterminating error by means of exclusive regulations, and the menaces and severities of punishment.* To this illustrious sect belonged nearly the whole of the army of Manchester.

Such was the force arrayed against the Presbyterians; a force whose numerical weakness in the House of Commons and the Assembly of Divines† was counterbalanced by its growing influence among the common people and in the army, and by the superior reason and power of its leaders. The great and manifold struggles which ensued are not, therefore, to be considered, what the historians have been fond of naming them, struggles between two sects. The "Independents," as the general body opposed to the Presbyterians suffered themselves, for party convenience, to be called, were, it is seen, many†—bound in union by a common love of liberty of speech and of religion. The Presbyterians, on the other hand, were one—devoted singly and solely to half measures of popular government, and to entirely compulsory measures of religious intolerance; for in the questions of religion at this period we never fail to see comprised the most valuable or the most dangerous maxims of civil government. The House of Lords, and almost all the men of great wealth on the side of the Parliament, secretly or openly favoured the Presbyterians, for the very reason that such opinions in church government were most favourable to their own limited political views.* They were tired of the war, and anxious for a compromise. They also showed, on various occasions, an alarm lest the king should be brought too low. "They did not desire an entire victory. What they wished for was an accommodation between the crown and the aristocracy, in which each of them might secure certain favourite objects, and be enabled to dictate to the nation."

Such was the state of parties at the close of the year 1644, when the reverses, still continued, of the English Parliamentary forces, and the presence of the army of the Covenant,

* Apologetical Narration of the Independents. Godwin, i., 337.

† But as in the House of Commons, so in this assembly, the "Independent" members were by far the most able. Two of the most considerable of their adversaries have given sketches of them, which will be thought authentic. Clarendon says, "The Independents were more learned and rational than the Presbyterians; and though they had not so great congregations of the common people, yet they infected and were followed by the most substantial and wealthy citizens, as well as by others of better condition." And Bailie, one of the deputies from Scotland, sent to watch over the interests of Presbyterianism in the Assembly, relates of them that "truly they speak much, and exceedingly well." And elsewhere, "truly, if the cause were good, the men have plenty of learning, wit, eloquence, and, above all, boldness and stiffness, to make it out."

† Among them Mr. Godwin justly counts Erastians, Anabaptists, Millenarians, Fifth Monarchy men; individuals who even in these times did not borrow their creed from the country in which they were born, but thought like citizens of the universe; and sects, the very names of which have perished, all embarked in the sacred cause against Presbyterian usurpation, and a compulsory uniformity of religious worship and belief.

pressed hard against the great leaders of the minority in the House of Commons.* Vane called up Cromwell from the army, and with many significant expressions, "a plea for tender consciences" was presented at the same time to the House of Lords, the House of Commons, and the Assembly of Divines; enforced in the Commons with consummate power by Vane, Cromwell, and Saint John; in the House of Lords by Lord Say; and in the Assembly by the leading ministers of the Independents. This proved an alarming check to the Presbyterians, who were driven, in consequence, to consent to a sort of compromise, and to establish a "directory for public worship," which left much to the will or the capacity of the minister who practised under it.

Charles seems to have been much struck at this time with the capacity and power exhibited by Vane, and entered into overtures of negotiation with him and Saint John. They humoured them only that they might the better acquaint themselves with the king's exact design, taking care, meanwhile, to communicate everything that passed to the speaker, to a committee of the House of Commons to which they belonged, and to the Scots commissioners, that their conduct might be free from suspicion. But Essex, not knowing this, and getting some hint of the matter, laid a complaint against these two as traitors to the cause before the House of Lords. They were, of course, most honourably acquitted.† Essex himself, at the same time, was thanked for his vigilance and zeal.

The open and acknowledged treaty of Uxbridge followed, which need not be detailed in these pages.‡ The names of Sir Henry Vane the younger and Oliver Saint John we find to have been added, by a special vote, to the commissioners for the Parliament. It is enough to show the temper of the king in entering on this treaty, to show that it was impossible success could have ever attended it. "As to my calling those at London a Parliament," he wrote to the queen during the preliminaries for the negotiation, "if there had been two besides myself of my opinion, I had not done it; and the argument that prevailed with me was, that the calling did nowise acknowledge them to be a Parliament; upon which condition and construction I did it, and no otherwise; and, accordingly, it is registered in the council books, with the council's unanimous approbation." Again he writes on a subsequent day: "I assure thee that thou needest not doubt the issue of this treaty; for my commissioners are so well chosen (though I say it), that they will neither be threatened nor disputed from the grounds I have given them; which, upon my word, are such as we had formerly determined on." "Believe," he once more writes to Henrietta, "that I have a little more wit than to place confidence in the fidelity of perfidious rebels." Upon the king the failure of that treaty rested, and on the king's head at last fell all the penalties of that invincible spirit of treachery which nothing could cope with or subdue, so long as a vestige of power or even life remained to him—so long as the narrowest loophole was still left through which he could yet catch a glimpse of the darling authority of an absolute throne.

The opening of the campaign of 1645 was rendered memorable by one of the most masterly strokes of policy, emanating from Vane and Cromwell, that had yet distinguished the statesmanship of the times, and which proved eventually, and that very soon, decisive of the fate of the war. This was the self-denying ordinance and the new model. It had been obvious for a considerable time to Vane and Cromwell, that Essex, Waller, and Manchester himself, all evidently temporizing, and afraid to look steadily at the result of one great and uncompromised victory, must be removed from their command, and the military system of the Parliamentary forces completely renovated, before anything like a perfect success could be looked for. Up to this time they had had sufficient proof that "their victories, so gallantly gotten, and in which they had so eminently experienced the favour of Heaven, had been of no avail;" that "a summer's triumph had proved but a winter's story, and the game, however it seemed well in autumn, was to be played over again in the spring."* They felt not less, that if things went on much longer thus, these very leaders might possibly be made instruments in the hands of the Presbyterians for the betrayal of what they held to be the most valuable conditions of their cause. The authorship of this great remedy now resolved upon, which should have the effect, without personal insult, of removing these obnoxious men, and accompanying with that removal a reorganization and reinforcement of the army, is ascribed by Clarendon to Vane. It was, no doubt, the result of deep and anxious deliberation among all the chief men of the Independents.

It was opened in the House of Commons on the 9th of December, 1644. On that day the House resolved itself into a committee to consider of the sad condition of the kingdom in

* The spirit of the four Scotch commissioners deputed to London to watch over the interests of the Covenant may be gathered from the following: "We purpose," says Baillie, one of the commissioners, "not to meddle in haste with a point of such high consequence (the establishment of uniformity in church government), till it please God to advance our army, which we expect will much assist our arguments."

† Journals, Jan. 17. Baillie, i., 426. Hist. of Com., i., 360.

‡ Whitelocke, who was one of the commissioners, gives a graphic sketch of this temporary reunion of the chief members of the hostile parties (all Englishmen—once friends!) on this mutual ground. "The commissioners for the treaty on both parts met at Uxbridge, and had their several quarters; those for the Parliament and all their retinue on the north side of the town, and those for the king on the south side, and no intermixture of the one party or their attendants with the other; the best inn of the one side was the rendezvous of the Parliament's commissioners, and the best inn of the other side of the street was for the king's commissioners. The evening that they came to town, several visits passed between particular commissioners of either party; as Sir Edward Hyde came to visit Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke, the Lord Culpepper visited Sir Henry Vane, and others of the king's commissioners visited several of the Parliament's commissioners, and had long discourses about the treaty, and to persuade one another to a compliance. Mr. Whitelocke visited Sir Edward Hyde, and Mr. Palmer, and Sir Richard Lane, and others, and several of the Parliament's commissioners visited divers of the king's commissioners, and had discourses with them tending to the furtherance of the business of the treaty. The town was so exceedingly full of company, that it was hard to get any quarter except for the commissioners and their retinue; and some of the commissioners were forced to lie two of them in a chamber together in field-beds, only upon a quilt, in that cold weather, not coming into a bed during all the treaty." (Jan. 29, 1644, p. 122.)

* Rushworth, vi., 3, 4.

reference to the intolerable burdens of the war, and the little prospect there was of its being speedily brought to a conclusion. In this committee there was a general silence for a good space of time, one "looking upon another to see who would break the ice,"* when it was at last broken by Cromwell. "Without," he said, "a more speedy, vigorous, and effectual prosecution of the war, casting off all lingering proceedings like soldiers of fortune beyond the sea to spin out the war, we shall make the kingdom weary of us, and hate the name of a Parliament. For what do the enemy say? nay, what do many say that were friends at the beginning of the Parliament? Even this: that the members of both Houses have got great places and commands, and the sword into their hands, and what by interest in Parliament, and what by power in the army, will perpetually continue themselves in grandeur, and not permit the war speedily to end, lest their own power should determine with it. This I speak here to our own faces is but what others do utter abroad behind our backs. I am far from reflecting on any: I know the worth of those commanders, members of both Houses, who are yet in power." Cromwell then went on to deprecate any investigation into the conduct of the commanders. He especially recommended "to their prudence not to insist upon a complaint as to the oversight of any commander-in-chief upon any occasion whatsoever." He observed that he was himself conscious of oversights, and well knew that they could scarcely be avoided in military affairs. Therefore, waving a strict inquiry into the cause of these things, he exhorted the committee to apply itself to some general remedy, "which, without in any way censuring the particular censure of individuals, might best in future shut out those evils under which they were at present suffering." The memorable debate which followed is unfortunately not reported. It ended, however, in a great discussion on the following resolution: "That no member of either House of Parliament shall, during the war, enjoy or execute any office or command, military or civil, and that an ordinance be brought in to that purpose." Vane, who had reserved himself for this resolution, spoke at great length upon it, and with even more than his usual eloquence.† Whitelocke, separating himself from the party he generally acted with, was its chief opponent. Hollis and the other heads of the Presbyterians seconded him, but without effect. Vane and Cromwell had selected the question with a masterly judgment and foresight; for the errors in the conduct of the war had been so apparent, that many of the Presbyterians were obliged on this occasion to declare against their chiefs. It does not appear, indeed, that there was more than one division in the progress of the ordinance through the Commons, but that involved its entire spirit; when, on the 17th of December, a proviso was offered to be added, that the ordinance, and anything contained in it, should not extend to the Earl of Essex, Lord-general. Upon this occasion the numbers stood, for the clause, 93; against it, 100. The ordinance had been reported to the House on the 11th, was passed on the 19th, and was carried up to the Lords on the 21st of December.

Every device was resorted to in that House to defeat by delay what they were most reluctant openly to propose. Three times the House of Commons sent up messages, desiring expedition, and representing that any delay in passing the ordinance would be dangerous—might be destructive. A select committee was then nominated by the Lords to consider of alterations to be introduced, and it is not a little characteristic that of the committee, consisting of ten members, four peers, Essex, Manchester, Warwick, and Denbigh, were persons to whose disadvantage the law would particularly operate. A paper of reasons originated in this committee against the substance of the ordinance. In this paper it was observed, that it deprives the peers of that honour which in all ages had been given them, since they had evermore been principally active, to the effusion of their blood, and the hazard of their estates and fortunes, in regaining and maintaining the fundamental laws of the land, and the rights and liberties of the subject; nor was there ever any battle fought for these ends wherein the nobility were not employed in places of chiefest trust and command. It was added, that the proposed measure was by no means equal to the lords and commons of England, since, though some of the gentry and commons were excepted as members of Parliament, yet that the rest might have liberty to discharge their duty, whether in civil office or the field, whereas the ordinance was proposed to operate as a universal disqualification of the whole hereditary nobility of the country. Another objection was, that the tendency of the ordinance appeared to them to be such, that, in attempting to put it in force, everything would be thrown into confusion in the armies; and that, therefore, till the "new model" of what was proposed to succeed was produced, they were scarcely in a position to judge the measure fairly. Finally, after repeated conferences between the two Houses, the ordinance was rejected by the Lords on the 13th of January.*

The last-named objection was at once, with masterly promptitude, laid hold of by the statesmen of the lower House, and the very day after the delivery of the reasons from the Lords, the committee of both kingdoms reported to the Commons a new model for the constitution of the army. This consent of the committee of both kingdoms, including the four Scotch commissioners, is supposed to have been achieved by Vane's mastery over the Marquis of Argyle, who had just arrived in London.† It was another decisive advance in influence secured for the Independents.

On the 19th of January the scheme of the new model was laid before the House of Commons, and the names of the principal officers who were to have command in this army were put to the vote on the 21st. The three armies of the Parliament were to be formed into one, consisting of 14,000 foot, 6000 cavalry, and

* Rushworth, vi., 4.

† The report of the debate in Clarendon, including Vane's speech, is all a gross forgery. (See Hist. of Com., i., 395-398.)

* Hist. of Com., i., 402, 403. † Clarendon. Godwin.

1000 dragoons, under a general-in-chief, lieutenant-general, major-general, thirty colonels, and the due proportion of other officers. Sir Thomas Fairfax was named general-in-chief, and Skippon major-general. Among the colonels appears the name of Algernon Sidney, and other most eminent men. Among the inferior officers were Ireton, Desborough, and Harrison. The name of the officer who was designated for the second place in the command, and the generalship of the cavalry, was kept in reserve, to be filled up, as it afterward appeared, with the name of Cromwell. This scheme of the new model passed the Lords on the 15th of February, creating an army of 22,000 men, to be principally draughted from the old armies.

A second "self-denying ordinance" was now transmitted to the Lords. Great misconception has arisen in consequence of the difference between these two ordinances in a very material point, though both called by the same name. Mr. Godwin has briefly and impressively stated the difference thus: "It has been commonly imagined that the Independents, after having carried a measure so full of boasted disinterestedness, acted a part directly contrary to their professions, smuggled in one exception after another, Cromwell the first; enriched themselves with the spoils of the nation; and silently and imperceptibly antiquated the law which had, at the moment, been their great instrument for defeating their adversaries of the Presbyterian party. But this way of stating the question is by no means exact. The original 'self-denying ordinance,' as it was called, directed that no member of either House of Parliament should, during the present war, hold any office, civil or military, such office being conferred by the authority of both or either of the Houses. This ordinance was defeated in the House of Lords by the machinations of the Presbyterians, and never passed into a law. A second ordinance, which was called by the same name, was brought in a short time after, and was attended with a more successful event. The enactment of this ordinance was, that every member of Parliament was hereby discharged from whatever office, civil or military, that had been conferred by the authority of Parliament. The former edict was prospective, and had more of the ordinary character of a law; the second prescribed something immediately to be done, and no more.* What was the cause of the striking difference between the first and the second 'self-denying ordinance,' must be a matter purely of conjecture. It is not improbable that some of the great leaders of the Independent interest began, in this interval, to suspect that the advantage of permanently separating the legislative character and that of an officer, civil or military, was more specious than real. Besides, as their adversaries had contrived to defeat their measure in the upper House, they felt less delicacy towards them, and constructed an edict which more plainly pointed at the individual change in the public service, which they held to be immediately required. The new law, therefore, was a temporary expedient, and the general principle was left as before."†

In the progress of this second measure through the House of Commons, it is to be remarked, there appears to have been only one division, which occurred on the twenty-first of January, when it was put to the vote whether Fairfax should be nominated commander-in-chief, and the numbers stood (on the question whether the nomination should be then made), for the affirmative, 101, for the negative, 69. When the ordinance came back from the Lords, however, a second division took place on an amendment that had been introduced in that House, purporting that the nomination of officers, which was vested in the commander-in-chief, should be subject to the approbation of the two Houses of Parliament; and the numbers stood, for the affirmative, 82, for the negative, 63, the majority being with the Presbyterians. This was not a point, however, of vital importance with Vane and the Independents, whose victory, in the achievement of the measure as it now stood, had been triumphantly complete.

Essex, Manchester, Warwick, and Denbigh had appeared in the House of Lords the day before the ordinance passed, and laid down their commissions. Acknowledgments were made by the Commons of their great and faithful services, and pensions were voted to them.

The army was now in the hands of the Independents. Its soldiers were nearly all members of that communion. Unadorned by rank, ungraced by any of the eminences of station, they were filled with religious zeal and an irrepressible enthusiasm. Each man felt as if the cause rested with him, each man had the sense that he was qualified to be a teacher to others. They were equally stimulated by the love of liberty, and the love of that scheme of religious faith which each man espoused. "They respected themselves; they believed that they were in a state of grace; and they were incapable of allowing themselves in anything unworthy of the high calling with which God had honoured them. They were vessels of glory, set apart for the purposes of heaven. As they had these feelings and impulses in common among them, so these feelings and impulses served them as a bond of indissoluble union. They advanced into the field chanting the psalms contained in the Scriptures, and fought, as they expressed it, with 'the sword of the Lord and of Gideon.'"[‡]

But then they were not lords, nor had seen dozens of campaigns, and infinite was the laughter and contempt they at first inspired. It was not given to all to see with the subtle and far-piercing glance of Vane or of Cromwell. "Truly this army was no way glorious," observes May, "either in the dignity of its commanders or the antiquity of the soldiers. Never did an army go forth to war who had less the confidence of their own friends, or were more the object of contempt to their enemies, and yet who did more bravely deceive the expectations of them both." Their successes he ascribes, under God, to their moral and religious as well as military discipline. "The usual vices of camps," he adds, "were here restrained. The discipline was strict. No theft, no wantonness, no oaths, no profane words, could escape without the severest castigation, by which it was brought to pass that in this camp, as in a well-ordered city, passage was safe and commerce free.* To all this the king's army offered a melancholy contrast, which set off with still greater lustre the Parliamentary virtues. "The officers took pride in the proficacy of their language and their lives; and the common soldiers were, out of the field, a disorderly and dissolute rabble."† What could the king's superiority in numbers, or his many other advantages, avail against this single circumstance alone! Most wisely had Vane and Cromwell judged. The Royalists were doomed to fall in the first great battle.

* That is, it did not prevent the discharged officers from recovering their offices again. † Hist. of Com., II., 41.

‡ Godwin, i., 464.

The single danger to be apprehended does not seem to have hitherto in any way occurred to Vane. To have suspected the virtue of the great soldier of the cause he had most at heart, to have doubted the reality of Cromwell's Republican fervour and enthusiasm, would have been equivalent to a surrender of the high faith and hope which sustained him in the mighty struggle he was engaged in.

The army of the new model marched resolutely on against Charles. His headquarters were at Oxford; he had a preponderance in the midland counties; was master in almost the whole of the western districts; had power in the north; and was complete master of Wales. In a few short weeks he was helpless! The new leaders in whom the power was vested struck at once against Charles himself, and kept him in pursuit. He had moved from Oxford in a northern direction, with a view, it is supposed, to co-operation with Montrose. The Scottish army advancing to the south, impelled by the English leaders, raised the siege of Carlisle, and interposed to foil his plan. Fairfax meanwhile had sat down before Oxford. Charles, upon this, at once turned back, and with considerable vigour and resolution assaulted the garrison of Leicester. Alarmed for the safety of the eastern counties, Fairfax immediately raised the siege of Oxford, and resumed his pursuit of Charles, who had moved from Leicester, fixed his headquarters at Daven-try, and betaken himself to the pleasures of the chase, while his soldiers ravaged and plundered the neighbouring country. Fairfax gradually and silently advanced, was joined by Cromwell near Northampton, and they both together took Charles by surprise near the fatal town of Naseby. At eleven at night a council of war was summoned in the Royalist camp; and with that careless and courageous gallantry which, whatever their other vices may have been, always distinguished the aristocratic officers of Charles's army, it was resolved, notwithstanding their critical position, "not only to give, but to advance and offer, battle."

The armies met at Naseby, upon a fallow field about a mile in breadth. The king led his centre in person, and found himself opposite to Fairfax and Skippon. Rupert commanded on the right, and (appointed at Cromwell's request, and invested with rank for the occasion) Ireton fronted him. Sir Marmaduke Langdale, on the left, was opposed by Oliver Cromwell. The word of the Cavaliers was "Queen Mary" (Henrietta Maria)—of the Parliamentarians,

"God our strength." The Royalists commenced the battle by advancing at a quick step, "with alacrity and resolution."‡ The van of the Parliamentary centre was broken by the charge, and the troops fell back upon the rear, as they had been commanded, in such necessity, to do. Skippon was severely wounded by a shot in the side, and Fairfax desired he would leave the field; but "the brave old man (says Rushworth) answered, 'He would not stir so long as a man would stand,' and kept the field to the end of the battle." Fairfax now advanced himself with a body of reserve, and the battle raged anew. Not content to exercise the functions of a captain, Fairfax grappled personally with the foe, galloped through the thickest of the fray, encouraged by dauntless example the brave, and shamed the timid, if any such were there. His helmet was beaten to pieces, but he continued to ride about bare-headed, and in this state happening to come up with his body-guard, commanded by Colonel Charles Doyley, the latter respectfully rebuked him for thus hazarding his person, "wherein lay the safety of the whole army and of the good cause, to be riding bareheaded among the showering bullets," at the same time offering him his own helmet. Fairfax put it by, saying, "'Tis well enough, Charles."§

The battle, meanwhile, had assumed a terrible aspect on either wing. Rupert began with his usual impetuosity, and bore down his adversaries in spite of the astonishing resistance of Ireton; while Ireton himself, wounded in the thigh with a pike, in the face with a halbert, having at the same time his horse killed under him, was made prisoner, though he afterward escaped back to the Parliamentarians. But now, while Rupert pursued the flying horse of the Parliament, and afterward vainly amused himself with summoning their park of artillery, Cromwell was deciding the fortune of the day (according to his custom) on the right wing. He attacked Sir Marmaduke Langdale, first with a close fire of carbines, next at the sword's point; broke and routed his cavalry, and drove them a mile from the field of battle, wholly beyond the possibility of farther concert with the Royalist infantry; then, with that consummate prudence which outshone even his extraordinary valour, the victorious Cromwell, unlike the victorious Rupert, returned to the aid of his struggling commander, and, falling on Charles's weary infantry, put them to instant route. One regiment alone preserved its order unbroken. "One Royalist corps," says Rushworth, "stood like a rock, and, though twice desperately charged, would not move an inch."|| At last, however, Fairfax, directing Doyley to make a third charge in front, simultaneously attacked them in the rear, pierced them in all directions, and, slaying an ensign with his own hand, seized the colours, and gave them to a common soldier to hold. The soldier, unable to resist the temptation, boasted among his comrades that he had seized those colours himself, and the boast went back to Fairfax. "Let him retain the honour," said that great general; "I have enough besides."

* Rushworth. Hist. from Mackintosh.

† Life of Fairfax, in Hartley Coleridge's Biographia Britannica—a most interesting and charmingly-written book. And see Whitelocke, June 14.

* History from Mackintosh, v. 363.

The king behaved with his accustomed bravery. When he saw his infantry routed and his affairs so desperate, he placed himself at the head of what remained of his cavalry, and implored them to stand the coming shock. "One charge more," he cried, "and we recover the day." It was vain; they were not in a condition to do it; Rupert had joined them too late; they fled, and left Fairfax and Cromwell masters of the field. Two thousand men had been slain—nearly an equal number on both sides; but Charles left behind him 5000 prisoners, of whom 1000 were officers, his whole artillery, a hundred stand of colours, with the standard royal, the king's baggage, with the cabinet containing his private papers and correspondence with the queen, the baggage of the army, including the plunder of Leicester, the royal coaches, the whole spoil of the camp—everything! The first civil war was decided by that memorable day, and the disclosure of all the treacheries and infidelities of the king's correspondence* was a weapon in the hands of the Independent leaders which, until the very termination of the struggle, they used with terrible effect.

Such was the first memorable result of Vane's great policy in the matter of the self-denying ordinance and the new model, and for that reason this battle has been detailed. In the field of civil polity, he was meanwhile pursuing other objects of scarcely less importance.

He had now directed his attention to the state of the representation in the House of Commons. The civil war had necessarily purged that house of the Royalist members, and also of others who had selected the policy of temporizing or of observing a strict neutrality. The war itself had been attended with memorable vicissitudes; for, as we have seen, in the winter of 1642, and in the autumn of 1643, expectations even ran strongly in favour of the success of the royal party, and it was the natural consequence of these vicissitudes to cause farther desertions. The precise number of the House of Commons, according to the returns in 1640, appears to have been 506. The highest numbers that are to be observed upon any division occur on the 1st of March following, and amount, taken together, to 383, including the tellers.† About the time of the king's declaration, after the war began, that only 80 of the 500 commoners, and only 15 or 16 of the 100 peers remained, the divisions certainly ran very low; but this was accident, and "could only be used to colour a party declaration." On the 9th of February following, the numbers rose as high as 201. We have seen that the numbers were nearly as great upon a vote respecting the self-denying ordinance in December, 1644. At the time of assembling the mock, or, as Charles himself called it, the "mongrel" Parliament at Oxford, on the 22d of January in that year, the Commons ordered a call of the House, which took place on the same day that the king had fixed for his followers at Oxford, and the numbers appear to have been divided as follow: 280 members answered to their names at Westminster; 100 were excused, as being absent in the service of Parliament in their several counties; and 118 at Oxford signed the letter to Essex of the 27th of the same month, calling on him to interpose for the restoration of peace. There are, therefore, only eight individuals unaccounted for in this computation.*

It is scarcely necessary to observe that one of the conditions of the civil war was to impose on the House of Commons itself the necessity, unavoidable in such a state of revolution, of declaring such persons as were most forward to engage in hostilities against them disabled from sitting thereafter in that Parliament; and in all the earlier instances, this vote of disability had been accompanied with the direction that a new writ should be issued for filling up the place of the member thus declared incapable. But here the affair stopped. Agreeably to the customary forms, the speaker issued his warrant to the clerk of the crown in chancery for the granting a new writ, to the originating of which the great seal was necessary; but the lord-keeper had carried off the great seal to the king at York in May, 1642, therefore the order to the speaker had necessarily miscarried; and from this time the question of introducing new members seems to have lain untouched until the 30th of September, 1644. On that day it was voted by the Commons that the House should, on a future day that was specified, take the subject into consideration. The actual decision on the question, however, was from time to time deferred,† and it was not till August of the following year that any progress was made. It was so managed that a petition was at that time presented from the borough of Southwark, praying that they might be authorized to elect two fresh representatives in the room of the first they had, one of whom was dead, and the other disabled by a vote of the House. This served as a signal for entering on a proceeding, which had certainly, by Vane, Saint John, and the other leaders of the Independents, been already determined on. On the 21st it was decided by a majority of three that new writs should be issued for Southwark, Bury St. Edmunds, and the cinque port of Hythe. This beginning was speedily pursued: 146 new members were introduced into the Parliament in the remainder of the year 1645, and 89 in the course of the following year. Among those at present introduced, we find the most honest, virtuous, and every way illustrious names of Fairfax, Blake, Ludlow, Algernon Sidney, Ireton, Skippon, Massey, and Hutchinson.‡

This, then, was another victory for the Independents. The Presbyterians and the Scots commissioners, however, disabled in a great

* It appeared, among other things, on the publication of this correspondence, that at the Oxford treaty he had secretly registered in the council book his protest that, in calling the Lords and Commons at Westminster a Parliament, he did not acknowledge them as such; that he looked upon them as banded traitors, to whom he owed neither forgiveness nor good faith; that he termed his own followers, of both Houses, assembled at Oxford, a "base," "mutinous," "mongrel Parliament;" that he designed bringing into England an army of Roman Catholics from Ireland, and a foreign army under the Duke of Lorraine, a popish prince—contrary to his express and solemn word. History from Mackintosh, vi., 2. And see Journals and Parliamentary History, or the 5th vol. of the Harleian Miscellany.

† See Godwin's History, ii., 25, et seq.

* See the Journals. Whitelocke, p. 80. Rushworth, v., 573; and Godwin, ii., 27.

† Godwin, ii., 26.
‡ Ludlow, i., 169, 170. Godwin, ii., 41. Notitia Parliamentaria.

part by the turn events had taken since the new modelling of the army, and astonished beyond measure at the decisive victory of Naseby, began to see the necessity of resorting to some expedient of rallying their strength, which, judiciously managed, was still superior in numbers. While they bethought themselves of what they must do, Cromwell's letter after the battle of Naseby was read from the chair. "Honest men," he wrote, "have served you faithfully in this action. I beseech you, in the name of God, not to discourage them. He that ventures his life for the liberty of his country should be left to trust God for the liberty of his conscience." The old question again started up; the Presbyterians insisted on their claims of an exclusive and intolerant church discipline; the Independents met them with all the force of common reason, and the accession of that reputation for it which recent military events had given them. A second sort of accommodation was effected, and the parties once more rested for a while.

Charles, defeated and almost helpless, was now at Oxford. He felt the necessity of taking some step for personal safety; he saw it was impossible that another army could be got together, and was casting in his own mind the relative advantages of throwing himself upon London for a treaty, or of making the best of his way to the Scottish army in the north. Here the striking attitude taken by Vane and the Independents appears to have affected him once more, and he proposed to Ashburnham to sound the Independents through Vane. Two letters remain in the Clarendon state papers addressed in the king's name by Ashburnham to Sir Harry Vane the younger. In these he pledges himself that, if Presbytery were insisted on, he would join Vane and the Independents with all his powers in "rooting out that tyrannical government." No answer on the part of Vane has been found. It is likely that he returned no answer.* It was impossible that a mind so subtle and acute could have brought itself to place confidence in the good faith of such a proposal. In the Naseby disclosures it had been made manifest that professions and protestations cost Charles nothing; that he held everything fair that was done in negotiating with an enemy; that he never talked of peace but with a crafty intention; "and that he never made a concession that he was not at the time considering how he should retract it."

The incident only testified to the strength of Vane's influence and party. A passage from Whitelocke's memorials of this period may be quoted for the same purpose: under the dates of October the 15th and 20th, he states, in one instance, "I lived with," in another, "I dined with, Sir Henry Vane, Mr. Solicitor (St. John), and other grandees of that party, and was kindly treated by them, as I used to be by the other." The cautious lawyer, though voting on questions of religious liberty with Vane and St. John, had evidently never before committed himself thus far.

The king's spirit of intrigue, however, was irresistible. His object was by some means or other to force himself into London, where he trusted his presence might work some kind of miracle in support of his prostrate cause. To this end he made the following extraordinary proposal of a treaty: that he himself should come to London with 300 followers, under the assurance and security of the two Houses of Parliament, the commissioners for Scotland, the corporation of the metropolis, and the chief commanders of the English and Scotch armies, for forty days; at the expiration of which he should be free to repair, at his own choice, to his garrison of Oxford, Worcester, or Newark. In the same message he repeated his Uxbridge proposition, that the military power should be vested for three years in commissioners, to be nominated half by himself and half by the Parliament, or in any other way that might be satisfactory to both parties. To render the point more intelligible, the king tendered in his message the names of thirty persons for commissioners, and among them were the names of Vane, Fairfax, Cromwell, and Hollis. This was the falsest proposal he had yet made, and the Independent leaders at once detected its falsehood. It was merely one of the old resources to strive to place the Parliament, if possible, in a false position. In the very midst of the subsequent measures he took to advance the same object, it was afterward found he had written thus to Digby: "Now, for my own particular resolution, I am endeavouring to get to London, so that the conditions may be such as a gentleman may own, and that the rebels may acknowledge me king, being not without hope that I shall be able so to draw either the Presbyterians or Independents to side with me for extirpating one the other, that I shall be really king again. I will conclude with this assurance, that whatsoever becomes of me, by the grace of God, I will never forsake the Church, my friends, nor my crown."

It would be tedious, and it is unnecessary, to follow the course of events after this period through the various changes which carried Charles to the Scotch camp, which subsequently induced the Scots to surrender him to the Parliament, and which ended in the violent struggles between the Presbyterian and Independent parties in the House of Commons, as to the final disposal of his person and dignity, and the new settlement of the government of the kingdom.

Clarendon has two remarks in his history which may be properly introduced here. He observes of the discomfort of the Scotch commissioners after the decision of the first civil war: "They had long had jealousy of Cromwell and Sir Henry Vane, and all that party, which they saw increased every day, and grew powerful in the Parliament, in the council, and in the city. Their sacred vow and covenant was mentioned with less reverence and respect, and the Independents, which comprehended many sects in religion, spake publicly against it, of which party Cromwell and Vane were the leaders, with very many clergymen, who were the most popular preachers, and who in the Assembly of Divines had great authority; so that the Scots plainly perceived that, though they had gone as far towards the destruction of the Church of England as they desired, they should never be able to establish their Presbyterian government, without which they should lose all their credit in their own country, and all their interest in England.* And in a subsequent passage of singular incorrectness he adds: "The truth is, though that party was most prevalent in the Parliament, and comprehended all the superior officers of the army (the general only excepted, who thought himself a Presbyterian), yet there were only three men, Vane, Cromwell, and Ireton, who governed and disposed all the rest according to their sentiments; and without doubt they had not yet published their dark designs to many of their own party, nor would their party at that time have been so numerous and considerable if they had known, or but imagined, that they had entertained those thoughts of heart, which they grew every day less tender to conceal, and forward enough to discover."†

* A misapprehension of the whole of this incident by Dr. Lingard is ably pointed out and corrected in the History from Mackintosh.

Upon this, it is worth while to inquire what these "dark designs" were that are here imputed to Vane. The lesson in politics which his life illustrated and enforced cannot be studied too well, and it has never yet been exhibited in that most impressive form which it assumes when, upon the great actions of his life, the rarer political writings he left behind him throw the light of their eloquence and wisdom.

The majority of historians speak of Vane as a purely theoretical Republican, with great wisdom in the means he employed, but with the utmost absurdity in the ends he aimed at: in a word, the owner of a political faith not reducible to this world, and only made up of wildness and extravagant enthusiasm. Such are the convenient opinions, with the help of which disagreeable conclusions of another sort are sought to be kept at distance!

A theoretical Republican Vane was not, if it is attempted to be shown by this that the motive of his public exertions was merely a preconceived idea of the abstract excellence of that form of civil society. What Vane sought was good and popular government, extensive representation, freedom of thought, freedom of the press, and perfect liberty of conscience. Because he could not find these under a monarchy, he became a Republican; but under a monarchy he would have been content with these. Practical and protracted experience of the utter impossibility of bringing Charles to terms of good faith was the origin of Vane's devotion to a republic. Having once embraced that faith, he pursued it with all the earnestness and enthusiasm of his character, but never for a single instant lost sight of the practical reasons out of which it had sprung up in his mind, nor of the wise design of preserving all its new institutions, in so far as possible, in correspondence with the fundamental laws and usages to which Englishmen had been for centuries accustomed, and under which, in their purer shapes, they had grown in virtue, in civilization, and in power.

In an Essay on Government, which was left among his papers at his death, he lays down a philosophical maxim which few will be bold enough nowadays to dispute: "Ancient foundations, when once they become destructive to those very ends for which they were first ordained, and prove hinderances to the good and enjoyment of human societies, to the true worship of God, and the safety of the people, are for their sakes, and upon the same reasons, to be altered, for which they were first laid. In the way of God's justice they may be shaken and removed, in order to accomplish the counsels of his will upon such a state, nation, or kingdom, in order to his introducing a righteous government of his own framing."‡ When he stood in the court of King's Bench upon his trial, he laid down another proposition, on which, he said, all his actions had been grounded, and he challenged the judges, with eloquent and unanswerable subtlety, to contradict it if they could. It was, that the very root and origin of monarchical government in England was the assent of the people through their representatives, or, in other words, the so horrible and terrifying Republican principle.

"However I have been misjudged and misunderstood, I can truly affirm that in the whole series of my actions, that which I have had in my eye hath been to preserve the ancient well-constituted government of England on its own basis and primitive righteous foundations, most learnedly stated by Fortescue in his book, made in praise of the English laws. And I did account it the most likely means for the effecting of this to preserve it at least in its root, whatever changes and alterations it might be exposed unto in its branches, through the blustering and stormy times that have passed over us.

"This is no new doctrine in a kingdom acquainted with political power, as Fortescue shows ours is, describing it to be, in effect, the common assent of the realm, the will of the people or whole body of the kingdom, represented in Parliament; nay, though this representation, as hath fallen out, be restrained for a season to the Commons' House in their single actings, into which, as we have seen, when, by the inordinate fire of the times, two of the three estates have for a season been melted down, they did but retire into their root, and were not hereby in their right destroyed, but rather preserved, though as to their exercise laid for a while asleep, till the season came of their revival and restoration."

Shortly before his death, while imprisoned in one of the isles of Scilly, he made a more elaborate statement of his views on this point, and of the justifications which he conceived the people and their leaders to have had in their attempts to alter the monarchical institutions. This remarkable treatise was entitled: "The

* In another passage he states, with unanswerable force, "It was ordinary among the ancients, not only to change their governors, but government also: If one race of kings be lawfully deposed, they are not wronged by change of government, and who else can be? It is so natural and fundamental a right in people to have and to use such a liberty, that we may do well to consider whether they have any right to give it out of their hands, unless it be lawful to contradict the law of nature, the true end of all government in human societies, turn their own reason out of doors, and so turn beasts for their governors to ride on. That the Jews, Greeks, and Romans, the wisest states in the world, have over and over used this liberty of changing their government as they saw occasion, and that often with very good success, is undeniable. Were it unlawful for a state in any case to depose and remove kings, what titles have any monarchs now upon oath to their crowns, that are descended of those who were elected into the room of such as the people deposed?"

People's Case Stated." At the commencement of it, he lays down, in language which bears no evidence of wildness or impatience of just restraint, the following rules: "The end of all government being for the good and welfare, and not for the destruction of the ruled, God, who is the institutor of government, as he is pleased to ordain the office of governors, intrusting them with power to command the just and reasonable things which his own law commands, that carry their own evidence to common reason and sense, at least that do not evidently contradict it, so he grants a liberty to the subjects, or those that by him are put under the rule, to refuse all such commands as are contrary to his law, or to the judgment of common reason and sense, whose trial he allows, by way of assent or dissent, before the commands of the ruler shall be binding or put in execution; and this in a co-ordinacy of power with just government, and as the due balance thereof; for," he adds, in words of deepest truth and significance, "the original impressions of just laws are in man's nature, and very constitution of being."

From the foregoing proposition, a condition of government is then established thus: "God doth allow and confer by the very law of nature, upon the community or body of the people, that are related to and concerned in the right of government placed over them, the liberty, by their common vote or suffrage duly given, to be assenters or dissenters thereunto, and to affirm and make stable, or disallow and render ineffectual, what shall apparently be found by them to be for the good or hurt of that society, whose welfare, next under the justice of God's commands and his glory, is the supreme law and very end of all subordinate governing power. Sovereign power, then, comes from God, as its proper root, but the restraint or enlargement of it, in its execution over such a body, is founded in the common consent of that body. The office of chief ruler, or head over any state, commonwealth, or kingdom, hath the right of due obedience from the people inseparably annexed to it. It is an office not only of divine institution, but for the safety and protection of the whole body or community, and therefore justly and necessarily draws to it, and engages their subjection." The logical force of this passage is only equalled by its philosophic sobriety. Subsequently he carries out his premises into the following eloquent statement of the proper source of the best form of government, in which, it will be seen, the character of his religious opinions, as I have endeavoured to describe them, receives very striking illustration. "The highest judgment and will set up by God for angels and men, in their particular beings, to hold proportion with, and bear conformity unto (in the capacity of ruled, in relation to their chief ruler), shines forth in the person of Christ, the ingrafted Word; and when, by the agreement or common consent of a nation or state, there is such a constitution and form of administration pitched upon as in a standing and ordinary way may derive and convey the nearest and greatest likeness in human laws, or acts of such a constitution, unto the judgment and will of the supreme legislator, as the rule and declared duty for every one in that society to observe, it is thereby that government or supreme power comes to receive being in a nation or state, and is brought into exercise according to God's ordinance and divine institution. So, then, it is not so much the form of the administration as the thing administered, wherein the good or evil of government doth consist; that is to say, a greater likeness or unlikeness unto the judgment and will of the highest Being, in all the acts or laws flowing from the fundamental constitution of the government."

The legal restraints placed for these objects on the office of king are then clearly stated, after which Vane adds: "The contrary heretofore was the principle at bottom of the king's cause, which he endeavoured to uphold and maintain, in order to decline and lay aside the legal restraints as aforesaid, which the government of England, by the fundamental Constitution, is subjected unto, as to the exercise and ministry of the royal office. From the observation and experience which the people of England had, and made many years together, by their representatives in Parliament, of a desire in the king to shake off these legal restraints in the exercise of the regal power, and on their having tried the best ways and means that occurred to their understandings to prevent the same, and to secure to themselves the enjoyment of their just rights and liberty, they at last pitched upon the desiring from the king the continuance of the sitting of the Parliament called November 3, 1640, in such sort as is expressed in that act, 17 Car., wherein it is provided, 'that it shall not be discontinued or dissolved but by act of Parliament.'" This act, however, he proceeds to argue, did not in itself dissolve their allegiance, or give the people back their original right to erect a new government, until after, all reasonable efforts failing, war had been resorted to, and the decision given: "Such appeal answered, and the issue decided by battle, the people's delegates still sitting, and keeping together in their collective body, may of right, and according to reason, refuse the readmission or new admission of the exercise of the former rulers, or any new rulers again over the whole body, till there be received satisfaction for the former wrongs done, the expense and hazard of the war, and security for the time to come that the like be not committed again. Until this be obtained, they are bound in duty, in such manner as they judge most fit, to provide for the present government of the whole body, that the common weal receive no detriment."* He admits the sacredness of an oath of allegiance to a sovereign, and argues, with great force and eloquence, that it is only an utter abuse of the kingly trust that can re-

* In another work he expresses the same doctrine thus: "All contrariant actings against the prince are not to be accounted a resisting of the power, especially when the whole state is concerned, and the business is managed by public trustees, called and authorized by law, as conservers of the state, and defenders of the public liberties and laws thereof. In such a public capacity, to stand in the gap when a breach is made, and hinder any charge or attempt that would ruin the state, is duty. In such case, they ought to withstand and hinder the violent proceedings of any, either by way of justice in a legal trial, or by force; for the prince is not master of the state, but only a guardian and defender thereof from injuries and evil."—Treatise on Government.

lieve the subject from it; but he will be utterly relieved in that case, he adds, "especially if, together with such breach of trust, both parties appeal to God, and put it upon the issue of battle, and God give the decision; and in consequence thereof, that original right be asserted, and possession thereof had and held for some years, and then not rightfully lost, but treacherously betrayed and given up by those in whom no power was rightfully placed."

These, then, are the "dark designs" of Vane: this is the wild and visionary enthusiast! He sought to achieve for the English people, for us, his posterity, the blessings of a government responsible to the governed, the basis of which was to be security for person and property, and perfect and uncontrollable freedom in all matters appertaining to the conscience and intellect. Failing of this object in that day under a monarchical form, he struck for a republic. This was his only crime—the sum of his "dark designs."

But, alas! for one person among the good citizens of London, at the close of the civil war, who could think with Vane, there were fifty who preferred to think, on these particular points, with Clarendon. The Presbyterians had once more rallied in this stronghold of their power. They clamoured for a Presbyterian settlement. They seemed to have altogether forgotten such things as a reform of political institutions, or an establishment of public rights and liberties. A petition had been secretly got up by the Presbyterians in the name of the city,* and was now carried into Parliament, praying for strict religious conformity, for subscription to the Covenant, and for the dissolution of the army. It was only preliminary to a more decisive movement on the part of the Presbyterians. The reduction of the army to a peace establishment was proposed in the House of Commons on the 9th of February. The dismantling of the garrisons in England and Wales, with the exception of forty-five; and the reduction of the army, after draughts of horse and foot for the service of Ireland, to about 5000 horse, to maintain public tranquillity, and the force of infantry required for the reserved garrisons, were carried after earnest and long debate, in which Vane used all his influence and eloquence against the motion, and carried, too, without due provision for arrears of pay. It was voted, also, that no member of Parliament should have a military command; that there should be no officer of higher rank than that of colonel, with the exception of Fairfax; and that every officer should take the Covenant, and conform to the Presbyterian ordinance in religion: in other words, all security for the triumphs that had been won for the people were recklessly voted away, and the people's bravest soldiers, Cromwell, Ireton, Ludlow, Algernon Sidney, Skippon, Blake, and Hutchinson, were insolently dismissed from their service. Fairfax himself was only retained on a division by 159 to 147.

Mr. Godwin has, at this passage of history, given way to no inappropriate strain of melancholy enthusiasm. "Here," he says, "we have a striking illustration of the uncertainty and versatility of human affairs. Cromwell, Ireton, St. John, and Vane were four of the ablest statesmen that ever figured upon the theatre of any nation. They were engaged to the measures they undertook by the strongest motives that could animate and excite the heart of man. They, and they only, had been principally concerned in conducting an arduous war to a successful termination. Other men had felt deeply and fought nobly; but it was they who created the army by which the victory was secured. Finding their influence not sufficiently triumphant in the House of Commons, they had recurred to the admirable expedient of setting on foot new elections for those places in England which, in the lapse of years, and by the events of a civil war, were found unrepresented; and this measure had, for a time, answered every purpose to them that their fondest wishes could have anticipated. Their adversaries were men of ordinary capacities; Hollis and Sir Philip Stapleton, the nominal leaders of the Presbyterians, would probably never have been heard of in history had they lived in a more tranquil period. Yet all these advantages possessed by the heads of the Independent party proved fleeting and illusory. The very circumstance of the great success and superlative talents of these men had a tendency to render them objects of jealousy to coarse and vulgar minds.

Hollis says, 'Though the greater part of the new members came into the House with as much prejudice as possible against us, yet, when they came to sit there themselves, and see with their own eyes the carriage of things, this made them change their minds, and many of them to confess and acknowledge that they had been abused.' Such is the almost unavoidable course of things in modern times, and among what is called a sober people. The men of the last four centuries in civilized Europe have been found capable of being strongly excited, and susceptible of a tone of fervour and enthusiasm. But this is to them an unnatural state, and they speedily subside into their constitutional quietude. There are but few of us that can even image to ourselves an excitement and elevation that, as in the instances of Greece and Rome, lasted for centuries. Talk to the men of later times of sobriety and moderation, and they will soon show that they prefer that lore to the sublimer style of heroism and virtue, of self-sacrifice and expansive affections. We are sons of the fog and the mist. The damp and flagging element in which we breathe becomes part of ourselves; we turn speculative men and calculators: timorous prudence and low circumspection fix their stamp on all we do. 'Our charity begins at home,' and fixes its attention emphatically on our own interests or our own firesides. We dare not mount, at least from the impulse of feeling, into an ethereal region, lest we should break our necks with the fall. To men formed in this mould, the representation of such persons as Hollis and

* A very memorable counter-petition was subsequently set afloat by the Independents, demanding some startling reforms, which exhibited revolution and Republicanism unmasked. It remonstrated against the payment of tithes, the hardships of enforced religious conformity, the insolent contumely with which Presbyterians designated those who would not conform to the Presbytery; the mischief of the House of Lords; and was addressed to the supreme authority of the nation in the Commons' House of Parliament.—Hist. from Mackintosh.

'Stapleton, 'the moderate party,' as they loved to denominate themselves, are almost sure to prove irresistible."*

Vane's position was that of the greatest difficulty. He felt that he must now throw his party upon the great body of the army for support, to a more absolute degree than he had contemplated hitherto. It will be worth while, before proceeding farther, to show what character of men these soldiers were. Whitelocke describes thus the troops raised by Cromwell: "He had a brave regiment of horse of his countrymen, most of them freeholders and freeholders' sons, and who, upon matter of conscience, engaged in this quarrel; and thus, being well armed within by the satisfaction of their own consciences, and without by good iron arms, they would as one man stand firmly and fight desperately." Baxter says of them in his life: "At his first entrance into the wars he had a special care to get religious men into his troop: these were of greater understanding than common soldiers, and therefore more apprehensive of the importance and consequence of the war; and making, not money, but that which they took for the public felicity, to be their end, they were the more engaged to be valiant. They therefore proved such that, as far as I could learn, they never once ran away before an enemy." The fiercely Royalist Bates, in his "Elenchus Motuum," speaks of them thus: "Cromwell invited all the honest men (as he was pleased to call them) to take on with him. Wherefore Independents, Anabaptists, and the sink of fanatics, came flocking to him, who, in the beginning, were unskilful both in handling their arms and managing their horses. But he used them daily to look after, feed, and dress their horses, and, when it was needful, to lie together with them on the ground. He besides taught them to clean, and keep their arms bright, and ready for service; to choose the best armour, and arm themselves to the best advantage. Trained up in this kind of military exercise, they excelled all their fellow-soldiers in feats of war, and obtained more victories over their enemies." "And these men," observes another Royalist, Sir Philip Warwick, "habited more to spiritual pride than carnal riot and intemperance, so consequently, having been industrious and active in their former callings and professions, where natural courage wanted, zeal supplied its place. At first they chose rather to die than fly; and custom removed the fear of danger." Of themselves, in a petition to the Parliament, these men had spoken thus: "We were not a mere mercenary army, hired to serve any arbitrary power of a state, but were called forth and conjured, by the several declarations of Parliament, to the defence of our own and the people's just rights and liberties. To these ends in judgment and conscience we took up arms; and we are resolved to assert and vindicate these rights against all arbitrary power, and all particular parties and interests whatsoever."† And lastly, when it was proposed to disband these very forces immediately after the restoration, Lord Clarendon, who could speak the truth only when the truth answered his purpose, spoke of them and their exploits in these words: "His majesty consents to the measure. Yet, let me tell you, no other prince in Europe would be willing to disband such an army; an army to which victory is entailed, and which, humanly speaking, could hardly fail of conquest whithersoever he should lead it; an army whose order and discipline, whose sobriety and manners, whose courage and success, have made it famous and terrible over the world."*

It was no common army, this: it was a band of men who had taken up arms for a great public cause, and who had a right to some influence, and that not inconsiderable, in the right direction of the victories won by their own valour for the security of their own homes. In this view, it is certain that Vane now countenanced the seizure of the king by Joyce, and Fairfax's march to London for the purpose of overawing the Presbyterians. Hitherto he had no distrust of Cromwell. The exertions of that great soldier in this crisis had been all Republican in their tendency, since in favouring, or at least not resisting, the organization of the agitators and other military councils, he was raising up the very worst instrument of despotism—an armed and enthusiastic democracy.

The disgraceful London riots in favour of the Presbyterians completed the sorry work set on foot by that party, and determined Vane's last scruples. He took the opportunity of removing with several other members, and the speakers of both Houses, to Fairfax's camp at Hounslow, and as he afterward rode with that general along the line of the troops, was hailed and cheered with enthusiasm. A few days after, Vane and Fairfax, the two speakers, with the other seceding members, met at Holland House, Kensington, and proceeded to Westminster, where the Presbyterians, feeling themselves once more defeated by a consummate stroke of policy on the part of their adversaries, while a melancholy and mischievous effort had been made by themselves, were unprepared to offer any farther present resistance. In Hyde Park they received even the congratulations of the lord-mayor and aldermen, and at Charing Cross the common council stood ready to receive them! Colonel Hammond's regiment of foot, and Rich's and Cromwell's regiment of horse, led the procession, which was closed by Tomlinson's regiment of horse. On the following day the whole army, with its artillery, marched through London, "but in so civil and orderly a manner that not the least offence or prejudice was expressed by them towards any man, either in words, action, or gesture." The procession had no sooner reached Palace Yard than Fairfax alighted and retired into a private house, while the Lords and Commons proceeded to their respective places of assembly. Manchester and Lenthall took the chair in each House; and the proceedings commenced with a report

* Godwin, Hist. of Com., ii., 218-221.

† In another petition, demanding payment of the arrears attempted to be withheld by the Presbyterians, these men say, "We hope that by being soldiers we have not lost the capacity of subjects—that in purchasing the freedom of our brethren we have not lost our own." They assert the justice of their demand of the payment of arrears to themselves not as "mercenaries whose end was gain," but as men "who had abandoned their estates, trades, callings, and the contentments of a quiet life, for the perils and fatigues of war in defence of the public liberty."

* In the History of the Commonwealth, ii., 152-155, the reader will find this subject treated.

from the commissioners of the Parliament, appointed to reside with the army (that in the House of Commons was made by Vane), of the transactions of the last preceding days. Fairfax was then successively introduced into each House, and received their thanks for what he had done. He was, at the same time, by their joint vote, made Constable of the Tower of London.*

The king's ill-judged flight from Hampton Court once more altered the position of affairs. The first treaty at the Isle of Wight, and the treachery of Charles with the Scots commissioners, will be more appropriately glanced at in the memoir of Henry Marten. The day after the Parliamentary commissioners returned, the celebrated vote of non-addresses was passed, equivalent to a resolution for the settlement of the kingdom without farther recourse to the king. The events which followed, and had the effect of lifting up the Presbyterians once more; the riots in the various English counties, and the advance and defeat of the Scotch army; the famous petitions and proposals of Fairfax and his officers, will also have fitter illustration in the notice of Marten's important participation in these measures. "Vane seems to have held himself as much as possible in the position of being able, at a crisis, to negotiate between the Commons and the army, secure that his party in the House would once more feel ascendancy and power upon the final crushing of the "second civil war."

The personal treaty at the Isle of Wight was now arranged; Vane was appointed one of the chief commissioners, and represented the Independent or (now) Republican party. Hollis and others represented the Presbyterians. Several peers attached to the Parliament were also present, and Charles was attended by forty-two friends and advisers. The interviews and debates were spun out from the 18th of September to the 27th of November, 1648. In the course of them Charles showed much ability, and Vane, who had, as he says, "believed him to be a very weak person," took occasion to acknowledge "that he had been deceived," for that he had found him "a man of great parts and abilities."† Such a feeling would be naturally apt to overrate itself by comparison with a previous unjust impression.

The result of the treaty was a concession of the militia by Charles, with the secret reservation to retract it;‡ but he afterward took his stand upon two points: a claim for "the divine institution of the bishops," and for indemnity to all his friends. Hollis and the other Presbyterians implored him on their knees, with tears in their eyes, to concede these also. He refused. "The truth is," says Clarendon, describing the treaty, "there were among the commissioners many who had been carried with the violence of the stream, and would be glad of those concessions which the king would very cheerfully have granted, an act of indemnity and oblivion being what they were principally concerned in; and of all the rest, who were more passionate for the militia and against the Church, there was no man, except Sir Harry Vane, who did not desire that a peace might be established by that treaty; for as all the other lords desired, in their own natures and affections, no more than that their transgressions might never more be called to remembrance, so the Lord Say himself (who was as proud of his quality, and of being distinguished from other men by his title, as any man alive) well foresaw what would become of his peerage if the treaty proved ineffectual, and the army should make their own model of the government they would submit to (as undoubtedly they resolved shortly to do), and therefore he did all he could to work upon the king to yield to what was proposed to him, and afterward, upon the Parliament, to be content with what his majesty had yielded." It was well for the men who preferred their titles to their country to argue thus, but the younger Sir Henry Vane remained to the last, "among the faithless, faithful."

Charles had again thought of escape and of revenge when he rejected the kneeling and weeping Presbyterians: the army now seized his person once more, and closed his hopes on that head forever. Meanwhile, a terrible remonstrance, calling for justice on him as "the capital source of all grievances," had been carried into the House of Commons, where the Presbyterian majority, again mustering, strove to parry it by successive remonstrances. The army, upon this, sent in a more determined declaration, that unless justice were suffered to prevail, they would purge the House, and put a stop to the treaty. At this crisis, the first of December, 1648, the commissioners from the Isle of Wight reported Charles's answers, and Hollis moved that they should be declared satisfactory. To the astonishment of Vane, Fiennes supported that motion, but the extract from Clarendon respecting Fiennes's father, Lord Say, explains the marvel.* The debate lasted one day, and its farther consideration was adjourned to the next by a majority of 133 to 102. Vane saw that the crisis he had striven so long to avert had arrived at last, and he prepared himself for one great and final effort to surmount it. The speech he delivered on the resumption of the debate on the second day is unfortunately only left to us in the equivocal pages of Clarendon. That it must have been very masterly, however, we can discern even there, and we discern in it, also, the first frank and resolute statement of the question as between monarchy and a republic.

"Young Sir Harry Vane," says Clarendon, "had begun the debate with the highest insolence and provocation, telling them 'that they should that day know and discover who were their friends and who were their foes, or, that he might speak more plainly, who were the king's party in the House and who were for the people;' and so proceeded with his usual grave bitterness against the person of the king and the government that had been too long settled; put them in mind 'that they had been diverted from their old settled resolution and declaration that they would make no more addresses to the king, after which the kingdom had been governed in great peace, and begun to taste the sweet of that republican government which they had in-

* Hist. of Com., ii., 386-7. Rushworth. Whitelocke.

† Sir Edward Walker, p. 312.

‡ Hist. from Mackintosh, vi., 105.

* This was first pointed out in the History from Mackintosh, in reply to the doubts of Godwin and Lingard.

tended and begun to establish, when, by a combination between the city of London and an ill-affected party in Scotland, with some small, contemptible insurrections in England, all which were fomented by the city, the Houses had, by clamour and noise, been induced and compelled to reverse their former votes and resolution, and enter into a personal treaty with the king, with whom they had not been able to prevail, notwithstanding the low condition he was in, to give them any security; but he had still reserved a power in himself, or at least to his posterity, to exercise as tyrannical a government as he had done; that all the insurrections which had so terrified them were now totally subdued, and the principal authors and abettors of them in custody, and ready to be brought to justice, if they pleased to direct and appoint it; that their enemies in Scotland were reduced, and that kingdom entirely devoted to a firm and good correspondence with their brethren, the Parliament, of England, so that there was nothing wanting but their own consent and resolution to make themselves the happiest nation and people in the world; and to that purpose desired that they might, without any more loss of time, return to their former resolution of making no more addresses to the king, but proceeded to the settling the government without him, and to the severe punishment of those who had disturbed their peace and quiet, in such an exemplary manner as might terrify all other men for the future from making the like bold attempts, which, he told them, they might see would be most grateful to their army, which had merited so much from them, by the remonstrance they had so lately published. This discourse appeared to be exceedingly disliked by that kind of murmur which usually shows how the House stands inclined, and by which men make their judgments there of the success that is like to be.*

Some members seconded Vane with a hearty concurrence, among them Wroth, Wentworth, and Prideaux. It was urged on the other side by Pryne that the Parliament was overawed by the army, and the question should be postponed. Another adjournment took place, and the debate was resumed next morning with increased vehemence. Six Monarchists and twelve Republicans are named as having spoken. The Presbyterians, not venturing to persist in a vote that the king's answers were satisfactory, modified it into a resolution that they afforded "a ground for the House to proceed to the settlement of the peace of the kingdom." Pryne delivered a speech of several hours in the affirmative, with, by his own account, wonderful effect. It was carried on a division by a majority of 140 to 104. The Lords readily concurred, and Vane's last hope of preventing a grosser injustice was forever gone.†

The House was purged of the Presbyterian majority on the following morning by Colonel Pride. That proceeding will be found described in the memoir of Marten. Vane alone, among all the Independents and Republicans, refused to share in a triumph obtained by such means. He had held a high sense of the claims of the army to be allowed to throw the weight of their opinions into the scale at a moment like the present, and while the state was itself in process of revolution; he had done his best in aiding them when on former occasions they had subdued the strength of the Presbyterians by the inspiration of a just terror; but this forcible exclusion of members, this absolute introduction of the sword into the House of Commons, the scene of his best exertions for the people in the past, and the source of his best hopes for the people in the future, appeared fraught with a danger surpassing every other. He took the resolution at once to retire from public life. He could not oppose those with whom he had hitherto acted in such close union; he knew not whether even now their motives might not be as pure as he held their conduct to be mistaken; but, in any case, he could never lend to the act of lawless force they had committed the sanction of his character and name. He retired to Raby,* and took no farther part in public life till after the execution of the king.†

It is a profound proof of Vane's political sagacity that he disapproved the policy of that great act. Upon the question of its abstract justice he never delivered an opinion.

He left his private retirement, and again joined his old friends and associates‡ on the 26th of February, 1649. He had been most earnestly entreated to this step by Cromwell, and, it is likely, accepted that entreaty as a pledge of the purity of intention with which it was designed to frame and carry out the government of the Commonwealth. Nor was the request Cromwell's alone, though his still superior influence with Vane was the instrument to procure compliance. There was no leading man of the party that did not hold the sanction of the most eminent Republican statesman to be the essential element of their new republic, or that would not have considered the outline of proceedings sketched hitherto void and

* This castle had suffered in the wars, for the Royalists made several attacks on it, in compliment, it might be supposed, to its owner. Whitelocke describes one of them: "The king's forces from Bolton Castle surprised Raby Castle, belonging to Sir Henry Vane, but were again close blocked up by forces raised by Sir George Vane." (July 7, 1645, p. 151.)

† The extraordinary incidents which filled up this interval are detailed and discussed in the Life of Marten.

‡ The omission of all mention of Vane's father, the elder Vane, still alive and taking a feeble part in public affairs with the men of the Commonwealth, must not surprise the reader. He sank into a cipher beside the splendid talents of his son. It is seldom that one family has borne twin names of eminence in it. But the truth was, that old Vane was only fit for such service as he performed under Charles—he was barely tolerated among the Independents for his son's sake.

§ All those proceedings are described in the Life of Marten. "The truth is, this honourable gentleman, having absented himself from the Parliament upon that great change and alteration of affairs in the year 1648, Lieutenant-general Cromwell, who sat upon the trial of the king, and encouraged the commissioners of the high court of justice to proceed to sentence, it being the general vote and desire of the army that the king should be put to death, was importunate with this gentleman, and used many arguments to persuade him to sit again in Parliament and in the council of state, and did at length prevail with him to come in." So writes Vane's friend Stubbe, in his answer to the calumnies of Baxter. Stubbe was one of the most eminent scholars of that or any other period, and was indebted for the first development of his talents to the regard and liberality of Vane. Another passage in his vindication of Vane from the attacks of Baxter is worth giving, as illustrating the contempt with which one of the "best abused" men of his time, which Vane certainly was, could afford, in the con-blank, had he refused to fill it up with the authority of his presence, his counsel, his name; and yet, notwithstanding all this, it was with much difficulty, and in the result of many arguments, that Cromwell prevailed with him to accede. He had been elected, long before his consent was ascertained, among the first members of the council of state, but he did not present himself till the 26th of February, nine days after all the council had been installed. A difficulty then occurred. On the day on which the instructions to the council of state had been voted, an engagement was drawn up and adopted, to be taken by each counsellor previously to his admission, the purport of which was to express his approbation of all that had been done in the king's trial, in the abolishing of kingship, and the taking away the House of Lords—and this oath was now presented to Vane. He refused to take it. He did not approve, he said, of what had been done in the king's trial or the king's death. No compromise could meet the difficulty. An entirely new oath was eventually drawn up, for the satisfaction of Sir Henry Vane.*

* Vol. vi., p. 199-201.

† History from Mackintosh, vi., 109.

The first measure we find traces of, after Vane's adhesion to the Commonwealth, is the issue of several new writs to the House of Commons. I may mention that, before his adhesion, the first public act of the council of state had been to recommend to Parliament to vacate the appointment of the Earl of Warwick (objectionable as a Presbyterian) to the office of lord-admiral. A bill had, in consequence, been brought in and passed, for repealing Lord Warwick's ordinance, and vesting the power of lord-admiral in the council of state. The next day another act was made, appointing Robert Blake, Edward Popham, and Richard Dean to the command of the fleet, each of whom afterward made his name familiar and eminent on the seas. Finally, on the 12th of March, a committee of three was named by the council to carry on the affairs of the admiralty dence of his character and virtue, to pass unnoticed all his wretched slanderers. I may mention that one of the ten thousand doggerel libels against him is preserved as a specimen in the Appendix (C) at the end of this article. "I presume," says Stubbe to Baxter, "he looks upon it as below him, and his great and weighty employments, to write anything in his own vindication: he hath other business to look after, and not to spend his time about the passionate and rash scribblings of every biased and engaged person; and therefore I think it not amiss, having more leisure and opportunity, not so much from any private or personal respect which I bear to him, as my love to the Commonwealth and public interest of these nations, which is owned and asserted by him upon just and honest principles, to clear up the innocence of that worthy knight, and to vindicate him, though without his privacy and knowledge, from your lies and aspersions."

* In his speech on his trial he told this to his judges: "When that great violation of privileges happened to the Parliament, so as by force of arms several members thereof were debarred coming into the House and keeping their seats there, this made me forbear to come to the Parliament for the space of ten weeks; to wit, from the 3d of December, 1648, till towards the middle of February following, or to meddle in any public transactions; and during that time the matter most obvious to exception, in way of alteration of the government, did happen. I can, therefore, truly say, that as I had neither consent nor vote, at first, in the resolutions of the Houses, concerning the non-addresses to his late majesty, so neither had I, in the least, any consent in, or approbation to, his death; but, on the contrary, when required by the Parliament to take an oath, to give my approbation, ex post facto, to what was done, I utterly refused, and would not accept of sitting in the council of state upon those terms, but occasioned a new oath to be drawn wherein that was omitted."

and navy, and Sir Henry Vane was placed at their head: Wauton and Rowland Wilson were the other members of the committee. Thus, in the administrative genius, the vigour, and the capacity of Vane—in the heroic courage, wonderful knowledge, and splendid virtues of Blake—was laid the foundation of a naval supremacy for England which she had not seen since Elizabeth's days.

Bradshaw was elected president of the council on the 10th of March. Three days latter, Milton, the kinsman of Bradshaw, was made secretary to the council for foreign tongues, which office had been held by Weckerlin under the committee of both kingdoms. "It is impossible," observes Mr. Godwin, "to consider these appointments without great respect. They laid the foundation for the illustrious figure which was made by the Commonwealth of England during the succeeding years. The admirable state of the navy is in a great degree to be ascribed to the superlative talents and eminent public virtue of Vane. The naval commanders were such as can scarcely be equalled in any age or country. The attachment of Milton is equivalent to volumes in commendation of Bradshaw. The perfect friendship of these three men, Milton, Bradshaw, and Vane, is, in itself considered, a glory to the island that gave them birth. The council, we are told, took up a resolution that they would neither write to other states, nor receive answers, but in the tongue which was common to all, and fittest to record great things, the subject of future history. And they fixed on Milton, the language of whose state papers is full of energy and wisdom, and must have impressed foreign states with a high opinion of the government from which they came. The character of the great poet of England frequently discovers itself in these productions, without detracting in the smallest degree from the graveness and sobriety which the occasions and the rank of the nation in whose name they were written demanded. On the other hand, Milton, who felt as deeply as any man that his proper destination was the quiet and sequestered paths of literature, conceived that he could not decline a public station when the demand came to him from such men, and was that he should devote himself to the service of that scheme of a republic which above all earthly things he loved."*

The next question that came to be considered in the council of state was, beyond every other question, the most important and the most difficult. It related to the dismissal of the present Parliament and the summoning of another. No popular or representative government can be said to exist without successive Parliaments, and the present House of Commons had sat for a period unheard of in our history, though fully warranted by the critical circumstances of the time. The passages I have quoted from Vane's statement of the "Case of the People," show most clearly, as it appears to me, that the act declaring that this Parliament could not be dissolved but by their own consent, was the corner-stone of all their public services, and of all the liberty that has since existed in this island. The Legislature that had been guided in their original measures by Pym and Hampden, and that, after their early decease, had been worthily, and in an eminent degree in their spirit, conducted by their successors, is perhaps, all things considered, "the most illustrious assembly whose acts are recorded in the history of the world." They had now completed all that originally they undertook. "They had conquered the determined enemy of Parliaments; they had finished the civil war; they had destroyed despotism, for he that had grasped the sceptre was no more, and his family, and even the idea of government to be vested in the hands of a single person, was publicly proscribed. All that remained to complete their glory was for them to put an end to their authority, and tranquilly to deliver up their power into the hands of their successors."

* Hist. of Com., iii., 33.

And this, as it appears to me, would not only have completed their glory, but, in all human probability, assured the Commonwealth's safety. In such peculiar cases, in the circumstances of such a change in the form of the government—accomplished, be it observed, and not merely struggling to its accomplishment, as we have recently seen it—more would have been gained by trusting the people than by distrusting them.* It is right, at the same time, to listen to what the ablest advocates of the course they adopted have to say in its favour. "Monarchy," says Mr. Godwin, "was at an end; the House of Lords was extinguished; it had been solemnly decreed that the Commons of England in Parliament assembled were the supreme authority. But all was yet in a state of convulsion and uncertainty. The tempest might be said to be over, but the atmosphere was loaded with threatening clouds, and the waves swelled this way and that with no unequivocal tokens of uneasiness and turbulence. This was the task that it fell to the present possessors of the legislative power to perform: to produce that calm, to adopt all those preliminary measures which might enable the present Parliament safely to deliver up the reins of political power to the next. They had advanced far to this end. They had erected a council of state, which comprised in its body much of what was most extraordinary in talents, and most unquestionable in public spirit and disinterested virtue, that was to be found in the nation."† "The great statesmen," Mr. Godwin continues, "who guided the vessel of the Commonwealth at this time had established a republic without king or House of Lords, the only government in their opinion worthy of the allegiance and support of men arrived at the full use of their understanding. They felt in themselves the talent and the energies to conduct this government with success. They wished to endow it with character, and gain for it respect. Having shown their countrymen practically what a republic was, they proposed to deliver it pure, and without reserve, into their hands, to dispose of as they pleased. This was their project. The present state of England was of a memorable sort. The great mass of the community, through all its orders, was now, particularly after the able and successful administration of the Commonwealth in its first six months, content to submit, at least for the present, to the existing government. But probably not more than a third part of the nation were sincere adherents to the Commonwealth's men and the Independents; the other two thirds consisted of Royalists and Presbyterians. Both of these, however disposed for a time to rest on their arms, were but so much the more exasperated against their successful rivals. Both these latter parties were for a monarchy, to be established in the line of the house of Stuart. Both were averse to the endurance of any religious system but their own. Stubbe, the protégé and intimate friend of Vane, says, the supporters of intolerance were five parts in seven of the inhabitants of England. The objects of Vane and Cromwell were the administration of a state without the intervention of a sovereign and a court, and the free and full toleration of all modes of religious worship and opinion. They would have held themselves criminal to all future ages if they supinely suffered the present state of things and the present operative principles to pass away, if they could be preserved. Cromwell, and Ireton, and Vane, and the rest, were intimately persuaded that, by a judicious course of proceeding, these advantages might be preserved. If things were allowed to continue in their present state, and if, by a skilful and judicious administration, the Commonwealth came by just degrees to be respected both abroad and at home, they believed that many of those persons who now looked upon it with an unkind and jealous eye would become its warmest friends. They felt in themselves the ability and the virtue to effect this great purpose. The Commonwealth was now viewed with eyes askance and with feelings of coldness, if not of aversion; but when once it was seen that this form of government was pregnant with blessings innumerable, that it afforded security, wealth, and a liberal treatment to all in its own borders, and that it succeeded in putting down the hostility of Ireland and Scotland, in impressing with awe Holland, France, Spain, and the various nations of the Continent, and in gaining for England a character and a respect which she had never possessed under any of her kings, they believed that the whole of the people, in a manner, would become Commonwealth's men, and would hold embraced in the strictest bonds of affection a government to which now they had little partiality. They sanguinely anticipated that they should effect all this; and then how glorious would be the consummation to convert their countrymen to the cause of freedom by benefits and honours, to instil into them the knowledge of their true interests by the powerful criterion of experience, and finally to deliver to them the undiminished and inestimable privileges of free-men, saying, "Exercise them boldly and without fear, for you are worthy to possess them."*

Such, no doubt, was the process of reasoning with the purest and loftiest minded of those men—the Vanes, the Martens, the Sidneyes, the Ludlows, the Iretons, the Bradshaws: it may well be disputed in the case of Cromwell; but, admitting all this, it would seem, nevertheless,

* Was it not proved afterward that this would have been the correct course, by the independent and spirited tone assumed even in the Parliaments summoned by the usurper? They are glanced at in the memoir of Marten.

† Hist. of Com., iii., 108.

* Hist. of Com., ii., 118, 119.

to have been a grand mistake to suppose that any lasting beneficial impression could have been produced in the minds of the people by merely administrative talents or glories, however great or triumphant. What the people wanted in the new form of government to lay its foundation deeper in their hearts, was what Vane has so ably pointed out in the political writings I have quoted, new institutions founded on the principles of the old. Granting the truth of what Mr. Godwin urges, it amounts to this, in fact, that the only present guarantee of the new Commonwealth rested in the army. Where, then, was the guarantee for the virtue or fidelity of the army? To themselves alone, or to men who had achieved influence over them, were they accountable. Remarkable as the circumstances were which widely distinguished them from the character of ordinary soldiers, it is yet certain that, when they found themselves the guardians of a Commonwealth in which all things were unsettled, and in which that very power which was more than ever necessary, in such a state of government, to hold together the elements of order and of liberty—the power and the authority of the people—was altogether excluded, the temptation was too great for men of much more than ordinary virtue. “Qui gardera les gardiens?”

There is much reason to believe, in my opinion, that Vane was overruled upon this question, and that he afterward, for that reason, desponded of immediate success in the achievement of the great part of the Republican design.* Some of his speeches in Richard Cromwell's Parliament will, I think, throw some light on this, and an extract from his friend Sikes's tribute may be urged in illustration of it; but these claim a place hereafter. One thing is quite certain, that Vane exhibited a perpetual uneasiness respecting the dissolution of the Parliament; was constantly mooting it in some form or other; and, as soon as he detected the traitorous design of Cromwell, distinguished himself by a memorable effort to secure those rights for the people that had been so long, and, as he then at last perceived, so fatally delayed.

The steps that were taken to strengthen the present House may be shortly described. The first of May is the day on which we trace the earliest mention of the subject in the journals. It was then determined that the business respecting due elections and equal representatives should be taken into consideration on the third day following. It was mentioned again on the fourth and the fifth, and on the eleventh was revived in the shape of a debate on the question of putting a period to the present Parliament, which was referred to a grand committee, or committee of the whole House. This question appears to have originated with Vane; he was chairman of all committees named respecting it. The committee of the whole House sat on the fifteenth, and prepared a resolution, which was immediately after voted by the House, that, previously to the naming a certain time for the dissolution of Parliament, a consideration should be had of the succession of future Parliaments, and the regulating their elections. This consideration was referred to a committee, consisting of Vane, Ireton, Scot, Nathaniel Rich, Algernon Sidney, and four others, who were to present to the House heads proper for their deliberation in determining on the subject. They were directed to sit every Monday and Friday. It is remarkable to notice the frequent mention of the sittings of this committee recorded in the journals, and the never-failing presence of Vane. The temporary arrangement which dispensed with a dissolution for the present had not dispensed with the sittings of this committee.

That temporary arrangement was at last effected thus: The exact numbers of the House were first ascertained. It had been determined by the act of the first of February that no person should be admitted to sit and vote as a member of the Legislature till he had declared his dissent from the vote of the fifth of December, that the king's answers to the propositions were a ground to proceed on for the settlement of the kingdom. The number of those who on that day voted for the negative was eighty three. But every member was now required to enter his dissent; and by a careful collation of the journals, it appears that the number of these, between the twentieth of December and the thirtieth of June following, could not be less than one hundred and fifty.* There were only six writs issued during this period, and these were in the room of members deceased. The ninth of June may be considered as the day on which the government first manifested its intention of continuing the existence of the present Parliament. On that day it was resolved that such members of the House as had not sat since the beginning of December should state their cases by the last day of the present month to the committee for absent members, which if they neglected to do, writs should then issue for new elections in the place of those who should so neglect. The question of any farther new writs in the room of members deceased appears to have been laid aside.

The first year of the Commonwealth closed with Cromwell's reduction of the rebellion in

* “This prophet or seer of God, in the midst of the greatest successes in the late war, when the churches, Parliament, and army reckoned their work done, thought their mountain so strong that they should never be moved, said the bitterness of death and persecution is over, and that nothing remained but (with those self-confident Corinthians) to be reigning as kings, he discovered himself to be of another spirit, with Paul—he could not reign with them. When they thus mused and spake, ‘We shall sit as a queen, we shall know no more sorrow,’ he would be continually foretelling the overflowing of the finer mystical Babylon by the most grossly idolatrous Babylon, and the slaying of the true witnesses of Christ between them both, as the consequence of such foundation. Has not he had his share in the accomplishment of his own prediction? Have not they, by their pride, apostasy, and treachery, been the occasion of his and their own sufferings, who would not believe him when he prophesied of such a suffering season. Have not floods of Belial judges, counsellors, witnesses, jurors, soldiers of Belial, compassed him about? Did Scripture, law, or reason signify anything with them? So the waters went over his soul; they took away his life from the earth. Yea, the rage and violence of brutish men followed him close at the heels, to his very execution stroke. But however it was with him as to a certain foresight of particular events, yet that he could conjecture and spell out the most reserved consults and secret drifts of foreign councils against us (which they reckoned as tacita, concealed till executed), the Hollander did experience to their cost.” So says Sikes in his extraordinary pamphlet, and, reduced to the ordinary language, it seems to me to express something like the feeling alluded to in the text. The closing allusion is to that power immortalized by Milton as having been possessed to an eminent degree by Vane—of unfolding “the drift of hollow states hard to be spelled.”

Ireland after terrible slaughter, and with the trial and acquittal of the notorious Lilburne on a charge of treason against the government.

Vane again took his seat in the second year's council of state. The historian of the Commonwealth thus notices the gradual construction of the naval administration over which the great statesman presided: "The committee of the admiralty and navy was first named on the 12th of March, twenty-three days from the original instalment of the council of state, and then consisted of only three persons, Vane, Valentine Wauton, and Alderman Rowland Wilson. Two others, Jones and Scot, were added in the course of the month, and two more, Purefoy and Stapley, on the 6th of June. Vane was all along the principal person in the care of the navy of England: when the war broke out between the Dutch and the English, he and two or three more were appointed commissioners to conduct it; and to his activity and skill contemporary writers principally ascribe the memorable success in which that contest issued. The committee of the admiralty in the second year were Vane, Wauton, Jones, Scot, Purefoy, Stapley, the Earl of Salisbury, Lord Grey of Groby, Alexander Popham, and Robert Wallop." Alderman Rowland Wilson (of whom Whitelocke says, "He was a gentleman of excellent parts and great piety, of a solid, sober temper and judgment, and very honest and just in all his actions, beloved both in the House, the city, and the army, and by all that knew him, and his death as much lamented") had died immediately before.

In the excellence of an administrative system, nothing could surpass the arrangements of the Commonwealth. They again renewed this year five other committees in the council of state—for the ordnance, Ireland, private examinations, the laws, and negotiations with foreign powers. These committees all varied in their amount, being from seven to ten or twelve members each, and the same counsellor of state being often on different committees.* Immense advantages accrued from this methodical distribution of the business of administration. The council at large, whose order-books are preserved, assembled for the general affairs of government, and to them, in the first instance, were confided the powers of the state. But these different committees, when they sat apart, had their attention directed, without distraction, to the special business for which they had been named, and either prepared matters for the guidance and decision of the council in general, or, as appears from the articles of instructions to the council, being of a certain assigned number, were authorized and empowered to give directions immediately, as from themselves, in the departments consigned to their care.†

Meanwhile young Charles Stuart was in the field against the Commonwealth in Scotland, and Fairfax had accepted the chief command of the expedition against him, when his wife

prevailed with him to resign it. By this fatal weakness Cromwell was left without a rival in the absolute command of the army, and he at once marched, "in glory and in joy," to his great Scotch campaign. The battle of Worcester afterward crowned his triumphs, and settled, for the present, the safety of the Commonwealth from foreign foes.

But with the opening of this second campaign by Cromwell,* Vane had manifested his suspicion of her danger from a more terrible treason. We observe it in the restless movements that were again resumed in the House of Commons, on the question of dissolution and a new House. We have seen that on the 15th of May, 1649, a committee had been appointed to take the subject into consideration. It consisted of Vane, Ireton, Scot, Algernon Sidney, and five other persons, among whom Vane had placed his father. Its first report, however, was not brought in till the 9th of January of the following year, some change having in the mean time taken place in the members of which it was constituted, and Ireton being on service in Ireland. On that day "Henry Vane the younger" introduced it, and its first proposition appears to have coincided with the suggestion of the Agreement of the People, tendered by the general council of the army twelve months before, that the representation of the people of England should consist of 400 members, though with a distribution to the counties, and the towns within them, somewhat different. It referred the succession of Parliaments, and the qualifications of the electors and elected, to future consideration, and recommended that all members now sitting in Parliament should be counted in the next Parliament as representatives for the places for which they at present sat. The first proposition, that the representatives should be in number 400, was voted by Parliament on the day that the report was brought up. The rest was deferred; and Vane seems to have pressed with great anxiety for its completion, but without effect. He had consented to the provision for the continuance of the present members in the House, as in some sort a necessary compromise in the necessities of the case, to enable the original achievers and founders of the Commonwealth to deliver into the hands of the new representatives such a statement as they alone could give of their motives and reasons for the late memorable actions, and to report themselves, no less than their cause, aright to the unsatisfied; but still the dissolution was delayed.

* We find the name of Vane in almost all the various administrative measures of the time. And it is interesting to observe him engaged, among other things, on the measure which had last occupied the great mind of Pym. "Referred," says one of Whitelocke's notes, p. 392, "to a committee to prepare an act upon Sir Henry Vane's report touching the excise." † Hist. of Com., iii., 181.

* Mr. Godwin, always too partial to the motives of Cromwell, dates his own suspicion of the intentions of the usurper at a somewhat later date. "It was only," he observes, "by slow degrees that he came to entertain those ambitious thoughts that in the sequel proved fatal to his own character and the welfare of his country. But they found entrance; and imperceptibly they proceeded to undermine the pillars of integrity and honesty in his bosom. He saw himself without a competitor. He had no equal. He began to disdain and despise those with whom he had hitherto acted. Incomparably the man of the highest genius he now met in the council-chamber at Whitehall was Sir Henry Vane. But what was Vane? He was wholly unfit to command an army. He did not possess that most glittering and striking of human accomplishments, to look through whole files and squadrons of athletic, well formed, and well armed men, and inspire them at once with confidence, submission, and awe, and make them move as if they had only one soul, and march at his word unflinching, even to the cannon's mouth."—iii., 218, 219.

Again the committee resumed its sittings, and through this and the following year would seem to have met upward of fifty times. Still nothing decisive was done. At last Vane procured the passing of a resolution that the subject should be again discussed in the House on the 24th of September, 1651.

Cromwell had arrived meanwhile from the triumphant field of Worcester, "brooding strange thoughts by the way.*" Finding matters in the House of Commons brought to this crisis by Vane, he seems at once to have decided on practising one of his profoundest arts of deception. He professed broadly his concurrence in the measure proposed, and announced his earnest desire for a new Parliament and a popular representation! Whether Vane was in any way moved by this to forego his suspicions, does not with any certainty appear.

The debate took place on the day appointed, and on the 25th the House voted, upon a division, Cromwell and Scot being tellers for the majority, that a bill should be brought in for fixing a certain time for closing the present Parliament and calling another; and it was referred to Saint John, Whitelocke, Lisle, Prideaux, Say, Miles Corbet, and eight others, to prepare the bill. Next day the names of Vane, Cromwell, Marten, and Salway were added to this committee; and it was ordered that all that came should have voices in their decisions. On the 1st of October it was directed that this committee should sit every afternoon till the bill was ready. At the expiration of one week the bill was brought in and read a first time, and, two days after, a second time. It was then committed to a committee of the whole House, which was ordered to sit daily from the 14th to the 28th. The committee sat with few interruptions till the 4th of November. On that day it was directed that a new chairman should take the chair; and on the 12th it was found necessary that the sergeant-at-arms should go into Westminster Hall and summon the members, as well judges as others, to attend the House for the farther consideration of the bill. On the 13th the House was desired to examine the question, whether it be now a convenient time to fix the period at which the sittings of the present Parliament should cease; and on the 14th it was decided that this was a proper time. This decision was not adopted without two divisions, the first of fifty to forty-six, and the second of forty-nine to forty-seven; Cromwell and Saint John being in each instance tellers for the majority. On the 18th it was voted without a division that the period should be the 3d of November, 1654.†

The conquest of Scotland now led to the incorporation of that country with the English Legislature. A union was devised on large and liberal terms, and the genius of Vane, exerted with such effect in Scotland on a previous most memorable occasion, was thought essential to the successful achievement of the measure. He at once consented to proceed to Scotland as one of the commissioners for the settlement of the union. It was a trying time for such a duty; but his country never required his services in vain. "It marks," says Mr. Godwin, "the generous and unsuspicious mind of Vane, who consented to go upon a journey to Scotland for certainly not less than two months, and to leave the military party without his personal opposition during that term. We may also infer from this fact the slow, deliberate, and cautious procedure of Cromwell. Vane would scarcely have engaged in this transaction, and have withdrawn himself for so long a time from the metropolis, if Cromwell and he had not been seemingly on terms of friendship."

The instructions to the commissioners were finally given on the 18th of December. They reached Scotland in the course of the following month, and opened their proceedings at Dalkeith, six miles from Edinburgh. Their purpose was to summon deputies from the different shires and boroughs of Scotland to meet them, and declare their assent to the proposed union. They sat during the greater part of January and the whole of February, and on the 1st of March they sent up Vane and another of the commissioners to report to Parliament the progress they had made, from whose statement it appeared that twenty shires and thirty-five boroughs had already assented to the union.* In consequence of this report the act of union was brought in, and read a first and a second time on the 13th of April. In a very remarkable speech in the Parliament of Richard Cromwell (reported in the recently published Diary, by Burton), in which Vane argued most subtly for the exclusion of the Scotch nominees or members who would have turned the majority against the Republicans, he stated that this act of union, in so far as it related to representation, had never been duly perfected. I insert the speech here, both as illustrative of his share in this famous transaction, and of those sound philosophical views of the necessity of "laying foundations" in matters of government which we have been doomed to see defeated in these first years of the Commonwealth.

"This gentleman's discourse about the union has called me up. I shall represent the true state of that union. Admitting the premises agreed by the whole House, I shall deny the conclusion that it is right, convenient, or possible to admit them to a right, either in law or fact, to sit here.

"Those that you sent to treat had their great aim to settlement and peace, and to lay aside all animosities. The difference arose about imposing a king upon us. We conquered them, and gave them the fruit of our conquest in making them free denizens with us."

He read the declaratory part, and acknowledged that to be the union, and stated the progress of it.

"It is the interest of this nation to own and countenance that union. None of my arguments shall weaken it. The ordinance for union relates to this declaration. It was thus brought back again by your members from Scotland, that there should be one Parliament, by successive representatives. This is your union, and, when opened, none will deny it. To the

* "That man would make himself our king!" said Hugh Peters, who saw him on the road.

† I ascertain these various divisions from Godwin's History of the Com., p. 305, 306.

* Godwin, Hist. of Com., iii., 320.

completing of this, accordingly, commissioners attended the Parliament. We agreed then the number to be thirty-five to represent Scotland. The Parliament accepted the result from our and their commissioners. A bill was prepared to pass if that Parliament had not been broken up. In that respect, the public faith of the nation was much concerned to promote it. He that will deny it, departs from the very cause we have managed.

"It is to be confessed, the union was perfected in the time of last Parliament. It only wanted the last hand, which should have changed the constitution of Parliament. There was no foundation in law in the Long Parliament to receive them from Scotland or Ireland till we had settled our own Constitution. The committees that came from Scotland did not sit here, but only treated with your committee.

"You must vary your own Constitution, as well to make you fit to receive them as for them to come, and therefore I moved that the writs be read. It was the true meaning of the petition and advice to distribute it so, by reducing their own number, to give place for Scotland and Ireland. This the Long Parliament were about to do, to reduce themselves from 500 to 400. This was not done that Parliament. I told you the reason. But this was done, by the providence of God, by the instrument of government—a new Constitution, which reduced our own Constitution suitable to that for Scotland and Ireland—and accordingly the Parliament in 54 and 56 sat. This was reserved to be done by the petition and advice, but prevented also by the providence of God. It was left to no person to declare it, but singly as that Parliament should declare. That was left imperfect.

"It is one thing for us to be united and incorporated, another thing to be equally represented in Parliament by a right constitution. There is a great difference. As soon as you are a representative of that Commonwealth, then must the thirty be called, and not before.

"There being a failure in the petition and advice as to the distribution, they were fain to have recourse to the common law and the old statutes. There being no act of Parliament for another distribution, they were forced to call you as we left it in 1648.

"Now the single question is, whether, by the Act of Union, any right was created to any one shire or borough of Scotland. If they send them, you cannot receive them without overturning your own foundation. Your being thus called upon the old bottom, when no law was afoot to call Scotland or Ireland, your commission is clear; otherwise they were brought hither upon you, that if you will see it, you may; if you will not, you may let it pass.

"I think you are bound in duty and convenience to perfect this union, both as to the distribution, and all other defects.

"I assert two things, which I would gladly have answered: 1. That those gentlemen that are chosen from those shires or boroughs have no right to sit as members of the representative of England, either by statute, common law, or agreement. 2. That there is no possibility of receiving them till you agree, by act of Parliament, on the distribution, and other things.

To say the chief magistrate may do it is expressly against the petition and advice. He cannot do it, it being neither in law, state, nor in the commission.

"Durham had as much a possessory right; why was not his oath broken as well in that as in this? Haply, he knew more what the people of Durham would say when they were applied to.

"Honestly and uprightly make it your first business to settle your own Constitution. It is said you go slowly on. Whose is the fault? If no new commission had been sent out, you might have gone on to have done a great deal of good. This is an imposing upon you.

"I would have this to be your first business—to lay foundations. Obstructions in the fountain are dangerous: that body cannot live. There is no remedy but to do that by law which cannot possibly be done without it. The single person may as well send one hundred as thirty, and all for one place, and so rule your debates as he pleases. This is the highest breach that can be. Where are you, or posterity, upon the account of prudence? You see how the state of your affairs is abroad—how the Swede is, since your mighty debate. France and Spain are very likely speedily to agree!

"It is an ill time for any man to assume to rule without a Parliament. In this juncture of time, I believe the Protector does not know the state of this business. If any counsel him to the contrary, it will fall heavy upon them. I hope you will not call it an excrementitious formality: it is the very essence and being of your privilege.

"Put the question, whether they have by law a right to sit, and that they may withdraw. If they do not, it is against the law of nature and nations to deny it. If they have no right by law to sit, none will insist upon it that they ought to continue."

The commencement of hostilities with Holland furnished a great occasion for the display of the genius of Vane in affairs of government. It had already shone forth in the pre-eminent success of his naval administration in the matter of Prince Rupert's expedition, and left foreign nations, repeating the names of Vane and Blake, to wonder wherein lay the secret of English success, whether in the genius of the council-chamber of the Commonwealth, or the bravery of her sons upon the waves.

During a portion of the Dutch war, Vane was not only at the head of naval affairs, but also president of the council, and his exertions were almost incredible.* When the war began, the

* "The next branch of his public usefulness, in a political capacity, was his most happy dexterity at making the best of a war. Armies are to small purpose abroad unless there be sage counsel at home. He heartily laboured to prevent a war with Holland, but the sons of Zerviah, a military party (that too much turned war into a trade), were too many for him in that point. He therefore set himself to make the best of a war for his country's defence. In this war, after some dubious fights (while the immediate care of the fleet was in other hands), he, with five others, were appointed by the Parliament to attend that affair. Hereupon he became the happy and speedy contriver of that successful fleet that did our work in a very critical season, when the Hollander vapoured upon our seas, took prizes at pleasure, hovered about our ports, and was ready to spoil all. His report to the House as to the war-ships by him recruited, ordered, and sent forth in so little time, to find the enemy weak, seemed a thing incredible." The foregoing is the testimony of Sikes, an unimpeachable witness.

Dutch were lords of the ocean. "They were in the full vigour of their strength, and had never yet, by sea, felt the breath of a calamity. They looked with contempt and impatience on the proud style the Commonwealth had assumed. Our navy was comparatively nothing: theirs covered the ocean with their sails." Before the war had concluded, the united powers of Vane and Blake had nevertheless struck down the pride of the United Provinces, and conferred on their beloved country that glorious title of mistress of the seas, which, to the present day, she has so gloriously maintained.

A temporary reverse, which was deeply felt at the time, only served to set off more brilliantly the subsequent exertions of Vane, and the success which crowned them. Blake, with only thirty-seven ships under his immediate command, had encountered Van Tromp in the Downs with a fleet of eighty sail, on the 29th of November, 1652. The fleet of the English admiral, imperfect as it was in number, was not even in proper fighting order; but it was Blake's grand creed* that the English flag should never decline the challenge of an enemy, whatever his advantages; and the advice of his officers, it is said, coinciding with his own, determined him to engage. The battle was fought with the utmost gallantry on both sides for about five hours, when night came on, and enabled Blake to abandon the fight and escape into harbour with the loss of two ships, and others in a shattered state. Blake's ship was the most forward and fiercely engaged, and he was himself wounded.† The victorious Dutchman, drunk with his triumph, afterward paraded his fleet up and down the English Channel, with a broom fixed to his masthead, in derision of having swept the English navy from the sea.

For this he was soon punished by the unparalleled efforts of Vane. The difficulty was a disastrous one at the moment, but his energies rose to the occasion. On the 29th the battle had been fought. Not many days after, Vane reported the navy estimates to the House, and it was at once resolved that £40,000 per month should be devoted to the navy. The next and most difficult point was to raise the revenue to meet such an appropriation; but Vane's energy and capacity surmounted it. He brought in a bill, and had it at once read a first and second time, to sell Windsor Park, Hampton Court, Hyde Park, the Royal Park at Greenwich, Enfield Castle, and Somerset House, the proceeds of the whole to be for the use of the navy. In the beginning of February, Blake was put to sea by Vane with eighty ships of war, and soon fell in with Tromp, at the head of a squadron of equal size, convoying 200 merchantmen. A battle commenced on the 18th of February, off the Isle of Portland, which, for the weight of the armaments engaged, the determined bravery of the combatants, the length of time during which it lasted, and the brilliancy of its results, far transcended every previous naval action on record, and has never, perhaps, been since surpassed. It was fought and renewed through three successive days, and at the end of the third day Blake conquered. He captured or destroyed eleven ships of war and thirty merchantmen, slew 2000 men, and took 1500 prisoners. His own ships suffered severely, but only one was sunk, and after her crew had been brought away; but his number slain is stated as nearly equal to that of his enemy.

Thus splendidly did Vane and Blake close the battles of that Republican Commonwealth whose own termination was now near at hand. Vane and Cromwell were at last on the eve of an open rupture.

Before it is described, an interesting circumstance claims our notice. During the progress of Vane's brilliant administration of the government, Milton had addressed to him his famous sonnet; and at the same time, as if with the view of composing those fatal differences between them, which threatened the state with calamity, by showing how the glories of each might be celebrated by the same impartial pen, the divine poet forwarded another and not less famous sonnet to Cromwell. That to Vane was first published in Sikes's book; and it is a singular circumstance that it escaped the notice of the first editors of Milton, and was only subsequently included in his poems. It had been sent privately to Vane, who furnished the copy to Sikes. I present it precisely as it was first printed, and with the commentary I have already referred to.

"The character of this deceased statesman," says Sikes, "I shall exhibit to you in a paper of verses, composed by a learned gentleman, and sent him July 3, 1652.

'VANE, young in years, but in sage council old,

Than whom a better senator ne'er held

The helm of Rome, when gowns, not arms, repell'd

The fierce Eperiot, and the African bold.

'Whether to settle peace or to unfold

The drift of hollow states, hard to be spell'd,

Then to advise how war may, best upheld,

Move by her two main nerves, iron and gold,

'In all her equipage: besides to know

Both spiritual power and civil, what each means,

What severs each, thou hast learn'd, which few have done,

The bounds of either sword to thee we owe;

Therefore on thy firm hand Religion leans

In peace, and reckons thee her eldest son.'

"The latter part of this sufferer's elegy in the above mentioned verses concerns his skill in distinguishing the two swords or powers, civil and spiritual, and the setting right bounds to each. He held that the magistrate ought to keep within the proper sphere of civil jurisdiction, and not intermeddle with men's consciences, by way of imposition and force, in matters of religion and divine worship. In that healing question for which he was wounded by the late Protector (so called), he did sufficiently manifest this to be as well the magistrates' true interest as the people's just security. 'Tis observed by More and others, on various accounts, that the Roman emperors, owning and incorporating Christianity with the laws of the empire, strengthened the interest of the formal Christian, and drove the true spiritual worshipper into the wilderness. While magistrates pretend, and, it may be, verily think they are doing Christ a high piece of service by such fawning and formal compliance, they are directly involved in the anti-Christian interest for the persecuting of Christ in his true spiritual members.

* Another noble article in Blake's creed may be recorded here, in contrast to the conduct of Cromwell. He was the staunchest of Republicans; but it is recorded of him that, on receiving the news of the dispersion of the Long Parliament, he at once issued an order to the men of the fleet that their duty as seamen was to defend their country against foreign enemies, and not to meddle with political affairs.

† Hist. from Mackintosh, vi., 168.

"This lover of his nation, and asserter of the just rights and liberties thereof unto his death, was also for limiting the civil power, delegated by the people to their trustees in the supreme court of Parliament, or to any magistrates whatsoever. He held that there are certain fundamental rights and liberties of the nation, that carry such a universal and undeniable consonancy with the light of nature, right reason, and the law of God, that they are in nowise to be abrogated or altered, but preserved. What less than this can secure people's lives, liberties, and birthrights, declared in Magna Charta, and ratified by two-and-thirty Parliaments since? Let but once this truth be exploded and blown away, all the rights and liberties of the nation will soon go after it, and arbitrary domination and rapine may securely triumph over all. Deny that there are any fundamental irrepealable laws, and who can be secure as to life, liberty, or estate? For if, by an overruling stroke of abused prerogative, a majority in Parliament can be procured that will pull up all the ancient mischief by a new law, make reason and duty treason, and that post factum too—in this case, he that did things most rational and justifiable by unrepealed or irrepealable laws yesterday, may be condemned by a law made post factum, and executed to-morrow. By this means judges may be put into a most unhappy capacity of justifying the wicked and condemning the righteous, under colour of Parliamentary authority; in both which things they are an abomination to the Lord."

Vane was now using the same unparalleled exertions he had made for Blake, to avert the despotism of Cromwell. But Cromwell had completed all his plans, and was more than prepared for the opposition which "even his own beloved Vane" (as Clarendon expresses it) was organizing against him. It should be remarked that his motives for instant procedure had not been lessened by the measure Vane had included in his recent administrative plans, of the sale of Hampton Court, at that time in Cromwell's trust. Vane had also, as soon as Blake left for sea, procured a resolution of the House of Commons, appointing the 3d of November, 1653 (instead of the 3d of November, 1654, before fixed on, as I have said), for the Parliament's dissolution. Roger Williams, Vane's old friend of earlier years in his government of New-England, was staying at this time in Vane's country residence in Lincolnshire, and we find him writing over to his friends of New-England: "Here is great thoughts and preparations for a new Parliament. Some of our friends are apt to think a new Parliament will favour us and our cause more than this has done."

Up to this moment, therefore, Vane would seem not to have despaired. Yet Cromwell's plans had left him not a single possibility of success. His instrument was the army, and his immediate agents the Republican officers. These officers had been first most thoroughly deceived; and the silly simplicity of their enthusiasm appears to have deserved betrayal. They professed, and indeed felt, almost all of them, a rooted aversion to the government of a single person. Cromwell, therefore, had first to "convince them that Vane, and Bradshaw, and Marten, the great apostles of the Republican school, and whom he had taught them before to look upon with implicit reverence, were dishonest;" he had next to purge himself from the imputation of personal motives, and every alloy of the love of greatness and the love of power. All this he did; and, as Mr. Godwin observes, "by degrees, by multiplied protestations of the purity of his views and a self-denying temper, and by an apparent frankness, and the manifestations of a fervent zeal, he succeeded, and formed to himself a party as strong and as completely moulded to his suggestions and his will as the boldness of his purposes required."

It appeared subsequently (and the circumstance may possibly explain some of the difficulties of Vane's position in holding out the existence of the old Parliament so long) that Cromwell's plan had not always been that of a violent dissolution, but that, as far back as the preceding October, he had brought about various meetings between the officers of the army and certain members of the Parliament opposed to Vane, for the purpose of convincing the latter of the necessity of putting a speedy end to their sittings. There were ten or twelve such meetings in all, and Cromwell's proposition appears to have been that, the Parliament being dissolved, the government ad interim should be intrusted in the hands of a small number of persons of honour and integrity, and whose characters should be well known to the public. The number mentioned was forty. They were to supersede the council of state, and to consist of members of Parliament and officers of the army.* The secret object of this was to prepare the way for his own supremacy or kingship, by removing every existing legislative and executive body that had the appearance of being founded upon the customs and institutions of England. The proposed senate, or council of forty, would have been moulded in a manner agreeable to his wishes; or, at worst, he depended upon having a majority among them whom he could render subservient to his purposes. And all this the military Republicans, saints of Democracy, and men of the Fifth Monarchy simply and gravely listened to, as auguring a blessed republic on the earth, while to these very men the wise and practical counsels of Vane were denounced as visionary!

"Cromwell," says the historian of the Commonwealth, "by calumnies, and the most insidious suggestions, succeeded in alienating the major part of the army from the leaders of the Parliament. His first topic was, that they were statesmen who, without undergoing hardships and being exposed to dangers themselves, were willing to use the army as their tool, and felt no genuine interest in its prosperity and happiness. The next argument was, that these lazy men, these 'baleful, unclean birds, perched as they were at fortune's top,' divided all the good things and the emoluments of the state among them, totally insensible to the adversities and privations which such a system inevitably entailed upon men of greater merit than themselves. Vane he treated as an obscure visionary, whose speculations no man could understand, and who, while he pretended to superior sanctity and patriotism, had no bowels of compassion for such as were not ready to engage themselves, heart and soul, in his projects. Others, agreeably to the austerity of the times, he exclaimed against as men of loose morals, and, therefore, unfit to be intrusted with the public safety. His own professed object was equality and a pure commonwealth, without a king or permanent chief magistrate of any kind."

* Baker's History of New-England, i., 287.

* Parl. Hist., xx., 158.

All was now prepared for submission except the unquenchable resolution of Vane. On the 20th of April, 1653, he hurried down to the House of Commons, resolved to make a last effort to sustain the Republic. By his exertions within the last month, all the amendments from his report on the dissolution bill had already been decided on in the successive sittings of the House, and all that now remained was the third reading, and that sanction of the Parliament which should give the bill the force of a law. Vane, on his arrival in the House, at once rose, and vehemently urged the necessity of passing through these latter forms at once, imploring them, for the most pressing reasons, to hazard no farther delay. Upon this a debate arose, for Cromwell had instructed his myrmidons. Harrison spoke in remonstrance and expostulation, and was answered more warmly still.

Meanwhile Cromwell and his military cabal were sitting in consultation at Whitehall. He had dismissed many who happened to be members of the House on the first announcement of its sitting, but still remained himself with a few others. At length Colonel Ingoldsby reappeared from the House in violent haste and excitement, and told him that if he meant to do anything, he had no time to lose.* Cromwell hastily commanded a party of soldiers to be marched round to the House of Commons, and, attended by Lambert and five or six other officers, at once proceeded there himself. Some of the soldiers he stationed at the door and in the lobby, and led some files of musketeers to a situation just without the chamber where the members were seated.†

"In plain black clothes, with gray worsted stockings," Cromwell quietly made his appearance on the floor of the House of Commons. Vane was urging passionately the necessity of proceeding to the last stage of the bill, with the omission of immaterial forms, such as the ceremony of engrossing. Cromwell stood for a moment, and then "sat down, as he used to do in an ordinary place." After a few minutes he beckoned Harrison. "Now is the time," he said; "I must do it!" Harrison, doubtful, at the instant, of the effect of what Vane was urging, advised him to consider. "The work, sir," he added, "is very great and dangerous." "You say well," retorted Cromwell, hastily, and "sat still for another quarter of an hour." The question was now about to be put, when Cromwell suddenly rose, "put off his hat, and spake." "At first," says Lord Leicester (on the information, no doubt, of Algernon Sidney), "and for a good while, he spake to the commendation of the Parliament for their pains and care of the public good; but afterward he changed his style, told them of their injustice, delays of justice, self-interest, and other faults"—in other words, he poured out, according to the reports of every one present, a vehement torrent of invective. Vane rose to remonstrate, when Cromwell, as if suddenly astonished himself at the extraordinary part he was playing, stopped and said, "You think, perhaps, that this is not Parliamentary language—I, know it!" Then, says Lord Leicester, "he put on his hat, went out of his place, and walked up and down the stage or floor in the midst of the House, with his hat on his head, and chid them soundly, looking sometimes, and pointing particularly upon some persons, as Sir R. Whitelocke, one of the commissioners for the great seal, and Sir Henry Vane, to whom he gave very sharp language, though he named them not, but by his gestures it was well known he meant them." One person, he said (aiming, Lord Leicester adds, at Vane), "might have prevented all this, but he was a juggler, and had not so much as common honesty. The Lord had done with him, however, and chosen honest and worthier instruments for carrying on his work." All this he spake, says Ludlow, "with so much passion and discomposure, as if he had been distracted." Vane's voice was heard once more, and Sir Peter Wentworth and Marten seconded him. "Come, come," raved Cromwell, "I'll put an end to your prating. You are no Parliament. I'll put an end to your sitting. Begone! Give way to honest men."

The tyrant then stamped his foot very heavily upon the floor, the door opened, and he was surrounded by musketeers with their arms ready. "Then the general," says Lord Leicester, "pointing to the speaker in his chair, said to Harrison, 'Fetch him down!' Harrison went to the speaker and spake to him to come down, but the speaker sat still and said nothing. 'Take him down!' said the general; then Harrison went and pulled the speaker by the gown, and he came down. It happened that day that Algernon Sidney sat next to the speaker on the right hand. The general said to Harrison, 'Put him out!' Harrison spake to Sidney to go out, but he said he would not go out, and sat still. The general said again, 'Put him out!' then Harrison and Worsley (who commanded the general's own regiment of foot) put their hands upon Sidney's shoulders as if they would force him to go out. Then he rose and went towards the door. Then the general went to the table where the mace lay, which used to be carried before the speaker, and said, 'Take away these bawbles!' So the soldiers took away the mace."

Helpless in the midst of this extraordinary scene, the members had meanwhile been gradually withdrawing. As they passed Cromwell, he addressed the leading men with passionate bitterness. He accused Alderman Allen of embezzlement, and Whitelocke of gross injustice. He pointed to Challoner, and told his soldiers he was a drunkard; he called after Sir Peter Wentworth that he was an adulterer; and as his old friend Harry Marten passed him, he asked if a whoremaster was fit to sit and govern. Vane passed him among the last, and as he did so, "said aloud, 'This is not honest! Yea, it is against morality and common honesty!'" Cromwell stopped for an instant, as if to recollect what vice he could charge his great rival with, and then addressed to him, in a loud but troubled voice, the memorable words, "Sir Harry Vane, Sir Harry Vane! the Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" He was now master. He "seized on the records, snatched the act of dissolution from the hand of the clerk," commanded the doors to be locked, and went away to Whitehall.*

* Whitelocke, 539; Perfect Politician, 168.

† Leicester's Journals, 192; Sidney Papers, by Blencowe.

* Leicester's Journals, p. 140, 141.

When Cromwell arrived that day at Whitehall, he was the absolute dictator of three kingdoms: when Vane reached his own home, he was once more a private man, with no authority in the state, with little fortune left from what he had so generously devoted to his country, with no remaining influence in the world save that of his genius and his virtue. Yet who would have chosen between them?

This memorable Long Parliament had many glorious epitaphs written over it. "It was thus," says Ludlow, "that Cromwell contrived to be rid of this Parliament, that had performed such great things, having subdued their enemies in England, Scotland, and Ireland; established the liberty of the people; reduced the kingdom of Portugal to such terms as they thought fit to grant; maintained a war against the Dutch with that conduct and success, that it seemed now drawing to a happy conclusion; recovered our reputation at sea; secured our trade, and provided a powerful fleet for the service of the nation. And however the malice of their enemies may endeavour to deprive them of the glory which they justly merited, yet it will appear to unprejudiced posterity that they were a disinterested and impartial Parliament, who, though they had the sovereign power of the three nations in their hands for the space of ten or twelve years, did not in all that time give away among themselves so much as their forces spent in three months." "Thus it pleased God," says the cautious Whitelocke, "that this assembly, famous through the world

* I have taken the various points in the foregoing account from very many authorities, all of them of the highest veneration. Whitelocke, Ludlow, Lord Leicester, The Perfect Politician, The Parliamentary History, and the Journals of the time. It will complete the curiosity and interest of the narrative to subjoin the "official" account of the incident published two or three days after in Cromwell's paper, the Mercurius Politicus: "Westminster, April 20. The lord-general delivered in Parliament divers reasons wherefore a present period should be put to the sitting of this Parliament, and it was accordingly done, the speaker and the members all departing. The grounds of which proceedings (it is probable) be shortly made public."

† This circumstance has already been glanced at. Vane's estates had suffered in the civil war; he had assisted the public treasury with various large sums; he had refunded positive receipts from his office, and surrendered an income of £30,000 a year! In point of fact, he was now a poor man—he might have been the wealthiest of the wealthy. But let us hear Sikes: "Such were his abilities for despatch of a business if good, or hindering it if ill, that had his hand been as open to receive as others to offer in that kind, he might have treasured up silver as dust. Many hundreds per annum have been offered to some about him in case they could but prevail with him only not to appear against a proposal. On the least intimation of such a thing to him, he would conclude it to be some corrupt, self-interested design, and set himself more vigilantly and industriously to oppose and quash it." for its undertakings, actions, and successes, having subdued all their enemies, were themselves overthrown and ruined by their own servants; and those whom they had raised now pulled down their masters; an example never to be forgotten and scarcely to be paralleled in any story, by which all persons may be instructed how uncertain and subject to change all worldly affairs are, and how apt to fall when we think them highest. All honest and prudent indifferent men were highly distasted at this unworthy action." "The Parliament," observes the accomplished Mrs. Hutchinson, "had now, by the blessing of God, restored the Commonwealth to a happy and plentiful condition; and although the taxes were great, the people were rich and able to pay them; they had some hundred thousand pounds in their purse, and were free from enemies in arms within and without, except the Dutch, whom they had beaten, and brought to seek peace upon honourable terms. And now they fell, because they thought it was time to deliver the people from their burdens, which could not be but by disbanding unnecessary officers and soldiers." "When Van Tromp," says Algernon Sidney, "set upon Blake in Folkestone Bay, the Parliament had not above thirteen ships against three-score, and not a man that had ever seen any other fight at sea than between a merchant-ship and a pirate, to oppose the best captain in the world; but, such was the power of wisdom and integrity in those that sat at the helm, and their diligence in choosing men only for their merit was attended with such success, that in two years our fleets grew to be as famous as our land-armies, and the reputation and power of our nation rose to a greater height than when we possessed the better half of France, and had the kings of France and Scotland for our prisoners." And these tributes may be closed with the words of one who had been a bitter and a scornful enemy. "Thus, by their own mercenary servants," exclaims Roger Coke, "and not a sword drawn in their defence, fell the haughty and victorious Rump, whose mighty actions will scarcely find belief in future generations; and, to say the truth, they were a race of men most indefatigable and industrious in business, always seeking for men fit for it, and never preferring any for favour nor by importunity. You scarce ever heard of any revolting from them; no murmur or complaint of seamen or soldiers; nor do I find that they ever pressed any in all their wars. And as they excelled in the management of civil affairs, so it must be owned they exercised in matters ecclesiastic no such severities as either the Covenanters, or others before them, did upon such as dissented from them; nor were they less forward in reforming the abuses of the common law."

It is right, before following Vane to his retirement, to place the reader in possession of the exact question between Cromwell and that great statesman, which we have seen thus insolently silenced by the application of brute force. This can only be done by stating the provisions of the bill on which Vane was content to rest his case with the people and posterity.

But this bill was never afterward found! Cromwell himself seized it from the hands of the clerk, and no copy of it remains upon record. By a careful examination of the journals, however, I have gathered sufficient information on the subject to leave no doubt of the general provisions of the bill,* or of the nature of many of its more important details.

I have already mentioned that Vane was the author of the reports from the select committee presented at various intervals to the House. Tracing these through the innumerable allusions, and votes, and divisions recorded concerning them in the journals, a tolerably complete abstract of it may be made. The number of representatives he fixed at 400. He recommended the abolition of the right of voting in the smallest boroughs, and proposed to throw the members into the larger counties; to give seven members to London and the liberties thereof; and to give members to all the larger cities and towns in England theretofore unrepresented. He presented to them the following list of the numbers of members to which he thought the counties of England and Wales, including the cities and boroughs within them, fairly entitled; and he left the particular distribution of members to each county, city, or borough, to the "pleasure of the House."†

Bedfordshire, and all the places within the same	6	Nottinghamshire, and all the places within the same	6
Buckinghamshire, &c.	9	Oxfordshire, &c.	6
Berkshire, &c.	6	Rutlandshire, &c.	2
Cornwall, &c.	10	Staffordshire, &c.	6
Cumberland, &c.	4	Salop, &c.	8
Cambridgeshire, &c.	8	Surrey, &c.	7
Cheshire, &c.	5	Southamptonshire, &c.	13
Derbyshire, &c.	5	Suffolk, &c.	16
Devonshire, &c.	20	Somersetshire, &c.	14
Dorsetshire, &c.	8	Sussex, &c.	14
Durham, &c.	4	Westmoreland, &c.	3
Essex, &c.	14	Wiltshire, &c.	13
Gloucestershire, &c.	8	Warwickshire, &c.	7
Hertfordshire, &c.	6	Worcestershire, &c.	7
Herefordshire, &c.	6	Yorkshire, &c.	24
Huntingdonshire, &c.	4	Anglesey, &c.	1
Kent, &c.	18	Brecknockshire, &c.	2
Leicestershire, &c.	6	Cardiganshire, &c.	2
Lincolnshire, &c.	15	Carnarvonshire, &c.	1
Lancashire, &c.	12	Denbighshire, &c.	2
Middlesex, &c. (except London)	6	Flintshire, &c.	1
London and the Liberties thereof	7	Glamorganshire, &c.	3
Norfolk, &c.	14	Merionethshire, &c.	1
Northamptonshire, &c.	8	Monmouthshire, &c.	3
Northumberland, &c.	8	Montgomeryshire, &c.	2
		Pembrokehire, &c.	3
		Radnorshire, &c.	3

* Ludlow, in his Memoirs, supplies the following sketch, which is corroborative of the accuracy of what is stated in the text: "The act for putting a period to the Parliament was still before a committee of the whole House, who had made a considerable progress therein, having agreed upon a more equal distribution of the power of election throughout England. And whereas formerly some boroughs that had scarce a house upon them chose two members to be their representatives in Parliament (just as many as the greatest cities in England, London only excepted), and the single county of Cornwall elected forty-four, when Essex, and other counties bearing as great a share in the payment of taxes, sent no more than six or eight; this unequal representation of the people the Parliament resolved to correct, and to permit only some of the principal cities and boroughs to choose, and that, for the most part, but one representative, the city of London only excepted, which, on account of the great proportion of their contributions and taxes, were allowed to elect six. The rest of the 400, whereof the Parliament was to consist (besides those that served for Ireland and Scotland), were appointed to be chosen by the several counties, in as near a proportion as was possible to the sums charged upon them for the service of the state, and all men admitted to be electors who were worth £200 in lands, leases, or goods."—ii. 435, 436.

† It is right to state that these details were published by the present writer in some papers written during the dis-

With respect to qualification, he suggested that the elective franchise in towns should be exercised by all housekeepers of a certain rental (which he left to the determination of the House), and with an earnestness rendered remarkable by events of our own day, while he pressed the necessity of extending the franchise in counties, he urged the danger of vesting it in those tenants whose tenure of estate subjected them to perpetual control. His plan was to give the right of voting in counties to all persons seised in an estate of freehold of lands, tenements, or other profits of the clear yearly value of 40s.; all tenants in ancient demesne; customary tenants; and all copyholders of any estate of inheritance in possession, of the clear yearly value of £5; all tenants for life of ancient demesne in possession, and all copyhold and customary tenants for life in possession of the clear yearly value of £5; all tenants in actual possession for the term of one-and-twenty years or more, in being, upon any lease granted, determinable upon life or lives, of the clear yearly value of £20 over and above the rent reserved or chargeable thereon; and all tenants, for the term of one-and-twenty years or more, in being, in possession of the clear yearly value of £20 over and above any rent reserved or chargeable thereon.

After explaining the various heads of his report, Vane moved "that they be referred to a grand committee of the House, to take into consideration and to prepare a bill to be presented." The numerous sittings and delays that followed have been already described, and from the frequent divisions on the journals, some notion may be gathered of the nature of the points that came under sharpest discussion. The disfranchising and enfranchising clauses were debated at very considerable length, each town and county being put separately. One or two circumstances, taken almost at random from the journals during 1652, will intimate a startling resemblance between these debates and those of a later period. Many divisions are there recorded, which betoken hard struggles for condemned boroughs; and we find that immediately after Plympton (so renowned in a certain famous schedule A.) had been consigned to destruction by a decisive division, the claims of Queenborough (also in that notable schedule) seem to have been stoutly debated; for, on a division, the numbers were equal, and the half-convicted borough was suffered to continue in existence only by the casting vote of the speaker. We may mention also that the proposal for uniting East and West Loo, in order to their sending one member, which was offered to and rejected by the Parliament of 1831, had been entertained and accepted by the Long Parliament. Of the enfranchising clauses, we might refer for a specimen to the minutes of one day's proceedings, which gave to Arundel, Honiton, and Reigate (all in schedule B.) the privilege of retaining one member, and to Penryn and Bury (in schedules D. and E.) the right of sending two members each. One circumstance farther is worthy of notice in thus slightly comparing the measures. The disastrous system of dividing the counties was in one instance, and in one instance only, adopted by the statesmen of the Long Parliament. On an amendment, and after long discussion, it was resolved that the members for the county of Yorkshire should be chosen separately, the elections for each riding to be made distinct. Here, however, in dividing a county already parcelled out in separate districts, none of the bad results so fairly to have been presumed, and since so deeply felt, from a general division of the counties, could be expected to accrue. Lastly, I may mention, that when Vane proposed to insert in the bill the county qualification clause already described, Cromwell defeated him in several divisions, and substituted a £200 qualification (real or personal) in its stead.

cussion of the Reform Bill in 1831, and afterward republished in the Times newspaper, then ably and earnestly advocating that measure.

Thus are established the popular claims of Sir Henry Vane the younger to the respect and admiration of posterity, in this his last Parliamentary struggle for the liberties of the Commonwealth. One striking circumstance more in connexion with the subject should still be noticed. When Cromwell called his second and third Parliaments, he seems to have tried the experiment of the principal provisions of this famous bill. His "Instrument of Government" directed that a Parliament should be summoned once in every third year; that all petty boroughs should be suppressed, and that the representation should be, as nearly as might be, proportioned to the amount of taxation. It fixed the number of English members at 400; of these, 261 were to be county members, besides six for London, two for the Isle of Ely, two for the Isle of Wight, and two each for Exeter, Plymouth, Colchester, Gloucester, Canterbury, Leicester, Lincoln, Westminster, Norwich, Lynn, Yarmouth, Nottingham, Shrewsbury, Bristol, Taunton, Ipswich, Bury St. Edmunds, Southwark, Coventry, New Sarum, Worcester, and York. It gave one each to the two Universities, and one each to all the towns and boroughs that were thought worthy to be represented, among which are Manchester, Leeds, Halifax, &c., and it fixed the amount of qualification at £200 of real or personal estate. And what was the result? The compilers of the Parliamentary History, no indifferent friends to the cause of the Royalists, say that "this popular and equitable scheme had filled the House of Commons with so great a number of independent gentlemen of the best families and estates in the kingdom, that he (Cromwell) had no way to manage them but by excluding either by fraud or force those who were the true friends of the Constitution." And he scrupled not to do so. He dissolved the first of the new Parliaments because it presumed to discuss the question, whether the government should be in a single person. He endeavoured strenuously, but in vain, to pack the second, by using various means to influence the elections; and failing in that, excluded a hundred members by allowing none to enter without a certificate from the council of state. Such was the practical working of even an imperfect copy of Vane's scheme.

Whatever may be thought, then, of the motives or policy of that statesman in deferring this measure, supposing, which is scarcely probable, that the delay was not beyond his control, no doubt he fell gloriously in his unsuccessful struggle to achieve it at last. He was driven from the government of the Commonwealth by a traitorous usurper because he proposed to strengthen it with new institutions, and replenish its languid veins with the vigorous blood of the people. He carried with him into his retirement that glorious consolation.

Some few days after the usurpation saw him quietly settled at Raby Castle. Here, or at his other seat of Belleau, in the county of Lincoln, with his family around him, he resumed the studies so inexpressibly dear to him, of learning, philosophy, and religion, and waited patiently for the first fitting occasion of striking another stroke for the Good Old Cause.

Cromwell, meanwhile, drunk with power, was setting at naught the advice of his wisest counsellor. "Consider frequently," wrote Milton to him, with noblest eloquence, and some thing of poetic license, on his first assumption of the power, "consider in thy inmost thoughts how dear a pledge, from how dear a parent intrusted (the gift liberty, the giver thy country), thou hast received into thy keeping. Revere the hope that is entertained of thee, the confident expectation of England; call to mind the features and the wounds of all the brave men who, under thy command, have contended for this inestimable prize; call to mind the ashes and the image of those who fell in the bloody strife; respect the apprehension and the discourse that is held of us by foreign nations, how much it is they look for in the recollection of our liberty, so bravely achieved, of our Commonwealth, so gloriously constructed; which if it shall be in so short a time subverted, nothing can be imagined more shameful and dishonourable; last of all, revere thyself, so deeply bound, that that liberty, in securing which thou hast encountered such mighty hardships, and faced such fearful perils, shall, while in thy custody, neither be violated by thee, nor any way broken in upon by others. Recollect that thou thyself canst not be free unless we are so; for it is fully so provided in the nature of things, that he who conquers another's liberty, in the very act loses his own; he becomes, and justly, the foremost slave. But, indeed, if thou, the patron of our liberty, should undermine the freedom which thou hadst but so lately built up, this would prove not only deadly and destructive to thine own fame, but to the entire and universal cause of religion and virtue. The very substance of piety and honour will be seen to have evaporated, and the most sacred ties and engagements will cease to have any value with our posterity; than which a more grievous wound cannot be inflicted on human interests and happiness, since the fall of the first father of our race. Thou hast taken on thyself a task which will probe thee to the very vitals, and disclose to the eyes of all how much is thy courage, thy firmness, and thy fortitude; whether that piety, perseverance, moderation, and justice really exist in thee, in consideration of which we have believed that God hath given thee the supreme dignity over thy fellows. To govern three mighty states by thy counsels; to recall the people from their corrupt institutions to a purer and a nobler discipline; to extend thy thoughts and send out thy mind to our remotest shores; to foresee all, and provide for all; to shrink from no labour; to trample under foot and tear to pieces all the snares of pleasure, and all the entangling seducements of wealth and power: these are matters so arduous, that, in comparison of them, the perils of war are but the sports of children. These will winnow thy faculties, and search thee to the very soul; they require a man sustained by a strength that is more than human, and whose meditations and whose thoughts shall be in perpetual commerce with his Maker."*

Cromwell had now decisively shown that he was not that man. He had already richly entitled himself to the doom he had stirred against Charles the First; for, like that unhappy prince, he had abruptly closed three Parliaments in succession because they threatened to thwart his will. The splendid trust of foreign victories and supremacy which he had inherited from Vane's administration of the Commonwealth he indeed maintained, and the glories of his foreign administration served to conceal or patch over the ragged condition of his domestic government. In that government existed no single principle of stability. Plots and treasons shook it in every month of its existence, till at last, abandoning merely desultory acts of despotism, he was driven to organize a system of military inquisition (in his instructions to the major-generals) that should have the effect of superseding the conditions of civil government. Having accomplished this, he bethought him of getting together a more manageable Parliament, and began to consider it possible that the nation, thoroughly discontented with military despotism, might possibly not be indisposed to listen to some compromise, involving the old institutions of kingship. Nothing could be attempted, at all events, without some shadow or form of a Parliament. Old habits were much, and the English people might still farther be deceived by a prudent conciliation on that score. Alas! he was indeed teaching them all the while an indifference to the liberty they had suffered so much in achieving—but not for himself the melancholy advantage! England was at this time a scene of beggarly and disgraceful rehearsal for the grand farce of the 29th of May, 1660.

Cromwell's preparation for his present move in the game was very characteristic; he published, on the 14th of March, 1656, a declaration, calling upon the people to observe a general fast, for the purpose of "applying themselves to the Lord to discover the Achan who had so long obstructed the settlement of these distracted kingdoms." He had fixed his gloating aspirations on a crown, and with admirable originality he therefore expressed the idea in this proclamation, that he and others associated with him in the government desired to humble themselves before God for their sins, and earnestly longed for light that they might discern their errors and faults, and therefore that it became them, with a spirit of lowliness, and mind open to conviction, to receive counsel and direction, in whatever methods Providence might adopt.

Sir Henry Vane had hitherto kept aloof from public affairs, engaged in the studies I have named. In the interim he had published the "Retired Man's Meditations" (a quarto volume of 430 pages) already described and quoted from, and other works illustrative of his views in religion and philosophy. With deep interest, indeed, he watched the proceedings of the usurper,* but in all the conspiracies and consultations of the disaffected he peremptorily refused to take part. Reason and public spirit were his weapons, and he left every other to the simple "visionaries" and "enthusiasts" who, having stripped the Commonwealth and her greatest statesmen of their liberties to clothe Cromwell with them, now conceived the noble project of assassination by way of hastening that saints' reign which their idol had once promised them. The apples in that fool's paradise were sour at last.

* Defensio Secunda pro Populo Anglicano.

Now, however, Vane entered the field, after his nobler fashion, against the dictator of the Commonwealth. He wrote a political treatise, which he entitled "A Healing Question propounded and resolved, upon Occasion of the late public and seasonable Call to Humiliation, in order to Love and Union among the honest Party, and with a Desire to apply Balm to the Wound before it become incurable. By Henry Vane, Knight." In this treatise he enforced his old doctrines of civil and religious liberty, and added some theories and recommendations concerning the construction of a civil government, the result, no doubt, of quiet and philosophical reflection on the occurrences of his political life, which are in the last degree striking and memorable. He here proposed, in fact, for the first time in the records of history, that expedient of organizing a government "on certain fundamentals not to be dispensed with," which was thought "visionary" and impracticable by the world till the world learned to venerate the name of Washington.

Vane begins with a statement of the question thus: "The question propounded is, What possibility doth yet remain (all things considered) of reconciling and uniting the dissenting judgments of honest men within the three nations, who still pretend to agree in the spirit, justice, and reason of the same good cause, and what is the means to effect this?" Of that cause he proceeds to say, that surely it "hath still the same goodness in it as ever, and is, or ought to be, as much in the hearts of all good people that have adhered to it; it is not less to be valued now than when neither blood nor treasure were thought too dear to carry it out, and hold it up from sinking; and hath the same omnipotent God, whose great name is concerned in it, as well as his people's outward safety and welfare; who knows also how to give a revival to it when secondary instruments and visible means fail or prove deceitful." And that the latter had been proved, the writer added significantly, "It seemed as if God were pleased to stand still, and be as a looker-on" during the last three years, that is, during Cromwell's tyranny.

* Clarendon not very accurately describes his conduct to have been, that he "retired quietly to his house in the country, poisoned the affections of his neighbours towards the government, and lost nothing of his credit with the people, yet carried himself so warily that he did nothing to disturb the peace of the nation, or to give Cromwell any advantage against him upon which to call him in question."

In a subsequent passage this is more distinctly stated, with all the dangers it was bringing the nation into, thus: "In the management of this war it pleased God, the righteous Judge (who was appealed to in the controversy), so to bless the counsel and forces of the persons concerned and engaged in this cause, as in the end to make them absolute and complete conquerors over their common enemy; and by this means they had added unto the natural right, which was in them before (and so declared by their representatives in Parliament assembled), the right of conquest, for the strengthening of their just claim to be governed by national councils, and successive representatives of their own election and setting up. This they once thought they had been in possession of, when it was ratified, as it were, in the blood of the last king. But of late a great interruption having happened unto them in their former expectations, and, instead thereof, something rising up that seems rather accommodated to the private and selfish interest of a particular part (in comparison) than truly adequate to the common good and concern of the whole body engaged in this cause: hence it is that this compacted body is now falling asunder into many dissenting parts (a thing not unforeseen nor unhopd for by the common enemy all along as their last relief); and if these breaches be not timely healed, and the offences (before they take too deep root) removed, they will certainly work more to the advantage of the common enemy than any of their own unwearied endeavours and dangerous contrivances in foreign parts put altogether."

Enlarging next on the universal advantages of liberty in civil and religious matters, Vane goes on to develop the method by which he thinks it might be secured to the people, and therein suggests the idea of a FUNDAMENTAL CONSTITUTION. He then directs the following vigorous passage against Cromwell: "The offence which causes such great thoughts of heart among the honest party (if it may be freely expressed, as sure it may, when the magistrate himself professes he doth but desire and wait for conviction therein), is, in short, this: that when the right and privilege is returned, nay, is restored by conquest unto the whole body (that forfeited not their interest therein), of freely disposing themselves in such a constitution of righteous government as may best answer the end held forth in this cause; that, nevertheless, either through delay they should be withheld as they are, or through design they should come at last to be utterly denied the exercise of this their right, upon pretence that they are not in a capacity as yet to use it, which, indeed, hath some truth in it, if those that are now in power, and have the command of the arms, do not prepare all things requisite thereunto, as they may, and, like faithful guardians to the Commonwealth, admitted to be in its nonage, they ought. But if the bringing of true freedom into exercise among men, yea, so refined a party of men, be impossible, why hath this been concealed all this while? and why was it not thought on before so much blood was spilt, and treasure spent? Surely such a thing as this was judged real and practicable, not imaginary and notional. Besides, why may it not suffice to have been thus long delayed and withheld from the whole body, at least as to its being brought by them into exercise now at last? Surely the longer it is withheld, the stronger jealousies do increase, that it is intended to be assumed and engrossed by a part only, to the leaving the rest of the body (who, in all reason and justice, ought to be equally participants with the other in the right and benefit of the conquest, for as much as the war was managed at the expense and for the safety of the whole) in a condition almost as much exposed, and subject to be imposed upon, as if they had been enemies and conquered, not in any sense conquerors. If ever such an unrighteous, unkind, and deceitful dealing with brethren should happen, although it might continue above the reach of question from human judicature, yet can we think it possible it should escape and go unpunished by the immediate hand of the righteous Judge of the whole world, when he ariseth out of his place to do right to the oppressed?"

After this wise, solemn, and searching reproof, Vane proceeds with masterly ingenuity to present such a view of events and affairs as, without any personal allusion, made it clear to all eyes that the ambition of Cromwell was the obstacle in the way of the establishment of a just and free government; that he was "the Achan who obstructed the settlement of these distracted kingdoms," and that, in preferring his own aggrandizement to the common good, and seizing an unlawful power, he had taken "of the accursed thing." He then delineates, in a passage ever deserving of remembrance, the course of proceedings by which a CONSTITUTION might be agreed upon and established, in reparation of all these injuries. The method, the reader will perceive, is exactly that which more than a century after was adopted by Washington and his immortal associates.

"The most natural way for which would seem to be by a general council, or CONVENTION of faithful, honest, and discerning men, chosen for that purpose by the free consent of the whole body of adherents to this cause, in the several parts of the nation, and observing the time and place of meeting appointed to them (with other circumstances concerning their election), by order from the present ruling power, but considered as general of the army; which convention is not properly to exercise the legislative power, but only to debate freely and agree upon the particulars, that by way of FUNDAMENTAL CONSTITUTIONS shall be laid and inviolably observed, as the conditions upon which the whole body so represented doth consent to cast itself into a civil and politic incorporation, and under the visible form and administration of government therein declared, and to be by each individual member of the body subscribed in testimony of his or their particular consent given thereunto; which conditions so agreed (and among them an act of oblivion for all) will be without danger of being broken or departed from, considering of what it is they are the conditions, and the nature of the convention wherein they are made, which is of the people represented in their highest state of sovereignty, as they have the sword in their hands unsubjected unto the rules of civil government, but what themselves, orderly assembled for that purpose, do think fit to make. And the sword, upon these conditions, subjecting itself to the supreme judicature thus to be set up, how suddenly might harmony, righteousness, love, peace, and safety unto the whole body follow hereupon, as the happy fruit of such a settlement, if the Lord have any delight to be among us !”

More need not be given* to show the spirit and philosophy of this great political treatise, its sincere and serious admonition, its fearless and vigorous exhortation, its moderate and respectful tone. It was in all respects calculated to work a great sensation; and perhaps the most striking circumstance connected with it remains to be noticed. Its author, resolved to maintain a perfect good faith even towards Cromwell, transmitted to him privately, through the hands of General Fleetwood, a copy before its publication, not disregarding of even the faint hope there existed that Cromwell might be induced to follow his advice, and adopt some such course as he had proposed, in which event the public feeling needed not, by its publication, be exasperated unnecessarily; but after the lapse of a month it was returned without comment, and Sir Henry immediately issued it from the press, with a postscript, in which allusion was made to the fact that it had previously been communicated to Cromwell. It is more than probable, however, that Fleetwood had feared to provoke the usurper by it, and therefore purposely withheld it from him.

Vane at once published it. The writs for the new Parliament came out at the same time, and a great excitement arose in many quarters. It was increased by the sudden appearance of another pamphlet, which was attributed also, though not on sufficiently good authority to render it quite certain,† to “Sir Harry Vane.” It was called “England’s Remembrancer,” and its tone was much more violent than that of the Healing Question. Some of the Republicans had been scrupling to act upon Cromwell’s writs, as it would be a recognition of his authority. This pamphlet answered the objection by putting the case of a thief, who, having kept one out of his house for a time, bids him return to it. “Would any of you scruple to go home because the thief had before exercised a power to which he had no right?” “What,” said the author in conclusion, “shall I say more to you, dear Christians and countrymen! Do not the cries of the widows and the fatherless speak? Do not your imprisoned friends speak? Do not your banished neighbours speak? Do not your infringed rights speak? Do not your invaded properties speak? Do not your affronted representatives, who have been trodden upon with scorn, speak?”

Cromwell is recorded to have “trembled” at last. He summoned Vane before the council. The conduct adopted by Vane in consequence, observes the historian of the Commonwealth, “is entitled to particular notice. His high spirit recoiled from the arbitrary proceeding of being summoned, absolutely, and without cause shown, to appear before the council. He had a short time before been second to no man in the island, and, in reality, the principal director of the councils of the Commonwealth. No man was ever more deeply imbued with a Republican spirit; and his high rank and ample fortune* had not exactly prepared him to be commanded by any one. He had now spent some years in retirement, and kept aloof from all cabals and private consults and disquisitions in political matters. His principal family seat was Raby Castle, in the bishopric of Durham; but his more favourite residence appears to have been at Belleau, in the county of Lincoln, where this summons, dated on the 29th of July, reached him on the 4th of August.”

The summons was of the true despotic kind. It was couched in the most unceremonious form, without the word “Sir,” or any term of address at the beginning; and the mandatory clause was expressed simply in the phrase, “you are to attend.”

Thursday, the 12th of August, was the day on which his presence was demanded before the council; but in a note to the president, he stated that it would be impossible for him to be in town till some days later. On the 14th he sent a message signifying that he had that evening arrived at his house at Charing Cross, and was ready to appear when sent for. His attendance was not required till the 21st; and he appears to have been merely questioned as to the authorship of the tract entitled “A Healing Question,” which he admitted to be his, and was suffered to leave the council. An order was then made in these words: “Sir Henry Vane having this day appeared before the council, and they having taken consideration of a seditious book by him written and published, entitled ‘A Healing Question, &c.,’ tending to the disturbance of the present government and the peace of the Commonwealth, ordered that, if he shall not give good security in bond for £5000 by Thursday next [in the warrants of September 4, entered in the council books, it stands Tuesday], to do nothing to the prejudice of the present government and the peace of the Commonwealth, he shall stand committed.”† Upon this order being sent to him, he wrote for answer that he could on no account comply with what was required, and by his own act do that which might blemish or bring in question his innocence, and the goodness of the cause for which he suffered. He farther said, “I am well content to take this as a mark of honour from those who sent it, and as the recompense of my former services;” and added, with a terrible significance, “I cannot but observe in this proceeding with me how exactly they tread in the steps of the late king, whose design being to set the government free from all restraint of laws as to our persons and estates, and to render the monarchy absolute, thought he could employ no better means to effect it than by casting into obloquy and disgrace all those who desired to preserve the laws and liberties of the nation.” He concluded thus: “It is with no small grief to be

* The whole of the treatise will be found in the Appendix (A) at the end of this article. The reader is particularly referred to it.

† He stated this himself, without mentioning Fleetwood’s name, in a letter he wrote to the council on being questioned before them.

† Thurloe’s State Papers, v., 242.

* The recent death of his father had placed him in possession of the family estates.

† “Proceeds of the Protector (so called) and Council against Sir Henry Vane,” p. 1-4.

lamented that the evil and wretched principles by which the late king aimed to work out his design should now revive and spring up under the hands of men professing godliness."

Cromwell appears to have been brought to a stand for some little while by this high resolution and courage. Fourteen days were suffered to elapse before a warrant was made out, directing the sergeant-at-arms to apprehend Vane, and conduct him to the Isle of Wight; another was sent to the governor of the island to receive him as a prisoner, and not to suffer any one to speak to him but in the presence of an officer.*

No public reason, it is to be observed, was given for this step. The English people were left to suppose, when they saw this great statesman sent by the Protector's order to a dungeon, that he had committed some terrible crime. In vain had Sir Henry declared himself a member of the Long Parliament, which had never been legally dissolved, and claimed the privilege of security from personal arrest. He was seized by Cromwell's officers, sent to the island on the 9th of September, and committed to Carisbrook Castle, the very prison in which Charles I. had been confined during the last year of his life. The remark of Mr. Godwin on this infamous proceeding may fitly close the account of it.

"Henry Cromwell describes Vane as one of the most rotten members of the community.† Such was not apparently the opinion of the Protector. He pays a high compliment to his victim, at the same time that he casts a burning disgrace on his own government, when he fairly states the tract in question as the sole ground for taking the author into custody, and sending him into confinement in the southernmost point of England. It was clearly confessing that they had no charge against him, that his conduct had been altogether irreproachable, and that he was placed under restraint for an unlimited time for having given his advice to his countrymen and their governors at a most critical period, in a style of exemplary temperance and sobriety. What must be the government of a country when the first men in it are liable to such treatment, and no other accusation is pretended to be brought against them!"

But this "conscience doth make cowards of us all," and the once brave and gallant Cromwell, driven to the cowardice of this oppression against Vane, as little dared to keep him long a prisoner. He was released from Carisbrook on the 31st of December, 1656.

The Parliament which had met meanwhile will be hereafter (in the life of Marten) alluded to. Conspiracies once again surrounded Cromwell, and his anticipated crown was dashed from his hands. The "Healing Question" was read continually at private meetings,‡ and discontent and danger lodged everywhere. The Protector strove to hide his troubles in every kind of fantastic resource, and to conceal pistols always upon his person; but both were pretty well ascertained by this time, and he had lost all pity, and sacrificed all esteem.

Still Vane remained to torture and be tortured. His influence perceptible everywhere, Cromwell, afraid to assault his liberty again, resolved, if he could, to strip him of his property, harass him by constant vexation, and thus compel him at last to submit to his government. With this view, measures were adopted to involve his estates in the meshes of the law. The attorney-general was employed to discover or invent flaws in the titles by which they were held. Bills were filed in the Exchequer, and legal proceedings of various kinds were instituted. At the same time, he was given to understand, that if he would support the government, all these measures should be stopped. In this way the whole power of Cromwell was brought to bear upon him; every art was used; and it was systematically and deliberately attempted, by a kind of slow torture, to wring from him his great fortune, and, by reducing him to poverty, to humble and break his spirit—but to no purpose. Among the faithless he was still found faithful: when all others proved false, he stood by his principles and redeemed his pledges. When hope had been driven from the heart of every other Republican, he did not despair or despond for a moment; when the name of liberty had become a proverb, a by-word, a reproach throughout the world, and its cause seemed utterly and forever lost, his allegiance never faltered, and his spirit was filled with a "serene and undoubting confidence in its final triumph, which neither prisons, nor chains, nor the scaffold could shake or impair."

In the interval which now intervened before the death of Cromwell, he appears to have written various matters. On the appearance of Harrington's "Oceana" he addressed a letter to him, which was published, entitled, "A needful Corrective or Balance in popular Government." He also published a theological work, entitled, "Of the Love of God, and Union with God;" and other learned treatises, chiefly on points of religion, were issued by him at this time.

Oliver Cromwell died on the anniversary of his great days of Worcester and Dunbar, the 3d of September, 1658, and writs for a Parliament were at once issued by the council of his son and successor, Richard Cromwell, returnable on the 27th of the following January. The people kept quiet and waited the issue. Upon this Parliament, it was understood, it would rest to effect a settlement of the form of government, and so far to determine the fortunes of the nation. It was the natural consequence of this impression that the election of its mem-lated in Thurloe: "His highness, accompanied only by the secretary, and a few of his gentlemen and servants, went to take the air in Hyde Park, where he caused a few dishes of meat to be brought, and made his dinner; after dinner the thought took him to drive his own coach, to which there were harnessed six fine horses, that had been sent him as a present by the Count of Oldenburgh. He accordingly put Thurloe into the coach, and himself mounted the box. For some time he drove very well; but by-and-by, using the whip a little too violently, the horses set off at full speed. The postillion, endeavouring to hold them in, was thrown; and, soon after, Cromwell himself was precipitated from the box, and fell upon the pole, and from thence to the ground. His foot got entangled with the harness, and he was so carried along a good way, during which a pistol went off in his pocket [a proof that he was never without firearms]. At length his foot got clear, and he escaped, the coach passing along without injuring him." He was confined with the consequences of the accident for two or three weeks.

* "Order Book" of the council of state.

† Thurloe, iv., 509.

‡ Ib., 185.

§ A curious incident which occurred on the 29th of September may illustrate the remark of the text. It is thus rebers became the occasion of the highest possible interest throughout the country. By the result of those elections, the struggle between the two great parties would be brought to a decision and a close. It is a proof of the fear which shook the residents of Whitehall, that the old and corrupt system of election was restored by them on this occasion.

Farther, and in no less memorable proof of their fear, they held it an object of paramount importance to prevent the election of Sir Henry Vane to the ensuing Parliament, and resorted to the most extraordinary and extreme measures to keep him out. He offered himself at Kingston-upon-Hull, of which place he claimed, as of right, to be considered the lawful representative, having sat as such in the Long Parliament. His right was confirmed by the electors; he was rechosen by a full majority of their votes; but the managers of the election, being creatures of Richard Cromwell's party, in defiance of justice and public sentiment, gave the certificate of election to another: Vane was determined not to be defeated by such means; he therefore proceeded to Bristol, entered a canvass, and received a majority of the votes. Here, also, the same bold and impudent outrage was committed by the officers; and others whose names stood below his on the poll-books were declared to be elected. He still persevered, and was finally returned from Whitechurch in Hampshire.

On the 27th of January Vane once more took his seat in the House of Commons. The terror his presence inspired among what was called the "court" party was only a little counterbalanced by the "packed House" they had managed to get together. They had named the Scotch and Irish representatives, and commanded the votes of actual and expectant placemen, for the most part lawyers, to the amount of 170. There were, besides, about 100 Moderates, Waiters upon Providence, and masked Royalists. The number of Republicans to set against all this were only 40, but they were headed by Vane, and ranked among them the names of Ludlow, Scot, and Bradshaw. Therefore the "court" trembled still.

They soon found that they had good reason for trembling. It was well understood among the Republicans that the first proceeding would be to confirm the government of Richard, and to sanction the House of Peers which his father had created. Vane had organized a small but resolute opposition to these measures with masterly power and skill. Their consultations before entering the House were always held at his residence at Charing Cross; he managed their debates in the House itself with the consummate genius of a popular leader, and was supported with infinite resolution and energy by Scot and Ludlow. The court party had, indeed, good reason to tremble.

His first great display against Richard Cromwell was on the debate upon the question of a recognition of his "undoubted" right, founded on the "Petition and Advice" of the late Protector. On the 9th of February, 1659, having reserved himself to a late day, after the usages of the more eminent and influential Parliamentary speakers in all times, "Sir Harry Vane" rose, and spoke thus. The speech includes so many matters of importance, is so masterly an evidence of Vane's power, and embraces such an interesting sketch of his political experiences, that the reader will wish it longer even than it is.

"I know very well the great disadvantage that any person suffers, that in this great and grave assembly shall, at this time of day, offer you anything. You have spent three days in the debate, and it is not unsuitable to your wisdom to be yet on the threshold. The more time you have taken, the more successful, probably, it may be.

"That which called me up at this time was what the last gentleman said, that is, to do things with unity. At least we shall be at greater unity, if not greater amity, by having patience to hear one another, and admitting the variety of reasons and judgments which are offered by all men. Though a large field has been led into, the thing is very short. Consider what it is we are upon—a protector in the office of chief magistrate. But the office, of right, is in yourselves. It is in your hands, that you may have the honour of giving or not giving, as best likes you. You may confer it, if you please, for any law to the contrary brought now into your House. I shall advise you to this, as was moved: give not by wholesale, so as to beg again by retail. To give will at any time get you many friends. It therefore concerns you in this business to have your eyes in your heads, to look well about you, that it slip not from you without considering what is your right, and the right of the people.

"The wise providence of God has brought things, in these our days, to the state of government as we now find it. I observe a variety of opinions as to what our state of government is. Some conceive that it is in king, Lords, and Commons; that the principles of old foundations yet remain entire, so that all our evils, indeed, are imputed to our departure from thence.

"It hath pleased God, by well-known steps, to put a period, and to bring that government to a dissolution. All the three Parliaments in the late king's time found the state of things in slavery. I have had some experience since the two Parliaments in 1640, and remember, when the Parliament considered the state of the nations, that they found them in a grand thralldom of oppression and tyranny, endeavouring to carry us up even into popery. God made us see the state and condition we were then in. The consideration of these things would have made us make long sweeps to redress it; but Providence led us on step by step. Therefore, having the legislative power, God saw it good that we should change the government; but we found great difficulties in the work, as most men were willing rather to sit down by slavery than to buy themselves out of it at so great a price.

"The first thing expected was, that justice should be done upon delinquents, who had so much the ear of that prince, that they told him he had power enough to protect himself and them too. He had the power of the militia. These grievances brought us to consider where the right of the militia lay; and when we saw it was in ourselves, we thought to make use of it with moderation, choosing rather to use it to reduce the king by fair means than otherwise.

"So well satisfied was this House then with the principles of that government, that there was then a declaration drawn in favour of it. I was one of that committee. I hear reflections as if I changed from that. I think it none my duty to change with better reason. They did think fit to publish that which was to preserve that ancient fabric of government, according to such qualifications as might be for the public service. I am well satisfied it was the clear intent of their hearts. But this encouraged the king, and brought it to that issue at last that he hardened his heart, till it was resolved to make no more addresses, but to bring him to judgment. But, in the mean time, applications were made to him, still imploring him to be reconciled; and nothing was wanting in the House, that, if possible, he might have saved the government, and himself with it; but God would not have it so. God knows best what that work is which he is to bring forth. When all applications could not prevail, they thought fit to bring the king to judgment; thereby the state of affairs was much altered.

"This House then thought fit to apply themselves to the Lords against the Scots' invasion, and in the great case of justice upon the king. The Lords refused both. In this juncture, they were reduced to the necessity of doing that which is now the foundation of that building upon which you must stand if you expect to be prosperous. When they came to look upon the delinquency of the king, and considered him as an object of justice, it was declared by them that the taking away of kingship was the only happy way of returning to their own freedom. Their meaning thereby was, that the original of all just power was in the people, and was reserved wholly to them, the representatives.

"When the Parliament, in questions as to what was just and right, had gathered up all into themselves, it was disputed in what way the king should be tried. They counted themselves then prepared to grant out a commission to try the king. I confess I was then exceedingly to seek, in the clearness of my judgment, as to the trial of the king. I was for six weeks absent from my seat here, out of my tenderness of blood; yet, all power being thus in the people originally, I myself was afterward in the business.

"The king upon his trial denies this power to be in the Parliament: they try it, and they seal it with the blood of the king. This action of theirs was commanded by this House to be recorded in all the courts of Westminster Hall, and in the Tower. If you be not now satisfied with this business, you will put a strange construction upon that action, and upon all that has been done by the general and soldiers. If you, here, will now doubt this right to be in you, you draw the guilt upon the body of the whole nation. You join issue with him upon that point. It will be questioned whether that was an act of justice or murder.

"Brought step by step unto your natural right by an unavoidable necessity, that little remnant of the Parliament were now the representative of the nation, springing up from another root. This had a more clear foundation, being thus the supreme judicature, to comprehend all government in itself. Whether the death of the king caused not a dissolution of that Parliament, as to that doing it then had, and as it was taken to be, I know not: I leave that to the long robe.

"It was then necessary, as the first act, to have resort to the foundation of all just power, and to create and establish a free state, to bring the people out of bondage from all pretence of superiority over them. It seemed plain to me that all offices had their rise from the people, and that all should be accountable to them. If this be monstrous, then it is monstrous to be safe and rational, and to bear your own good.

"It is objected that this nation could not bear that government; but Holland bears it against the power of Orange. They keep the office of stadtholder vacant to this day: so do other places. This is a principle that we may bear it, if we can bear our own liberties, or, that if we have not the importance of the people of Israel: unless, with the Israelites, we will return to Egypt, weary of our journey to Canaan.

"This being the case, we were declared a free state. We were after tossed upon all those billows that sunk us in the sands. Though we miscarried then, though this free state was shipwrecked, yet you have got a liberty left to say it is now again in your possession, else I am mistaken. If it be so, I hope you will not part with it but upon grounds of wisdom and fidelity. If you were but arbitrating in the cause of a private friend, you would make the best bargain for him that you could: you would so do as not to give away the right of him by whom you were intrusted but upon good grounds. That which you give, give it freely on grounds of justice: understand well your terms.

"This brings me to the consideration of another thing, which is, that the first government being dissolved, another is brought into the room. Though not perfect, yet it is said the foundations are laid, upon which we may build a superstructure of which we need not be ashamed. Now, SHALL WE BE UNDER-BUILDERS TO SUPREME STUART? We have no need, no obligation upon us to return to that old government. I have a vote.

"For the covenant with the Scots, their invasion did render that covenant invalid. They would have repossessed a king and imposed him upon this nation by virtue of that covenant which they had broken. The Parliament showed that their shackles were broken; it did not oblige any farther. That it was famous and had power! That was the Israelites' argument for worshipping the sun and moon. If we return to an obligation by virtue of the covenant, by the same reason we may return to worship the sun and moon. I hope those shall not sway here.

"Lastly, at the dissolution of the Long Parliament, you lost your possession, not your right. The chief magistrate's place was assumed without a law. There was assumed with it, not only the power of the crown on the terms of former kings, which hath its foundation and regulation by the laws, but the possession was assumed. You were then under various forms of administration: some that had not the characters of trust upon them; some too limited. Still, you were kept out of possession. Parliaments have been called, and as often broken.

"This 'Petition and Advice,' which is now so much insisted upon, was never intended to be the settled government, but only to be a pair of stairs to ascend the throne; a step to king, Lords, and Commons. It pleases God to let you see you have not been ill counselled to wait upon him a first day, and a second, and a third day, to see what he will hold out for your peace and safety for asserting the liberties of the people. This bill huddles up in wholesale what you have fought for, and is hasted on lest you should see it.

"We have now a 'Petition and Advice' that comes in place of the ancient government, the 'instrument,' and all other forms. Yet, if this were the case, you are, notwithstanding the Petition and Advice, in the clear, rightful possession of this government, which cannot be disposed of but by your consent. The old Protector thought it fit to have it given him from you, and had it, by your pleasure, invested upon him; but, although it was acknowledged that he had power to get it, yet he thought fit to make it your free gift. It will not be denied now. A presenting this office by that Parliament, and the open investiture of him in your chair, prove it. Yet, as to this gift of yours, I dare be bold to say, the thing given was hardly understood. By giving of this office, they gave, in the 16th article, the power of their own dissolution!

"It being acknowledged to have been your gift, let us consider what was given, and how given.

"The gift was the executive power, the ruling power: that is, the office of chief magistrate. All the Legislature was then in the people. The Commonwealth would not put the executive power out of their hands. For this reason, they set up those shadows, the keepers of the liberties of England, as an executive power, to distinguish it from the Legislature. This, then, was the thing given, and this the Petition and Advice hath made a difficulty of returning! The power of the purse, indeed, is left us, because they know not how to take it from us. There is no dispute but you have a right to open the people's purse, because kings knew they could not well take it; but the chief magistrate! they would not allow you that to give!

"Now this power and the office were given, it seems, by the regulation of the Petition and Advice; the whole executive power of the late king was all given, at one clap, to the late Protector for life. This being given to him, was not given absolutely to any other for life. Nothing was given him more, only the nomination and declaration of a successor, which must be according to law. So says the Petition and Advice. This nomination must first appear before we can say this gentleman is the undoubted Protector. Had I thought this had been said before, I should have spared both you and myself.

"That which is now brought in, the bill of recognition, takes it for granted that there is no one in possession of the Protectorship; for it requires that you acknowledge his right and title, not that we should acknowledge his person, and then inquire what is this right and title. It is hard we should be put upon that. Let us know what this right and title is that we must recognise. But it seems the Parliament that made the petition and advice, they gave it, and we must acknowledge it!

"If he hath any right, it must be by one of these three ways: 1. Either by the grace of God and by God's providence, that if he hath a sword, he may take whatever is within the reach of it, and thus maintain his right. 2. Or as the son of the conqueror. He was, indeed, a conqueror on your behalf, but never of yourselves fit for you to recognise. 3. Or, lastly, by the Petition and Advice. But that cannot be urged until it doth appear that he hath it according to that. Yet that is only a nomination, which hath nothing of constitution until you have made it. He must come to you for that. I appeal, then, if this has not deserved three days' debate. Deserves it not more to set nails upon it! May it not deserve a grand committee, to convince one another in love and unity?

"Therefore I shall move that this bill may, upon the whole matter, be committed to a grand committee, where reason may prevail.

"It is not a sudden recognition, a sudden obtaining of the first steps, that will direct us fairly into the room. It must be on an unshaken foundation that you can ever hope to maintain it against the old line. If you be minded to resort to the old government, you are not many steps from the old family. THEY WILL BE TOO HARD FOR YOU IF THAT GOVERNMENT BE RESTORED.

"Instead of the son of a conqueror by nature, make him a son by adoption. Take him into your own family, and make him such a one as the great One shall direct you. When the army see that they are yours, they will be protected by you.

"I would have all names of sectaries laid aside, and righteousness go forward. Let fees and extortions be looked into, which make the laws themselves your oppressors. I have discharged my conscience, and look on it as a special testimony of God's providence that I am here to speak this before you."

Vane's retirement had not impaired his powers! It is impossible to imagine, from this outline, a speech more able in itself, or better adapted to the purpose and position of the speaker; yet history still excludes such speeches from her consideration in treating of the questions they refer to.*

The Republicans were beaten, however, upon the extreme question, and, it being resolved to have the government vested in a "single person," Vane was driven to make the hardest fight he could for an extreme limitation of his power. On the 18th of February he addressed the House on this point.

"I would have the nature of the thing opened at little, that is to be the occasion of the farther debate. I shall offer you my thoughts preparatively. You are now bounding the chief magistrate.

* This, and the other masterly efforts of Vane I shall shortly quote, were published about ten years ago in "Burton's Diary," by Mr. Towill Rutt. They have not been noticed since.

"The office of chief magistrate hath something in it essential, and which must be inviolably kept for him for the necessary preservation of the good of the whole, and the administration of justice.

"But it hath also something superfluous, and very chargeable. Such as are: 1. A thing called kingly power, which implies the whole affair of monarchy and prerogative, which are great occasions of vain expenses and waste all the nation over. Lay aside this state of kingly power, and keep your chief magistrate. 2. The power of the chief magistrate as to the negative voice: The denying it by you to the chief magistrate as by the law of the nation now set up is fit and requisite. When all these things are in our power, must we dispute it over again between the people and the chief magistrate?

"The chief magistrate pretends to a power, not only of executing laws, but to enact laws; whereas it is the right of all to bind themselves, and to make those laws by which they are to be ruled. If corporations, or any society of men, have a right to make by-laws, surely much more hath this House, which is the representative of the body of the nation. If the interest of the whole nation should lie at one man's door, it were worse than in the meanest corporation, especially to serve a single person, or the interest of a few courtiers or flatterers.

"Thus it should be, that he should not deny what you find to be for your good. This our laws have declared that the single person ought to grant: leges quas vulgus elegerit. It was urged by Lord Fiennes, who drew the declaration, that it was undeniable that the king should not deny laws.

"This, therefore, is of so great concernment, agreeable to the law of nature and the constitution of the nation. It was before—though, if it were not, it is now—in your power. Great weight was laid upon it in all propositions of peace, and so much weight depends upon it as in the proportion of restraining or binding of power it ought to be a principal ingredient. The chief magistrate may do well without it.

"On the other side, I would have him possess all things needful to his acting for the people; all the power to draw in the public spirits of the nation to a public interest; but not power to do them or you any hurt. This is to make him more like God himself, who can do none. Flatterers will tell him otherwise; but they that wish his safety and honour will agree that he shall have power to do everything that is good, and nothing that is hurtful. It is therefore necessary so to bind him as he may grow up with the public interest.

"It was offered that the militia and negative voice be included in the vote of your chief magistrate. Then it was answered that the previous vote provided that nothing should be binding. It was then allowed the reason. Why is that reason denied now? That Parliament that made the other House surely had the legislative. They must either own that the legislative power was in that House, else nothing passed to them. If it stand not on that Constitution, then it must stand on the old Constitution.

"I shall clear it that we are going to settle that which is fallacious. It will strip you at one time and at one breath. You make void all your former expressions, which to me is as clear as day. If they can do none of those things till they have set up a co-ordinate power, then you can pass nothing here, but must have their concurrence. Pass this, and you will have that brought in upon you from the other House, that will confirm the single person in all things that concern him, and so your own liberties are left at loose. If you have a mind to do aught for the people, do it clearly. Pronounce your judgment, that the chief magistrate shall have no negative upon the people assembled in Parliament. Do this, else I shall take it for granted that you will have no fruit of your debate, and that you intend nothing for the people.

The people—still the people! for them he had struggled his whole life through, and still his hopes and objects were fixed alone on them.

The next effort Vane made against Richard was aimed at him through his administration. On February 21, Secretary Thurloe moved the order of the day for going into details connected with the war, and asked the immediate sanction of the House to the preparation of such shipping and forces as might be necessary to promote the success of a mediation in the affairs of the kings of Sweden and Denmark in relation to the Baltic Sea, and to the command of the Sound, wherein Sweden was to be assisted by England, and Denmark by the Dutch. Upon this proposition, very peremptorily urged, Vane rose and said,

"I am yet perplexed in my thoughts; therefore I shall only mind you of the old order in Parliament. Upon such reports as this, or letters, or messages from the king, we never looked upon them the same day, but had a jealousy and suspicion of some court design in them, to engage us in such rash designs before we knew where we were.

"I do not say there is any such thing now, but it looks like some such thing. I told you, at first, that I feared matter of money was our chief concern. I fear still the same thing is now intended, in that we must not have leave to sleep so much as one night upon it. We must give a million of money by a side wind! Sure we must find out this money, and yet we must not sleep upon it! I dare not think of the sad consequence of this, unless your wisdoms will disintricate you in it.

"It hath been the great wisdom of princes, that heretofore have had to do with the House of Commons, who see not at first the sad consequences of things, to make a war, and then presently to make a peace, and then put up the money that was given them towards the pretended war. I do not say such things are now, but I desire we may sleep upon this at least forty-eight hours.

"I perceive many things are taken for granted; of which I am not yet fully satisfied: 1. That the King of Denmark must be dispossessed. 2. That we must fit ourselves to take possession of some part of it, like birds of prey. 3. That Holland is your enemy already.

"If it be our interest that Sweden should be emperor of the Baltic Seas, I should be very glad to understand how.

"France may, perhaps, be willing to engage us in this quarrel; and when we are engaged, he will be as fit to bridge over somebody else as any other. I move for Thursday or Friday."

The government were here assailed in a weak point, and were at last obliged to give way. Three days after Vane again spoke to the same question, in answer to Thurlow. He insisted on a series of gross errors that had been committed, in promoting peace with Holland instead of war, in stirring up war with Spain instead of settling peace, and in flinging English influence at the feet of the most despotical minister of Europe, the Cardinal Mazarin.

"We are not yet at the bottom. Many considerable things have been offered in the last matter of fact by Mr. Secretary.

"What is declared is to me very satisfactory. He assures us there is no engagement, nothing of any private treaty between us and the Swede, that he knows of. But may there not be an underhand, secret treaty, that he knows not of? I have heard something to that purpose, and upon very good intelligence, that there is an engagement.

"If the good providence of God had not interrupted it, I believe the question had not now been to have been decided by you. The fleet should have gone long since, but it was prevented; and if it had gone, this debate had been determined before this time. But I shall not go upon that ground, but only upon the grounds that are offered, and suit my discourse to that.

"The coalition with that state, the Dutch, if it had been well pursued, you had shut out all correspondence with the Spanish interest.

"I am not able to see through it, nor to understand how the whole style of managing the peace with Holland, and war with Spain, hath been agreeable at all to the interest of the state, but rather very much to the interest of a single person.

"The interest then used, and the endeavouring to bring the two nations to a coalition, which had made a great progress, would have drawn off the States wholly from the Spanish interest, which now mingles much in their counsels; and if that had been then followed home, it would have made that state at that time wholly yours. If, when you sent ten thousand men to Jamaica, where you have left your dead men to your reproach, you had sent the same fleet to the Sound and fallen upon the Dutch, that would have done your business. You might have been a great way in Germany, and have made an emperor there yourself.

"That which increases my jealousy is, that I see this affair all along managed but to support the interest of a single person, and not for the public good, the people's interest.

"Our counsels have been mingled with France, and taken from the cardinal, who goeth upon the most tyrannical principles of government in the world. The French put us upon this remote design; and out of that bow, I doubt, comes this shaft, to be sent into the Sound. Looks not this like a principle of Cardinal Mazarin, for your single person to get a fleet into his hands?

"I know no reason you have to send a fleet indefinitely, implicitly upon this design. The Swede is absolute possessor of both sides of the Sound, and he will make sure of the passage too, if you do but assist him; and when he hath it, he must either give it you by new treaty, or you must take it out of his hands by force.

"When one half was in the Dane's hands, and the other in the Swede's, it was then best for us, for we might be as necessary to the Dane as any other. And now France, when they see an opportunity, can easily resent former injuries. This business is not fit to be so openly debated; it requires more secrecy.

"A twofold necessity has been thought of, and is put upon you: 1. It is not to be delayed till to-morrow. That will be too late. This is the very nick of time, and they put it upon you with so great necessity, that all other arguments must receive no favour. 2. You must transmit wholly to the disposal of your single person to do what he pleases. There is nothing lost in the preparations of the fleet. Your officers, I believe, are all commissioned upon that presumption, that the militia is already in him. Naught will satisfy unless the militia be granted in the single person within twenty-four hours.

"In answer to the objection: 1. The vote will not seclude us, unless the disposal be in the single person, and by that you give away implicitly the power of the militia before you have asserted your own right or taken it upon yourselves. Oh! but you make the single person no other than a committee-man!

"Yet, though loath to own it, lest you come to a commonwealth again, so dangerous, not so much as advice will be admitted!

"2. And as you do not assert your right in the militia, so you do not assert your interest, or take that part of it that belongs to you in the very business before you. You must have the persons' names brought in to you to be approved. It is told you, you are not able here to make or manage peace or war! your commander-in-chief must do it. I hope you will express your interest as well as a declaration. Assert the practice as well as the right of the militia. Be assured of the faithfulness of the Commonwealth; first, of those persons that you send. I hope you will have an able commander, and one that hath given good testimony of his good affection towards you.

"3. You must at one day give up all the interest in the militia upon the necessity that is urged upon you; the necessity that it must be done in this manner, and no other way.

"You have better methods! 1. Assert your militia to be in you. 2. Refer it to your commissioners to see that no delay be in it. 3. Have your officers before you, and approve of them. 4. Appoint a committee of your own to advise about disposing of this to the most public advantage."

This speech produced a very great effect. Its last recommendations in especial were most subtly and effectively aimed. They revived the old disputes between the Long Parliament and Charles, which had so many significant associations connected with them, and brought back in its full force the startling question he had put to them in his previous speech of the 9th of February, "SHALL WE BE UNDER-BUILDERS TO SUPREME STUART?" Shall we lay the foundation of a system that must bring a "Charles the Second" back to us sooner or later?

Some days after this, on the 1st of March, 1658, we accordingly find the old dispute upon the source of Richard's power, the famous "Petition and Advice" to bind the present Parliament, and the propriety of admitting of the title of the "other House" (as the miserable assembly of Lords was contemptuously called), again in discussion. Vane's speech ran thus :

"The more I consider this, the more difficult I meet with. I have my eye upon the Petition and Advice; and if you consider how things are left, upon the death of the late Protector, by that Petition and Advice, I am sure, unless you shut your eyes, you may see that you are the undoubted legislative power of the nation, even by that Constitution by which you are called, and the Protector himself proclaimed.

"1. You know, when the Recognition was pressed, how much it was urged that the Protector should be made out to be so, according to the Petition and Advice, namely, by due nomination, which hath never been done unto this day. The declaration of his highness appears not !

"Admit that he was duly nominated himself; yet there is no power in that Petition and Advice for this Protector to nominate another House: and that power in him is defective, because it was singly given to the late Protector.

"I would have you first examine whether those now sitting have any foundation, as now called, by that law; there will be no cause of complaint against you by keeping to that rule.

"I understand not that objection that we are shew-shrunk and manacled, and cannot proceed; that we can effect nothing unless we transact with these men. You have as much power to make a House of Lords with the concurrence of the Protector as the last Parliament had.

"I thought you would have gone to clear the rights and liberties of the people, and to have passed that between you and his highness, without owning the other House.

"Sir, we have as much power as those that made the Petition and Advice. It is but the using of the just power. We are wandering and cannot find the door, so great and wilful blindness is upon us. It has pleased God to confound us in our debates, that we cannot, in a third, come to a question, because we wander from our Constitution.

"Cannot we despatch the business of this Parliament, and leave the other House alone till next Parliament? Why may it not be left till then? Keep but true to the things you have already. I know not how we are limited. Discourse abroad says your vote is with them. How it comes, I know not!

"It will be told you next that a House of Commons is unnecessary, and out of your ruins the Seventy shall be built up! Consider clearly whether this House now sitting have any foundation, by this calling, to sit upon the Petition and Advice. If they have not, I think you are as fit to advise about calling them as the council that called them."

Six days later, these questions assumed a more serious shape, and a very long and arduous debate was taken on the question of recognising this House of Lords, which Secretary Thurloe, with amazing assurance, urged was as much entitled to existence under the "Petition and Advice" as the House of Commons or the protectorate. This called up Vane, who gave way to greater passion, and even fierceness of manner, than he had ever shown before. The terrible intensity of every word in this speech is truly astonishing.

"I am very sorry to trouble you so late. Could I satisfy myself with these grounds that have been offered, I should not trouble you.

"If you pass in the negative, all the power is here. If the contrary, I dare say then all the power is gone hence.

"I conceive, in passing this in the negative, you do bring all power into this House, but not into that way of a commonwealth.

"When the power of king or House of Lords is melted down into this House, it is in the people by the law of nature and reason. Death, and tract of time, may melt it and bring it down, but this shall never die. Where is then the anarchy, the sneaking oligarchy?

"The representative body never dies, whoever die. Provision is made for it. By the law of the land, they could have come together if there had been no protector de facto. You are ever thus.

"You have voted a protector de facto, and put it in a way of a bill, to put it de jure, and I hear no arguments now against it!

"The question is not now whether the Petition and Advice shall be a law, but whether it shall be so far as it is argued to be a law; or whether it be not a lame law, to bring in king, Lords, and Commons, insensibly.

"It was told you by Mr. Attorney, of the duchy, that this was a restitution. But it is not told you how the power came into the hands of your old servants, that turned you out of doors.

"As to the Petition and Advice, they declared here that it was made elsewhere; and they gave you no more than they thought fit—a mere show!

"A new family; one peer in the room of another; and here's face about again!

"Consider the fate of that king. I wonder to hear arguments of force used.

"If you pass this, you pass all. The question is as catching as that of the French king. When I consider how comprehensive this question is, I wonder how it should be thought to pass in the affirmative.

"1. You admit this 'House' to be a rightful house, upon the same rightful foot with yourself. You admit them to be fit and meet persons, and that this is for the good of the people.

2. You set up a means to perpetuate an arbitrary power over you, to lay yourselves aside, and make you forever useless—I may say odious forever!

"You settle £130,000 per annum, such as never was done. You have granted the excise and customs forever, and farmed them in such a way as to make the people cry out their governors are very unnatural. The people would never part with customs. You can relieve no grievances.

"Formerly you might have gone alone. Possession—you see how far it goes.

"The sore is, they are afraid that you should go alone to his highness and complain of his sneaking counsellors!

"God is almighty!

"Will not you trust him with the consequences? He that has unsettled a monarchy of so many descents in peaceable times, and brought you to the top of your liberties, though he drive you back for a while into the wilderness, he will bring you back. He is a wiser workman than to reject his own work.

"Go you on to advise with his highness. Advise him, in his tender years, of the mal-administration! I know no hinderance but you may transact with his highness alone, and agree of 'another House' in the best way for the good of the nation."

The effect of this speech was so great, that upon an actual division of the English members it is thought the Republicans must have won the day. The Scotch and Irish nominees of the crown once more turned the balance against them.

Against these nominees Vane now directed his assaults. On the 9th of March he startled the House by telling them that in present circumstances they were no House, and that "they had been out of order ever since they sat." Upon a point of order he rose and said,

"I could not attend you yesterday in your great debate. If I understand anything of order, you have been out of order ever since you sat. Till this was cleared, you ought to have done naught but choose your speaker.

"It arises thus to me. As your question was last Parliament whether you would keep out so many members as that those that were in might make the Petition and Advice, now the question is whether you shall take in so many as are not members that may confirm it. You propose to transact with those persons here that have no foundation, that you may transact with persons that have no law to be another House. By this means you have subverted your own foundation. Your wisdom will be concerned in it to part with a prize in your hands that you know not how to manage. Again, it must be considered that they should withdraw while this debate is afoot. Otherwise they will hang upon you perpetually as a negative. As you lay your foundation, so will the weight of it be. You will look for peace, and have none.

"The vote for the single person passed with the greatest unanimity that ever was. When a man is asleep, he finds no hunger till he wake. I doubt the people of England will be hungry when they awake!

"A greater imposition never was by a single person upon a Parliament, to put 60 votes upon you. By this means, it shall be brought upon you insensibly to vote by Scotch and Irish members, to enforce all your votes hereafter."

It is a remarkable proof of the surpassing influence of Vane and the party he chiefly represented in this House, that notwithstanding even these nominees, and all the scandalous resources which had been employed to influence the elections, the Republicans actually managed in the end to achieve a majority upon the omission of the word "undoubted" from the recognition of the Protector's title.

The last speech I shall notice in Burton's Diary of this Parliament attests Vane's impartial justice and humanity. A petition had been presented to the House on the part of seventy persons, Royalist prisoners, who had some years before been sent to Barbadoes. It appears that when they arrived, after much ill-treatment, at the place of their destination, they were sold in the public market. It was alleged, however, in answer to the petition, by some of the Protector's party, that their slavery was limited to five years, and that a distinction was made in favour of their condition above that of the negroes who worked in the cultivation and preparation of sugar. These face-making friends of liberty protested, besides, that these men had basely resisted the cause of the right faith, and deserved extreme punishment. Most admirably did Vane answer them. A better retort was never made, nor was ever the distinction between hostilities, public and private, or between sincere enemies and false friends, more exquisitely given. The allusion from Lucretius, at the close, is in perfect keeping with the whole.

"I do not look on this business as a cavalierish business, but as a matter that concerns the liberty of the freeborn people of England.

"To be used in this barbarous manner, put under hatches, to see no light till they came thither, and sold there for £100—such was the case of this Thomas!

"I am glad to hear the old cause so well resented; that we have a sense and loathing of the tyranny of the late king, and of all that tread in his steps, to impose on liberty and property! As I should be glad to see any discouragement upon the Cavaliers, so I should be glad to see any discouragement and indignation of yours against such persons as tread in Charles Stuart's steps, whoever they be. The end of the major-generals was good as to keeping down that party, but the precedent was dangerous.

"Let us not be led away. Whenever the tables turn, the same will be imposed upon your best men that is now designed to the worst. There is a fallacy and subtlety on both hands. I would have you be as vigilant against that party as you can; but if you find the liberty and property of the people of England thus violated, take occasion from these ill precedents to make good laws.

"That which makes me hate the Cavaliers is their cause, and when I see others hate their cause, I shall believe them that they hate their persons. I detest and abhor them as much as any. Let us not have new Cavaliers and old. Let us hate it in those that tread in their steps as well as in themselves. Be not cozened by popularity on the one hand, in complaints of this nature, nor on the other hand swallow up your liberties and properties. Do not that which is bonum only, but bonè."

An extraordinary party, meanwhile, had been formed without the doors of the House. It was supposed, by a large class of the more liberal section of Cromwell's officers, that Vane's objects might at last prevail, such was the irresistible power and energy with which, unsubdued and unrelaxing, he still urged them forward. They now suddenly resolved upon the policy of hastening their achievement by forcing a dissolution of the present corrupt House; and a petition had accordingly been prepared by these men, and was forwarded through the hands of Fleetwood, the young Protector's brother-in-law, and Desborough, his uncle, to Richard, requesting him to dissolve the Parliament. Richard, in alarm, accordingly despatched the keeper of the seal, as he was bidden, to dissolve the Houses; but, having received information of the design, the House of Commons determined not to be dissolved, ordered their doors to be closed, and the gentleman usher of the black rod to be refused the permission of entry. Some of the members abruptly quitted the House. It was voted that the fugitives should be called back, and that no member should henceforth quit his place without leave. The Protector's summons to attend him in the House of Lords was not obeyed; and while the usher unsuccessfully pressed for admittance, it is said* that Vane, resolved to use even this last opportunity of bringing Richard into contempt, rose, and addressed the speaker in these words:

"Mr. Speaker,—Among all the people of the universe, I know none who have shown so much zeal for the liberty of their country as the English at this time have done: they have, by the help of divine Providence, overcome all obstacles, and have made themselves free. We have driven away the hereditary tyranny of the house of Stuart, at the expense of much blood and treasure, in hopes of enjoying hereditary liberty, after having shaken off the yoke of kingship; and there is not a man among us who could have imagined that any person would be so bold as to dare to attempt the ravishing from us that freedom, which cost us so much blood and so much labour. But so it happens, I know not by what misfortune, we are fallen into the error of those who poisoned the Emperor Titus to make room for Domitian, who made away Augustus that they might have Tiberius, and changed Claudius for Nero. I am sensible these examples are foreign from my subject, since the Romans in those days were buried in lewdness and luxury, whereas the people of England are now renowned all over the world for their great virtue and discipline; and yet suffer an idiot without courage, without sense, nay, without ambition, to have dominion in a country of liberty! One could bear a little with Oliver Cromwell, though, contrary to his oath of fidelity to the Parliament, contrary to his duty to the public, contrary to the respect he owed that venerable body from whom he received his authority, he usurped the government. His merit was so extraordinary, that our judgments, our passions, might be blinded by it. He made his way to empire by the most illustrious actions; he had under his command an army that had made him a conqueror, and a people that had made him their general. But as for Richard Cromwell his son, who is he? what are his titles? We have seen that he had a sword by his side; but did he ever draw it? And, what is of more importance in this case, is he fit to get obedience from a mighty nation, who could never make a footman obey him? Yet we must recognise this man as our king, under the style of Protector! a man without birth, without courage, without conduct. For my part, I declare, sir, it shall never be said that I made such a man my master."

Richard Cromwell never appeared in public again. The government continued for a short time to be administered in his name, but he was himself "null and void."

After his formal abdication, which speedily followed, an open coalition was announced between the Republicans and the more liberal division of officers, by the leaders of the respective parties, Vane and Fleetwood. The result of this was the resuscitation of the famous Long Parliament, and the administration of the government, for a short period, on Republican principles. But for many reasons, which need not be discussed here, the cause was soon found hopeless. Upon the subsequent rupture between the Parliament and the officers, Vane adhered to the latter, as the last resource against Monk in favour of a republic, accepted a commission,* and was ultimately, when that inextinguishable Parliament revived itself again, carried under arrest for it into his seat in Lincolnshire. This adhesion to the officers has nevertheless been truly called "one of those acts which prove Vane a sagacious and sound politician." He saw that the Commonwealth could be saved only by union with the army. He detected earlier than any other the designs of Monk, but strove in vain to collect materials for their overthrow. Hazlerig and his silly associates of the Long Parliament were meanwhile in process of cajolement to their heart's content. Vane stayed at Belleau, now confident of the worst; and never at any time had Oliver Cromwell's despotism struck him so with anger or with shame, as when he now reflected on that state of indifference to liberty into which it had brought his countrymen.

I will rapidly sketch the general features of his conduct before his arrest, and then proceed to the "Restoration." During his adhesion to the officers, he was appointed one of the committee of safety, to whom the supreme and entire power of the country was intrusted, until Parliament could make farther arrangements. The authority of this committee was to continue only for eight days. A council of state was subsequently agreed upon, and on the 13th of May he was nominated one of its members. He was also, at that time, chairman of a committee of this council, to whom the whole military and naval force of the country was committed, with power to make all appointments in each branch of the service. Soon afterward a special commission was formed to administer the affairs of the admiralty, and he was placed at its head. In September, 1659, he was made president of the council, and continued to serve in every important trust, as the leading member of committees of safety, and other executive and legislative committees. Upon one of the latter committees, he discharged his last noble effort for the great cause his life had been

* This was made matter of charge against him on his trial. He observed upon it thus: "That which remains of farther charge yet to me is the business of a regiment, an employment which I can in truth affirm mine own inclinations, nature, and breeding little fitted me for, and which was intended only as honorary and titular, with relation to volunteers who, by their application to the council of state, in a time of great commotions, did propound their own officers, and, without any seeking of mine, or my considering any farther of it than as the use of my name, did, among others, nominate me for a colonel, which the council of state approved, granting commissions to myself and all other officers relating thereunto; and the Parliament confirmed my said commission upon report thereof made to them."

* By the authors of the Biographia Britannica, Oldmixon, and others. The speech is not in Burton, because that diary abruptly closes before the day in question.

devoted to, by reporting a bill for the future and permanent settlement of the government, of which the following were the heads:

"1. That the supreme power, delegated by the people to their trustees, ought to be in some fundamentals not dispensed with:" that is, that a Constitution ought to be drawn up and established, specifying the principles by which the successive "trustees," or representatives assembled under it, should be guided and restrained in the conduct of the government, and clearly stating those particulars in which they would not be permitted to legislate or act. 2. One point, which was to be determined and fixed in this Constitution, so that no legislative power should ever be able to alter or move it, was this: "That it is destructive to the people's liberties (to which, by God's blessing, they are fully restored) to admit any earthly king, or single person, to the legislative or executive power over this nation." 3. The only other principle reported as fundamental, and to be placed at the very basis of the Constitution, was this: "That the supreme power is not intrusted to the people's trustees, to erect matters of faith and worship, so as to exercise compulsion therein."

Such services as these, however, were past forever, for the people were now drunk with the orgies of the "Restoration." Upon the occurrence of this event, Vane left his seat in Lincolnshire, and came up to a favourite residence he had at Hampstead, near London.* He was not "conscious of having done anything in relation to public affairs for which he could not willingly and cheerfully suffer." He had taken no share in the trial or death of Charles I., and the new king had graciously promised a wide and merciful indemnity. But in the early part of July, 1660, he was arrested at Hampstead and flung into the Tower.

Lord Clarendon was the author of this measure. A glance at the proceedings by which Vane was excepted from the indemnity shows it beyond the possibility of doubt. Long debates, and many conferences between the two Houses of Parliament, had taken place previously to the passing of that act. The House of Commons proposed to subject to capital punishments those alone who had been immediately concerned in the trial and execution of Charles I., at the same time not exempting other offenders from penalties and forfeitures. The king himself, in a speech addressed to the Lords on the subject of the Act of Indemnity, assured the House that he never had entertained a thought of excepting any besides those immediately concerned in the murder of his father, and begged them not to exclude others from the benefit of the act. This mercy and indulgence, the king said, would be the best way to bring them to repentance, and the safest expedient to prevent future mischief. The House of Lords, however, urged the necessity of excluding Vane, and this was distinctly on Clarendon's suggestion. In one of the conferences, the "Lord-chancellor Hyde" advised the exclusion of Vane as "a man of mischievous activity." The Commons opposed this for some time. At length, after three conferences, they agreed to except him, on a suggestion from the lord-chancellor that the two Houses should petition the king to spare his life. A petition of the two Houses was accordingly presented, praying the king, on behalf of Sir Henry Vane, that if he should be attainted, his execution might be remitted. The king received the petition and granted the request. Even Bishop Burnet admits the king gave a favourable answer, though in general words. On his trial Vane pleaded the royal promise in his defence, and the fact of such a promise was not denied by the counsel for the prosecution. The promise itself was absolutely read in the court.

During these debates the illustrious prisoner had been moved from prison to prison, and was at length immured in a solitary castle on one of the isles of Scilly.

Here he was deliberately kept till a more pliant Parliament could be got together for the purposes of his murder. It is not a harsh expression to use in this case. From the moment of the restoration, Charles and his chancellor had resolved upon the murder of Vane. They procured his exception from the indemnity act by a trick, and now waited till a House of Commons, more slavish and more zealous for royalty than that of the Convention Parliament, could be set on to clamour for his death.

For two years, necessary to the completion of this diabolical plan, he was kept a prisoner; and here, on Scilly, while waiting this slow approach of vengeance, in the solitary and dismal recesses of a desolate castle, he lost neither his lofty spirit nor his calm philosophy. Although separated from his family and friends, and severed, as it were, from the earth itself, shut out from the light of heaven and the intercourse of man, hearing no sound but the dashing of the ocean's waves against the foundation stones, and the howling of its storms among the turrets of his feudal prison, his soul was serene and unruffled, the abode of peace and light. Religion and philosophy, to whose service he had devoted his great faculties and pure affections in the days of his ardent youth and glorious manhood, when power and prosperity were his lot, and the world was bright before him, now came to solace, and cheer, and bless him in the reverse of his earthly fortunes, and when the dark clouds were gathering around the close of his career. "Although," pursues an eloquent writer, speaking of him at this period, "to human eye all his efforts had failed, and the cause of liberty was utterly lost and undone, when even hope itself had fled from every other breast, he did not despond. Not a shadow of doubt passed over his spirit. His confidence was founded upon a rock, and his faith in the promises of God disclosed to his clear and heaven-illuminated vision the sure prospect of the happy period when there would be no more tyranny or oppression on the earth. He felt that the hour of his final trial was rapidly approaching; and, although there was a constitutional delicacy and tenderness in his nature, which had even made him so sensitive to physical suffering as to lead his enemies to charge him with a want of personal courage, he contemplated death with a singular calmness and complacency of spirit. And well he might; for when he looked back over his life, his mind rested with a just satisfaction upon the faithful and constant devotion of his talents to the cause of God and his people; and when he turned towards the future, he contemplated, with a glorious hope and blessed assurance, the rewards in reserve for sincerity, benevolence, and piety, in that world where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

* Ludlow, vol. iii., p. 111.

Some of the writings with which this imprisonment was thus dignified and solaced happily remain on record. It was here he wrote the "People's Case Stated," which I have already fully described, and other religious works, in accordance with the pure faith and the elevated doctrine which have also received ample illustration in these pages. Other fragments of works remain, and are, many of them, of a deeply touching character. He wrote of "Government," of "Religion," of "Life," of "Death," of "Friends," of "Enemies," with all the calmness of an ancient philosopher, but in the deepest and most generous spirit of diviner Christianity. The good old cause was now apparently lost forever. All its greatest friends had sunk into the grave, or were wandering in exile, or immured in dungeons, or perishing on the scaffold. His own blood was, he well knew, thirsted after by powerful enemies; yet he contemplated all things as he had ever contemplated them; he saw all the objects of his glorious life as they had ever been present with him, save only that now his hope was gone of himself surviving to witness their achievement.

"The people's cause, whom God after trial hath declared free, is a righteous one, though not so prudently and righteously managed as it might and ought to have been. God's doom is therefore justly executed upon us, with what intent and jugglings soever it was prosecuted by men."

In his Meditations on Death, he regarded that event not only with cheerful fortitude, but in the profoundest spirit of philosophy.

"Death is the inevitable law God and nature have put upon us. Things certain should not be feared, but expected. Things doubtful only are to be feared. Death, instead of taking away anything from us, gives us all, even the perfection of our natures; sets us at liberty both from our own bodily desires and others' domination; makes the servant free from his master. It doth not bring us into darkness, but takes darkness out of us, us out of darkness, and puts us into marvellous light. Nothing perishes or is dissolved by death but the veil and covering, which is wont to be done away from all ripe fruit. It brings us out of a dark dungeon, through the crannies whereof our sight of light is but weak and small, and brings us into an open liberty, an estate of light and life, unveiled and perpetual. It takes us out of that mortality which began in the womb of our mother, and now ends to bring us into that life which shall never end. This day, which thou fearest as thy last, is thy birthday into eternity.

"Death holds a high place in the policy and great commonwealth of the world. It is very profitable for the succession and continuance of the works of nature.

"The fading corruption and loss of this life is the passage into a better. Death is no less essential to us than to live or to be born. In flying death thou flyest thyself: thy essence is equally parted into these two, life and death. It is the condition and law of thy creation. Men are not sent into the world by God but with purpose to go forth again; which he that is not willing to do, should not come in.

"The first day of thy birth bindeth thee and sets thee in the way as well to death as to life. To be unwilling; therefore to die, is to be unwilling to be a man, since to be a man is to be mortal. It being therefore so serviceable to nature and the institution of it, why should it be feared or shunned? Besides, it is necessary and inevitable: we must do our best endeavour in things that are not remediless, but ought to grow resolute in things past remedy.

"It is most just, reasonable, and desirable to arrive at that place towards which we are always walking. Why fearest thou to go whither all the world goes? It is the part of a valiant and generous mind to prefer some things before life, as things for which a man should not doubt nor fear to die. In such a case, however matters go, a man must more account thereof than of his life. He must run his race with resolution, that he may perform things profitable and exemplary.

"The contempt of death is that which produceth the boldest and most honourable exploits. He that fears not to die, fears nothing. From hence have proceeded the commendable resolutions and free speeches of virtue, uttered by men of whom the world has not been worthy."*

Of "Life" he had then instructed himself to think as only the passage to a place where knowledge and virtue would be better achieved after the body was in the grave:

"There is a time to live and a time to die. A good death is far better and more eligible than an ill life. A wise man lives but so long as his life is more worth than his death. The longer life is not always the better. To what end serves a long life? Simply to live, breathe, eat, drink, and see this world. What needs so long a time for all this! Methinks we should

* Again, in another passage of this exquisite fragment, he says, "True natural wisdom pursueth the learning and practice of dying well, as the very end of life; and, indeed, he hath not spent his life ill that hath learned to die well. It is the chiefest thing and duty of life. The knowledge of dying is the knowledge of liberty, the state of true freedom, the way to fear nothing, to live well, contentedly, and peaceably. Without this there is no more pleasure in life than in the fruition of that thing which a man feareth always to lose. In order to which, we must above all endeavour that our sins may die, and that we see them dead before ourselves, which alone can give us boldness in the day of judgment, and make us always ready and prepared for death. Death is not to be feared and fled from, as it is by most, but sweetly and patiently to be waited for, as a thing natural, reasonable, and inevitable."

I cannot resist giving one extract more, in which we find two thoughts expressed almost literally in Shakespeare's words: "It is a good time to die, when to live is rather a burden than a blessing, and there is more ill in life than good. There are many things in life far worse than death, in respect whereof we should rather die than live. The more voluntary our death is, the more honourable. Life may be taken away from every man by every man, but not death.

"It is a great point of wisdom to know the right hour and fit season to die. Many men have survived their own glory. That is the best death which is well recollected in itself, quiet, solitary, and attendeth wholly to what at that time is fittest.

"They that live by faith die daily. The life which faith teaches works death. It lends up the mind to things not seen, which are eternal, and takes it off, with its affections and desires, from things seen, which are temporary."

soon be tired with the daily repetition of these and the like vanities. Would we live long to gain knowledge, experience, and virtue? This seems an honest design, but is better to be had other ways by good men, when their bodies are in the grave."

In another most beautiful passage on this subject, his peculiar religious faith is strikingly shown:

"The knowledge, sight, and experience of such a kind of subsisting and heavenly manner of life that man is capable of, is the best preparative and most powerful motive to leave the body, and surcease the use of our earthly organs. This, in effect, is all that bodily death, rightly known and understood, doth impart: a lawful surceasing the use and exercise of our earthly organs, and our willing and cheerful resorting to the use and exercise of that life without the body, which man is capable to subsist in when made perfect in spirit, an equal and associate with angels, under the power and order of expressing what he inwardly conceives, as they do. This made Paul look upon life in the body, and life out of it, with no indifferent eye; as accounting the being at home in the body an absence from the Lord; and such a kind of absence from the body as death causes, to be that which makes us most present with the Lord; which, therefore, he should be most willing unto, and, with greatest longing after, desire."

Towards the close of the second year of his imprisonment, we ascertain the desperate efforts his enemies were making to force on his trial, in passages of a most affecting letter to his wife.

"MY DEAR HEART," he begins, "the wind yet continuing contrary, makes me desirous to be as much in converse with thee (having this opportunity) as the providence of God will permit, hoping these will come safe to your hand. It is no small satisfaction to me, in these sharp trials, to experience the truth of those Christian principles, which God, of his grace, hath afforded you and me the knowledge, and emboldened us to make the profession of. Have faith and hope, my dearest. God's arm is not shortened; doubtless great and precious promises are yet in store to be accomplished in and upon believers here on earth, to the making of Christ admired in them. And if we cannot live in the power and actual possession of them, yet if we die in the certain foresight and embracing of them by faith, it will be our great blessing. This dark night and black shade which God hath drawn over his work in the midst of us, may be, for aught we know, the ground-colour to some beautiful piece that he is now exposing to the light." Dwelling next upon the trials he had been called to, with a view to the working out of this most sublime image, he expresses the good and holy influence which afflictions are intended by Providence to exert upon the Christian aspects of man's character. "Nor would I have it thought that I have already attained the powerful practice of this holy duty and perfection; but it is much in my desire, aim, and hope. The difficult circumstances I am in, and that I am still more and more every day cast into, by God's wise-disposing providence, to the sequestering me from the world, and withholding all sensible comforts from me, so much as he doth, make me, in some sort, confident it is for a good end, and that out of love and faithfulness I am made to drink of this bitter cup, the better to help forward that necessary work in me, and upon me, wherein consists the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

"If I may have and enjoy this, it would seem a very little matter to me to be in outward bonds, banishment, want, or any other afflictions. Help me, then (in all your cares and solitudes about me), to what will further and advance this work in me. The Lord grant me and mine to be content, if he deny us to live of our own, and will bring us to the daily bread of his finding, which he will have us wait for, fresh and fresh from his own table, without knowing anything of it beforehand. Peradventure there is a greater sweetness and blessing in such a condition than we can imagine till we have tried it. This may add to my help, even our making little haste to get out of our troubles, patiently waiting till God's time come, wherein he will open the prison doors, either by death, or some other way, as he please, for the magnifying his own great name, not suffering us to be our own choosers in anything, as hitherto hath been his way with us.

"And why should such a taking up sanctuary in God, and desiring to continue a pilgrim and solitary in this world, while I am in it, afford still matter of jealousy, distrust, and rage, as I see it doth to those who are unwilling that I should be buried and lie quiet in my grave, where I now am. They that press so earnestly to carry on my trial, do little know what presence of God may be afforded me in it and issue out of it, to the magnifying of Christ in my body, by life or by death. Nor can they, I am sure, imagine how much I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ, which of all things that can befall me I account best of all. And till then, I desire to be made faithful in my place and station, to make confession of him before men, and not deny his name, if called forth to give a public testimony and witness concerning him, and to be herein nothing terrified. What, then, will the hurt be, that I can or shall receive by the worst that man can do unto me, who can but kill the body, and thereby open my prison door, that I may ascend into the pleasures that are at Christ's right hand? If the storm against us grow still higher and higher, so as to strip us of all we have, the earth is still the Lord's and the fulness thereof; he hath a good storehouse for us to live upon. God can, and (if he think fit) will chalk out some way wherein he may appear by his providence to choose for us, and not leave us to our own choice; and being contracted into that small compass which he shall think fit to reduce us unto, we may, perhaps, meet with as true inward contentment, and see as great a mercy in such a sequestration from the world, as if we were in the greatest outward prosperity. I know nothing that remains to us but, like a tossed ship in a storm, to let ourselves be tossed and driven with the winds, till He that can make these storms to cease, and bring us into a safe haven, do work out our deliverance for us. I doubt not but you will accordingly endeavour to prepare for the worst."

In this letter, it will be seen, Vane's touching design is not solely to prepare his wife and family for his death, which he knew to be near, but also to sustain and solace them in the poverty to which they would be left, should his estates suffer the forfeitures of treason. Soon after its date, which was March 7th, 1662, he was removed from Seilly to the Tower of London. The grand jury having found a bill against him as "a false traitor," &c., he was arraigned before the Court of King's Bench on the 2d of June, 1662.

Vane was refused the assistance of counsel, and stood alone on the floor of the court that memorable day against the attorney-general,* the solicitor-general, and four others of the most eminent lawyers in the kingdom, among whom were men that had been agents in the affairs of the Commonwealth when Vane was its most eminent chief! He was not permitted to see his indictment before it was now read, or to have a copy of it afterward, and he had been denied the benefit of legal advice or consultation out of the court as well as in; yet he stood upon the floor of that court the most cheerful and unmoved person there.

The indictment charged him with compassing and imagining the death of Charles II., and conspiring to subvert the ancient frame of the kingly government of the realm. The overt acts laid in the indictment were, that the prisoner, in concert with other traitors, assembled and consulted to destroy the king and the government, and to exclude the king from the exercise of his royal authority; and that he took upon himself the government of the forces of the nation by sea and land, and appointed officers to hold command in an army raised against the king; and for the purpose of effecting his design, did actually, in the county of Middlesex, levy war against the king.

This indictment, at Vane's request, was read over to him twice, in English; he then desired that it might be read over to him in Latin, but this was refused. After taking some objections to the indictment, the most important of which was, that, as the offences charged in it were committed in his capacity as a member of Parliament, or as acting under its commission, he could only be held to answer for them before Parliament itself, and not at the bar of any inferior or other tribunal, the judges peremptorily overruled them, and required him to answer to the indictment "Guilty" or "Not Guilty."

Vane then urged, at great length, those reasons which led him to decline to put himself on trial by pleading to the indictment. Never were undeniable reasons pressed with such power and ability. He showed that it was impossible for him to have that equal and just trial which was his right as an Englishman. He argued that, contrary to all the authorities and principles of English law which he cited, he was arraigned before judges who, in another place, had prejudged his case and recorded their votes against him. He dwelt upon the months and years that had been occupied in contriving and collecting secret evidence to sustain the prosecution, while he had all the time been kept a close prisoner.* He entered upon a particular examination of the specifications brought against him, and showed that they were vague and general, and such as did not bear against him individually, but as a member of a Parliament to which he was lawfully elected, and in which he had acted in concurrence with the nation from time to time. In conclusion, he addressed his judges in this nervous and solemn strain:

"Unto this, unless some remedy be afforded by the justice, candour, and favour of this court, it may be better for the prisoner (for aught he yet knows) to be immediately destroyed by special command (if nothing else will satisfy), without any form of law, as one to whom quarter, after at least two years' cool blood, is thought fit to be denied in relation to the late wars. This may seem better than under a colour and form of justice to pretend to give him the benefit of the law and the king's courts, whose part it is to set free the innocent, upon an equal and indifferent trial had before them,

* "It is observable how early hard measure appeared in the way wherein the prisoner became excepted out of the Act of Indemnity, when the Commons, his proper judges, declared him in their thoughts not fit to be endangered in the point of life; yet unto the judgment of the Lords (that ought not to judge commoners unbrought before them by the Commons, much less in opposite judgment to the Commons) the Commons were necessitated to yield, lest otherwise the Act of Indemnity to the whole nation should stop upon this dispute and essential difference between the two Houses; a competition easily overruled; although, as it proves by the sequel, that act of indemnity is like to become felo de se, or a destroyer of itself, if your lordships should conceive yourselves at liberty, notwithstanding that act, not only to bring anew into memory upon the stage the state of all the past differences from first to last, but to try and judge the merit of them in my person, and therein call in question the validity of that whole act, and make void the benefit intended by it, in case the war undertaken and managed by both or either of the houses of Parliament be judged unlawful, and within the statute of 25 Edward III.; for this adjudges all the people of England morally guilty of the evil of a sin and offence against the law of nature, which once done, whatever promised indemnity be granted for the present, the evil of the action remaineth upon record, not only to the infamy of the whole people of England, but their future danger, upon pretence that they have forfeited the very indemnity granted.

"The length of time taken to search out matter against the prisoner, and the undue practices and courses to find out witnesses, do farther evidence how unlike the prisoner is to have an equal and indifferent trial. He doubts not this will appear in his two years' close imprisonment (six months whereof was banishment), during which time he was never so much as once examined, or had any question put to him whereby he might conjecture wherefore he was committed to prison, any farther than was expressed in the warrants of commitment. Now these were so general that nothing certain or particular could be gathered out of them. But upon the received opinion that he was excepted out of the Act of Indemnity, and, in the sense of both Houses, a great delinquent, his estate was attempted to be inventoried, his rentals demanded, his rents were actually seized in the tenants' hands, and they forbidden to pay them. His very courts were prohibited by officers of great personages, claiming the grant of the estate, and threatening his officers from doing their duty. By these kind of undue proceedings, the prisoner had not wherewithal to maintain himself in prison, and his debts, to the value of above £10,000, were undischarged, either principal or interest. The hopes of private lucre and profit hereby was such in the tenants and other persons sought out for far and near to be witnesses, that it is no wonder at last something by way of charge comes to be exhibited." The foregoing is from a paper he left behind him in his prison, endorsed "Memorandums pleadable on my arraignment."

* This was the eccentric Sir Geoffrey Palmer, of whom Roger North gives a very graphic sketch. He was distinguished by his ability and masterly knowledge in his profession, and his wisdom and generosity are said to have been incomparable. During all the troubles of the age, he lived quiet in the Temple, a professed and known Cavalier; and no temptation of fear or profit could ever shake his principles. He had great business in conveyancing, and would not keep a clerk who was not a strict Cavalier. One of his clerks was said to be so rigid that he would never write the word Oliver with a great O, and the attorney-general himself was reported to have purchased the manor of Charlton from its resemblance to the name of his royal master.

if their cause will bear it; but it is very visible beforehand that all possible means of defence are taken and withheld from him, and laws are made ex post facto to forejudge the merit of the cause, the party being unheard.

"And when he hath said all this, that, as a rational man, does occur to him, and is fit for him to represent in all humility to the court, he craves leave farther to add, that he stands at this bar not only as a man, and a man clothed with the privileges of the most sovereign court, but as a Christian that hath faith and reliance in God, through whose gracious and wise appointment he is brought into these circumstances, and unto this place at this time, whose will he desires to be found resigned up into, as well in what he now calls him to suffer, as in what he hath called him formerly to act, for the good of his country, and of the people of God in it. Upon this bottom, he blesses the name of his God, he is fearless, and knows the issue will be good, whatever it prove. God's strength may appear in the prisoner's weakness; and the more all things carry the face of certain ruin and destruction unto all that is near and dear to him in this world, the more will divine deliverance and salvation appear, to the making good of that Scripture, that he that is content to lose his life in God's cause and way, shall save it, and he that, instead thereof, goes about to save his life upon undue terms, shall lose it.

"Far be it, therefore, from me to have knowingly, maliciously, or wittingly offended the law, rightly understood and asserted, much less to have done anything that is malum per se, or that is morally evil. This is what I allow not, as I am a man, and what I desire with steadfastness to resist, as I am a Christian. If I can judge anything of my own case, the true reason of the present difficulties and straits I am in is because I have desired to walk by a just and righteous rule in all my actions, and not to serve the lusts and passions of men, but rather to die than wittingly and deliberately sin against God and transgress his holy laws, or prefer my own private interest before the good of the whole community I relate unto, in the kingdom where the lot of my residence is cast."

Before resuming his seat, Vane once more claimed the benefit of council. The court told him that if he would plead, and put himself on the issue, he should then have counsel assigned. After considerable urging, and with evident reluctance and distrust of the sincerity of the court and its promise, he was prevailed upon to comply, and to plead not guilty. He was at once remanded to prison, and, four days after, was brought up to trial.

Upon taking his place in the court, he claimed the promise of his judges, and was told that they would be his counsel! So went on this deliberate murder. Since the first promise was made, Chief-justice Forster (who presided at the trial) had been to Hampton Court and received instructions. He and his associates throughout were merely the instruments of the murderers behind the scene, Charles and Clarendon. Chief-justice Forster had even been overheard to say on the day of arraignment, when the convincing arguments of the prisoner had left the prosecuting officers without the power of answering them, "Though we know not what to say to him, we know what to do with him."

The attorney-general, Sir Geoffrey Palmer, now stated the nature of the overt acts charged against the prisoner, and the particulars of the proofs. "We shall prove," he said, "that the prisoner sat with others in several councils, or rather confederacies, encroached the government, levied forces, appointed officers, and at last levied open and actual war at the head of a regiment; and though he be chargeable for any crime of treason since the beginning of the late war, yet we shall confine the facts of which we charge him to the reign of his present majesty." The first piece of evidence was a warrant under the hand and seal of the prisoner, directed to the officers of the navy, and commanding them to issue out stores for the service of the government. The signature of the prisoner was proved by two witnesses acquainted with the general character of his handwriting. Several entries in the journals of the House of Commons were then read. One of them, dated the 1st of February, 1649, purported to be an order for establishing a council of state. Another entry, of the date of the 13th of February in the same year, contained instructions to the council of state, requiring them to suppress the attempts of any who should pretend title to the kingly government, from the late king, or from his son, or from any other person. The attorney-general insisted that the former part of these instructions showed an interest to destroy the person of the king, and that the latter part showed an interest to destroy the kingly government. It appeared from another entry in the journals of the 14th of February, 1649, that the prisoner had been chosen a member of the council of state, and had acted upon the instructions before mentioned, and usually sat in the council; and that he had also acted as treasurer of the navy. The fact of his sitting as member in a committee of council was also proved by witnesses. It was farther proved that in 1651 he was appointed president of the council of state, and as such signed orders for military equipments. Another entry was read, dated 7th of May, 1659, from which it appeared that a committee of safety had been appointed for the care of the Commonwealth, and that the prisoner was one of its members, and, as such, had acted in conference with foreign ambassadors, and nominated officers to commands in the army, and had made several orders, and acted in various other ways in the service of the Commonwealth. A witness of the name of Marsh proved that the prisoner proposed a new model of the government, Whitelocke presiding in the chair; and that one of the particulars proposed was a resolution declaring it destructive to the people's liberty to admit any king into power. Another witness stated that he believed Sir Henry Vane had proposed this resolution to the chairman, and affirmed positively that he gave reasons in its support. A third proved that Sir Henry Vane had been at the head of a company of soldiers in Southwark.*

Such was the substance of the evidence in support of the prosecution. Sir Henry Vane was now called upon for his defence. He argued, first, in point of law, that the word "king," in the statute of treasons, could only be understood to mean a king regnant, one in the actual possession of the crown, and not a king merely such de jure, who is not in possession of the throne; that the Parliament was the only power regnant at the time alleged, consequently that no treason could be committed against the king. He was proceeding in this argument, when the court observed that, previous to entering into his defence in matters of law, it would be proper for him to call witnesses, if he had any. Upon this, he said that, not having been informed of the nature of the charges, nor of the evidence to be brought against him, he had not been able to provide witnesses, and he therefore desired process of the court to summon witnesses, and a farther time to answer the charge; but the court declared that such a delay could not be allowed. Undaunted, he then, with infinite learning and ability, grappled with all the evidence against him, and justified every particular of his conduct. The learning, the eloquence, the lofty courage with which he did this, will appear in the following masterly passages:

* Phillips's State Trials.

"The causes that did happen to move his late majesty to depart from his Parliament, and continue for many years, not only at a distance and in a disjunction from them, but at last in a declared posture of enmity and war against them, are so well known and fully stated in print, not to say written in characters of blood on both parts, that I shall only mention it, and refer to it.

"This matter was not done in a corner. The appeals were solemn, and the decision, by the sword, was given by that God who, being the judge of the whole world, does right, and cannot do otherwise.

"By occasion of these unhappy differences, thus happening, most great and unusual changes and revolutions, like an irresistible torrent, did break in upon us, not only to the disjoining that Parliamentary assembly among themselves (the head from the members, the co-ordinates from each other, and the Houses within themselves), but to the creating such formed divisions among the people, and to the producing such a general state of confusion and disorder, that hardly any were able to know their duty, and with certainty to discern who were to command and who to obey. All things seemed to be reduced, and in a manner resolved into their first elements and principles.

"Nevertheless, as dark as such a state may be, the law of England leaves not the subjects thereof, as I humbly conceive, without some glimpses of direction what to do, in the cleaving to, and pursuing of which, I hope I shall not be accounted nor judged an offender, or if I am, I shall have the comfort and peace of my actions to support me in and under my greatest sufferings.

"The king is acknowledged to have two capacities in him: one a natural, as he is descended of the blood royal of the realm; and the body natural he hath in this capacity is of the creation of almighty God; and mortal: the other is a politic capacity, in respect of which he is a body politic or mystical, framed by the policy of man, which is immortal and invisible. To the king, in both these capacities conjoined, allegiance is due; that is to say, to the natural person of the king, accompanied with his politic capacity, or the politic appropriated to the natural.

"The politic capacity of the king hath properly no body nor soul, for it is framed by the policy of man.

"In all indictments of treason, when any one does intend the death and destruction of the king, it must needs be understood of his natural body, the other being immortal. The indictment therefore concludes, contra legantiam suæ debitum, against the duty of his allegiance, so that allegiance is due to the natural body.

"Admitting, then, that thus by law allegiance is due to the king (as before recited), yet it is always to be presumed that it is to the king in conjunction with the Parliament, the law, and the kingdom, and not in disjunction from or opposition to them; and that while a Parliament is in being and cannot be dissolved but by the consent of the three estates.

"This is therefore that which makes the matter in question a new case, that never before happened in the kingdom, nor was possible to happen, unless there had been a Parliament constituted, as this was, unsubjected to adjournment, prorogation, or dissolution, by the king's will. Where such a power is granted, and the co-ordinates thereupon disagree and fall out, such effects and consequences as these that have happened will but too probably follow; and if either the law of nature or England inform not in such case, it will be impossible for the subjects to know their duty, when that power and command which ought to flow from three in conjunction comes to be exercised by all or either of them, singly and apart, or by two of them against one.

"When new and never-heard-of changes do fall out in the kingdom, it is not like that the known and written laws of the land should be the exact rule, but the grounds and rules of justice, contained and declared in the law of nature, are and ought to be a sanctuary in such cases, even by the very common law of England; for thence originally spring the unerring rules that are set by the divine and eternal law for rule and subjection in all states and kingdoms."

In a subsequent passage of this immortal defence he illustrated the emphatic differences which separated his case from that of almost every other, though he avowed the same devotion to the good cause common to all who had suffered for it, and proudly appealed to his virtuous and unstained conduct in his days of power.

"The resolutions and votes for changing the government into a Commonwealth or free state were passed some weeks before my return to Parliament; yet afterward, so far as I judged the same consonant to the principles and grounds, declared in the laws of England, for upholding that political power which hath given the rise and introduction in this nation to monarchy itself, by the account of ancient writers, I conceived it my duty, as the state of things did then appear to me, notwithstanding the said alteration made, to keep my station in Parliament, and to perform my allegiance therein to king and kingdom, under the powers then regnant, upon my principles before declared, yielding obedience to their authority and commands; and having received trust, in reference to the safety and preservation of the kingdom, in those times of imminent danger both within and without, I did conscientiously hold myself obliged to be true and faithful therein. This I did upon a public account, not daring to quit my station in Parliament by virtue of my first writ. Nor was it for any private or gainful ends to profit myself or enrich my relations. This may appear as well by the great debt I have contracted, as by the destitute condition my many children are in as to any provision made for them; and I do publicly challenge all persons whatsoever that can give information of any bribes or covert ways used by me during the whole time of my public acting. Therefore I hope it will be evident to the consciences of the jury that what I have done hath been upon principles of integrity, honour, justice, reason, and conscience, and not, as is suggested in the indictment, by instigation of the devil, or want of the fear of God.

"A second great change that happened upon the constitution of the Parliament, and in them, of the very kingdom itself and the laws thereof, to the plucking up the liberties of it by the very roots, and the introducing of an arbitrary regal power, under the name of Protector, by force and the law of the sword, was the usurpation of Cromwell, which I opposed from the beginning to the end, to that degree of suffering, and with that constancy, that well near had cost me not only the loss of my estate, but of my very life, if he might have had his will, which a higher than he hindered; yet I did remain a prisoner, under great hardship, four months, in an island, by his orders.

"Hereby that which I have asserted is most undeniably evident, as to the true grounds and ends of my actions all along, that were against usurpation on the one hand, or such extraordinary actions on the other as I doubted the laws might not warrant or indemnify, unless I were enforced thereunto by an overruling and inevitable necessity."

In conclusion, he put in these questions to the court:

"1. Whether the collective body of the Parliament can be impeached of high treason?"

"2. Whether any person acting by authority of Parliament can, so long as he acteth by that authority, commit treason?"

"3. Whether matters acted by that authority can be called in question in an inferior court?"

"4. Whether a king de jure, and out of possession, can have treason committed against him, he not being king de facto, and in actual possession? And prayed it might be argued by counsel.

"5. Whether matters done in Southwark, in another county, may be given in evidence to a Middlesex jury?"

All these masterly arguments to law and appeals to simplest reason were of course unavailing. The court held that the Parliament was determined and dissolved by the death of Charles I.; that the proceedings subsequent to that event, though conducted in the name of Parliament, were without any legal authority, and absolutely void; that Charles II. became king de facto as well as de jure from the moment of his father's death; and that all acts done with intent to exclude him from the exercise of his kingly office were overt acts of high treason. As to the objection respecting the counties, the court held that any overt act tending to prove the compassing of the death of the king might be given in evidence, in whatever county that overt act had been committed.

Vane, resolute and undaunted, still prayed the benefit of a bill of exceptions upon these points; but this the court refused, being of opinion that the statute of Westminster 2, chap. 31, which allows of bills of exceptions, does not apply to a criminal case, but only to actions between party and party. He then proved, by a few witnesses, the utter falsehood of much of the crown evidence, and so closed his defence.

The solicitor-general now rose, and made a most brutal speech. He openly declared "that the prisoner must be made a public sacrifice;" and, in allusion to his urgent demands for the benefit of counsel, held this indecent language: "What counsel, does he think, would dare to speak for him in such a manifest case of treason, unless he could call down the heads of his fellow-traitors, Bradshaw or Cook, from the top of Westminster Hall?" When the solicitor had ended, the court sent out the jury without saying a word on the merits of the case, in order that the effect of his harangue might not be impaired, and he was even permitted to hold a secret consultation with the foreman as they were leaving the box. After an absence of half an hour, the jury returned into court with a verdict of guilty, and Vane was carried back to the Tower.

Some friends visited him in his cell immediately after his return to it, and they were surprised to find him in cheerful spirits. Although he had been in court for more than ten hours, without any refreshment, and engaged for a large part of the time in the most earnest and energetic efforts of argument and oratory, he seemed, at the conclusion, to be clothed with new strength and animation of soul. They questioned him, and he explained the feeling thus: "He had all along," he said, "foreseen the prosecution which had then been consummated. He knew that the offences to be charged upon him would be such as would equally involve the whole nation, and that, in defending himself, he might, therefore, be considered as defending the liberty and life of every Englishman who had acted in the cause of the Commonwealth. He had been deeply impressed with a sense of the obligation that rested upon him to make a defence worthy of the importance and magnitude of the occasion, and he had formed the resolution to avail himself of every security which the Constitution and laws of the country had provided to protect the subject against injustice and oppression. Actuated by these views, he had refused to plead to the indictment until he was assured he should have the benefit of counsel. When, on the morning of that day, he found that he had been deceived and betrayed, and was without counsel to advise with him, aid him, and speak for him, and that the great cause of liberty and right was left for him alone to vindicate, he was oppressed with a sense of his incompetency to do it justice; but in looking back, at the close of the day, upon the defence he had been enabled to make, his heart overflowed with devout gratitude and joy. He blessed the Lord that he had been strengthened to maintain himself at the post which Providence had assigned him; that arguments had been suggested to his mind; that he had not been left to overlook any means of defence; that his lips had been clothed with more than their usual eloquence, and that, by his gracious help, he had been enabled to discharge, to his own entire satisfaction, the duty he owed to his country and to the liberty of his countrymen. He had spoken that day, as he told the judges, 'not for his own sake only, but for theirs and for posterity.' He had done his best and his utmost for himself and for his fellow-men; his conscience was discharged, his obligations to society were fulfilled, and his mind was therefore at peace with itself, at peace with the world, and full of satisfaction, comfort, and joy."*

The real murderers now appear upon the scene. We are able to uplift the curtain which has concealed them hitherto, and show them to the execration of posterity.

The time had come for the redemption of the king's solemn promise that he would remit Vane's sentence should he be proved guilty. Instead of interfering to redeem, he interfered to whet the zeal of Clarendon. He thus wrote, the day after the trial, to his pious chancellor :

"Hampton Court, Saturday, }
Two in the afternoon.

"The relation that has been made to me of Sir Henry Vane's carriage yesterday in the Hall is the occasion of this letter, which, if I am rightly informed, was so insolent as to justify all he had done, acknowledging no supreme power in England but a Parliament, and many things to that purpose. You have had a true account of all; and if he has given new occasion to be hanged, certainly he is too dangerous a man to let live, if we can honestly put him out of the way. Think of this, and give me some account of it to-morrow, till when I have no more to say to you. C. R."

On Wednesday, the 11th of June, Vane was brought up to receive his sentence. After the usual formalities, he was called upon to answer "whether he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him." Vane rose upon this, "with an air which sufficiently indicated that he not only had something, but a good deal, to say, why sentence of death should not be passed upon him." He commenced by observing that he had not yet heard the indictment read in Latin, and he claimed it as a right undeniable. This led to a sharp debate between him and the judges and lawyers, in which he finally prevailed. When the indictment had been read in Latin, he next claimed counsel to make exceptions to the indictment, according to law. After much discussion this was overruled; but he would not relinquish his claim until the court had distinctly assumed the responsibility of refusing it. The next thing he offered was a bill of exceptions, which, in the want of counsel, he had framed himself. It had been offered on the day of his trial, and the judges had then refused to sign it. He now showed that the statute of Edward had never been repealed, and he adduced passages from Sir Edward Coke to prove that, if the justices should refuse to sign a bill of exceptions, they might be compelled by a writ to sign it, and otherwise proceeded against. This bold measure on the part of the prisoner confounded and staggered the court. "The statute was explicit, the law clear, the right certain." But, after much evasion and disputation, the court refused to sign or receive it; and on this point also Vane would not relinquish his claim, until the judges had, one by one, assumed the responsibility of the refusal.

The bill of exceptions prepared by Vane has been preserved. It is a paper of great ability, learning, and interest, setting forth all the particulars in which he had been unjustly used, and the law violated in his person. In the course of it, he mentions several interesting circumstances, implying the baseness of Monk, and other matters.*

* "On the day of my arraignment, an eminent person was heard to say I had forfeited my head by what I said that day before ever I came to my defence. What, that should be I know not, except my saying in open court, 'sovereign power of Parliament,' which the attorney-general wrote down, after he had promised at my request no exception should be taken at words; and whole volumes of lawyers' books pass up and down the nation with that title, 'sovereign power of Parliament.' Six moderate men, that were like to consider what they did before they would throw away my life, were summoned to be of my petty jury, which the king's counsel hearing, wrote a letter to one of the sheriffs to unsummon them; and a new list was made the night immediately before the day of verdict, on purpose that the prisoner might not have any knowledge of them till presented to his view and choice in Westminster Hall. Yet one of the forty-eight of this list (who said he would have starved himself before he would have found Sir Henry Vane guilty of treason) was never called, though he walked in the hall all the while. And in that hurry of those that compassed about, I being alone, stripped of all assistance, Sir William Roberts foreman, and Sir Christopher Abdy, were sworn by the court before I was aware; so my challenging them might seem a personal disobliging and exasperation of them against me, after they were sworn and fixed. The solicitor also had a long whisper with the foreman of the jury, in the court, before they went to verdict, telling him the prisoner must be a sacrifice for the nation, &c.; suddenly after which I am here called to receive my sentence. After the day of my trial, the judges went to Hampton Court."

The foregoing is from a paper he had prepared in arrest of judgment. This also is an extract from his most able and convincing argument on the law of treason :

"The law is made for the benefit and security of the subject, whom the law requires not to examine the right of sovereignty. Nor is the danger less under one government

* I will subjoin a few details from Sikes: "On this day, liberty being given to friends to visit him in the Tower, he received them with very great cheerfulness and with a composed frame of spirit, having wholly given up himself to the will of God. It being told him by a friend that his death would be a loss to the people of God, he answered, that God would raise up other instruments to serve him and his people." And as to the king's promise: "Upon friends persuading him to make some submission to the king, and to endeavour the obtaining of his life, he said, if the king did not think himself more concerned for his honour and word than he did for his life, he was very willing they should take it. 'Nay, I declare,' said he, 'that I value my life less in a good cause than the king can do his promise. I think the king himself is so sufficiently obliged to spare my life, that it is fitter for him to do it than myself to seek it.'" The following is extremely touching: "Mention being made to him of the cruel proceedings against him, 'Alas!' said he, 'what ado they keep to make a poor creature like his Saviour!' In discourse he said, 'If the shedding of my blood may prove an occasion of gathering together in one the dispersed interests and remnant of the adherers to this cause, of whatever differing persuasions, I should think ten thousand lives, if I had them, well spent in such a service.'"

Vane's next step was to request the reading of the petition of the Parliament in favour of his life, and the king's promise, in reply, not to take it away. After much dispute he prevailed on this point, and the proceedings in reference to that petition were read in open court. He then reminded the court, who had begun to show signs of impatience under his searching and effectual management of his cause, that there were certain questions of law which must be settled before sentence could be passed upon him. He wished to argue them, by counsel if permitted, if not in person, before their lordships. He proceeded to instance them: "1. Whether a Parliament were accountable to any inferior court. 2. Whether the king, being out of possession—"

The court suddenly broke in upon him at this point, and, with considerable vehemence, declared that "the king was never out of possession." Sir Henry instantly replied, with great coolness, that if the king was never out of possession, the indictment against him must inevitably fall to the ground; for the charge it alleged was, "that he endeavoured to keep out his majesty."

The judges now showed themselves highly excited; and Vane, after again demanding to be heard in assigning his reasons for an arrest of judgment, and after having exhausted the various provisions of the English law in favour of the security of the subject, desisted from all farther attempts. As he folded up his papers, he appealed from that tribunal to the righteous judgment of God, who, he reminded his judges, would judge them as well as him, and he concluded by expressing his willingness to die upon the testimony he had borne.*

As he uttered these last words, Sergeant than another. The statute is, for securing the subjects from all dormant titles, that they may safely pay their allegiance when they receive protection, and that they may not be in danger of being destroyed by two powers at the same time. For that power which is supreme and de facto will be obeyed, and make it treason to do otherwise, be it right or wrong. And if the subject be at the same time in danger of committing treason against the power de jure, then is he in a miserable condition and state of unavoidable necessity, which is provided against by the laws of the land. Otherwise, if he be loyal to the king de jure, he shall be hanged by the king de facto; and if he be faithful to the king de facto, he shall die by the king de jure, when he recovers possession. Against this it was that the statute of 11 Henry VII. was provided, in the difference betwixt the two houses of York and Lancaster. My case is either the same with that, and then I desire the benefit of that statute; or else it is new, and then I desire, as is provided 25 Edward III., that it be referred to the Parliament."

And lastly (one of these points respecting the indictment he subsequently, as I have said, achieved):

"I have not been permitted to have a copy or sight of the indictment, nor so much as to hear it read in Latin, which is the original record of the court, and ought to be the foundation of their whole proceeding with me. I often desired these things of the court. I was put (after two years' close imprisonment) to answer for my life to a long indictment, read in English, which, whether it were rightly translated, how should I know, that might not hear the original record in Latin? Counsel also, learned in the law, were denied me, though pressed for by me again and again before I pleaded. And had they been granted, what could they have said as to defects of law in the indictment, unless they might have had a copy of it beforehand? My trial for life was huddled up. The jury, as was told me, must not eat or drink till they had done their work: but why such haste and precipitancy for a man's life, that is more than meat or estate, when you can let civil causes about men's estates depend many years? If an erroneous judgment be passed in such matters, it is reversible; but if innocent blood be spilled, it cannot be gathered up again."

* Upham's Life.

Keeling, who had manifested great passion during the trial, exclaimed, "So you may, sir, in good time, by the grace of God." This lawyer had been very abusive on several occasions, and Vane had rebuked his rudeness. Once, for instance, while the latter was reading a passage from a volume of the statutes, Keeling, wishing to look at the book, attempted rather rudely to snatch it from his hands. Vane withheld the volume, remarking, "When I employ you as my counsel, sir, I will find you books."

I close the account of this most memorable trial with one portion of the grand appeal which Vane had taken occasion to make on this last day, not to his judges, but to posterity. The first has reference to the old charge of having violated the Covenant.

"And in the asserting and adhering unto the right of this highest sovereign, as stated in the Covenant before mentioned, the Lords and Commons jointly before the year 1648, and the Commons alone afterward, to the very times charged in the indictment, did manage the war and late differences within these kingdoms. And whatever defections did happen by apostates, hypocrites, and time-serving worldlings, there was a party among them that continued firm, sincere, and chaste unto that cause to the last, and loved it better than their very lives, of which number I am not ashamed to profess myself to be; not so much admiring the form and words of the Covenant, as the righteous and holy ends therein expressed, and the true sense and meaning thereof, which I have reason to know.

"This general and public case of the kingdom is so well known by the declarations and actions that have passed on both sides, that I need but name it, since this matter was not done in a corner, but frequently contended for in the high places of the field, and written even with characters of blood. And out of the bowels of these public differences and disputes doth my particular case arise, for which I am called into question; but, admitting it come to my lot to stand single in the witness I am to give to this glorious cause, and to be left alone, as in a sort I am, yet, being upheld with the authority before asserted, and keeping myself in union and conjunction therewith, I am not afraid to bear my witness to it in this great presence, nor to seal it with my blood, if called thereunto; and I am so far satisfied in my conscience and understanding, that it neither is nor can be treason, either against the law of nature or the law of the land, either malum per se or malum prohibitum; that, on the contrary, it was the duty I owed to God the universal king, and to his majesty that now is, and to the Church and people of God in these nations, and to the innocent blood of all that have been slain in this quarrel. Nothing, it seems, will now serve, unless by the condemnation passed upon my person they be rendered to posterity murderers and rebels, and that upon record in a court of justice in Westminster Hall. And this would inevitably have followed, if I had voluntarily given up this cause without asserting their and my innocency, by which I should have pulled that blood upon my own head, which now I am sure must lie at the door of others, and, in particular, of those that knowingly and precipitately shall imbrue their hands in my innocent blood, under whatever form or pretext of justice.

"My lords, if I have been free and plain with you in this matter, I beg your pardon; for it concerns me to be so, and something more than ordinarily urgent, where both my estate and life are in such imminent peril; nay, more than my life—the concerns of thousands of lives are in it, not only of those that are in their graves already, but of all posterity in time to come. Had nothing been in it but the care to preserve my own life, I needed not have stayed in England, but might have taken my opportunity to have withdrawn myself into foreign parts, to provide for my own safety; nor needed I to have been put upon pleading, as now I am, for an arrest of judgment, but might have watched upon advantages that were visible enough to me in the managing of my trial, if I had consulted only the preservation of my life or estate.

"No, my lords, I have otherwise learned Christ than to fear them that can but kill the body, and have no more that they can do. I have also taken notice, in the little reading that I have had of history, how glorious the very heathens have rendered their names to posterity in the contempt they have showed of death (when the laying down of their life has appeared to be their duty), from the love which they have owed to their country."

The appropriate answer of the judges was "judgment of death." They sentenced him to execution on Tower Hill.*

The space between Wednesday and Saturday was granted to him wherein to prepare for death. He passed it chiefly in exhortations and prayers with his wife and children, who were allowed to remain with him.* At the hour of midnight previous to the day of his execution, the sheriff's chaplain came to his cell with the warrant for his execution. He related the circumstance to his friends in the morning, and said, "There was no dismalness at all in it. After the receipt of the message I slept four hours so soundly, that the Lord hath made it sufficient for me; and now I am going to sleep my last, after which I shall need sleep no more." Early that forenoon his wife, children, and friends were all assembled in the prison. Many and most impressive were his entreaties to them all that they should not mourn for him.

"I know a day of deliverance for Sion will come. Some may think the manner of it may be as before, with confused noise of the warrior, and garments rolled in blood; but I rather think it will be with burning and fuel of fire. The Lord will send a fire that shall burn in the consciences of his enemies, a worm that shall not die, and a fire that shall not go out. Man they may fight against, but this they cannot fight against. And why," said he, speaking before all the company, "should we be frightened with death? I bless the Lord I am so far from being affrighted with death, that I find it rather shrink from me than I from it." Then, kissing his children, he said, "The Lord bless you—he will be a better Father to you—I must now forget that ever I knew you. I can willingly leave this place and outward enjoyments for those I shall meet with hereafter in a better country. I have made it my business to acquaint myself with the society of heaven. Be not you troubled, for I am going home to my Father."

Subsequently he prayed with them; and these were passages of his prayer:

"I die in the certain faith and foresight that this cause shall have its resurrection in my death. My blood will be the seed sown, by which this glorious cause will spring up, which God will speedily raise. Then, laying down this earthly tabernacle is no more but throwing down the mantle, by which a double portion of the Spirit will fall on the rest of God's people. And if by my being offered up, the faith of many be confirmed, and others convinced and brought to the knowledge of the truth, how can I desire greater honour and matter of rejoicing? As for that glorious cause, which God hath owned in these nations and will own, in which so many righteous souls have lost their lives, and so many have been engaged by my countenance and encouragement, shall I now give it up, and so declare them all rebels and murderers? No, I will never do it; that precious blood shall never lie at my door. As a testimony and seal to the justness of that quarrel, I leave now my life upon it, as a legacy to all the honest interest in these three nations. Ten thousand deaths rather than defile my conscience, the chastity and purity of which I value beyond all this world ! I would not for ten thousand lives part with this peace and satisfaction I have in my own heart, both in holding to the purity of my principles and to the righteousness of this good cause, and to the assurance I have that God is now fulfilling all these great and precious promises in order to what he is bringing forth. Although I see it not, yet I die in the faith and assured expectation of it."

* It is worth subjoining here the opinions of two of the most eminent of English lawyers on this infamous judgment. "When," says Blackstone, "a usurper is in possession, the subject is excused and justified in obeying and giving him assistance; otherwise, under a usurpation, no man could be safe, if the lawful prince had a right to hang him for obedience to the powers in being, as the usurper would certainly do for disobedience. Nay, farther, as the mass of the people are imperfect judges of title (of which, in all cases, possession is prima facie evidence), the law compels no man to yield obedience to that prince whose right is, by want of possession, rendered uncertain and disputable, till Providence shall think fit to interpose in his favour, and decide the ambiguous claim; and, therefore, till he is entitled to such allegiance by possession, no treason can be committed against him." Mr. Justice Foster takes the same view of the statute, and maintains that when the throne is full, any person out of possession, but claiming title, be his pretensions what they may, is no king within the statute of treason. "I am aware," he adds, "of the judgment of the court of King's Bench in the case of Sir Henry Vane: that King Charles II., though kept out of the exercise of the kingly office, yet was still a king, both de facto and de jure, and that all acts done to the keeping him out were high treason." The case of Sir Henry Vane, he then remarks, was a very singular case; and he concludes with these words, which are, in truth, conclusive on the question: "I will therefore say nothing on the merits of the question more than this, that the rule laid down by the court involved in the guilt of treason every man in the kingdom who had acted in a public situation under a government possessed in fact for twelve years together of sovereign power, but under various forms at different times, as the enthusiasm of the herd, or the ambition of their leaders, dictated." It is an historical fact, that Lord-chief-justice Hale, when of high rank at the bar, took the engagement "to be true to the Commonwealth of England without a king or House of Lords." This, as Mr. Justice Foster remarks, was plainly, in the sense of those who imposed it, an engagement for abolishing kingly government, or at least for supporting the abolition of it; and with regard to those who took it, it might, upon the principles of Sir Henry Vane's case, have been easily improved into an overt act of treason against King Charles II.

* From his exhortations to his children I may take the following:

"Live in the spirit and walk in the faith of our father Abraham. Listen to the experiences of your father in this dying hour and season of darkness, who can and doth here give a good report of that heavenly and better country he is now going to the more free and full enjoyment of. In the midst of these his dark circumstances, his enjoyments and refreshings from the presence of the Lord do more abound than ever." "Regard not the reproaches that are fallen on your father. Say or do men what they will, Abraham's faith will find the blessing Abraham found, in whosoever it is."

Again :

"Thou hast promised that thou wilt be a mouth to thy people in the hour of trial ; for thou hast required us to forbear the preparatory agitations of our own minds, because it is not we that are to speak, but the Spirit of our heavenly Father that speaketh in us, in such seasons. In what seasons more, Lord, than when thou callest for the testimony of thy servants to be writ in characters of blood ! Show thyself in a poor weak worm, by enabling him to stand against all the power of thy enemies. There hath been a battle fought with garments rolled in blood, in which (upon solemn appeals on both sides) thou didst own thy servants, though, through the spirit of hypocrisy and apostacy that hath sprung up among us, these nations have been thought unworthy any longer to enjoy the fruits of that deliverance. THOU HAST THEREFORE ANOTHER DAY OF DECISION YET TO COME ! Such a battle is to begin, and be carried on by the faith of thy people ; yea, is in some sort begun by the faith of thy poor servant, that is now going to seal thy cause with his blood. Oh that this decision of thine may remarkably show itself in thy servant at this time, by his bold testimony while sealing it with his blood ! We know not what interruptions may attend thy servant ; but, Lord, let thy power carry him in a holy triumph over all difficulties."

He concluded thus :

"My hourglass is now turned up, the sand runs out apace, and it is my happiness that death doth not surprise me. It is grace and love thou dost show thy poor servant, that thou hastenest out his time, and lettest him see it runs out with joy and peace. Little do my enemies know (as eager as they are to have me gone) how soon their breaths may be drawn in. But let thy servant see death shrink under him. What a glorious sight will this be, in the presence of many witnesses, to have death shrink under him, which he acknowledgeth to be only by the power of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, whom the bands of death could not hold down ! Let that spirit enter into us that will set us again upon our feet, and let us be led into that way that the enemies may not know how to deal with us. Oh, what abjuring of light, what treachery, what meanness of spirit has appeared in this day ! What is the matter ! Oh ! death is the matter. Lord, strengthen the faith and heart of thy poor servant to undergo this day's work with joy and gladness, and bear it on the heart and consciences of his friends that have known and seen him, that they also may say, the Lord is in him of a truth. Oh that thy servant could speak any blessing to these three nations ! Let thy remnant be gathered to thee.

Prosper and relieve that poor handful that are in prisons and bonds, that they may be raised up and trample death under foot. Let my poor family that is left desolate—let my dear wife and children be taken into thy care ; be thou a husband, father, and master to them ; let the spirit of those that love me be drawn out towards them. Let a blessing be upon these friends that are here at this time ; strengthen them ; let them find love and grace in thine eyes, and be increased with the increasings of God. Show thyself a loving Father to us all, and do for us abundantly above and beyond all that we can ask or think, for Jesus Christ his sake."

Sikes was present at the last scene of all, and has described the triumphal progress (for such it was) from the Tower to the scaffold.

"Then one of the sheriff's men came in and told him there was no sled to come, but he was to walk on foot.

"Then Mr. Sheriff coming into the room, was friendly saluted by him, and after a little pause communicated a prohibition that he said he had received, which was, that he must not speak anything against his majesty or the government. His answer to this he himself relates on the scaffold. He farther told Mr. Sheriff he was ready ; but the sheriff said he was not, nor could be this half hour yet. 'Then, sir, it rests on you, not on me (said Sir Henry), for I have been ready this half hour.' Then the sheriff, at his request, promised him his servants should attend him on the scaffold and be civilly dealt with, neither of which was performed ; for (notwithstanding this promise) they were beaten and kept off the scaffold, till he said, 'What ! have I never a servant here !'

"After this, one of the sheriff's men came and told him there must be a sled ; to which Sir Henry replied, 'Any way, how they please, for I long to be at home, to be dissolved and to be with Christ, which is best of all.' He went very cheerfully and readily down the stairs from his chamber, and seated himself on the sled (friends and servants standing about him) ; then he was forthwith drawn away towards the scaffold. As he went, some in the Tower (prisoners as well as others) spake to him, praying the Lord to go with him. And after he was out of the Tower, from the tops of houses and out of windows, the people used such means and gestures as might best discover, at a distance, their respects and love to him, crying aloud, 'The Lord go with you ; the great God of heaven and earth appear in you and for you ;' whereof he took what notice he was capable in those circumstances, in a cheerful manner accepting their respect, putting off his hat and bowing to them. Being asked several times how he did by some about him, he answered, 'Never better in all my life.' Another replied, 'How should he do ill that suffers for so glorious a cause ?' To which a tall black man said, 'Many suffered for a better cause.' 'And many for a worse,' said Sir Henry ; wishing 'that when they came to seal their better cause,' as he called it, 'with their blood, as he was now going to seal his, they might not find themselves deceived. And as to this cause,' said he, 'it hath given life in death to all the owners of it, and suffers for it.'

"Being passed within the rails on Tower Hill, there were many loud acclamations of the people, crying out, 'The Lord Jesus go with your dear soul,' &c. One told him that was the most glorious seat he ever sat on. He answered, 'It is so indeed,' and rejoiced exceedingly.

"Being come to the scaffold, he cheerfully ascends; and being up, after the crowd on the scaffold was broken in two pieces to make way for him, he showed himself to the people on the front of the scaffold with that noble and Christian-like deportment, that he rather seemed a looker-on than the person concerned in the execution, insomuch that it was difficult to persuade many of the people that he was the prisoner. But when they knew that the gentleman in the black suit and cloak, with a scarlet silk waistcoat (the victorious colour) showing itself at the breast, was the prisoner, they generally admired that noble and great presence he appeared with. 'How cheerful he is!' said some. 'He does not look like a dying man!' said others; with many like speeches, as astonished with that strange appearance he shined forth in.

"Then, silence being commanded by the sheriff, lifting up his hands and his eyes towards Heaven, and afterward resting his hand on the rails, and taking a very serious, composed, and majestic view of the great multitude before and around him, he spake."

His address was a vigorous statement of all he had urged on his trial, and all the injustice he had suffered. When he was describing the conduct of the judges, however, in refusing to seal his bill of exceptions, Sir John Robinson, lieutenant of the Tower, who attended the execution for no other purpose than to prevent any dangerous impression being made by the prisoner, interrupted him, saying, in a most furious manner, which gave great dissatisfaction even to the Loyalists who were present, "Sir, you must not go on thus—you must not rail at the judges; it is a lie, and I am here to testify that it is a lie." Vane replied, "God will judge between you and me in this matter. I speak but matter of fact, and cannot you bear that?" 'Tis evident the judges have refused to sign my bill of exceptions." The trumpeters were then ordered to approach nearer to the prisoner and blow in his face, to prevent his being heard; at which Sir Henry, lifting up his hand, and then laying it on his breast, said, "What mean you, gentlemen? Is this your usage of me? Did you use all the rest so? I had even done (as to that), could you have been patient; but, seeing you cannot bear it, I shall only say this, that, whereas the judges have refused to seal that with their hands that they have done, I am come to seal that with my blood that I have done."

He then resumed his address to the people, and proceeded to detail some of the circumstances of his life. Sikes's 'report,' with its interruptions, is too striking to be omitted. He was himself present on the scaffold, and held one of the "note books" referred to:

"Gentlemen, Fellow-countrymen, and Christians,—When Mr. Sheriff came to me this morning, and told me he had received a command from the king that I should say nothing reflecting upon his majesty or the government, I answered, I should confine and order my speech, as near as I could, so as to be least offensive, saving my faithfulness to the trust reposed in me, which I must ever discharge with a good conscience unto death; for I ever valued a man according to his faithfulness to the trust reposed in him, even on his majesty's behalf, in the late controversy. And if you dare trust my discretion, Mr. Sheriff, I shall do nothing but what becomes a good Christian and an Englishman; and so I hope I shall be hereafter civilly dealt with.

"I stand here this day to resign up my spirit into the hands of that God that gave it me. Death is but a little word; but 'tis a great work to die. It is to be but once done; and after this cometh the judgment, even the judgment of the great God, which it concerns us all to prepare for. And by this act I do receive a discharge, once for all, out of prison, even the prison of the mortal body. In all respects wherein I have been concerned and engaged as to the public, my design hath been to accomplish good things for these nations.' Then, lifting up his eyes and spreading his hands, he said, 'I do here appeal to the great God of heaven and all this assembly, or any other persons, to show wherein I have defiled my hands with any man's blood or estate, or that I have sought myself in any public capacity or place I have been in.'

"The cause was three times stated:

"I. In the Remonstrance of the House of Commons.

"II. In the Covenant, the Solemn League and Covenant—'

"Upon this the trumpets again sounded, the sheriff caught at the paper in his hand, and Sir John Robinson, who at first had acknowledged that he had nothing to do there, wishing the sheriff to see to it, yet found himself something to do now, furiously calling for the writer's books, and saying, 'He treats of rebellion, and you write it.' Hereupon six note-books were delivered up.

"The prisoner was very patient and composed under all these injuries and soundings of the trumpets several times in his face, only saying, "'Twas hard he might not be suffered to speak; but,' says he, 'my usage from man is no harder than was my Lord and Master's; and all that will live his life this day must expect hard dealing from the worldly spirit.' The trumpets sounded again to hinder his being heard. Then again Robinson and two or three others endeavoured to snatch the paper out of Sir Henry's hand, but he kept it for a while, now and then reading part of it; afterward, tearing it in pieces, he delivered it to a friend behind him, who was presently forced to deliver it to the sheriff. Then they put their hands into his pockets for papers, as was pretended, which bred great confusion and dissatisfaction to the spectators, seeing a prisoner so strangely handled in his dying words. This was exceedingly remarkable, that in the midst of all this disorder, the prisoner himself was observed to be of the most constant composed spirit and countenance, which he throughout so excellently manifested, that a Royalist swore 'he died like a prince.'"

What the feelings of the people may have been at this instant, an eloquent writer has attempted to describe. "As might have been expected, and as the government had most seriously apprehended, a great impression had by this time been made by the prisoner upon the vast multitude that surrounded him. The people remembered his career of inflexible virtue and patriotism. They had been roused to indignation by the treatment he had received at the hands of Cromwell and of the restored monarch. His trial had revived the memory of his services and sufferings. The fame of his glorious defence had rung far and wide through the city and nation. The enthusiasm with which he had been welcomed by weeping and admiring thousands as he passed from prison to Tower Hill; the sight of that noble countenance; the serene, and calm, and almost divine composure of his deportment; his visible triumph over the fear of death and the malice of his enemies—all these influences, brought at once to bear upon their minds, and concentrated and heightened by the powers of an eloquence that was the wonder of his contemporaries, had produced an effect which, it was evident, could not, with safety to the government, be permitted to be wrought any higher."

Vane, meanwhile, had turned aside, and simply observing, "It is a bad cause which cannot bear the words of a dying man," knelt upon the scaffold, and for a few minutes busied himself in prayer. Sikes resumes his description: "Before the stroke, he spake to this effect: 'I bless the Lord, who hath accounted me worthy to suffer for his name. Blessed be the Lord that I have kept a conscience void of offence to this day. I bless the Lord I have not deserted the righteous cause for which I suffer.' But his very last words of all at the block were as follows: 'Father, glorify thy servant in the sight of men, that he may glorify thee in the discharge of his duty to thee and to his country.'"

In an instant, as Vane stretched out his arms, the executioner, at a single blow, discharged his dreadful office; and one of the greatest and purest of men that ever walked the earth, to adorn and elevate his kind, had left the world, which was not worthy of him.

Sikes has a remark on the result of this infamous murder, which is as striking as it is true: "Cromwell's victories are swallowed up of death: Vane has swallowed up death itself into victory. He let fall his mantle, left his body behind him, that he had worn nine-and-forty years, and is gone to keep his everlasting jubilee in God's rest. It is all day with him now—no night or sorrow more—no prisons or death. He is gone from a place where so much as the righteousness of man cannot be endured. He is gone to a place where the righteousness of God is the universal garb of all the inhabitants. He is gone to that better city, the New Jerusalem. He had served his generation in his mortal body, done his work, and was glad to fall asleep, and go look for his reward somewhere else. You see what this ungrateful world has afforded him for all his kindness—reproach, prisons, and death: he had need have other returns somewhere. Great is his reward in heaven.

"Well! they have done all they can do to this lover of his country and the laws thereof. But I would willingly have their understandings disabused in one point. Let them not think they have conquered him. They knew him not. He judged his judges at the bar. He triumphed over his executioners on the scaffold, R. and the rest. Such a public execution was more eligible than to have lingered out some small time in a prison, as a condemned person, liable to any arbitrary after-claps, on any future motion or pretence of motion in our troubled sea. He had more ease; God more glory; the honest party of the nation and their just cause more advantage; and, why may I not say, his most intimate friends and dearest relations more comfort, in this way of his deliverance, once for all!"

That "just cause" was indeed once more elevated by the death of Vane, and his own sublime hopes abundantly realized. The government of Charles II. scarcely ever recovered the shock his genius and his sufferings had given them. Burnet says "that it was generally thought the government had lost more than it gained by his death." Pepys, a thorough-paced Loyalist, witnessed the execution, and says that the people regarded it as a "miracle," and that it was a most impressive spectacle. He remarks farther, "that the king lost more by that man's death than he will get again for a good while;" and expresses the opinion that it had given the bishops a blow from which they would never recover.

Vane's eldest son, who bore his name, and had been reinstated in his inheritance and honours, was sworn into William's privy council at that revolution of 1688 which banished forever from England the detested family of the Stuarts.

APPENDIX

TO THE

LIFE OF SIR HENRY VANE THE YOUNGER.

A.

A Healing Question propounded and resolved, upon Occasion of the late public and seasonable Call to Humiliation, in order to Love and Union among the honest Party, and with a Desire to apply Balm to the Wound before it become incurable.

THE question propounded is, What possibility doth yet remain (all things considered) of reconciling and uniting the dissenting judgments of honest men within the three nations, who still pretend to agree in the spirit, justice, and reason of the same good cause, and what is the means to effect this?

Ans. If it be taken for granted (as, on the magistrate's part, from the ground inviting the people of England and Wales to a solemn day of fasting and humiliation, may not be despaired of) that all the dissenting parties agree still in the spirit and reason of the same righteous cause, the resolution seems very clear in the affirmative; arguing not only for a possibility, but a great probability hereof; nay, a necessity daily approaching nearer and nearer to compel it, if any or all of the dissenting parties intend or desire to be safe from the danger of the common enemy, who is not out of work, though at present much out of sight and observation.

The grounds of this are briefly these: First, the cause hath still the same goodness in it as ever, and is, or ought to be, as much in the hearts of all good people that have adhered to it: it is not less to be valued now, than when neither blood nor treasure were thought too dear to carry it on, and hold it up from sinking; and hath the same omnipotent God, whose great name is concerned in it, as well as his people's outward safety and welfare; who knows, also, how to give a revival to it when secondary instruments and visible means fail or prove deceitful.

Secondly, The persons concerned and engaged in this cause are still the same as before, with the advantage of being more tried, more injured to danger and hardship, and more endeared to one another, by their various and great experiences, as well of their own hearts as their fellow-brethren. These are the same still in heart and desire after the same thing, which is, that, being freed out of the hands of their enemies, they may serve the Lord without fear, in holiness and righteousness all the days of their life.

As they have had this great good finally in their aims (if declarations to men and appeals to God signify anything), so, as a requisite to attain this, they did with great cheerfulness and unanimity draw out themselves to the utmost in the maintenance of a war, when all other means, first essayed, proved ineffectual. In the management of this war, it pleased God, the righteous Judge (who was appealed to in the controversy), so to bless the counsel and forces of the persons concerned and engaged in this cause, as in the end to make them absolute and complete conquerors over their common enemy; and by this means they had added unto the natural right which was in them before (and so declared by their representatives in Parliament assembled), the right of conquest, for the strengthening of their just claim to be governed by national councils, and successive representatives of their own election and setting up. This they once thought they had been in possession of, when it was ratified, as it were, in the blood of the last king. But of late a great interruption having happened unto them in their former expectations, and, instead thereof, something rising up that seems rather accommodated to the private and selfish interest of a particular part (in comparison) than truly adequate to the common good and concern of the whole body engaged in this cause: hence it is that this compacted body is now falling asunder into many dissenting parts (a thing not unforeseen nor unhopd for by the common enemy all along as their last relief); and if these breaches be not timely healed, and the offences (before they take too deep root) removed, they will certainly work more to the advantage of the common enemy than any of their own unwearied endeavours and dangerous contrivances in foreign parts put all together.

A serious discussion and sober enlarging upon these grounds will quickly give an insight into the state of the question, and naturally tend to a plain and familiar resolution thereof.

That which is first to be opened is the nature and goodness of the cause; which, had it not carried in it its own evidence, would scarce have found so many of the people of God adherers to it within the three nations, contributing either their counsels, their purses, their bodily pains, or their affections and prayers, as a combined strength; without which, the military force alone would have been little available to subdue the common enemy, and restore to this whole body their just natural rights in civil things, and true freedom in matters of conscience.

The two last-mentioned particulars, rightly stated, will evidence sufficiently the nature and goodness of this cause.

For the first of these, that is to say, the natural right, which the whole party of honest men adhering to this cause are by success of their arms restored unto, fortified in, and may claim as their undeniable privilege, that righteously cannot be taken from them, nor they debarred from bringing into exercise, it lies in this:

They are to have and enjoy the freedom (by way of dutiful compliance and condescension from all the parts and members of this society) to set up meet persons in the place of supreme judicature and authority among them, whereby they may have the use and benefit of the choicest light and wisdom of the nation that they are capable to call forth, for the rule and government under which they will live; and through the orderly exercise of such measure of wisdom and counsel as the Lord in this way shall please to give unto them, to shape and form all subordinate actings and administrations of rule and government so as shall best answer the public welfare and safety of the whole.

This, in substance, is the right and freedom contained in the nature and goodness of the cause wherein the honest party have been engaged; for in this all the particulars of our civil right and freedom are comprehended, conserved in, and derived from their proper root; in which, while they grow, they will ever thrive, flourish, and increase; whereas, on the contrary, if there be never so many fair branches of liberty planted on the root of a private and selfish interest, they will not long prosper, but must, within a little time, wither and degenerate into the nature of that whereto they are planted; and hence, indeed, sprung the evil of that government which rose in and with the Norman Conquest.

The root and bottom upon which it stood was not public interest, but the private lust and will of the conqueror, who by force of arms did at first detain the right and freedom which was and is due to the whole body of the people; for whose safety and good, government itself is ordained by God, not for the particular benefit of the rulers, as a distinct and private interest of their own; which yet, for the most part, is not only preferred before the common good, but upheld in opposition thereunto. And as at first the conqueror did, by violence and force, deny this freedom to the people, which was their natural right and privilege, so he and his successors all along lay as bars and impediments to the true national interest and public good, in the very national councils and assemblies themselves, which were constituted in such a manner as most served for the upholding of the private interest of their families; and this being challenged by them as their prerogative, was found by the people assembled in Parliament most unrighteous, burdensome, and destructive to their liberty! And when they once perceived that by this engine all their just rights were like to be destroyed especially (being backed, as it was, with the power of the militia, which the late king, for that purpose, had assumed into his hands, and would not, upon the people's application to him in Parliament, part with into the hands of that great council, who were best to be intrusted with the nation's safety), this was the ground of the quarrel, upon a civil account between the king and his party, and the whole body of adherents to the cause of the people's true liberty; whereof this short touch hath been given, and shall suffice for the opening of the first branch of this cause.

The second branch which remains briefly to be handled is that which also upon the grounds of natural right is to be laid claim unto, but distinguishes itself from the former as it respects a more heavenly and excellent object wherein the freedom is to be exercised and enjoyed, that is to say, matters of religion, or that concern the service and worship of God.

Unto this freedom the nations of the world have right and title by the purchase of Christ's blood, who, by virtue of his death and resurrection, is become the sole Lord and Ruler in and over the conscience; for to this end Christ died, rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and of the living, and that every one might give an account of himself, in all matters of God's worship, unto God and Christ alone, as their own Master, unto whom they stand or fall in judgment, and are not in these things to be oppressed, or brought before the judgment-seats of men. For why shouldst thou set at naught thy brother in matters of his faith and conscience, and herein intrude into the proper office of Christ, since we are all to stand at the judgment-seat of Christ, whether governors or governed, and by his decision only are capable of being declared with certainty to be in the right or in the wrong?

By virtue, then, of this supreme law, sealed and confirmed in the blood of Christ unto all men (whose souls he challenges a propriety in, to bring under his inward rule in the service and worship of God), it is that all magistrates are to fear and forbear intermeddling with giving rule or imposing in those matters. They are to content themselves with what is plain in their commission, as ordained of God to be his minister unto men for good, while they approve themselves the doers of that which is good in the sight of men, and whereof earthly and worldly judicatories are capable to make a clear and perfect judgment: in which case the magistrate is to be for praise and protection to them. In like manner, he is to be a minister of terror and revenge to those that do evil in matters of outward practice, converse, and dealings in the things of this life between man and man, for the cause whereof the judicatories of men are appointed and set up. But to exceed these limits, as it is not safe nor warrantable for the magistrate (in that he who is higher than the highest, regards, and will show himself displeased at it), so neither is it good for the people, who hereby are nourished up in a biting, devouring, wrathful spirit one against another, and are found transgressors of that royal law which forbids us to do that unto another which we would not have them do unto us, were we in their condition.

This freedom, then, is of high concern to be had and enjoyed, as well for the magistrate's sake as for the people's common good; and it consists, as hath been said, in the magistrate forbearing to put forth the power of rule and coercion in things that God hath exempted out of his commission: so that all care requisite for the people's obtaining this may be exercised with great ease, if it be taken in its proper season, and that this restraint be laid upon the supreme power before it be erected, as a fundamental constitution, among others, upon which the free consent of the people is given, to have the persons brought into the exercise of supreme authority over them and on their behalf; and if, besides, as a farther confirmation hereunto, it be acknowledged the voluntary act of the ruling power, when once brought into a capacity of acting legislatively, that herein they are bound up, and judge it their duty so to be (both in reference to God, the institutor of magistracy, and in reference to the whole body by whom they are intrusted), this great blessing will hereby be so well provided for that we shall have no cause to fear, as it may be ordered.

By this means a great part of the outward exercise of anti-Christian tyranny and bondage will be plucked up by the very roots, which, till some such course be held in it, will be always apt to renew and sprout out afresh, under some new form or refined appearance, as by late years' experience we have been taught: for, since the fall of the bishops and persecuting presbyteries, the same spirit is apt to arise in the next sort of clergy that can get the ear of the magistrate, and pretend to the keeping and ruling the conscience of the governors, although this spirit and practice hath been all along decried by the faithful adherents to this cause as a most sore oppression and insufferable yoke of bondage, most unrighteously kept up over the consciences of the people, and therefore judged by them most needful to be taken out of the way; and in this matter the present governors have been willing very eminently to give their testimony in their public declarations, however in practice there is much of grievance yet found among us, though more, in probability, from the officiousness of subordinate ministers than any clear purpose or design of the chief in power.

Having thus showed what the true freedom is, in both the branches of it, that shines forth in the righteous cause, wherein the good people of these nations have so deeply engaged, it will not be improper, in the next place, to consider two particulars more that give still farther light into the matter in question, as, first, the qualifications of the persons that have adhered to this cause; secondly, the capacity wherein they have been found from time to time carrying it on.

As to their qualification, they have, in the general, distinguished themselves and been made known by a forwardness to assist and own the public welfare and good of the nation, for the attaining and preserving the just rights and liberties thereof, asserted and witnessed unto in the true stating of this cause, according to the two branches thereof already spoken to. They have showed themselves, upon all occasions, desirers and lovers of true freedom, either in civil or in spirituals, or in both. To express their value thereof, and faithfulness to the same, they have largely contributed, in one kind or other, what was proper to each in his place to do; which actions of theirs, proceeding from hearts sincerely affected to the cause, created in them a right to be of an incorporation and society by themselves, under the name of the good party, having been from the beginning unto this day publicly and commonly so acknowledged, by way of distinction from all neutrals, close and open enemies, and deceitful friends or apostates. These, in order to the maintaining of this cause, have stood by the army, in defence and support thereof, against all opposition whatever, as those that, by the growing light of those times, have been taught and led forth in their experiences to look above and beyond the letter, form, and outward circumstances of government, into the inward reason and spirit thereof, herein only to fix and terminate, to the leaving behind all empty shadows that would obtrude themselves in the place of true freedom.

Secondly, as to the capacity wherein these persons, thus qualified, have acted, it hath been very variable, and subject to great changes: sometimes in one form, and sometimes in another, and very seldom, if ever at all, so exactly and in all points consonant to the rule of former laws and constitutions of government as to be clearly and fully justified by them any longer than the law of success and conquest did uphold them who had the inward warrant of justice and righteousness to encourage them in such their actions.

The utmost and last reserve, therefore, which they have had, in case all other failed, hath been their military capacity, not only strictly taken for the standing army, but in the largest sense, wherein the whole party may (with the army, and under that military constitution and conduct which, by the providence of God, they shall then be found in) associate themselves in the best order they can for the common defence and safety of the whole; as not ignorant that when once embodied in this their military posture, in such manner as by common consent shall be found requisite for the safety of the body, they are most irresistible, absolute, and comprehensive in their power, having that wherein the substance of all government is contained, and under the protection whereof, and safety that may be maintained thereby, they can contrive and determine in what manner this irresistible, absolute, and boundless power, unto which they are now arrived in this their military capacity, shall have just and due limits set unto it, and be drawn out in a meet and orderly way of exercise for the commonweal and safety of the whole body, under the rule and oversight of a supreme judicature, unto the wisdom of whose laws and orders the sword is to become most entirely subject and subservient; and this without the least cause of jealousy or unsafety, either to the standing army, or any member thereof, or unto the good people adhering to this cause, or any of them, since the interest of both, by this mutual action of either, will be so combined together in one (even in that wherein before they were distinct), that all just cause of difference, fear, animosity, emulation, jealousy, or the like, will be wholly abolished and removed.

For when once the whole body of the good people find that the military interest and capacity is their own, and that into which necessity at the last may bring the whole party (whereof, of right, a place is to be reserved for them), and that herein they are so far from being in subjection or slavery, that in this posture they are most properly sovereign, and possess their right of natural sovereignty, they will presently see a necessity of continuing ever one with their army, raised and maintained by them for the promoting this cause against the common enemy, who in his next attempt will put for all with greater desperateness and rage than ever.

Again, when once the standing army and their governors shall also find that, by setting and keeping up themselves in a divided interest from the rest of the body of honest men, they withhold from themselves those contributions in all voluntary and cheerful assistances, by the affections and prayers, by the persons and purses of the good party, to the weakening themselves thereby, as to any vigorous support from them, in the times of most imminent danger (whereof the late king had an experience, that will not suddenly be out of memory, when he undertook the war, in the beginning of these troubles, against the Scots, and was, in a manner, therein deserted by all the good party in England), they will then find (if they stay not till it be too late) that, by espousing the interest of the people, in submitting themselves with their fellow-adherents to the cause, under the rule and authority of their own supreme judicature, they lose not their power or sovereignty, but, becoming one civil or politic incorporation with the whole party of honest men, they do therein keep the sovereignty, as originally seated in themselves, and part with it only but as by deputation and representation of themselves, when it is brought into an orderly way of exercise, by being put into the hands of persons chosen and intrusted by themselves to that purpose.

By this mutual and happy transition, which may be made between the party of honest men in the three nations virtually in arms, and those actually so now in power at the head of the army, how suddenly would the union of the whole body be consolidated, and made so firm as it will not need to fear all the designs and attempts of the common enemy, especially if herein they unite themselves in the first place to the Lord, as willing to follow his providence, and observe his will in the way and manner of bringing this to pass! in which case we shall not need to fear what all the gates of hell are able to do in opposition thereunto.

It is not, then, the standing and being of the present army and military forces in the three nations that is liable to exception of offence from any dissenting judgments at this time among the honest, well-affected party. In and with them, under God, stand the welfare and outward safety of the whole body; and to be enemies to them, or wish them hurt, were to do it to themselves; and, by trying such conclusions, to play the game of the common enemy, to the utter ruin and destruction, not only of the true freedom aimed at and contended for in the late wars, but of the very persons themselves that have been in any sort active or eminent promoters thereof.

The army, considered as it is in the hands of an honest and wise general, and sober, faithful officers, embodied with the rest of the party of honest men, and espousing still the same cause, and acting in their primitive simplicity, humility, and trust, in reference to the welfare and safety of the whole body, is the only justifiable and most advantageous posture and capacity that the good party at present can find themselves in, in order to the obtaining that true freedom they have fought for, and possessing of it in the establishment thereof upon the true basis and foundation, as hath been showed, of right government.

That wherein the offence lies, and which causes such great thoughts of heart among the honest party (if it may be freely expressed, as sure it may, when the magistrate himself professes he doth but desire and wait for conviction therein), is, in short, this:

That when the right and privilege is returned, nay, is restored by conquest unto the whole body (that forfeited not their interest therein), of freely disposing themselves in such a constitution of righteous government as may best answer the ends held forth in this cause; that, nevertheless, either through delay they should be withheld as they are, or through design they should come at last to be utterly denied the exercise of this their right, upon pretence that they are not in capacity as yet to use it, which, indeed, hath some truth in it, if those that are now in power, and have the command of the arms, do not prepare all things requisite thereunto, as they may, and, like faithful guardians to the Commonwealth, admitted to be in its nonage, they ought.

But if the bringing of true freedom into exercise among men, yea, so refined a party of men, be impossible, why hath this been concealed all this while? and why was it not thought on before so much blood was spilt, and treasure spent! Surely such a thing as this was judged real and practicable, not imaginary and notional.

Besides, why may it not suffice to have been thus long delayed and withheld from the whole body, at least as to its being brought by them into exercise now at last? Surely the longer it is withheld, the stronger jealousies do increase, that it is intended to be assumed and engrossed by a part only, to the leaving the rest of the body (who, in all reason and justice, ought to be equally participants with the other in the right and benefit of the conquest, for as much as the war was managed at the expense and for the safety of the whole) in a condition almost as much exposed, and subject to be imposed upon, as if they had been enemies and conquered, not in any sense conquerors.

If ever such an unrighteous, unkind, and deceitful dealing with brethren should happen, although it might continue above the reach of question from human judicature, yet can we think it possible it should escape and go unpunished by the immediate hand of the righteous Judge of the whole world, when he ariseth out of his place to do right to the oppressed?

Nay, if, instead of favouring and promoting the people's common good and welfare, self-interest and private gain should evidently appear to be the things we have aimed at all along; if those very tyrannical principles and anti-Christian relics, which God by us hath punished in our predecessors, should again revive, spring up afresh, and show themselves lodged also and retained in our bosoms, rendering us of the number of those that have forgot they were purged from their old sins, and declaring us to be such as, to please a covetous mind, do withhold from destruction that which God hath designed to the curse of his vengeance: if all those great advantages of serving the Lord's will and design in procuring and advancing his people's true welfare and outward safety, which (as the fruit of his blessing upon our armies) have so miraculously fallen into our hands, shall at last be wrested and misimproved to the enriching and greating of ourselves—if these things should ever be found among us (which the Lord in mercy forbid!), shall we need to look any farther for the accursed thing! will not our con-sciences show us, from the light of the Word and Spirit of God, how near a conformity these actions would hold therewith? which sin (Josh., vii.) became a curse to the camp, and withheld the Lord from being any more among them, or going out with their forces. And did the action of Achan import any more than these two things: First, he saved and kept from destruction the goodly Babylonish garment, which was devoted by God thereunto; secondly, he brought not in the fruit and gain of the conquest into the Lord's treasury, but covetously went about to convert it to his own proper use? To do this is to take of the accursed thing, which (Josh., vii.) all Israel was said to do in the sin of Achan, and to have stolen and dissembled likewise, and put it among their own stuff. This caused the anger of the Lord to kindle against Israel, and made them unable to stand before their enemies, but their hearts melted as water. And thus far the Lord is concerned, if such an evil as this shall lie hid in the midst of us. But to return to what we were upon before.

The matter which is in question among the dissenting parts of the whole body of honest men is not so trivial and of such small consequence as some would make it. 'Tis, in effect, the main and whole of the cause; without which all the freedom which the people have or can have is in comparison but shadow and in name only, and therefore can never give that peace and satisfaction to the body which is requisite unto a durable and solid settlement. This is that which makes all sound and safe at the root, and gives the right balance necessary to be held up between sovereignty and subjection in the exercise of all righteous government; applying the use of the sword to the promoting and upholding the public safety and welfare of the whole body, in preference, and, if need be, in opposition unto any of the parts; while yet, by its equal and impartial administration in reference unto each, it doth withal maintain the whole body in a most delightful harmony, welfare, and correspondency. The sword never can, nor is it to be expected ever will do this, while the sovereignty is admitted and placed anywhere else than in the whole body of the people that have adhered to the cause, and by them be derived unto their successive representatives, as the most equal and impartial judicature for the effecting hereof.

Where there is, then, a righteous and good constitution of government, there is, first, an orderly union of many understandings together, as the public and common supreme judicature or visible sovereignty, set in a way of free and orderly exercise, for the directing and applying the use of the ruling power or the sword, to promote the interest and common welfare of the whole, without any disturbance or annoyance from within or from without; and then, secondly, there is a like union and readiness of will in all the individuals, in their private capacities, to execute and obey (by all the power requisite, and that they are able to put forth) those sovereign laws and orders issued out by their own deputies and trustees.

A supreme judicature, thus made the representative of the whole, is that which we say, will most naturally care, and most equally provide for the common good and safety. Though by this it is not denied but that the supreme power, when by free consent 'tis placed in a single person or in some few persons, may be capable also to administer righteous government; at least, the body that gives this liberty, when they need not, are to thank themselves if it prove otherwise. But when this free and natural access unto government is interrupted and declined, so as a liberty is taken by any particular member, or number of them, that are to be reputed but a part in comparison of the whole, to assume and engross the office of sovereign rule and power, and to impose themselves as the competent public judge of the safety and good of the whole, without their free and due consent, and to lay claim unto this, as those that find themselves possessed of the sword (and that so advantageously as it cannot be recovered again out of their hands without more apparent danger and damage to the whole body than such attempts are worth), this is that anarchy that is the first rise and step to tyranny, and lays grounds of manifest confusion and disorder, exposing the ruling power to the next hand that on the next opportunity can lay hold on the sword, and so, by a kind of necessity, introduces the highest imposition and bondage upon the whole body, in compelling all the parts, though never so much against the true public interest, to serve and obey, as their sovereign rule and supreme authority, the arbitrary will and judgment of those that bring themselves into rule by the power of the sword, in the right only of a part that sets up itself in preference before, or at least in competition with, the welfare of the whole.

And if this, which is so essential to the wellbeing and right constitution of government, were once obtained, the disputes about the form would not prove so difficult, nor find such opposition, as to keeping the bone of contention and disunion, with much danger to the whole; for if, as the foundation of all, the sovereignty be acknowledged to reside originally in the whole body of adherents to this cause (whose natural and inherent right thereunto is of a far ancients date than what is obtained by success of their arms, and so cannot be abrogated even by conquest itself, if that were the case), and then if, in consequence hereof, a supreme judicature be set up and orderly constituted, as naturally arising and resulting from the free choice and consent of the whole body taken out from among themselves, as flesh of their flesh and bone of their bone, of the same public spirit and nature with themselves, and the main be by this means secured, what could be propounded afterward as to the form of administration that would much stick?

Would a standing council of state, settled for life, in reference to the safety of the Commonwealth, and for the maintaining intercourse and commerce with foreign states, under the inspection and oversight of the supreme judicature, but of the same fundamental constitution with themselves—would this be disliked? admitting their orders were binding, in the intervals of supreme national assemblies, so far only as consonant to the settled laws of the Commonwealth, the vacancy of any of which, by death or otherwise, might be supplied by the vote of the major part of themselves: nay, would there be any just exception to be taken if (besides both these) it should be agreed (as another part of the fundamental constitution of the government) to place that branch of sovereignty which chiefly respects the execution of laws in a distinct office from that of the legislative power (and yet subordinate to them and to the laws), capable to be intrusted into the hands of one single person, if need require, or in a greater number, as the legislative power should think fit; and, for the greater strength and honour unto this office, that the execution of all laws and orders (that are binding) may go forth in his or their name, and all disobedience thereunto, or contempt thereof, be taken as done to the people's sovereignty, whereof he or they bear the image or representation, subordinate to the legislative power, and at their will to be kept up and continued in the hands of a single person or more, as the experience of the future good or evil of it shall require?

Would such an office as this, thus stated, carry in it any inconsistency with a free state? Nay, if it be well considered, would it not rather be found of excellent use to the wellbeing of magistracy, founded upon this righteous bottom, that such a lieutenancy of the people's sovereignty in these three nations may always reside in some one or more person, in whose administration that which is reward and punishment may shine forth?

And if now it shall be objected that (notwithstanding all these cautions), should once this sovereignty be acknowledged to be in the diffused body of the people (though the adherents to this cause, not only as their natural, but as their acquired right by conquest), they would suddenly put the use and exercise of the legislative power into such hands as would, through their ill qualifedness to the work, spoil all by mal-administration thereof, and hereby lose the cause instead of upholding and maintaining it.

The answer unto this is, first, that God, by his providence, hath eased our minds much in this solicitude by the course he hath already taken to fit and prepare a choice and selected number of the people unto this work, that are tried and refined by their inward and outward experiences in this great quarrel, and the many changes they have passed through; in respect whereof well qualified persons are to be found, if due care be but taken in the choice of them. And if herein this people of the Lord shall be waiting upon him for his guidance and presence with them, we may have grounds and hope that God (whose name hath all along been called upon in the maintaining of this cause) will pour out so abundantly of his spirit upon his people attending on him in righteous ways, and will also so move their hearts to choose persons bearing his image into the magistracy, that a more glorious product may spring up out of this than at first we can expect, to the setting up of the Lord himself as chief judge and lawgiver among us. And unto this the wisdom and honesty of the persons now in power may have an opportunity eminently to come into discovery; for in this case, and upon the grounds already laid, the very persons now in power are they unto whose lot it would fall to set about this preparatory work, and by their orders and directions to dispose the whole body, and bring them into the meekest capacity to effect the same, the most natural way for which would seem to be by a general council, or convention of faithful, honest, and discerning men, chosen for that purpose by the free consent of the whole body of adherents to this cause in the several parts of the nations, and observing the time and place of meeting appointed to them (with other circumstances concerning their election) by order from the present ruling power, but considered as general of the army:

Which convention is not properly to exercise the legislative power, but only to debate freely, and agree upon the particulars that by way of fundamental constitutions shall be laid and inviolably observed as the conditions upon which the whole body so represented doth consent to cast itself into a civil and politic incorporation, and under the visible form and administration of government therein declared, and to be by each individual member of the body subscribed in testimony of his or their particular consent given therunto: which conditions so agreed (and among them an Act of Oblivion for one) will be without danger of being broken or departed from, considering of what it is they are the conditions, and the nature of the convention wherein they are made, which is of the people represented in their highest state of sovereignty, as they have the sword in their hands unsubjected unto the rules of civil government, but what themselves orderly assembled for that purpose do think fit to make. And the sword, upon these conditions, subjecting itself to the supreme judicature thus to be set up, how suddenly might harmony, righteousness, love, peace, and safety unto the whole body follow hereupon, as the happy fruit of such a settlement, if the Lord have any delight to be among us!

And this once put in a way, and declared for by the general and army (as that which they are clearly convinced, in the sight of God, is their duty to bring about, and which they engage accordingly to see done) how firmly and freely would this oblige the hearts and persons, the counsels and purses, the affections and prayers, with all that is in the power of this whole party to do, in way of assistance and strengthening the hands of those now in power, whatever straits and difficulties they may meet with in the maintenance of the public safety and peace!

This, then, being the state of our present affairs and differences, let it be acknowledged on all hands, and let all be convinced that are concerned, that there is not only a possibility, but a probability, yea, a compelling necessity, of a firm union in this great body, the setting of which in joint and tune again, by a spirit of meekness and fear of the Lord, is the work of the present day, and will prove the only remedy under God to uphold and carry on this blessed cause and work of the Lord in the three nations, that is already come thus far onward in its progress to its desired and expected end of bringing in Christ, the desire of all nations, as the chief Ruler among us.

Now unto this reuniting work let there be a readiness in all the dissenting parts from the highest to the lowest, by cheerfully coming forth to one another in a spirit of self-denial and love instead of war and wrath, and to cast down themselves before the Lord, who is the father of all their spirits, in self-abasement and humiliation, for the mutual offence they have been in, for some time past, one unto another, and great provocation unto God, and reproach unto his most glorious name, who expected to have been served by them with reverence and godly fear; for our God is a consuming fire.

And, as an inducement unto this, let us assure ourselves the means of effecting it will not prove so difficult as other things that have been brought about in the late war, if the minds and spirits of all concerned were once well and duly prepared hereunto by a kindly work of self-denial and self-abasement, set home by the spirit of the Lord upon their consciences, which, if he please, he may do we know not how soon: nay, we shall behold with a discerning eye the inside of that work which God hath been doing among us the three years last past: it would seem chiefly to have been his aim to bring his people into such a frame as this; for in this tract of time there hath been (as we may say) a great silence in heaven, as if God were pleased to stand still and be as a looker on, to see what his people would be in their latter end, and what work they would make of it, if left to their own wisdom and politic contrivances. And as God hath had the silent part, so men, and that good men too, have had the active and busy part, and have, like themselves, made a great sound and noise, like the shout of a king in a mighty host; which, while it hath been a sound only and no more, hath not done much hurt as yet; but the fear and jealousy thereby caused hath put the whole body out of frame, and made them apt to fall into great confusions and disorder.

And if there be thus arisen a general dissent and disagreement of parts (which is not, nor ought to be, accounted the less considerable because it lies hid and kept in under a patient silence), why should there not be as general a confession and acknowledgment of what each may find themselves overtaken in, and cannot but judge themselves faulty for? this kind of vent being much better than to have it break out in flames of a forward and untimely wrathful spirit, which never works the righteousness of God, especially since what hath been done among us may probably have been more the effect of temptation than the product of any malicious design; and this sort of temptation is very common and incident to men in power (how good soever they may be) to be overtaken in, and thereupon do sudden unadvised actions, which the Lord pardons and overrules for the best, evidently making appear that it is the work of the weak and fleshly part, which his own people carry about with them too much unsubdued; and therefore the Lord thinks fit, by this means, to show them the need of being beholden to their spiritual part to restore them again, and bring them into their right temper and healthful constitution.

And thus, while each dissenting part is aggravating upon it self-faultiness and blame, and none excusing, but all confessing they deserve, in one sort or other, reproof, if not before men, yet in God's sight, who knows how soon it may please God to come into this broken, contrite, and self-denying frame of spirit in the good people within the three nations, and own them, thus truly humbled and abased, for his temple and the place of his habitation and rest, wherein he shall abide forever! of whom it may be said, God is in the midst of her, she shall not be moved; God shall help her, and that right early, or with his morning appearance; at which time he will sit silent no longer, but Heaven will speak again, and become active and powerful in the spirits and hearts of honest men, and in the works of his providences, when either they go out to fight by sea or by land, or remain in council and debates at home for the public weal, and again hear the prayers of his people, and visibly own them as a flock of holy men, as Jerusalem in her solemn feasts: "I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, saith the Lord, to do it for them: and then they shall know that I the Lord their God am with them, and that they are my people, and that ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men that have showed yourselves weak, sinful men, and I am your God, that have declared myself an all-wise and powerful God, saith the Lord God."

POSTSCRIPT.

READER,—Upon the perusal of this discourse, thou wilt quickly perceive that these two things are principally aimed at in it by the author: First, to answer in some measure that which is called for by those in power, when they publicly profess they desire nothing more than conviction, and to find out the hidden provocations which either have or yet may bring forth the Lord against these nations, in the way which at present they are in.

Secondly, to remove out of the minds and spirits of the honest party, that still agree in the reason and justice of the good old cause, all things of a private nature and selfish concern (the tendency whereof serves but to foment and strengthen wrath and divisions among them), and in place thereof to set before them that common and public interest, which, if with sincerity embraced, may be the means of not only procuring a firm union among them, but also of conserving them herein.

In order to this, the author hath not been willing so much to declare his own opinion, or deliver any positive conclusions, as to discuss the business by way of question and answer, and thereby make as near a conjecture as he can of that wherein the several dissenting parts may with better satisfaction meet together, and agree upon a safe and righteous bottom, than to remain at the distance they do, to the apparent advantage of the common enemy, the approaching ruin of themselves, and needless hazard, if not loss, of the cause they have been so deeply engaged in; especially considering that, when once they shall be found beginning to come forth to one another in such a condescending, self-denying spirit, cleansed from the stain of hypocrisy and deceit, they may be well assured that light will spring up among them more and more unto a perfect day; and then those things which at present we have next in view, will prove as shadows ready to flee away before the morning brightness of Christ's heavenly appearance and second coming, through which they will be heightened and improved to their full maturity, to the bringing in that kingdom of his that shall never be moved.

And because an essay hath been already made in a private way to obtain the first thing, that is to say, conviction, which chiefly is in the hand of the Lord to give, the same obligation lies upon the author, with respect to the second, for the exposing of it as now it is unto public view, and therein leaving it also with the Lord for his blessing thereunto.

B.

The People's Case stated.

He in whom is the right of sovereignty, and to give law, is either so of himself, or in the right of another, that may derive the same unto him; which shows that there are two sorts of sovereigns.

A sovereign in the first sense none is nor can be but God, who is of himself most absolute; and he that is first of all others in the second sense is the man Christ Jesus, to whom the power of sovereign, in the right of the Father, is committed, over all the works of God's hands. Christ exercised the same in the capacity of David's root from before the beginning of the world. He owns himself thus to be, long before he became David's seed; this, his being in spirit, or hidden being, even as a creature, the first of all creatures in personal union with the Word, David saw and acknowledged, Psalm ex. i. Thus Christ may be called God's lieutenant sovereign, or general viceregent of his supremacy over all in heaven and in earth. He therefore is the true universal king and root of all sovereign and just governing power, whether in heaven or on earth.

His sovereignty is unquestionable and unaccountable, because of the perfection of his person, carrying in it an aptitude and sufficiency to govern, without possibility of error or defect of any kind. Sovereign and governing power doth necessarily relate to subjects that are to be the ruled, and subjects capable of such government; therefore, when God himself purposes within himself to be supreme legislator and governor, he doth withal purpose the being and creation of both worlds, as the subject matter of his kingdom. He propounds to govern his subjects by and with their own consent and good liking; or without and against it, in the way of his revenging justice; governing by laws, clearly stating and ascertaining the duty or the offence, as also the rewards and penalties.

Herein just government consists, or the justice of government; for he that rules over others must be just, and, indeed, should be seen to be so in all his commands; so seen, as to render the consciences of the ruled, and those whose duty it is to obey, inexcusable before God and before men if they dissent or resist.

Inexcusable they are before God, because the matter commanded is the matter of God's law, and therefore just to be obeyed. They are also inexcusable before men, that which is required of them being generally acknowledged and affirmed (by those in whom the common consent of the subjects is intrusted to that end) to be just and reasonable, and therefore to be obeyed; for the end of all government, being for the good and welfare, and not for the destruction of the ruled, God, who is the institutor of government, as he is pleased to ordain the office of governors, intrusting them with power to command the just and reasonable things which his own law commands, that carry their own evidence to common reason and sense, at least, that do not evidently contradict it, so he grants a liberty to the subjects, or those that by him are put under the rule, to refuse all such commands as are contrary to his law, or to the judgment of common reason and sense, whose trial he allows, by way of assent or dissent, before the commands of the ruler shall be binding or put in execution; and this in a co-ordinacy of power with just government, and as the due balance thereof. The original impressions of just laws are in man's nature and very constitution of being. Man hath the law in his mind (or the superior and intellectual part of him), convincing and bringing that into obedience and subjection to the law of God, in Christ himself. He hath also that which is a law in his members that are on the earth (or his earthly and sensual part), whose power is co-ordinate with the other, but such, that if it be not gained into a harmony and conjunction with its head, the spirit or mind of man, hath ability to let and hinder his mind or ruling part from performing and putting in execution that which is good, just, fit, and to be acknowledged as the righteous dictates of the mind, which ought to be the ruling power, or law to the man: so, in the outward government over man, the secondary or co-ordinate power, concurring with that which is the chief ruling power, is essential to just government, and is acknowledged to be so by the fundamental constitution of the government of England, as well as in the legal being and constitution of Parliaments, whether that which hath been usual and ordinary, according to the common law, or that which of late hath been extraordinary, by express statute, for the continuance of the Parliament (17 Car.), until dissolved by act of Parliament:

For, together with the legal being which is given to regal power and the prerogative of the crown, there is the legal power and being reserved also unto that body, which is the people's or kingdom's representative, who are the hands wherein that which is called power politic is seated, and are intrusted with giving or withholding the common consent of the whole nation, according to the best of their understandings, in all matters coming before them, and are to keep this liberty inviolate and entire, against all invasions or encroachments upon it whatsoever.

This second power, in the very writ of summons for calling a Parliament, is declared to be of that nature, that what the first doth without obtaining the consent and approbation of the second, in Parliament, is not binding, but ineffectual, and when the representative body of the kingdom (in and with whom this power is intrusted, as the due and legal balance and boundary to the regal power, set and fixed by the fundamental constitution) is made a standing court, and of that continuance as not to be dissolvable but by its own consent; during such its continuance, it hath right to preserve itself from all violent and undue dissolution, and to maintain and defend its own just privileges, a chief of which is to bind or loose the people, in all matters good or hurtful to them, according to their best judgment and discretion.

In the exercise of this their trust, they are indemnified by law, and no hurt ought to come unto them; that governing power, which is originally in God, and flows at first from him, as the sole and proper fountain thereof, is brought into exercise among men, upon a differing and distinct account.

First, As it is a trust and right derived conditionally from God to his officers and ministers (which therefore may be lost), who, being called by him, and in the course of his providence, to the exercise of it, are to hold it of him the universal King, and to own themselves, in the exercise thereof, as his viceregents, to cut off by the sword of justice evil-doers, and to be a protection and encouragement to them that do well. But, because it is part of God's call of any person to this high trust to bring him into the possession and free exercise thereof by the common consent of the body of the people, where such sovereign power is set up, unless they have forfeited this liberty; therefore,

Secondly, God doth allow and confer, by the very law of nature, upon the community or body of the people that are related to and concerned in the right of government placed over them, the liberty, by their common vote or suffrage duly given, to be assenters or dissenters thereunto, and to affirm and make stable, or disallow and render ineffectual, what shall apparently be found by them to be for the good or hurt of that society, whose welfare, next under the justice of God's commands and his glory, is the supreme law and very end of all subordinate governing power.

Sovereign power, then, comes from God as its proper root, but the restraint or enlargement of it, in its execution over such or such a body, is founded in the common consent of that body.

The office of chief ruler, or head over any state, commonwealth, or kingdom, hath the right of due obedience from the people inseparably annexed to it. It is an office, not only of divine institution, but for the safety and protection of the whole body or community, and therefore justly and necessarily draws to it, and engages their subjection.

This office of the sovereign, according to the laws and fundamental constitution of the government of England, is ministered by the king in a twofold capacity—as his will and personal command is in conjunction and agreement with his people in Parliament during the session thereof, or as it is in conjunction and agreement with the law, the Parliament not sitting. But his will and personal command single, in disjunction and disagreement from the Parliament or the laws, hath not the force of a law, saith Fortescue, and gives the reason of it, because this is a limited monarchy, where the king's power (as to the exercise of it) is only a power politic.

The obedience, then, which from the subject is due to the king, and which they are sworn to perform by the oath of allegiance, is to him, in the ministry of the royal office, according to the reason and intent of the fundamental compact and Constitution, and according to his own oath, which is to govern by law; that is, to exercise his rule or royal commanding power in conjunction and agreement with the Parliament when sitting, and in conjunction and agreement with the laws of the land, they not sitting. To exercise his power otherwise is and hath been always judged a grievance to the people, and a going against that which is the original right and just liberty of the community, who are not to be bound to such personal commands at will and pleasure, nor compelled to yield obedience thereunto.

The contrary hereunto was the principle at bottom of the king's cause, which he endeavoured to uphold and maintain, in order to decline and lay aside the legal restraints as aforesaid, which the government of England, by the fundamental constitution, is subjected unto, as to the exercise and ministry of the royal office.

From the observation and experience which the people of England had, and made many years together, by their representatives in Parliament, of a desire in the king to shake off these legal restraints in the exercise of the regal power, and on their having tried the best ways and means that occurred to their understandings to prevent the same, and to secure to themselves the enjoyment of their just rights and liberty, they at last pitched upon the desiring from the king the continuance of the sitting of the Parliament called November 3d, 1640, in such sort as is expressed in that act, 17 Car., wherein it is provided that it shall not be discontinued or dissolved but by act of Parliament.

This was judged by them the greatest security imaginable for keeping the ministry of the royal office within its due bounds, and for quieting the people in the enjoyment of their rights; but experience hath showed that this yet could not be done without a war, the worst and last of remedies. For although their continuance as the representative body of the kingdom, with the right to exercise the power and privileges inherent in and inseparable from that supreme court and chief senate (whereof the king is head, both making but one person or politic body in law), yet they themselves, as well as the king, were bound by the fundamental constitution or compact upon which the government was at first built, containing the condition upon which the king accepted of the royal office, and on which the people granted to him the tribute of their obedience and due allegiance. This condition (as the laws and experience declare) is, that the king shall exercise his office of ruler over them according to the laws, as hath been showed, and as he and his people shall from time to time agree in common council in Parliament, for that end assembled. In respect hereof, the laws so made are called the concordats or agreements passed between the king and the subject, in the third part of Cook's Institutes.

These agreements, then, are the standard unto the king's rule and the people's obedience, signifying the justice of his commands and the dueeness of their allegiance.

But the case so happening that this conjunction and agreement, which ought to be found between the personal will of the king and representative will of the kingdom, failing, and these two wills declaring themselves in contrariety and opposition, both of them becoming standing powers, co-ordinate and distinct parts of the supremacy, as the two channels wherein the supremacy is placed and appointed to run, as to its exercise by the fundamental constitution, hence sprang the war, each asserting and endeavouring to defend and maintain their own part and right, which ought not to be kept up in disjunction and contrariety, but in unity and agreement each with other. These two parties, with their adherents, in this case, may be, according to the law, contrariety one towards another, as the law affords an example in the preamble of Cook's fourth part of his Institutes (not properly traitors), being co-ordinate powers, parts of the supremacy, that are the heads to each party, and, by consequence, have a right of making a war, as their last appeal, if they cannot otherwise agree.

Being once entered thus into a state of war and actual enmity, they do, as it were, become two nations, and cease to be under the obligations they were in before; for during this state of war and enmity, the standing laws (in a sort) cease, and a new way of rule each party forms to himself and his adherents, as may best consist for each of their safeties and preservations.

Upon this disjunction of the two wills, in the harmony and agreement whereof the supremacy is placed, these following queries do naturally arise:

First, To which or whether of these by law is the allegiance required as due—is it to be yielded to the personal will of the king single, in disjunction from the will of the representative body of the kingdom, or to the will of the people, in disjunction from the will of the king? Or is it to the personal will of the king, in conjunction with the laws, though in opposition and contrariety to the will of the kingdom's representative in Parliament assembled? Or is it to the will of the kingdom's representative, in conjunction with the laws, though in opposition to the personal will of the king?

The Second Query is, In whose judgment in this case are the people by law to acquiesce as to the declaring with whom the laws are—whether the personal judgment of the king single, or the vote of the senate, that is, the kingdom's representative body?

The Third Query is, With whom will the laws be found to go in this case, so rare, unusual, and never happening before; and who is the proper and competent judge? Also, whether the laws be not perfectly silent, as never supposing such a case possible to happen, by reason that the power used by the one for dissolving the other never before suffered the opposition to rise so high?

The Fourth Query is, Whether he, in this case, that keeps his station and place of trust, wherein God and the law did set him, with care to demean himself according to the best of his understanding, agreeably to the law and customs of Parliament, and pursuant to their votes and directions (so long as they sit and affirm themselves to be a Parliament), and uses his best endeavours in the exercise of that public trust, that no detriment in the general come unto the Commonwealth by the failure of justice, and the necessary protection due from government, without any designing or intending the subversion of the Constitution, but only the securing more fully the people's liberties and just rights from all future invasions and oppressions, be not so far from deserving to be judged criminal in respect of any law of God or man, that he ought rather to be affirmed one that hath done his duty, even the next best that was left to him, or possible for him to do in such a dark, stormy season, and such difficult circumstances?

As to the right of the cause itself, it ariseth out of the matter of fact that hath happened, and, by the just and wise providence of God, hath been suffered to state itself, in the contest between the personal will and declared pleasure of the king on the one hand, and the public will or vote of the people in Parliament on the other, declaring itself either in orders or ordinances of both Houses, or in the single act of the House of Commons asserting itself a Parliament, upon the grounds of the act 17 Car., providing against its dissolution.

This will appear with the more evidence and certainty by considering wherein either part had a wrong cause, or did or might do that which was not their duty; taking the measure of their duty from what as well the king as the people's representative are obliged unto, by the fundamental constitution of the government, which binds them in each of their capacities and distinct exercises of their trust to intend and pursue the true good and welfare of the whole body or community as their end. This, in effect, is to detain the people in obedience and subjection to the law of God, and to guide them in the ways of righteousness unto God's well-pleasing, and to avoid falling out or disagreeing about the way or means leading to that end.

Hence that party which in his or their actings was at the greatest distance from, or opposition unto, this end, and willfully and unnecessarily disagreed and divided from the other in the ways and means that were most likely to attain this end, they were assuredly in the fault, and had a wrong cause to manage, under whatever name or face of authority it was headed and upheld. And such a wrong cause was capable of being espoused and managed under the face of authority, as might be pretended unto by either part; for as the king, insisting upon his prerogative, and the binding force which his personal will and pleasure ought to have, though in distinction from and opposition to his Parliament, might depart from the end of government, answerable to his trust, and yet urge his right to be obeyed, so the public will of the people, exercised in and by the vote of their representative in Parliament, asserting itself to be of a binding force also, and to have the place of a law, though in distinction from the king and laws also (as saith the king), whatever otherwise by them is pretended, might also depart from the true end of government answerable to their trust, and yet insist upon their right to be obeyed and submitted unto, and, having power in their hands, might unduly go about also to compel obedience. It is not lawful either for king or Parliament to urge authority and compel obedience as of right in any such cases, where, according to the law of nature, the people are at liberty, and ought to have a freedom from yielding obedience, as they are and ought to have whenever any would compel them to disobey God, or to do things that evidently in the eye of reason and common sense are to their hurt and destruction. Such things nature forbids the doing of, having for that very purpose armed man with the defensive weapon of refusing to consent and obey, as that privilege whereby man is distinguished from a beast; which when he is deprived of he is made a beast, and brought into a state of perfect servitude and bondage.

Such a state of servitude and bondage may by God's just judgment be inflicted upon man for sin and the abuse of his liberty, when by God restored. The liberty which man was at first created in is that privilege and right which is allowed to him by the law of nature, of not being compelled under any pretence whatsoever to sin against God, or to go against the true good and welfare of his own being—that is to say, of his inward or outward man—but in both these cases to have and to use his just liberty to dissent and refuse to obey.

For this every man hath that in himself which by God is made a proper and competent judge; for as to all sin against God and the righteousness of his law, the light of conscience, that is to say, the work of the law, in and upon the mind or inward sense, and in conjunction with it, doth lighten every one that cometh into the world, accusing or excusing, if it be not hearkened unto and kept awake. And for all such actings as tend to the ruin and destruction of man in his outward and bodily concerns, and as he is the object of magisterial power and jurisdiction, every man hath a judgment of common sense, or a way of discerning and being sensible thereof, common to brute beasts, that take in their knowledge by the door of their senses, but is much heightened and ennobled in man by the personal union it is taken into with his intellectual part and intuitive way of discerning things, through the inward reflectings of the mind, compared with the law of God. This inferior judgment in man, when it is conjoined with and confirmed by the judgment of his superior part, is that which we call rational, or the dictates of right reason, that man hath a natural right to adhere unto, as the ordinary certain rule which is given him by God to walk by, and against which he ought not to be compelled, or be forced to depart from it by the mere will and power of another, without better evidence; that is, a higher, a greater, or more certain way of discerning. This, therefore, in Scripture, is called man's judgment or man's day, in distinction from the Lord's judgment and the Lord's day; and this is that in every individual man, which in the collective body of the people, and meeting of head and members in Parliament, is called the supreme authority, and is the public reason and will of the whole kingdom, the going against which is, in nature as well as by the law of nations, an offence of the highest rank among men; for it must be presumed that there is more of the wisdom and will of God in that public suffrage of the whole nation, than of any private person or lesser collective body whatsoever, not better qualified and principled; for man is made in God's image, or in a likeness, in judgment and will, unto God himself, according to the measure that in his nature he is proportioned and made capable to be the receiver and bearer thereof. Therefore it is that the resisting and opposing either of that judgment or will which is in itself supreme, and the law to all others (or which bears so much proportion and likeness to the supreme will as is possible for a society and community of men agreeing together for that end to contrive and set up for an administration thereof unto them), is against the duty of any member of that society, as well as it is against the duty of the body of the whole society to oppose its judgment and will to that of the supreme Lawgiver, their highest Sovereign, God himself.

The highest judgment and will set up by God for angels and men, in their particular beings, to hold proportion with and bear conformity unto (in the capacity of ruled in relation to their chief ruler), shines forth in the person of Christ, the ingrafted Word; and when, by the agreement or common consent of a nation or state, there is such a constitution and form of administration pitched upon as, in a standing and ordinary way, may derive and convey the nearest and greatest likeness in human laws, or acts of such a constitution, unto the judgment and will of the supreme Legislator, as the rule and declared duty for every one in that society to observe, it is thereby that government or supreme power comes to receive being in a nation or state, and is brought into exercise according to God's ordinance and divine institution. So, then, it is not so much the form of the administration as the thing administered wherein the good or evil of government doth consist; that is to say, a greater likeness or unlikeness unto judgment and will of the highest Being in all the acts or laws flowing from the fundamental constitution of the government.

Hence it is that common consent, lawfully and rightfully given by the body of a nation, and intrusted with delegates of their own free choice, to be exercised by them as their representatives (as well for the welfare and good of the body that trusts them, as to the honour and well-pleasing of God, the supreme Legislator), is the principle and means, warranted by the law of nature and nations, to give constitution and admission to the exercise of government and supreme authority over them and among them: agreeable hereunto, we are to suppose that our ancestors in this kingdom did proceed, when they constituted the government thereof, in that form of administration which hath been derived to us in the course and channel of our customs and laws; among which, the law and customs in and of the Parliaments are to be accounted as chief. For,

Hereby, First, The directive or legislative power (having the right to state and give the rule for the governor's duty and the subject's obedience) is continued in our laws, which as well the king as people are under the observation of; witness the coronation oath, and the oath of allegiance.

Secondly, The coercive or executive power is placed in one person, under the name and style of a king, to be put forth, not by his own single personal command, but by the significance of his will and pleasure, as the will of the whole state, in and by his courts of justice, and stated public counsels and judicatures, agreed on for that purpose between him and his people in their Parliamentary assemblies.

The will of the whole state, thus signified, the law itself prefers before the personal will of the king, in distinction from the law, and makes the one binding, the other not; so that the public will of the state, signified and declared by the public suffrage and vote of the people or kingdom in Parliament assembled, is a legal and warrantable ground for the subject's obedience in the things commanded by it, for the good and welfare of the whole body, according to the best understanding of such their representative body, by it put forth during the time of its sitting.

The body with whom the delegated vote and public suffrage of the whole nation is intrusted being once assembled, with power not to be dissolved but by their own consent, in that capacity the highest vote and trust that can be exercised, and this, by authority of Parliament, unto ex officio, or by way of office, are the keepers of the liberties of England, or of the people, by the said authority, for which they are accountable if they do not faithfully discharge that their duty. This office of keeping the liberty, which by the law of God and nature is due to the community or whole body of the people, is, by way of trust, committed by themselves to their own delegates, and in effect amounts unto this:

1. That they may of right keep out and refuse any to exercise rule and command over them except God himself, who is the supreme and universal king and governor, or such as shall agree in their actings to bear his image, which is to be just, and show, for the warrant of their exercise of sovereignty, both a likeness in judgment and will unto Him who is wisdom and righteousness itself; and the approbation and common consent of the whole body, rationally reposing that trust in them, from what is with visible and apparent characters manifest to them, of an aptness and sufficiency in them to give forth such public acts of government that may bear the stamp of God's impression upon them in the judgments they do and execute, especially being therein helped with a national council of the people's own choosing from time to time.

2. They may of right keep, hold, and restrain him or them with whom the coercive or executive power is intrusted, unto a punctual performance of duty, according to the fundamental constitution, the oath of the ruler, and the laws of the land ; and if they shall refuse to be so held and restrained by the humble desires, advice, and common consent in Parliament, and the people's delegates be invaded and attempted upon by force to deter them from the faithful discharge of this their duty, they may, in asserting their right, and in a way of their own just defence, raise armies, put the issue upon battle, and appeal unto God.

3. Such appeal answered, and the issue decided by battle, the people's delegates still sitting, and keeping together in their collective body, may of right, and according to reason, refuse the readmission or new admission of the exercise of the former rulers, or any new rulers again over the whole body, till there be received satisfaction for the former wrongs done, the expense and hazard of the war, and security for the time to come, that the like be not committed again. Until this be obtained, they are bound in duty, in such manner as they judge most fit, to provide for the present government of the whole body, that the commonweal receive no detriment.

4. In this, which is the proper office of the people's delegates, and concerns the keeping and defending the liberty and right of the whole people and nation, they may and ought, during their sitting, to exercise their own proper power and authority, the exigencies of the kingdom requiring it, although the other two estates, jointly instructed with them in the exercise of the legislative authority, should desert their station, or otherwise fail in the execution of their trusts ; yea, or though many or most of their own members, so long as a lawful quorum remains, shall either voluntarily withdraw from them, or for just cause become excluded. In this discharge of their trust for the common welfare and safety of the whole, their actings, though extraordinary and contrariant to the right of the other two, cannot be treasonable or criminal, though they may be tortuous and erroneous, seeing they are equals and co-ordinate in the exercise of the legislative power, and have the right of their own proper trust and office to discharge and defend, though their fellow-trustees should fail in theirs ; nor can nor ought the people, as adherents to their own delegates and representatives, to be reputed criminal or blameworthy by the law.

In the exercise of one and the same legislative power, according to the fundamental constitution of the government of England, there are three distinct public votes allowed for assent or dissent in all matters coming before them, the agreement of which is essential and necessary to the passing of a law : the personal vote of the king ; the personal votes of the Lords in a house or distinct body ; and the delegated vote and suffrage of the whole people in their representative body, or the House of Commons. Unto each of these appertains a distinct office and privilege proper to them.

1. The regal office, and the prerogative thereof, to the king.

2. The judicial office, to the Lords, as the highest judicature and court of justice under the king, for the exercising coercive power and punishing of malefactors.

3. The office of the keepers of the liberties and rights of the people, as they are the whole nation incorporated under one head, by their own free and common consent.

The regal office is the fountain of all coercive and executive power, pursuant to the rule set to the same by law, or the agreement of the three estates in Parliament.

The rule which is set is that of immutable just and right, according to which penalties are applicable and become due, and is first stated and ascertained in the declared law of God, which is the signification or making known by some sign the will of the supreme Legislator, proceeding from a perfect judgment and understanding, that is without all error or defect.

The will that flows from such a judgment is in its nature legislative and binding, and of right to be obeyed for its own sake, and the perfection it carries in it and with it in all its actings. This will is declared by word or works, or both. By word we are to understand either the immediate breath and spirit of God's mouth or mind, or the inspiration of the Almighty, ministered by the Holy Ghost, in and by some creature as his vessel and instrument, through which the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament were composed. By works that declare God's will, we are to understand the whole book of the creature, but more eminently and especially the particular beings and natures of angels and men, who bear the name and likeness of God in and upon their judgments and their wills ; their directing power, and their executive power of mind, which are essential to their being, life, and motion.

When these direct and execute, in conjunction and harmony with God's judgment and will, made known in his law, they do that which is right ; and by adhering and conforming themselves unto this their certain and unerring guide, do become guides and rulers unto others, and are the objects of right choice, where rulers are wanting in church or state.

The rule, then, to all action of angels or men, is that of moral or immutable just and right, which is stated and declared in the will and law of God. The first and highest imitation of this rule is the creature-being in the person of Christ. The next is the bride, the Lamb's wife. The next is the innumerable society of the holy angels. The next is the company of just men, fixed in their natural obedience and duty through faith, manifesting itself, not only in their spirits, but in their outward man, redeemed, even in this world, from the body of corruption, as far as is here attainable. The power which is directive, and states and ascertains the morality of the rule for obedience, is in the law of God ; but the original, whence all just executive power arises, which is magisterial and coercive, is from the will or free gift of the people, who may either keep the power in themselves, or give up their subjection into the hands and will of another as their leader and guide, if they shall judge that thereby they shall better answer the end of government, to wit, the welfare and safety of the whole, than if they still kept the power in themselves ; and when they part with it, they may do it conditionally or absolutely ; and while they keep it, they are bound to the right use of it. In this liberty every man is created, and it is the privilege and just right which is granted unto man by the supreme Lawgiver, even by the law of nature under which man was made.

God himself leaves man to the free exercise of this his liberty when he tenders to him his safety and immutability, upon the well or ill use of this his liberty, allowing him the choice either to be his own guide and self-ruler in the ability communicated to him to know and execute God's will, and so to keep the liberty he is possessed of in giving away his subjection or not, or else upon God's call and promise to give up himself in way of subjection to God as his guide and ruler, either absolutely or conditionally. To himself he expects absolute subjection ; to all subordinate rulers, conditional.

While man's subjection is his own, and in his own keeping, unbested and ungiven out of himself, he is not, nor cannot be, accountable by way of crime or offence against his ruler and sovereign, but may do with his own what he please, but still at his peril if he use not this his liberty as he should, to the end for which it is given him, which is by voluntary and entire resignation to become an obedient subject unto Him who is the supreme Lawgiver and rightful King, without possibility of change or defection.

Unto this right, and the lawful exercise and possession of it, this nation did arrive by the good providence and gift of God, in calling and assembling the Parliament, November 3d, 1640, and then continuing their session by an express act (17 Car.), with power not to be dissolved but by their own consent ; which was not so much the introducing of a new law, as declaratory of what was law before, according to man's natural right, in which he was created, and of which he was possessed by God, the sovereign Giver of all things.

But the passing that said act of Parliament alone was not that which restored the nation to their original right and just natural liberty, but only put them in the capacity and possibility of it. That which was wanted to make out to the nation a clearness in having and obtaining this their right, was the obligation they had put upon themselves and their posterities to their present sovereign and his authority, which in justice and by the oaths of allegiance they were solemnly bound to, in the sight of God as well as of man ; and therefore, unless by the abuse of that office of trust (to that degree as on his part to break the fundamental compact and constitution of government), they could not be set free nor restored to their original right and first liberty, especially if, together with such breach of trust, both parties appeal to God, and put it upon the issue of battle, and God give the decision ; and in consequence thereof, that original right be asserted, and possession thereof had and held for some years, and then not rightfully lost, but treacherously betrayed and given up by those in whom no power was rightfully placed to give up the subjection of the nation again unto any whatsoever.

Unto which is to be added, that how and when the dissolution of the said Parliament, according to law, hath been made, is yet unascertained, and not particularly declared ; by reason whereof, and by what hath been before showed, the state of the case on the subject's part is much altered as to the matter of right, and the usurpation is now on the other hand, there being, as is well known, two sorts of usurpers : either such as have no right of consent at all unto the rule they exercise over the subject, or such who, under pretence of a right and title, do claim, not by consent, but by conquest and power, or else hold themselves not obliged to the fundamental compact and constitution of government, but gain unduly from the subject, by advantages taken through deceit and violence, that which is not their own by law.

For a rational man to give up his reason and will unto the judgment and will of another, without which no outward coercive power can be, whose judgment and will is not perfectly and unchangeably good and right, is unwise and unsafe, and by the law of nature forbidden ; and therefore all such gift, made by rational men, must be conditional, either implied or explicit, to be followers of their rulers, so far as they are followers of that good and right which is contained in the law of the supreme Lawgiver, and no farther; reserving to themselves, in case of such defection and declining of the ruler's actings from the rule, their primitive and original freedom to resort unto, that so they may, in such case, be as they were before they gave away their subjection unto the will of another; and reserving also the power to have this judged by a meet and competent judge, which is the reason of the king and kingdom, declared by their representatives in Parliament; that is to say, the delegates of the people in the House of Commons assembled, and the commissioners on the king's behalf, by his own letters patent in the House of Peers; which two concurring, do very far bind the king, if not wholly.

And when these cannot agree, but break one from another, the Commons in Parliament assembled are ex officio the keepers of the liberties of the nation, and righteous possessors and defenders of it against all usurpers and usurpations whatsoever, by the laws of England.

C.

Vanity of Vanities, or Sir Henry Vane's Picture.(To the Tune of the Jews' Corant.)

Have you not seen a Bartholomew baby,
A pageant of policy as fine as may be,
That's gone to be shown at the manor of Raby,
Which nobody can deny?

There was never such a prostitute sight,
That ere profaned this purer light,
A hoous pocus juggling knight,
Which nobody can deny.

He was taken for a Delphic Tripus,
Quite another doubt-solving Edipus,
But the Parliament made him a very quibus,
Which nobody can deny.

His cunning state tricks and oracles,
His lying wonders and miracles,
Are turned at last into Parliament shackles,
Which nobody can deny.

*He sat late in the House so discontent,
With his arms folded and his brows bent,
Like Achitophel to the Parliament,*
Which nobody can deny.

*When first the English war began,
His father was a court trepan,
And rose to be a Parliament man,*
Which nobody can deny.

The devil ne'er see such two Sir Harrys;
Such a pest'lent pair nor near nor far is,
No, not at the Jesuits' Sorbon of Paris,
Which nobody can deny.

His dainty project of a select senate,
Is damned for a blasphemous tenet;
'Twas found in the budget ('tis said) of monk Bennet,
Which nobody can deny.

Of this state and kingdoms he is the bane,
He shall have the reward of Judas and Cain,
And 'twas he that overthrew Charles his wain,
Which nobody can deny.

Should he sit where he did with his mischievous brain,
Or if any his counsels behind do remain,
The House may be called the labour in Vain,
Which nobody can deny.

D.

Sir Henry Vane's Speech at a Committee for the Bill against Episcopal Government, June 11, 1641.

Mr. Hyde sitting in the chair.

MASTER HYDE.—The debate we are now upon is, whether the government by archbishops, bishops, chancellors, &c., should be taken away out of the Church and kingdom of England; for the right stating whereof, we must remember the vote which passed yesterday, not only by this committee, but the House, which was to this effect: That this government hath been found, by long experience, to be a great impediment to the perfect reformation and growth of religion, and very prejudicial to the civil state.

So that, then, the question will lie thus before us: Whether a government, which long experience hath set so ill a character upon, importing danger, not only to our religion, but the civil state, should be any longer continued among us, or be utterly abolished?

For my own part, I am of the opinion of those who conceive that the strength of reason already set down in the preamble to this bill by yesterday's vote is a necessary decision of this question; for one of the main ends for which church government is set up is to advance and further the perfect reformation and growth of religion, which we have already voted this government doth contradict; so that it is destructive to the very end for which it should be, and is most necessary and desirable; in which respect, certainly, we have cause enough to lay it aside, not only as useless, in that it attains not its end, but as dangerous, in that it destroys and contradicts it.

In the second place, we have voted it prejudicial to the civil state, as having so powerful and ill an influence upon our laws, the prerogative of the king, and liberties of the subject, that it is like a spreading leprosy, which leaves nothing untainted and uninfected which it comes near.

May we not, therefore, well say of this government, as our Saviour, in the fifth of Matthew, speaks of salt (give me leave upon this occasion to make use of Scripture, as well as others have done in this debate), where it is said that salt is good: "But if the salt hath lost its savour, wherewith will you season it? It is therefore good for nothing but to be cast out, and trodden under foot of men." So church government, in the general, is good, and that which is necessary, and which we all desire; but when any particular form of it hath once lost its savour, by being destructive to its own ends, for which it is set up (as by our vote already passed we say this hath), then surely, sir, we have no more to do but to cast it out, and endeavour, the best we can, to provide ourselves a better.

But to this it hath been said that the government now in question may be so amended and reformed, that it needs not be pulled quite down or abolished, because it is conceived it hath no original sin or evil in it; or if it have, it is said, regeneration will take that away.

Unto which I answer, I do consent that we should do with this government as we are done by in regeneration, in which all old things are to pass away, and all things are to become new; and this we must do if we desire a perfect reformation and growth of our religion, or good to our civil state. For the whole fabric of this building is so rotten and corrupt, from the very foundation of it to the top, that if we pull it not down now, it will fall about the ears of all those that endeavour it within a very few years.

The universal rottenness or corruption of this government will most evidently appear by a disquisition into these ensuing particulars.

First, let us consider in what soil this root grows: Is it not in the pope's paradise? do not one and the same principles and grounds maintain the papacy, or universal bishop, as do our diocesan or metropolitan bishops? All those authorities which have been brought us out of the fathers and antiquity, will they not as well, if not better, support the popedom as the order of our bishops? So, likewise, all these arguments for its agreeableness to monarchy and cure of schism, do they not much more strongly hold for the acknowledgment of the pope than for our bishops? And yet have monarchies been ever a whit the more absolute for the pope's universal monarchy, or their kingdoms less subject to schisms and seditions? Whatsoever other kingdoms have been, I am sure our histories can tell us this kingdom hath not; and therefore we have cast him off long since, as he is foreign, though we have not been without one in our own bowels. For the difference between a metropolitan, or diocesan, or universal bishop, is not of kinds, but of degrees; and a metropolitan or diocesan bishop is as ill able to perform the duty of a pastor to his diocese or province, as the universal bishop is able to do it to the whole world; for the one cannot do but by deputies, and no more can the other; and therefore, since we all confess the grounds upon which the papacy stands are rotten, how can we deny but these that maintain our bishops are so too, since they are one and the same?

In the second place, let us consider by what hand this root of episcopacy was planted, and how it came into the Church.

It is no difficult matter to find this out: for is not the very spirit of this order a spirit of pride, exalting itself in the temple of God over all that is called God? First, exalting itself above its fellow-presbyters, under the form of a bishop; then over its fellow-bishops, under the title of archbishops; and so still mounting over those of its own profession, till it come to be pope; and then it sticks not to tread upon the necks of princes, kings, and emperors, and trample them under its feet. Also thus you may trace it from its first rise, and discern by what spirit this order came into the Church, and by what door, even by the back door of pride and ambition, not by Christ Jesus. It is not a plant which God's right hand hath planted, but is full of rottenness and corruption; that mystery of iniquity which hath wrought thus long, and so fit to be plucked up, and removed out of the way.

Thirdly, let us consider the very nature and quality of this tree or root in itself, whether it be good or corrupt in its own nature: we all know where it is said, "A good tree cannot bring forth corrupt fruit, nor a corrupt tree good fruit. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" By its fruit, therefore, we shall be sure to know it; and according as the fruits of the government have been among us, either in Church or Commonwealth, so let it stand or fall with us.

And of government in the Church: First, as itself came in by the back door into the Church, and was brought in by the spirit of anti-Christ, so itself hath been the back door and inlet of all superstition and corruption into the worship and doctrine of this Church, and the means of hastening us back again to Rome. For proof of this, I appeal to all our knowledge in late years past, the memory whereof is so fresh, I need enter into no particulars.

A second fruit of this government in the Church hath been the displacing of the most godly and conscientious ministers; the vexing, punishing, and banishing out of the kingdom the most religious of all sorts and conditions, that would not comply with their superstitious inventions and ceremonies; in one word, the turning the edge and power of their government against the very life and power of godliness, and the favour and protection of it unto all profane, scandalous, and superstitious persons that would uphold their party: thousands of examples might be given of this, if it were not most notorious.

A third fruit hath been schisms and factions within ourselves, and alienation from all the Reformed Churches abroad.

And, lastly, the prodigious monster of the late canons, whereby they had designed the whole nation to a perpetual slavery and bondage to themselves and their superstitious inventions.

These are the fruits of the government in the Church. Now let us consider these in the civil state; as,

1. The countenancing all illegal projects and proceedings, by teaching in their pulpits the lawfulness of an arbitrary power.

2. The overthrowing all process at common law that reflected never so little upon their courts.

3. The kindling a war between these two nations, and blowing up the flame, as much as in them lay, by their counsels, canons, and subsidies they granted to that end.

4. The plots, practices, and combinations during this Parliament, in all which they seem to have been interested more or less.

Thus have they not contented themselves with encroachments upon our spiritual privileges, but have envied us our civil freedom, desiring to make us grind in their mill, as the Philistines did Samson, and to put out both our eyes: O let us be avenged of these Philistines for our two eyes!

If, then, the tree be to be known by its fruits, I hope you see by this time plainly the nature and quality of this tree.

In the last place, give me leave, for a close of all, to present to your consideration the mischiefs which the continuance of this government doth threaten us with, if by the wisdom of this committee they be not prevented.

First, the danger our religion must ever be in, so long as it is in the hands of such governors as can stand firmly in nothing more than its ruin, and whose affinity with the pope's hierarchy makes them more confident of the papists, than the professors of the Reformed religion for their safety and subsistence.

Secondly, the unhappy condition our civil state is in, while the bishops have vote in the Lords' House, being there as so many obstructions in our body politic to all good and wholesome laws tending to salvation.

Thirdly, the improbability of settling any firm or durable peace so long as the cause of the war yet continues, and the bellows that blow up this flame.

Lastly, and that which I will assure you goes nearest to my heart, is the check which we seem to give to Divine Providence if we do not at this time pull down this government.

For hath not this Parliament been called, continued, preserved, and secured by the immediate finger of God, as it were, for this work? Had we not else been swallowed up in many inevitable dangers by the practices and designs of these men and their party? Hath not God left them to themselves, as well in these things as in the evil administration of their government, that he might lay them open unto us, and lead us, as it were, by the hand, from the finding them to be the causes of our evil, to discern that their rooting up must be our only cure? Let us not, then, halt any longer between two opinions, but with one heart and resolution give glory to God in complying with his providence, and with the good safety and peace of this church and state, which is by passing this bill we are now upon.

E.

A Letter from a Person of Quality to a Relation of Sir Henry Vane, about a Week after the Execution.

MADAM,—If I do later than others give you an account of the share I have in the loss of your generous kinsman, it is because I would not rudely disturb the motions of so just a sorrow; but I hope that you are assured I have so real a concern in all that relates to you, that it was not necessary, by an early haste, to send you an information of it. I have, madam, while I own a love to my country, a deep interest in the public loss, which so many worthy persons lament. The world is robbed of an unparalleled example of virtue and piety. His great abilities made his enemies persuade themselves that all the revolutions in the last age were wrought by his influence, as if the world were only moved by his engine. In him they lodged all the dying hopes of his party. There was no opportunity that he did not improve for the advantage of his country. And when he was in his last and much-deplored scene, he strove to make the people in love with that freedom they had so lavishly and foolishly thrown away.

He was great in all his actions, but to me he seemed greatest in his sufferings, when his enemies seem to fear that he alone should be able to acquaint them with a change of fortune. In his lowest condition, you have seen him the terror of a great prince, strengthened by many potent confederates and armies; you have seen him live in high estimation and honour, and certainly he died with it. Men arrive at honours by several ways. The martyrs, though they wanted the glittering crowns the princes of those ages dispensed, have rich ones in every just man's esteem. Virtue, though unfortunate, shines in spite of all its enemies; nor is it in any power to deface those lasting monuments your friend hath raised of his, in every heart that either knew him, or held any intelligence with fame. But, madam, I trespass too long upon your patience. This is a subject I am apt to dwell on, because I can never say enough of it. I shall now only desire you to make use of that fortitude and virtue that raised your friend above the malice and power of his enemies; and do not, by an immoderate sorrow, destroy that which was so dear to him—yourself, but live the lively representation of his virtue, the exercise of which that made you always the admiration of

Your humble servant, &c.

The 22d June, 1662.

HENRY MARTEN.—1602–1680.

HENRY MARTEN, or, as he was more generally called, Harry Marten, was born in Oxford ("particularly, as I conceive," says Anthony à Wood, "in the parish of St. John Baptist, in a house opposite to Merton College Church, then lately built by Harry Sherburne, gentleman, and possessed at the time of Harry's birth by Sir Henry his father") in the year 1602. His father, Sir Henry Marten, LL.D., was the most eminent civilian of his time. Educated also at Oxford, he had carried off all the honours of the University, and, after leaving it, became successively judge of the admiralty, and twice dean of the arches, received knighthood, and in 1624 the appointment of judge of the prerogative. In the Parliament of 1628 he represented the University of Oxford, and in the Long Parliament sat for the borough of St. Ives, in Huntingdonshire. He acted generally with the liberal party, but his temper was moderate, and he strove to conciliate to the last.

Shortly after the birth of Harry Marten, we find Sir Henry in London. "When a lad," said one of the libellers of the famous Republican in after years, "you lived in Aldersgate-street, under the tuition of the then called 'blue-nosed Romanist' your father, who was the best civilian of our horizon, and a 'six-swingler,' as they termed him; he had but £40 per annum of his own."* Whatever his condition was then, it is quite certain that, some short time before his death, which took place in 1641, he had purchased "a fair estate, mostly lying in Berks," which Anthony à Wood adds, "his ungodly son Harry squandered away."†

Young Harry Marten was sent while yet in his boyhood to a grammar-school in Oxford, and afterward, in his fifteenth year, became a gentleman commoner of University College;‡ "where," says the author of the Athenæ, "and in public, giving a manifestation of his pregnant parts," he had the degree of bachelor of arts conferred upon him in the latter end of 1619. He then travelled for some time in France, and at his return was prevailed on by his father to consent to one of those marriages of convenience which carry in their train all kinds of misery and social wrong. "His father found out a rich wife for him," says Aubrey, "whom he married something unwillingly." After the birth of a daughter they rarely met again; but it is a touching circumstance to record, that in the last lonely years of his wretched imprisonment, this wife and daughter were the only persons in the world that seemed to recollect his existence, or that, to his own mind, gave him still some interest in life.

He offered himself for Parliament on the great election in April, 1640, to the electors for the county of Berkshire. His name had already become known as that of a man of eloquence and wit, and as the adviser of some of the most eminent public men of the time. He had contracted friendships with Hyde (Lord Clarendon), with Nathaniel Fiennes, with Hampden, and with Pym. He had also, in 1639, spiritedly refused to contribute a single sixpence towards the maintenance of a war against his fellow-countrymen in Scotland. These were his claims, and an immense majority of the Berkshire electors at once cheerfully acknowledged them.

Marten's life, up to this time, had been one of extreme gayety. "He was a great lover of pretty girls," says Aubrey, "to whom he was so liberal, that he spent the greatest part of his estate." Men wondered at first, therefore, in those times of solemnity and precision, when they saw a man so free in living, and so liberal in speech, admitted to the intimacy of the gravest and most religious men of the age. They had yet to learn, what to the penetrating glance of the leaders of this Parliament had been already revealed, that under the condemned habits of recklessness and dissipation lurked in this case one of the most active and useful dispositions, one of the most frank, liberal, and benevolent spirits—in a word, one of the best and most serviceable politicians that the country had produced.

Nor were they long in learning this. Marten at once took an active part in the proceedings of Parliament, and everybody saw that if he was the wittiest and most pleasant, he was also one of the most ardent and uncompromising of the opponents of Charles. "He was a great and faithful lover of his country," says Aubrey: "his speeches were not long, but wondrous poignant, pertinent, and witty. He was of an incomparable wit for repartees; not at all covetous; humble, not at all arrogant, as most of them were; a great observer of justice, and did always, in the House, take the part of the oppressed."* The shafts he shot at Charles struck deeper for the very reason that, in other circumstances, might have turned them aside comparatively harmless; and the name of Harry Marten, once a signal for laughter only, became a terror in Whitehall.

In the short interval between the Parliaments of April and November, Charles, ever childishly forward in showing his resentments, found an opportunity to insult this new and formidable assailant. Marten happened to be walking in Hyde Park one day as his majesty's carriage passed, when the king himself, speaking very loud, and in the hearing of many people, applied a gross expression to him. "Harry went away patiently," says Aubrey, who relates the anecdote, "sed manebat alta mente repòstum. That sarcasm raised the whole county of Berks against him." In other words, Marten was returned to the House of Commons by the electors of that county, on the summoning of the

* A letter prefixed to a libellous publication (by a reckless and notorious libertine named Gayton) called "Colonel Harry Marten's Familiar Letters to his Lady of Delight." [There is also a small quarto with the date of 1685, entitled "the Familiar Epistles of Col. Henry Marten, found in his Mistress's Cabinet," second edition. It is impossible that so much nonsense was ever penned by the colonel.—C.]

† Ath. Ox., iii., 17.

‡ He was matriculated, according to the Oxford records, on the 31st of October, 1617: "Henricus Marten, Oxoniensis militis filius, annos natus 15." famous Parliament of 1640, with greater enthusiasm than before.

* Letters and Lives, ii., 435, 436.

The rise of the Republican party in the House of Commons has been described in the life of Vane, and Marten's statesmanship has received occasional illustration there. It was natural that, in entering on a decisive course in the House of Commons, he should choose his part with the Independents, then laying with so much energy and resolution the secret and solid foundations of their power. He had most need, his enemies said (and his friends need not deny the imputation), of the divine principle of toleration which distinguished that great party. "Henry Marten," says Bishop Burnet, "was all his life a most violent enemy to monarchy, but all that he moved for was upon Roman and Greek principles. He never entered into matters of religion." The charge the bishop would imply in this passage is not a serious one. Vane and Cromwell, penetrated with all the fervours of a most earnest religious zeal, could see no purer end of government than the laughing Harry Marten proposed—that of elevating in the social scale every individual man in England, until the time might come when no Englishman should have a master, and in every corner of the island should be realized that lofty and soaring spirit which made Rome, so long as Rome remained uncorrupted and unpoisoned, a mark for the admiration of all succeeding ages. "Some persons," Hume observes, in his character of this Parliament of 1640, "partial to the leaders who now defended public liberty, have ventured to put them in the balance with the most illustrious characters of antiquity, and mention the names of Pym, Hampden, Vane, as a just parallel to those of Cato, Brutus, Cassius. Profound capacity, indeed, undaunted courage, extensive enterprise—in these particulars, perhaps, the Roman do not much surpass the English patriots; but what a difference when the discourse, conduct, conversation, and private as well as public behaviour of both are inspected! Compare only one circumstance, and consider its consequences. The leisure of those noble ancients was totally employed in the study of Grecian eloquence and philosophy, in the cultivation of polite letters and civilized society; the whole discourse and language of the moderns were polluted with mysterious jargon, and full of the lowest and most vulgar hypocrisy."* The falsehood of the pretence on which this charge was raised in the case of Pym and Vane has been shown in the course of these biographies; but as against Marten, no such pretence could even be attempted by his worst opponents. Every one admitted him to be a man of real wit, and of the most mirthful and jovial propensities—"as far from a Puritan (to use Aubrey's expression) as light from darkness." Nor was his great learning ever questioned; for it was a perpetual theme of wonder with people that he had found time for so many and such various accomplishments, living the life he had led.

Holding Republican opinions, it is the distinction of Harry Marten to have been the first who is reported to have avowed them. This is not said in praise of his wisdom, which on that point was perhaps questionable, but merely as a statement of a fact. The anecdote is told in a very interesting way in a passage of Clarendon's own life.

Hyde, Pym, Hampden, Marten, and Nathaniel Fiennes had been dining together one day, during the progress of the Episcopacy Bill, at Pym's lodgings in Westminster, when, after dinner, "Nathaniel Fiennes asked Mr. Hyde whether he would ride into the fields and take a little air, it being a fine evening; which the other consenting to, they sent for their horses, and riding together in the fields between Westminster and Chelsea, Mr. Fiennes asked him 'what it was that inclined him to adhere so passionately to the Church, which could not possibly be supported.' He answered, that 'he could have no other obligation than that of his own conscience and his reason, that could move with him, for he had no relation, or dependence upon any churchman that could dispose him to it; that he could not conceive how religion could be preserved without bishops, nor how the government of the state could well subsist if the government of the Church were altered;' and asked him what government they meant to introduce in its place. To which he (Fiennes) answered that 'there would be time enough to think of that; but assured him, and wished him to remember what he said, that if the king resolved to defend the bishops, it would cost the kingdom much blood, and would be the occasion of as sharp a war as had ever been in England; for that there was a great number of good men who resolved to lose their lives before they would ever submit to that government,' which," continues Hyde, "was the first positive declaration he had ever heard from any particular man of that party." This is a good introduction to the anecdote of Marten, which follows immediately after.

"Within two days after this discourse from Mr. Fiennes," pursues Clarendon, "Mr. Hyde, walking between the Parliament House and Westminster, in the churchyard met with Harry Marten, with whom he lived very familiarly, and speaking together about the proceedings of the Houses, Marten told him that 'he (Hyde) would undo himself by his adhering to the court;' to which he (Hyde) replied, that 'he had no relation to the court, and was only concerned to maintain the government and preserve the law;' and then told him 'he could not conceive what he (Marten) proposed to himself, for he did not think him to be of the opinion or nature with those men who governed the House;' and asked him 'what he thought of such and such men;' and he (Marten) very frankly answered that 'he thought them knaves; and that when they had done as much as they intended to do, they should be used as they had used others.' The other pressed him then to say what he desired, to which, after a little pause, he (Marten) very roundly answered, 'I DO NOT THINK ONE MAN WISE ENOUGH TO GOVERN US ALL,' which was the first word he (Hyde) had ever heard any man speak to that purpose; and would, without doubt, if it had been then communicated or attempted, been the most abhorred by the whole nation of any design that could be mentioned; and yet it appears it had even so early entered into the hearts of some desperate persons, that gentleman being at that time possessed of a very great fortune, and having great credit in his country."^{*}

* Hume's History, v., 260, 4to.

Taking all this with the proper allowances, it would seem perfectly clear that Marten was now and then too free of speech, nor sufficiently accommodated his opinions to times and places. Whatever the secret conclusions might be to which Vane, and Ludlow, and Cromwell had already in their own minds arrived, it was surely most unwise to hazard any public disclosure of them before the general intellect and moral feeling had become sufficiently ripe for the attempt, or before the perfidy and bad faith of Charles had received its utmost extent of illustration among the great body of the people.

Clarendon's imputations on Marten's good faith respecting his great political associates have no warrant or authority. He was in all things sincere—to a fault, it might be added, were it right to associate such a reproach with any order of sincerity. In all the consultations of the liberal leaders, and in all their most memorable actions during 1640 and 1641, he took a most prominent part; and though the prudence of his conduct and counsel was sometimes brought in question, he never lost his influence with the House, or the warmest friendship of its leaders; nor, it may be added, rarely failed to be justified by the event, in what seemed to more careful and cautious men the very height even of his imprudence. In a curious pamphlet by Dudley, third Lord North, then a member of the House of Commons, this receives incidental illustration in a passage which, though not correct as a statement of facts, serves to show the feeling of the House. "Businesses," the writer observes, "were not always carried on in the House according to the mind and intended order of the leading persons; for the business of that protestation made in the year 1641 had been taken into consideration at a private meeting of the grandees, and was then concluded to be unseasonable. Yet Henry Marten, being unsatisfied with their determination, moved it the next day in Parliament, and found the House so disposed as a vote was presently passed for a protestation, which was afterward worded by a select committee, and approved of in both Houses; and to this the leaders would not oppose themselves, though they considered it improper at that time."[†]

On the 4th of July, 1642, when Charles had retired from London, and was on the eve of setting up his standard at Nottingham, Marten was appointed one of those fifteen eminent and trusted persons, lords and commoners, to whom Parliament deputed the powers of a "committee of safety," "to take into consideration whatever might concern the safety of the kingdom, the defence of the Parliament, the preservation of the peace of the kingdom, and the opposing any force which might be raised against the Parliament: this committee to meet when and where they pleased." Such was the simple frame of the first executive government of the Parliament; the members receiving no inauguration—no attendance given to them—no even a stated place of meeting assigned. It is a circumstance worthy of remark, that in all the proceedings taken by the House of Commons while the question of the king's supremacy may be said to have been yet undecided, nothing was done that was not wholly indispensable; while, in the creation of any new powers or agencies of government, which the vicissitudes of public affairs might render fugitive and ephemeral, we never fail to see that their creators were most careful to give them no incidents or inducements that might unnecessarily afford the members in whom they were vested a temptation to protract their existence.

When the civil war began, and Charles issued his proclamation against the members of both Houses, Marten's name received the honour of a special exception, in common with those of Hampden and Pym, from the offer of kingly pardon. This only redoubled his exertions in the "committee of safety," and his zeal in discharging its duties involved him in many personal contentions of great warmth and passion.*

Among the earliest commissions of colonels of horse granted by order of the Parliament, we find the name of Harry Marten. His active, light-hearted, and mercurial spirit, not content with all the labours and duties imposed on him in London, sought employment also at the scene of war. The House of Commons, as an additional proof of their confidence, bestowed upon him the military governorship of Reading. He was subsequently obliged to abandon this city at the king's approach,[†] but under circumstances which left no imputation on his courage. No imputations, such as too deservedly fell on the virtuous and highly-gifted, but timid Nathaniel Fiennes, for his unfortunate abandonment of Bristol, sullied the name of Marten.

Elated by his temporary successes, Charles again addressed his misguided Commons, telling them that "his quarrel was not against the Parliament, but against particular men, who first made the wounds, and would not now suffer them to be healed, but made them deeper and wider by continuing, fostering, and fomenting mistakes and jealousies betwixt body and head, his majesty and his two Houses of Parliament; which persons he would name, and was ready to prove them guilty of high treason." He then proceeded to name Pym, Hampden, Marten, and Hollis as the chief traitors, and desired that "they might be delivered into the hands of justice, to be tried by their peers, according to the known laws of the land."[‡]

These gallant "traitors" were not relaxing any of their exertions meanwhile, and Marten, more successful as a civilian than a soldier, was once more at Westminster, engaged in fierce contests and disputes with the House of Lords. To that House he never at any time affected any attachment; and, whenever it threatened the slightest interruption to the proceedings of the Commons, he prepared himself with somewhat ostentatious glee for an encounter with their lordships. I find upon the journals of this

* Clarendon's Life, 41, 42, folio ed., 1759.

† From a curious and interesting pamphlet, called "A Narrative of some Passages in or relating to the Long Parliament, by a Person of Honour." Horace Walpole states the author to have been Dudley, the fourth Lord North.

* See the case of the Earl of Northumberland, which led to abortive proceedings between the two Houses. Parl. Hist., xii., 238-240; and Clarendon's History, iv., 17-51.

† Clarendon, iii., 318.

‡ Clarendon's Hist. of the Reb., iii., 618, restored text, Appendix E.

period a very grave complaint from the upper to the lower House, respecting some certain expressions used against the Lords in a conference by Marten, "because they were not so forward in passing ordinances for seizing the estates of delinquents" as the Commons desired them to be. The expressions were these: "I have something to deliver to your lordships in the behalf of the House of Commons. It is true, my lords, there are some privileges belonging to the House of Peers, and others to the House of Commons; and this of raising moneys you have ever solely attributed to them, since your lordships have never refused to join with them when they have brought up anything that concerns the raising of money; and therefore they expect you would not now refuse to pass this ordinance, without giving them some very good reasons for it." On turning to the Parliamentary History, we see that "the Lords debated this matter for some time, and afterward appointed a committee of ten lords to consider of a fit way how to vindicate the privilege of their House in this particular; but it is probable this matter was dropped, as the former [a previous contest with Marten of the same description], for we find nothing more of it in the journals."*

Some few days after, however, the journals present another dispute between the same parties respecting "two young horses" which had been taken out of the king's stables by a person of the name of De Luke. "The Lords ordered the horses to be restored, and De Luke to attend them to answer it. This man produced his warrant to the messenger from Mr. Marten, and Mr. Marten himself refused to return the horses, saying, 'We have taken the king's ships and forts, and may as well take his horses, lest they might be employed against us; but, however,' he added, 'he would acquaint the House of Commons therewith the next morning, who would satisfy the Lords at a conference.' This the Lords took very ill, and at the conference they told the Commons that they had resolved to write to the lord-general to recall Mr. Marten's commission; but for himself they had done nothing, in regard he was a member of their House, adding that they did apply themselves unto the Commons in all respect and civility, and did look for reparation in this business; instead of which, the Commons, on their return to the House, voted that Mr. Marten did well in not delivering the two horses till he had made them acquainted with it; that these two horses should be kept by Mr. Marten till this House gives farther order; and that the lord-general should be desired not to do anything in the business concerning Mr. Marten till he heard farther from that House."† The dispute in this case is far from assuming a dignified shape on either side, but its result surely exhibits the great folly, considering the incapacity, of their lordships. "To so low an ebb," is the pathetic remark of the compilers of the Parliamentary History, "was the authority of the House of Peers already reduced!" They had themselves to thank for it.

An anecdote of Marten, said to belong to this period, has been told by Doctor Peter Heylin.†

* Parl. Hist., xii., 240.

† Ibid., xii., 251.

‡ In his History of the Presbyterians, 452, ed. 1672.

I present it with more than a doubt of its authenticity, since no concurrent testimonies bear it out, and it is in its character very improbable. The Commons, according to Heylin's account, were always glad to avail themselves of Harry Marten's great fertility of resource in devising means of raising supplies during the difficulties that beset the opening of the war, and gave him almost unlimited power to this end. Secretly indulging, on one occasion, a particular malicious humour of his own, it occurred to him that there would be no farther use for the regalia, and that they might as well be sold for what they would bring; "whereupon," continues Heylin, "Marten, then member for Berks, having commanded the sub-dean of Westminster to bring him to the place where the regalia were kept, made himself master of the spoil; and having forced open a great iron chest, took out the crown, the robes, the sword, the sceptre, belonging anciently to King Edward the Confessor, and used by all our kings at their inaugurations; then, with a scorn greater than his lusts and the rest of his vices, he openly declares that there would be no farther use of these toys and trifles, and in the folly of that humour invests George Withers (an old Puritan satirist*) in the royal habiliments, who, being thus crowned and royally arrayed (as right well became him), first marched about the room with a stately garb, and afterward, with a thousand apish and ridiculous actions, exposed these sacred ornaments to contempt and laughter." In declining to admit the truth of this story, it would be unjust to withhold from its learned and very reverend author the praise of a skilful invention and a quick perception of the ludicrous.

Marten's indulgence of his wit and humour on all possible occasions, and his well-known careless avowals of his preference for Republican government, gave currency and plausibility to such anecdotes. The latter characteristic, indulged freely almost everywhere, at last heedlessly escaped him from his place in the House of Commons. Such avowals must always wait for their proper place and season, and in this instance both were forgotten.

The incident occurred on the 16th of August, 1643. The pages which related it are torn from the journals of the House, but Whitelocke has supplied the omission in his Memorials.‡ It occurred in the course of a debate on what were thought the scandalous expressions of a work published by one Saltmarsh, a Puritan minister, in which he urged, among other things, that "all means should be used to keep the king and his people from a sudden union; that the war ought to be cherished under the notion of popery, as the surest means to engage the people; and that if the king would not grant their demands, then to root him out and the royal line, and to collate the crown upon somebody else." Several members having strongly condemned such advice, Marten suddenly rose, and said that "he saw no reason to condemn Mr. Saltmarsh so strongly, and that it were better one family should be destroyed than many." This called up Sir Nevil Poole, who moved that "Mr. Marten should explain what one family he meant." Marten interrupted him with the remark that such a motion was needless, and boldly and bluntly answered, "The king and his children!" Upon this there was a storm in the House, and many of the members urged loudly "against the lewdness of Mr. Marten's life, and the height and danger of these words, and spoke sharply against him." Pym, then within a few short months of his death, interfered on behalf of his friend, but at the same time, on public grounds, condemned his expressions. Marten was in the end expelled the House, and committed to the Tower.* A fortnight afterward he was "ordered to be forthwith discharged, without paying any fees for his imprisonment," but he did not, till after the lapse of a year and a half, resume his seat in the House.

* And a very fine old poet.

† Page 68, ed. 1682.

Nevertheless, he continued unremittently to labour in the cause. His father had died two years before, and left him in possession of property to the amount of £3000 a year. From the moment of his accession to it, he appears to have indulged to excess his liberal tastes and "elegant desires;" the whole county of Berkshire rang with the festivities of the Vale of the White Horse;† and his personal courtesies to all classes of men gave him unprecedented popularity there. After his expulsion from the House of Commons he continued to hold his colonel's commission, and was present in several skirmishes and engagements. He also contributed, I find, out of his own resources, upward of £3000 to the Parliamentary commissioners for the maintenance of the war.‡ During its progress, it may be added, he lost estates to much larger amounts, and at its close found himself in fortune a ruined man. That ruin was ascribed (by slanderers who could never forgive him the cheerful accomplishments with which he graced a great and serious cause) to other and less worthy reasons, which these pages shall not be polluted by any farther reference to. A memoir of his life, composed as this has been with a scrupulous attention to the truth, will be in itself the best and most particular answer that can be given to all such statements.

During Marten's absence from the House, the self-denying ordinance was debated and passed. Clarendon can say, nevertheless, that Nathaniel Fiennes and Henry Marten were among those "who spoke more and warmer in favour of the self-denying ordinance than those spoke who opposed it." Marten did not resume his place in the House of Commons till nine months after that famous measure was passed;* and Nathaniel Fiennes was still in France during its discussion, whither he had retired in deep mortification at the affair of Bristol. The truth is, that the whole of the debate on this ordinance as reported in Clarendon's History is an absolute and unmitigated forgery, made for his own purposes by Clarendon, and adopted in philosophical indolence by Hume. How much history has been written in this way!

The resolution for Marten's reinstatement in the House was passed on the 6th of January, 1645-6, and, Whitelocke says, "gave occasion to some to believe that the House began to be more averse from the king." It was certainly a proof, among others, of the growing strength of the quiet and wise party of the Independents, and it is most gratifying to discover that it was proposed by Vane. Dudley Lord North, in the curious pamphlet already adverted to, describes it thus: "It was conceived now that Henry Marten might do good service as a member, and so his restitution was moved for; but answer was soon made that he was a person dead civilly, and could not be restored to life. Hereupon young Sir Harry Vane (one of the oracles of those times) arose and said, 'That the matter was very easy to be effected, by expunging out of the journal-book that order whereby he had been cast out; and that the House was ever understood to be mistress of her own orders.' This was found so ready a way as the matter was presently determined; and Henry Marten, having notice, came into the House again, disposed to do farther mischief." This is simply an exaggerated account of a course adopted to save Marten the necessity of a new election.

It is not difficult to imagine the welcome Harry Marten received on entering the House once more. His wit had been the ornament and relief of almost every debate; his graceful manner, and never-failing good-humour, had been perforce made acceptable to the sourest Puritan there; and by his gallant and unflinching adherence to Republican principles, by the respect his intellect and genius inspired, he had bound himself in the fastest friendship to Cromwell, to St. John, and to Vane. From the instant he resumed his seat until his old friend's traitorous usurpation on the Commonwealth, his name appears most prominently in every

* The same occurrence is told with a difference in Lord North's pamphlet: "Henry Marten," says his lordship, "exalted in mind by various successes, adventured to cast himself upon a rock, and thus it was: When it had been some ways expressed in the House that the good and happiness of this nation depended upon his majesty's safety, and the continuance of the royal line, Henry Marten stood up and affirmed it to be a mistake; for (as he conceived) this nation might be very happy though the royal line were extinct. Upon those words he was presently questioned, and after some debate, voted out of the House." I may add a characteristic anecdote of Pym from the same authority. It shows that on an occasion somewhat similar to the present, his address and skill were exerted with greater success on the behalf of an injudicious friend. "The House had newly received a message from his majesty, which was so far from being satisfactory as many persons spoke against it with much vehemence, and among the rest Sir Henry Ludlow (father of the great Republican), who very resolutely used these terms: 'He who sent this message is not worthy to be King of England.' Upon saying this he was immediately interrupted, and the words that were spoke agreed upon preparatory to a charge; but before his withdrawing, in order to a censure, Mr. Pym arose and said, 'That those words contained nothing of dishonour to the king,' which being found very strange, he thus cleared his meaning: 'If these words be such as a fair conclusion is naturally deducible from them, then they cannot be evil in themselves. Now that a fair conclusion naturally ariseth from them may be proved by syllogism. He who sent this message is not worthy to be King of England; but King Charles is worthy to be King of England, therefore King Charles sent not this message. Now,' saith Mr. Pym, 'I leave it to judgment whether or no this syllogism comprise anything in it worthy of censure.' This argument was so ingenious as Sir Henry Ludlow (with his ill meaning) came freely off without punishment."

† Where his principal mansion was situate. "Becket," says Aubrey, "in the parish of Shrinchem, was his chief seat—in the Vale of the White Horse, now Major Wildman's—where he was very hospitable and exceeding popular."

‡ Whitelocke's Memorials, 385, ed. 1682.

* See Whitelocke, 135 and 192. Also Journals of April 3, 1645, and January 6, 1645 (old style).

transaction of importance,* and, above all, when mercy is to be shown, or an act of liberal and kind-hearted justice done, the name of Henry Marten, and the record of his best exertions, are sure to be found not wanting.

When John Lilburne's intemperance had delivered him over into the fangs of Prynne, Marten interfered in his behalf. When he afterwards sought redress from the House of Commons, it was Marten who moved his committee and sat as its chairman. If it had been possible to have saved a man of such a temper, so grossly fond of quarrel, so self-conceited of his own honesty as to suppose he absorbed all of it himself that had been left in the world, so credulous and so suspicious, Marten would have saved him. And when it was obvious at the last that he must be left to his own wild and irreclaimable courses, it was Marten's wit which suggested that excuse for him which has passed into a familiar saying. "This very John Lilburne," says Rushworth, "after his trial, persisted in writing many books against those then in power and authority, and some particular members thereof; inasmuch as it was said by Henry Marten in favour of him, 'That if there were none living but himself, John would be against Lilburne, and Lilburne against John.'"[†]

Nor—as his attachment to Cromwell withheld him not from these kind-hearted efforts in behalf of one who, but for a superabundance of conceit and bile, might have been one of the stanchest friends to the great cause, as he had already proved one of its most courageous soldiers—did his friendship for Vane prevent his protesting on many occasions against the conduct of Vane's father. A good anecdote is told by Aubrey on this point. Having spoken somewhat sharply for some time against old Vane, and seeing some marks of pain and vexation on the countenance of his son, he suddenly interposed, "But for young Sir Harry Vane—" Fifty voices interrupted him, "What have you to say to young Sir Harry?" Marten quietly sat down. From all parts of the House (the members were in committee) the question again broke out, "What to young Sir Harry?" The wit rose with very great gravity, and observed, "Why, if young Sir Harry lives to be old, he will be old Sir Harry!" and so, says Aubrey, "sat down, and set the whole House a laughing, as he oftentimes did;" and the invective against old Vane was forgotten for that time, and some mortification saved to young Sir Henry.

And not alone for men belonging to his own party, and generally acting with it, were these happy resources called in aid by Harry Marten. "He did always," as Aubrey says in his character of him, "take in the House the part of the oppressed," no matter what their politics. The relation I am now about to give is taken from a curious pamphlet, republished in Lord Somers's tracts, and called, "A true and just Account of what was transacted in the Commons' House, when that House voted David Jenkins, Esq., a Welsh Judge, and Sir Francis Butler, to be guilty of High Treason against themselves; and likewise an Account of an excellent Speech that the said Judge intended to have spoken at the Place of his Execution, taken from the Mouth and Notes of the said Sir Francis Butler."

This Judge Jenkins was justly famous in his day as a fervent and intrepid Royalist. The offence he was now brought before the Commons to answer, among others, was that of having, in 1642, in some Welsh counties, condemned to death persons charged with being in arms against the king. On being conducted to the bar with Butler, the latter knelt as he was instructed, but the old judge peremptorily refused to do so. In the reprimand which followed, the speaker adverted in especial to this mark of contumacy, as the greater fault in him, "seeing he pretended to be knowing in the laws of the land." The relation then proceeds: "Sir Francis said during this speech of Lenthall's, Judge Jenkins had prayed him softly not to speak much; so to let all their malice fall on him only, since he was in years, and Sir Francis but young in respect to him. And when the speaker's speech was ended, Judge Jenkins asked whether they would now give him liberty to speak. 'Yes,' answered Lenthall, 'so you be not very long.' 'No,' said the judge, 'I will not trouble either myself or you with many words. In your speech, Mr. Speaker, you said the House was offended at my behaviour, in not making any obeisance to you at my coming here, and this was the more wondered at, because I pretended to be knowing in the laws of the land. In answer to which, Mr. Speaker, I say, that I thank God I not only pretend to be, but am knowing in the laws of the land (having made it my study for these five-and-forty years); and because I am so, that was the reason of such my behaviour; for as long as you had the king's arms engraven on your mace, and acted under his authority, had I come here I would have bowed my body in obedience to his writ and authority, by which you were first called; but, Mr. Speaker, since you and this House have renounced all your duty and allegiance to your sovereign and natural liege lord the king, and are become a den of thieves, should I bow myself in this house of Rimmon, the Lord would not pardon me in this thing.'"

The amazement and confusion excited by this courageous burst broke forth on all sides. "The whole House," says the narration, "fell into such an uproar and confusion, that for half an hour they could not be reduced into any order, for sometimes ten, sometimes twenty, would be speaking together; but at length the fury abated, and the House voted they were both guilty of high treason (without any trial at all), and should suffer as in cases condemned for treason. So they called for the keeper of Newgate, to know the usual days for execution in such cases. He told them it was usually on Wednesdays or Fridays; and then was debated whether it should be done on next Wednesday or Friday. Then stood up Harry Marten (the droll of that House), who had not spoken before. He said he would not go about to meddle in their vote, but as to the time of execution he had something to say, especially as to Judge Jenkins. 'Mr. Speaker,' says he, 'every one must believe that this old gentleman here is fully possessed in his head—that he is pro aris et focis mori—that he shall die a martyr for this cause; for otherwise he never would have provoked the House by such biting expressions; whereby it is apparent that if you execute him, you do what he hopes for and desires, and whose execution might have a great influence upon the people, since not condemned by a jury: wherefore my motion is, that this House would suspend the day of execution, and in the mean time force him to live in spite of his teeth;' which motion of his put the House into a fit of good-humour, and they cried, 'Suspend the day of execution.' So they were returned back to Newgate."

* He was a great favourite with the citizens of London, and spoke in the common hall very often. Some of these speeches, as that concerning Sir William Waller, are to be found among the pamphlets of the time, and are good specimens of close reasoning and a most happy style.

† Rushworth, ii., 468.

Anything more exquisite than this, wiser in fact, more benevolent or humane in purpose, more happy in its turn of wit, is not even recorded among the sayings of Harry Marten. The conclusion of the incident is well worth giving, not less for its interest in itself, than as a proof and confirmation of the sound sagacity which guided Marten in his interference on this as on every similar occasion—of the wisdom which was the undercurrent of his wit.

On their return to prison, Sir Francis Butler "asked the judge whether he had not been too hardy in his expressions to the House. 'Not at all,' said he; 'for things of a rebellious nature have been so successful in this kingdom, and have gotten such a head, that they will almost allure the weak loyal man to comply therewith, if some vigorous and brave resistance is not made against them, and to their faces; and this was the cause why I said such home things to them yesterday. And although I have opposed rebels and traitors all my life hitherto, yet I persuade myself that at the time of my execution, on the day of my death, I shall be like to Samson, and destroy more Philistines than I ever did in all my life—that is, confound their rebellious assertions; and in this thought of mine I am so wrapped up, that I hope they won't totally suspend my execution.'"

His companion's wonder may be conceived by this time to have reached an intense pitch. The brave old judge soon satisfied it: "I will now," said the judge, "tell you all that I intend to do and say at that time: first, I will eat much liquerish and gingerbread, thereby to strengthen my lungs, that I may extend my voice far and near, for no doubt there will be great multitudes at the place; and then I will come with Bracton's book hung upon my left shoulder, with the statutes at large hung upon my right shoulder, and the Bible with a riband put round my neck, and hanging on my breast. Then I will tell the people that I was brought there to die for being a traitor; and in the words of a dying man, I will tell them that I wish that all the traitors in the kingdom would come to my fate. But the House of Commons, I will then tell them, never thought me a traitor, else they would have tried me for such, in a legal manner, by a jury, according to the custom of this kingdom for a thousand years. They have indeed debarred me from my birthright, a trial by my peers, that is, a jury; but they knew, and that is it, that I am not guilty according to law. But since they will have me a traitor, right or wrong, I thought it was just to bring my counsellors with me, for they ought to be hanged as well as I, for they all along advised me in what I have done. Then shall I open Bracton to show them that the supreme power is in the king, the statute-book to read the oath of allegiance, and the Bible to show them their duties. All these were my civil counsellors, and they must be hanged with me! So when they shall see me die,"* concluded the old man, "thousands will inquire into these matters, and having found all I told them to be true, they will come to loath and detest the present tyranny."

Alas for this romantic project, not unlikely to have proved a wise one! The wit of Marten proved wiser still, and the imaginative old judge was left merely to indulge in anticipations of his day of execution, which proved as vain as they were fond.

The next service of humanity in which we find Harry Marten's wit engaged was a service to literature no less. He preserved the life of the author of Gondibert. Taking advantage of that misfortune of the poet, which the pleasant doggerel of Suckling has commemorated (no less than the questionable taste of the poet's wife, in the portrait prefixed to her edition of his works)—

"Will Davenant, ashamed of a foolish mischance
That he had got lately, travelling into France,
Modestly hoped the handsomeness of his muse Might any deformity about him excuse—taking advantage of this, when the proposition for his death was in agitation, Marten rose, and infused mercy and good-humour into the House by observing that really Will Davenant was but a rotten and imperfect subject, and that sacrifices "by the Mosaic law" were always required to be pure and without blemish. The question was deferred, and the ultimate interposition of Milton and Whitelocke completed the act of mercy.†

Merciful and kind-hearted as Marten was, however, no one had a firmer or more immovable temper when in his own view of the public interests they seemed to demand its exercise. He was the most violent and unyielding of Republicans, the first to avow that faith, and the first to pursue unflinching, and at all hazards, the great object of its realization. After the reverses of Charles had thrown him into the power of the Parliament, Marten was the resolute opponent of all accommodation that had for its basis the restoration of a limited monarchy; and in the course of one of the debates on this subject after the battle of Naseby—when one of the members had been urging on the House the still surviving reverence of the people for their monarch, as exemplified in the account of the passage of Charles (under the conduct of the Parliamentary commissioners) from Newcastle to the palace of Holmby, where, as was alleged, multitudes had thrown

* The fervid old gentleman still more fortified his friend and his own purpose at this point by reading at full length all the original passages from these authorities: it is not necessary to give them here.

† Aubrey's Lives, vol. ii. of Bodleian Letters, p. 208. The first half of the third book of Gondibert was written while in the prisons of the Commonwealth; and he quitted it thus imperfect, alleging, in ever-memorable and lofty words, that "even in so worthy a design he should ask leave to desist, when he was interrupted by so great an experiment as dying."

themselves in his way, to show him their reverence and their pity—Marten observed that he had heard of it; that the majority of the people had been afflicted with the king's evil, and sought his majesty's touch to cure them; but he was very sure, for his own part, that a touch of the great seal of the Parliament would be found to possess precisely the same virtue, and he added his preference for that.

In the long strife which followed between the Independents and the Presbyterians, and involved the fate of Charles and of the monarchy, Marten was the most active and persevering of the opponents of the king. He held that it was impossible to treat with such perfidy, constant insincerity, and bad faith as the whole of Charles's public life had exhibited, and which was now crowned by the disclosure of the contents of the cabinet left on the field of Naseby. He urged the immediate and firm settlement of a new frame of government, without present relation to the person of the king, or to questions that would be best disposed of afterward; and when, upon the refusal given by Charles to the first propositions voted him by the influence of the Presbyterians, the commissioners deputed to treat having brought back that refusal from the captive monarch, and received the thanks of the House of Commons for the way in which they had conducted themselves, Marten startled the majority of members present by suddenly getting up and asking, "Nay, are not our thanks rather due to the king, who has rejected our offers?" He had not overrated the importance of that rejection. The day that succeeded was a day of stormy debate, and in the midst of it Marten moved,* and Hazlerig seconded, that no more addresses should be made to the king; that his person should be demanded, and that Fairfax's army should march into the North, to enforce the application. "We know not," says Baillie, in a letter written at the moment, "we know not at what hour they will close their doors, and declare the king fallen from his throne."

The Independents and Republicans had indeed the advantage now, and through many difficulties and dangerous struggles (which they surmounted with the true genius of statesmen, by strength of character and elevation of aims) they pursued it home. The last thing that remained for them to subdue was the treachery of the Scottish people, or, rather, the treachery of the Scots commissioners, supported by the religious bigotry of the mass of the Scottish people. In the questions which this involved, Marten took part with an infinite zeal; and when the commissioners, in pursuance of their plan, claimed the right of interference and dictation in the terms of peace proposed at the close of 1647 to the royal prisoner, a strain of wit and eloquence, of the happiest ridicule as of the most exquisite reasoning, was poured out against them with irresistible effect by the genius of Harry Marten. The readers will be grateful for having this masterly production laid before them, which is richly entitled to that notice it would no doubt have received from the historians, if it had happened to be made up, not of wisdom and of wit, but of dulness and falsehood.

He begins in a very clear, startling, and decisive tone; the force of plain expression is, indeed, strongly illustrated throughout, and heightened not a little by occasional dashes of humour.

"TO RECTIFY, NOT TO UPBraid YOU! You have, for divers years together, been very well entreated by us of this nation, and that from a willingness we ever had, as upon all occasions, so particularly in your persons, to manifest the brotherly respect we bear towards them who sent you. Upon the same account, many former boldnesses and provocations of yours have been winked at by the Parliament, as, I am confident, your last answer would likewise be, did you not therein seem to have remained here so long as to have quite forgotten why you came.

"You may therefore please to remember that it was no part of your first business (whatever supplemental commissions may have since been procured for a farther exercise of our patience since you came among us) to settle religion, nor to make a peace in England; so as all those devout-like and amicable endeavours, for which you think to be thanked, were not only intrusions into matters unconcerning you, but so many diversions from performing, as you ought, what was properly committed to you.

"As for our religion: since the zeal of your countrymen would needs carry their care thereof so far from home, methinks their divines, now sitting with ours at Westminster, might excuse your trouble in this particular, or at least might teach you, by their practice, that your advice therein to the Parliament is to be but an advice, and that an humble one.

"As for the other particular of peace: it is true that, about three years ago, here were ambassadors from our neighbours of the Low Countries, who, having found the king almost weary of fighting, made use of their privilege, and did his errand instead of their masters'; which was with big words to beg a peace. After that, when the king's cause had nothing left to lean upon but the treachery of our false friends and servants, an ambassador from our neighbours of France did, en passant, make a certain overture of accord betwixt the crown and the head; but your employment here from our neighbours of Scotland had so little relation to peace, that your only work was to join counsels with a committee of ours in ordering and disposing such auxiliary forces as that kingdom should send into this for carrying on the war.

"As to the delays you charge upon the Parliament, in that they answer your papers sometimes late, and sometimes not at all, yet require peremptory and speedy resolutions from you, as if their dealings were unequal towards you: I hope you will give over making such constructions when you shall consider how much more business lies upon their hands than upon yours, and how much slower progress the same affairs must needs find in passing both Houses than if they were to be despatched only by four or five commissioners. Were not I conscious to this truth, and to the abundant civility they have always shown for you in their undelayed reading, present referring, and desire of complying with what you send them, so far as might consist with their duty to this Commonwealth, and that they want nothing but time to say so, I should never have presumed to trust so great a cause upon the patronage of so rude a pen; neither, indeed, is it left there, my design being to let the world imagine how strong a stream of justice runs on our side, when I dare oppose the reasons of my single bark against all the advantages of number, abilities, and countenance that you can meet me with."

* See Hollis, p. 58.

The reader needs not be told, after what I have said in the life of Vane, that the positions taken up by the Scots commissioners, backed as they were, for the most part, by the Presbyterian party in England, rendered it necessary that this decisive tone should be adopted against them. The great party, of which Marten was so eminent a member, had, indeed, reason to hate the Presbyterians nearly as much as they hated the Royalists. What the Independents had fought for through the whole of the struggle with Charles, was liberty; not liberty in one sense only, but in a sense that should pervade all things. The seven years that had been passed in toil and battle would indeed have been passed to little purpose in their view, and all the miseries of civil war been rushed into wickedly and in vain, were it all now to end in the restoration of a perfidious king, in the persecution or extirpation of sects, and in the establishment of a form of government in the Church not less exclusive and intolerant than the old. These were the objects now plainly driven at by the Scots commissioners; and in these objects the Presbyterian party in Parliament entirely sympathized, though the character they had to lose as friends to political freedom and the earliest instigators of the war made them necessarily wary and cautious in declaring their sympathy too boldly. Marten takes advantage of the latter circumstance throughout the whole of this paper with great adroitness and skill.

The severity of the following passage is much increased and strengthened by its happy homeliness:

"For order's sake, I shall take the pains to set the body of your discourse as upright as I may (its prolixity and perplexity considered) upon two feet: one is, the claim you make in behalf of the kingdom of Scotland to the inspection of, and conjunction in, the matter of our laws and the conditions of our peace; the other, mistaking the first for evinced, is your telling us what you think fit, and what unfit, for us to establish in our Church and state, and what way you conceive most proper for obtaining of a peace betwixt the king and us, together with the proofs wherewith you seek to fortify your several opinions.

"It would give your first foot too much ground to hold dispute with you upon the second; therefore, since a man may see by your forwardness in printing and publishing both these and other your transactions with the Houses, that your arguments, like the king's in his messages, are not framed so much to satisfy the Parliament as to beget in the people a dissatisfaction towards the Parliament, I will, God enabling me, take a time apart to undeceive my countrymen concerning both the king and you, by laying the hook as open as the bait in all your lines; and, for the present, apply myself only to the showing you, that when you shall have offered your counsel to the Parliament of England (as for aught I know any one man may do unto another) in matters concerning this kingdom only, though the most wholesome counsel that ever was or can be given, and the Parliament shall not approve of it, nor have so much as a conference upon it, it is no more manners in you than it would be in the same number of Spaniards, Indians, or of the most remote region of the earth, to press it again, to insist upon it, and to proclaim your unsatisfaction in it."

The pretences of the Scots, and the serious invasions they implied on the newly-achieved freedom of England, are next ably exposed. The introduction of the subject of the army is aimed not less at the Parliamentary Presbyterians.

"Let us, with your favour, consider your pretences: you do not aim, as yourselves profess, at sharing in our rights, laws, nor liberties, but in other matters, viz., such as either in their own nature, or by compact, are common to both kingdoms; which I take the more notice of, because one would suppose you to be grown kinder now than you were the other day, when you went about to make us believe that nothing in our laws did properly belong to us but the form and manner of proceeding therein, the matter of them being held in common with the kingdom of Scotland; and therefore, and for their possibility of containing something prejudicial to that kingdom, to be revised by you before they receive their perfection.

"But the truth is, you are still where you were, only the people's ears are, by this time, so habituated to the doctrines you frequently sow among them—those doctrines so improved by your seminaries, who find their own interest interwoven with yours, and the Parliament seeming but a looker on—that you persuade yourselves anything will pass that you shall set your stamp on; otherwise you would certainly have been ashamed to disavow the busying yourselves with our rights, laws, and liberties, and, with the same breath, to dispute our rights, correct our laws, and infringe our liberties.

"Nay, contrary to that moderate concession of yours, you do, in this answer, intrench upon the very form and manner of our bills and propositions; and, as if the marshalling them, the putting them into rank and file, were to be by your order, you take upon you to appoint which of our desires shall have the van, and which the rear, in this expedition.

"And (which is the most pleasant part of the story, if it would take, as truly such a thing might have done, when you and we were first acquainted), though the Parliament of England, as I told you even now, would not order the motions of the Scots army that served us in our country and for our pay but by conjunction of councils with commissioners of that kingdom, yet you (as you could not forbear meddling with our army when it was in modelling) so do in this paper continue the office you put yourselves into, of disposing, disbanding, dismembering, catechizing, and reviling this army of ours, the greatest bulwark, under God, of our liberties, and which yet had proved ineffectual if your councils had been followed or your importunities regarded.

"Since, then, your way of advising us is not in a modest or submitting manner, but as if you meant to pin your advice upon us whether we will or no, give me leave, I pray you, to examine quâ fiducia, promising you faithfully for my part that whensoever you shall bring the matters contested for within the rules of your own setting down, that is, 'either in nature or by covenant, or by treaty, to be of a mixed concernment,' I will either not deny you a 'joint interest' in them, or acknowledge myself to have no more honour nor conscience in me than he may be said to have who, being intrusted for his country, gives up their dearest rights to the next stranger that demands them without so much as arguing the point."

Great earnestness, zeal, and force are singularly united in this remarkable paper with a certain studied and cold tone of temperance, and downright homeliness of manner. The altered position of the Scots since the conclusion of the war is exquisitely illustrated in the answer to their first argument.

"Your arguments, by my computation, are five, and, if I understand them, speak thus :

"ARG. 1. 'The same common interest upon which Scotland was invited and engaged in the war, ought to be continued (so I read you, and not 'improved,' that being a wild expression, and reaching neither you nor I know whither) in making the peace.' For answer thereto, should I admit it, the word 'invited' put you in mind that your countrymen came not to the war before they were called : keep you the same method in accedendo ad consilium, and we shall still be friends. But I cannot subscribe to this position, for I believe it was a duty that the people of Scotland did owe unto themselves to give us their assistance in the late war, though they had not been invited ; yet doth it not follow from thence that when the war is ended (as you often say it is, and yet most riddingly take huge pains for peace) they are bound to mingle with us in our councils, nor help us to settle our own kingdom, which we think ourselves able to settle well enough without them—at least without their prejudice, to whom a good peace or a bad, so as it be a peace, is the same thing : for instance, the law of this land that gives me leave to pull down my neighbour's house when it is on fire, in order to the quenching of it for the securing of my own, will not authorize me, against his will, to set my foot within his threshold when the fire is out, even though I make it my errand to direct him in the rebuilding of his house, and pretend the teaching him so to contrive his chimneys as may, in all probability, prevent, for the future, a like loss to him, a like danger to myself.

"ARG. 2. You demand the same conjunction of interests to be given you that was had of you. There I join issue with you, and profess, that if ever the Parliament of England, or any authority derived therefrom, did offer to put a finger into the proper affairs of Scotland, or into the government, civil, ecclesiastical, or military, of that kingdom, and being once required to desist, did, notwithstanding, prosecute their title of advising, volentibus nolentibus, I shall readily, so far as in me lies, grant you to have a hand with us in the managing of this kingdom and the government thereof."

The next extract is of great importance, as a protest on the part of a leader of the Independents declaratory of the nature and force of the obligation of the covenant. The passage in itself is most masterly. It strengthens and establishes, it will be seen, Vane's own view of that league of which he was the author, and which, were every other record of his life destroyed, would yet permanently attest the greatness of his genius and the force of his character. With what a careless yet noble simplicity Marten describes the wise and tolerant faith of the Independents !

"ARG. 3. You affirm that the covenant entered into betwixt us makes you copartners with us in everything there mentioned ; by which reckoning, neither this nation nor that of Scotland hath any right, law, or liberty which either can properly and distinctly call its own, but both interests are jumbled together, and the two kingdoms are not confederate, but incorporated.

"Concerning the Covenant, therefore, which myself, among others, considering it first as well as I could, have taken, I shall shortly give you my sense in relation to the point before us :

"First, I do not conceive the parties to that league intended thereby to be everlastingly bound each to the other ; the grounds of striking it being merely occasional, for the joining in a war to suppress a common enemy ; accordingly, we did join ; the enemy is, if we be wise, suppressed, and the war, as you say, ended ; what should the Covenant do, but, like an almanac of the last year, show us rather what we have already done than what we be now to do ?

"Secondly, What would it do were it renewed and made perpetual ? Thus much it saith, in my opinion, and no more : whensoever you shall be violently hindered in the exercise of that religion you had among you at the time of the engagement, and shall require our assistance, we must afford it you for the removal of that violence. In like manner, whensoever we shall be so hindered in the exercise of that religion which we, according to that Covenant, shall establish here, upon request to you made for that effect, you are tied to assist us ; and so throughout all the other clauses respectively and equally ; carrying this along with you, we are hereby obliged to the reciprocal defence of one another, according to the declaration of the party wronged in any of the particulars there compromised, without being cavilled at, or scrupled by the party invoked ; whether your religion be the same it was, or ours the same it should be ; whether the bounds of your liberties or ours be not enlarged beyond their then line ; whether your delinquents or ours be justly so or no : for the native rights of both people being the principal, if not the only thing we looked on when we swore, we do not keep our oath in preserving those rights if we do not allow this master-right to each several people, namely, to be sole judges within themselves, what religion they will set up, what kind of laws they will have, what size, what number of magistrates they hold fit to execute those laws, and what offenders to be tried by them. Hereupon you know we did not inquire at all how orthodox your religion was before we vowed to maintain you in it ; that is, in the quiet professing of it, not in the theological truth of it, which last were a business for a University perhaps, not for a kingdom be- ing well assured it was established by them who had all the authority that is visible to choose for themselves, and could not, without apparent breach of order, and injury to fundamentals, be disturbed in the exercise of what they had so chosen.

"So far is the plain text of this Covenant from confounding interests, that it clearly settles and confirms them upon the several bases where it found them. And it would not be unworthy of you to take heed lest this Covenant, upon which you seem to set so high a rate, be not as easily violated as slandered, since the most deadly wars have been said at least to begin with misunderstandings."

The rationale of the famous eighth article of this treaty is now given, in a passage which, for closeness of reasoning, familiar wit of illustration, and a vigorous conciseness of style, is quite worthy of Swift. The general case of the Independents is here stated against all their opponents, whether of England or Scotland, with inimitable ease and clearness.

"ARG. 4. Your entitling yourselves to a cognizance in the conditions of our peace, and, consequently, in the matter of our laws, when they relate to an agreement, as I confess the four bills do which were sent, is grounded upon a very great mistake of the eighth article in the treaty, the words whereof are indeed very rightly recited by you, and the article itself so rational, so ordinary, so necessary, in all wars joined in by two states, that I do almost wonder as much what need there was to have inserted it, as I do how it is possible for you to mistake it. It stands briefly thus: one of you (for the purpose), and I (pardon, if you please, the familiarity of the instance), have solemnly engaged ourselves each to the other for our mutual aid against a third person, because we conceived him too strong for either of us single, or because one of us doubted he might have drawn the other of us to his party if not pre-engaged against him; but whichever of us was first in the quarrel, or whatever was the reason of the other's coming in, we are engaged; and, though there were no writings drawn betwixt us, no terms expressed, were not I the veriest skellum that ever looked man in the face if I should shake hands with the common adversary and leave you fighting? Against such a piece of baseness, supposing it be like to be in nature, this article provides, and says, that since these two kingdoms were content to join in a war, which, without God's great mercy, might have proved fatal to them both, neither of them shall be suffered to make its peace apart; so as if the Parliament of Scotland, upon consideration of reasons occurring to themselves, should offer to readmit the king into that kingdom, I say, not with honour, freedom, and safety, but in peace, the Parliament of England might step in and forbid the banns, telling them we are not satisfied that an agreement should yet be made; similiter, if this Parliament would come to any peace with him by bills or propositions, or by what other name soever they call their plasters, you may, being so authorized in name of that kingdom, or the Parliament thereof, intervene and oppose, telling us that you, who are our fellow-surgeons merely in lancing of the sore, are not satisfied in the time for healing of it up; but for you to read a lecture to us upon our medicaments and their ingredients, to take measure of wounds, and to prefer your measure before that of our own taking, was never dreamed on by the framers of this article.

"Here it may perhaps be demanded, though not by you, whether, according to my sense of the treaty, tying up both kingdoms to a consent in the flat, not in the qualis fuerit of peace, if one should be obstinately bent to hang off, the other be necessitated to weller everlastingly in blood for want of such a concurrence? I answer, yes, for these reasons:

"First, A wise man will foresee inconveniences before he makes his bargain, and an honest man will stand to his bargain, notwithstanding all inconveniences.

"Secondly, There will be no great encouragement for any obstinacy of that kind when it shall be remembered that the party obstructing the peace must continue to join in the war, and is liable to all the consequences thereof.

"Thirdly, There is another and a more natural way to peace and to the ending of a war than by agreement, namely, by conquest. I think he that plays out his set at tennis till he wins it makes as sure an end of it, and more fair, than he that throws up his racket when he wants but a stroke of up, having no other way to rook those of their money that bet on his side. If I am trusted to follow a suit in law for friends concerned therein, together with myself, and daub up a rotten compromise with my adversary, my fellows not consulted, but desiring the suit should still go on, it is not fit they should be bound thereby; but if I continue to do my duty, and bring the cause to a hearing, to a verdict thereupon, and to judgment upon that, such an end of the quarrel I hope I may make without their leave, and, if the trial went with me, certainly without their offence.

"To return to the nature of confederacies. Is the war wherein we are joined an invasion from without? Any one man of either side, if he have strength enough, hath authority enough to end it by repelling the invader. Is it a rebellion from within? It were strange to think that any law or engagement should hinder a single man from ending it, if he be able, by suppressing of the rebels. The unworthy friend in the fable, when his companion and he met a bear in the wood, might have been allowed to kill her himself, but he should not have sought his safety in a tree without taking his friend along with him.

"One thing more I shall add to justify the reason of this eighth article, such as might, for its clearness of being implied, have excused its being listed among the rest. Never did any people that joined in arms with a neighbour nation patch up a peace apart with more dishonour to itself, than either of us should do if we could imagine ourselves to be so vile; for the common enemy in this war is not a stranger unto either kingdom, but the king of both; so as whichever of the two closeth with him by itself, before consent that there shall be at all a closure, doth not only withdraw from the other those aids it should contribute, but of a sworn brother becomes an open enemy.

"Here I must observe, that as you put an interpretation upon this article which it will not bear, and, from the power you have thereby of hindering us from agreeing with the king at all, would enable yourselves to pry into the particulars of our agreement, so you do not once glance at the point which was the true, genuine scope of the article: you do not protest against our making peace with this man, and give such reasons as Jehu did upon a less occasion: you do not wonder what confidence we can repose in him, after all this experience of him, and before so much as a promise of any amendment from him: you do not warn us, by the example of your countrymen, what a broken reed we shall lean upon when we make a pacification with him: you do not remember us with what horror the Assembly of your Church did look upon his misdoings, nor what sense both kingdoms had (not of a reconciliation with him, but) of even suffering him to come near the Parliament of England until satisfaction were given for the blood which he had then caused to be shed in the three kingdoms. In fine, you do not say, for you need not give us your reasons, that you will make no peace with the king, therefore we ought not; but you do as bad as say that you have made your peace already, and that not only without our consent (in despite of the article which you urge against us), but without our privacy; that you are come to a degree beyond being friends with him, to be advocates for him; not in meditating that his submission might be accepted, his crimes obliterated, and their salary remitted, but in asserting the same cause which we have been all this while confuting with our swords—the same cause which, what Englishman or Scotsman soever shall endeavour to maintain in arms, is a declared traitor to his country; and if by his tongue or pen, in that kingdom of the two where he is no native, a manifest incendiary. But there will be time enough to do your errand into Scotland after I have proved England to be a noun substantive, against which you have the shadow of one argument left still.”

The same soundness and sagacity of view, the same vigour of understanding, at once original and practical, equal force and familiarity of illustration, and alike plainness and strength of style, are observable in his treatment of the fifth and last argument of these Scots commissioners.

“ARG. 5. The strength of your last reason is this: ‘Our Parliament hath formerly communicated unto you the matter of their propositions and of their bills in order to peace, and generally, indeed, whatever hath passed betwixt the king and us since the conjunction of the two kingdoms against him;’ thereupon you have offered us your advice concerning the particulars so communicated, and we have reconsidered them upon your advice, sometimes complying therewith, at other times making it appear to you why we could not. You say, ‘That communication of councils we would never have suffered, if we had not been bound to it, which if we ever were, we still are.’

“Custom and constant usage, I acknowledge, doth commonly obtain the name of law; but the late practice of some four or five years hath not an aspect reverend enough to deserve the name of custom. It is as old, you will say, as a usage can be that is grounded upon a treaty of the same age, and shall be sufficient to signify how the parties to the treaty did understand their own meaning. I should not deny this pretence of yours to be more than colourable, if you could prove that our transactions with the king were imparted to you in relation to that engagement; nay, if I could not show you upon what other ground we did, and that we could not reasonably be imagined to do it upon that.

“First. To prove what the Parliament had in their intentions when they advised with you, I believe you will not undertake; especially this being the first time, to my remembrance, that this point came in question betwixt us. I shall therefore endeavour to tell you, as near as I can, having been an attentive witness to most of their debates upon that subject, what it was that moved them to give your challenge so much probability of advantage as this amounts unto: you ask that now without being answered, which you were not to have without asking. You were so, and that from these two roots: one was the extraordinary care the Parliament had to omit no act, no circumstance of civility towards you, which might express or preserve the amity and correspondence betwixt them and your masters, though they were not ignorant what extreme prejudice courteous and good-natured men have often drawn upon themselves in their dealing with persons of a contrary disposition; another was, since both kingdoms have been embarked in the same cause, as men of war, and were afterward resolved to trade for peace—since the commodities of both were to be stowed in the same bottom, and bound for the same port, we thought it but an ordinary piece of friendship for us, who could make no markets when we should be arrived without your allowance, to open and let you see, before we launched, our several parcels and instructions concerning what we would export and what bring home; not that we meant to consult you what kind of merchandise you thought fittest for us to deal in (which, questionless, is better known at the Exchange than at Edinburgh), nor to follow such advice therein as you should give us without asking, any farther than we liked it (and so far the best merchant in London is content to be ruled by the swabber of his ship), but merely to the end you might, if you pleased, from our example, and from your approbation of the wares we were resolved to deal in, furnish that kingdom whose factors you were with merchandise of the same kind; and for evidence that the freedom we used towards you was no otherwise understood by you; you did actually underwrite divers of our bills of lading in these syllables, ‘The like for the kingdom of Scotland.’

“It remains to be showed how little reason there is you should fancy to yourselves such a ground of the Parliament’s former openness to you as you strive to father upon them; for, first, if they had communicated their propositions to you, as conceiving the word agreement in the eighth article to comprehend all the preparations to, materials of, and circumstances in, an agreement, they would not have adhered, as many times they did, unto their own resolutions, notwithstanding your reiterated dissatisfaction.

"Again: If they had conceived themselves bound to any such thing by this article, would they not have thought the kingdom of Scotland as much bound for their parts? Should we not have been as diligent inspectors and castigators of your propositions as you have made yourselves of ours?"

"When you shall ask me (setting the point of duty aside, and granting all that hath been done by us in this kind to have been voluntary) why we do not observe the same forwardness in communicating our matters to you, the same patience in expecting your concurrence with us, and the same easiness of admitting your harangues and disputations among us, which you have heretofore tasted at our hands, and how we are become less friendly than we were! I have this to say, there is some alteration in the condition of affairs: so long as we needed the assistance of your countrymen in the field, we might have occasion to give you meetings at Derby House, and now and then in the Painted Chamber, it being likely that the kingdom of Scotland might then have a fellow-feeling with us for the wholesomeness or perniciousness of your counsels; whereas now, since we are able, by God's blessing, to protect ourselves, we may surely, with his holy direction, be sufficient to teach ourselves how to go about our own business, at least without your tutoring, who have nothing in your consideration to look upon but either your particular advantage, or that of the kingdom whence you are; and as there is some alteration in affairs, so there is very much in persons, I mean in yourselves, unless, being indeed the same at first which now we find you, you only wanted an opportunity to appear; but, whether you be changed or discovered, what Englishman soever shall peruse the papers that you have shot into both Houses of Parliament, especially into the House of Commons, these last two years, but would as lief take advice from the king as from you! And if a stranger should read them, he would little suspect the writers for friends or counsellors, but for pleaders, for expostulators, for seekers of a quarrel; and that (which is the most bitter weed in the pot) in the behalf, not so much of them who did employ you, as of him against whom you were employed, and against whom, if you were Scotsmen, nature would teach you to employ yourselves.

"By this time I hope you see we have greater cause to repent that we have kept such thorns thus long in our sides, than to return with the dog to the same vomit, and with the lazy sow, scarce cleansed of her former wallowing, to bemire ourselves again. I bestow a little the more ink upon this point, because I would prevent like claim hereafter, and have it left to the liberty of this nation, next time they shall be invaded or oppressed, though they did once call in all their brethren of Scotland to their aid, whether they will do so any more or no."

The bitter severity, the supreme scorn of these masterly sentences, were long remembered and referred to. An entire and perfect contempt scorneth nicer phrase. The close of the paper, so remarkable in every way, illustrates with almost superior force the Republican fervour of Marten's views, the various wit of his illustrations, and the Republican plainness and strength of his style.

"Having gone through your five arguments, at the end of your dozen commandments (so I call desires that must not be slighted on pain of incurring the guilt of violating engagements, and of such dangers as may ensue thereupon), I observe one engine you use, whereon you lay more weight than upon all you say besides: it begins with a flourish of oratory, bespeaking a fair interpretation of your meaning, though your motion be to take the right eye out of every one of our heads; then you think to make your desires legitimate with fathering them upon a kingdom, and put us in mind how well that kingdom hath deserved to reign over this; for to the offering of desires, as desires, there needs no merit, sure; but since your opinion (that the advantages of honour lie all on that side, and that obligations of this sort have not been as reciprocal between both nations as those of leagues and treaties) will force my pen upon this subject, I shall let you know that somewhat may be said, when modesty gives leave, on this side too; and yet all the kindnesses we have received from Scotland shall, by my consent, not only be paid for, but acknowledged; and I can be content to believe that our neighbours did not know how ill we were till we were almost past cure, and therefore came slowly to us; that they did not know how well we were in a year after we had nothing for them to do, and therefore went slowly from us; only I would have it confessed that the fire we talk of was of your countrymen's kindling, began to burn at your house, to be quenched at ours, and by our hands.

"But admit this nation had been merely passive in this war, and did owe their deliverance out of the king's talons wholly to the Scots nation: if the rescuer become a ravisher, if they have protected their own prey, they have merited only from themselves, and have their reward in their own hands. What have we gotten by the bargain? What have we saved? What have we not lost? For if once you come to fetch away my liberty from me, I shall not ask you what other thing you will leave me; and the liberty of a people governed by laws consists in living under such laws as themselves, or those whom they depute for that purpose, shall make choice of. To give out orders is the part of a commander; to give laws, of a conqueror; although our Norman did not think fit so to exercise his right of conquest; nay, our condition would be lower and more contemptible if we should suffer you to have your will of us in this particular, than if we had let the king have his; for,

"First, A king is but one master, and therefore likely to sit lighter upon our shoulders than a whole kingdom; and if he should grow so heavy as cannot well be borne, he may be sooner gotten off than they. You shall see a Monsieur's horse go very proudly under a single man, but to be chargé en croupe is that which nature made a mule for, if nature made a mule at all.

"Secondly, The king never pretended to the framing and imposing of laws upon us, as you do: he would have been content with such a negative voice therein as we allow you in the making of our peace with him. Did we fight rather than afford him so much, though seemingly derived unto him from his predecessors; and shall we tamely give you more—give you that which your ancestors never yet durst ask of ours?

"Thirdly, It had been far more tolerable for the king than for any foreign nation to have a share in the making of our laws, because he was likely to partake, and that largely, in the benefit of them, if good; in the inconveniences, if bad; which strangers are not; nay, contrarily, it is matter of envy and jealousy betwixt neighbours to see each other in a flourishing estate: so as the proper end of laws being to advance the people for whom they are made in wealth and strength to the uttermost, they are the most incompetent judges of those laws in the world whose interest it is to hinder that people from growing extremely rich or strong.

"But what hath been already said, and by a word or two of close, it will, I hope, appear, that the claim you make to the voting with us in the matter of our laws and the conditions of our peace, as a thing whereunto we should be obliged by agreement, is,

"1. Mistaken in matter of fact, there being no such engagement on either side.

"2. Unreasonable, for the considerations above mentioned, and for being destructive to the very principles of property.

"3. Unequal (notwithstanding the reciprocity), more than Cyrus's childish judgment was, in making the little boy change coats with the great one, because his was long and the other short; for our coats are not only longer than yours, but as fit for us that do wear them as for you that would.

"4. Unusual, there being no precedent for it that I could ever read or hear of; and yet there have been leagues betwixt states of a stricter union than this betwixt us, as offensive and defensive, ours only defensive.

"5. Unsafe, for the keeping up of hedges, boundaries, and distinctions (I mean real and jurisdictional ones, not personal and titular) is a surer way to preserve peace among neighbours than the throwing all open. And if every man be not admitted wise enough to do his own business, whoever hath the longest sword will quickly be the wisest man, and disinherit all his neighbours for fools.

"6. Impossible to be made good to you, if it had been agreed; for the Parliament itself, from whom you claim, hath not, in my humble opinion, authority enough to erect another authority equal to itself.

"As for your exhortations to piety and loyalty, wherewith you conclude: when you have a mind to offer sacrifice to your God and tribute to your emperor (since the one will not be mocked, and the other should not), you may do well to do it of your own; and to remember THAT THE LATE UNNATURAL WAR, WITH ALL THE CALAMITIES THAT HAVE ENSUED THEREON, TOOK ITS RISE FROM UNNATURAL ENCROACHMENTS UPON THE SEVERAL RIGHTS AND LIBERTIES OF TWO NATIONS, RESOLVED, IT SEEMS, TO HOLD THEIR OWN WITH THE HAZARD OF A WAR, AND ALL THE CALAMITIES THAT CAN ENSUE THEREON."

The result of these exertions against the Scots by Marten and his friends was to establish the irreparable breach so long desired, and prepare the way for the last victory of the Independents. The four bills embodying the conditions of treaty were sent to the king for his assent.* The Scots commissioners arrived at the Isle of Wight exactly one day later than the commissioners of the Parliament, and with much formality delivered to the king a protest against the bills, but with the secret object of pressing an alliance with Charles that should put an end to the ascendancy of Cromwell, of Vane, and their bitter assailant Marten. The weak and perfidious king rejected the bills of the Parliament, and at the same instant signed a secret treaty with the Scots, by which he bound himself to renounce Episcopacy, and accept the Covenant in solemn Parliament of both kingdoms. By this act he renounced also forever the character which has so long and so idly been ascribed to him, of the Church of England's martyr. They who say he died for the Church of England cannot say also that he refused to set his hand to the surrender of it. After the treaty the Scots left the Isle of Wight to prepare for war with their brethren of England, and the Parliamentary commissioners returned to London with that news which Vane, Cromwell, Marten, and Ireton were only waiting for to induce them to begin their operations at once for changing the form of government of this country from a monarchy into a republic.

Marten drew up a resolution, which was supported with startling force by Ireton and Cromwell in a short debate recorded by Clement Walker.† The resolution declared "that they would offer no farther addresses or applications to the king; that no addresses or applications should be made by any one without leave of the two Houses; and that whoever contravened this order should be liable to the penalties of treason." After a violent speech from Sir Thomas Wroth in support of the resolution, according to Clement Walker, Ireton rose, and spoke with calm but fatal moderation. He said that "the king had denied that protection to the people which was the condition of obedience to him; that after long patience they should now at last show themselves resolute; that they should not desert the brave men who had fought for them beyond the possibility of retreat or forgiveness, and who would never forsake the Parliament unless the Parliament first forsook them." After some farther debate, Walker adds, "Cromwell brought up the rear." It was time, he said, to answer the public expectation, that they were able and resolved to govern and defend the kingdom by their own power, and teach the people that they had nothing to hope from a man whose heart God hardened in obstinacy. "Do not," he concluded, "let the army think themselves betrayed to the rage and malice of an irreconcilable enemy, whom they have subdued for your sake, from whom they should meet revenge and justice; do not drive them to despair, lest they seek safety by other means than adhering to you, who will not stick to yourselves; and (laying his hand on his sword) how destructive such a resolution in them would be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to judge." A division after this debate, involving the principle of the resolution, was carried by a majority of 141 to 92, and established beyond question the power of the Independent or (now) Republican party. The Lords, after two days' delay, concurred with the Commons, and a declaration from the Republican officers attested with opportune force the gallant devotion of the army. Charles's last reasonable chance had now disappeared forever!

* Clarendon has altogether misrepresented the nature of these bills, and directly and unequivocally falsified the description of the last two of them.—See Godwin's History of the Commonwealth, ii. 474, note.

† Hist. of Independency, p. 70. Walker's account is borne out by this very striking passage of a pamphlet by May on the "Origin and Progress of the Second Civil War." It is to be found in Masere's Select Tracts, vol. i., 108. "On the third of January, the House of Commons debated of this denial of the king: the dispute was sharp, vehement, and high about the state and government of the Commonwealth; and many plain speeches made of the king's obstinate averseness, and the people's too long patience. It was there affirmed that the king, by his denial, had denied his protection to the people of England, for which only subjection is due from them; that, one being taken away, the other falls to the ground; that it is very unjust and absurd that the Parliament (having so often tried the king's affections) should now betray to an implacable enemy both themselves and all those friends who, in a most just cause, had valiantly adventured their lives and fortunes; that nothing was now left for them to do but to take care for the safety of themselves and their friends, and settle the Commonwealth (since otherwise it could not be) without the king.

In all the subsequent proceedings against him Marten acted a foremost and distinguished part. Relying on the good faith of Oliver Cromwell, at this time the most intimate of his friends, he assisted him to the utmost, in common with the other Republicans, in strengthening the civil influences and power of the army. Supposing Cromwell to have already formed to himself his secret projects of ambition, it must nevertheless be admitted that the measures in which Vane and Marten now co-operated with him were not such as seemed likely to conduce to a scheme of personal usurpation. These measures had become absolutely necessary to meet the determined and fierce hostility of two great parties, the Presbyterians and the Royalists (still strong even in their defeat, because the known prejudices and habits of a great majority of the English people in favour of a monarchical executive secretly sustained some of the weakest points of their cause); and Vane and Marten could scarcely have supposed that in promoting the organization of an armed and enthusiastic democracy with a view to surmount these potent obstacles, they were not doing everything within their then limited means to advance the cherished project of a pure republic. But this question, so far as Vane is concerned in it, has already been discussed. Marten's belief in Cromwell's sincerity lasted longer than Vane's, not less, perhaps, because of a less subtle and more relying temper, than that he was, by reason of his commission in the army, more mixed up with the absolute personal interests of that great body.

When Fairfax began his ominous advance upon London, after the famous rendezvous at Newmarket, Marten joined him in his capacity as colonel, and was understood not only to have taken an active share in the various consultations of the officers, but to have assisted Ireton in his famous papers and representations to the House of Commons, drawn up on behalf of the army. Let those who imagine such conduct to have directly favoured the subsequent establishment of military despotism first understand what these representations were. "We are not," says the preamble of one of them, "a mercenary army, hired to serve any arbitrary power of state, but called forth and conjured by the several declarations of Parliament to the defence of our own and the people's just rights and liberties; and so we took up arms in judgment and conscience to those ends, and are resolved—according to your first just desires and declarations, and such principles as we have received from your frequent informations and our own common sense concerning these our fundamental rights and liberties—to assert and vindicate them against all arbitrary power, violence, and oppression, and all particular interests and parties whatsoever." This consideration should, indeed, never be lost sight of in pronouncing upon the events of this memorable crisis. When these men saw that all they had fought and bled for in fields where their courage and genius for command had revived memories of the men of Cressy and of Poitiers—when they saw the dearly-won liberty at last within their grasp, endangered by the exclusive and intolerant views of the Presbyterians, they merely stepped out of the ranks wherein they had not fought for hire, but for the interests of their children and their homes, and, as citizens, threw their weight into the scale of parties, with a demand that those interests might not be sacrificed again to the predominance of bigotry or intolerance, no matter what the form they might assume.

A subsequent passage in the paper already quoted will illustrate farther the exact sympathy of Marten and the officers, up to this period and beyond it, with the views of Vane and with the purest doctrines of popular government. "And because," they said, "the present distribution of elections for Parliament members is so very unequal, and the multitude of burgesses for decayed or inconsiderable towns (whose interest in the kingdom would in many not exceed, or in others not equal, ordinary villages) doth give too much and too evident opportunity for men of power to frame parties in Parliament to serve particular interests, and thereby the common interest of the whole is not so minded, or not so equally provided for, we therefore farther desire, That some provision may be now made for such distribution of elections for future Parliaments as may stand with some rule of equality or proportion, as near as may be, to render the Parliament a more equal representative of the whole; as, for instance, that all counties, or divisions and parts of the kingdom (involving inconsiderable towns), may have a number of Parliament-men allowed to their choice proportionably to the respective rates they bear in the common charges and burdens of the kingdom, and not to have more, or some other such like rule. And thus a firm foundation being laid, in the authority and constitution of Parliaments, for the hopes at least of common and equal right and freedom to ourselves and all the freeborn people of this land, we shall, for our parts, freely and cheerfully commit our stock or share of interest in this kingdom into this common bottom of Parliaments; and though it may, for our particulars, go ill with us in one voyage, yet we shall thus hope, if right be with us, to fare better in another." Two centuries were allowed to pass, and a new settlement of the Constitution and the crown was suffered to be made, before the simple, wise, and manly claims of these Republican officers, headed by the mild and modest Fairfax, the resolute Cromwell, the pure and lofty-minded Ireton, the witty, light-hearted, and so-called mercurial Harry Marten, were conceded to the English people!

Some months after the date of this representation from the army, when the Presbyterians, assisted by some disturbances among the people, and certain desperate intrigues on the part of the king and the Cavaliers, had rallied once again and held momentary sway in the capital, another and a final body of "proposals" was issued from the council of officers. It had been prepared by Ireton and Marten. Its sincerity has been doubted by shrewd and well-judging writers, on the ground that these men were too stanch Republicans to entertain seriously any project that should have for its basis the restoration of the king. This reason, however, is scarcely admissible. Undoubtedly Ireton and Marten were stanchest Republicans; Republicans in theory no less than practically convinced Republicans; Republicans because they held, with the better spirits of Greece and Rome, that man in civil subjection to his fellow-man is incapable of being all that man in the abstract is qualified to be; and Republicans also, because of their practical experience of the utter insincerity, falsehood, and perfidy of the present monarch; but yet, admitting all this, it should not have withheld them from negotiating, under the present distracted circumstances of the kingdom, a certain and immediate purchase of liberty and good government, on behalf and for the advantage of the great mass of their fellow-citizens, even at the sacrifice of the form and the name they loved. And this was what they did in drawing up these memorable proposals. They imbodyed under them the immortal design of what has been called in modern days, "a monarchy surrounded with Republican institutions," or what Montesquieu would have better called "a republic in disguise."

Had Charles accepted these proposals, and with sincerity redeemed them, his throne and his life would have been saved. He rejected them with infatuated scorn,* and both were lost. He placed secret reliance still upon the divisions in the city and the Parliament, and, clinging to his detested fondness for intrigue, abandoned himself to the worst fate that awaited him.

Some extracts from these proposals will startle the reader. They present a system of civil and religious reform so entire and perfect, and condense, in a series of compact proposals,

* See Memoirs of Sir John Berkeley in Masere's Select Tracts, i., p. 366-369. Mr. Hallam most justly remarks of the general character of the proposal, that "the terms were surely as good as Charles had any reason to hope. The severities against his party were mitigated. The grand obstacles to all accommodation, the Covenant and Presbyterian establishment, were at once removed; or, if some difficulty might occur as to the latter, in consequence of the actual possession of benefices by the Presbyterian clergy, it seemed not absolutely insuperable; for the changes projected in the constitution of Parliament, they were not necessarily injurious to the monarchy. That Parliament shall not be dissolved until it had sat a certain time, was so salutary a provision that the triennial act was hardly complete without it. It is, however, probable, from the king's extreme tenaciousness of his prerogative, that those were the conditions that he found it most difficult to endure."—Const. Hist. i. 286 such a mass of philosophical legislation, as, after a two centuries' march of intellect over the English nation, her liberal ministers and representatives are still only struggling to attain to. In the very Parliament which now sits at Westminster, the same propositions are actually under discussion which formed the major part of these proposals from the council of officers drawn up by Ireton and Marten, and laid upon the table of the House of Commons at the close of 1649 by the younger Vane!*

The paper opens with a stipulation that the "things hereafter proposed," having been provided for by the Long Parliament, that famous assembly should be dissolved "within a year at most." A plan for reform in the representation is then propounded thus:

1. "That Parliaments may biennially be called, and meet at a certain day, with such provisions for the certainty thereof as in the late act was made for triennial Parliaments, and what farther or other provision shall be found needful by the Parliament to reduce it to more certainty; and upon the passing of this, the said act for triennial Parliaments to be repealed.

2. "Each biennial Parliament to sit one hundred and twenty days certain, unless adjourned or dissolved sooner by their own consent; afterward to be adjournable or dissolvable by the king: and no Parliament to sit past two hundred and forty days from their first meeting, or some other limited number of days now to be agreed on; upon the expiration whereof, each Parliament to dissolve of course, if not otherwise dissolved sooner.

3. "The king, upon advice of the council of state, in the intervals betwixt biennial Parliaments, to call a Parliament extraordinary, provided it meet above seventy days before the next biennial day, and be dissolved at least sixty days before the same, so as the course of biennial elections may never be interrupted.

4. "That this Parliament and each succeeding biennial Parliament, at or before adjournment or dissolution thereof, may appoint committees to continue during the interval, for such purposes as are, in any of these proposals, referred to such committees.

5. "That the elections of the Commons for succeeding Parliaments may be distributed to all counties, or other parts or divisions of the kingdom, according to some rule of equality or proportion, so as all counties may have a number of Parliament members allowed to their choice proportionable to the respective rates they bear in the common charges and burdens of the kingdom, or, according to some other rule of equality or proportion, to render the House of Commons, as near as may be, an equal representative of the whole; and in order thereunto, that a present consideration be had to take off the elections for burgesses for poor, decayed, or inconsiderable towns, and to give some present addition to the number of Parliament members for great counties that have now less than their due proportion, to bring all, at present as near as may be, to such a rule of proportion as aforesaid.

6. "That effectual provision be made for future freedom of elections and certainty of due returns.

7. "That the House of Commons alone have the power, from time to time; to set down farther orders and rules for the ends expressed in the two last preceding articles, so as to reduce the election of members of that House to more and more perfection of equality in the distribution, freedom in the election, order in the proceeding thereto, and certainty in the returns; which orders and rules, in that case, to be as laws.

* Parl. Hist., xvi., 210.

8. "That there be a liberty for entertaining dissents in the House of Commons, with a provision that no member be censurable for aught said or voted in the House, farther than to exclusion from that trust, and that only by the judgment of the House itself."

In the succeeding passages it is proposed that the judicial power of both Houses should be strictly limited and defined, and that the formation and attributes of grand juries, the magistracy, and the sheriffs should be better and more justly regulated. How little modern reformers have discovered! how much less they have achieved!

9. "That the judicial power, or power of final judgment in the Lords and Commons, and their power of exposition and application of law, without farther appeal, may be cleared; and that no officer of justice, minister of state, or other person adjudged by them, may be capable of protection or pardon from the king without their advice and consent.

10. "That the right and liberty of the Commons of England may be cleared and vindicated as to a due exemption from any judgment, trial, or other proceeding against them by the House of Peers, without the concurring judgment of the House of Commons; as also from any other judgment, sentence, or proceeding against them other than by their equals, or according to the law of the land.

11. "The same act to provide that grand-jurymen may be chosen by and for several parts or divisions of each county respectively, in some equal way, and not remain, as now, at the discretion of an under-sheriff, to be put on or off; and that such grand-jurymen for their respective counties may, at each assize, present the names of persons to be made justices of peace, from time to time, as the country hath need for any to be added to the commission; and at the summer assize to present the names of three persons, out of whom the king may prick one to be sheriff for the next year."

This most masterly evidence of statesmanlike genius stipulates next, that the king's power over the militia be subject to the advice of Parliament, and a council for ten years; that the disqualifications for civil privilege, and compositions for estates incurred by delinquents (adherents to the royal standard), should be settled by a mitigated scale of remarkable moderation and magnanimity; and that for the liberty, security, happiness, and peace of the kingdom, there should be passed acts respectively of confirmation, indemnity, and oblivion. Then came the following noble conditions:

"An act to be passed to take away all coercive power, authority, and jurisdiction of bishops, and all other ecclesiastical officers whatsoever, extending to any civil penalties upon any; and to repeal all laws whereby the civil magistracy hath been or is bound, upon any ecclesiastical censure, to proceed, ex officio, unto any civil penalties against any persons so censured.

"That there be a repeal of all acts or clauses in any act enjoining the use of the Book of Common Prayer, and imposing any penalties for neglect thereof; as also of all acts, or clauses in any act, imposing any penalty for not coming to church, or for meetings elsewhere for prayer or other religious duties, exercises, or ordinances; and some other provision to be made for discovering of Papists and Popish recusants, and for disabling of them, and of all Jesuits or priests, from disturbing the state."

In other words, that tests, and penalties, and obligations of force upon the conscience were not the means. It is a pity that this valuable discovery in morals and in legislation is so grievously wanting of universal application, even now! The next propositions are these:

"That the taking of the Covenant be not enforced upon any, nor any penalties imposed upon the refusers, whereby men might be constrained to take it against their judgments or consciences; but all orders or ordinances tending to that purpose to be repealed.

"That (the things here before proposed being provided for settling and securing the rights, liberties, peace, and safety of the kingdom) his majesty's person, his queen, and royal issue, may be restored to a condition of safety, honour, and freedom in this nation, without diminution to their personal rights, or farther limitation to the exercise of the legal power than according to the particulars aforesaid."

A supplement of residuary matters followed, which it was desired no time should be lost by the Parliament in despatch of, since they would tend, "in a special manner, to the welfare, ease, and just satisfaction of the kingdom." Some of these are striking to the last degree in their application to the present day, to its wants and claims. They begin by demanding "that the just and necessary liberty of the people to represent their grievances and desires by way of petition may be cleared and vindicated," and that, "in pursuance of the same, the common grievances of the people may be speedily considered of and effectually redressed." Several are thus particularized, and the majority of them still wait redress! They ask, for instance, that "the excise may be taken off from such commodities whereon the poor people of the land do ordinarily live, and a certain time to be limited for taking off the whole." They demand that "the oppressions and encroachments of forest laws may be prevented for the future," and that "all monopolies, old or new, and restraints to the freedom of trade, be taken off." They stipulate next that "a course may be taken, and commissioners appointed, to remedy and rectify the inequality of rates, being upon several counties, and several parts of each county, in respect of others, and to settle the proportions for land-rates to more equality throughout the kingdom; in order to which, we shall offer some farther particulars, which we hope may be useful." And they require, in words of sad and significant import at this time, that "the present unequal, troublesome, and contentious way of ministers' maintenance by tithes be considered of, and some remedy applied." They proceed to claim, afterward, that simple reform of the law in ordinary processes, which is wanted still, in asking that "the rules and course of law, and the officers of it, may be so reduced and reformed, as that all suits and questions of right may be more clear and certain in the issues, and not so tedious nor chargeable in the proceedings as now; in order to which, we shall offer some farther particulars hereafter."

I transcribe the demand which follows with a mingled feeling of astonishment, of regret, and shame. What miseries—miseries more frightful, because hidden from the universal gaze, and borne in secrecy and silence—have since flowed from the injustice for which this demand suggested a simple and effectual remedy—that very remedy which is at this moment, with a melancholy and almost hopeless earnestness, prayed for by the thousands of heart-broken men who are the last victims to that accursed principle of the infamy of poverty which is here condemned by the statesmen of the seventeenth century, and which, with the passage of two hundred years, has not yet ceased its disgrace and reproach to the English character and name. They require "that prisoners for debt, or other debtors, who have estates to discharge them, may not, by embracing imprisonment or any other ways, have advantage to defraud their creditors, but that the estates of all men may be some way made liable to their debts (as well as tradesmen are by commissions of bankrupt), whether they be imprisoned for it or not; and that such prisoners for debt, who have not wherewith to pay, or at least do yield up what they have to their creditors, may be freed from imprisonment, or some way provided for, so as neither they nor their families may perish by their imprisonments." The stipulations which succeed are dictated by the same noble spirit of justice and humanity. "Some provisions to be made that none may be compelled, by penalties or otherwise, to answer unto questions tending to the accusing of themselves or their nearest relations in criminal causes, and no man's life to be taken away under two witnesses. That consideration may be had of all statutes, and the laws and customs of corporations, imposing any oaths, either to repeal, or else to qualify and provide against the same, so far as they may extend or be construed to the molestation or ensnaring of religious and peaceable people merely for nonconformity in religion."

Such were the views and sentiments, and such the genius for government, of the men who now (to resume the narrative), upon another temporary ascendancy of the Presbyterians after the vote of non-addresses—upon seeing the former solemn resolution of the House mocked by the commencement of another personal treaty with the king—upon a melancholy conviction of the absolute insincerity and inveterate perfidy of Charles's friends, prepared themselves for the last decisive steps that should overthrow the English monarchy. Fairfax and his officers, in a body, presented a remonstrance to the House, calling for the immediate breaking up of the treaty, and for justice on the king as the "capital source of all grievances."* At about the same instant they seized once more the person of the king, and "Colonel Harry Marten," Rushworth tells us,†

"went hence to Lieutenant-general Cromwell." He left London suddenly and joined that leader, still engaged against the Scots. His purpose, no doubt, was to consult with him respecting the menacing attitude taken by the Presbyterians. After some days' absence, he returned to London as suddenly as he had quitted it.

The Presbyterians had been warding off the army remonstrance by successive adjournments. The remonstrance was now followed up by the more startling announcement of the resolve of the army "to purge the House," since by that means only they could stop the treaty. The Presbyterians, plucking up an unwonted courage on the eve of their last defeat, at once determined, by a division of 133 to 102, to go into discussion of the treaty. In this discussion Vane was defeated on his famous motion for a return to the vote of non-addresses, after a speech in which he stated the question openly as between a monarchy and a republic, by a division of 140 to 104. There had been, according to Prynne, upward of 340 members present during this discussion; but many, from age and infirmity, had been unequal to the fatigue of sitting through the whole day and night till nine next morning, the period of the duration of the adjourned debate.

Next morning (the army having advanced meanwhile from Windsor upon London) the city guard was withdrawn from Westminster by its commander Skippon, and the posts were occupied by three regiments under the command of Sir Hardress Waller, Colonel Hewson, and Colonel Pride. The latter officer, with a list in his hand, took his station at the door of the House of Commons, and as the members entered and were identified by the doorkeeper and Lord Grey of Groby, who stood near Pride for the purpose, arrested in succession, and during a period of three days, the Presbyterian majority, in all upward of a hundred and fifty members, several of whom were afterward unconditionally restored. The little that need be urged respecting this measure has been glanced at in the Life of Vane. That great statesman at once withdrew from a scene in which such an outrage on the foundation of all that had been done for the past seven years of war, and of all that he yet hoped to do for the people—a popular and representative body—had become fatally necessary in the views of those with whom he had heretofore acted. It is probable he at once saw the mischievous purposes such a precedent might suggest in the breast of Cromwell—a thought which does not seem to have yet occurred to any of the other trusted leaders of the Independents. Marten's faith in Cromwell was certainly still undisturbed.

Cromwell arrived in London the second day after the purge; and it was Henry Marten, who, having entered the House of Commons with him that day, "arm in arm," afterward rose from his place and moved that the speaker should return him thanks for his great and eminent services performed in the course of the campaign.* This was done with acclamation; and the day after, the two Houses adjourned to the 12th of the then month, December, 1648-9.

* Rush, vii., 1331. Parl. Hist., xvi. † Vol. vii., 1265

* Wood's Ath. Ox., iii., 1239. Journals. Clement Walker, 34.

Several meetings of the council of the army took place in the interval of this adjournment, at which the treatment of the king was of course warmly debated. "At this consultation of the first commanders in the army," says a Royalist writer, "Marten, as a colonel, attended, and he cut the matter short by telling them 'they should serve his majesty as the English did his Scotch grandmother—cut off his head.' This horrid advice was adopted, and he was the first to dispose of everything for the completion of the villany." This must be taken with allowance; but it may be admitted that he was the first to utter openly, at this great crisis, as he had done on occasions less important, the thoughts that lay lurking in the breasts of the majority of his associates.

The first step against the life of the king attempted in the House of Commons was taken on the 23d of December, when, in the discussion of one of the proposals of the army that "justice should be done upon delinquents," Charles the First was mentioned by name as the capital delinquent, and a committee of thirty-eight appointed to prepare charges against him. The most prominent members of this committee were Henry Marten and Thomas Scot, the latter a man of genius and courage, variously accomplished, a masterly orator, and an ardent Republican. Widdrington and Whitelocke, the keepers of the seal, were also on the committee, but on being sent for on the second or third day of its deliberations, they "went out of town together, that they might have no concern in the business."*

Another anecdote of Marten's share in these deliberations rests also on Royalist authority. A witness (Sir Purbeck Temple) swore against him on his trial that he overheard from a place of concealment one of the consultations previous to the king's trial, at which Cromwell and Marten, and many others, were present, in the course of which much doubt and anxiety were expressed; and he overheard Cromwell ask the others, "I desire you to let us resolve here what answer we shall give the king when he comes before us; for the first question that he will ask us will be, By what authority and commission do we try him?" to which none answered presently; then, after a little space, Henry Marten, the prisoner at the bar, rose up and said, "In the name of the Commons and Parliament assembled, and all the good people of England," which none contradicted."

Charles had meanwhile arrived at Windsor, and on the 28th received an ominous order from the council of war that he should no longer be served by cupbearer or carver on bended knee, and that the other ceremonials of regal state had been ordered to be discontinued. The end was now in view, and Charles prepared to meet it with becoming firmness. The last scene of all, once bounded with hopelessness, is no longer a difficult scene to act; and from this instant, in the heroic sufferings of the man, we are only too much inclined to forget the part he had played as king. "Is there anything more contemptible," he asked of his faithful Herbert, "than a despised prince?" But over that character he threw a pathetic lustre, which we seek for in vain throughout his high and palmy days.

On the same ominous 28th of December, an ordinance for the king's trial was carried into the House of Commons. Some days before, Marten, Ireton, and Ludlow had been added to the committee of executive government at Derby House, and measures were now in progress there for the alteration of all the insignia of government into symbols of a republic.

On the 1st of January, the committee of thirty-eight, having sat and examined witnesses, reported to the House of Commons a charge against the king, beginning with the terrible words, "That the said Charles Stuart, being admitted King of England, and therein trusted with a limited power to govern by and according to the laws of the land, and not otherwise; and, by his trust, oath, and office, being obliged to use the power committed to him for the good and benefit of the people, and for the preservation of their rights and liberties; yet, nevertheless, out of a wicked design to erect and uphold in himself an unlimited and tyrannical power, to rule according to his will, and to overthrow the rights and liberties of the people; yea, to take away and make void the foundations thereof, and of all redress and remedy of misgovernment, which, by the fundamental constitutions of this kingdom, were reserved, on the people's behalf, in the right and power of frequent and successive Parliaments, or national meetings in council: he, the said Charles Stuart, for accomplishing of such his designs, and for the protecting of himself and his adherents in his and their wicked practices to the same ends, hath traitorously and maliciously levied war against the present Parliament and the people therein represented." In support of this, various overt acts are recited, including the battles of Edge Hill, Newbury, and Naseby.

The ordinance and the charge were sent up to the Lords on the 2d of January (with a resolution from the Commons that it is treason for the king to levy war against the Parliament and kingdom), and at once unanimously rejected. It is curious, however, that their lordships at the same time "adjourned for a week," which, in the circumstances of the country, was tantamount to a declaration that they would take no farther part in the conduct of its affairs. In the light of an abdication the Commons certainly seem to have considered it; for on the 3d of January Marten went up to "examine the journal-book of the House of Peers, to see how the business stood as to the resolution and ordinance." On his return, the ordinance was at once directed to be brought in anew; six lords and three judges before named were ordered to be omitted, and an addition made of two sergeants, Bradshaw and Nicholas. The ordinance, with these alterations, was immediately read a first and second time, and the resolution revoked of treason against the king in the name of the Commons only, it having before been voted with a blank for the Lords. On the day following this, they passed, with closed doors, these three momentous resolutions: "That the Commons of England, in Parliament assembled, do declare, That the people are, under God, the original of all just power; and do also declare, That the Commons of England, in Parliament assembled, being chosen by representing the people, have the supreme power in this nation; and do also declare, That whatsoever is enacted or declared for law by the Commons in Parliament assembled, hath the force of a law; and all the people of this nation are concluded thereby, although the consent and concurrence of king or House of Peers be not had thereto."

* Whitelocke, Journal of 26th of December.

On the 6th, the ordinance was read a third time and passed. The number of commissioners named in it was 135.* Of these there were Viscount Lisle, son to the Earl of Leicester; Lord Grey of Groby, son to the Earl of Stamford; Lord Monson, of the kingdom of Ireland; General Lord-viscount Fairfax; Lieutenant-general Cromwell, Major-general Skippon, Commissary-general Ireton, Colonel Marten, and all the colonels of the army; with three sergeants-at-law, John Bradshaw, Robert Nicholas, and Francis Thorpe; the speaker of the House of Commons and five barristers, Alexander Rigby, Roger Hill, Miles Corbet, John Lisle, and William Say; five aldermen of London, one knight of the Bath, eleven baronets, and ten knights. Of these commissioners, eighty-two were members of the House of Commons.† The only great name of the time absent from the list was the name of Sir Henry Vane the younger.‡

On the 8th of January, the commissioners sat for the first time in the Painted Chamber in Westminster Hall. Fifty-three were present, including Fairfax, who never appeared again. Counsel* and the officers of the court were nominated at this sitting; due proclamation was made in Westminster Hall by the sergeant-at-arms of the coming trial; and a similar proclamation was demanded of the House of Commons to be made at the old Exchange and in Cheapside, which was made accordingly.

On the 9th of January, the report of the committee for the construction of a new great seal was carried into the House of Commons by Henry Marten.* It recommended that on the one side there should be engraved the map of England and Ireland, with the inscription, "the Great Seal of England," and on the other, a representation of the House of Commons, with the inscription, "In the first year of freedom, by God's blessing RESTORED." The instructions of the committee were at once adopted, and the new seal ordered to be prepared with all convenient despatch.†

Marten used on another and more memorable occasion this word of remarkable import, RESTORED. Mr. D'Israeli has related the anecdote in his ingenious memorials of Charles the First,‡ and I subjoin it in his words: "In drawing up the remonstrances of the army, which changed the monarchy into a commonwealth, this Sheridan of his day had said, 'restored to its ancient government of Commonwealth.' A member rose to reprimand, and to wonder at the impudence of Harry Marten, asserting the antiquity of Commonwealth, of which he had never before heard. The wit rejoined by a whimsical illustration of the propriety of the term, and the peculiar condition of the man who had now heard it for the first time. 'There was,' said Harry, 'a text which had often troubled his spirit concerning the man who was blind from his mother's womb, but at length whose sight was restored to the sight which he should have had.' The witticism was keen, though almost as abstruse as the antiquity of an English commonwealth." This illustration was keen indeed, and by no means so abstruse as Mr. D'Israeli supposes.

On the 10th the commissioners again met, and chose the president of their court in the person of John Bradshaw, sergeant-at-law and chief justice of Chester. To preside on so ex-

* In the original ordinance the names are said to have been 150. If from this number we take away nine, and then add two, the result ought to be 143. There were, therefore, other omissions and variations.

† Of these 135, seventy-one was the largest number ever present at the trial. Sixty-seven were present on the day when sentence was pronounced. Forty-three only appeared the next day, when the execution was ordered. Fifty-nine signed the death-warrant. Some few of the commissioners attended the preliminary meetings in the Painted Chamber, but never sat as judges. From forty to fifty of the commissioners appear never to have taken any part in the proceedings, notwithstanding the summonses ordered by the court, and the exertions of the sergeant-at-arms.

‡ The name of Algernon Sidney appears in it, but he only attended the preliminary meetings in the Painted Chamber, and never attended the court after the trial commenced. His own allusion to the trial remains, and he is too distinguished a person to have his opinion omitted on an occasion so memorable. He says, "I was at Penshurst when the act for the king's trial passed, and, coming up to town, I heard that my name was put in. I presently went to the Painted Chamber, where those who were nominated for judges were assembled. A debate was raised, and I positively opposed the proceeding. Cromwell using these formal words, 'I tell you, we will cut off his head with the crown on it,' I replied, 'You may take your own course, I cannot stop you; but I will keep myself clear from having any hand in this business;' and saying thus, I immediately left them, and never returned. This is all that passed publicly. I had indeed an intention, which is not very fit for a letter."—Blencowe, p. 237. It is not, perhaps, difficult to fix what this intention was. Clarendon says that, among the more violent party against the king, there were three opinions: one was for deposing him, another for secret assassination, and a third for bringing him to public trial as a malefactor. It was the last of these opinions that Sidney states himself to have opposed. The mode of secret assassination we well know to have been most alien to his nature. There cannot be a question but that, with Vane, he would have preferred the deposition of Charles.

* "To Mr. H. Marten," says one of the Royalist writers, "was referred all the alterations in the public arms, in the great seal, and the legends upon the money. It was singular that the cross made a part of the first. Upon the money was a shield, bearing the cross of St. George, encircled with a palm and olive-branch, inscribed, 'The Commonwealth of England;' and on the reverse, 'God with us, 1648,' which gave occasion to some to remark that God and the Commonwealth were not on the same side."

† In Whitlocke's Memorials the vote is thus recorded: "Votes that the present great seal shall be broken, and a new one forth with made; and, in the mean time, all proceedings under the present great seal to be good till the new one be confirmed. That the arms of England and of Ireland shall be engraven on one side of the new great seal, with this inscription, 'the Great Seal of England.' That on the other side of the seal shall be the sculpture, or map of the House of Commons sitting, with these words engraven on that side: 'In the first year of freedom, by God's blessing restored, 1648.' This was, for the most part," adds Whitlocke, "the fancy of Mr. Henry Marten, a noted member of the House of Commons, more particularly the inscriptions." It is, perhaps, worth adding, that on the very day of these votes, Whitlocke and Widdrington, by mutual agreements, made their appearance in the House, that they might not, by inference, be included among the members who refused all concern with the present government. Whitlocke, in a very curious, and certainly ingenious passage of his memorials, remarks: "January 12, we heard demurrers, forenoon and afternoon, in the queen's court: the counsel were more peremptory and unsatisfied than ordinary, and used us like declining officers." The next day he says, "Some told us, for news, that new commissioners of the great seal were to be appointed, Sergeants Bradshaw, Thorpe, and Nicholas. This was supposed to be discourse only, as some would have it."

‡ Vol. v., 428.

traordinary an occasion, it is most justly observed,* demanded from the man who was appointed to the office great courage, great presence of mind, sound judgment, a composed and impressive carriage, and a character unstained with reproach or the imputation of any vice. And such a man was Bradshaw. "Being of a distinguished family," says Milton, in his Defensio secunda pro populo Anglicano,† "he devoted the early part of his life to the study of the laws of his country. Thence he became an able and an eloquent pleader, and subsequently discharged all the duties of an uncorrupt judge. In temper neither gloomy nor severe, but gentle and placid, he exercised in his own house the rites of hospitality in an exemplary manner, and proved himself on all occasions a faithful and unfailing friend. Ever eager to acknowledge merit, he assisted the deserving to the utmost of his power. Forward at all times to publish the talents and worth of others, he was always silent respecting his own. No one more ready to forgive, he was yet impressive and terrible when it fell to his lot to pour shame on the enemies of his country. If the cause of the oppressed was to be defended, if the favour or the violence of the great was to be withstood, it was impossible, in that case, to find an advocate more intrepid or more eloquent, whom no threats, no terrors, and no rewards could seduce from the plain path of rectitude."

The counsel for the prosecution were next fixed upon, and the choice fell on Steele, Coke, Dr. Dorislaus, and Aske. Steele was named attorney to the court, and Coke solicitor. Steele being prevented from attending the court by real or pretended sickness, the task principally fell upon Coke. It is somewhat singular, as Mr. Godwin remarks, that this person, in his travels in early life, trod almost exactly upon the steps of Milton. At Rome he spoke so openly against the corruptions of the Catholic Church, that it was not judged safe for him to continue any longer in that place; and at Geneva he resided some months in the house of Diodati, the professor of theology, with whom Milton also formed an intimate friendship. His skill as a lawyer was acknowledged by his enemies; and, indeed, it is impossible to read the speech he drew up for the trial without admiring its strength and acuteness.

* Godwin, Hist. of Com.

† Milton was Bradshaw's kinsman by the mother's side. The whole of the original passage in which Bradshaw is delineated is too noble and too appropriate for omission here. "Est Joannes Bradscianus (quod nomen libertas ipsa, quacunq; gentium colitur, memorie sempiternae celebrandum commendavit), nobili familia, ut satis notum est, ortus; unde patris legibus addiciendis, primam omnem aetatem sedulo impendit; dein consultissimus causarum ac disertissimus patronus, libertatis et populi vindex acerrimus, et magnis reipublice negotiis est adhibitus, et incorrupti iudicis munere aliquoties perfunctus. Tandem uti regis iudicio praesidere vellet, a senatu rogatus, provinciam sane periculosissimam non recusavit. Attulerat enim ad legum scientiam ingenium liberale, animum excelsum, mores integros ac nemini obnoxios; unde illud munus omni prope exemplo majus ac formidabilius, tot scicriorum pugionum ac inanis petitis, ita constanter, ita graviter, tanta animi cum presentia ac dignitate gessit atque implevit, ut ad hoc ipsum opus, quod jam olim Deus edendum in hoc populo mirabili providentia decreverat, ab ipso numine designatus atque factus videretur, et tyrannicidarum omnium gloriam tantum superaverit, quanto est humanius, quanto justius, ac majestatis plenius, tyrannum judicare, quam iudicandum occidere. Alii qui nec tristis, nec severus, sed comis ac placidus, personam tamen quam suscepit tantam, æqualis ubique sibi, ac veluti consul non unius anni, pari gravitate sustinet: ut non de tribunalis tantum, sed per omnem vitam iudicare regem diceret. In consiliis ac laboribus publicis maxime omnium indefessus, multique par unus; domi, si quis alius, pro suis facultatibus hospitalis ac splendidus, amicis longe fidelissimus, atque in omni fortuna certissimus, bene merentes quoscunque nemo citius aut libentius agnoscit, neque majore benevolentia prosequitur; nunc pios, nunc doctos, aut quavis ingenii laude cognitos, nunc militares etiam et fortes viros ad inopiam reductos suis opibus sublevat; iis si non indigent, colit tamen libens atque amplectitur; alienas laudes perpetuo prædicare, suas tacere, solitus; hostium quoque civillium, si quis ad sanitatem rediit, quod experti sunt plurimi, nemo ignoscitur. Quid si causa oppressi cuiuspiam defendenda palam, si gratia aut vis potentiorum oppugnanda, si in quenquam bene meritum, ingratitude publica oburganda sit, tum quidem in illo viro, vel facundiam vel constantiam nemo desideret, non patronum, non amicum, vel idoneum usq; et intrepidum, vel disertiorum alium quisquam sibi aptet; habet, quem non minime dimovere recto, non metus aut munera propositio bono atque officio, vultusque ac mentis firmissimo statu dejicere valent."

These awful preliminaries having been completed with that solemn publicity which befitted such an occasion, the king was brought privately from Windsor to St. James's, and on the following morning, the 20th of January, 1649, conducted by Colonel Harrison from St. James's to Westminster. A scene awaited him there, which called, and not in vain, for an exercise of dignity and firmness unsurpassed in the history of kings.

Westminster Hall, fitted up as a "high court of justice," received him. In the centre of the court, on a crimson velvet chair, sat Bradshaw, dressed in a scarlet robe, and covered by his famous "broad-brimmed hat,"* with a desk and velvet cushion before him, Say and Lisle on each side of him, and the two clerks of the court sitting below him at a table, covered with a rich Turkey carpet, on which were laid the sword of state and a mace. The rest of the court, with their hats on, and, according to Rushworth, "in their best habits," took their seats on side benches hung with scarlet. A numerous guard of gentlemen carrying partisans divided themselves on each side. Such was the simple appearance in itself of this memorable court. When its members had all taken their seats, the great gates of the Hall were thrown open, and the vast area below was at once filled with crowds of the English people, eager to witness the astonishing spectacle of a monarch brought to account for crimes committed in the period of his delegated authority. This presence of the people was the grandest feature of the scene. Surrounding galleries were also filled with spectators.

Charles entered, and advanced up the side of the Hall next the Thames, from the house of Sir Robert Cotton. He was attended by Colonels Tomlinson and Hacker, by thirty two officers holding partisans, and by his own servants. The sergeant-at-arms, with his mace, received him and conducted him to the bar, where a crimson velvet chair was placed for him, facing the court. After a stern and steadfast gaze on the court, and on the people in the galleries on each side of him, Charles placed himself in the chair, and the moment after, as if recollecting something, rose up and turned about, looking down the vast hall, first on the guards which were ranged on its left or western side, and then on the eager waving multitude of the people which filled the space on the right. No visible emotion escaped him; but as he turned again, his eye fell upon the escutcheon which bore the newly-designed arms of the Commonwealth, on each side of which sat Oliver Cromwell and Henry Marten,* and he sank into his seat. The guard attending him divided on each side of the court, and the servants who followed him to the bar stood on the left of their master.

* This was a thick, high-crowned beaver, lined with plated steel. It is to this day preserved at Oxford.

Bradshaw now addressed the king, and told him that the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, being deeply sensible of the evils and calamities which had been brought on the nation, and the innocent blood that had been spilled, and having fixed on him as the principal author, had resolved to make inquisition for this blood, and to bring him to trial and judgment; and had therefore constituted this court, before which he was brought to hear his charge, after which the court would proceed according to justice. Coke, the solicitor, then delivered in, in writing, the charge, which the clerk read. The king endeavoured to interrupt the reading, but the president commanded the clerk to go on, and told Charles that if he had anything to say after, the court would hear him. The charge stated that he, the king, had been intrusted with a limited power to govern according to law, being obliged to use that power for the benefit of the people, and the preservation of their rights and liberties; but that he had designed to erect in himself an unlimited power, and to take away the remedy of misgovernment, reserved in the fundamental Constitution, in the right and power of frequent and successive Parliaments. It then proceeded to enumerate the principal occasions on which, in execution of his purpose of levying war on the present Parliament, he had caused the blood of many thousands of the free people of this nation to be shed; and it affirmed all these purposes and this war to have been carried on for the upholding a personal interest of will and power, and a pretended prerogative to himself and his family, against the public interest, and common right, liberty, justice, and peace of the people of this nation. The charge being read, the president demanded Charles's answer.

During the reading Charles is said to have smiled at the words "tyrant" and "traitor" which occurred in the course of it; but, two or three minutes after, a trivial incident changed the current of his thoughts, and gave him a more awful sense of the situation in which he stood. "In touching Coke gently on the shoulder with his cane, and bidding him 'Hold!' its gold head dropped off, and he who was accustomed to be served with eager anticipation and slavish genuflection, was left to take it up himself. This omen is said to have waked his superstition. It was no less calculated to affect him through his reason."<†

He had rallied, however, before the demand of Bradshaw for his answer, and replied to it with great ability, and in a very grave and collected manner. He observed that, not long before, in the Isle of Wight, he had been engaged in a treaty with both Houses of Parliament, and that the treaty had been very near a conclusion. He knew not, therefore, by what authority he had been brought there, other than the authority of thieves and robbers. He saw no House of Lords in that court, and he affirmed that a king also was necessary to constitute a Parliament. He said that he had a trust committed to him by God, and derived to him by old and lawful descent, and that he would not betray it by answering to a new and unlawful authority. He concluded that, when he was satisfied of the authority by which he was brought there to answer, he would proceed farther. Bradshaw at once, and in a speech of much subtlety, overruled the objection to the competency of the court, and ordered the counsel to proceed.

The second and third days of the trial were consumed in similar discourses. The court would not allow the authority by which they sat there to be disputed, and the king desired that he might give his reasons. This produced interruption and altercation. The president informed him that the court was satisfied of the authority by which they sat there, and that they overruled his demurrer. They then caused the king's contumacy to be recorded, by which he refused to plead before them.*

The fourth and fifth days of the trial were employed in hearing witnesses, the court having determined that, though the king refused to plead, they would proceed to this examination ex abundanti only, for the farther satisfaction of themselves. The court sat during these days in the Painted Chamber. On the sixth day the commissioners were engaged in determining and voting the sentence with which the trial was to be completed.

The duty of "preparing the draught of a final sentence, with a blank for the manner of death," was now intrusted to Henry Marten (who had attended every day of the trial), to Thomas Scot, to Henry Ireton, to Harrison, Say, Lisle, and Love. The next day (the 26th of January) this sentence was engrossed at a private meeting, and the 27th appointed for the last sitting of the court.

On that memorable and most melancholy day, the king was brought for the last time to Westminster Hall. As he proceeded along the passages to the court, some of the soldiers and of the rabble set up a cry of "Justice!" "Justice, and execution!" This, Mr. Godwin justly remarks, exactly corresponds with the spirit of the mutiny which took place in the army in November, 1647. These men distrusted the good faith of their leaders; and, seeing that six days had now passed without any conclusion, suspected, as the manner of rude and ignorant men is, that there was some foul play and treachery. One of the soldiers upon guard said, "God bless you, sir." The king thanked him; but his officer struck him with his cane. "The punishment," said Charles, "methinks, exceeds the offence." The king, when he had retired, asked Herbert, who attended him, whether he had heard the cry for justice, who answered he did, and wondered at it. "So did not I," said Charles: "the cry was no doubt given by their officers, for whom the soldiers would do the like, were there occasion.*

* D'IIsraeli, v., 429.

† History from Mackintosh, vi., 119; in which volume, I may add, the principal incidents of the Commonwealth are most ably, and in a philosophic spirit and temper, related by the historian.

* Godwin, ii., 673.

Placed for the last time at the bar, Charles, without waiting for the address of Bradshaw, whose appearance betokened judgment, desired of the court that, before an "ugly sentence" was pronounced upon him, he might be heard before the two Houses of Parliament, he having something to suggest which nearly concerned the peace and liberty of the kingdom. The court would at once have rejected this proposal (which was, in effect, tantamount to a demand for the reversal of all that had been done, and a revocation of the vote that had been passed, declaring the people, under God, the original of all just power, and that the Commons' House in Parliament, as representing the people, were the supreme power) but for the expressed dissatisfaction of Commissioner Downes, a timid and insincere man, in consequence of which the sitting was broken up, and the court retired to deliberate in private. They returned in half an hour with a unanimous refusal of the request.

It is supposed by many writers that Charles purposed, in case they had assented; to resign the crown in favour of his son; but if so, it has been fairly asked,* Why did he not make the offer known in some other way? It would have produced its effect as certainly if promulgated in any other mode, and would, at all events, have bequeathed to posterity the full knowledge "to what extremity he was willing to advance for the welfare of his people, and to save his country from the stain of regicide." The supposition of that intention does scarcely, in fact, seem probable. Charles had wedded himself to his kingly office, and had now accustomed himself to look on death as the seal that should stamp their union and the fame of martyrdom indelibly and forever. His real purpose in making the request must remain a secret, equally with the well-considered motives of the commissioners in refusing it.

Bradshaw now rose to pronounce the sentence. "What sentence," he said, "the law affirms to a tyrant, traitor, and public enemy, that sentence you are now to hear read unto you, and that is the sentence of the court." The clerk then read it at large from a scroll of vellum. After reciting the appointment and purpose of the high court, the refusal of the king to acknowledge it, and the charges proved upon him, it concluded thus: "for all which treasons and crimes, this court doth adjudge that he, the said Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy, shall be put to death by severing his head from his body." Then Bradshaw again rose and said, "The sentence now read and published is the act, sentence, judgment, and resolution of the whole court;" upon which, all the commissioners stood up by way of declaring their assent. The unhappy king now solicited permission to speak, but was refused. The words which passed between him and Bradshaw are worthy of record, as a most pathetic consummation of the melancholy scene. The fortitude and dignity which had sustained Charles throughout appears at last to have somewhat given way, but in its place we recognise a human suffering and agony of heart to the last degree affecting. "Will you hear me a word, sir?" he asked. "Sir," replied Bradshaw, "you are not to be heard after the sentence." "No, sir?" exclaimed the king. "No, sir, by your favour," retorted the president. "Guards, withdraw your prisoner." Charles then exclaimed, with a touching struggle of deep emotion, "I may speak after the sentence! By your favour, sir! I may speak after the sentence! EVER! By your favour—" A stern monosyllable from Bradshaw interrupted him, "Hold!" and signs were given to the guards. With passionate entreaty the king again interfered. "The sentence, sir! I say, sir, I do—" Again Bradshaw said "Hold!" and the king was taken out of court as these words broke from him: "I am not suffered to speak. Expect what justice other people will have!"

In the short interval that remained to him, every consolation of spiritual advisers, or of the society of Friends, was granted by the governors of the Commonwealth. He passed the 28th of January, which was Sunday, alone with Doctor Juxon, engaged in exercises of devotion. On the Monday he received the farewell visit of his children. At this moment he might himself have said, with his old and betrayed friend Strafford, "Put not your trust in princes!" None of the princes of Europe had offered an intercession in his favour. A republic alone, that of the United Provinces, interposed with a desire that his life might be spared.*

The warrant for his execution—the "bloody warrant," as history calls it—had meanwhile (on the 29th) been signed by the fifty-nine commissioners, who have by that act made their names memorable forever.† A scene of an

* Other and more brutal outrages, such as the soldiers puffing the smoke of their tobacco in his face, have been repeated and reiterated in print, and are yet gross fabrications.—(See Brodie, iv., 199, note.) Clarendon and Warwick say that one or more of the soldiers spit in Charles's face. But both Clarendon and Warwick were at a distance from the scene; Herbert, who was constantly near the king, says no such thing. Whitelocke also, an unexceptionable witness, is silent. In Rushworth, p. 1425, we find the words put into Charles's mouth, on the cry of the soldiers, "Poor souls! for a piece of money they would do as much for their commanders." But it is not denied that several of the latter parts of Rushworth's Collections were tampered with after his death, and before their publication. The words in question are, in fact, copied from Sanderson, p. 1132. Milton (Defensio Secunda) has given himself the trouble to contradict the tale, that one of the soldiers was destroyed for saying God bless you, sir. The passion of succeeding times was to run a parallel between the last days of Charles and the crucifixion of Christ. "Suffering many things like to Christ" is Sanderson's expression. [The 30th of January is still regarded as a fast-day in the English Church, and a service for morning and evening, in commemoration of KING CHARLES THE MARTYR, is to be found in the Prayer Book. It has not yet been used on this side the Atlantic.—C.]

† Godwin, Hist. of Commonwealth, ii., 677.

* Journals of Lords, Jan. 29 and Feb. 2; of Commons, Jan. 29, 30.

† It was in these words: "Whereas Charles Stuart, king of England, is and standeth convicted, attainted, and condemned of high treason and other high crimes; and sentence upon Saturday last was pronounced against him by this court, to be put to death by the severing of his head from his body, of which sentence execution yet remaineth to be done. These are, therefore, to will and require you to see the said sentence executed in the open street, before Whitehall, upon the morrow, being the 30th day of this instant month of January, between the hours of ten in the morning and five in the afternoon of the same day, with full effect. And for so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant. And these are to require all officers, soldiers, and others, the good people of this nation of England, to be assisting unto you in this service.

"To Col. Francis Hacker, Col. Huncks, and Lieut.-col. Phray, and to every of them.

"Given under our hands and seals, (Sealed and subscribed by)

"John Bradshaw, Thomas Grey, Oliver Cromwell, Ed-

extraordinary character between Marten and Cromwell is said to have occurred on the signing of this warrant.* As Cromwell advanced to the table with the pen, he laughingly marked Marten's face with the ink, and the same practical jest was returned with interest by Marten. The anecdote rests on the authority of a detestable collection of slanders, "The Trials of the Regicides;" but I give it, because, on its being sworn to at his trial, Marten himself, without denying it, simply remarked that the circumstance did not imply malice. He had been pleading his utter want of malice against the king personally in all he did, when the crown counsel observed, "We shall prove against the prisoner at the bar (because he would wipe off malice) that he did this merrily, and was in great sport at the time of the signing the warrant for the king's execution." "That does not imply malice," remarked Marten.

An old servant of his, named Ewer, was upon this put into the witness box, and the following examination took place: "Counsel. Come, sir, you are here upon your oath; speak to my lords and the jury; you know the prisoner at the bar very well; you have sometimes served him: were you present in the Painted Chamber, January 29th, 1648, at the signing the warrant—the parchment—against the king?" "Ewer. The day I do not remember, but I was in that chamber to attend a gentleman there; I followed that gentleman (looking at Mr. Marten)—I followed that gentleman into that chamber." "Lord-Chief-baron. After what gentleman?" "Ewer. Mr. Marten. My lord, I was pressing to come near, but I was put off by an officer or soldier there; I told him I was ordered to be by that gentleman. My lord, I did see a pen in Mr. Cromwell's hand, and he marked Mr. Marten in the face with it, and Mr. Marten did the like to him; but I did not see any one set his hand, though I did see a parchment there with a great many seals to it."

If the occurrence really took place, it is yet unworthy of such a philosophical historian as Hume to quote it as an evidence of barbarous or "rustic" buffoonery.* No doubt, if Marten and Cromwell did this, they did it as a desperate momentary relief from over-excited nerves, and because they felt more acutely than their more sober brethren all that was involved in the dark duty they were then engaged in. Such "toys of desperation" commonly bubble up from a deep-flowing stream below. Downes, a weak man, is said to have been obliged to go out into the speaker's chamber "to ease his heart with tears." Marten and Cromwell were not weak men, and it was not in tears, at such a time as this, that they could have eased their hearts!

The mournful and tragic scene that was enacted on the 30th of January, 1649, in the open street fronting Whitehall,* is familiar to every reader of history, and need not be described here. Through the whole of that scene Charles bore himself with a dignified composure, and was to the last undisturbed, self-possessed, and serene. He addressed the crowd from the scaffold, forgave all his enemies, protested that the war was not begun by him, declared that the people's right was only to have their life and goods their own, "a share in the government being nothing pertaining to them," and concluded with words which, perhaps, expressed a sincere delusion, that "he died the martyr of the people." When his head fell, severed by the executioner at one blow, "a dismal, universal groan issued from the crowd."

"He nothing common did, or mean,
Upon that memorable scene;
But with his keener eye
The axe's edge did try:
Nor called the gods, with vulgar spite,
To vindicate his helpless right:
But bowed his comely head Down as upon a bed!"

So in a few years after wrote a most generous adversary, whose name is dear to every lover of literature or of liberty, Andrew Marvel, and in an ode to Oliver Cromwell himself! The lapse of two centuries has confirmed the poet's praise.

In pronouncing upon this great event as a mere act of statesmanship—an opinion called for in this memoir of one of the king's most ardent and inflexible judges—it needs no hesitation to declare it at once a most melancholy and disastrous error. The result proved that, through long years of political sufferings and distractions. But as surely as it was an error, so surely was it committed in good faith—committed as an awful act of justice, and to exhibit it to the kings of the earth, and, through them, to all succeeding generations of men, "a terrible example." It cannot be denied by any just and unbiased inquirer into history (for histories are so written that it is not sufficient to read them alone), that Charles I. had, "to a degree which can scarcely be exceeded, conspired against the liberty of his country."† It was to this he died a martyr; not to the Church or to the people, but to his intense desire for absolute power and authority. For this he laid aside, for upward of twelve years, all use of Parliaments; for this, when driven to them again, he negotiated for an army both in England and in Scotland to overawe their sittings; for this, he most daringly violated their most sacred privileges, at last commenced war against them, and for four years desolated England with the blood of her bravest children. Nor, when conquered, did he surrender the desperate hope which was still sustained for this. In every quarter he sought for the materials of a new war; and at last, after an interval of twenty months, "and from the depths of his prison," he found them. Nor should it ward Whaley, Michael Livesey, John Okey, John Danvers, John Boucher, Henry Ireton, Thomas Maleverer, John Blackiston, John Hutchinson, William Goffe, Thomas Pride, Peter Temple, Thomas Harrison, John Huseon, Henry Smith, Peregrine Pelham, Simon Meyn, Thomas Horton, John Jones, John More, Hardress Waller, Gilbert Millington, George Fleetwood, John Alured, Robert Lilburn, William Say, Anthony Stapely, Richard Deane, Robert Tichburne, Humphrey Edwards, Daniel Blagrave, Owen Roe, William Purofoy, Adrian Scroope, James Temple, Augustine Garland, Edmund Ludlow, Henry Marten, Vincent Potter, William Constable, Richard Ingoldsby, William Cawley, John Barstead, Isaac Ewers, John Dixwell, Valentine Walton, George Norton, Thomas Chaloner, Thomas Wogan, John Ven, Gregory Clement, John Downs, Thomas Wayte, Thomas Scott, John Carew, Miles Corbet."—Rush, vii., 1426.

* Hume, Hist., v., 75.

* The scaffold was erected immediately before the Banqueting House, now Whitehall Chapel, and Charles is said to have entered upon the scaffold through the centre window of the latter building.

† Godwin, Hist. of Com., ii., 689.

be forgotten that all hope of compromise at last was rendered doubly vain by the most consummate insincerity on the part of Charles: "He could never be reconciled; he could never be disarmed; he could never be convinced. His was a war to the death, and therefore had the utmost aggravation that can belong to a war against the liberty of a nation."* Such was the character and conduct of Charles I., and herein the justification of the motives of his judges. What farther is to be said on this point shall be said in this memoir by themselves. What can be better urged for those who held that a simple deposition of Charles was the wiser course, has been said in the Life of Vane.

A distinction, however, has been made by the historian of the Commonwealth,† which should not be omitted here. Speaking of the critical complexion of Parliamentary proceedings at the time of the king's death, he observes, "In the beginning of the year the Independents had had the superiority; but their authority, so far as depended on the number of votes, hung by a thread. How long was that state of things likely to continue? By whatever party they were displaced, they well knew that the crime of sitting in judgment on Charles, and signing the warrant for his execution, would be visited with the severest vengeance.‡ They knew that they held their lives in their hands. When they gave judgment against the king, they at the same time pronounced sentence on themselves. They could not, with any security, calculate on the impunity of eleven years and four months, which they ultimately reaped. But they had engaged in a great cause, and they would not draw back. Their cause might triumph forever; but they could not be so infatuated and so blind as not to perceive the many probabilities there were that the business would have a different issue. In that case they consented to sacrifice their lives on the altar of their country. But we must not be so unreasonable as to imagine that the judges who sat on the life of the king were all men of heroic resolution. There were certain men among them by whom the business was planned; there were others who had no part in framing the measure, but who willingly devoted themselves in the affair; but there was also a portion of the king's judges who co-operated from timidity—had no will to the business; but had not the courage to refuse those by whom they were pressed into it."

Upon the whole, the subject may be safely left with the opinion of the greatest statesman of modern times, and a high and unblemished authority on all points of constitutional doctrine. "If," observes Charles James Fox, in his "Fragment of History," "if we consider this question of example in a more extended view, and look to the general effect produced upon the minds of men, it cannot be doubted but the opportunity thus given to Charles to display his firmness and piety has created more respect for his memory than it could otherwise have obtained. It has been thought dangerous to the morals of mankind, even in romance, to make us sympathize with characters whose general conduct is blameable; but how much greater must the effect be when, in real history, our feelings are interested in favour of a monarch with whom, to say the least, his subjects were obliged to contend in arms for their liberty? After all, however, notwithstanding what the more reasonable part of mankind may think upon this question, it is much to be doubted whether this singular proceeding has not, as much as any other circumstance, served to raise the character of the English nation in the opinion of Europe in general. The truth is, that the guilt of the action—that is to say, the taking away of the life of the king—is what most men in the place of Cromwell and his associates would have incurred; what there is of splendour and of magnanimity in it, I mean the publicity and solemnity of the act, is what few would be capable of displaying."

The business of the Commonwealth was now resumed with quiet and resolved deliberation. On the Commons' journals of the day of execution there is a remarkable entry: "Ordered, That the common post be stayed until to-morrow morning, 10 o'clock;" but on the day following, ordinary matters were proceeded with; and on the 1st of February the House of Lords sent a message to the House of Commons, desiring a conference on the new settlement. The Commons allowed the messengers to wait at the door without the slightest notice of them or of their message. The patience of the messengers was exhausted, but not that of the Lords, who sent again and again, with as little success.* At last the Commons took notice of their existence indeed!

On the 6th of February it was moved in the House of Commons "that the House of Peers in Parliament is useless, dangerous, and ought to be abolished, and that an act be brought in to that purpose." Upon this Mr. D'Israeli remarks,† "Harry Marten, as reckless in his wit as in his life, with the same tolerant good-humour which he had evinced on a former occasion with Judge Jenkins, proposed an amendment in favour of the Lords, that 'they were useless, but not dangerous.' By this felicitous humour, this Commonwealth-man had often relieved the Royalists in their most critical circumstances." Mr. D'Israeli here falls into an unaccountable error. Marten's amendment was merely as to the terms of the motion, and, far from being "in favour" of the Lords, is perhaps the most exquisite sarcasm that has ever been levelled against them. His dislike of that House was always, it has been shown, most eagerly manifested, and the present opportunity was not to be resisted. Some graver members having objected, he withdrew the amendment; and, on the subsequent division of forty-four to twenty-nine, which took place on the motion for the abolition, was one of the tellers* for the majority against the Lords. When the motion passed their lordships were sitting. It was communicated to them; they heard prayers; disposed of a rectory; ad-

* History from Mackintosh, vi., 134.

† Commentaries, v., 418.

‡ Journals. Lord Grey of Groby was the other teller, and for the minority the tellers were Colonels Purefoy and Sydenham.

* Godwin, Hist. of the Com., ii., 689. † Mr. Godwin.
‡ Nor was this the only danger. Assassination must have been present to their imaginations, as likely to have been resorted to against them. Dorislaus and Rainborough were assassinated soon after.—(See Brodie, Brit. Emp., iv., 264; and Godwin, iv., 693.)

journed to the next morning as if nothing had happened, and did not sit again till the Restoration.*

A more memorable vote was passed next day: "That kingship in this nation hath been found by experience to be unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous to the liberty, safety, and public interest of the people, and ought therefore to be abolished." This was followed up by Marten, who proposed that the king's statues at the Old Royal Exchange and other places should be taken down, and the following inscriptions placed on the several sites: "Exit Tyrannus Regum ultimus—Anno libertatis Angliæ restituta primo—Anno Domini 1648-9, Jan. 30." This was agreed to, and at once done. Two acts in pursuance of the votes were passed; and the House of Commons published a declaration of its "late proceedings, and settling the government in the way of a free state," which was widely circulated in the English, Latin, French, and Dutch languages.

In all these proceedings Marten was the most prominent actor. He now introduced a bill for the sale of the royal property in lands and houses, of those trappings of royalty which are called the regalia, of the king's furniture, jewels, paintings, and other works of art.† The courts of France, Spain, the Spanish Netherlands, and Sweden, were the chief purchasers. The indifference with which they looked on while Charles was tried and executed, has been contrasted reproachfully, and not unjustly, by Royalists, with their avidity to possess his spoils.‡ And now the 9th of February was the first day of term, or sitting in the courts of law; and this circumstance rendered it necessary that certain preliminary steps should immediately be taken. In these Marten also took active part. Of the twelve judges, the two chief justices, the chief baron, with Jermyn for the King's Bench, Pheasant for the Common Pleas, and Gates for the Exchequer, signified their willingness to continue in the exercise of their offices, provided the House of Commons passed a declaration that they were resolved to maintain the fundamental laws of the nation, and passed an act for repealing the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. This was accordingly done without delay. One of the acts was introduced by Marten. An oath well and truly to serve the Parliament and people was then substituted; and, the name of King's Bench being taken away, that of Upper Bench was substituted in its place. The other six judges declined taking commissions under the Commonwealth. The great seal was at the same time brought into the House and broken in pieces; and a new seal being ready, and Widdrington declining to continue in office, it was intrusted to Whitelocke, Sergeant Richard Keble, and John Lisle. At the same time the office of commissioner was rendered more important and honourable by its being enacted that it should thenceforth be held by the tenure quamdiu se bene gesserint.§

The most important change remained to be made—the substitution of an executive council of state for the committee of government at Derby House. To this end, five members of the House of Commons were appointed as a committee to select the names of forty persons fit to compose this council, whose power was to continue for one year. The five persons were John Lisle, Cornelius Holland, Luke Robinson, Thomas Scot, and Edmund Ludlow; and it has been remarked very truly that their appointment was an instance of "remarkable delicacy," since certainly none of them had yet been habitually concerned in the conduct of public affairs, though two of them, Scot and Ludlow, were known for their integrity, their great devotion to the public welfare, and the ardour of their Republican sentiments.

On the 17th of February the council of state was installed. Henry Marten took his seat in it with Cromwell, Bradshaw, and Ludlow. Vane's subsequent adhesion has been described. Most truly does Mr. Godwin exclaim, "Never did any governors enter upon their functions under more formidable difficulties than the men who now undertook to steer and direct the vessel of the new Commonwealth. They were, in a certain sense, a handful of men, with the whole people of England against them.* Their hold on the community was, by their religious sentiments (those of the Independents), by the rooted aversion of many to the late king and his family, by the sincere terror that was felt of the ascendancy either of the Episcopal or Presbyterian party, and the devout adherence of a respectable set of men to the principle of religious toleration. The character also of the leaders did wonders. Scarcely has there existed a body of more eminent statesmen than Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, Marten, and Vane." On the 10th of March, the council, which had theretofore had a different præses for each day of sitting, appointed Bradshaw their official president; and, three days later, Milton, Bradshaw's kinsman, was made secretary to the council for foreign tongues—an office held by Weckerlin under the committee of both kingdoms.

One of their first steps was to settle the religious government, which was not left to wild theories, or merely loose and voluntary arrangement. The Presbyterian form was maintained, but stripped of all coercive power and temporal pretensions—in short, restricted to conferring licenses and ordination. A provision was made out of the tithes for the Episcopalian clergy, and there was a decided relaxation even towards Catholics. During the debates on these important matters, Henry Marten signalized himself by the first expression of opinions which should be remembered to his lasting honour. He proposed the repeal of the statute of banishment against the Jews.† That community had been banished from England in the year 1290; and from that time no body of Jews, formed into a community, could be found within our dominions. Now, after the lapse of three hundred and fifty-nine years, it was Henry Marten who proposed, in a noble spirit of justice, to put an end to this proscrip-

* History from Mackintosh, vi., 134.

† Whitelocke, p. 403.

‡ History from Mackintosh, vi., 135.

§ Journals, Feb. 8 and 9.

* This must not be understood literally. The people had trusted them in all their struggles against the king, but for the experiment of a republic, now about to be tried, they were merely unprepared.

† Wood's Ath. Oxon., iii., 1239.

tion. He was unsuccessful, and the reform was left for Cromwell to achieve in his day of absolute power. But the eloquent praise which Mr. Godwin bestows upon Cromwell for the act should have been written of Marten. "It was an enterprise worthy of his character. His comprehensive mind enabled him to take in all its recommendations and all its advantages. The liberality of his disposition, and his avowed attachment to the cause of toleration, rendered it an adventure becoming him to achieve. As a man, he held that no human being should be proscribed among his fellow-men for the accident of his birth; as a Christian, who looked forward in the faith of prophecy for the conversion of these our elder brethren in the rejection of polytheism, he knew that kind treatment and impartial justice supplied our best instrument for subduing their prejudices; and as a statesman, he was aware how useful the Jews might be made to the nation as the medium of commerce, and to the government as the means of correspondence, the communicators of valuable information, and the divulgers of secrets with which it might be important for them to be acquainted."

It has been with some justice reproached to these great founders and fathers of the Commonwealth, that they failed at this time, with all the power in their hands, to reform the representation, the municipal institutions, and the law, according to the admirable outline given in the "Declaration of the Army" and the "Agreement of the People," and to make this the basis of the new settlement. The matter has been discussed in the Life of Vane. The only answer to the reproach is, that to have dissolved Parliament at this crisis would have been to expose the nation, very possibly, to the return of kingship, with its power and passions, and possibly with the bigot vengeance of the Presbyterians in its train. The new rulers, however, recruited the House by relaxation in favour of excluded and retired members, and by new writs to fill up vacancies.*

The difficulties which beset the young Commonwealth in relation to the question of a dissolution of the Parliament were great indeed. In justice to the leading statesmen of the time, they should never be lost sight of. "The government of the country," Mr. Godwin truly says, "was at this time in a very artificial and unnatural condition. The existing power and organization rested in three bodies of men. The council of war, who had purged the Parliament on the 6th of December; the Parliament, or House of Commons, such as it remained after that reduction of its members; and the council of state, which had been appointed by the mutual understanding and concord of the other two. These three bodies of men were in perfect harmony: the majority of the House of Commons, since the event of the 6th of December, had espoused and approved the ideas of the council of war; and the council of state, which was, in reality, a selection of the ablest and fittest members from the other two, was employed, with assiduity, sagacity, and energy, in carrying on the executive government in a way corresponding with the designs and conceptions of their creators. The whole of these, in their authority over the nation—and they retained for the present the acquiescence or submission of the great body of the people—hung by a single thread. The council of war and of state were arbitrary combinations of men; but the Parliament had been chosen by the people. It is true, they were reduced by the compulsory absence of many of their members, and by other circumstances, to a small number, and were styled by Lilburne, and other audacious and inconsiderate men, a mock Parliament. Still they bore the magic name, a Parliament: the laws of England, by old prescription, were accustomed to emanate from the Parliament of England. Constituted as they were, they could not be despised. The abilities of Cromwell, Ireton, and Vane, countenanced by the virtues of Fairfax, Ludlow, Bradshaw, and Scot, necessarily commanded respect. They had in their service the professional talents of Whitelocke, St. John, Rolle, and the gallant Blake. They were recommended to public favour by the wit of Marten and the literature of Milton. They included in their council the Earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, Denbigh, and Mulgrave, with Viscount Lisle, son of the Earl of Leicester, and brother to Algernon Sidney. Such were the present House of Commons, such the present administrative government."

The best argument used for the retention of this government undisturbed for the present, was, however, afterward used in a debate upon the subject in the House of Commons by Henry Marten himself, in a happy and apposite simile. He told the House, "that he thought they might find the best advice from the Scripture what they were to do in this particular: that when Moses was found upon the river, and brought to Pharaoh's daughter, she took care that the mother might be found out, to whose care he might be committed to be nursed; which succeeded very happily." Applying this, he observed, "Their Commonwealth was yet an infant of a weak growth and a very tender constitution; and therefore his opinion was, that nobody could be so fit to nurse it as the mother who brought it forth, and that they should not think of putting it under any other hands until it had obtained more years and vigour." To which he added, "that they had another infant too under their hands, the war with Holland, which had thrived wonderfully under their conduct; but he much doubted that it would be quickly strangled if it were taken out of their care who had hitherto governed it."†

But to describe the course of government, and Marten's share in it in farther detail, would be to retrace much of the ground already gone over in the Memoir of Vane. It will be sufficient to observe upon, and to sketch, a few of the more personal points of his conduct merely.

Soon after the installation of the council of state, the indefatigable and untameable Lilburne began his agitations once more. He promoted dissensions in the army; abused Cromwell, Fairfax, Marten, and all the leaders; reanimated the hopes of the Levellers; and, in reward for it all, was shut up once more in the Tower. This had no effect, however; for, while Cromwell's terrible campaign against the Irish rebellion was spreading slaughter and desolation through that unhappy country, the fearless and brawling John issued from his residence in the Tower all manner of denunciations of the Parliament and council of state, as a "company of pickpockets," "thieves," "robbers," "murderers," and "brother beasts of Nebuchadnezzar the tyrant;" challenged them to a debate by two champions on each side, and an umpire, upon the issue of which he staked his life; and declared that if his challenge were not accepted within five days, he should hold himself free "to anatomize them publicly and privately." Proceedings were again instituted against him, but after they had advanced a little, the audacity and obstinacy even of Lilburne were shaken by domestic troubles, and he longed for a short release from imprisonment. A most eminent tribute is it to the fame of a generous character, that the person at once thought of by the demagogue as likely to procure him this favour was Henry Marten. With wonderful faith in the kind and forgiving temper of a man he had always so heartily abused for having often before befriended him, Lilburne wrote a letter to Marten, stating that his son had died of the smallpox the day before, and that his wife and two other children were ill, and expressing his desire, under these circumstances, that he might be allowed a few days' liberty to visit them.* The next day Henry Marten moved the House of Commons that he should be liberated on security, which was granted. Nor was this all; for, on finding subsequently that Lilburne's property† had been much harassed in the Star Chamber, and it had left him miserably poor, Marten exerted himself successfully to satisfy him for what was due by a grant of the dean and chapter's lands, at ten years' purchase.‡

* History from Mackintosh, vi., 137.

† Clarendon, vii., 4, 5.

But ever, as it has been shown, Marten was on the humane side, excepting in the one memorable instance, where a sense of duty committed violence on his kinder dispositions. A Royalist writer§ relates an occurrence of this time, on the bill having been passed in the House of Commons "to punish the crimes of incest, adultery, and fornication with death—Mr. Henry Marten would not let it be carried, without observing 'that the severity of the punishment by this act being death, would cause these sins to be more frequently committed, because people would be more cautious in committing them for fear of the punishment, and being undiscovered, would be imboldened the more in the commitment of them;' and the following year, chiefly by his procurement, it was abrogated."

The losses endured by Marten in the public service, and the absolute pecuniary assistance he had rendered to the popular cause in very critical times, which have been already referred to, were now taken into consideration by the House of Commons. Bradshaw's case was considered at the same time. The votes may be related from Mr. Godwin's history. "They resolved to settle on Bradshaw lands to the amount of two thousand pounds per annum. The act for that purpose was passed on the 15th of August. And farther to compensate him for the loss of a lucrative profession, it was resolved to bestow on him the office of chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. It is reasonable to infer from these measures that neither he nor any other member enjoyed any salary in the capacity of councillor of state. Bradshaw, by his office, was in some measure the first man in the nation. He was to receive foreign ambassadors, and to represent in his person, upon occasions of public solemnity, the executive government of the Commonwealth of England. Another distinguished statesman, whose case went hand in hand with that of Bradshaw, was Henry Marten. He presented a petition to the Parliament representing the arrears due to him as a colonel in the army, and the losses he had otherwise sustained in the service of the public, as well as the sums of money disbursed by him in that service. It was in consequence resolved that lands to the amount of one thousand pounds per annum should be settled on him, and the act to that effect was passed on the same day with the act in favour of Bradshaw. The provision not being found to reach the value proposed, a supplemental act in behalf of Marten was passed the 28th of September.* Marten's regiment of horse was also established for him.

In the second year of the Commonwealth Marten had again been elected into the council of state. At the close of this year he appears to have strongly suspected Cromwell's designs. It was time, indeed, that the more sagacious Republicans should have begun to do so. The double conquests of Ireland and of Scotland had now universally established his influence over the nation, and placed temptations within his reach almost irresistible. Marten was the first to throw out open hints of the possible consequence. He used some memorable words in the House of Commons, to the effect that "if they were to be governed by a single person, their last king would have been as proper a gentleman for it as any in England; for he found no fault with his person, but his office only."† On another occasion he vented the same ominous allusion in a sally of humour. Cromwell, in the heat of some debate in the House of Commons, called his old friend "Sir Harry Marten;" when, says Aubrey, with infinite gravity, "Mr. Henry Marten rises and bows: 'I thank your majesty! I always thought, when you were king, that I should be knighted.'"‡

At about the date, too, of these disputes, we find them alluded to in this outrageous way by a Royalist newspaper: "Division in the army grows great; superiority is the thing looked upon, and Cromwell thinks he deserves it best, which Henry Marten is impatient to suffer; and Pryde, stepping between them, makes great words to fly; inasmuch that Ruby Nose (Cromwell) drew his dagger in the House on Saturday, and clapping it on the seat by him, expressed great anger against Harry and his levelling crew."§ This, of course, is a preposterous exaggeration, but it illustrates the fact of the difference.

It was soon illustrated, however, much more decidedly. In electing the council of state for

* Preparative to Hue and Cry, 38. † Journals.

‡ Just Reproof, 6. Journals of the Commons.

§ Mr. Noble.

* Hist. of Com., iii., 185, 186.

† Wood's Ath. Ox., iii., 1240. Clement Walker, Hist. of Indep.

‡ Bodleian Letters.

§ Mercurius Pragmaticus, March, 1650, 1651.

the third year a new mode of proceeding was adopted. In the re-election of February, 1650, the names of the preceding council were regularly called over and put to the vote; and, in consequence, one having died in the interval, thirty-seven were rechosen, and three only rejected. It had been felt, and by Marten among others, that this was giving to the executive government too much the air of a standing council. The Parliament had been, of necessity, and was likely to continue for some time to come, a fixed and unvaried body. For this there were potent reasons, as it has already been shown; but there could be no such reason for making the council of state permanent. It had been decided in the beginning that this member of the government should be a body holding its office for twelve months only. "One of the most essential features of a free state," as Mr. Godwin justly remarks in relating these circumstances, "is rotation, and that those men who are intrusted for the public good with high and comprehensive powers should be subjected to the purification of new and frequently-repeated elections. All offices in such a state should, as far as is practicable, be thrown open to all. No man should be allowed to consider the powers he holds in trust for the nation a sinecure and an inheritance. It is good that men qualified for office should feel that at certain stated intervals they are not unlikely to be invited to accept it. It is good that a certain portion of fresh and unworn understanding and enterprise, not trained in the shackles of an unvaried routine, should from time to time be introduced into the national councils." In accordance, it may be fairly supposed, with some such reasoning as this, Parliament now decided that the council of state for the ensuing year should consist of forty-one persons, and that only twenty-one of those who were now of the council should be allowed to be re-elected. "The ablest and most highly-endowed of the individuals," observes Mr. Godwin, "who were excluded by the operation of this rule on the present occasion, was Henry Marten." Mr. Godwin has omitted to state, however, by whose exertions he was excluded. It was the work of Oliver Cromwell, now brooding over his projects of absolute power.*

In the House of Commons, however, Marten still remained. The power was not yet matured for what Cromwell had in purpose there. In the House of Commons, during the period of his exclusion from the executive, Marten only laboured the more, with all his wit, his eloquence, and his humanity, in behalf of the liberties of the Commonwealth. He supported Vane in the noble projects described in the memoir of that great person, and pursued at this time with an anxiety and zeal proportionate to the chance there yet remained—by an infusion of new popular power into the House of Commons, and an establishment of new and strong institutions for freedom, on the basis of the "Army Proposals"—to save the country from the usurpation that impended.

A few instances of the humour that he nevertheless gave way to in the midst of the serious debates of this period, may be recorded here.

Having let fall some phrases in the course of one of the discussions which gave offence to a Puritan member, the latter suggested that it would be well to have a motion to expel all "profane and unsanctified persons" from the House. Upon this, Marten gravely got up and observed, "That he should take the liberty to move, before the motion alluded to, that 'all fools might be put out likewise,' and then," he added, "the House might probably be found thin enough."

Aubrey tells us that H. M. (as he usually calls Marten) "was wont to sleep much in the House," and afterward explains this by saying that it was "dog-sleep," or, in other words, a means resorted to on the occasion of any very prosy oration from an alderman or a Puritan to intimate his fatigue, and hint the propriety either of liveliness or a conclusion on the part of the speaker. On one of these occasions, when Marten seems not only to have been "sleeping," but nodding his head rather vehemently, and breaking into occasional interruptions, "Alderman Atkins made a motion that such scandalous members as slept, and minded not the business of the House, should be put out." H. M. starts up: "Mr. Speaker, a motion has been made to turn out the nodders; I desire the noddies (noddies) may also be turned out." Poor Alderman Atkins never fairly recovered this.

On a different occasion, in referring to his own case, then unsettled, and to some recent and questionable appointments, he is said to have observed, in a manner that provoked peculiar laughter, "That he had seen, at last, the Scripture fulfilled: 'Thou hast exalted the humble and meek; thou hast filled the empty with good things, and the rich hast thou sent empty away!'"

More serious matters now claim attention. In the council of state installed for the fourth year of the Commonwealth the name of Henry Marten had again appeared, but whether the opposition of Cromwell had relented or proved ineffectual, does not appear; most probably, however, the latter, since in the election for the fifth year he was again excluded, and it is said by Cromwell's means. The victory of Worcester had given the "crowning mercy" to the general; Fairfax's resignation had left him alone in power with the army; the death of Ireton had removed the last restraint which withheld his meditated assault on the liberties of his country. The memorable scene of the forcible dissolution of the Long Parliament immediately followed, and on that day, already described, Marten received the reproach of licentiousness and a dissolute life from his old friend Cromwell.

The last scene of the council of state has been described in such a strain of melancholy enthusiasm by Mr. Godwin, that the passage will be interesting here. From breaking up the Parliament Cromwell had joined the council of officers, and now, in the afternoon, attended by Lambert and Harrison, repaired to the council of state. Bradshaw was in the chair. "It required," says Mr. Godwin, "a man of his nerve, his deep sense of religion, and his immoveable spirit, to discharge the duties of that day. It must have been sufficiently known what was about to happen; and since the fate of the Commonwealth could not be averted, all that remained was that it should so die as was most worthy of the days it had lived. Cromwell was to be met and confronted by a man who in his person should represent the freedom and the majesty of the Republic, which had now entered far into its fifth year; and amid all the heroes of that hour in England, it is not too much to say that there was no other person from whose lips the accidents of a dying state, not unmeet to be numbered with ancient Athens or Rome, could so worthily have been pronounced. Perhaps no man was ever placed in so illustrious a situation as that which Bradshaw occupied at this moment. He was to face one, in that age, so far as related to an ascendancy over the minds of his fellow-creatures either in war or in peace, the foremost man in the world. By an extraordinary coincidence, the same individual who had presided at the trial of a legitimate king, and who had pronounced sentence of death upon him for his multiplied delinquencies against his people, was now called upon from another chair to address a usurper in the most critical moment of his career, and to set before him, in firm and impressive terms, the deed he had perpetrated and was now perpetrating. Cromwell was backed by all his guards, and by an army of the highest discipline, and the most undaunted and prosperous character. Bradshaw appeared before him in the simple robe of integrity. The lord-general was the most resolute of men, and who could least endure an idle show of opposition. The parade of contradiction and the pomp of declamation would have been useless. A few words (a brief and concentrated remonstrance) were enough. They were uttered, and Cromwell ventured on no reply. Abashed the traitor stood. Cromwell, having entered the council-chamber, thus addressed the members who were present: 'Gentlemen, if you are met here as private persons, you shall not be disturbed; but if as a council of state, this is no place for you; and, since you cannot but know what was done in the morning, so take notice that the Parliament is dissolved.' To this Bradshaw answered, 'Sir, we have heard what you did at the House in the morning, and before many hours all England will hear it; but, sir, you are mistaken to think that the Parliament is dissolved, for no power under heaven can dissolve them but themselves; therefore take you notice of that.' With this protest the council rose and withdrew."

* Wood's Ath. Oxon., iii., 1240.

It is unnecessary to pursue the subject of Cromwell's usurpation on the Commonwealth; sufficient has been said in the Life of Vane. Marten invariably refused to acknowledge his authority, and was excluded from all the Parliaments that met under the Protectorate. We find him at last in prison, and learn that he was thrown there by the power of Cromwell; but for what reason, save on the general ground of his great talents and still fearless Republicanism, does not distinctly appear. It is stated, indeed,* that he had sometimes attended the meetings of the discontented Republican officers, who joined with Wildman, Overton, and others in their conspiracy against Cromwell; but no satisfactory proof of this is offered.

Yet, though Marten was kept from his place by the strong arm of tyranny, there were not wanting men, even in those Parliaments, to declare his sentiments and vindicate the old cause. At the very moment the usurper's power seemed greatest, and he was on the eve of clutching the object of all his hopes and ambitious toils, these men dashed it from him. In none of his Parliaments—not even in that composed of his own nominees—could he command a majority; the sentiment of liberty was still too strong for him; and thousands were found resolute enough to echo the remarkable words of a speaker in the Parliament of 1654, that, "having cut down tyranny in one person, they would not see the nation enslaved by another, whose right could be measured only by the length of his sword." The leaders of these men were Bradshaw and Scot, and most ably did they represent the opinions and the hopes of Marten and of Vane. Their speeches, Ludlow says, in the Parliament of 1654, "were very instrumental in opening the eyes of many young members, who had never before heard the public interest so clearly stated and asserted; so that the Commonwealth party increased every day, and that of the sword lost ground proportionally." Never did a splendid foreign administration so effectually conceal the innate rottenness of the entire domestic scheme and policy as in the case of the government of Cromwell.

It is much to be lamented that the speeches referred to by Ludlow have perished; but history has lately received a rich accession, which in some sort compensates* the loss, from the publication of Burton's admirable diary, by a writer who is worthy in all respects to have been associated with such a work, by his great talents, his masterly research, his unaffected simplicity and sincerity, and the disinterested zeal which has distinguished a long life devoted to the popular cause. We find in this diary Scot's speeches in Oliver Cromwell's last Parliament, and it is to these (unused hitherto in the histories), and to the speeches of the same stanch Republican in the Parliament that followed, that the case of such a statesman as Marten, in the judgment and trial of Charles I., must be referred, for the satisfaction of those who desire, after a lapse of two centuries, to sit in judgment on the motives that prompted that great event. Some extracts from these most striking assertions of Republican statesmanship are therefore necessary here.

That Parliament met, pursuant to adjournment, on the 28th of January, 1657–1658. Two changes had been made in the interim, in accordance with the famous "Petition and Advice" of the officers, namely, the readmission of the greater portion of the excluded members, and the creation of a miserable "House of Lords." After three days' preliminary sitting, a message "from the Lords" desired the concurrence of the Commons in an address to the Protector for a fast. The Commons protested against the title—would admit no other than that of “the other House.” It was even maintained that the new House was not a co-ordinate legislative assembly, but invested only with certain functions of judicature.* To this all Scot’s arguments tended, and he resolutely refused, on any other terms, to recognise Cromwell’s House of Lords. In vain they urged the “Petition and Advice” against him. His great speech on the occasion was a most masterly effort, and, in a subtle vindication of the Republican party, included a terrible assault on the despotism of Cromwell.

* "Diary of Thomas Burton, Esq., member in the Parliaments of Oliver and Richard Cromwell, from 1656 to 1659. Edited and illustrated with notes historical and biographical, by JOHN TOWILL RUTT."

* By Mr. Godwin, Hist. of Com., iv.

Scot began by saying that the “ancientness” of the institution of a House of Lords had nothing now to do with the question, for that that House had “been justly cast out by their being clogs upon passing of many good laws.” He proceeded to state: “The Scots, when the king was at Carisbrooke Castle, invaded England, not as brethren, but to impose a king upon you. The Lords were then desired that they would declare this invasion of the Scots enmity, and as enemies to the nation, which, for affection to the king, they would not do. You know afterward what happened. By the virtue of two or three hundred thousand pounds the Scots were persuaded to give over, and leave their king at Carisbrooke Castle. After the House of Commons had declared all this of non-addresses and the like, yet the Lords voted addresses notwithstanding. The major part of this House voted the like.” The army foresaw that their liberties were likely to be betrayed. I am for trusting the people with their liberties as soon as any; but when they come to irregularities, and the major part grow corrupt, they must be regulated by miracle, or otherwise perish. The soldiers see their cause betrayed; the city and apprentices all discontented; and if the army had not then appeared, where had then our cause been?

“The Lords would not join in the trial of the king. We must lay things bare and naked. We were either to lay all that blood of ten years’ war upon ourselves, or upon some other object. We called the King of England to our bar, and arraigned him. He was, for his obstinacy and guilt, condemned and executed; and so let all the enemies of God perish! The House of Commons had a good conscience in it. Upon this the Lords’ House adjourned and never again met, and hereby came a farewell of all those peers, and it was hoped the people of England should never again have a negative upon them.”

This is surely interesting. The orator next proceeded, after some allusions to the arguments of members of the House, to insinuate bitter sarcasms against Cromwell: “I shall now say,” he exclaimed, “why they are not, why they ought not to be, a House of Lords. You have not called them so. In all your Petition and Advice you have not said a word of it. Oh, but you intended it, said he. It appears to me you never intended it, because you never said it; and it is reason enough for me to say it. Once this House said king, and yet you never said lords; and if ever you had said it, it would have been then. He (Cromwell) refused it upon a pious account, and I hope he will still do so.

“Shall I, that sat in a Parliament that brought a king to the bar and to the block, not speak my mind freely here?

“Those that now sit in that House that would be lords, did they, or not, advise you to make them lords? Let me argue in a dilemma. Did they think to be lords? Then it was their modesty. Did they not think to be lords? Then they voted like Englishmen; just, entire, like choosing the Roman general. I think you have not yet meant to put a negative upon the people of England. I suppose you would not call them lords for tenderness of the consciences of the people of England. They are under an engagement, and I hope you will be as tender as you were to the point of a king; and you will not come under the crime of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, which caused Israel to sin.

“I come to show why you now should not make a House; I should say, a House of Lords. I cry you mercy! If there be a House of Lords, it is more reason to call the old peerage; and there is not one of them there, as I am informed. But you cannot call them for impossibility. You have not a quorum, not half a quorum, of persons qualified. Those that be, fail in the very formalis causa, estates and interest. Anciently the bishops, abbots, and lords, their tenants, and relations, could engage half England. The providence of God has so ordered it that England is turned a commonwealth, and do what you can, you cannot make it otherwise; and if you join any with them in the Legislature, it will not do your work.

“The administrations of God’s dealings are against you. Is not God staining the glory and pride of the world? Is there anything but a commonwealth that flourishes? Venice against the pride of the Ottoman family! All their mountains are pulled down. God governs the world as he governs his Church, by plain things and low things. It was this that led your Long Parliament—the providence of God, that virtue and honesty should govern the world—not that I am for a Fifth Monarchy.”

In subsequent very striking passages, Scot undertakes to show, not only that they should not be considered a House of Lords, but that they could not be so considered. “Why not, then?” he asks. “Why? because they are but commoners; and were yesterday here. It is not agreeable to the qualification of commoners. For aught that appears to you, they sit as a part of the Commons in another place. They have not the reason of the quality of lords. They have not interest—not the forty thousandth part of England. Have they an interest? Why, had they such an interest, why not sit here? The interest follows the persons. As they have none by sitting there, they lose interest by it. The old nobility will not, do not sit there. They lose that interest. You lose the people of England by it. They were, by the providence of God, set free from any negative. Will they thank you if you bring such a negative upon them? The people that have bled for you! that have not gained by you, but you by them! What was fought for but to arrive at that capacity to make their own laws?

“The unhandsome posture you bring yourselves into by it! To stand here to that House, not like a Parliament of England! Consider the consequences, that you charge not all the blood upon the great Parliament. The blood that shut out a negative stands at your door. I have heard of some motion for a day of humiliation for this blood. Why, you should put on the king's head again, which was surely taken without his consent, and without the Lords' too! Let not the people of England petition to have fetters upon them. Let it be your patience, and not your desires. It is not noble for the people of England to seek this."

* History from Mackintosh, vi., 237.

That expression, "let it be your patience, and not your desires," is of significant import. Scot's conclusion was worthy of the whole speech. He took the possible answers to his objections in succession; among them, the assertion that "they had been made" lords—that they who had made them "another House," made them lords. "I will not say," remarked Scot on this, "but his highness has power of honour, but not to set up courts. I would as soon be knighted under his sword in the camp, as under any man that ever gave honour. The argument is sophistry: you made them another House; his highness made them lords; therefore they are a House of Lords. You have settled them only as a high court of justice; but if you make them a co-ordinate power with you, you give them the power of your purses, of peace and war, of making laws, and magistrates to execute them.

"The people of Israel were governed by themselves—by the people. The people met, saith the text, and went to Hebron. The people have power of all these things. God submits all his administrations to the people, with reverence may I say it. God left to Adam to name all creatures: God did not say this is a lion, this is a bear; but Adam gave names to every creature. So he did to the woman, because a rib out of his side gave her a name. This House is a rib out of your side. You have given it a name. My motion is, that you would not alter it!"*

Three days after, the same question being in discussion among the members under another form, submitted to them as to the "Commons" by the "other House," Scot took occasion to throw out a somewhat ominous hint of the present resolution of the Republicans. After impressing the necessity of returning an answer to these quasi lordlings as to "the other House," he went on to remark: "It is not enough that they christen themselves, but they christen you—that you are 'Commons.' I am not ashamed of the title, it being the greatest honour under heaven to serve the people in the meanest capacity in this House; all power being originally in the people. I observed this was used as an argument the other day, that you had received a message from them by that title. He that deceives me once, it is my fault if he deceive me twice. Modesty (it is Tertullian) may bring a man to misery. The Greeks were destroyed, many of them, because they could not say no. They are at best but originally from you."

The result of this plain speaking was another dissolution by Cromwell. Hartlib, Milton's correspondent, describing the necessity for this step, after mentioning the danger to be apprehended from the Royalists, adds: "Besides, there was another petition set on foot in the city for a commonwealth, which would have gathered like a snowball; but by the resolute, sudden dissolving of Parliament, both these dangerous designs were mercifully prevented." Mrs. Hutchinson herself says, that such had been the influence of these sentiments of Vane, Marten, and Scot upon the minds of men at this period, that a third party was actually "ready both with arms and men, when there was opportunity, to have fallen in, with swords in their hands, for the settlement of the rights and liberties of the good people."

The resumption of power by the Republicans on the death of Oliver Cromwell has been described in the Life of Vane. It is necessary here, however, in order to place on record the only authentic vindication of the motives of the Republican leaders in their execution of Charles I. with a view to the establishment of a commonwealth, to resort once more to the speeches of Scot, Marten's intimate friend and associate in those memorable actions. Most true is what Mr. Godwin has remarked of the way in which these men have to this day been referred to by a large class of writers, as though they were raking out the records of a "Newgate Calendar." Party rage began this; indolence has suffered it to continue; and even Mr. Godwin, admirable for many of the greatest qualities of an historian, and, above all, admirable for that pursuit of truth which is his unailing characteristic, has failed to quote these only just statements of the real matters at issue between the Royalists and the Republican regicides. In reading even the imperfect records of Scot's speeches which yet remain, we find ourselves at once emerged from the foul atmosphere of falsehood and exaggeration, as of the meaner and baser sophistries, and breathing the clear air of honest, fearless, conscientious, and determined men. Whatever may have been their errors in judgment, their actions, we must feel, belonged to the highest order of just and honourable motive. It was the cause—the good old cause—which they ventured everything to sustain.

Upon Thurloe's proposition, in Richard Cromwell's first Parliament, for "recognising" the "undoubted" right of Richard as Protector, Scot spoke with Vane for the substitution of the word "agnise" for recognise, and the total omission of the phrase "undoubted." The debate, as we have already seen in the Memoir of Vane, was taken on these points for the purpose of trying the question of a pure republic in the least offensive shape. The declared object at the same time was the rejection of the bill. Scot rose, after a speech of a very hot Presbyterian (Mr. Bulkley), in favour of Richard; and after referring to the events which

* It is worth subjoining, from a debate in the Parliament of Richard Cromwell, Scot's deliberate opinion of Oliver's administration. He was arguing against trusting the whole power of war to Richard and his council: "I look upon his father," said Scot, "as of much more experience and counsel than himself; yet he was never so successful as when he was a servant to the Commonwealth. What a dishonourable peace he made, and what an unprofitable and dangerous war. Was not the effect of the peace with Holland, and the war with Spain, the most disadvantageous and deplorable that ever were? Therefore, if he that was a man of war and of counsel miscarried, why should I trust a single person, the most unfit to refer it to? Yet you do implicitly commit the whole charge upon his highness." first led to the agitation of questions against monarchy in England—naming the Stewarts as “that family, that cursed family! I may call it so yet!”—he proceeded to allude to the necessities which drove them to the execution of Charles. “Had he been quiet,” he said, “after he was delivered up to us by the Scots, knowing him to be our king—” A blank in the diary occurs here, but it is not difficult to imagine what the close of the sentence would have been, when we find it followed thus: “So long as he was above ground, in view, there were daily revoltings among the army, and risings in all places; creating us all mischief, more than a thousand kings could do us good. It was impossible to continue him alive. I wish all had heard the grounds of our resolutions in that particular. I would have had all our consultations in foro, as anything else was. It was resorted unto as the last refuge. The representatives, in their aggregate body, have power to alter or change any government, being thus conducted by Providence. The question was, whose [i. e., on whom] was that blood that was shed? It could not be ours. Was it not the king’s, by keeping delinquents from punishment, and raising armies? The vindictive justice must have his sacrifice somewhere. The king was called to a bar below, to answer for that blood. WE DID NOT ASSASSINATE, OR DO IT IN A CORNER. WE DID IT IN THE FACE OF GOD AND OF ALL MEN. If this be not a precept, the GOOD OF THE WHOLE, I know not what is—to preserve the good cause, a defence to religion and tender consciences. I will not patronise or justify all proceedings that then were.”

This is a memorable passage. It was not the language of self-vindication only, but of awful and impressive warning to all the generations of men that were to follow after the violent death of the ardent and honest speaker. How poorly it has been often imitated in modern times!

Scot now vindicated the intentions of the Long Parliament on the eve of its dissolution, and asserted the regrets which followed it, and the respect due to its memory. “The Dutch war came on. If it had pleased God and his highness to have let that little power of a Parliament sit a little longer—when Hannibal is ad portas, something must be done extra leges—we intended to have gone off with a good savour, and provided for a succession of Parliaments; but we stayed to end the Dutch war. We might have brought them to oneness with us. Their ambassadors did desire a coalition. This we might have done in four or five months. We never bid fairer for being masters of the whole world—not that I desire to extend our own bounds. We are well if we can preserve peace at home. If you be fain to fight Holland over again, it is vain to conceal it. That gentleman says the Parliament went out, and no complaining in the streets, nor inquiry after them. That is according to the company men keep. Men suit the letter to their lips. It is as men converse. I never met a zealous assertor of that cause, but lamented it, to see faith broken, and somewhat else. I will say no more. It was as much bewailed as the instrument of government. A petition, the day after the Parliament was dissolved, from forty of the chief officers, the aldermen of the city of London, and many godly divines (except the rigid Presbyters, too well-wishers to Mr. Love’s treason*), besought to have that Parliament restored; but the Protector, being resolved to carry on his work, threatened, terrified, and displaced them; and who would, for such a shattered thing, venture their all? You have had five changes. This is the fifth, and yet the people have not rest. It may be the people may think of returning to that again, or it may be to another government. The Romans continued consuls 100 years. There were endeavours to bring in kingship, and many lost their heads for it. Brutus’s own sons died under the axe, rather than their father would suffer kingship. Then came the decemviri, to collect the best laws in all nations, still jussu populi; to make peace and war; to make laws; to make magistrates; to frame twelve tables to be standing laws. I would not hazard a hair of his present highness’s head. Yet I would trust no man with more power than what is good for him and for the people. I had rather have £100 per annum clear, than £200 accountable. He is yet at the door. If you think of a single person, I would have him sooner than any man alive. Make your body, and then fit your head—if you please, one head; else we must debate all the limbs over again, either in a grand committee, or by twenty or thirty gentlemen. In the mean time, lay this bill aside.”

The question being again driven back upon the words “agnise” and “undoubted,” Scot took an opportunity to declare, with respect to the latter phrase, that force was used to pass the “Petition and Advice,” and that he could never recognise a title under it alone. He observed, in some passages of remarkable constitutional doctrine, that he might acknowledge that person as chief magistrate; but he added, “the word ‘undoubted’ is a doubt with me. The argument used against those that say fire does not burn, is, put your fingers in. Were not pikes at the door to keep us out? It was proved. I cannot admit that a free Parliament. The Petition and Advice was not pursued. If the nomination appear not to you, you cannot go upon that. The Parliament have suffered entails upon the crown; but this has been done before the judges and council, and publicly. This government is but de bene esse. The kingdom of England was not always hereditary. Of twenty-five or twenty-six kings, fifteen or sixteen of them came in by the choice of the Parliament, and not by descent; among the rest, King Stephen, Richard II., Edward I. The Parliament has always power to make or empower the chief magistrate, and they changed the government as often as they thought it good for the people. As to the instance, the last king, I was at his coronation. At every corner, every society was asked, Will you have this person for your king? This implies a power of the people; though he was king before, by succession. As to the oath made without doors, I find myself free here. You may remove the chief magistrate, and make whom you please so. In Henry VI. and Henry IV.’s time, the election was from the people.” After some farther precedents of this sort, Scot, referring to an argument used in the debate, that the people had really acquiesced in the selection of Richard, laid down in another form Vane's principle of a convention of the people. "You say you have a people that have declared this honourable and very precious person, with the acclamations of towns and villages. *If the whole body had done this in a collective aggregate body, met in any place, you ought not to question it; but this is but from some parts, in their several scattered bodies. I would have some persons to withdraw and word a question, though it would come better from another House than from us, that are bargainers for the people. We must consider as well what a man he may be. A young lion's teeth and claws may grow. I speak not of him, God knows! Yet we are not to trust too far. If we were assured that through his life he would not err, no man can tell who is to come after. Can you retrench that power you are making for perpetuity? St. Austin and Pelagius were born both in a day. The antidote and poison were both of an age. Make the provision for the safety of the people's liberties, and your magistrate's power and prerogative, contemporary. Let them be twins. Let them justify one another. Let not one precede the other. Whom would you have the Protector thank for his power—the people? the army? the council? Let him own you for it! Amor et delicia populi Angliæ—let him be so, when made your creature, not ad extra. It is a human institution; only own him as your authority. The Parliament will be said to be either fools or madmen, that know not what is fit for them so well as another. Why should we think ourselves more unfit to provide for ourselves, and for our own good, than any other? If we be so, let us set up the court of wards again, not for our children, but for ourselves. Why may not we be as well intrusted as any single person? Who better judges than the heads of the tribes? Name a committee to form a question that may take in both. You will then despatch more in an hour than you have done in all this time."*

* A Presbyterian minister tried and executed in 1651 for treason against the Commonwealth.

The omission of the word "undoubted" was eventually agreed to. Scot again gave battle on the question of the substitution of "agnise" for "recognise." The famous Henry Neville (the author of Plato Redivivus, and other works, remarkable for their soundness of doctrine and purity of style) had observed, that the word "recognise" gave away the question, or that it betokened slavery, and was answered by a remark from Mr. Goodrick, that "we were not slaves in Elizabeth's time, and it was the language then," when Scot rose. "The grounds of the word 'recognise' then," he said, "and in the times of Henry VIII. and Henry IV., were different from ours. The reason for Henry IV.'s recognition was because Richard II. was alive, and his competitor. It was in contradiction to competitors—only to distinguish persons. An act of Parliament passed to legitimate Queen Elizabeth, because it was questioned whether she were fit to reign or no. King James came from another kingdom and another family. There was no recognition to King Charles, and no need of it. He had no competitor. I can decognise Charles Stuart and that family, but recognise I cannot. It comprehends the merits of the question. We must now speak, or ever hold our peace. It was told that the great seal was sent for two or three times, and either his highness was not so well, or—I know not what; it was sent back again. The privy council made him. I would have him to be your creature, and he will be more tender of your liberties and privileges. If I recognise, I must be satisfied how he was declared, according to the Petition and Advice. We are not ingenuously dealt withal, for this is but a wing of the debate, and the wing will be out of your reach. If this pass, you will take a little breath between that and caring for the liberties of the people; and then money must be had for this Protector. I was saying I would be a slave, but I would not either, till I needs must. If I could have lived safely in any other part, I would not have lived here. I would be content it should be set upon my monument—if it were my last act, I own it!—I was one of the king's judges. I hope it shall not be said of us, as of the Romans once, O homines, ad sceritum parati!"

It need not be repeated here, that Richard Cromwell was soon driven from the Protectorate by Vane and Scot, and their gallant associates, who, in Marten's absence from the House, so resolutely maintained the opinions they held in common. With the recall of the Long Parliament after that event, Harry Marten once more took his seat in the House of Commons. The intrigues of the traitor Monk need not be detailed here; it is sufficient to say that, before their consummation, they had been seen through by the fine sense of Marten, and ridiculed by his wit. While the protestations of devotion to a commonwealth, made by that "scoundrel of fortune," were duping Hazlerig and the less reflecting Republicans; while he "called God to witness that the asserting of a commonwealth was the only intent of his heart," and was believed, we have had occasion to notice the subtle detection of the trick by Vane, and the masterly though unsuccessful effort he made to avert its consequences. We have now to add, that Marten took occasion to say, in his place in Parliament, that, although he doubted not General Monk's real design was a commonwealth, it yet befitted the House to consider the very remarkable inaptitude of the means he was providing for that object. "Why, sir," he continued, "he is like a person sent to make a suit of clothes, who brings with him a budget

* It was Scot's last act to own this. When some of the mean-spirited Presbyterians, who were among the last left in the reassembled Long Parliament, before its final dispersion by Monk, proposed that before they separated they should bear their witness against the horrid murder of the king, and the motion was followed by the protestation of one of the members that he had neither hand nor heart in that affair, Scot at once rose and said, "Though I know not where to hide my head at this time, yet I dare not refuse to own, that not only my hand, but my heart also, was in it." This was his last word in Parliament. Before his judges he manifested the same lofty and resolved temper, pleading nothing but his privilege of Parliament, and the unquestionable character of the great office he had borne, as deputed by the people to adjudge the king. The last words he pronounced upon the scaffold were a blessing to God "that of his free grace he had engaged him in a cause not to be repented of.—I say in a cause not to be repented of." Here the sheriff interposed, and the executioner hid his dreadful office. This was indeed a CAUSE which, in Vane's immortal words, "gave life in death to all the owners of it and sufferers for it."

full of carpenter's tools; and being told that such things are not at all fit for the work he has been desired to do, answers, 'Oh, it matters not! I will do your work well enough, I warrant you.'*

Upon the Restoration, the name of Henry Marten was "absolutely excepted, both as to life and property," from the act miscalled of oblivion and indemnity; but he surrendered, with Scot and others, resolved to take his trial. Trial, however, it should not be called, for all the proceedings against the regicides were made up of the bloodiest and most savage cruelty, the basest falsehoods, the most shocking perfidy. The first determination taken by the treacherous lawyers who directed the proceedings was the settlement of six notable rules, among which we find these: That the indictment should be for compassing the death of the late king, under the 25th of Edward III., and that his death should be one of the overt acts to prove the compassing; that overt acts not in the indictment might be given in evidence; that two witnesses should not be required to each particular overt act. As a farther precaution, the commission was delayed until the appointment of new sheriffs more slavishly ready than their predecessors to pack a jury. Bills were sent up and found against twenty-nine persons,† and their trials began before thirty-four commissioners,‡ on the 9th of October, 1660, at the Old Bailey.

* Ludlow.

† Marten, Waller (Sir H.), Harrison, Carew, Cook, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scroop, Jones, Hacker, Axtel, Heveningham, Millington, Tichborn, Roe, Kilburn, Harvey, Pennington, Smith, Downs, Potter, Garland, Fleetwood, Meyn, J. Temple, P. Temple, Hewlet, and Waite.

‡ The commissioners who by these proceedings damned themselves to fame were Sir Thomas Allen, lord-mayor of London, Lord-chancellor Hyde, the Earl of Southampton, the Duke of Somerset, the Duke of Albemarle (Monk), the Marquis of Ormond, the Earl of Lindsay, the Earl of Manchester, the Earl of Dorset, the Earl of Berkshire, the Earl of Sandwich, the Lord Say and Sele, the Lord Roberts, the Lord Finch, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Frederic Cornwallis, Sir Charles Berkeley, Mr. Secretary Nicholas, Mr. Secretary Morrice, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Mr. Arthur Annesley, Sir Orlando Bridgman, lord-chief-baron, Mr. Justice Forster, Mr. Justice Mallet, Mr. Justice Hyde, Mr. Baron Atkins, Mr. Justice Twisden, Mr. Justice Tyrrel, Mr. Baron Turner, Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir William Wild, recorder of London, Mr. Sergeant Brown, Mr. Sergeant Hale, and Mr. John Howel. The prosecutors in behalf of the king were Sir Jeffery Palmer, attorney-general; Sir Heneage Finch, solicitor-general; Sir Edward Turner, attorney to the Duke of York; Sergeant Keeling, Mr. Wadham Wyndham. A great portion of these men, it has been well pointed out (Hist. from Mackintosh), who thus sat as judges, were as guilty of treason under the 26th Edward III. and the charge of the chief-baron, as those whom they tried. The judge declared it to be the law that "no authority, no single person or community of men, nor the people collectively or representatively, have any coercive power over the King of England," and that to imprison the king was "a horrid treason" by two statutes of Parliament. But of these commissioners, fifteen, according to Ludlow, had levied war against the king by their votes in Parliament, or by force of arms in the field, and several of them still sat in Parliament when Charles for the first time became its prisoner at Holmby. Lords Manchester and Say were excepted from a general pardon in one of the proclamations of the late king. Hollis acted the most violent part in Parliament, and in the civil war, or, as it was now called, the rebellion, with the farther disqualification for the ends of justice of bringing to the trial of Independents and Republicans the vindictive passions of a partisan and a Presbyterian. Monk, in sitting as a commissioner, but finished the part played by him in the recent transactions. The palm of transcendent infamy may be given to Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, who, having purchased his pardon by his perfidy, now sat as the judge of men with whom he had sat in council, for whose safety, to the touching of a hair of their head, he had bound him-

On the 10th of October, after some months of imprisonment, Marten was placed at the bar of the Old Bailey, and required to plead. "I desire," he said, "the benefit of the act of oblivion—" Here he was interrupted, and told he must plead guilty or not guilty; and that if he demanded the benefit of the act of oblivion, it was a confession of being guilty! Upon this Marten resumed earnestly, "I humbly conceive the act of indemnity—" Again he was interrupted coarsely, and told he must plead. The following is a report of what followed, in which Marten's quiet and resolute self-possession appears very striking.

"The Court. 'You must plead guilty or not guilty.' Marten. 'If I plead, I lose the benefit of that act.' Court. 'You are totally excepted out of the act.' Marten. 'If it were so I would plead. My name is not in that act.' Court. 'Henry Marten is there.' Mr. Solicitor-general. 'Surely he hath been kept a close prisoner indeed, if he hath not seen the Act of Indemnity. Show it him.' Mr. Skelton opened the act. Court. 'How is it written?' Clerk. 'It is Henry Marten.' The act being shown him, he said, 'HENRY MARTEN; my name is not so—it is Harry Marten.' Court. 'The difference of the sound is very little. You are known by that name of Marten.' Marten. 'I humbly conceive all penal statutes ought to be understood literally.' Clerk. 'Are you guilty or not guilty?' Marten. 'I am not Henry Marten.' The clerk again asked him as before, and the court said, 'Be advised; the effect of this plea will be judgment;' and the solicitor-general cited somewhat parallel to this, in a case formerly of Baxter, where the name was Bagster, with an s, and adjudged all one, being the same sound. The clerk then put the question to him again, when, instead of answering, he said, 'My lord, I desire counsel.* There will arise matter of law as well as fact.' The court then told him, 'You are indicted for treason—for a malicious, traitorous compassing and imagining the king's death; if you have anything of justification, plead not guilty, and you shall be heard; for if it be justifiable, it is not treason. The rule is, either you must plead guilty, and so confess, or not guilty, and put yourself upon your trial; there is no medium.' Marten. 'May I give anything in evidence before a verdict?' Court. 'Yes; upon your trial you may give any evidence that the law warrants to be lawful evidence.' The clerk here again put the question of guilty or not guilty; and the court said, 'Understand one thing, because I would not have you mistaken; you cannot give in evidence the misnomer.' Marten. 'I submit, and plead not guilty.' Clerk. 'How will you be tried?' Marten. 'By God and my country.' Clerk. 'God send you a good deliverance.'"

The crown counsel then opened the case, and observed that Marten had "both signed and sealed the precept for summoning the court and the warrant for execution," and that he had sat every day, and "particularly the day of sentence." Here Marten interrupted the prosecutor, and said that he did not decline self in the penalty of "damnation body and soul," and with whom he might have been tried as an accessory.—(Vol. vi., p. 342.)

* He had before demanded the assistance of counsel, and been refused.

a confession so as to matter of fact, provided the malice were set aside. He had, he said, with others, judged Charles I. to death, but neither "maliciously, murderously, nor traitorously." The crown counsel here laughed, and promised to prove malice very easily; and the lord-chief-baron informed the prisoner that "there is malice implied by law—malice in the act itself. That," he continued, "which you call malice—that you had no particular intention or design against the king's person, but in relation to the government—that will not be to this present business. If it should exonerate anything, that would be between God and your own soul; but as to that which is alleged in the indictment, maliciously, murderously, and traitorously, they are the consequences of law. If a man meet another in the street, and run him through, in this case the law implies malice; though but to an ordinary watchman, there is malice by the law in the fact; if there was no such expressed personal malice, yet the fact done implies malice in law." The solicitor-general now interfered, and showed the meanness of his thoughts, and his incapacity for judging the actions of great-souled men, by this piece of vulgar pleasantry: "My lord, he does think a man may sit upon the death of the king, sentence him to death, sign a warrant for his execution, meekly, innocently, charitably, and honestly!" Marten answered to this quietly and with dignity: "I shall not presume to compare my knowledge in the law with that of that learned gentleman; but, according to that poor understanding of the law of England that I was capable of, there is no fact that he can name that is a crime in itself, but as it is circumstantiated. Of killing a watchman, as your lordship instanced, a watchman may be killed in not doing his office, and yet no murder." The lord-chief-baron retorted: "I instanced that of a watchman, to show there may be a malice by law, though not expressed; though a man kill a watchman, intending to kill another man, in that case it is malice in law against him; so in this case, if you went to kill the king when he was not doing his office, because he was in prison, and you hindered him from it, the law implies malice in this. It is true, all actions are circumstantiated, but the killing of the king is treason of all treasons." And was reinforced by a sage remark of Mr. Justice Forster: "If a watchman be killed, it is murder; it is in contempt of magistracy—of the powers above: the law says that contempt adds to the malice." The crown counsel now stood up with a triumphant air, and told their lordships: "We shall now prove against the prisoner at the bar (because he would wipe off malice) that he did this very merrily, and was in great sport at the time of signing the warrant for the king's execution." "That," quietly answered Marten, "does not imply malice." Ewer's evidence was then given, as already related.*

Sir Purbeck Temple was now called as a witness, and the counsel asked him what he knew "of that gentleman (the prisoner), in his carriage of this business." Sir Purbeck Temple gave the following evidence in answer: "My lords, I being present in town when that horrid murder was contrived against the late king, there came some persons of honour, servants of the late king, to my father's house, Sir Edward Partridge, to engage me to join with them to attempt the king's escape. In order whereunto, they told me nothing would tend so much to his majesty's service as to endeavour to discover some parts of their counsels; for that it was resolved by Cromwell to have the king tried at the high court of justice, as they called it, the next day, and desired me (if possible) to be there to discover their counsels, whereby the king might have notice, and those that were to attempt his escape. In order whereunto, the next day, by giving money to the officer of the Painted Chamber, I got in by daylight in the lobby of the Lords' House. I espied a hole in the wall under the hangings, where I placed myself till the council came, where they were contriving the manner of trying the king when he should come before them. After the manner of praying and private consultations among themselves, when their prayer was over, there came news that the king was landed at Sir Robert Cotton's stairs; at which Cromwell ran to a window, and, looking on the king as he came up the garden, he returned as white as the wall. Returning to the board, he speaks to Bradshaw and Sir Henry Mildmay how they and Sir William Brereton had concluded on such a business; then turning to the board, said thus: 'My masters, he is come, he is come, and now we are doing that great work that the whole nation will be full of; therefore I desire you to let us resolve here what answer we shall give the king when he comes before us, for the first question that he will ask us will be, By what authority and commission do we try him?' To which none answered presently. Then, after a little space, Henry Marten, the prisoner at the bar, rose up and said, 'In the name of the Commons and Parliament assembled, and all the good people of England,' which none contradicted; so all rose up, and then I saw every officer that waited in the room sent out by Cromwell to call away my lord such a one (whose name I have forgot), who was in the Court of Wards chamber, that he should send away the instrument, which came not, and so they adjourned themselves to Westminster Hall, going into the Court of Wards themselves as they went thither. When they came to the court in Westminster Hall, I heard the king ask them the very same question that Cromwell had said to them."

The solicitor-general then addressed the jury, interrupting the last witness, to desire them to place the correct interpretation on what the prisoner had said about want of malice. "You see, gentlemen," he said, "the prisoner at the bar confesses his hand to the warrant for executing the king; you see, by his servant, how merry he was at the sport; you see, by this witness, how serious he was at it, and gave the foundation of that advice upon which they all proceeded; and now, gentlemen, he says he did it not traitorously. I humbly conceive he means it was justifiable!" To this Marten, without any emotion, observed to the chief-baron: "My lord, the commission went in the name of the Commons assembled in Parliament, and the good people of England ; and what a matter is it for one of the commissioners to say, Let it be acted by the good people of England !” To this the solicitor retorted, “ You know all good people did abhor it. I am sorry to see so little repentance.”

* See ante, p. 376.

Being called upon for his defence, Marten addressed the court in these words. ‘The touching effect of their quiet earnestness is not lessened by the consideration they show to the place and position in which the speaker now stood. “My lord, I hope that which is urged by the learned counsel will not have that impression upon the court and jury that it seems to have, that I am so obstinate in a thing so apparently ill ; my lord, if it were possible for that blood to be in the body again, and every drop that was shed in the late wars, I could wish it with all my heart ; but, my lord, I hope it is lawful to offer in my own defence that which, when I did it, I thought I might do. My lord, there was the House of Commons, as I understood it (perhaps your lordships think it was not a House of Commons) ; then it was the supreme authority of England : it was so reputed both at home and abroad. My lord, I suppose he that gives obedience to the authority in being de facto, whether de jure or no—I think he is of a peaceable disposition, and far from a traitor. My lord, I think there was a statute made in Henry VII.’s time, whereby it was provided that whosoever was in arms for the king de facto, he should be indemnified, though that king de facto was not de jure ; and if supreme officers de facto can justify a war (the most pernicious remedy that was ever adjudged by mankind, be the cause what it will), I presume the supreme authority of England may justify a judicature, though it be not an authority de facto. My lord, if it be said that it is but a third estate, and a small parcel of that—my lord, it was all that was extant. I have heard lawyers say, that if there be commons appurtenant to a tenement, and that tenement all burned down except a small stick, the commons belong to that one small piece, as it did to the tenement when all standing. My lord, I shall humbly offer to consideration whether the king were the king indeed—such a one whose peace, crowns, and dignities were concerned in public matters. My lord, he was not in execution of his offices—he was a prisoner.” Marten then made allusion to King Charles II., and said that, so long as the representative body of England “supported him, he (Marten) should pay obedience to him.” “Besides, my lord,” he concluded, “I do owe my life to him, if I am acquitted for this. I do confess I did adhere to the Parliament’s army heartily. My life is at his mercy ; now if his grace be pleased to grant it, I shall have a double obligation to him.”

The solicitor-general followed in aggravation of the case. “My lord,” he said, “this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, hath entered into a discourse, that I am afraid he must have an answer in Parliament for it. He hath owned the king, but thinks his best title is the acknowledgment of the people ; and he that hath that, let him be who he will, hath the best title.” Marten here interrupted the solicitor with these few words : “I have one word more, my lord. I humbly desire that the jury would take notice, that, though I am accused in the name of the king, that if I be acquitted, the king is not cast. It doth not concern the king that the prisoner be condemned ; it concerns him that the prisoner be tried. It is as much to his interest, crown, and dignity, that the innocent be acquitted, as that the nocent be condemned.”

The lord-chief-baron delivered his charge, in which he took occasion to observe : “Marten hath done that which looks forward more than backward ; that is, to repentance of that which is past, than obedience of that which is to come. It is a trouble to repeat those things which he said himself, and truly, I hope in charity he meant better than his words were.” A verdict of guilty was returned by the jury “after a little consultation.”

It has been said that Henry Marten sought to save his life upon his trial by professions of repentance and contrition. The reader has the means of judging the utter falsehood of such a charge. No late-found loyalty was his. His conduct in that hour was what it had been his whole life through—easy, self-possessed, and firm. He offered no uncalled-for offence to the court, it is true, or to the powers once more in possession of the kingdom. There was about Harry Marten, in all circumstances, as there generally is with men of wit or various accomplishment, that habitual grace, that continual sense of the proprieties in manner, which nothing could interrupt, ever varying and adapting itself to all circumstances alike ; but when he left the bar that day, after receiving sentence (and he left it with a step that betokened a light heart still, though a firm one), no one entertained a doubt but that the next display of his accomplishments and his courage would be made upon a scaffold.

And yet his life was spared. Some of the Royalists visited him in prison, and requested him to petition Parliament for mercy. Bishop Burnet says, upon this, that his “vices” had procured him such friends. Mr. D’Israeli says, with greater truth, that the news of his impending execution had roused the grateful mediation of the numerous friends of the opposite party to his own, whom in his own days of power “his facetious genius had so timely served.”* He acceded to their request, and sent a petition to the two Houses. In this petition he observed, with the careless wit which no misfortune could subdue, that he had surrendered himself upon the Restoration in consequence of the king’s “declaration of Breda,” and that, “since he had never obeyed any royal proclamation before this, he hoped that he should not be hanged for taking the king’s word now.”

On the discussion of the matter in the House of Commons, a Royalist writer tells us, “the grave and sober members were generally for having him pay his forfeited life ; but he had many advocates in those who had partook of the pleasures of his conviviality, both within and without the House.” Notwithstanding the latter circumstance, however, the Commons took no step upon the petition. The Lords afterward took it into consideration, and summoned Marten before them. Here his conduct was still as it had ever been. Worn with imprisonment, and distracted with hopes deferred (for three months had now passed since his sentence), he confessed no fault, extenuated nothing of that for which his life was sought in penalty, but, making a half-pleasant allusion to the past, besought their lordships to give him more time to live. We find from the Lords' Journals (7th February, 1661) that "Mr. Marten being demanded what he could say for himself why the aforesaid act for his execution should not pass," he replied, that his hope was in the great mercy of their lordships, greater here than it could be in any other case, since "the honourable House of Commons, that he did so idolize, had given him up to death, and now this honourable House of Peers, which he had so much opposed, especially in their power of judicature, had suddenly been made the sanctuary to flee to for life." Lord Falkland and other peers spoke very warmly in his behalf, and the sentence of death was remitted. Yet the mercy, after all, was more than questionable. He was ordered to be imprisoned for life.

* Commentaries, vol. v., p. 418. The men of his own party, with whom he had ever contracted friendships, exhibited on all occasions a singular attachment to him ; and Ludlow relates of his father, Sir Henry Ludlow, that he believed his death was chiefly occasioned by his deep grief at the expulsion of Marten from the House of Commons in 1643

† Noble. Echard.

A blank, then, suddenly falls here on the gayety, the grace, the high purposes, the wit of Harry Marten! a blank even felt by the most prejudiced advocates of the men it had been the business of his life to oppose. "Such," says one of them, "was the last sad doom of this man, whose quickness of thought, elegance of manners, vivacity, wit, and charming gayety had often fascinated, not only the convivial board, but the grave, austere, sour Republican chiefs in the House of Commons, who so often chose him their manager and director!"*

His first prison was the Tower; he was afterward ordered to Windsor, from which Aubrey says he was removed, "because he was an eiesore to majestie;" his final place of imprisonment was the Castle of Chepstow, in Monmouthshire. It would seem that this place was selected with some view to a former and prouder connexion with it, that might render his present humiliation deeper, for Wood tells us that at the period of his greatest influence in the country, "the Welsh counties desired Henry Marten for their commander-in-chief." In Chepstow he lingered over twenty long years of imprisonment. "For twenty years," exclaimed a great living writer, in his early days of hope and of enthusiasm, standing in the very room that had been occupied by the illustrious prisoner,

"For twenty years, secluded from mankind,
Here MARTEN lingered. Often have these walls
Echo'd his footsteps, as with even tread
He paced around his prison; not to him
Did nature's fair varieties exist!
He never saw the sun's delightful beams,
Save when through yon high bars it pour'd a sad

* Even old Anthony à Wood, after exhausting every variety of abuse on Marten, is obliged to finish with the following admissions, qualified a little at the close. "He was a man of good natural parts, was a boon familiar, witty, and quick with repartees, was exceeding happy in apt instances, pertinent and very biting, so that his company being esteemed incomparable by many, would have been acceptable to the greatest persons, only he would be drunk too soon, and so put an end to all the mirth for the present."—Ath. Oxon., vol. iii., p. 1241.

And broken splendour. Dost thou ask his crime?
He had rebell'd against a king, and sat
In judgment on him—for his ardent mind
Shaped goodliest plans of happiness on earth,
And peace and liberty. Wild dreams! but such
As Plato loved; such as, with holy zeal,
Our Milton worshipp'd. Bless'd hopes! a while
From man withheld even to the latter days
When Christ shall come, and all things be fulfill'd!"*

And through all the early, and, indeed, solitary years of his imprisonment, those ardent hopes and goodliest plans may well be thought to have still remained, his refuge and sustinment. He had other consolations in his misery, which were named before. It brought back the long-estranged affection of earlier days—his wife's sympathy, and his daughter's affectionate zeal. His own estate confiscated by the crown, everything he could need in the narrow circuit of his prison he received out of the jointure that had been reserved to his wife on their marriage; and when, in the latter years of his imprisonment, the severities commemorated by the poet had been in some respects relaxed, the visits of his daughter relieved the loneliness and infirmity of age. His wife had died some little time before.†

One anecdote of Marten remains to be told. It is the only anecdote we have of his imprisonment, the single gleam which breaks through the now impenetrable obscurity of those melancholy years, to reveal the man; and with its aid we see the man unchanged. He is firm, frank, fearless as ever. He had been suffered, during the last few years of his life, in consideration of the harmlessness, no less than the infirmities, of his great age, to walk out of his prison occasionally, under the strict conduct of a keeper, into the neighbouring village of St. Pierre. A person of the name of Lewis lived here, and when he saw him, would ask him into his house. It grew into a habit at last; and a visit to this house, and a conversation with its owner, were the old man's last remaining comforts. Some unlucky day, however, this Lewis, who was a slavish Royalist (as people who lived in the neighbourhood of royal castles in those days generally were), happened to ask his visitor if, supposing the deed were to be done over again, he would again sign the warrant for Charles

* This inscription for the apartment in which Marten was confined was composed by ROBERT SOUTHEY, LL.D., when he was the Laureate of Wat Tyler, and before he had the remotest idea of becoming the Laureate of George the Fourth! GEORGE CANNING, the literary Rolands-pierre of his day, sharpened his axe to a razor's keenness for the execution of the distinguished victim. The inscription of Southey led Canning to compose the following unrivalled parody:

Inscription for the door of the Cell in Newgate, where Mrs. Brownrigge, the 'Prentice-cide, was confined previous to her Execution.

"For one long term, or e'er her trial came,
Here Brownrigge linger'd. Often have these cells
Echo'd her blasphemies, as with shrill voice
She scream'd for fresh Geneva. Not to her
Did the blithe fields of Tothill, or thy streets,
St. Giles', its fair varieties expand,
Till at the last, in slow-drawn cart, she went To execution. Dost thou ask her crime?
She whipp'd two female 'prentices to death,
And hid them in the coal-hole—for her mind
Shaped strictest place of discipline. Sage schemes,
Such as Lyeurgus taught, when at the shrine
Of the Orthyrian goddess he bade flog
The little Spartans; such as erst chastised
Our Milton when at college. For this act
Did Brownrigge swing. Harsh laws! but time shall come
When France shall reign, and laws be all repeal'd!"

† Aubrey, Bodleian Letters. Ath. Oxon., vol. iii., p. 1243.

the First's execution. Marten told him "Yes;" and was never after received into the house of Mr. Lewis.* The end, however, which he must surely now have prayed for, was rapidly approaching, and at last, in 1681, enfeebled with the weight of seventy-eight years, and the sufferings of a long imprisonment, against which his strong natural health had wonderfully borne him up, he was suddenly, while sitting at dinner, struck with apoplexy, and fell dead from his chair.

A paper containing the following verses was found in the room where he died.† They appear to have expressed the very latest of his thoughts before death, and he had formed the opening letters, it will be seen, into his own

* I have not the original authority for this anecdote near me, but I transcribe one version of it from a French work by the accomplished M. Guizot. "Henri Marten conserva jusqu'à la fin de sa vie la même opinion sur la mort du roi. Un M. Lewis, habitant à Saint Pierre, aux environs de Chepstow, le recevait souvent chez lui, lorsqu'il sortait avec son garde. Il lui demanda un jour si, dans le cas où la chose serait à recommencer, il signerait de nouveau l'ordre de l'exécution de son souverain, Marten répondit affirmativement; sur quoi M. Lewis cessa de la recevoir."—M. Guizot's Notes to Ludlow.

† Wood's Ath. Oxon., iii., 1242. Aubrey also mentions this circumstance.

name—an old, fantastic resource from the wearying length of lonely hours.

"Here or elsewhere (all's one to you—to me!),

Earth, air, or water gripes my ghostless dust,
None knowing when brave fire shall set it free.

Reader, if you an oft-tried rule will trust,

You'll gladly do and suffer what you must!

"My life was worn with serving you and you,

And death is my reward, and welcome too:

Revenge destroying but itself; while I

To birds of prey leave my old cage, and fly:

Examples preach to th' eye—care, then, mine says,

Not how you end, but how you spend your days."

Thus, to the very last hour, a sense of the great matters in which his early years had been engaged was present with this eminent person, and the last lesson he desired to leave to posterity was in the spirit of those ancients on whose actions he had modelled his own—that the most miserable or the most painful of deaths was nothing in the memory of a well-spent life. He had earned the glorious privilege of bequeathing such a lesson, for never was a cause more just or honourable, or in its result more fraught with blessings, felt to the present hour, than that which among the bravest of its advocates—exalting it by his generous purpose as he graced it by his wit—counts with pride the name of HENRY MARTEN.

OLIVER CROMWELL.—1599–1658.

OLIVER CROMWELL was born at Huntingdon, in the large Gothic house to which his father's brewery was attached,* on the 25th of April, 1599.† The name he bore had not infrequently been heard of in English history, but it was destined to become immortal in his person by the deeds with which he connected it—whether for good or evil, these pages, undertaken in no spirit of unjust detraction or of blind admiration, may possibly help to determine.

Milton, in his "Defensio Secunda," thus alludes to the family of Cromwell: "Est Oliverius Cromwellus genere nobili atque illustri ortus: nomen republica olim sub regibus bene administrata clarum, religione simul orthodoxa vel restituta tum primum apud nos vel stabilita clarius."‡ The noble and illustrious race here pointed at was that of Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex; a man of humble birth,§ but who had risen to be Henry VIII.'s prime minister and vicar-general of England, and whose sister had married into the family of Oliver's ancestors. The latter were Welsh, and bore the name of Williams,* until Sir Richard Williams—the issue of this marriage between the sister of Essex and Mr. Morgan Williams, "of Llanishen in the county of Glamorgan"—having risen into favour and knighthood at Henry VIII.'s court by his own gallant prowess and the influence of his uncle, and having obtained, among other extensive grants of nunneries and monasteries at that time dissolved, the nunnery of Hinchinbrook and the abbey of Ramsey, in the county of Huntingdon, fixed his seat at the former place, and assumed thenceforward the name of Cromwell, in honour of the chief architect of his princely fortunes.

Thus from the chivalrous son of a Glamorganshire squire the worldly power and splendour of the family of the Cromwells took its rise, as from the farmer son of a brewer of Huntingdon it afterward dated its immortality. This Richard Cromwell was one of the few favourites and servants of Henry VIII. whom he did not send to the scaffold; and when, in the old Chronicles of Stow,† we catch the dawn

* A friend of Cromwell's last biographer, Dr. Russell, thus describes the building and its present state: "That it was not," as stated by Mr. Noble, "out of the ruins of St. John's Hospital that Mr. Robert Cromwell's mansion was erected, is manifest from the fact that the said institution is still existing and flourishing, and from its funds is supported the grammar-school of the town in which Oliver himself was educated. As Cromwell's ancestor, Sir Richard, obtained a rich dowry of the old abbey possessions from Henry VIII., it has been supposed that the house and lands of the Augustine friars came into the family in this way. But it is stated in the Valor Ecclesiasticus that they were granted to Thomas Andern on the suppression of the monasteries; and I ascertained, from an inspection of the ancient wills, registered in the office of the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, that the house was occupied as a brewery by a Mr. Philip Clam before it came into the possession of Robert Cromwell, the Protector's father. The latter must therefore have obtained the property by purchase; and as his fortune was but small, we find that he continued to carry on the brewery formerly established on the premises. The house was built of stone, with Gothic windows and projecting attics, and must have been one of the most considerable in the borough. It had extensive back premises, in which the brewery was carried on, and a fine garden. In the year 1810, the estate was purchased by James Rust, Esq., whose extensive improvements have entirely obliterated every trace of the Cromwell mansion. "Previous to this date, the chamber in which Oliver was born, and the room under it, remained as they were at the time when that event took place; and an outbuilding, noticed by Noble, in which Cromwell was said to have held forth to the Puritans, was pointed out to strangers."—[I regard Russell's work as partaking strongly of the age of Charles II., and by no means affording just views of the Protector. No man, however, who wishes to obtain a just and comprehensive view of this greatest of England's great men, will fail to consult that admirable work just published by Carlyle, "The Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell." It unfolds the sturdy heart of Cromwell, and, though he may be denied a place in the collection of the great men whose statues are to adorn the British Parliament House, this labour of Carlyle's will disabuse the public mind, and enthroned him in the grateful recollections of the lovers of liberty.

I omit many notes which I had prepared to affix to this article, in consequence of the publication of this very satisfactory work, lately issued by Messrs. Wiley & Putnam.—C.]

† I can subjoin the entry of the parish register: "Oliverus filius Roberti Cromwell, gent., et Elizabethæ uxoris ejus, natus 25^o die Aprilis, et baptizatus 29^o ejusdem mensis, 1599. E registro ecclesiæ paroch. s^ti Johannis, infra oppidum Huntingdon."

‡ Milton's Prose Works, by Birch, folio edition, vol. ii., p. 344. "Oliver Cromwell was sprung from a noble and illustrious family; the name was formerly famous in the state when well governed by kings; more famous, at the same time, for orthodox religion, then either first restored or established among us."

§ The reader need not be told that this was the famous Thomas Cromwell of the Reformation—the son of Walter Cromwell, a blacksmith of Putney—who rose to power on the wreck of Wolsey's fortunes, and fell suddenly down by disregarding Wolsey's fate. Doubtless he was not free from error, but his memory claims a larger share of our respect than is generally due to such men.

* The pedigree of this family, from whom Oliver Cromwell directly sprung, commences, according to the industrious and satisfactory researches of Mr. Noble, with Glothyan, lord of Powis, who, about the middle of the eleventh century, married Morveth, the daughter and heiress of Edwin ap Tydwell, lord of Carlgan. William ap Yevan, the representative of the family in the fifteenth century, was first in the service of Gaspar, duke of Bedford, Henry VIII.'s uncle, and afterward in that of Henry himself. Morgan Williams, or, rather, Morgan ap Williams (he gave up the latter name in obedience to Henry VIII.'s policy of mingling together, as much as possible, the English and Welsh names and families), who married Essex's sister, was William ap Yevan's son.—[I am not quite willing to join Mr. Carlyle in his contempt for Noble, who really has deserved the gratitude of posterity for his laborious researches.—C.]

† Stow thus describes the tournament; the incident at its close is given in Fuller's Church History. Here are Stow's words: "On May-day was a great triumph of jousting at Westminster, which jousts had been proclaimed in France, Flanders, Scotland, and Spain, for all comers that would, against the challengers of England, which were Sir John Dudley, Sir T. Seymour, Sir T. Poynings, Sir George Carew, knights; Anthony Kingston, and Richard Cromwell, esquires: which said challengers came into the lists that day, richly apparelled, and their horses trapped all in white, gentlemen riding afore them, apparelled all with velvet and white sarnet, and all their servants in white doublets, and hosen cut all in the Burgonion fashion; and there came to just against them the said day, of defendants forty-six, the Earl of Surry being the foremost; Lord William Howard, Lord Clinton, and Lord Cromwell, son and heir to T. Cromwell, earle of Essex, and chamberlaine of England, with other, which were all richly apparelled: and that day Sir John Dudley was overthrowen in the field, by mischance of his horse, by one Andrew Brene; nevertheless, he brake divers spears valiantly after that; and after the said jousts done, the said challengers rode to Durham Place, where they kept open household, and feasted the king and queen, with their ladies, and all the court. The 2d of May, Anthony Kingston and Richard Cromwell were made knights of the same place. The 3d of May, the said challengers did tourney on horseback, with swords; there came against them twenty-nine defendants: Sir John Dudley and the Earl of Surrey running first, which, the first of his loyal fortunes, it is as though it gleamed reproachfully down upon the terrible act which laid the foundation of the mightier fortunes of his great-grandson Oliver. On May-day, 1540, a brilliant tournament at Westminster opens its lists before us, in which Richard Cromwell and others had proclaimed themselves to France, Flanders, and Scotland the defenders of the honour and rights of their English king. Henry VIII. looks on, and when Sir Richard Cromwell has struck down challenger after challenger with undaunted arm, forth from his deep broad chest rolls out the royal laugh of Henry: "Formerly thou wast my Dick, but hereafter thou shalt be my diamond." Then from the finger of majesty drops a diamond ring, which Sir Richard picks up and again presents to Henry, who laughingly places it on his finger, and bids him ever after bear such a one in the fore gamb of the demi-lion in his crest; and such a ring did Oliver Cromwell wear there* when he left his farm at Ely to bear more formidable arms at the challenge of a king!

Oliver Cromwell

HARPER AND BROTHERS NEW YORK

The sudden and violent fall of Essex had no disastrous effect on his kinsman's fortunes, which shone brightly to the last. Enriched to an almost unprecedented extent by the plunder of the religious houses, he left to his son, Henry Cromwell, the inheritance of a most noble fortune.† Nor was this Henry less for-course, lost their gauntlets, and that day Sir Richard Cromwell overthrew M. Palmer in the field off his horse, to the great honour of the challengers. The 5th of May, the said challengers fought on foot, at the barriers, and against them came thirty defendants, which fought valiantly, but Sir Richard Cromwell overthrew that day, at the barriers, M. Culpepper in the field; and the sixth of May the said challengers brake up their household: in the which time of their house-keeping they had not only feasted the king, queen, ladies, and the whole court, as was aforesaid, but on the Tuesday in the Rogation Week they feasted all the knights and burgesses of the Common House in the Parliament; and on the morrow after, they had the mayor of London, the aldermen, and all their wives to dinner; and on the Friday they brake it up as is aforesaid." Sir Richard and the five challengers had then each of them, as a reward of their valour, 100 marks annually, with a house to live in, to them and to their heirs forever, granted out of the monastery of the friars of St. Francis, in Stamford, which was dissolved October 8, 1538; and his majesty was the better enabled to do this, as Sir Will. Weston, the last prior, who had an annuity out of the monastery, died two days after the justs. Fortunate king and fortunate knights, to have a prior die so opportunely! But to break a heart is not a bad recipe for death at any time.

* See Noble's Protectoral House, vol. i., p. 11, and Fuller's Church History.

† In his will (which is dated as early as June, 1545), it appears, he styled himself by the alias Williams, a custom observed by all the Cromwells up to and even past the time of Oliver. An extract of this will, in which Sir Richard describes himself as of "the privy chamber of the king," is given by Mr. Noble. "He directs that his body shall be buried in the place where he should die; and devises his estates in the counties of Cambridge, Huntingdon, Lincoln, and Bedford, to his eldest son Henry, with the sum of £500 to purchase him necessary furniture, when he shall come of age: his estates in Glamorganshire he devises to his son Francis (his only other son), and bequeaths £300 to each of his nieces, Joan and Ann, daughters of his brother, Walter Cromwell; and directs, that if Tho. Wingfield, then in ward to him, should choose to marry either of them, he shall have his wardship remitted to him, otherwise that the same should be sold; he also leaves three of his best great horses to the king, and one other great horse to Lord Cromwell, after the king has chosen: legacies are also left to Sir John Williams, knt., and Sir Edw. North, knt., chancellor of the court of augmentation, and to several other persons, who seem to have been servants. Gab. Donne, clerk; Andr. Judde, Will. Coke, Phil. Lenthall, and Rich. Servington, were appointed executors. This will was proved Nov. 28th, 1546. Sir Richard," Mr. Noble adds, "must have left a prodigious fortune to his family, by what he possessed by descent, grants and purchases of church lands, tunate than his father. Elizabeth esteemed him highly, knighted him in 1563, and in the following year honoured him by a visit at his family seat of Hinchinbrook, on her return from the University of Cambridge. His memory still lived in the neighbourhood of his estates some century since, for he had associated it with generous actions in the hearts of the poor of the district, and, to the poor, long memories for benefits belong. They called him in his lifetime the Golden Knight, for he never entered any of the towns or villages around him without bestowing some money on the needy and distressed; and that honourable title survived him.* He lived to a good old age, and left behind him six sons and five daughters, of whom the second daughter, Elizabeth, gave birth to the patriot Hampden, and of whom the second son, Robert, the meanest in fortune, was destined to exert an influence on the destinies of the world-unapproached by the most illustrious of his ancestors, or the most powerful of their patron princes, for he was the father of Oliver Cromwell.

Mr. Robert Cromwell, but for this memorable circumstance, would have lived and died unknown in Huntingdon, since his tastes were humble as his fortunes.† He was sent, indeed, to one of Elizabeth's Parliaments by the electors of that borough, but he appears to have experienced only enough of that sort of public life to conceive disgust to it, since all the duties he afterward discharged were confined to his native town, in which he served as one of the bailiffs,‡ sat as justice of the peace, and, when and from the sums he must have acquired by filling very lucrative employments, with the liberal donations of his sovereign, King Henry VIII. This is evident from his possessions in Huntingdonshire, the annual amount of which, at an easy rent, were worth at least £3000 per ann.; these estates only, in Fuller's time, were, he says, valued by some at £20,000, and by others at £30,000 annually, and upward; and from what these estates now let for, in and near Ramsey and Huntingdon (which are only a part of them), I should presume that Sir Richard's estates in that county only would now bring in as large a revenue as any peer at this time enjoys; and yet it is evident that he had considerable property in several other counties."

* See Noble's Memoirs of the Cromwell Family, vol. i., p. 22.

† These fortunes are thus described by Noble: "Rob. Cromwell, Esq., second son of Sir Henry Cromwell, knt., had, by the will of his father, an estate in and near the town of Huntingdon, consisting chiefly, if not wholly, of possessions belonging formerly to the monastery of St. Mary for Augustine friars, amounting, with the great tithes of Hartford, to about £300 per ann."

‡ His name as bailiff is to be found at this day in the nave of a church in Huntingdon. Dr. Russell's friend, before referred to, says: "In the nave of St. Mary's Church, Huntingdon, the following notice is to be seen on one of the pillars:

'Cromwell.
Turpin.
Bailiffs.
1600.'

The church was not built till 1620, and Robert Cromwell, the Protector's father, who must be the person here meant, died in 1617. The inscription was probably made by some curious person, after the name of Cromwell had 'gathered all its fame,' and drawn public attention and inquiry to the ancestors of the Protector." That he took great interest in the concerns of his native county, and was consulted respecting its improvements by its leading proprietors, is, however, indisputable, from a passage in Sir William Dugdale's History of the Fens, where his signature is found attached to a certificate addressed to the privy council in 1605, stating that the draining of the fens in Northampton, Lincoln, Huntingdon, and Cambridge (a work which his son afterward resolutely opposed), was practicable, and might be accomplished "without peril to any haven or county." In recommending this great improvement, he was joined by sixteen of the principal persons in the four coun-his family had outgrown his income, betook himself to the occupation of a brewer. He had married in early life Elizabeth, the daughter of William Steward, of the city of Ely, an undoubted descendant of the royal family of the Stuarts.* This lady had already been the wife of "Will. Lynne, gent., son and heir-apparent of John Lynne of Bassingborne, Esq."† when, in the second year of her widowhood, with a jointure of only £60 a year,‡ she married Mr. Robert Cromwell.

Thus allied to a self-ennobled family on the one hand, and on the other to royalty itself, Mr. Robert Cromwell and his wife were nevertheless brewers of Huntingdon. It is strange, indeed, that this should ever have been disputed, since not the remotest shade of doubt, and as little of discredit, can possibly be thrown upon the fact. The records of the purchase of the brewery, and of its management, are in existence still; and from the unimpeachable testimony of many witnesses, that of Roger Coke§ may be selected, whose father, being asked whether he knew the Protector, answered, "Yes, and his father too, when he kept his brewhouse in Huntingdon." A contemporary writer tells us something more: "Both Mr. Cromwell and his wife were persons of great worth, and no way inclined to disaffection, either in their civil or religious principles, but remarkable for living upon a small fortune with decency, and maintaining a large family by their frugal circumspection."|| In subjoining the statement of Sir William Dugdale, we may, perhaps, discover the ridiculous pretence with which the scrupulous asserters of Mr. Robert Cromwell's "pure gentility" satisfy their tender consciences, and lay the burden of the brewery on his wife. "Robert Cromwell," says Dugdale,¶ "though he was, by the countenance of his elder brother, Sir Oliver, made a justice of the peace in Huntingdonshire, had but a slender estate; much of his support being a brewhouse in Huntingdon, chiefly managed by his wife." The Royalist chronicler, Heath, is still more explicit on the latter point. "The brewhouse," he says, "was kept in his father's time, and managed by his mother and his father's servants, without any concernment of his father therein, the accounts being always given to the mistress, who, after her husband's death, did continue in the same employment and calling of a brewer, and thought it no disparagement to sustain the estate and port of a younger brother, as Mr. Robert Cromwell was, by those lawful means; however, not so reputable as other gains and trades are accounted." True, not so reputable as Mr. Heath would have accounted the trade and gain of a servile follower of courts, of a mean flatterer of kings, of a base tool of incapable favourites or ministers. Had Mr. Cromwell been all this, and lent out his wife in furtherance of the calling, loud should have been the praises of the apostles of the Restoration!

Scarcely less contemptible do they seem to us, however, who foolishly imagine they exalt the claims of Robert Cromwell's son, in making out his father an idle "gentleman," and his mother a laborious drudge. That the wife assisted the husband in his pursuits is yet indisputable, as it was natural, for the fashion of fine ladyism in a tradesman's wife had not then "come up" in the world; while of her own more homely fashion, she proved the superior advantage, when her husband's death had left her the sole protectress of a young and numerous family. An interesting person, indeed, was this mother of Oliver Cromwell—a woman with the glorious faculty of self-help when other assistance failed her: ready for the demands of fortune in its extremest adverse time—of spirit and energy equal to her mildness and patience; who, with the labour of her own hands, gave dowries to five daughters sufficient to marry them into families as honourable, but more wealthy than their own; whose single pride was honesty, and whose passion love; who preserved in the gorgeous palace at Whitehall the simple tastes that distinguished her in the old brewery at Huntingdon; whose only care, amid all her splendours, was for the safety of her beloved son in his dangerous eminence; finally, whose closing wish, when that anxious care had outworn her strength, accorded with her whole modest and tender history, for it implored a simple burial in some country churchyard, rather than those ill-suited trappings of state and ceremony wherewith she feared, and with reason feared, that his highness, the Lord Protector of England, would have her carried to some royal tomb! There is a portrait of her at Hinchinbrook, which, if that were possible, would increase the interest she inspires and the respect she claims. The mouth, so small and sweet, yet full and firm as the mouth of a hero; the large, melancholy eyes; the light, pretty hair; the expression of quiet affectionateness suffused over the face, which is so modestly enveloped in a white satin hood; the simple beauty of the velvet cardinal she wears, and the richness of the small jewel that clasps it, seem to present before the gazer her living and breathing character.*

ties most immediately interested, and among them by his brother Sir Oliver. * See Appendix A.

† The following inscription rests on a tombstone in the Cathedral of Ely: "Hic inhumatus jacet optimus spei adolescens Gulielmus Lynne, generosus, filius & hæres apparer Johannis Lynne de Bassingborne in Co. Cantab. Arm. qui quidem Gulielmus immatura morte preemptus in ipsius ætate flore 27 agens Annum, 27 die Julij A.D. 1589, non sine summo omnium dolore, ex hac Vitâ placide migravit; unquam relinquens filiam Catharinam scilicet, quam etiam 17 die Martij sequentis præpropera mors eadem Naturâ lege natam sustulit, simulque jam cum Patre eterno fruitur gaudio—Posuit amoris ergo moestissima illius Conjug. Elizabetha filia Gulielmi Steward de Ely Armigeri."

‡ The smallness of this jointure (for the family fortune that remained to the Stewards rested solely with her brother, Sir Thomas, of whom mention will be made hereafter) was a favourite subject of lampoon with the Cavaliers up to the period of his death. "It is hoped," I find in one of their scurrilous papers, "that now our enormous taxes will be eased, as the Protector's highness, by the death of his mother, is freed from her dowry, which amounted to the prodigious sum of £60 annually."

§ See Detection, vol. ii., p. 57. || Noble, vol. i., p. 84.

¶ See Short View of the Recent Troubles, p. 459.

 In his Flagellum, p. 15.

* Out of the profits of her trade," says a writer in the Biographica Britannica, "and her own small jointure of sixty pounds a year, she provided fortunes for her daughters, sufficient to marry them into good families. The eldest was the wife of Mr. John Desborough, afterward one of the Protector's major-generals; another married, first, Roger Whetstone, Esq., and afterward Colonel John Jones, who was executed for being one of the king's judges; the third espoused Colonel Valentine Walton, who died in exile; the fourth, Mrs. Robina Cromwell, married, first, Dr. Peter French, and afterward Dr. John Wilkins, bishop of Chester,

On the 25th of April, in the year 1599, this excellent woman gave birth to Oliver Cromwell. He was her second son, and the only one of three who lived to manhood; one of her daughters had also died in youth, and the names of the survivors were Elizabeth, Catharine, Margaret, Anna, Jane, and Robina, who, with Oliver, formed the family of Mr. Robert Cromwell.

Four days after his birth, Oliver Cromwell was baptized in the parish church of St. John's, in his native place: his uncle, Sir Oliver, after whom he was named,* standing for him at the font.

Of his extreme youth, marvellous stories were recollected in his days of power, not for this, however, to be rejected, since what has once been believed should in all future time be matter of just concern. When Milton undertook a history of England, he began it with a large collection of traditional fables, because he well knew that to whatever has been truly believed, however false or fabulous, belong some of the most sacred privileges of truth itself, and that the imagination can never be strongly influenced without a corresponding and enduring action upon the opinions and the character. The fables of biography may show us, at all events, in what various ways the celebrity of their object has wrought upon his countrymen.

From the instant of his birth, according to the traditions of Huntingdon, the peculiar destiny which had marked the infant for its own saved him from all meaner chances.† A non-juror, who afterward purchased and inhabited his father's house, used to assert this destiny to have been nothing less than the devil; and, in proof of the connexion, would show, behind the door of the room that Oliver was born in, a curious figure of that personage wrought in the hangings. On the same authority rests the version of one of Oliver's escapes, wonderful as Gulliver's at Brobdingnag. "His grandfather, Sir Henry Cromwell," so goes the story, "having sent for him to Hinchinbrook, when an infant in arms, a monkey took him from the cradle, and ran with him upon the lead that covered the roofing of the house. Alarmed at the danger Oliver was in, the family brought beds to catch him upon, fearing the creature's dropping him; but the sagacious animal brought the 'fortune of England' down in safety: so narrow an escape had he, who was doomed to be the conqueror and sovereign magistrate of three mighty nations, from the paws of a monkey."‡ The tradition which saves the daring and reckless young lad from drowning by the providential interference of the curate of Cunnington,§ is, perhaps, better worthy of belief, though it might be difficult to say so much of the Royalist addition to the story, tagged on after the Restoration—that this same worthy curate, at a future period, when kindly called upon by Oliver, in a march at the head of his troops through Huntingdon, and asked if he recollected the service he had done, answered, "Yes, I do; but I wish I had put you in, rather than see you here in arms against your king."

The child's temper, it seems admitted on all hands, was wayward and violent,‡ and is said to have broken out on one occasion, when he was yet only five years old, with an ominous forecast of times and deeds to come. The anecdote is told by Noble. "They have a tradition at Huntingdon," says that industrious collector, "that when King Charles I., then Duke of York, in his journey from Scotland to London, in 1604, called, in his way, at Hinchinbrook, the seat of Sir Oliver Cromwell, that knight, to divert the young prince, sent for his nephew Oliver, that he, with his own sons, might play with his royal highness; but they had not been long together before Charles and Oliver disagreed; and as the former was then as weakly as the latter was strong, it was no wonder that the royal visitant was worsted; and Oliver, even at this age, so little regarded dignity, that he made the royal blood flow in copious streams from the prince's nose. This was looked upon as a bad presage for that king when the civil wars commenced. I give this only as the report of the place: thus far is certain, that Hinchinbrook, as being near Huntingdon, was generally one of the resting-places when any of the royal family were going to or returning from the north of England, or into or from Scotland." An anecdote, which somehow bears upon it the stamp and greatness of reality! If these boys ever met (and when King James's frequent visits to Hinchinbrook are borne in mind,§ it is difficult to suppose they did not), what occurrence so likely as a quarrel, and what result so plain as that the anecdote tells us? The nervous, feeble, tottering infan-

a famous preacher and a celebrated mathematician. It may not be amiss to add, that an aunt of Cromwell's married Francis Barrington, Esq.; another aunt, John Hampden, Esq., of Buckinghamshire, by whom she was mother to the famous John Hampden; a third aunt was the wife of Mr. Whaley, and the mother of Colonel Whaley, in whose custody the king was while he remained at Hampton Court. He had two other aunts, but of their marriages we have no account.* There are some errors and some omissions in this account. The wife of Desborough was Jane, the fifth daughter (the eldest, Elizabeth, dying unmarried); Catharine, the second, married Jones; Margaret, the third, married Walton; Anna, the fourth, who is omitted by the writer, married John Sewster, of Wistow, in Huntingdonshire, Esq.; and the sixth and youngest, Robina, married as stated.—[This article was written by Kipper, and is a very satisfactory narrative; perhaps it affords as clear a representation of the Protector as can be found in the same compass.—C.]

* See Appendix D., Sir Oliver Cromwell.

† In the very curious little volume which I have already had occasion to quote, Heath's Flagellum, it is made matter of reproach against nature that no portentous omens had ushered the lad into the world. "Fate," he says, "when it had decreed and ordained the unhappy birth of this famous, by her most secret and hidden malice, brought him into the world without any terrible remark of his portentous life, neither comets, nor earthquakes, nor such like violences of nature, ushering or accompanying him, to the declaring and pointing out that the scourge of the English empire and nation was now born. Thus also she did, by indiscernible methods, train him up to the possession of the throne, and as secretly and cunningly, after all his bloody and most nefarious actions, shift him out of it, and with a blast of her spent fury turned him into his wished-for grave." The latter sentence is somewhat obscure, unless "the blast of her spent fury" is taken to indicate the storm, which actually, on the day of his death, unroofed the houses in London, and tore up trees in the parks.

* The Rev. Dr. Lort's MSS., quoted in Noble, vol. i., p. 92.

† Then a Mr. Johnson.

‡ "From his infancy," says Heath, "to his childhood, he was of a cross and peevish disposition, which, being humoured by the fondness of his mother, made that rough and intractable temper more robust and outrageous in his juvenile years, and adult and masterless at man's estate."

§ See Appendix D., Sir Oliver Cromwell.

cy* of the shambling king's son, unequally matched against the sturdy little limbs and daring young soul of the man-child of the Huntingdon brewer—yet foolish obstinacy urging the weakness of the one, and a reckless ambition of superiority overcoming the kindness and generosity of the other. The curtain of the future was surely for an instant upraised here!

Nor here alone. More signal and direct manifestations were avouched, if still stronger and more widely-believed traditions are received. Nor will they be rejected hastily by such as care to penetrate beneath the surface of the character which had lain, as it were, wrapped up even in the very cradle of this child. The supernatural, as it seems to the vulgar, is not always what it seems. The natural, when denied for a time its proper vent, will force itself into the light in many various shapes, which assume a fearful aspect from their intensity alone. The tame and common medium of dull and feeble minds is not what the world has distributed among all her sons. Thoughts, as their sufferer has himself described them, "like masterless hell-hounds," roared and bellowed round the cradle of Bunyan; round that of Vane the forms of angels of light seemed to vision the everlasting reign of peace which his virtuous labours would have realized; and now, round the bed of the youthful Cromwell played an awful yet delicious dream of personal aggrandizement and power.

He had laid himself down one day, it is said, too fatigued with his youthful sports to hope for sleep, when suddenly the curtains of his bed were slowly withdrawn by a gigantic figure which bore the aspect of a woman, and which, gazing at him silently for a while, told him that he should, before his death, be the greatest man in England. He remembered when he told the story—and the recollection marked the current of his thoughts—that the figure had not made mention of the word king. The tradition of Huntingdon adds, that although the "folly and wickedness" of such a notion was strongly pointed out to him, the lad persisted in the assertion of its truth, for which, "at the particular desire of his father," he was soundly flogged by his schoolmaster. The flogging only impressed the fact more deeply on the young day-dreamer; and betaking himself immediately to his Uncle Steward,† for the purpose of unburdening himself once more respecting it, he was told by that worthy kinsman of royalty that it was "traitorous to entertain such thoughts."‡

* It is unnecessary to inform the reader that in the infancy of Charles I. he was unable to stand firmly, owing to the weakness and distortion of the legs which he had inherited from his father, and that in his most vigorous manhood the infirmity was never entirely corrected. Even in the fine equestrian portrait by Vandyke, now at Hampton Court, a curvature at the knee is distinctly visible.

† Sir Thomas Steward. See Appendix A.

‡ Mention of this matter is thus made in the Flagellum. All the other accounts give the story as in the text. "Twas at this time of his adolescence that he dreamed, or a familiar rather instigated him and put it into his head, that he should be king of England; for it cannot be conceived that now there should be any such near resemblance of truth in dreams and divinations (besides, the confidence with which he repeated it, and the difficulty to make him forget the arrogant conceit and opinionated pride he had of himself, seem to evince it was some impulse of a spirit), since they had ceased long ago. However the vision came, most certain it is, that his father was exceedingly troubled

This incident in Cromwell's youth was not forgotten in his obscurity to be remembered only in his eminence; for Clarendon distinctly tells us that "it was generally spoken of, even from the beginning of the troubles, and when he was not in a posture that promised such exaltation." In the height of his glory, we have also good authority for saying, Cromwell himself mentioned it often; and when the farce of deliberation took place on the offer of the crown to the Protector, it is remarked by Lord Clarendon, that "they who were very near to him said, that in this perplexity he revolved his former dream or apparition, that had first informed and promised him the high fortune to which he was already arrived, and which was generally spoken of, even from the beginning of the troubles, and when he was not in a posture that promised such exaltation; and that he then observed that it had only declared that he should be the greatest man in England, and that he should be near to be king, which seemed to imply that he should be only near, and never actually attain, the crown."

Another incident, not, perhaps, unconnected with the foregoing, and as singular, if less awful, connected the childhood of Cromwell with the mighty future that awaited it. I shall detail it in the words of the Royalist Heath,* because, of the many accounts that exist of this happily undisputed anecdote, they appear to be the most characteristic. "Now," observes that writer, "to confirm a royal humour the more in his ambitious and vain-glorious brain, it happened (as it was then generally the custom in all great free-schools) that a play called 'The Five Senses' was to be acted by the scholars of this school,† and Oliver Cromwell, as a confident youth, was named to act the part of Tætus, the sense of feeling; in the personation of which, as he came out of the tying-room upon the stage, his head encircled with a chaplet of lawrel, he stumbled at a crown, purposely laid there, which, stooping down, he took up, and crowned himself therewithal, adding, beyond his cue, some majestic mighty words; and with this passage the event of his life held good analogy and proportion, when he changed the lawrel of his victories (in the late unnatural war) to all the power, authority, and splendour that can be imagined within the compass of a crown."

The extemporization of the "mighty majestic words" is an addition of the zealous narrator: the reader will observe, when the scene is before him, that the exact speeches of Tætus are mighty and majestic enough to effect the strange coincidences of the story without other aid. The comedy is well known to the lovers of old English dramatic literature by the

at it; and having angrily rebuked him for the vanity, idleness, and impudence thereof, and seeing him yet persist in the same presumption, caused Dr. Beard to whip him for it; which was done to no more purpose than the rest of his chastisements, his scholar growing insolent and incorrigible from those results and suasions within him, to which all other dictates and instructions were useless, and as a dead letter."

* The author of the Flagellum, which I have already quoted—the first biographer of Cromwell after the Restoration. He was, I believe, the son of Charles I.'s cutler, an exiled Loyalist, and was, moreover, a needy scribe, who wrote pamphlets of all sorts to order, and corrected manuscripts for a maintenance.

† Huntingdon Free-school, where Oliver then was.

name of Lingua, as a highly ingenious and pleasant work, with more than the usual share of that strong good sense which distinguishes its otherwise fantastic author, Anthony Brewer.* It is in the nature of an allegory, celebrating the contention of the five senses for the crown of superiority, and discussing the pretensions of Lingua, or the tongue, to be admitted as a sixth sense; ending, as far as the latter is concerned, with the allotment of "the sense of speaking" to women only.

Now let the reader imagine little Master Oliver Cromwell entering, "his head encircled with a chaplet of lawrel," and gazing up so high above him as to be utterly unconscious of the plotter at his side, and, till he stumbles on it, of the crown at his feet.

TACTUS. The blushing childhood of the cheerful morn
Is almost grown a youth, and overclimbs
Yonder gilt eastern hills, about which time
Gustus most earnestly importuned me
To meet him hereabouts; what cause I know not.

MENDACIO. You shall do shortly, to your cost, I hope.

TACT. Sure, by the sun, it should be nine o'clock!

MEN. What a star-gazer! will you ne'er look down?

TACT. Clear is the sun, and the blue firmament
Methinks the heavens do smile— [ment :
[TACTUS sneezeth.

MEN. At thy mishap,
To look so high, and stumble in a trap!

[TACTUS stumbleth at the robe and crown.

TACT. High thoughts have slippery feet; I had wellnigh fallen.

MEN. Well doth he fall that riseth with a fall.
TACT. What's this!

MEN. O! are you taken? 'tis in vain to strive.
TACT. How now!

MEN. You'll be so entangled straight—

TACT. A crown!

MEN. —that it will be hard—

TACT. And a robe!

MEN. —to loose yourself!

TACT. A crown and robe!

* It contains, among other striking things, that fine enumeration of the characteristics of different languages—"The Chaldee wise, the Arabian physical." &c.—given in Charles Lamb's Specimens, and also the following masterly discrimination of Tragedy and Comedy in all their ornaments and uses, which the reader will not object to my quoting:

"These two, my lord, Comedies and Tragedies,
My fellows both, both twins, but so alike
As birth to death, wedding to funeral.
For this that rears himself in buskins quaint
Is pleasant at the first, proud in the midst,
Stately in all, and bitter death at end.
That in the pumps doth frown at first acquaintance,
Trouble in the midst, but at the end concludes,
Closing up all with a sweet catastrophe.
This grave and sad, disdain'd with brinish tears:
That light and quick, with wrinkled laughter painted.
This deals with nobles, kings, and emperors,
Full of great hopes, great fears, great enterprises:
This other trades with men of mean condition,
His projects small, small hopes, and dangers little.
This gorgeous, broider'd with rich sentences:
That fair and purpled round with merriments.
Both vice detect and virtue beautify,
By being death's mirror, and life's looking-glass."

The comedy was first acted, we learn from the preface to its first impression, at Cambridge, and next at this Huntingdon Free-school.

MEN. It had been fitter for you to have found a fool's coat and a bauble—hey! hey!

TACT. Jupiter! Jupiter! how came this here!

MEN. O! sir, Jupiter is making thunder; he hears you not; here's one knows better.

TACT. 'Tis wond'rous rich: ha! but sure it is not so: ho!

Do I not sleep, and dream of this good luck, ha?
No, I am awake, and feel it now.

Whose should it be? [He takes it up.

MEN. Set up a si quis for it.

TACT. Mercury! all's mine own; here's none to cry half's mine.

MEN. When I am gone. [Exit.

TACTUS, alone, soliloquizeth.

TACT. Tactus, thy sneezing somewhat did
Was ever man so fortunate as I? [portend.

To break his shins at such a stumbling-block!
Roses and bays pack hence: this crown and My brows and body circles and invests! [robe

How gallantly it fits me! sure the slave
Measured my head that wrought this coronet.

They lie that say complexions cannot change;
My blood's ennobled, and I am transform'd

Unto the sacred temper of a king.
Methinks I hear my noble parasites

Styling me Cæsar or great Alexander, Licking my feet, and wond'ring where I got

This precious ointment. How my pace is mended!
How princely do I speak! How sharp I threaten!

Peasants, I'll curb your headstrong impudence,
And make you tremble when the Lion roars.

Ye earth-bred worms! O for a looking-glass!
Poets will write whole volumes of this change:

Where's my attendants? Come hither, sirrahs,
Or by the wings of Hermes—"

[quickly,

It is not difficult to picture to the imagination the strut of democratic contempt with which the reckless young actor delivered some of these lines:

"How my pace is mended!
How princely do I speak! How sharp I threaten!"

The whole scene is curious, and was, no doubt, remembered with emotion in after years, when state had indeed seemed to ennoble blood; when epithets of Cæsar or Alexander were as nothing in the mouths of parasites; when the clownish soldier had been mended into the comely prince; and the voice that sounded sharp and untunable through the House of Commons in 1640, sent forth accents at Whitehall, some very few years later, of the sweetest grace and majesty.

Such scanty records as may be now collected of young Cromwell's school-days realize what it does not tax the imagination to receive as a not unfair impression of them. He was active and resolute; capable of tremendous study, but by no means always inclined to it; with a vast quantity of youthful energy, which exploded in vast varieties of youthful mischief; and, finally, not at all improved by an unlimited system of flogging adopted by his schoolmaster. How easily, in such cases, are the lessons of tyranny taught; and, when they have failed to subdue, how long and bitterly remembered!
Dr. Beard, then at the head of the Huntingdon free-school, had made himself notorious for his severity,* even in that age of barbarous disci-

* The frontispiece to a well-known book of the time,
"The Theatre of God's Judgments," is said to be a portrait pline; and in young Cromwell he seems to have found a favourite object for its exercise.

A biographer, already quoted, describes these school-days with characteristic force; and, remembering the writer's prejudice, we have little difficulty in separating false from true. "From A B C discipline," he says, "and the slighted governance of a mistress, his father removed him to the tuition of Dr. Beard, school-master of the free-school of that town, where his book began to persecute him, and learning to commence his great and irreconcilable enemy; for his master, honestly and severely observing that and others his faults (which, like weeds, sprung out of his rank and uncultivable nature), did, by correction, hope to better his manners, and with a diligent hand and careful eye, to hinder the thick growth of those vices which were so predominant and visible in him. Yet, though herein he trespassed upon that respect and lenity due and usual to children of his birth and quality, he prevailed nothing against his obstinate and perverse inclination. The learning and civility he had, coming upon him like fits of enthusiasm, now a hard student for a week or two, and then a truant or otioso for twice as many months—of no settled constancy.

"Amongst the rest of those ill qualities," continues this impartial biographer, "which fructuated in him at this age, he was very notorious for robbing of orchards; a puerile crime and an ordinary trespass, but grown so scandalous and injurious by the frequent spoyles and damages of trees, breaking of hedges and inclosures, committed by this apple-dragon, that many solemn complaints were made, both to his father and master, for redress thereof, which missed not their satisfaction and expiation out of his hide; on which so much pains were lost that that very offence ripened in him afterwards to the throwing down of all boundaries of law or conscience. From this he passed into another more manly theft, the robbing of dove-houses, stealing the young pigeons, and eating and merchandizing of them, and that so publicly, that he became dreadfully suspect to all the adjacent country."

Nor are his offences of youth limited by charges of this kind. Other gross imputations against his good taste and refinement—such as the boy-days of Louis XIV. were not altogether free from—received general acceptance before his eminence, and were not altogether contradicted by his occasional practices after it. The diligent Mr. Noble thus supplies one of those stories from various writers: "Sir Oliver was a worthy knight, loved hospitality, and always kept up old customs. Accordingly, at Christmas, his doors were thrown open to all, who were not only feasted, but entertained with music, dancing, and the usual sports of the age and place. Among the relations and friends of Sir Oliver came his nephew and godson, by invitation, to partake of the festivity of one of those seasons; but he so far forgot himself, that, to humour a depraved taste, he besmeared his clothes and gloves with the most nauseous filth, and accosts the Master of Misrule in the frequent turnings of a frisking dance, as well as every other person that came in his way, so that the company could scarce bear the room. The Master of Misrule, discovering that our young Oliver was the offender, seized, and ordered him to undergo a severe ducking in a pond adjoining to the house; Sir Oliver, his uncle, permitting the sentence to be carried into full execution, as a punishment for his dirty behaviour. Perhaps I ought to apologize for relating so filthy a tale; but, as this was the occasion of Oliver's losing his uncle's good opinion, I thought its particular relation could not be dispensed with."* There is possibly great exaggeration in the story, but, in after years, the Protector's turn for pleasantries was now and then oddly developed, as we shall have occasion to show; and what, in those youthful days, might have equally deserved a ducking in a horsepond on a cold Christmas night, was received as the greatest favour and condescension by ladies of birth and breeding.

From the grammar-school of Huntingdon, on the 23d of April, 1616, when Cromwell was within two days of completing his seventeenth year, he was entered a fellow-commoner of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge,† and seems to have carried all his school propensities, in the most lively and flourishing state, along with him to the University. "In his youth," says Sir William Dugdale, "he was for some time bred up in Cambridge, where he made no proficiency in any kind of learning; but then and afterwards sorting himself with drinking companions, and the under sort of people (being of a rough and blustering disposition), he had the name of a ROYSTER amongst most that knew him." This is borne out by Heath, who accompanies it with other details. "The relation of a father," he observes, "and one so stern and strict an examiner of him (he being in his nature of a difficult disposition and great spirit, and one that would have due distances observed towards him from all persons, which begat him reverence from the country people), kept him in some awe and subjection till his translation to Cambridge, where he was placed in Sidney College, more to satisfy his father's curiosity and desire than out of any hopes of completing him in his studies, which never reached any good knowledge of the Latine tongue. During his short residence here, where he was more famous for his exercises in the fields than in the schools (in which he never had the honour of, because no worth and merit to, a degree), being one of the chief match-makers and players at foot-ball, cudgells, or any other boysterous sport or game, his father, Mr. Robert Cromwell, died, leaving him to the scope of his own inordinate and irregular will, swayed by the bent of very violent and strong passions.* It is significant of much to discover, in these notices of Cromwell's boyish irregularities, that his father was as strict and stern to the lad as his mother was affectionate and indulging.*

* The learned Dr. Bates, who attended the Protector in his last illness, has given his authority to this incident (Elenchi. Mot., pars. prima). And Heath, in his "Flagellum," relates it thus: "By these lewd actions he had so alienated the affections of his uncle and godfather Sir Oliver Cromwell, that he could not endure the sight of him, having, in his own presence, in the great hall of his house, where he magnificently treated King James at his assumption to the crown of England, in a Christmas time (which was always highly observed by him by feasting and keeping open house), played this unhandsome and unseemly trick or frolic, with the relation of which the reader will be pleased to indulge me, because I have seen it recounted by a worthy and learned hand. It was Sir Oliver's custom in that festival to entertain in his house a Master of Misrule, or the Revels, to make mirth for the guests, and to direct the dances and the music, and generally all manner of sports and gambols; this fellow Cromwell, having besmeared his own clothes and hands with surverreance, accosts in the midst of a frolicking dance, and so grimed him and others upon every turn, that such a stink was raised, that the spectators could hardly endure the room; whereupon the said Master of Misrule, perceiving the matter, caused him to be laid hold on, and by his command to be thrown into a pond adjoining to the house, and there to be waded over head and ears, and rinsed of that filth and pollution sticking to him; which was accordingly executed, Sir Oliver suffering his nephew to undergo the punishment of his unmanly folly."

† The following is an extract from the register of Sidney Sussex: "A festo Anunciationis, 1616. Oliverius Cromwell Huntingdoniensis admissus ad commensum Scriptorum Aprilio vicessimo tertio; Titore Mrs. Ricardo Howlett." Between this entry, however, and the next, it is amusing to observe that there is crowded in, in a smaller hand or letter, the underwritten character. "Hic fuit grandis ille impostor, carnifex perditissimus, qui piientissimo rege Carolo 10 nefaria cæde sublato, ipsum usurpavit thronum, et tria regna, per 5 ferme annorum spatium, sub protectoris nomine indomita tyrannide vexavit."

of this pain-inflicting pedagogue. It represents him with a rod in his hand, two scholars standing behind, and As in Præsent issuing from his mouth.

There is no reason to question the irregularities themselves. They are such as thousands committed even in those times, and tens of thousands have committed since, whom obscurity in after life has dismissed, with all their vices and all their virtues, to a happy oblivion. It is worth while to observe, however, that the supposition of Cromwell's having left the University only as wise, in point of learning, as he went there, is by no means so credible.

Cromwell's learning in after years, which there is no reason to doubt he acquired at this time, was of a fair average character. His sincere respect for men of greater learning, and his anxious desire to elevate and promote the claims of literature at all times, has never been questioned save by the meanest and least scrupulous of his detractors. A good knowledge of Latin it is quite certain he possessed, though Bishop Burnet tells us of it with a sneer. "He had no foreign language but the little Latin that stuck to him from his education, which he spoke very vitiously and scantily." The most learned of the ambassadors he received during the Protectorate do not, on the other hand, seem to have discovered these defects in his Latin. Beveridge writes to Jongstall at the Hague,† that "last Saturday I had a discourse with his Excellency Cromwell above two hours, without any body being present with us. His excellency spoke his own language so distinctly that I could answer him. He (Cromwell) answered again in Latin." In various incidents of a similar sort, related in the records of the Commonwealth, it is difficult to discover any grounds of truth for Burnet's reproach; and it is worth adding, that the Royalist friend of Waller, who prefixed a life of the poet to the first edition of his works, takes occasion to tell his readers that "Cromwell loved, or affected to love, men of wit: Mr. Waller frequently waited on him being his kinsman; and, as he often declared to me, observed him to be very well read in the Greek and Roman story."* Other opportunities may occur for adverting to this subject; but there exists, in one of the ambassadorial addresses to Cromwell, a passage of eloquence bearing upon it, and now known to have proceeded from Milton's hand, which seems to me to decide the question completely, and to say all that need be said concerning it in the finest possible manner.

Don Juan Rodriguez de Saa Meneses, Conde de Penaguaia, addressed to Cromwell in Latin an idea of a perfect hero—Milton having discharged himself of a portion of his ever-lofty admiration of Cromwell by composing it at the request of that illustrious foreigner. Having named various imaginary qualities, he proceeded thus: "To these I added a study of letters, by which nature should be cultivated, the mind polished and subdued, and reason sharpened; yet this, in a person instructed for the Commonwealth, and trained up for political affairs, I wished might be moderate; for as the art of governing a commonwealth, for the most part, is active and practical, it should rather consist of counsel and prudence than of speculative and theoretical knowledge and wisdom. It is necessary, therefore, for him who is brought up to the art of ruling and commanding, to be tinged indeed with a study of letters, which may reasonably inform him, and banish ignorance and unskilfulness from his mind, yet not to be so deeply tutored as to comprehend them absolutely and exactly in every point; for I know not by what means this thorough knowledge of the sciences, at the same time that it sharpens the intellect, dulls the soul, and interrupts its close attention to the administration of public affairs: perhaps because it wastes the spirits necessary for action, and, by gradually consuming them, causes the mind, in proportion as it is deprived of them, to grow languid. These applications of the wit and mind are tender things; they do not fancy the sun and the crowd, but delight in shade and retirement; noise and business disturb them; they shrink up at the horror of arms, and are even affrighted at the bawling of the forum. Like noble and delicate maidens, they

* It is certain, too, that he had made it his care in life to become master of a noble library. An authority exists for saying this—than which no better could be urged—in the life of the famous and most learned Dr. Manton. "When Cromwell took on him the Protectorship, in the year 1653, the very morning the ceremony was to be performed, a messenger came to Dr. Manton to acquaint him that he must immediately come to Whitehall: the doctor asked him the occasion; he told him he should know that when he came there. The Protector himself, without any previous notice, told him what he was to do, i. e., to pray upon that occasion. The doctor laboured all he could to be excused, and told him it was a work of that nature which required some time to consider and prepare for it. The Protector replied that he knew he was not at a loss to perform the service he expected from him, and opening his study door, put him in with his hand, and bid him consider there, which was not above half an hour. The doctor employed that time in looking over his books, which he said was a noble collection." Manton, as Dr. Harris emphatically says, was a judge. Let us add here, that in his days of power, Cromwell showed an invariable regard and respect for the Alma Mater of his boyhood. We find an order of his, dated July 1, 1652, directed to all officers and soldiers under his command, forbidding them to quarter any officer or soldier in any of the colleges, halls, or other houses belonging to Cambridge University, or to offer any injury or violence to any of the students, or members of it; and this at their peril.

* Heath begins his narrative with a statement that "from his infancy to his childhood he was of a cross and peevish disposition, which being humoured by the fondness of his mother, made that rough and intractable temper more robust and outrageous in his juvenile years."—[It may be well to say that Heath was his first biographer, who has been generally copied as an authority, and the discredited stories affecting his early life are introduced by him.—C.]

† 12th of August, 1653.

must rather be kept safe at home than brought forth into engagements and perils; wherefore the most celebrated generals of antiquity have so addicted themselves to the instructions of their preceptors, as rather to adorn than to profess those studies; they have applied themselves just so much to them as might serve to nourish, not to overwhelm, their minds. It was this course that the hero Achilles held under Chiron and Phœnix; Alexander under Aristotle; Epaminondas under Lysias; Scipio under Panætius. And though Pericles among the Greeks, and Julius Cæsar among the Romans, may have passed for scholars, yet certainly their praise (whereof both obtained a very great share) is comprised chiefly in their eloquence, which consists more in force and nature than in art and precept. For this reason it is delivered down to us, that the one thundered when he spoke, and that the other pronounced everything with the same spirit he fought with. You, O most excellent Cromwell! have applied your mind to the study of letters in this manner, copying exactly what I had observed in these and other famous captains of antiquity. You have gathered up the literary dust at Cambridge, without deepening the tracks of learning. You have garnished your understanding with those arts which become a liberal nature; you have rubbed off the rust of your mind; you have sharpened the edge of your wit; you have gained such a character as not to be reckoned an ill scholar, and fitted yourself, by the rudiments of the sciences, to manage the highest offices of the Commonwealth. You have given us, in fact, such a specimen of your capacity, that you may make it appear, if you were disposed to go on in the pursuit of learning, how very able you are to equal the greatest masters; just as Julius Cæsar did, whose steps you so nearly tread in, according to the testimony of Cicero himself, that prince in every kind of learning. And in conducting the Commonwealth, you have chose to imitate that Cæsar rather than Cicero, by preferring the harsh, incessant, and laborious employment of a general, to the delicate and sedentary office of a senator. It did not become that hand to wax soft in literary ease, which was to be inured to the use of arms, and hardened with asperity; that right hand to be wrapped up in down among the nocturnal birds of Athens, by which thunderbolts were soon after to be hurled among the eagles which emulate the sun."

In June, 1617, Robert Cromwell died, and it is probable, since his widow found herself obliged to continue the brewery after his decease, that a consideration of family circumstances (for the disagreement with Sir Oliver appears to have still continued) withdrew her son from the University immediately afterward. It is certain that, before half his college term had expired, he returned to Huntingdon, and was passed from thence to London, where, in accordance with the almost universal practice with young men of any family in that age, he was entered as a member of Lincoln's Inn.*

f * His name does not appear now in the books of that society, but his having entered of it was a fact notorious to his contemporaries, and no doubt, therefore, the name was erased in the new and base-born loyalties of the Restoration. Anthony Wood tells us distinctly, "his father dying while he was at Cambridge, he was taken home and sent to Lincoln's Inn to study the common law; but making nothing

But, if the general tradition is trustworthy, he now utterly rejected every habit of study; carried his practices of school and college to the very highest pitch of dissolute recklessness; and, after some little time, returned to Huntingdon a finished London rake, with a strong tendency in his rakishness to the coarse and the low. Heath's account of this cannot possibly be omitted.

"It was not long after his father's death ere Oliver, weary of the Muses, and that strict course of life (though he gave latitude enough to it in his wild sallies and flyings out), abandoned the University, and returned home, saluted with the name of young Mr. Cromwell, now in the room and place of his father; which how he became, his uncontrolled debaucheries did publicly declare. For drinking, wenching, and the like outrages of licentious youth, none so inflamed as this young Tarquin, who would not be contraried in his lust, in the very strain and to the excess of that regal ravisher. . . . These pranks made his mother advise with herself and his friends what she should do with him, to remove the scandal which had been cast upon the family by his means; and therefore it was concluded to send him to one of the inns of court, under pretence of his studying the laws, where, among the mass of people in London, and frequency of vices of all sorts, his might pass in the throng without that particular neer reflection upon his relations, and at worst the infamy should stick only on himself. . . . Lincoln's Inn was the place pitched upon, and thither Mr. Cromwell, in a suitable garb to his fortunes, was sent, where but for a little while he continued; for the nature of the place, and the studies there, were so far regretful beyond all his tedious apprenticeship to the more facile academick sciences, that he had a kind of antipathy to his company and converse there, and so spent his time in an inward spite, which for that space superseded the enormous extravagancy of former viciousness—his vices having a certain kind of intermission, succession, or transmigration, like a compleat revolution of wickedness into one another, so that few of his feats were practised here. And it is some kind of good luck for that honourable society that he hath left so small and so innocent a memorial of his membership therein. . . . His next traverse was back again into the country to his mother, and there he fell to his old trade, and frequented his old haunts, consumed his money in tipling, and then run on score per force. In his drink he used to be so quarrelsome as few (unless as mad as himself) durst keep him company. His chief weapon, in which he delighted, and at which he fought several times with tinkers, pedlers, and the like (who most an end go armed therewith), was a quarter-staff, in which he was so skilful that seldom did any overmatch him. A boisterous discipline and rudiment of his martial skill and valour, which with so much fierceness he manifested afterward in the ensuing war! . . . These and the like strange, wild, and dishonest actions made him everywhere a shame or a terrour, insomuch that the alewives of Huntingdon and other places, of it, he was sent for home by his mother, because a debauchee, and a boisterous and rude fellow." This is corroborated, too, by almost every contemporaneous record.

when they saw him a coming, would use to cry out to one another, 'Here comes young Cromwell; shut up your doors:' for he made it no punctilio to invite his roysters to a barrel of drink, and give it them at the charge of his host, and in satisfaction thereof either beat him, or break his windows, if he offered any shew, or gave any look or sign of refusal or discontent. . . . His lustful wantonnesses were no less predominant than the other unruly appetites of his mind, it being now his rude custom to seize upon all women he met in his way on the road, and perforce ravish a kiss, or some lewder satisfaction from them; and if any resistance were made by their company, then to vindicate and allay this violence and heat of his blood with the letting out of theirs, whose defence of their friend's honour and chastity innocently ingaged them. And the same riots was he guilty of against any who would not give him the way, so that he was a rebel in manners long before he was a Belial in policy. . . . I am loath to be too large in such particulars, which may render me suspect of belying him, out of prejudice or revenge; but I have heard it confirmed so often from knowing persons, and the stories made use of by his party, who did thereby magnify his conversion, making him thus dear and precious unto God, that I was obliged to mention them."

These coarse details are given here in the persuasion that they may represent, making allowance for the natural exaggeration of the writer, the wild course and current of Cromwell's irregular youth—a youth how common in that age, how common in every age, but how seldom followed by those wonderful fortunes which have burned into these records of this life things that are held of no account in the lesser fortunes of meaner men, yet are in truth less pardonable in them than here, where they must be taken to express some portion of that amazing energy of temperament which is afterward destined to force out for itself a nobler outlet on a grander theatre of action. Nor will the reflecting reader hold that even such experiences, so wild and so unworthy, were altogether without their use in the after-chances of a career like Cromwell's, wherein power was to be achieved by practising upon the weakness, no less than by guiding the strength, of all classes of the humanity around him. It is said of him by a professed panegyrist, who sought to explain, and not unsuccessfully, the sort of life he led at this time in London, that "he came to Lincoln's Inn, where he associated himself with those of the best rank and quality, and the most ingenious persons; for though he were of a nature not adverse to study and contemplation, yet he seemed rather addicted to conversation, and the reading of men and their several temperaments, than to a continual poring upon authors."* Men of a large soul have no need of all those studies that are necessary to the education of other men. Nature offers herself to be studied by them, without the spectacles of books to read her by. They have only to look inward, as Dryden finely says, and they will observe her, in all her strength and all her weakness, there.

There is only one incident in these early and irregular practices which, if true, leaves a serious stain on that portion of the life of Cromwell. Sir William Dugdale originated it in his "Short View of the Late Troubles,"* where we find this remark: "By his exorbitances, at last he so wasted his patrimony, that, having attempted his uncle Steward† for a supply of his wants, and finding that on a smooth way of application to him he could not prevail, he endeavoured, by colour of law, to lay hold of his estate, representing him as a person not able to govern it. But therein he failed." The diligent researches of Mr. Noble, it must be admitted, seem to confirm this serious charge, while they are more explicit in detailing the grounds of it. From them it would seem that, soon after his return to Huntingdon from London, he "endeavoured to reinstate his fortune by annexing the estate of his maternal uncle, Sir Thomas Steward, to his own, even in the lifetime of Sir Thomas. . . . It was not unlikely that he had asked of that gentleman a liberal supply, and 'finding that by a smooth way of application to him he could not prevail, he endeavoured to lay hold of his estate, representing him as a person not able to govern it;' which he did by petitioning his majesty to grant him a commission of lunacy; but the king dismissed the petition as ill founded." With a strong reluctance to entertain this story, I am nevertheless bound to subjoin what strikes me to be farther evidence in support of it—evidence which some may even take to be incontrovertible. Hacket, in his life of Archbishop Williams (Scrinia Reserata), gives it as an eminent proof of that wily bishop's penetration, that, at the very outset of Cromwell's career, he thoroughly detected his character. In a council held in 1645, Hacket represents Williams thus speaking of Cromwell to the king: "I knew him at Buckden, but never knew his religion, being a common spokesman for sectaries, and maintaining their part with stubbornness. He never discoursed as if he were pleased with your majesty and your officers, and, indeed, he loves none that are more than his equals. Your majesty did him but justice in refusing his petition against Sir Thomas Steward of the Isle of Ely; but he takes them all for his enemies particular account of his gallantries, introduces him to an audience of the French king, and an intimacy with Cardinal Richelieu. Upon his return he assures us that Cromwell was highly in the good graces of Dr. Williams, bishop of Lincoln, to whom he says he was nearly related; and, what is still more extraordinary than all this, Mr. Leti lets us into the secret that the bishop had an amour with Cromwell's wife; and in the same ingenious style, and with equally scrupulous attention to truth, he perseveres through the whole work, assuring us that he wrote it during his stay in England, and that he took care to be perfectly well informed as to everything which he relates. It is bare justice to Mr. Leti, however, to add, that he names the Earl of Anglesen, the Earl of Aylesbury, and several other persons of distinction, as the authors of the various matters he acquaints us with, and it is just possible that they were the somewhat stupid but successful jokes of those distinguished persons.

* P. 459.

† See Appendix A.

* "Portraiture of his Royal Highness Oliver," by Carington, p. 8, a book, on the whole, not so deficient in trustworthiness as others of the time—Mr. Daubeny's, for instance, or M. Gregorio Leti's. The last, published in French, at Amsterdam, fifty years after Cromwell's death, obtained considerable circulation in England. A copy is in my possession, and a short specimen of it may possibly amuse the reader. For instance, M. Gregorio Leti makes Cromwell a prodigy of learning at the University, exceedingly admired by the bishops, a great favourite with King James. He then sends him over to France upon his travels, gives us a that would not let him undo his best friend, and, above all that live, I think him the most mindful of an injury. He talks openly that it is fit some one should act more vigorously against your forces, and bring your person into the power of the Parliament. He hates the Earl of Essex, because he says he is but half an enemy to your majesty, and has done you more favour than harm. His fortunes are broken, that it is impossible for him to subsist (much less satisfy his ambition) but by your majesty's bounty, or by the ruin of us all in one common confusion. In short, every beast has some evil properties, but Cromwell has the properties of all evil beasts."

One consideration remains, involving a different and less injurious view of the charge itself. It is indisputable that this Sir Thomas Steward, at his death, which occurred not many years afterward, left the whole of his fortune to his nephew—to the young man at whose hands he had suffered so recently such a cruel and insulting wrong. Is it possible to imagine that intercession on the part of relatives, which is alleged to have brought this result about, would have sufficed in any way to that end, if the old man had not now, in reality, proved somewhat wavering in his wits. Giving Oliver Cromwell the advantage (to which he is fairly entitled) of the doubt so started, it is surely not difficult to imagine that, when he petitioned the king to the effect stated by Dugdale and Noble, and apparently corroborated by Archbishop Williams himself, he may really have believed his kinsman to be labouring under the malady alleged.

The time now arrived, however, when the wild days were to close, and with them the imputations they gave birth to; when higher purposes and objects were to wake out of their early sleep in Cromwell's heart, and thenceforth sleep no more; when his fellow-townsmen were to ask with wonder among each other how such a reformation could have risen,

"Since his addiction was to courses vain;
His companies unlettered, rude, and shallow;
His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports;
And never noted in him any study,
Any retirement, any sequestration
From open haunts:"

and possibly some one, more intelligent and accomplished than the rest, was to answer in that counter-quotations from the prince of poets and philosophers, whose death should just then have plunged the world in mourning, if the world had known his value:

"The strawberry grows underneath the nettle,
And wholesome berries thrive and ripen best
Neighbour'd by fruit of baser quality:
And so this man obscured his contemplation
Under the veil of wildness; which, no doubt,
Grew like the summer grass, fastest by night,
Unseen, yet crevice in his faculty."

Whereat might the questioner have rejoined, with the strongest confidence that he had indeed attained in this the secret of Cromwell's mental progress,

"It must be so; for miracles are ceased."

On the 22d of August, 1620, four months after the completion of his twenty-first year, Cromwell married Elizabeth Bourchier, daughter of Sir James Bourchier, of Felsted, in Essex, a kinswoman of the Hampdens, a woman of high spirit, of an ancient and honourable family, and whose irreproachable life and unobtrusive manners should indeed have protected her from the insults and obloquies of the time, if any thing could have been held sacred from them. The marriage took place at St. Giles's Church, Cripplegate, London; and three days afterward, we discover from a deed still in existence, Cromwell (described in the document as Oliver Cromwell, alias Williams, of Huntingdon, Esq.) entered into a defeasance of statute staple to Thomas Morley, citizen and leather-seller, of London, in £4000, conditioned that he should, before the 20th of November following, convey and assure unto Elizabeth his wife, "for the term of her life, for her jointure, all that parsonage house of Hartford, with all the glebe lands and tythes," in the county of Huntingdon.* It is interesting to find that, some years afterward, when Cromwell's wants appeared to require it, this amiable and excellent woman surrendered this jointure, which, with the fortune she had brought her husband, is reported to have gone in satisfaction of the debts contracted by early extravagance.

Nor, through all the wonderful changes she was doomed to experience, did she ever lose the simplicity and modesty of her youth. She is said to have borne what few women can patiently bear, with only such complaints as the most sweet and generous nature would give utterance to—and in this was more influenced by love than restrained by awe.† Her husband's elevation she rather endured than rejoiced in; for even the stern Ludlow, when telling us that "he (the Protector) removed from the Cockpit, which house the Parliament had assigned to him, to take possession of Whitehall, which he assigned to himself," adds, that "his wife seemed at first unwilling to remove thither, though afterwards she became better satisfied with her grandeur."* This "satisfaction" will, perhaps, be more truly expressed in saying that, while the wife of Cromwell had good sense enough to be contented with an humble station, she had yet spirit and dignity sufficient for the loftiest. "She was, indeed," says an impartial witness, "an excellent housewife, and as capable of descending to the kitchen with propriety as she was of acting in her exalted station with dignity. Certain it is, that she acted a much more prudent part as protectress than Henrietta did as queen, and that she educated her children with as much ability as she governed her family with address. Such a woman would, by a natural transition, have filled a throne." This pleasing picture of a virtuous and able woman's character seems to me to be completed by the fact her biographer should be proud to subjoin, that she was the only one of the relatives of Cromwell whose kinsmen received no place of profit or emolument under the protectorate of Cromwell.†

* See Noble's "Memoirs of the Protectoral House."

† I have already ventured to say all that, perhaps, need be said in a question of this kind in my Life of Strafford, p. 88, 89, to which the reader is referred; but one of the notes in Noble's book bears too close a reference to this subject to be omitted here; and the writer was too candid as well as industrious not to have a right to claim fair attention to what he supposes himself to have had reason to believe in a case of this kind. "The Protector Oliver," he says, "though a great devotee, is known to have indulged himself, after he arrived at power, with the company of ladies, and that not in the most innocent manner. Lady Dysert, afterward Duchess of Lauderdale, and Mrs. Lambert, have been frequently given as his mistresses. They were ladies of very different accomplishments; the former was beautiful, witty, learned, and full of intrigue; Mrs. Lambert employed herself only in praying and singing hymns. It was a court jest, that the Protector's instrument (of government) was found under my Lady Lambert's petticoat. His acquaintance with the gay Lady Dysert gave such offence to the godly, that he was obliged to decline his visits to her; and it was thought that General Toullemache owed his birth to Oliver; but there could no hurt arise in holding heavenly meditation with Mrs. Lambert. Heath, in his 'Flagellum,' says, Mrs. Lambert was a woman of good birth and good parts, and of pleasing attractions, both for mind and body. There is a history printed of a pretended natural son of the Protector's, but it is too marvellous to be true. Probably, however, Oliver had natural children, one of whom might be Dr. Millington, after whose name, in the register of Strensham, in Worcestershire (the birthplace of the humorous Butler), is, 'Query: was not he a bastard of Oliver Cromwell?' and I am the more inclined to think this true, because in the postscript of a letter from Ursula Hornyhould, dated from London, Dec. 4, 1744, to a gentleman in the vicinity of that place, is, 'Did you ever hear it said that Dr. Millington was illegitimate? Here has been talk that Dr. Millington was a bastard of Oliver Cromwell.' The scandal it would have given, had the Puritans known of his amours, and the advantages the Cavaliers would have made of it, would be sufficient reasons for his keeping matters of this kind from the eyes of the public. Besides, though her highness was an obedient wife, she was not without spirit and sensibility; but, though she might know that she had reason to suspect the Protector, we cannot suppose she carried it to such unreasonable lengths as to be jealous of Christina, queen of Sweden, as some pretend."

* "Ludlow's Memoirs." The Royalist writers, I may observe, were so deficient in materials of accusation against her, that they made as much as they could of an alleged plainness of person; and Cowley, meaning to ridicule this in his "Cutter of Coleman-street," has put the following into Cutter's mouth, as part of his description of his friend Worm: "He would have been my Lady Protectress's poet: he writ once a copy in praise of her beauty; but her highness gave for it but an old half-crown piece in gold, which she had hoarded up before these troubles, and that discouraged him from any further applications to court." The portraits of Mrs. Cromwell now in existence give the lie to this, nevertheless, and represent a pretty and comely person, with just such an expression on the face as is borne out by her quiet and unoffending character.

† The name of Bouchier appears in some of the appointments. Yet, in a MS. of the Suffolk gentry during the usurpation, now existing in the handwriting of Sir John Cullum, is to be found the following entry: "In 1655, — Bouchier, Esq., and — Bouchier, gent., brothers of Oliver Cromwell's wife, and sons of Sir Ja. Bouchier, knt., in the parish of Whepsted, within about four miles of Bury. Sir John found in the registers these items: 'Mr. James Bouchier buried the 15th of March, 1656; Mr. Henry Young and Mrs. Susan Bouchier were married the 8th of April, 1656.'" No doubt, therefore, these were claimants for office, had their sister countenanced the claims. It will not, perhaps, be out of place here to append a sketch of the few incidents in the life of the Protectress, after her great husband's death; what other mention she receives in these pages will be in the ordinary course of my narrative. On the revival of the council of officers after Cromwell's death, they showed themselves not insensible to her merit; they obliged the Parliament to make a suitable settlement upon her, at a time when the Cromwellian interest was no more. It was grateful in them, and honourable to her. "Perceiving the return of the king," however, Noble tells us, "would take place, she conveyed a great quantity of gold, and some of the best and most portable valuables belonging [as was alleged, but by a fiction of royalty alone] to the royal family, to a fruiterer's warehouse, near the sign of the Three Cranes, in Thames-street, with an intention to export them out of the kingdom; but it being discovered, the council, May 16, 1660, ordered persons to view them, who reported that some pictures, and other things belonging to his majesty, were found; the remainder was attached in the custody of Lieutenant-general Cox; and June 9 following, information was given to the House of Lords that she, her son Richard, and Henry, Lord Herbert, had many deeds, evidences, and writings belonging to the Lord-marshal of Worcester [whose estates Cromwell had received from Parliament in payment of his military services], all of which they were ordered to deliver up." She had, until about this time, resided at the Cockpit and at Whitehall; but, leaving these places, she went from London and retired into Wales. Mr. Granger says he was credibly informed that she was a considerable time in Switzerland; but probably she never

Such was the partner for life's journey whom Cromwell had the good fortune to obtain, and from his union with whom his useful life began. He fixed his residence in his native town of Huntingdon, and having reconciled all old differences with his wealthy kinsmen—the Barringtons, the Hampdens, his uncle Sir Oliver, and all whom his early courses had offended—he addressed himself to those studies and pursuits which were to pave his way to greatness.

Then was seen the same vehemence of temper in the rigid duties of life which had so recently transported its owner into the extremes of pleasure. Cromwell's house became notorious as the refuge of Nonconformist ministers, or of such as suffered in any way for conscience' sake: nor was he content with offering them this refuge merely; he encouraged them to opposition; he stimulated his fellow-townsmen to support them in it; he attended the Bishop of Lincoln in person (afterward the famous Archbishop Williams) to press their suits; he preached for them; he prayed with them; * he proclaimed in every place the wrongs they were exposed to, and urged at every season, and by every allowable means, the necessity of redress.† was there. Finding that no inquiries were made after her, she returned into England, and found an asylum in the house of her son-in-law, Mr. Claypole, at Norborough, in Lincolnshire, where she continued until her death, courting obscurity. She had, as I have before mentioned, had the tithes of Hartford settled upon her: these she gave up. Oliver some years afterward gave her a grant of £2000 per ann.; but probably she never received any part of it, as it was, I think, issuing out of estates which were given to him by the Parliament, and belonged to the delinquent Loyalists, who, at the Restoration, would naturally reclaim what had been illegally and forcibly taken from them. The £8000 per ann., settled upon her by the Parliament, was never paid to her, nor perhaps any part of it; so that we must suppose she had but trifling means to support herself upon during her widowhood, and that arising chiefly from the sale of those valuables that she retained after the Protector's death. She survived her husband seven years; and, dying at Norborough, was buried in a vault in the chance of that church, but no memorial whatever is to be found to her memory."

* "His house," says a writer in the "Biographica Britannica," "became the retreat of the persecuted Nonconformist teachers; and they show a building behind it which, they say, he erected for a chapel, where many of the disaffected had their religious rites performed, and in which Mr. Cromwell himself sometimes gave them some edifying sermons. From his strenuousness in their cause, he was soon looked upon as the head of that party in the county; and he often interested himself warmly in their behalf, by attending Dr. Williams, bishop of Lincoln, and importunately desiring some mitigation for such of the Nonconformist preachers as had fallen into trouble, he regarding them as suffering persecution for conscience' sake."

† Having satisfied himself with the venerable divines of the Church, says Heath, "he fell in with some of the precisest sort; began to show himself at lectures, to entertain such preachers at his house, to countenance that way, and be very zealous in all meetings of such people, which then began to be frequent and numerous, and to exercise with them by praying and the like; to estrange himself from those his benefactors, and at last to appear a public dissenter from the discipline of the Church of England." The same writer gives, in the way of a sneer, a noble instance of the truth and sincerity of Cromwell's new way of life. "And now," he says, "he was grown (that is, he pretended to be) so just, and of so scrupulous a conscience, that, having some years before won £30 of one Mr. Calton at play, meeting him accidentally, he desired him to come home with him, and to receive his money, telling him that he had got it by indirect and unlawful means, and that it would be a sin in him to detain it any longer; and did really pay the gentleman the said £30 back again." Mr. Noble, too, in the course of his zealous researches, discovered, in one of the manuscripts submitted to him, a similar anecdote, which he thus relates: "Dr. Hutton, in his MS. book, says that Oliver won some money from Mr. Rob. Compton, a genteel lad,

Herein was shown, by this extraordinary man, his aptitude for the great claims and questions of the age. Of all the discontents that then muttered at a distance of the coming change; of all the grievances that were pushing on the stumbling and shambling government of the first Stuart to the inevitable precipice awaiting it; of all the mighty motives that were likely, while they stirred masses of men to generous suffering and great action, to consolidate in the end one tremendous party, irresistible and unyielding for life or death, the questions of religion and the conscience not only stood the first, but might be said to hold every other within their mighty embrace; for what the Church was then immortal language has depicted, in describing all that aspired to dignity in her service, from the curate to the bishop, as

"Such as for their bellies' sake
Creep, and intrude, and climb into the fold.
Of other care they little reck'ning make,
Than how to scramble at the shearer's feast,
And shove away the worthy bidden guest.
Blind mouths! that scarce themselves know how to hold
A sheep-hook; or have learn'd aught else the least
That to the faithful herdsman's art belongs!
What recks it them? What need they? They are sped;
And when they list, their lean and flashy songs
Grate on their scrannel pipes of wretched straw:
The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed,
But, swain with wind, and the rank mist they draw,
Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread:
Besides what the grim wolf with privy paw
Daily devours apace, and nothing said."

So great was the influence acquired by Cromwell in his masterly seizure of such grievances as these, that the chiefs of his fellow-townsmen offered to return him for the borough in the next Parliament that should be summoned. The effort was made in 1625, and failed; but in 1628 Oliver Cromwell went up to Westminster, and took his seat in the third Parliament of Charles I., as member for the borough of Huntingdon.*

A question has been raised as to the nature of his employment at Huntingdon in the interval after his marriage, since there is little doubt that his own private resources were insufficient to his support. It scarcely admits of a doubt, as it seems to me, that he took an active share in the business of his mother's brewery. The universal attempts of the Royalists of his day, both before and after the usurpation, to cast ridicule upon his having once followed son of a draper, or some such trade, in London; and it being by unfair play, he was determined to repay it him, which he did most opportunely, for the messenger found him at an ordinary, surrounded by bailiffs, so that he could not venture to leave the room; but he satisfied the debt, which was £20, and took away with him £100." Sir Philip Warwick, too, distinctly tells us that "he used a good method upon his conversion, for he declared he was ready to make restitution unto any man who would accuse him, or whom he could accuse himself to have wronged. To his honour I speak this, for I think the public acknowledgments men make of the public evils they have done to be the most glorious trophies they can have assigned to them."

* An impression has prevailed that he sat in the 1625 Parliament—as alleged by various writers, and even by the plodding and curious Mr. Noble. A friend of one of his latter biographers, however, Dr. Russell, supplies the following decisive note on this point: "A few years since there was a disputed election case in the borough, which was carried to a committee of the House, and it became necessary that authenticated copies of the returns should be procured from the originals in the town. I examined these, and found that Cromwell sat only once for Huntingdon, namely, in the third Parliament of Charles I., as stated above. In the first Parliament of that monarch, the former members, Sir Henry St. John and Sir Henry Mainwaring, were returned."

the occupation of a brewer,* are surely enough to raise a strong presumption of the fact (however justly the ridicule may be despised), in the absence of any counter statement on the part of his friends or dependants. And there is a passage in Milton's noble panegyric of him, applying to a somewhat later period, which is not without a certain strong bearing on the question: "Is matura jam atque firmata ætate, quam et privatus traduxit, nulla re magis quàm religionis cultu purioris, et integritate vitæ cognitus, domi in occulto creverat; et ad summa quæque tempora fiduciam Deo fretam et ingentem animum tacito pectore aluerat." "Being now arrived to a ripe and mature age, all which time he spent as a private person, noted for nothing so much as the culture of pure religion and an integrity of life, he was grown rich at home; and enlarging his hopes with reliance in God for any the most exalted times, he nursed his great soul in silence." The expression "grown rich," in this magnificent passage, seems undoubtedly to warrant the inference that it was by some pursuit he had thus grown rich, for it is well ascertained that at that time he had found out no easier method of achieving wealth or substance.†

A family, too, had meanwhile grown up around him. On the 13th of October, 1621, fourteen months after his marriage, his first son was baptized at St. John's Church, in Huntingdon. He was named Robert, after his grandfather, but died in his childhood. A second son, named Oliver, was baptized in the same church on the 6th of February, 1623, and subsequently received his education at the Felsted free grammar-school, in Essex, where he had been placed by means of the influence of his maternal grandfather (Sir James Bouchier)

* See Appendix C. A thousand other instances might be given—as in Hudibras, where the knight's dagger is spoken of:

"It had been 'prentice to a brewer,
Where this and more it did endure,
But left the trade, as many more
Have lately done on the same score."

Again, in a description of the House of Commons.

"'Tis Noll's old brewhouse now, I swear,
The speaker's but his skinker,
Their members are like th' council of war,
Carmen, pellers, tinkers."

And in another description of the Protector's court.

"Who, ficker than the city ruff,
Can change his brewer's coat to buff,
His dray-cart to a coach, the beast
Into two Flanders mares at least:
Nay, hath the art to murder kings,
Like David, only with his slings."

And, finally, for it is unnecessary to give more, in a song called "The Sale of Religious Household Stuff:"

"And here are Old Noll's brewing vessels,
And here are his dray and his slings."

With prose writers such allusions are scarcely less abundant. Walker, who wrote the "History of Independency," and prophesied that Cromwell (then lieutenant-general to Fairfax) would assume the supreme sway, added to his prediction, "Then let all true saints and subjects cry out with me, 'God save King Oliver and his brewing vessels.'" And, speaking of Harry Parker, under the name of Observer, he notices his return from Hamborough, and that "he is highly preferred to be a brewer's clerk (alias secretary to Cromwell)." Cowley's "Cutter of Coleman-street" has also an allusion to the business of Cromwell, when Worm, in derision of Cutter's learning, is made to ask, "What parts hast thou? Hast thou scholarship enough to make a brewer's clerk?"

† See, for an argument in favour of this, Mr. Thomas Cromwell's "Life and Times of Oliver Cromwell," p. 44.

with the Earl of Warwick. At the breaking out of the civil war, this boy, then nineteen, procured a commission by his father's interest, and, when the strife had wellnigh closed, fell in battle. His name, in touching allusion to that death, was one of the last words that rose to the Lord Protector's lips in this world.*

The first daughter born to Cromwell was baptized at St. John's, in Huntingdon, on the 5th of August, 1624. She will find subsequent mention in these pages for her uncompromising spirit and love of freedom. She married the famous Ireton; and, after the death of that most eminent soldier and statesman, took, as her second husband, Lieutenant-general Charles Fleetwood, in obedience, as was supposed, rather to the Protector's earnest entreaty than the selection of her own desire. Cromwell's next child was his successor Richard, who was born at Huntingdon on the 4th, and baptized at St. John's on the 19th of October, 1626; and this was followed, on the 20th of January, 1628, by the birth of Henry, afterward lord-lieutenant of Ireland, who was baptized on the 29th of that month, in the Church of All Saints, in Huntingdon. The education of both these boys was finished, along with that of their eldest brother, at the Felsted school, where they were taught by a man of well-known accomplishment, Mr. Holbeach; and had the advantage of the strict superintendence of their grandfather, Sir James Bourchier.

A letter from Cromwell to one of his son Richard's sponsors was found among some Cambridge manuscripts a few years ago. It is dated from Huntingdon on the 14th of October, 1626, and addressed to one of the tutors in St. John's College, Cambridge, whose friendship he had probably formed during his own stay at the University. "Loving sir," the letter runs, "make me so much your servant by being godfather unto my child; I would myself have come over to have made a formal invitation, but my occasions would not permit me; and therefore hold me in that excused. The day of your trouble is Thursday next. Let me intreat your company on Wednesday. By this time it appears I am more apt to encroach upon you for new favours, than to show my thankfulness for the love I have already found; but I know your patience and your goodness cannot be exhausted by your friend and servant, OLIVER CROMWELL. Hunt., this 14. October, 1626—to my approved good friend, Mr. Hen. Dowtlett, at his chambers in St. John's College there." This short and simple letter is interesting, because it is characteristic of Cromwell's mind at the period; and, notwithstanding the subject it relates to, contains not a cloudy or fanatic phrase. It shows, also, the sort of connexion he continued to keep up with Cambridge, and which, no doubt, was thus early preparing the way for his subsequent representation of that borough.

But it is time to return to the newly-elected representative for Huntingdon, on his way to take his seat at Westminster, in the month of March, 1628. Let us suppose that he and Hampden entered the House together, at the momentous opening of that famous Parliament

—two men already linked to each other by the bonds of counsel and of friendship yet more than by those of family, but presenting how strange a contrast to each other in all things, save the greatness of their genius! The one of exquisitely mild deportment, of ever civil and affable manners, with a countenance that at once expressed the dignity of his intellect and the sweetness of his nature; and even in his dress, arranged with scrupulous nicety and care, announcing the refinement of his mind; the other, a figure of no mean mark, but oh, how unlike that! His gait clownish, his dress ill made and slovenly, his manners coarse and abrupt, and his face such as men look on with a vague feeling of admiration and dislike! The features cut, at it were, out of a piece of gnarled and knotty oak; the nose large and red; the cheeks, coarse, warted, wrinkled, and sallow; the eyebrows huge and shaggy, but, glistening from beneath them, eyes full of depth and meaning, and, when turned to the gaze, piercing through and through the gazer; above these, again, a noble forehead, whence, on either side, an open flow of hair "round from his parted forelock manly hangs," clustering; and over all, and pervading all, that undefinable aspect of greatness alluded to by the poet,* when he spoke of the face of Cromwell as one that

"Did imprint an awe,
And naturally all souls to his did bow,
As wands of divination downward draw,
And point to beds where sovereign gold doth grow."†

* Dryden.

† Other opportunities will occur for adverting to Cromwell's appearance, but I may here subjoin the chief authorities for the above slight sketch. First, let the reader turn to the careful engraving, after Lely's portrait, prefixed to this volume: the only portrait I ever met with, among the hundreds that are in existence, which, to my mind, expresses Cromwell. † It represents him on the eve of his assumption of the Protectorate; and a story is told of Cromwell's instructions to the "young man" who painted it, that he was not to inflict any "nonsense" on the canvass, but paint wrinkles, warts, and all. There is an air about it (which we may suppose gathered there by the wonderful events that had already declared themselves to the successful soldier) of calm and unalterable superiority. The firm-set lips, the fair, large front, the threatening brow and nose, all "declare absolute rule;" and yet to gaze upon it for a time is to understand the worst libels of the Royalists. Clarendon describes Cromwell as having something singular and ungracious in his look and appearance. The author of Hudibras says, "Cromwell wants neither wardrobe nor armour; his face was naturally buff, and his skin may furnish you with a rusty coat of mail; you would think he had been christened in a lime-pit, and tanned alive." When Major-general Massey was introduced into the presence-chamber at the Hague, after his escape from England, immediately after the execution of Charles I., the Marquis of Montrose (who had seen Cromwell often in battle) asked him, by way of drollery—but a very misplaced drollery at such a time—"how Oliver's nose did." Clement Walker says, that when Cromwell ordered the soldiers to fire, in the insurrection of the London apprentices, "his nose looked as prodigiously upon you as a comet;" and, speaking of the government making treason no treason, he adds, that, should the House vote that "Oliver's nose is a ruby, they would expect you to swear it, and fight for it." These scurrilous jests, which yet have a certain character of truth, might be multiplied infinitely from the journals and records of the time. The "Mercurius Pragmaticus" of January, 1648, tells us, "Then Mr. Cromwell, to show that this was no time to speak sense and reason, stood up, and the glow-worm glistening in his beard, he began to spit fire; and, as the devil quoted Scripture against our Saviour, so did he against his sovereign, and told the House, it is written, 'Thou shalt not suffer a hypocrite to live;' and what then, I pray you, will become of himself?" The "Parliament Porter" of the following August is not less complimentary: "Nothing is heard now among the brethren but triumph and fury, singing and mirth, for their happy success (thanks to the devil first, and next to Noll Cromwell's nose) against the Scots, whom they vaunt to have beaten to dust. Monro, one of the best soldiers in Christendom, is coming on

* This has not been noticed by any writer, but will appear in an extract of one of the journals from the time.

Imagine, then, these two extraordinary men, now for the first time together,* passing along the crowded lobbies of that most famous assembly—Hampden greeting his friends as he passes, stopping now and then, perhaps, to introduce his country kinsman to the few whose curiosity had mastered the first emotion inspired by the singular stranger, but pushing directly forward towards a knot of active and eager faces that are clustered round a little spot near the bar of the House, on the right of the speaker's chair,† in the midst of which stand Sir John Eliot, Sir Robert Philips, and Pym. The crowd make way for Hampden; the central figures of that group receive him among them with deference and gladness; he introduces his cousin Cromwell; and, among the great spirits whom that little spot contains, the clownish figure, the awkward gait, the slovenly dress, pass utterly unheeded, for, in his first few words, they have discovered the fervour, and, perhaps, suspected the greatness, of this accession to their cause. Pym is soon seen to draw the new member for Huntingdon aside, and, with a forecast of his favourite sphere of action, initiates him into the case against Mainwaring ‡

Meanwhile, let a passage from one of Dr. South's sermons hint to us what may, at that instant, have occupied the more vulgar thoughts of the Royalist portion of the assembly. "Who," said that zealous candidate for a bishopric, "who that had beheld such a bankrupt, beggarly fellow as Cromwell first entering the Parliament House, with a threadbare torn coat, and a greasy hat (and perhaps neither of them paid for), could have suspected that, in the course of so few years, he should, by the murder of one king, and the banishment of another, ascend the throne, be invested in the royal robes, and want nothing of the state of a king but the changing of his hat into a crown?" "Odds fish, Lory!" exclaimed the laughing Charles, when he heard this from the divine who had panegyrized the living lord-protector, "Odds fish, man! your chaplain must be a bishop. Put me in mind of him at the next vacancy."

with a powerful army to give Nell another field fight: he will find hard play here, for these will not be laughed out of their loyalty, nor frightened out of themselves with the blazing of his beacon nose." Nor, in the "Mercurius Elencticus" of the February following the king's execution, is there any lack of characteristic forgery: "Sure Cromwell intends to set up his trade of brewing again, for the other day, being in the presence of the Duke of Gloucester, he stroked him on the head, and, like a merciful protector, said, 'Sirrah, what trade do you like best? Would not a shoemaker be a good trade for you, or a brewer? And for that little gentlewoman, your sister (meaning the Lady Elizabeth), if she will be ruled, I will provide her a husband; one of Colonel Pride's sons, or one of my own, if either of them like her, or can love her.' The duke told him that, 'being a king's son, he hoped the Parliament would allow him some means out of his father's revenue to maintain him like a gentleman, and not put him an apprentice like a slave.' Nose A!—ty makes answer, 'Boy, you must be apprentice, for all your father's revenue will not make half satisfaction for the wrong he hath done the kingdom;' and so Nose went blowing out." This long note may be closed by a short notice from the "Annual Register," where an old lady sets down her recollections of Cromwell, and says, among other things, that, when she saw him, his face was very pale, and his nose a deep red.

* Nothing is surely so probable, since Cromwell would most likely, in any case, have come up to town with Hampden, but, considering that this was his first session, must almost of necessity have availed himself of the present introduction of his influential cousin.

† See Life of Pym, p. 212.

‡ Ibid., p. 150.

Oh, glorious time for the Church! Oh, golden age for the profligate and the slave!

Not so the days before us now: the month of June has come, and Pym has risen, in this third Parliament, the accuser of the royal chaplain, Mainwaring. The various assertions of manly thought and elevated courage that rang through the great assembly after that memorable exposure have been celebrated in other portions of this work. Mainwaring, given up by Charles and by Laud, received severe judgment. Cromwell sat silently, earnestly watching all, and patiently waiting all.

The House reassembled, smarting with the gross events of the recess. A debate soon followed; and in the course of it were heard the mild, yet potent accents of the voice of Hampden, insinuating deadly objections under the notion of modest doubts, and, almost insensibly to themselves, influencing in his behalf the most violent of his opponents. The charm of that exquisite orator hangs yet over the House, when it is suddenly dispelled by a harsh and broken voice of astonishing fervour, whose untunable but piercing tones announce to the Royalists a foe to grapple with, and to the patriots a strong arm of help: it is Cromwell. Among other things, he accuses Dr. Alabaster of having preached flat popery at St. Paul's Cross; and more, that his diocesan, the Bishop of Winchester, had ordered him to do it! By this same bishop's means, he adds, that Mainwaring, so nobly and justly punished here for his sermons, has been recently—recently, within a month, preferred to a rich living. If these are steps to Church preferments, what may we not expect?*

Cromwell resumed his seat, and was followed by Sir Robert Philips, a veteran in debate, and one of the acknowledged authorities of the House, whose tone, in the few words he addressed to the speaker, bore evidence to the striking effect which the new member had created. Then followed the singular scene which closed in the adoption of Pym's religious vow—the heaviest blow yet aimed at the Church of Laud; and then, the dissolution.

After that disastrous termination of this Parliament, Cromwell returned to Huntingdon, but thenceforward kept himself in frequent intercourse with Hampden and the celebrated St. John, the latter of whom had married his uncle's eldest daughter.† He had now openly chosen his part with that mighty body of able and resolute men, who were pledged to the death against a continuance of the old, the vile, and irresponsible government of England; and, though having merely set his hand to the plough, every idea and purpose of his mind seemed, in that very instant, to have stretched forward to some prospect of a harvest-time. Hampden's vade mecum was "Davila's History of the Civil Wars;" Cromwell's was the already unceasing thought of the great motives that might be infused into mean men by the simple use of one tremendous passion, in whose presence pleasure should avail not, and suffering be as nothing: a glorious and elevating thought of all the possible vices and follies in even the basest, the weakest, and the most low-born, which might thus be entirely overmastered or subdued. In other words, Hampden studied how best to manage an army; Cromwell, how best to raise one.

* See Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 289.

† Elizabeth, daughter of Henry Cromwell, Esq., of Upwood.

From this time it was notorious he carried religious exercises to an infinitely higher pitch than he had yet attempted; and now it was that Sir Philip Warwick was told by his physician, Dr. Simcott, of the splenetic man his patient was; and how he had "phansyes about the cross in that town;" and how that he, the doctor, had been "called up to him at midnight, and such unseasonable hours," so very many times, upon a "strong phansy, which made him believe he was then dying." No doubt the good Dr. Simcott knew about as much of the disease his patient laboured under as the grave Sir Philip Warwick himself. The thoughts that shook Oliver Cromwell then were far beyond the reaches of their souls; it is possible, nay, almost certain, that they were even "beyond the reach" of the thinker's own; for therein consists, as our noblest philosopher has in a single line defined it, the whole pain of hypochondriacal metaphysics. Cromwell had already projected himself too far into the future.

And the process, thus commenced, seems to have gone regularly on during the brief interval he remained in Huntingdon. Had Shakspeare personally undergone the precise disease, he could not more finely have defined it, as by a prophetic forecast, in Cromwell's case, than by the description Polonius gives of Hamlet's suffering. For the young prince, observes that fine, politic specimen of the Burleigh school,

*Fell into a sadness; thence into a fast;
Thence to a watch; thence into a weakness;
Thence to a lightness;*

and this was the very movement of hypochondriacal disease now traced in Cromwell. At one time plunged in sorrow; now still more alarming the affectionate solicitude around him by refusing support that nature cried for; then starting from his bed in the dead of night with fits of painful watching; troubled strangely afterward with "phansies about the cross" of Huntingdon; and then, after an interval, suddenly plunging into fantastic shapes of merriment, that showed most painful and dangerous of all: thus did Cromwell, according to the traditions and records of the time, pass the three years that followed his return to Huntingdon from the Parliament of 1628.

At last (perhaps moved to it by some desire to seek refuge in a change of scene) he resolved to leave that town. I should observe that, some days after his return from his Parliamentary duties, he had been appointed, in conjunction with his old tutor, Dr. Beard, and one Robert Bernard, a justice of the peace, under the new charter granted about that time to the Huntingdon corporation; but this appointment, made with a probable view of softening the asperity of the late formidable member of Parliament, had grown irksome to him from circumstances recently named, and his discomforts were thought to have been increased by the neighbourhood of his very violent Royalist uncle, Sir Oliver, whose influence had already rendered hopeless his re-election for Huntingdon.

Be this as it may, there is no doubt that, in 1631, he prevailed with that uncle, his wife, and his mother,* to concur with him in the sale of certain lands and tithes of the family, out of which his small patrimony was at present derived. By this sale he realized £1800; and having stocked a little farm at St. Ives with the money, he at once, leaving his mother at Huntingdon, in the midst of old associations too dear to her to be resigned, removed to St. Ives with his wife and children.

Nearly every local memorial of the residence of the Cromwells at Huntingdon has perished. The great old family are extinct; their manor-houses and lands have passed to other proprietors; but, though no trace remains to tell of the old knightly fortunes and splendours of the chief representatives of the name, the memory of the self-raised brewer has clung fast to the soil—even to fragments of it—and will cling there immortally. A portion of land near Godmanchester is still called Oliver Cromwell's Swath; and two acres in the manor of Brampton still bear the name of Oliver Cromwell's Acres.

In the care of the St. Ives farm he now not only sought employment for some portion of the ill-subdued energy which always craved in him for action, but also put to the proof the value of those thoughts we have attributed to him after the disastrous dissolution of 1628. In the tenants that rented from him—in the la-

* The industry of Mr. Noble furnishes us with an abstract of the conveyance, which I shall give (as probably interesting to the reader), premising that "the reason of Sir Oliver and Mrs. Robert Cromwell joining in the deed is, that the latter had a small jointure out of it, and that, with reference to the former, Sir Henry Cromwell had merely given or devised these premises to his son, Rob. Oliv., the Protector's father, for a long term of years, as it was usual anciently." The following is Mr. Noble's abstract and description of the property: "On the 7th. of May, 1631, he obtained that his uncle, Sir Oliver Cromwell, alias Williams, of Ramsey, in the county of Huntingdon, kn't, his mother, Eliz. Williams, alias Cromwell, of Huntingdon, widow, should join with himself and his wife (who are described, Oliver Williams, alias Cromwell, of Huntingdon, Esq., and Elizabeth, his now wife), to convey his estates in and near Huntingdon, and at Hartford, to Richard Oakeley, of the city of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, Esq., and Rich. Owen, also of the county of Middlesex, Esq. As it may be very acceptable to many of my readers, especially those of Huntingdon and its vicinity, I will give the parcels as they stand in the deed, omitting only the general words. All the capital messuage, called the Augustine Fryers, alias Augustine Friars, within the borough or town of Huntingdon, and the messuages, &c., belonging to it, and one close, called the Dove-house close, and also all those three cottages or tenements, with a malt-house, and a little close, by estimation one acre, lying together in Huntingdon, aforesaid, theretofore of Edm. Goodwyns; and also all those seven leas of pasture, containing by estimation two acres, called Toothill Leas, lying in Huntingdon; and also all those two acres and three roods of meadow, lying and being in Brampton, in the said county of Huntingdon, in a meadow there called Portholme; and also all those two acres of meadow, in Godmanchester, in the said county of Huntingdon; all the above premises are called either late, or now or late, in the possession of the said Eliz. Cromwell, widow; and all other the lands and tenements of the said Eliz. Cromwell, widow, Oliv. Cromwell, Esq., or either of them, in Huntingdon, Godmanchester, or Brampton aforesaid, or any of them. And also all the rectory and parsonage of Hartford, in the said county, and the tithes both great and small of the same, with all and singular the rights, members, and appurtenances thereof, to the late dissolved priory or monastery of the blessed Virgin Mary, in Huntingdon aforesaid, heretofore belonging or appertaining, and being some time parcel of the possessions thereof. The sum." Mr. Noble adds, "that these estates were sold for was only £1800; with this he did not think it beneath him to stock a grazing farm at St. Ives, in Huntingdonshire, whither he went upon leaving the place of his birth."

bourers that took service under him—he sought to sow the seeds of his after-troop of Ironsides. He achieved an influence through the neighbourhood all around him, unequalled for piety and self-denying virtue. The greater part of his time, even upon his farm, was passed in devotional exercises, and expositions, and prayer. Who prays best will work best; who preaches best will fight best: all the famous doctrines of his later and more celebrated years were tried and tested on the little farm at St. Ives. His servants were taught that, however inferior to the lords of the earth they might be in worldly circumstances, there were yet claims of loftier concern in which they had equal share, and in the right understanding of which their humanity might exalt itself to the level of the proudest. He did not drudge them from rising to setting sun, as if they had been merely beasts of burden; he left them time, at intervals, to ponder on the momentous fact that even they had immortal souls. Before going to their field-work in the morning they knelt down with their master in the touching equality of prayer; in the evening they shared with him again the comfort and exaltation of divine precepts, and were taught the inexpressible value of the religion that is practical, and tends to elevate, not to depress, the soul.

In St. Ives, to this day, significant memorials of Cromwell exist, which strangely and deeply connect themselves, even at this distance of time, with those solemn scenes. A vast number of swords are scattered round the neighbourhood, bearing on their hilts the initials O. C. They have descended from the farmers and labourers of the times we are retracing, to the possession of their present owners; for in 1641, when the sky foretold the imminent storm, a large supply of swords was sent to the district of St. Ives, marked with those initials, for which, some few months after, the sum of £100 was voted to Cromwell, in acknowledgment of the outlay and the zeal. With the Bible he had before given them in one hand, and the sword he then gave them in the other, those old tenants and labourers of St. Ives afterward formed part of that immortal phalanx which was never known to yield or be beaten in battle.*

Meanwhile the farm itself was anything but prosperous. It was probably, however, the last part of Cromwell's care, and therefore the sneers of the Royalist biographers and historians on this point fall harmlessly enough. "The long prayers," writes Hume, "which he said to his family in the morning, and again in the afternoon, consumed his own time and that of his ploughmen; and he reserved no leisure for the care of his temporal affairs."† His health, more than his temporal affairs, troubled him at this time. The cold and damp air of St. Ives never thoroughly agreed with him; and his appearance almost every Sunday in the parish church was long remembered and adverted to by the inhabitants of that place, after his fame had directed all eyes towards him, and made him the argument of every tongue. They described him walking up the aisle in an ill-arranged dress, and with a piece of red flannel* fastened round his throat to protect him from the frequent inflammations to which the sharp cold and excessive moisture of the air had painfully exposed him.

Other memories, too, Cromwell left behind him among the people of St. Ives. More friendly to the true religion than to its professed ministers—in whose communion he nevertheless seems up to this time to have remained—he was remembered as the friend of the poor or the oppressed in conscience; as a man of wonderfully fervent piety, ever zealous to promote good works and to reward good men. One of his letters, written during his residence at St. Ives, is fortunately preserved in the British Museum, and corroborates in all respects this report of his character. It is addressed to his "very loving friend Mr. Storie, at the sign of the Dogg in the Royal Exchange, London." The object of it appears to have been to secure the continuance of "a man of goodness, and industrie, and abilitie every way," in a lectureship which Mr. Storie and others had instituted in St. Ives. Its spirit is that of a generous and disinterested earnestness, and it is not without its characteristic touches.

"MR. STORIE,—Amongst the catalogue of those good workes which your fellow-citycenes and our countriemen have donne, this will not be reckoned for the least, that they have provided for the feedinge of soules. Buildinge of hospitals provides for men's bodyes; to build materiall temples is indyed a worke of pietye; butt they that procure spirituall food, they that build up spirituall temples, they are the men trulye charitable, trulye pious. Such a worke as this was your erectinge the lecture in our ploughs, carts, &c.; and the better to prosper his own and his men's labour, every morning, before they stirred out, the family was called together to prayer, at which exercise, very often, they continued so long, that it was nine of the clock in the morning before they began their work; which awkward beginning of their labour sorted with a very sorry issue; for the effect of those prayers was, that the hinds and ploughmen, seeing the zeal of their master, which dispensed with the profitable and most commodious part of the day for their labour, thought they might borrow the other part for their pleasure, and therefore commonly they went to plough with a pack of cards in their pockets, and having turned up two or three furrows, set themselves down to game till dinner-time, when they returned to the second part of their devotion, and measured out a good part of the afternoon with dinner, and a repetition of some market-lecture that had been preached the day before. And that little work that was done was done so negligently and by halves, that scarce half a crop ever reared itself upon his grounds, so that he was (after five years time) glad to abandon it, and get a friend of his to be the tenant for the remainder of his time."

"The clerk of the parish of St. Ives, who is a very intelligent old man, and much superior to his station (having been bred an attorney), told me, that he had been informed by old persons who knew Mr. Cromwell when he resided at St. Ives, that he usually frequented divine service at church, and that he generally came with a piece of red flannel round his neck, as he was subject to an inflammation in his throat. It appears by Mercurius Elencticus that Oliver's neck was awry; surely it was a disorder incident to heroes."—Noble's Memoirs of the Protectoral House.

* We owe this curious fact respecting the swords to Mr. Noble, who incidentally mentions the discovery, in some doubt of their origin. Mr. Noble tells us, also, that, at the time he wrote, a large barn which Cromwell built still went by his name, and that the farmer who then rented the lands which he occupied marked his sheep with the identical iron which Oliver used, and which have upon them the letters O. C.

† The ingenious Mr. Heath also gives his usual scurril version of these incidents, in Cromwell's History. "But his estate still decaying, he betook himself at last to a farm, being parcel of the royalty of St. Ives, where he intended to husband it, and try what could be done by endeavour, since nothing (as yet) succeeded by design; and accordingly took servants, and bought him all utensils and materials, as cuntrie, in the which you placed Dr. Welles, a man of goodnesse, and industrie, and abilitie every way, not short of any I knowe in England; and I am perswaded that sithence his cominge, the Lord by him hath wrought much good amongst us. It only remains now that he whose first moved you to this, putt you forward to the continuance thereof: it was the Lord, and therefore to him lift we up our harts that he would perfect it. And surely, Mr. Storie, it were a piteous thinge to see a lecture fall in the handes of so manie able and godly men, as I am perswaded the founders of this are, in these times wherein we see they are suppressed with too much hast and violence by the enemies of God his truth; far be it that soe much guilt should sticke to your hands, who live in a citye so renowned for the clere shininge light of the Gospell. You knowe, Mr. Storie, to withdrawe the pay is to lett fall the lecture, for whoe goeth to warfare at his own cost? I beseech you, therefore, in the bowells of Christ Jesus, putt it forward, and lett the good man have his pay. The soules of God his children will bless you for it; and so shall I, and ever rest your lovinge friend in the Lord, OLIVER CROMWELL. Commende my harty love," he adds in a postscript, "to Mr. Busse, Mr. Beadley, and my other good friends. I would have written to Mr. Busse, but I was loath to trouble him with a longe letter, and I feared I should not receive an answer from him: from you I expect one soe soon as conveniently you may. Vale."

This letter is dated "St. Ives, 11th of January, 1635;" and in the following year he left that place to take possession of a property of some little value in and near Ely, which just then fell to him by the will of his maternal uncle, Sir Thomas Steward.* In the month of June, 1636, we find him domiciled at the glebe-house, near St. Mary's Churchyard, in the city of Ely. His property here, though respectable in amount, was not very considerable, for it consisted less of any extensive freehold or independent possession, than of long leases and tithes held under the dean and chapter, whom he found, however, not unwilling to accommodate his wishes, and so, as they may have fancied, purchase his forbearance or esteem, by renewing the greater part of his leases for one-and-twenty years.† They appointed him, also,

* See anté, p. 402.

† "After a residence of between four and five years at St. Ives, by the death of his maternal uncle, Sir Tho. Steward, in the beginning of Jan., 1635-6, without issue, he became possessed of very considerable estates in and near Ely, part of which consisted of a lease of land and tithes belonging to the parishes of Trinity and St. Mary, in Ely, held under the dean and chapter: this caused him to seat himself in that city. He resided in the glebe-house, near to St. Mary's Churchyard, now occupied by Mr. Page, the present lessee: he certainly had removed to Ely so early as June 7, in that year, as he had then signed an acquittance for £10 given by the Attorney-general Noy, and received of the executors of Sir Tho. Steward. He was chosen, Aug. 30 in this year, a trustee in Parson's Charity, together with the right reverend father in God, Fra. lord-bishop of Ely, Will. Fuller, D.D., and dean of Ely, Anth. Page, of Ely, gent., and Will. Austin, of Ely, yeoman; and by the charter of incorporation granted by King Charles I., Jan. 16, 1633, no one could be a scoffee unless he was actually an inhabitant of that city. The dean and chapter of Ely, Oct. 20 following, renewed his lease for 21 years of the tithes of the parishes of Trinity and St. Mary in that city. The dean and chapter of Ely, Oct. 27, 1637, granted to him, jointly with the bishop of that see, Will. March, John Goodricke, Anth. Page, Esqrs., Henry Goodricke, and others, scoffees, therein named, a lease of Denver's Holt, near Stuntney.

to the trusteeship of some important charities in the city.

Here it was, however—while living, as he told his own Parliament in 1654, neither in any considerable height, nor yet in obscurity*—that one of his worst hypochondriacal distempers is reported to have seized him. It was natural that it should have done so, even as on those melancholy days we have described, following the dissolution of the Parliament he first sat in. The threatening thunder of the impending political tempest was now again heard along the sky, louder and more imminent than ever. The outrages on the people—on life, on liberty, on conscience, on all that gave life value, or could endear it even to its native land—those horrible outrages which had now for nearly twelve long and dreary years been endured, without an apparent prospect of redress, were at last approaching their fearful hour of consummation and retribution. All this, in its minute detail, has already been described,† and need not be repeated here. Now, with the sure sense of what such events were swiftly urging on, they must have struck with their deepest force on Cromwell. His most melancholy and distempered state of religious metaphysics would as surely descend with them. If he had horrible visions of the slit noses, and earless heads, and bloody human mutilations going on in the pillories of Laud, be sure that he had visions too, which pressed yet more terribly upon him, of the oceans of blood that lay between these days and the days of liberty, and that were nevertheless to be passed, amid the singing of psalms and expoundings of prayer, without a thought for suffering or sorrow. Cromwell's most intense manifestations of religion, it is to be invariably observed, preceded his greatest resolves, and went hand in hand with his greatest deeds. No wonder, then, they pressed fearfully upon him in these three years at Ely. No wonder, when he saw, as he described it in after years,‡ thousands of his "brethren forsake their native country to seek their bread from strangers, or to live in howling wildernesses," that he thought, with flushed cheek and agitated heart, of those noble uses of the most despised life he had taught to his tenants and labourers at his little farm at St. Ives, of the better and braver resource that should have yet remained even to lowest and most oppressed humanity.

I do not pause to tell the reader that the idea of Cromwell himself having ever entertained the notion of leaving England to seek a safer home in America is utterly incredible, and supported by no worthy evidence. Elsewhere, in these lives, it has been refuted § Such was

During the following year, there are several memorandums preserved respecting Parson's Charity, in which his name is mentioned; and Oct. 29 in this year, he received from the dean and chapter of Ely two leases, one of Mallicourt manor, the other of Beele closes, each for 21 years.—Noble's Memoirs of the Protectoral House.

* "I was by birth a gentleman, living neither in any considerable height, nor yet in obscurity."—Words spoken to his Parliament, Sept. 13, 1654.

† In Lives of Eliot and Pym.

‡ To the Parliament of 1654—in dissolving it.

§ See Life of Pym. The reader will recollect the incident referred to. Yet it may be as well to subjoin it, for lovers of the marvellous. "Lord Brooke, Lord Say and Sele and his sons, Pym, and other distinguished men of the same sentiments, were about to remove to a settlement in not the cast of his mind or temper. To leave England, where everything heaved with the anticipation of such a future—when the name of Hampden filled all mouths, and his quiet attitude of immovable resolution during the great trial of ship-money had made grateful all hearts—when the harvest of what had been sown by suffering approached to be reaped in triumph—nay, when the very corn was ripe and only waiting for the glancing sickle! The bare thought is of ridiculous unlikelihood.

In Thurloe's State Papers is preserved a letter of deep interest from Cromwell to his cousin, the wife of Oliver St. John, written at this period from Ely. It is addressed to "My beloved Cozen Mrs. St. John, att Sir William Masham his house called Oates in Essex," and bears the date of "Ely, 13th of October, 1638." It seems to me not only to point to the thoughtless past, but to cherish the hope of the great and thoughtful future.

"DEERE COZEN,—I thankfully acknowledge your love in your kind remembrance of mee upon this oportunitie. Alas, you doe too highlye prize my lines and my Companie. I may bee ashamed to owne your expressions, consideringe how unprofitable I am; and the meane improvement of my tallent. Yett to honour my God by declaringe what hee hath done for my soule, in this I am confident, and I will bee soe. Trulye then this I finde, that hee giveth springes in a drye and barren wilderness, where no water is. I live (you know where) in Mesheck, which they say signifies prolonginge; in Kedar, which signifieth blacknesse; yet the Lord forsaketh mee not. Though hee doe prolonge, yett he will (I trust) bringe mee to his Tabernacle, to his resting-place. My soule is with the congregation of the first-borne, my body rests in hope; and if heere I may honour my God either by doeing or sufferinge, I shall be most glad. Trulye noe poore creture hath more cause to putt forth himselfe in the Cause of his God than I. I have had plentifull wadges beforehand; and I am sure I shall never earne the least mite. The Lord accept mee in his Sonn, and give mee to walke in the light, and give us to walke in the light, as hee is in the light. Hee it is that enlighteneth our blacknesse, our darknesse. I dare not say hee hydeth his face from mee. He giveth mee to see light in this light. One beame in a darke place hath exceedinge much refreshment in it; blessed bee his name for shininge upon soe dark a hart as mine. You knowe what my manner of life hath bin. O, I lived in, and loved darknesse, and hated the light; I was a chiefe—the chiefe of Sinners. This is true, I hated Godlinesse, yett God had mercy on mee. O the riches of his mercy! praise him for mee, pray for mee, that hee, whoe hath be-gunn a good worke, would perfect it to the day of Christ. Salute all my good friends in that Family whereof you are yett a member. I am much bound unto them for theyr love. I blesse the Lord for them, and that my Sonn by theyr procurement is soe well. Lett him have your prayers, your Councell; lett mee have them. Salute your Husband and sister from mee. He is not a man of his word; hee promised to write about Mr. Wrath of Epinge, butt as yett I received noe letters. Putt him in minde to doe what with conveniency may bee donn for the poore cozen I did sollicit him about. Once more farewell; the Lord bee with you: soe prayeth your trulye lovinge Cozen, OLIVER CROMWELL. . . My wife's service and love presented to all her friends."

This letter has been strangely remarked upon by the only other biographer of Cromwell, who quotes it thus: "It expresses," says Dr. Russell, "the strong feeling of remorse and self-abasement with which he was then agitated. Nor were his views of the future more cheerful than his retrospect of the past. He brooded over the evils which his diseased imagination created, and saw no recovery for his affairs, spiritual or temporal, in the distant perspective which opened up before him." No recovery for his affairs spiritual! Why, the purpose of the letter is to reflect back upon his dear cousin some portion of the spiritual light that had then shone in so graciously upon himself. No hope for his temporal affairs! Why, his body, he tells his correspondent, rests in hope; he is looking forward with gladness to some nearly approaching time when he may possibly honour his God "either by doeing or sufferinge;" and in the very next sentence to that, repeats the idea which evidently occupies him so as almost to exclude every other, of "putting himself forth in the cause of his God." The tone of the letter is any thing but despondent or cast down. Even its reference to his early days of dissolute wildness is rather made with a joyous sense of a blessed change, than with a still exacting or self-accusatory grudge. When Cromwell wrote that letter he was rather thinking, be sure, of the Parliament that must be summoned soon, and the place he was likely to succeed in standing for, than with any remorseful or despondent dread of either temporal or spiritual thing.

Before proceeding to that great subject of all his present thoughts, a slight allusion in the letter should detain us briefly with his domestic concerns. His son Richard was then staying at Sir William Masham's; and truly it may be supposed to have become a matter of some moment with him now, to clear his house, when he could, of a few of its numerous little inmates, for his family had increased around him. On the 2d of July, 1629, a second daughter had been christened at the old Huntingdon church of St. John's. She was called Elizabeth, after his mother, and will have mention in these pages hereafter as the favourite daughter of Cromwell. On the 8th of January, 1632, a boy, born at St. Ives, had been baptized in the same church of Huntingdon, and received the name of James, after that of his maternal grandfather; but some few days afterward he appears to have died, and to have been buried there.

New-England, where the name of Saybrooke, in honour of the two noble leaders, had already been given to a township in which they were expected. Eight vessels with emigrants on board were ready to sail from the Thames, when the king, by an order of council, forbade their departure, and compelled the intended passengers to come on shore, fatally for himself; for among those passengers Hazlerig and Hampden, and Cromwell, with all his family, had actually embarked. There are few facts in history which have so much the appearance of fatality as this. I have shown the worthlessness of the authority on which this story rests; and also, if it depends on the actual occurrence of the ships' having been stopped by an order of council, the patriots ought to have left after all, for the embargo was speedily taken off the ships, and they left with all their passengers.

Then, in February, 1637, the gentle Mary, so handsome, and yet so like her father, afterward wife to Earl Faulconberg, had been born in Ely, and subsequently, as with the rest, baptized in Huntingdon. Lastly, Frances, the fourth and youngest daughter, swiftly followed, and was baptized on the 6th of December, 1638, at St. Mary's Church in Ely. The motive for sending all these children, except this last (when some accident or illness, no doubt, intervened to make her an exception), to receive baptism in Huntingdon, must have been a kind deference to the wishes of their grandmother and to her prejudice in favour of that place, since their father had yet had no open quarrel or difference with the churchmen of St. Ives or Ely.* This supposition is farther borne out by a fact which surprised Mr. Noble in the course of his researches, that the children of her daughters, the Wautons, the Disbrowes, and the Sewsters, were also nearly all of them brought for baptism to the same old church in Huntingdon. She was equally fond of, and interested in them all. It increases our admiration for that true affection which, with all its weakness and with all its strength, characterized the noble-hearted mother of Oliver Cromwell.

But his name recalls the thoughts with which he was at this time eagerly watching the prog-

* The late good old Oliver Cromwell, Esquire, in his terrifically stupid quarto about his great progenitor, is always anxious to exhibit Cromwell, with a singular weakness, as on the best possible terms to the last moment with Church and aristocracy. "In the books of Record of a Charitable Institution in Ely," he observes, "the members whereof are styled Ely Feoffees, is the following entry, so late as 1641 (whereof the Writer has been permitted to take a Copy), he then being an active member of the Long Parliament: '1641. Gave to divers poor people, in the presence of Mr. Archdeacon and Mr. Oliver Cromwell, £16 14s.' This shows that he had not then ceased to associate with the clergy of the Establishment." Indeed, worthy old gentleman, it proves nothing of the sort, but is merely a necessary act of duty on the part of Cromwell, as one of the charitable trustees as aforesaid. What would Mr. Cromwell make of this anecdote told by Mr. Noble? "It will be proper to observe, that Oliver was probably neither pleased with the clergy, nor the manner that the Cathedral service was performed in Ely; for in Jan., 1643-4, he wrote to the Rev. Will. Hitch, the clergy-vicar, to desire he would desist using the choir service, as unifying and offensive; but advised him to catechize, read, and expound the Scriptures, and have more frequent preaching than had been usual; and this, for fear the soldiers should tumultuously attempt a reformation; subjoining, that he must answer it if he did not comply; which he not choosing to do, both the soldiers and the rabble broke into the Cathedral during divine service, and Oliver addressing himself to Mr. Hitch, said, 'I am a man under authority, and am commanded to dismiss this assembly.' Mr. Hitch made a pause; when, finding that Oliver, and the people with him, proceeded up to the communion table, he began to discharge the office of his function; at which Cromwell returned with great displeasure, and laying his hand upon his sword, in a passion, bid the clergyman leave off 'his fooling,' and come down; and then drove the whole congregation from the Cathedral." "There is also," pursues old Mr. Cromwell, furnishing us with some little facts connected with Cromwell's residence in Ely that may be worth subjoining, "a Petition at Ely, addressed to Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, by the inhabitants of the Isle of Ely, in the reign of King Charles I., stating that Aldreth was a great market for fat cattle, but that it had been discontinued in consequence of the decay of Aldreth bridge, which should be kept in repair by the Earl of Suffolk as lord of the manor of Haddenham. The object of this Petition is to request the Bishop to lay their case before the King for redress. This Petition is signed by Cromwell and many others. With these Records is also a letter of Cromwell's, of which the following is a copy: 'Mr. Hand,—I doubt not but I shall be as good as my word for your monie. I desier you to deliver 40s. of the Town monie to this bearer, to pay for the phisicke for Benson's Cure. If the Gentlemen will not allow it at the tyme of account, keep this boat, and I will pay it out of my own purse. Soe I rest, your loveinge friend, OLIVER CROMWELL.' Sept. 13, 1638."

ress of events towards the now inevitable Long Parliament. And now an occasion arose, whereof he most skillfully availed himself, in furtherance of these eager hopes and wishes.

The Earl of Bedford and other noblemen of the day had, some seven or eight years before, proposed a scheme for draining the extensive fens which in those days covered some millions of acres of the finest plains in the counties of Cambridge, Huntingdon, Northampton, and Lincoln. The good work had now advanced to a certain extent—that part of it, in fact, properly called the Bedford Level, and containing nearly 400,000 acres, had been completed—when it was found necessary to call in other aid to the project, and a proposition was made to the crown, offering a fair proportion of the land for its countenance, assistance, and authority in the completion of the whole.

Up to this point all had gone on well: the scheme included in itself unquestionably a large share of public advantage, and its chief projector was a nobleman of wide and deserved popularity; but, from the instant of the royal interference, all kinds of difficulties and contentions were introduced. A parcel of court commissioners—officers ever hateful in that day, and with reason, to the wretched and oppressed commonalty—arrived in the districts, held courts for the adjudication of claims connected in any way with the property, decided all the questions in the king's favour of course, and, it is even said, proposed to dispute with Lord Bedford and the other originators of the undertaking their retention of 95,000 acres of the land already recovered, in compensation of the venture they had undergone.* Whether the latter allegations are true or false, it is not doubted that the occasion was at once seized by the king's officers as an admirable one for enriching the then most needy Exchequer, and that, with this view, several acts of injustice were threatened.

The common people began to murmur—to complain loudly—to clamour for justice—to threaten in their turn. Meetings were held; and at one of them a powerful auxiliary suddenly appeared in the person of Oliver Cromwell. From that instant the scheme became thoroughly hopeless. With such desperate determination he followed up his purpose—so actively traversed the district and inflamed the people everywhere—so passionately described the greedy claims of royalty, the gross exactions of the commission, nay, the very questionable character of the improvement itself, even could it have gone on unaccompanied by incidents of tyranny—to the small proprietors insisting that their poor claims would be merely scorned in the new distribution of the property reclaimed—to the labouring peasants, that all the profit and amusement they had derived from commoning in those extensive wastes were about to be snatched forever from them—that, before his almost single individual energy, king, commissioners, noblemen-projectors, all were forced to retire, and the great project, even in the state it then was, fell to the ground.

This matter has been variously described; but in the account just given, an attempt has been made to reconcile the discrepancies that have appeared in other descriptions of it. It seems clear to me, from all the documents that afford us information,* that the scheme had proceeded, entirely unopposed by the people, till, on the completion of the Bedford Level, the name and interest of the king became involved in it; that Cromwell then saw the advantage which might be taken of the popular discontent awakened by the latter circumstance, and availed himself of it accordingly; that when he moved in it first, it might merely have been with a view to support and protect the threatened rights of the popular nobleman who was the chief projector, but that, in the course of his opposition, he saw an irresistible opportunity of impressing with a sense of his influence not only large masses of the small proprietors, and of the lower orders of discontented men whose rights and pleasures were now found to be endangered by the scheme, but also of exhibiting that influence to the country at large in the defeat not only of king and commissioners, but of the entire scheme itself; and that, before this temptation, every consideration of the real utility and the many beneficial tendencies of the undertaking involved, vanished altogether. A pure motive of good may have engaged him first, but it was certainly a mixed motive of evil and good that shaped his ultimate course.

* Life and Times of Cromwell, by Thomas Cromwell, p. 68.

Let the facts which I shall now state prove this, if farther proof is wanted. In the year 1649 the Long Parliament passed an act for "draining the great level of the Fens," and in the preamble of that act it is stated, "that whereas the said great level, by reason of frequent overflowings of the rivers . . . has been of small and uncertain profit, but (if drained) may be improved and made profitable, and of great advantage to the Commonwealth, and the particular owners, &c. . . . And whereas Francis, late Earl of Bedford, did undertake the said work, and had 95,000 acres, parcel of the said great level, decreed and set forth, in October, in the thirteenth year of the reign of the late King Charles, in recompense thereof; and he and his participants, and their heirs and assigns, have made a good progress therein, with expense of great and vast sums of money; but by reason of some late interruptions, the works there made have fallen into decay: be it therefore enacted and ordained, that William, now Earl of Bedford, &c., in recompense of the aforesaid charge and adventure, and for bearing the charge of draining, and maintaining the works from time to time, shall have and enjoy the said whole 95,000 acres." Now the chief advocate of this measure in the House was no other than "Lieutenant-general Cromwell," whose name afterward appears as a commissioner "to hear, determine, order, adjudge, and execute all such things as are prescribed by this act." Circumstances had changed a little! It was not undeserving of praise in Cromwell, however, to seek thus to repair* the temporary obstruction he had offered to an undertaking of general advantage, and in his former opposition to which he had supposed himself sanctioned by the consideration of higher objects and efforts that then claimed the influence such opposition gave him.

* Even Sir P. Warwick's account, though for many reasons coloured to the author's purpose, offers no violent contradiction to it. He writes: "The Earl of Bedford, and divers of the principal gentlemen, whose habitations confined upon the fens, and who, in the heat of summer, saw vast quantities of lands which the fresh waters overflowed in the winter, lie dry and green, or drainable—whether it was public spirit or private advantage which led them thereunto, a stranger cannot determine—they make propositions unto the king to issue out commissions of sewers to drain those lands, and offer a proportion freely to be given to the crown for its countenance and authority therein; and as all these great and public works must necessarily concern multitudes of persons, who will never think they have exact justice done to them for that small pretence of right they have unto some commons, so the commissioners, let them do what they can, could never satisfy such a body of men. And now the king is declared the principal undertaker for the draining; and by this time the vulgar are grown clamorous against these first popular lords and undertakers, who had joined with the king in the second undertaking, though they had much better provisions for them than their interest was ever before; and the commissioners must by multitudes and clamours be withstood; and, as a head of this faction, Mr. Cromwell, in the year 1639, at Huntingdon, appears, which made his activity so well known to his friend and kinsman, Mr. Hampden, that he gave a character of Cromwell of being an active person, and one that would sit well at the mark." See, also, Camden's Britannia, by Gibson, i., 489, 490; also Dugdale, p. 460.

For his influence in all the districts around Huntingdon and Ely was now indeed supreme. The "Lord of the Fens" was the name the common people worshipped him by.† Some of the Parliamentary chiefs congratulated Hampden on the great position of popularity his kinsman had achieved, and suggested various places he might offer himself for in the ensuing Parliament, if, as was then generally supposed, his uncle's influence was too strong for his success in Huntingdon. He is indeed, returned the sagacious Hampden, an active man, a man "to sit well to the mark;" for the other matter, he and his kinsman had already taken council.

The writs appeared, returnable in November, 1640, and Cromwell offered himself at once for Cambridge. He was encountered by a formidable opposition, headed by John Cleaveland, the well-known poet, who was at that time a tutor of St. John's, and a man of considerable influence, all of which he levelled in every possible way against Cromwell. The contest was obstinately fierce, and ended in Cromwell's return at last, by the majority of a single vote. That vote, exclaimed Cleaveland—or at least his friends affirm he exclaimed this—"that vote, that single vote, hath ruined both Church and kingdom."

Cromwell remembered the disservice in after years, and paid it back with interest by means of his major-generals of the Protectorate. Cleaveland was arrested by those worthies under Haynes, and sent to prison in Yarmouth. I cannot resist inserting here the reasons which were given by them for this step, from the state documents of the time. The first was, that he lived in utter obscurity in the house of a Royalist, very few persons in the neighbourhood knowing that there was such a man resident among them! the second was, that he possessed great abilities, and was able to do considerable disservice; and a third reason for his imprisonment was, that he wore good clothes, though, as he confessed, he had no estate but £20 per annum, allowed him by two gentlemen, and £30 by the person in whose house he resided, and whom he assisted in his studies! He would, it is said, have been released, had he possessed any property upon which the commissioners could have fixed an assessment.

* He passed another act for the same purpose on the 26th of May, 1654, during his own Protectorate.

† Mercurius Aulicus, November 5, 1643.

Yet Cleaveland had possibly the advantage after all, for his good spirits never forsook him, and there was light enough in his prison to enable him to write out that definition of a protector, which not uncharacteristically illustrates, as we shall find, some passages in Cromwell's history.

"What's a Protector? He's a stately thing,
That apes it in the monage of a king.
He's a brass farthing, stamped with a crown,
A tragic actor, Cæsar in a clown!
A bladder blown—with others' breath puff'd full—
Not the Perillus, but Perillus' Bull!
Æop's proud Ass vaill'd in the Lion's skin,
An outward Saint lined with a Devil within.
An echo whence the royal sound doth come,
But just as a barrel head sounds like a drum.
Fantastic image of the royal head,
The Brewer's with the King's arms quartered.
He is a counterfeited piece, that shows
Charles his effigies with a copper nose.
In fine, he's one we must Protector call,
From whom the King of kings protect us all."

In November, 1640—that month never to be named but with honour by the well-informed student of English history—this "Cæsar in a clown" once more entered the House of Commons. The world-amazing scenes that followed up to the time when Charles, on an inauspicious day of wind and storm, erected his standard at Nottingham, and proclaimed the chief representatives of the English people to be a parcel of rebels and robbers, have been already placed before the reader in the lives of Pym, of Hampden, and of Strafford. Such incidental points only remain to be noticed here as may serve in any way to illustrate the character of Oliver Cromwell, before it blazed forth all over the land in the splendour of military achievement.

The morning of the 11th of November, 1640, saw anxious crowds assembled in the neighbourhood of Westminster. A great business was afoot. Crowds of members poured into the House from all quarters. Some, as Hyde remarked, were observed to have sad and melancholy faces; and others, as if flushed by a stern and "unnatural" joy, to be "marvellous elated" in step and aspect. Such was, indeed, the natural difference between the men who saw a crisis impending that would overtax their strength, and the greater men, who, in the sure terrors of the future, that were to be born of the miseries of the past, only recognised and welcomed the stormy yet not impassable sea which rolled between slavery and freedom. Other thoughts, deeper in his heart of hearts, lurking there even unknown to himself, may have agitated Cromwell. His friends said, in after years, that even now he would startle them by sudden and gratuitous graspings of his sword, and by fits of the same abrupt and immoderate laughter which were noted on the eve of Worcester and Dunbar.

The members are now all within the House, and upon the crowd outside an anxious silence has fallen, such as anticipates great events. Hour passes after hour, yet the door of the Commons is still locked, and within may be heard, by such as stand in the adjoining lobby, not the confused and wrangling noise of a various debate, but the single continuous sound of one ominous voice, interrupted at intervals, not by a broken cheer, but by a tremendous shout of universal sympathy. Suddenly a stir is seen outside, the crowd grows light with uncovered heads, and the carriage of the great lord-lieutenant of Ireland dashes up to the House of Lords.

Ten minutes more have passed—the door of the Commons' House is abruptly thrown wide open—and forth issues Pym, followed by upward of three hundred representatives of the English people, in that day the first men of the world in birth, in wealth, in talents. Their great leader crosses to the House of Lords, and the bar is in an instant filled with that immortal crowd.

What, meanwhile, was the suspense lately endured by the meaner masses outside, to the agitation which now heaved them to and fro, like the sullen waves of an advancing storm. But the interval is happily shorter. It is closed by the appearance of Maxwell, the usher of the House of Lords, at whose side staggers Strafford himself—a prisoner! The storm which had threatened fell into a frightful stillness. They make "through a world of staring people," as old Baillie the Covenanter wrote to his friends in Scotland, towards the carriage of the Earl, "all gazing, no man capping to him, before whom that morning the greatest of England would have stood discovered." Statesmanship had achieved its master-stroke. The power of the greatest and proudest minister that ever ruled a nation—of the only minister of genius that Charles I. possessed—lay grovelling in the dust beneath the feet of the meanest person in that assembled populace.

An act worthy of the lofty praise of Milton. "Thus," says that great writer, having noticed the high birth of this famous assembly, their singular attainments, and their astonishing public virtue in having for the most part passed the ordeal, not only of courtly vengeance, but of courtly temptation—"thus, in the midst of all disadvantages and disrespects, having given proof of themselves to be better made and framed by nature to the love and practice of virtue than others, under the holiest precepts and best examples, have been headstrong and prone to vice; and having, in all the trials of a firm, ingrafted honesty, not oftener buckled in the conflict than given every opposition the foil; this, moreover, was added, by favour from heaven, as an ornament and happiness to their virtue, that it should be neither obscure in the opinion of men, nor eclipsed for want of matter equal to illustrate itself; God and man consenting, in joint approbation, to choose them out, as worthiest above others, to be both the great reformers of the Church and the restorers of the Commonwealth. Nor did they deceive that expectation, which, with the eyes and desires of their country, was fixed upon them; for no sooner did the force of so much united excel, lence meet in one globe of brightness and efficacy, but, encountering the dazzled resistance of tyranny, they gave not over, though their enemies were strong and subtle, till they had laid her grovelling upon the fatal block: with one stroke winning again our lost liberties and charters, which our forefathers, after so many battles, could scarce maintain."

In that true master-stroke Oliver Cromwell bore his part with the foremost men of the time. He did not often speak in the House, but he was full of action. In at least twenty out of the forty committees that were appointed within the first week to consider of various grievances, we find his name. And he could speak, too, as we have already seen, and when he spoke, it was something much to the purpose.

"The first time I ever took notice of him," writes the grave and trustworthy Royalist, Sir Philip Warwick, "was in the beginning of the Parliament held in November, 1640, when I vainly thought myself a courtly young gentleman, for we courtiers valued ourselves much upon our good clothes. I came into the House one morning, well clad, and perceived a gentleman speaking, whom I knew not, very ordinarily apparelled; for it was a plain cloth suit, which seemed to have been made by an ill country tailor: his linen was plain, and not very clean; and I remember a speck or two of blood upon his little band, which was not much larger than his collar: his hat was without a hatband. His stature was of a good size; his sword stuck close to his side; his countenance swoln and reddish; his voice sharp and untunable; and his eloquence full of fervour—for the subject-matter would not bear much of reason, it being in behalf of a servant of Mr. Prynne's, who had dispersed libels against the queen for her dancing, and such like innocent and courtly sports; and he aggravated the imprisonment of this man by the council-table unto that height, that one would have believed the very government itself had been in great danger by it. I sincerely profess it lessened much my reverence unto that great council, for he was very much harkened unto. And yet I lived to see this very gentleman, whom, out of no ill-will to him, I thus describe, by multiplied good successes, and by real, but usurped power (having had a better tailor, and more converse among good company), in my own eye, when for six weeks together I was a prisoner in his sergeant's hands, and daily waited at Whitehall, appear of a great and majestic deportment, and comely presence. Of him, therefore, I will say no more, but that verily I believe he was extraordinarily designed for those extraordinary things which one while most wickedly and facinorously he acted, and at another so successfully and greatly performed."*

* Warwick's Memoirs. Lord Clarendon, in his life, has described similar earnestness, rudeness, and passionate fervour on the part of Cromwell, in a private committee of the House. The account, however, is not so credible as Warwick's—there are many errors in it which the reader will at once perceive—and it is deeply tinged with that vanity and gross egotism which characterized Clarendon not less than his wonderful talents: "Mr. Hyde," the passage runs, "was often heard to mention one private committee, in which he was put accidentally into the chair, upon an enclosure which had been made of great wastes, belonging to the queen's manors, without the consent of the tenants, the benefit whereof had been given by the queen to a servant of near trust, who forthwith sold the lands enclosed to the Earl of Manchester, lord-privy-seal; who, together with his son Mandevil, were now most concerned to maintain the enclosure; against which, as well as the inhabitants of other manors, who claimed common in those wastes, as the queen's tenants of the same, made loud complaints, as a great oppression, carried upon them with a

It was not the tailor, good Sir Philip, who had wrought any portion of this change. A great man had achieved greatness, and had fallen into its state with the ease of one who merely assumes his natural place in the human family. The genius which could achieve Cromwell's aims included in itself all the faculties, tempers, and tastes which they might require to establish or assert them.* At present, indeed, all these were in tumult and confusion. His mind was as yet the chaos only, from which order and majesty were to spring. But there, even then visible to penetrating minds, their great elements lay heaped, massed, crowded together.

As Hampden left the House on the day Sir Philip Warwick witnessed what he has described so well, Lord Digby, who had himself in that Parliament just entered public life, was seen to hurry after him, "Pray, Mr. Hampden," he asked, overtaking the patriot as he descended the stairs, "pray, Mr. Hampden, who is that man—that sloven who spoke just now? for I see he is on our side, by his speaking so warmly." Hampden answered, in ever-memorable language, "That sloven whom you see before you hath no ornament in his speech; that sloven, I say, if we should ever come to a breach with the king, which God forbid!—in such a case, I say, that sloven will be the greatest man in England."

Yet the "breach with the king" was approaching fast! Strafford had expiated on the scaffold his mighty guilt, and the wretched master who had deserted him was now on all sides himself deserted.

Ominous questions then passed between men, and strangers asked of each other what was very high hand, and supported by power. The committee sat in the queen's court; and Oliver Cromwell being one of them, appeared much concerned to countenance the petitioners, who were numerous, together with their witnesses; the Lord Mandevil being likewise present as a party, and by the direction of the committee, sitting covered. Cromwell (who had never before been heard to speak in the House of Commons) ordered the witnesses and petitioners in the method of the proceeding, and seconded and enlarged upon what they said with great passion; and the witnesses and persons concerned, who were a very rude kind of people, interrupted the council and witnesses on the other side with great clamour when they said anything that did not please them, so that Mr. Hyde (whose office it was to oblige men of all sorts to keep order) was compelled to use some sharp reproofs and some threats to reduce them to such a temper that the business might be quietly heard. Cromwell, in great fury, reproached the chairman for being partial, and that he discountenanced the witnesses by threatening them; the other appealed to the committee, who justified him, and declared that he behaved as he ought to do; which more inflamed him who was already too much angry. When, upon any mention of matter of fact, or the proceeding before and at the enclosure, the Lord Mandevil desired to be heard, and with great modesty related what had been done, or explained what had been said, Mr. Cromwell did answer and reply upon him with so much indecency and rudeness, and in language so contrary and offensive, that every man would have thought, that as their natures and their manners were as opposite as it is possible, so their interest could never have been the same. In the end, his whole carriage was so tempestuous, and his behaviour so insolent, that the chairman found himself obliged to reprehend him, and to tell him if he proceeded in the same manner he would presently adjourn the committee, and the next morning complain to the House of him, which he never forgave, and took all occasions afterward to pursue him with the utmost malice and revenge to his death."

* Even Clarendon himself spoke thus of him in after years: "As he grew into place and authority, his parts seemed to be raised, as if he had concealed his faculties till he had occasion to use them; and when he was to act the part of a great man, he did it without any indecency, notwithstanding the want of custom."

likely next to happen. Sir Philip Warwick, walking with Sir Thomas Chicheley into the House, met Cromwell unexpectedly, and, unable to resist an impulse which prompted him at the moment, went up to him and desired honestly to know what the real objects of his party were. "I can tell you, sirs," answered Cromwell, abruptly, as he passed on, "I can tell you what I would not have, if I cannot what I would." The words, no doubt, in truth expressed at that particular time the condition of the speaker's mind, but this perhaps, I would add, less from the real uncertainty that then prevailed there than from the control exerted over it by men of wisdom as great as his own, and of experience more enlarged in Parliaments, whose plans were of a different cast, and had already taken shape and substance.

Pym and Hampden, I firmly believe, had in their design from the first to rest contented with a strong and decided limitation of the monarchical government: not with such a settlement as that of 1688, but with one wherein the popular substance should have had place no less than the popular form, and in securing which they would have taken care to recognise, by something better than a quibble, those rights and privileges of the people that were the source of all to be attempted and the object of all to be achieved, at once the means and the end of every constitutional settlement. In the life of Pym I have accordingly offered some reason for supposing that when Charles had entered the field of civil war, and his hopeless insincerity left any ultimate arrangement with himself almost as hopeless, these great leaders cast their thoughts towards Charles Louis, the young prince-elect of the Palatinate—a wanderer from his kingdom by the tyrannical encroachment of Austria—the elder brother of Prince Rupert, and the next heir to the English crown in case the family of Charles I. were set aside. I afterward found that the conclusion I then arrived at had been anticipated by one of Bishop Warburton's most acute notes on Clarendon.

Since the publication of that memoir, however, Lord Nugent has intrusted me with the loan of some valuable family papers, hitherto unpublished, with a courteous permission to make all necessary use of them. Among them are several letters from this young prince to his mother—the sister of Charles I., the beautiful and unhappy Queen of Bohemia, "the eclipse and glory of her kind."* Some extracts may be valuable here, and will not be thought uninteresting, since they illustrate, in some striking points, the character and events of the time.

The prince not only lived with his uncle at this time, but, according to Clarendon, enjoyed a pension from him of "twelve thousand pounds sterling yearly." This pension may have been nominally due, but it seems certain, from some of the letters which I shall quote, that it was not regularly paid. That Charles treated his nephew with extreme kindness is, however, indisputable; what Henrietta's conduct towards him may have been admits, perhaps, of some doubt. From Whitehall "this $\frac{13}{20}$ of May, 1641," he thus writes in the course of one of his letters to the Queen of Bohemia:

"I did not writte to y^r Ma^y by the last post, not knowing whether the same might not be stopped as the former was, whereof I doubt but by this y^r Ma^y doth know the occasion, w^{ch} wth my L^d of Strafford's death hath putt the queene in an ill humour.* In this the king hath shewed himselfe a good master & a good Christian, & att last a good king, for the day afore he should give the howses of parliament an answer concerning the Bill of Attaindor against the Earll of Strafford, the bishops, after a whole daye's debate, had much to doe to perswade him that he might give way unto it w^h a safe conscience, because the judges did declare, upon the voting of the two houses of the fact, that it was treason, though the king could not be satisfied of it in his conscience, & that w^hall the people stood upon it w^h such violence, that he would have putt himselfe & his in a great danger by denying execution. Therefore, att last, the king protested att the councill table, that if his persone were onely in danger, he would gladly venture it to save L^d Strafford's life; butt seeinge his wife, children, & all his kindome were concerned in it, he was forced to give way unto it; w^{ch} he did not expresse without teares. This bearer will tell y^r Ma^y the circumstance of my L^d of Strafford's execution, for he sayth he was close by. What passed since in parliament, y^r Ma^y will understand from others; that of greatest note is, that w^h the Bill of my L^d of Strafford, the king passed another, that the parliament should not be adjourned nor broken w^hout the consent of the two howses. Concerning the king's manifest, my frends advise me to stay as yet some few dayes w^h it untill the Scotts treaty come to an end, butt they assure me w^hall that it shall not want applause in the howses. The king intends to make a posting journey for Scotland, as he doth declare openly, butt whether it will hold, God knoweth, since resolutions are apt to be changed att this court."

The prince's definition of a good master, a good Christian, and a good king, is scarcely satisfactory. The letter offers some proof, however, of an implied intercourse held even thus early with the popular leaders. The next letter I shall quote (dated "this 28th of July, 1641") still farther confirms this, and presents some characteristic points besides. Its opening sketch of the widowed Lady Strafford is extremely touching.

"I have done y^r Ma^y's comaunds to my Lady Strafford, who did expresse a great deal of humble devotion to y^r service, & to be very sensible of the favour you did her; She hath promised me to send Mrs. Kirck's picture inameled to y^r Ma^y. If I gett it soone enough I will send it by this bearer. She also desired me to make hir humble excuse to you, that she doth not write to y^r Ma^y because this great affliction hath made a shaking in her limbs, soe that she is not able to rule a penn. By my former y^r Ma^y hath understood how the queen's journey was broken, & by Cave the change of the L^d Chamberlaine. It was a thing my L^d of Essex did not att all sue for, & would not have accepted it, butt that he saw the king was resolved the other should not keepe it, & that if he had refused that also, after soe many other things w^{ch} were put upon him, the world might have thought that the high hand he carried in parliament was not soe much for to maintaine the liberties of the subjects as out of a spleene to the court. He [L^d Essex] hath done what y^r Ma^y desired in y^m of the 1st of July in the house of peeres, & by Mr. Hamblen in the house of commons, & is alwayes very forward in anything that concernes y^r Ma^y & y^m. There hath offered itselfe an opportunity w^{ch} doth discover how much y^r Ma^y is bound to M^r Treasurer Vane, w^{ch} you may see if you compare the printed order of the howse of commons concerning the manifest, w^{ch} the written coppie w^{ch} was sent you, for in that is left out THE QUEENE OF BOHEMIA by his expresse order to Weckerlin, though it was inserted in this when it was read publicly by the speaker afore the king; Madame, I could not indure this insolent, ungrateful, & base trick of his, butt have complained of it to some of the house of commons & my L^d of Essex, w^{thout} naming Vane, but onely desiring them to question the printer, & then it will be seene from whence it came; it was Vane also that pressed me most about the ceremonies wth the Prince of Orange, & I doubt not butt he did as much wth the king. I shall know to-day or to-morrow what will become of it. Just now my L^d of Essex told me that he moved it in the house of the peeres, & that the printer is to come to-morrow to the barre to answer for it. S^r Henry Vane puts it from himselfe upon the king, when I spoke to the king in it & argued it wth him, as that it did not att all ingage him—that it was only an honour w^{ch} the 2 howses intended to y^r Ma^y: he said nothing else, butt that since it was printed it could not be altered. S^r Tom Berington was going to speake of it in the howse, & S^r Raph Hopton, butt some other businesse that came betweene hinder'd it, & afterwards they were spoken to by Vane & L^d Say not to meddle in it, butt what they have done since I doe not know."

* This seems to dispose altogether of Bishop Burnet's assertion of the queen's indifference to that act.

* Sir Henry Wotton.

There cannot be a doubt, from the tone and style of these extracts; that the writer was playing a double game at this moment between the court and the people's party. It is observable as much in his hatred to old Vane and the queen's set of courtiers, as in his more distinct assertions. Another letter is written from "Newmarket, this 10th of March, 1642," while staying there with the king, after the attempted arrest of the five members (when the prince-elect, it will be recollected, accompanied his uncle to the House) had led to the ill-fated flight from London. This letter paints a miserable picture, and is here printed entire.

"MADAME,—I have done what y^r Ma^y did therein comaund me towards the king, who tooke it very well, & sayd, I doubt not butt my wife & my sister will be very good friends. As for my brother Rupert's employment in the Irish warres, the king is enough inclined to it, butt I beleve the parliament will employ none there butt those that they may be sure of. I shall speake wth some of them about it, either for him or br. Maurice. This last I thinke might wth honour have a regiment under Lesly, butt to be under any other odd or sencelesse officer, as some are proposed, I shall not advise it. . . . The L^{ds} Pembroke, Holland, Dunsnow, Seymor, & 8 of the howse of commons, have presented the king yesterday wth a new declaration from both howses to shew the causes of theyr feares & jealousies, & againe to presse the king to putt the militia into their hands, & to come nearer unto them, for to give the lesse cause of feare, & that it would make a clearer understanding betweene him & his people; & if his Ma^y did refuse this, they would be forced to publish the said declaration, and take the militia into their hands of themselves. This is the effect of it, for the thing itselfe hath not beene suffered to be printed, nor any coppies to be taken as yett; butt now I doubt not butt it will be published, because I heare the king's answear this morning concerning the militia was a plaine denial, and concerning his coming nearer to London, that he would doe it when the parliament would give him cause for it, butt would not farther expaine himselfe upon this last. I doubt not butt the weeke wee shall remouve from hence, butt whither, God knows! Some say to Yorke, others to Norwich (w^{ch} I cannot beleve), others into Scotland; in the mean time I have noe monie, & if I had not pawned my diamond garter (for the plate was pawned already) for a hundred pound, I could not have got monie for to have gone this journey, for the comissioners of the treasury could give me none; butt they & some of the howse of commons have assured me to mouve the house for some present supply for me. Thus businesse goe heere, & I rest y^r Ma^y's most humble and obedient sonn and servant,

"CHARLES L."

Here indeed was a change, sudden as it was miserable, yet pursuing in the order of a natural effect a miserable cause foregone. For the first twelve years of the reign of Charles, the people had never dared to call their property their own; scarcely a new morning ever rose on an English family that was not dreaded as the usher of some new oppression; new faces were never seen in town or village that did not inspire the terror of some new exaction; in support of the ever-craving and ever-impooverished Exchequer. These frightful scenes have already been minutely detailed by the writer of these pages. And what is the unfailing answer urged by the apologists of the court? that its wants were for the state, and that all its personal expenses were singularly moderate and economical. This poor answer has been as often refuted, yet scarcely a new record of the time is opened by the historical inquirer which does not make the refutation even more complete. A most striking instance of this has very recently appeared. Several interesting extracts from the "Pell Records" have been made public by a gentleman in the service of the government, Mr. Devon, in the shape of "issues of the Exchequer" in various reigns. Nothing could more vividly illustrate the spirit of the several courts—the superstition of one, the public spirit and usefulness of another, the brilliant and lavish gayety of a third. The publication was unfortunately discontinued on the eve of our admission to the Exchequer of Charles I. and II., but a sufficient quantity of the materials collected in these reigns has nevertheless been given to the public in another form: and what do we discover in those of Charles I.? Profusion of the most reckless sort squandered on mere personal vanities. While the people were starving—while the terrors of the Spanish Inquisition were more than realized by the GENERAL FORCED LOAN inquisitors, let the reader observe the entries, during a short eighteen months of the time, made for the purchase of jewelry alone, and wonder, if he can, at the retribution which followed.

"On the 25th of March, 1626, there is an order to pay Sir John Eyre £2000, 'the price of a diamond of the weight of twelve carates,' given by his late majesty to the French ambassador. On the 17th of April, to John Aston, his majesty's goldsmith, £110, in part of £3053, 6s. 4d. [on the 26th of July, 1628, this debt had increased, or another been incurred, to the amount of £6866 16s. 0½d.], for gold and silver plate bought for his majesty's use, and for chains of gold, medals, and other things given to ambassadors. On the 19th of May, £200 to the Duke of Buckingham 'for a chain of gold provided by his majesty's direction, and sent by his majesty as a present to a Dutch captain.' On the 25th of May, to 'the Lady Theodocia Dudley, wife to Edward lord Dudley, £500, in part of £1700, due unto her for a rich diamond, sold and delivered for his majesty's use.' On the 3d of June, to Dame Elizabeth Moreton, widow of Sir Albert Moreton, 'the sum of £800, in part of £2000, in full satisfaction of and for a fair diamond ring, bought by his majesty of her, and bestowed upon the ambassador lately employed from the King of Sweden; as also the sum of £400, in full satisfaction of and for a fair jewel, set with many diamonds, bought of her, and bestowed upon the ambassador lately employed from the Elector of Brandenburg.' On the 20th of September, 'to Sir Maurice Abbott, £2000, in part of £4000, in full payment and satisfaction of the sum of £8000, due to him for a diamond cut in fassets, and set in a collet,' for his majesty's use; the remaining £4000 'to be paid out of the money of the second payment of the portion of his majesty's dearest consort.' On the 29th of December, to Henry Garway, Esq., £2000, for 'one large, thick table diamond, set in a collet of gold, which he sold and delivered to his majesty.' On the 16th of January, to the Earl of Pembroke, late lord-chamberlain, £6400, in full of £8400, 'for sundry jewels, disposed of by him for his majesty's service, according to such directions as he hath received from his majesty.' On the 12th of June, 1627, to Robert Hooke, goldsmith, £900, 'for a garter and two Georges, which his majesty hath sent to the Prince of Orange.' On the 28th of August, to Charles Herbert £1000, 'for a fair George, set full of diamonds, lately sold unto his majesty.' On the third of September, to Sir Maurice Abbott, £4000, in further payment of the £8000 due for the diamond cut in fassets, and set in a collet, before mentioned; and on the 4th of September £2000 in full payment. On the 6th of October, to Philip Jacobson, £300, 'for a diamond hatband, bought of him by his majesty;' and a further sum of £100, in full of £2100, for a jewel, bought of him by his majesty, the same being a picture case of gold, set with seven great and fourteen small diamonds, cut in fassets; and on the same day, to Edward Sewster, goldsmith, £1500, being 'the price of a ring, with a fair table diamond,' 'which his majesty did bestow upon his majesty's dear consort Queen Mary's bishop;' and to Philip Jacobson, jeweller, £3480, 'due unto him for jewels, by him delivered for his late majesty's service, and for a George set with diamonds, and for a diamond set in a ring of gold, likewise delivered for his said late majesty's service, and for one great jewel bought of him by his majesty.' And on the 27th of October, to the Earl of Pembroke, £400, in part of £2000, residue of the sum of £10,000, in full satisfaction of a ring, bought by his majesty of the Earl of Holland, and of other jewels, bought of Philip Jacobson, jeweller, and a jewel, bought of William Rogers, goldsmith, amounting in the whole to the sum of £10,400.' The following entry, though of a later date, has reference to jewels bought during this period: 'By order, 1st of July, 1628, to Henry Ellowes, £1300, for a bracelet which his majesty bought of him, and bestowed upon his dearest consort the queen, for a new-year's gift, at Xmas, 1626.'"

The imagination of the poet was not a fiction!

"Ay, there they are,
Nobles and sons of nobles, patentees,
Monopolists, and stewards of this poor farm,
On whose lean sheep sit the prophetic crows,
Here is the pomp that strips the houseless orphan,
Here is the pride that breaks the desolate heart.
These are the lilies glorious as Solomon,
Who toil not, neither do they spin—unless
It be the webs they catch poor rogues withal.
Here is the surfeit which to them who earn
The niggard wages of the earth, scarce leaves
The tithe that will support them till they crawl
Back to its cold, hard bosom. Here is health
Follow'd by grim disease, glory by shame,
Waste by lean famine, wealth by squalid want,
And England's sin by England's punishment.

The punishment followed hard indeed. Our next extract from these letters exhibits the writer's royal uncle not only a beggar, but a prisoner. I print the letters out of their order in time, because it is of importance, in regard to the connexion I believe to have been once meditated by the popular leaders with this young prince, to complete the view which is presented of him in these valuable and very interesting documents.

But first let the reader observe this passage from Clarendon. It refers to the latter part of the year 1643. "The arrival of the prince-electoral at London," says the noble historian, "was now no less the discourse of all tongues than the death of Mr. Pym. He had been in England before the troubles, and received and cherished by the king with great demonstration of grace and kindness, and supplied with a pension of twelve thousand pounds sterling yearly. When the king left London, he attended his majesty to York, and resided there with him till the differences grew so high that his majesty found it necessary to resolve to raise an army for his defence. Then, on a sudden, without giving the king many days' notice of his resolution, that prince-electoral left the court; and taking the opportunity of an ordinary vessel, embarked himself for Holland, to the wonder of all men, who thought it an unseasonable declaration of his fear at least of the Parliament, and his desire of being well esteemed by them, when it was evident they esteem'd not the king as they should. And this was the more spoken of, when it was afterward known that the Parliament expressed a good sense of his having deserted the king, and imputed it to his conscience, 'that he knew of some such designs of his majesty as he could not comply with.' At this time, after many loud discourses of his coming (which were derived to Oxford, as somewhat that might have an influence upon his majesty's counsels, there being then several whispers of some high proceedings they intended against the king), he arrived at London, and was received with ceremony; lodged in Whitehall, and order taken for the payment of that pension which had been formerly assigned to him by his majesty; and a particular direction given by both Houses 'that he should be admitted to sit in the Assembly of Divines,' where, after he had taken the covenants, he was contented to be often present: of all which the king took no other notice than sometimes to express that he was sorry, on his nephew's behalf, that he thought fit to declare such a compliance."

* The Athenæum, No. 573.

Whatever the prince's hopes were, however, all events now took an inauspicious turn respecting them. Pym and Hampden—the leaders of what might be called the Constitutional party of the Parliament, and the controllers of the Parliament itself so long as they lived—were now no more, Lord Essex was powerless, and their successors in influence were declared Republicans. Not that the hopes of the young prince ever perished altogether till the section of Presbyterians who still continued to encourage them had also undergone most merited political death: they were still, it will be seen, retained; and from the style and character of the extracts which I now give in support of this, another and a not ungrateful fact appears—that the English people lost little by losing any closer connexion with this prince-elect. His feelings seem to have been really mean and sordid as his wants. He here details an interview, interesting, yet very painful in its character, with his now imprisoned and deserted uncle. The letter is dated from Whitehall, the 12th of November, 1647:

"MADAME,—I waited all the last weeke on the king my uncle att Hampton Court, whither I intend to return on Munday next, since there is very few w^h him, & there is a rumour of his remouvall, though I cannot give much credit to it, untill the army receive some satisfaction for their pay, w^hout w^h they will hardly goe farre from the citty or parl^t. His Ma^y upon occasion doth still blame the way I have bin in all this while, & I doe defend it as the only shelter I have, when my publike businesse & my person have received soe many neglects (I will not say worse) att court, & by those that had relation to him, & noe lesse by himselfe since the queene hath had any hand in businesse; butt I entred upon noe particulars, butt wished that, whatsoever opinion he had of me, he might in a happy agreement w^h his parl^t be reestablished, wherein I could not butt also comprehend the safety of my friends, & leave what concernes myselfe to the venture. Madame, I would not have renewed that sore of his ill usage of me since the queene hath had power w^h him, butt that he urged me to it, in saying I should rather have lived upon bread and water than have complyd w^h the parl^t, w^h he s^d I did to have only one chicken more in my dish (w^h was his phrase, & I doe guesse who made use of it in another occasion afore this warre begunne), and that he would have thought it a designe more worthy his neveu if I had gonne about to have taken his crowne from his head; w^h, & such like expressions, would have mooved a saint; neither doe I know of any butt our Saviour that would have ruined himselfe for those that hate one. The king used me else civilly & w^h enough kindnesse (att least in appearance), neither seemed he displeased att the freedome I used in replying to him, w^h I did w^h all the respect I could conceive, if it were otherways I should hope to heare of it by y^r Ma^y. As I am writing of this, I am told that divers coming from Hampton Court this morning say that the king is gone from thence this night, & that six horses were heard in the night galloping over Kingstone Bridge, w^h is supposed to have bene his Ma^y, & that it was not against his will, since there was noe bussell att all heard in the night, & it is likely his Ma^y went away afore the guards were sett, w^h used to be about 9 of the clock att night, yesterday having been his writing day, in w^h he little came abroad, & soone retired after supper. Afore I close this I shall acquaint y^r Ma^y w^h what I doe farther heare concerning his Ma^y. . . I heare since that S^t John Cooke, one of the com^{rs} w^h the king hath made relation to the howse of peeres of his Ma^ys departure yesternight about seven of the clock through the garden alone, having left two letters upon the table in his bed-chamber, one to the comissioners, & another to Coll. Whaley that guarded him, giving them thanks for their civilities towards him, desiring the com^{rs} to present such papers as he had left there to the parl^t (the contents whereof I do not yett know), & desires Coll. Whaley to give his saddle horses to the D. of Yorke. This is all what for the present I can acquaint y^r Ma^y concerning this businesse, not doubting butt you will heare more particulars from others, since I have not bene abroad to day, in w^h & for ever I rest y^r Ma^ys most humble & obedient sonn & servant,

"CHARLES."

In a subsequent letter to his mother,* dated from the same place six months later, he refers in the same tone of indifferent concern to the "cloud the king lies under;" observes that it is "more unusuall for kings & queenes ever to confesse themselves to be in the wrong, than for such smaler potentates as myselfe;" protests that he is "not to answer for all the proceedings of a dis-tempered state;" and adds: "as for my credit w^h the parliament, I beleve y^r Ma^y nor any bodie else ever heard me brag of it, though I thinke myself as well used by them as their present condition & the state of affaires doth permit; neither doe I know (considering w^hall how much those that are nearest to me are against them) all this time where I should be better, for I would rather be beholding to those who never have disoblged me (to whom I have some relation) for my maintenance, than to France, or any others that have wronged me."

* His royal cousins are in other letters a frequent subject of remark between the prince and his mother. In one, dated from Somerseth House, the 20th of Oct., 1648, is the following: "I beleve your Ma^y would not be of my L^d Stafford's opinion if you saw the Duke of Gloster, for my brother Edward had ever a round face from his youth, & the Duke of Gloucester hath a long one allready: & his eyes, though browne yet, in my opinion are of another shape than my s^d brothers, butt indeed he hath his fatt cheekes, as most children of that age have."

Finally, in a letter written within a month of his uncle's execution, and when that terrible course of policy was well known to have been decided on, this prince writes to his mother, the sister of Charles I., in this cold, unfeeling strain: "You did not fail in your judgement of the treaty wth the king, though I beleieve y^r Ma^y nor noebody else could have imagined the issue thereof altogether soe ill, as there is sufficient cause to feare it will prove. Many that were well wishers to it did ever apprehend that the king's too long husbanding his concessions, and losse of opportunity, would produce those effects that are followed, & God knowes where they will end, for w^{ch} those that have had or have still the manadging of those great affaires are to answer; others that are butt remotely concerned in the effects thereof, cannot be blamed if they doe not intermeddle; neither is it in their power to mend any thing; For it hath been seen in all governments that strength will still prevaile, be it right or wrong."

And so our candidate-king waited quietly by till the execution of his uncle, and then he found that other objects were entertained by its promoters, which could fairly dispense at last with his presence altogether. Certainly Cromwell had better claims than Charles Louis!

That extraordinary man—to resume the history of his fortunes—has spoken little in the House of late, but since the death of Strafford he has even increased in fervid activity. The remonstrance is now on foot in the House of Commons, and he is one of its most ardent promoters; for with every act of policy that had in view the separation of the moderate from the decided party, his excitement and zeal increased. And, even thus early in his public career, we can observe that affectation of indifference to objects on which he had set his soul, which he converted in after life into one great means of achieving them.

Thus Clarendon, speaking of the remonstrance, tells us, "They [the leading men in the House of Commons] promised themselves they should easily carry it: so that the day it was to be resumed, they entertained the House all the morning with other debates, and towards noon called for the remonstrance; and it being urged by some that it was too late to enter upon it, with much difficulty they consented that it should be entered upon next morning at nine of the clock; and every clause should be debated; for they would not have the House resolved into a committee, which they believed would spend too much time. Oliver Cromwell asked the Lord Falkland why he would not have it put off, for that day would quickly have determined it. He answered, there would not have been time enough, for sure it would take some debate. The other replied, A very sorry one: they supposing, by the computation they had made, that very few would oppose it. But he quickly found he was mistaken."

It is not possible to suppose that Cromwell could have believed this, even if he said it, since none knew better than Pym, Hampden, and himself, that one of the great objects of the remonstrance was to act as a touchstone of parties both in the House of Commons and throughout the nation. Clarendon's addition to the story, also, is utterly incredible, unless it is to be taken as another evidence of Cromwell's wily deceit, which it is difficult to take in that light, seeing so little motive for it. For the debate having been renewed the following day, and having ended in the stormy scene so vividly described by Sir Philip Warwick—" (at three of the clock in the morning, when [by a majority of eleven] they voted it, I thought we had all sat in the valley of the shadow of death; for we, like Joab's and Abner's young men, had caught at each other's locks, and sheathed our swords in each other's bowels, had not the sagacity and great calmness of Mr. Hampden, by a short speech, prevented it, and led us to defer our angry debate until the next morning)"—the noble historian tells us, "that as the members at that late hour were hurrying out of the House, the Lord Falkland asked Oliver Cromwell whether there had been a debate. To which he answered, he would take his word another time; and whispered him in the ear, with some asseveration, that if the remonstrance had been rejected, he would have sold all he had the next morning, and never have seen England more; and he knew there were many other honest men of the same resolution. So near," adds Clarendon, "was the poor kingdom at that time to its deliverance." The story, if taken as a piece of sincerity on the part of Cromwell, is not to be believed for an instant. That, as I have before remarked, was not his temper. It was not his temper to despair of any achievement on which he had fixed his determination and his hopes, so long as life, and his good strong arm, remained to him.

Civil war became inevitable, and it is characteristic of Cromwell that he was the first man absolutely in the field. Acting under no regular commission, he performed some pieces of daring and important service in his native districts. When the later declaration by the king* respecting the question of the militia had left no doubt of the speedy unfurling of the royal standard, he suddenly left London for the old vicinity of Huntingdon, whither a supply of arms, sent at his own private charge, had preceded him; and where a large body of dauntless men awaited him, inspired to the coming conflict by no mercenary or mean motives, but by the great old lessons they had learned under the farmer of Ely and St. Ives. His striking determination, too, at this period, to venture every thing on the result of the contest, is farther shown by his having recklessly devoted large sums out of his dwindled private patrimony to the promotion of public designs. He had given £500 to the fund raised by Parliament for assistance to crush the Irish rebellion; he had purchased the weapons I have elsewhere named;* and when, some few months

* Given in the Life of Pym.

† The following are extracts from the journals of the House: "Whereas Mr. Cromwell hath sent down arms into the county of Cambridge for the defence of that county; it is this day ordered that Sir Dudley North shall forthwith pay to Mr. Cromwell £100, which he hath received from Mr. Crane, late high-sheriff of the county of Cambridge; which said £100 the said Mr. Crane had remaining in his hands for coat and conduct money." "Ordered, that Mr. Cromwell do move the lord-lieutenant for the county of Cambridge to grant his deputation to some of the later, a difficulty arose respecting some hired wagons provided to put Lord Manchester's army in motion against the king, he at once got rid of the difficulty by paying out of his own purse £100 for the hire.

Having arrived and picked out his men—a solid foundation for his famous regiment of Ironsides—he appears at once to have bent his chief exertions to the organization of some system among the chief popular men of the district, whereby they might have the inhabitants immediately trained to military service, the eastern counties associated for mutual defence, and the movements of the Royalists watched with unsparing vigilance. In the Commons' Journals of a very little later date, an order is observed, that "Mr. Cromwell do move the lord-lieutenant for the county of Cambridge to grant his deputation to some of the inhabitants of the town of Cambridge to train and exercise the inhabitants of that town."

And a more obvious piece of daring service—more important it could not be—while the royal standard still remained unfurled, commemorated Cromwell's resolved zeal. Taking along with him his brother-in-law Valentine Wauton (member for the county of Huntingdon), he succeeded in stopping the plate of the University of Cambridge, a spoil of inestimable value, which was then on the point of being sent to the king, to be melted down for the purposes of the war.* We find from the Journals, that on the 15th of August, 1642, Sir Philip Stapleton gave an account in the lower House, from the committee for the defence of the kingdom, that "Mr. Cromwell, in Cambridgeshire, had seized the magazine in the castle of Cambridge, and had hindered the carrying of the plate from that university." And on the 18th of August, we find from the same authorities, a committee was appointed to prepare an order for the "indemnity of Mr. Cromwell and Mr. Walton, and those that have or shall assist them in the stopping of the plate that was going from Cambridge to York."†

Nor, in these first decisive movements, did Cromwell forget his uncle Sir Oliver's powers of mischief and aptitude to use them. He marched over to Ramsey, found his uncle at home, and having treated him personally with inhabitants of the town of Cambridge to train and exercise the inhabitants of that town.—1642."

* Various accounts have been given of this transaction, which, though disputed in various ways, is correctly stated in the text; but perhaps the most comical version is that which follows, from a tract entitled "Querela Cantabrigiensis," in which certainly, while the writer describes the seizure of the plate, he concedes a seizure of a different sort, as prompt and more amusing. "Master Cromwell, Burgess for the town of Cambridge, and then newly turned a man of war, was sent down, as himself confessed, by his masters above, at the invitation of his masters below, to gather what strength he could, and stop all passages, that no plate might be sent; but his designs being frustrated, and his character as an active, subtle man thereby somewhat shaken, he hath ever since bent himself to work what revenge and mischief he could against us. In pursuit whereof, before that month was expired, down he comes again, in a terrible manner, with what forces he could draw together, and surrounds divers colleges while we were at our devotion in our several chapels, taking away prisoners several doctors of divinity, heads of colleges, and these he carries with him to London in triumph."

† See, also, May's History of the Long Parliament, 3d book, p. 79. The booty must have been very large indeed, since we find that the particular pieces sent from St. John's College alone amounted to 2065½ ounces. See Barwick's Life, p. 24.

every demonstration of studied kindness and respect, resolutely took from him all his means of at that instant assisting the king. The scene must have been strange on both sides, but it illustrates in Cromwell, with singular force, one of the most remarkable qualities of his character. The reader will require nothing more to assist his imagination in the matter, after he has read the delightfully characteristic version of the anecdote given by Sir Philip Warwick. "While I was about Huntingdon," he says, "visiting old Sir Oliver Cromwell, his uncle and godfather, at his house at Ramsey, he told me this story of his successful nephew and godson: that he visited him with a good strong party of horse, and that he had asked him his blessing, and that the few hours he was there he would not keep on his hat in his presence; but, at the same time, he not only disarmed, but plundered him, for he took away all his plate."

At last the king took the field, and the regular levies commenced on both sides, as they have been described in the memoirs of Pym and Hampden. It only remains here to notice, in particular detail, the practical result of all those great thoughts which I have heretofore shown in the course of partial realization at the various stages of Cromwell's history—in the final organization of that immortal troop of horse, which became the after wonder and admiration of the world. Had his history closed with the raising and disciplining of these men, it would have left a sufficient warrant of his greatness to posterity.

Having accepted the commission under Essex of a colonel of a cavalry regiment, he proceeded to enrol a body of a thousand men. And on this point let us first quote the celebrated Baxter's words: "I think," says that generally well-intentioned person, "that, having been a prodigal in his youth, and afterward changed to a zealous religiousness, he meant honestly in the main, and was pious and conscientious in the main course of his life, till prosperity and success corrupted him; that at his first entrance into the wars, being but a captain of horse, he had a special care to get religious men into his troop: these men were of greater understanding than common soldiers, and therefore were more apprehensive of the importance and consequence of the wars; and making not money, but that which they took for the public felicity, to be their end, they were the more engaged to be valiant; for he that maketh money his end, doth esteem his life above his pay, and therefore is like enough to save it by flight when danger comes, if possibly he can; but he that maketh the felicity of church and state his end, esteemeth it above his life, and therefore will the sooner lay down his life for it. And men of parts and understanding know how to manage their business, and know that flying is the surest way to death, and that standing to it is the likeliest way to escape; there being many usually that fall in the flight for one that falleth in valiant fight. These things it's probable that Cromwell understood, and that none would be such engaged valiant men as the religious; but yet I conjecture, that at his first choosing such men into his troop, it was the very esteem and love of religious men that principally moved him, and the avoiding of those disorders, mutinies, plunderings, and grievances of the country, which debosht men in armies are commonly guilty of: by this means he indeed sped better than he expected. Aires, Desborough, Berry, Evanson, and the rest of that troop did prove so valiant, that, as far as I could learn, they never once ran away before an enemy. Hereupon he got a commission to take some care of the associated counties, where he brought this troop into a double regiment of fourteen full troops; and all these as full of religious men as he could get: these having more than ordinary wit and resolution, had more than ordinary success." In this passage the writer touches on a question of some interest in alluding to the first motives that are likely to have prompted Cromwell in the selection of such men as these. There cannot be a doubt, I think, as it has been the purpose of these pages hitherto to illustrate, that the religious tendencies were seized by his genius first as a means rather than an end; yet it might have been in his thoughts as strongly that the end to be achieved was that of the best interests of religion no less.

Nor will the reader who has accompanied me thus far suppose that this Republican captain held religion to be the sole necessary accomplishment of a soldier. While he held, indeed, that bravery unaccompanied by lofty motives was a mere brutish faculty, he held as strongly that the noblest and least mercenary motives required yet the most faithful discipline. His regiment is thus described by Whitelocke. "He had a brave regiment of horse of his countrymen, most of them freeholders and freeholders' sons, who upon matter of conscience engaged in this quarrel, and under Cromwell. And thus, being well armed within by the satisfaction of their own consciences, and without by good iron arms; they would as one man charge firmly and fight desperately." A political enemy to Cromwell writes still more strongly of the excellence of his military discipline. "His men," says the writer, "who, in the beginning, were unskilful both in handling their arms and managing their horses, by diligence and industry became excellent soldiers; for Cromwell used them daily to look after, feed, and dress their horses, and, when it was needful, to lie together with them on the ground; and, besides, taught them to clean and keep their arms bright, and have them ready for service; to choose the best armour, and to arm themselves to the best advantage. Trained up in this kind of military exercise, they excelled all their fellow-soldiers in feats of war, and obtained more victories over their enemies."*

But the most striking and characteristic evidence on these minor points of discipline remains to be quoted from a still more inveterate enemy. "Cromwell," says Heath,† "well knowing the nature of the quarrel (which was pretended for religion), resolved and advised that there were no men so likely to oppose the conquering gallantry of those gentlemen on the king's side as such who were or should be engaged upon account of conscience and zeal, which would spirit them with the same magnanimous fortitude, and make them also to endure the difficulties and hardships of the war with a more pertinacious constancy, as having bodies better able, and minds more finely sublimed upon that score, pro aris et focis, than the mixed and most rascally herd of loose and vicious people. But yet, prudently considering that in so long an interval and vacancy of war, from which this nation had been blessed, the most forward Hotspurs on the account of zeal might quale and shrink at the noise of the battle, and their spiritual proud courage abate at the encounter, and never defie a Cavalier again after one dismal alarm and fright of a discomfiture, he would first prove and try his troopers how they could endure a sudden terror, and by that grow hardy to the constancy of danger (as eagles certify themselves of the genuine race of their young ones by their experiencing how they can outstare and brave the sun, and imitate them with a bold and passive fortitude, the hardy rudiments of their fighting, predatory life); for as he relied on one hand upon their religious resolution and spiritual valour, so did he not reject the arm of flesh, which should actuate those inward impulses, and by a just temperment of both to a true metal, conduct and manage their sober and well-governed bravery to an assurance of success and victory; and such whose hearts failed, he resolved to dismount them, and give their horses to more courageous riders. This he did by a stratagem upon the first muster of his troop; when having privily placed twelve men in an ambuscado (it being neer some of the king's garrisons), upon a signal or the appointed time, the said ambush, with a trumpet-sounding a charge, galloped furiously to the body, out of which some 20 instantly fled out of fear and dismay, and were glad the forfeiture was so cheap and easie, and, ashamed of their childish and disgraceful deserting of their station and colours, had not the confidence to request their continuance in his service, or deny or scruple the rendering their horses to them who should fight the Lord's battle in their stead."

Some shades there are in the account I have next to quote of this remarkable regiment, but it has also characteristic touches of happiest truth which may not be denied. "All Cromwell's men," says Sir Philip, "had either naturally the fanatic humour, or soon imbibed it. A herd of this sort of men being by him drawn together, he himself, like Mohammed, having transports of fancy, and, withal, a crafty understanding, knowing that natural principles, though not morally good, will conduce to the attainment of natural and politic ends, made use of the zeal and credulity of those persons; teaching them, as they too readily taught themselves, that they engaged for God when he led them against the king; and where this opinion met with a natural courage, it made them the bolder, and too often the cruller; for it was such a sort of men as killed brave young Cavendish and many others, after quarter given, in cold blood. And these men, habituated more to spir-

* "Hi autem initio nec arma tractandi nec equos gnari, diligentia solertiaque bellatores accerrimi evaserunt; equis etenim curandis, nutriendis ac detergendis indies assuefacti sunt, et si opus foret simul humicubando; arma insuper polire, nitida et usui expedita servare, loricas optimas induere, neque cetero armorum genere communire condocerunt eos Cromwellius. Atque hoc exercitii militaris genere, præ reliquis commilitum omnibus emicuevit virtute bellica, pluresque ab hoste palmas reportarunt."—Bate's Elench, &c., part ii., p. 270.

† Flagellum, p. 31-33.

atural pride than carnal riot or intemperance, so, consequently, having been industrious and active in their former callings and professions, where natural courage wanted, zeal supplied its place; and at first they chose rather to die than fly; and custom removed fear of danger; and afterward, finding the sweet of good pay and of opulent plunder and preferment, the lucrative part made gain seem to them a natural member of godliness.*

Finally, and most interesting evidence of all, Cromwell himself, in one of his conferences during the Protectorate, thus described, in memorable and characteristic words, his own proceedings at the present period of his history. "I was," he said, "a person that from my first employment was suddenly preferred and lifted up from lesser trusts to greater, from my first being a captain of a troop of horse; and I did labour (as well as I could) to discharge my trust; and God blessed me as it pleased him; and I did truly and plainly, and then, in a way of foolish simplicity (as it was judged by very great and wise men, and good men too), desirous to make my instruments to help me in this work; and I will deal plainly with you. I had a very worthy friend then, and he was a very noble person, and I know his memory was very grateful to all, Mr. John Hampden. At my first going out into this engagement (I saw), their men were beaten at every hand; I did, indeed, and desired him that he would make some additions to my Lord Essex's army of some new regiments; and I told him I would be serviceable to him in bringing such men as I thought had a spirit that would do something in the work. This is very true that I tell you; God knows I lye not: 'Your troops,' said I, 'are most of them old, decayed serving-men and tapsters, and such kind of fellows'; and said I, 'their troops are gentlemen's sons, younger sons, and persons of quality: do you think that the spirits of such base and mean fellows will be ever able to encounter gentlemen, that have honour, and courage, and resolution in them?' Truly, I presented him in this manner conscientiously, and truly I did tell him, you must get men of a spirit; and take it not ill what I say (I know you will not) of a spirit that is likely to go on as far as gentlemen will go, or else I am sure you will be beaten still. I told him so; I did truly. He was a wise and worthy person, and he did think that I talked a good notion, but an impracticable one; truly I told him I could do somewhat in it; I did so; and truly I must needs say that to you (impart it to what you please), I raised such men as had the fear of God before them, and made some conscience of what they did; and from that day forward, I must say to you, they were never beaten, and wherever they were engaged against the enemy, they beat continually; and truly this is matter of praise to God; and it hath some instruction in it, to own men that are religious and godly, and so many of them as are peaceably, and honestly, and quietly disposed to live within government,* as will be subject to those Gospel rules of obeying magistrates, and living under authority. I reckon no godliness without this circle; but without this spirit, let it pretend what it will, it is diabolical, it is devilish, it is from diabolical spirits, from the height of Jotham's wickedness."

And now, in leading forth into the field these thousand warriors, Oliver Cromwell gave them their last instruction in a piece of fiery sincerity, which, better than the cold hypocrisy he had equally at command, availed him for his present purposes. He told them that he would not seek to perplex them (since other officers he had heard instructed their troops in the nice legal fictions of their civil superiors in Parliament) with any such phrases as fighting for king and Parliament: † it was for the Parliament alone they were now marching into military service: for himself, he declared, that if he met King Charles in the body of the enemy, he would as soon discharge his pistol upon him as upon any private man; and for any soldier present, therefore, who was troubled with a conscience that might not let him do the like, he advised him even now to quit the service he was engaged in. A terrible shout of determined zeal announced no deserter on that score, and on marched Cromwell and his Ironsides—then the seed, and soon after the flower, of that astonishing army, which even Lord Clarendon could describe as one to which victory was entailed, and which, humanly speaking, could hardly fail of conquest whithersoever led; an army whose order and discipline,

* Not disputing these shrewd hints by Sir Philip Warwick, the evidence of an eyewitness may be quoted here, in support of the continued mildness, modesty, religion, and goodness of Cromwell's special regiments: "Quicquid efficiunt in te dementes Olivari, nauci non facio, religiosissimi imperatores, religionis mediis in exercitiis defensionem, protectorem, propagatorem, nemo nisi laudum tuarum supra modum invidus hic reperitur, qui te non suspexit, admiratus fuerit, observantia summa non coelest. Enim vero ubinam terrarum tam religiosus visus est imperator, tamque religiosus exercitus? Miratus ego sum, varias Anglie provincias tunc pro negotiorum meorum, vel principis mei Serenissimi Ducis Gueldriae Comitissae Haemunda necessitate peragrans, easque militibus tuis referatas, ita quietas, tranquillas, pacatas, quasi ne unus quidem in illis miles esset, sic addictas pietati, quasi monachorum non militum legiones in pagis ipsarum dispersas degerent. Ita certa singulis diebus tunc fundendis Deo precibus, tunc audiendis dei preconiis, erant assignata tempora, milites ipsos adeo modestos, nihique nisi Deum, pietatem, religionem, virtutem respirantes, ut ingenuè fatear cum stupore non mediocri sepe suspexi. Atque ne putet hic aliquis velle me blandiri, oleum Olivario divendere, vel in illius aures instillare, testem Deum adhibeo, quod sepiissime praesidiarios Olivarii, modo supra dictos milites adiens, ne vel inverecundum verbum unquam ab ullius ex illis ore perceperim, iururandumque nullum, sed meram humanitatem, urbanitatem, pietatem, verecundiam, modestiam animadverterim. Unde nequam in Olivarii militibus locum habere potest quod de omnibus alijs jampridem decantatum est,

Nulla fides pietasque viris qui castra sequuntur;
sed de illis dicendum potius est,

Multa fides pietasque viris qui castra sequuntur."

* This was said, the reader will recollect, under the Protectorate, in a conference on the advantages of monarchy.

† A few months later he is said, on the authority of a Royalist journal of the time, the "Mercurius Politicus," to have used a very different style. When the associated counties, says the writer, were threatened by Lord Capel, Cromwell invited the principal gentry in Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Hertford to a conference, where he urged upon them the propriety of uniting all the forces they could raise, in order to repulse the common enemy. "He entreated them to consider seriously how acceptable a service they should render to the king by keeping five whole counties in his obedience; and concluded by drawing their attention to the honours and other rewards which they might justly expect from his majesty, in return for so signal a proof of their loyalty!" "Such excellent arts have they," he continues, "to abuse the people, and make them think they do good service to the king, when they endeavour to destroy him." It will be observed that here Cromwell was dealing with the gentry—not the commonalty—of the Parliamentary force.

whose sobriety and manners, whose courage and success, made it famous and terrible all over the world. "On went Noll Cromwell," said the reckless Royalist Marchmont Needham—"forth went Noll in the might of his spirit, with his swords and Bibles, and with all his train of disciples; every one of whom is as a David, a man of war and a prophet; gifted men all, that have resolved to their work better than any of the sons of Levi, and are rushing through England with their two-edged swords and Bibles, to convert the Gentiles."

Cromwell styles himself a captain of a troop in the characteristic piece of autobiography quoted in these descriptions of his men, but I cannot discover that he ever held such a commission under Essex. It possibly refers merely to the period of his first daring excursions before the king's standard was in the field, and which, without any regular commission, he seems to have pursued also some few days after, for one of his exploits before all the Parliamentary commissions of array had been issued was to seize the person of Sir Thomas Conisby, high sheriff of the county of Herts, who had come to St. Alban's on the market-day for the purpose of proclaiming the Earl of Essex, and all who should be his followers, traitors. The self-important knight had arrived in the market-place, and gravely unfolded his momentous proclamation, when suddenly he was pounced upon by Cromwell and his troop, and carried off a captive to London. Then it was Cromwell received his colonel's commission, with an instruction to increase his followers to a regiment of a thousand men; and how he did this the reader has seen.

Meanwhile, the commissions of array are out on all sides, and every town, every village, every hamlet in England is a muster-place for armed men, who are to fight against their own countrymen, their friends, perhaps their kindred. The causes which suddenly raised up for the king a larger levy of partisans and soldiers than could possibly have been anticipated by the Parliament, have been already placed before the reader.* "I thought," says the enthusiastic and honest Ludlow, in describing his adhesion to the army of Essex, "I thought the justice of that cause I had engaged in to be so evident, that I could not imagine it to be attended with much difficulty; for though I supposed that many of the clergy, who had been the principal authors of our miseries, together with some of the courtiers, and such as absolutely depended on the king for their subsistence, as also some foreigners, would adhere to him, yet I could not think that many of the people, who had been long oppressed with heavy burdens, and now, with great difficulty, had obtained a Parliament, composed of such persons as were willing to run all hazards to procure a lasting settlement for the nation, would be either such enemies to themselves, or so ungrateful to those they had trusted, as not to stand by them to the utmost of their power; at least (though some might not have so much resolution and courage as to venture all with them, yet), that they would not be so treacherous and unworthy as to strengthen the hands of the enemy against those who had the laws of God, nature, and reason, as well as those of the land, of their side." But not the common people alone, whom many causes may be supposed to have influenced, deserted, at this trying hour, the Parliament which had risen to assert their rights of property, of labour, and of conscience: men of rank, who had hitherto acted firmly and resolutely against the king, now fairly deserted the principles they had avowed, and went over to the royal banner. Nothing but that subtle and delicate sense of honour, which the term loyalty implies, could have actuated these men to such a course. It was no love for Charles or for his cause: but that "grinning honour" stood in the way, they had fought against both. Their voices had been their own in the struggle for liberty and law, but their swords were the king's alone. "I would not continue here an hour," wrote Lord Robert Spencer from the royal camp to his wife, "if there could be an expedient found to solve the punctilio of honour." And thousands were agitated by the same melancholy reflection, till the welcome death they sought in battle solved every punctilio at last. Had such men as these seen the crown of England "on a hedge-stake," they would have remained to the death beside it.

A man of this sort, for instance, was Sir Bevill Grenville, who, when the king's affairs were in miserable plight at the first from the difficulty of collecting men, suddenly declared himself for Charles, published a commission of array, raised troops, and occupied a line of posts in the western counties. "I go," he said, "with joy and comfort, to venture my life in as good a cause, and in as good company, as ever Englishman did; and I do take God to witness, if I were to choose a death, it would be no other than this." Here there appeared no "grinning" doubts, but they existed notwithstanding. In Grenville they took the shape of that sort of melancholy foreboding touching his own fate, which also so strongly affected Falkland. In his active exertions in the field, in the more general business of the strife, in fierce and passionate resolution against the foe, Grenville yielded to none. Here he had no doubts, no scruples, nothing that stood in the way of service. Deeper in his heart of hearts the melancholy lay.

Among the manuscripts intrusted to me by Lord Nugent, I have found some interesting letters before and during the first year of the war, written to his wife—"to his best friend,

* In the Life of Hampden.

† "Soon after my engagement in this cause, I met with Mr. Richard Fiennes, son to the Lord Say, and Mr. Charles Fleetwood, son to Sir Miles Fleetwood, then a member of the House of Commons, with whom consulting, it was resolved by us to assemble as many young gentlemen of the Inns of Court, of which we then were, and others, as should be found disposed to this service, in order to be instructed together in the use of arms, to render ourselves fit and capable of acting in case there should be occasion to make use of us. To this end, we procured a person experienced in military affairs to instruct us in the use of arms, and for some time we frequently met to exercise at the Artillery Ground in London. And being informed that the Parliament had resolved to raise a life-guard for the Earl of Essex, to consist of a hundred gentlemen, under the command of Sir Philip Stapleton, a member of Parliament, most of our company entered themselves therein, and made up the greatest part of the said guard; among whom were Mr. Richard Fiennes, Mr. Charles Fleetwood, afterward lieutenant-general, Major-general Harrison, Colonel Nathaniel Rich, Colonel Thomlinson, Colonel Twisleton, Colonel Boswell, Major Whitby, and myself, with divers others."—Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i., p. 42.

the Lady Grace Grenville"—by this gallant man. I shall quote one, dated from Bodmyn, the 12th of October, 1642, which illustrates a striking difference between the levy of the common troops for the king's service, and such levies as we have noticed in the case of Cromwell. It illustrates, too, the change which these distressing times could work in the gentlest natures. The mild and gentlemanly Grenville now threatens his neighbours and his tenants, and flings out insulting epithets against his old friend and associate, the Earl of Essex.

"DEARE LOVE,—I will detaine Sym. Cottle noe longer, nor can he bring you much more newes than I sent you yesterday. Wee found men enough at the place appointed well arm'd, & for my part I am impatient (as all my honest frends else are) that wee did not march presently, to fetch those traitors out of their nest at Lanecaston, or fire them in it, butt som of our faynter bretheren have prevailed soe farr wth the sherriff as there is a conference agreed on this day between —6—of a side, to see if they can compose matters. But we will march on neverthelesse, to be before hand if they agree not. My neighbours did ill that they came not out, & are punishable by the lawe in a high degree; & though I will doe the best I can to save some of the honestest sort, yet others shall smart. They were not in this to have comands from me; it is a legall course w^{ch} the sherriff is directed to by the statute, & he is the comander in the buisnes, and not the collonells, butt he may take to his assistance whom he pleases. My neighbours did perchance looke to heare from me, & if wee proceed I shall expect they should yett come forth, or they shall suffer, & they shall have farther direction from me. The gallant Prince Rupert goes on gloriously in his uncle's service; he hath given another blow to the enemy greater than the former, & hath well nye cutt off all their cavallry wth his; soe as the great cuckhold is forc'd to shutt himself up wth his foote w^hin the walls of Worcester, & not being able to keepe the field, witherward the king is moving wth his army to give the last blow, being able to barre him from all reliefe, and his army is mightily encreased. Cottle hath a note. Publish it to y^r frends. I have sent it already to my Cos. Cary. I hope wee shall shortly see good daies againe. My noble frend the brave Wilmott had a shrewd wound, & the prince himselfe slightly hurt, butt they killed 2000 of the enemy wth little losse. Your owne
"B. GRENVILLE."

What a change from a few years before, when bonds of love no less than sympathy connected the writer with men of thoughts as lofty, and hearts as generous, and fame as pure as his own, but for whom he cannot find better words now than traitor or than cuckold! How different from the days when his only care was for the domestic charities he is now forced to thrust aside; when the sanctities of social life occupied the thoughts that are now only bent on the tragic scenes of civil strife, on plundered towns, on flaming villages, on ravaged homesteads. The reader will not, perhaps, object to my introducing here, from the same valuable manuscripts, a picture of Sir Bevill Grenville, as he was, in one of his letters of that former time, to the same "best friend, Mrs. Grace Grenville." Such touching memorials, illustrating so vividly the changes of the period, belonging peculiarly to a personal history of the time, and are used too scantily to be withheld when found. The matter of these letters contrasts not more strongly than their appearance: that which has been quoted, so worn and soiled as though it had travelled across a wide country in some trooper's pocket; these, almost as fresh and clean as letters written yesterday. The date of the first is London, May 18, 1626; that of the second only two days later.

"MY DEAREST,—Since myne by Stanburie I have receaved yrs by my Co: Trevillian's man, wherein you say you have not heard from me, w^{ch} I wonder at, for surely I have written often unto you, both by way of Exeter and otherwise. Butt you doe much amaze me to tell me you are soe much distress'd for want of a midwife; for God's sake be sure to have one under hand, whatever it cost, and you cannot excuse your fault in neglecting it soe long. Howsoever, have myne Abbott by, if all else faile; shee, I hope, will doe her best, & I assure myselfe can doe well enough. There is little hope of having any of the Plate home as yett, butt all that can be don shall be. I am glad you have fetcht some of the Timber, to keepe Allen aworke; for I desire the worke should goe on wth all possible speed. If my co: Arundell be at Efford when you have Child, it will be verrie fitting shee should be a God-mother too; therefore, though it be a boy, intreat both her & my-sister too; it is no more than wee have don formerly. My bro. Hen: is the man, whether it be boy or girl; & I hope Sr Jo: Eliot shall be there too if it be a boy, though the King hath lately sent him to the Tower for some wordes spoken in the Parlt^t; but wee are all resolv'd to have him out againe, or will proceed in noe businesse; & if y^e Child chance to be borne before my coming downe, stay the Christning till wee can heare from one another. I will write shortly to you againe; in the mean time, doe rest y^r OWNE BEVILL GRENVILLE. . . . Reme'ber my duty to y^r mother, & forgett me not to my sister." Again: "MY DEAREST,—How all the things, that at severall times I have & shall send to you from hence, will nowe come unto you, I knowe not, because they are to passe thorough so many hands; butt I will hope the best. I have this weeke sent you a boxe of . . . Sweet Meats, ass many sortes & the best I can gett, saying only apricots, whereof there are butt one pound, & those not verrie good, though the best y^e can be gotten too; there were fewe or none don the last yeare, because of the sicknes, & that makes the scarsety. The note of particulars is heerinclosed, wanting only one boxe of the Quidinoock, w^{ch} I have eaten. I hope my Lady be now wth you, therefore reme'ber my duty to her. Wee have Sr Jo: Eliot at liberty againe; the House was never quiett till the King releas'd him. If God send us a boye, I have a good minde to have him called John, for my poore brother John's sake; if it be a Gyrle, Grace. But I would faine perswade myselfe that I could be there at it, though I am now in some doubt, & therefore will heartely pray for you, if I canot be present. Keepe my aunts and my sister by any meanes with you, & remember me to them. Soe I hasteley comend you to God, resting your own ever

"BEVILLE GRENVILLE."

Since the levying of his regiment, Cromwell has, meanwhile, already greatly distinguished himself. His first service was sudden and complete as his seizure of the unlucky Sir Thomas Conisby. Having received intelligence of a meeting of gentlemen of the king's party at Lowestoft in Suffolk, for the purpose of concerting means for making a stand in that quarter, he came upon them by surprise, and made the whole body, consisting of about thirty persons of opulence and distinction, his prisoners. It was mentioned in the journals of the day as "the best piece of service that hath been done for a long time."* The historian of the Parliament, May, tells us that the ammunition and engines of war secured on this occasion by Cromwell were "enough to have served a considerable force." And certain it was, pursues that historian, that "if Cromwell had not surprised them in the nick of time, it had proved a matter of great danger to the country; for within one day after, as many more knights and gentlemen that were listed before, would have met at the same place."

The first pitched battle between Charles and his subjects has been described in the life of Hampden. But while these early occurrences of the war left every one doubtful to which side success had fallen, the resolute cavalry of Cromwell were achieving remarkable and unquestioned advantages in every direction of their march.† At the head of twelve troops, their colonel had penetrated into Lincolnshire, disarming the disaffected as he passed, taking Stamford and Burleigh House by his way, and scattering all opposition before him. Not far from Grantham they were met by double their number—a flying corps of cavalry belonging to a light army levied by young General Cavendish, and with which he strove to recover Lincolnshire to the king. Cromwell's men, though many of them harassed and fatigued, stood firm; and the front they presented, few in numbers as they were, would seem to have been not at all inviting to the enemy, for the firing on both sides for upward of half an hour appears to have been confined to the skirmishers that covered each line, till at last Cromwell himself gave the word, and his men advanced with an irresistible shock. The result may be described in the letter which Cromwell addressed to the speaker the instant after the event: "God hath given us this evening a glorious victory over our enemies. They were, as wee are informed, one-and-twentie colours of horse troops, and three or foure of dragoons. It was late in the evening when wee drew out. They came and faced us within two miles of the town. Soe soon as wee had the alarm, wee drew out our forces, consisting of about twelve troops, whereof some of them soe poore and broken that you shall seldome have seen worse; with this handfull it pleased God to cast the scale; for after wee had stood, a little above musket shot the one body from the other, and the dragoons having fired on both sides for the space of halfe an houre or more, they not advancing towards us, wee agreed to charge them, and advancing the body after many shots on both sides, came with our troops a pretty round trot, they standing firme to receive us, and our men charging fiercely upon them, they were immediately routed and ran all away, and wee had the execution of them two or three miles. I believe some of our souldiers did kill two or three men a pece. Wee have also gotten some of their officers and some of their colours; butt what the number of dead is, or what the prisoners, for the present wee have not time to inquire into."*

Cromwell's next important service was the relief of Gainsborough, which, having been taken by Lord Willoughby, and garrisoned with Parliamentary soldiers, would have surrendered before the army of Lord Newcastle, returning victorious from Atherton Moor, but for the interposition of Cromwell, who, with sudden and astonishing bravery, threw himself and his regiment between the town and the first division of the advancing Royalist force, commanded by Lord Newcastle's brother, young General Cavendish. It was a fearful position. On the summit of an acclivity before them were ranged numbers in the proportion of at least three to one, while along the base of the hill ran a lofty fence, accessible only through a single gateway. On this quarter the enemy poured a heavy fire; yet Cromwell, having himself resolutely and safely passed, filed his men through, inspired by his own courage to deeds of as lofty daring, formed them as they passed, section by section, and then at once made a furious charge up hill, which overbore the enemy as much by the wonder the act inspired as by any real shock of arms. The major part of the Royalists fled in broken confusion. Cromwell, still holding his men together, plunged back on that part of the enemy which alone had been able to stand, drove them pellmell into a bog, and there, it is melancholy to be obliged to add, butchered them, including poor Cavendish himself, without mercy. It was the first great advantage these resolute soldiers had gained: their leader had inspired them to it by daring which might well have carried them beyond the common limits of soldierly forbearance, and it is charitable to suppose that this act was committed at a time when they were scarcely responsible agents.†

* Perfect Diurnal, 25th of May, 1643.

† The Perfect Diurnal writes of the result: "Gen. Cav.

* "By letters from Suffolk of the 15th present, it was informed that on Tuesday last, Colonel Cromwell, with about 1000 horse, having notice of a great confederacy held amongst the malignants at a town called Lowestoft, in that county, being a place of great consequence, came upon them unawares, and gained the town with small difficulty and no shot; took prisoners Sir Thomas Barker and his brother Sir John Pettus, Mr. Thomas Knevet, two of the younger Cutlings, Captain Hammond, Mr. Corey, Mr. Turwill, Mr. Preston, and about twenty others of good worth. This was the best piece of service that hath been done for a long time, for both the counties will now be freed of their fears of the malignants. There were also taken in the said town divers clergymen of the confederacy, good store of ammunition, excellent saddles, great store of pistols, powder, shot, and other engines for war, sufficient for a great force. This hath set the whole county right, so that now they are all up in arms, and would feign be in action for the Parliament."—Perf. Diur., 18th Mar., 1643.

† "And now," writes Mrs. Hutchinson, "were all the countreyes in England noe longer idle spectators, but severall stages, whereon the tragedie of the civill warre was acted; except the easterne association, where Mr. Oliver Cromwell, by his diligence, prevented the designs of the royall party."

This achievement, Whitelocke tells us, was "the beginning of Cromwell's great fortunes, and now he began to appear in the world." It was the beginning, too, of his close and extraordinary intimacy with Ireton. This famous man was at the time a captain in "Col. Thornhaugh's regiment;" but hearing of Cromwell's brave intentions in this matter, solicited leave to join him in the enterprise, and a lasting bond of friendship was thereafter sealed between them. Cromwell had perhaps the most surprising faculty in selecting his friends or agents of any man that ever played a great part in the world; and it might possibly be taken as in some sort an evidence of the purity of his present motives that he now selected Ireton. Eleven years the junior of Cromwell, this gallant and virtuous man had been bred to the bar, and had distinguished himself thus early by the projection of various legal and constitutional reforms of a very striking and philosophical character. His opinions, however, were all Republican, and his integrity so stern and uncompromising,* that no worldly motives or advantages ever changed or modified those convictions of his mind. Nor did military services ever transport him out of philosophical or meditative habits, since he was able with amazing facility, as Hume has with a misplaced sneer observed, "to graft the soldier on the lawyer, the statesman on the saint." Three years after the relief of Gainsborough, this excellent person married Cromwell's eldest daughter, Bridget, then in her twenty-first year, having, instantly upon the former action, Mrs. Hutchinson tells us, "quite left Colonel Thornhaugh's regiment," to join that of the greater colonel whose conduct and genius had "charmed him."

These individual successes, meanwhile, availed little against serious reverses lately undergone by the Parliament. Even after relieving Gainsborough, Cromwell was obliged to draw off towards Boston, which he did in masterly order, slowly retreating before the overwhelming force of the main body of Newcastle's army, yet presenting at every step of his retreat "a bold front to his pursuers, and appearing to invite rather than shun an encounter." Newcastle, however, marched straight on to Gainsborough, recovered that place, and made himself master of Lincoln.

In the west it was, however, that the king's forces were at this time chiefly successful. The letter already quoted from the Grenville manuscripts referred to some of these successes; and the fight of Bradock Down, where Sir Ralph Hopton commanded the royal troops, was endish, and another person of note, much like to Gen. King, one colonel, lieutenant-colonel, sergeant-major, and a captain, with above 100 others, were found dead upon the place, near upon twice as many killed in the pursuit, and prisoners above 150. Upon their retreat they relieved the town with powder and other provisions; after which they skirmished with a new supply of Newcastle's army that came against them, brought off their foot, which was engaged with great disadvantage, and made a fair retreat into the town, with little loss."

* Ludlow says of him in after years, that "when he heard of a bill brought into Parliament in his absence, to settle upon him two thousand a year in land, in his character of lord-deputy of Ireland, he expressed his displeasure, and said they had many just debts, which he wished they would pay before they made such presents; that, for their land, he had no need of it, and therefore would not have it."

a decided victory. In this Grenville greatly distinguished himself, and the rout of the Parliamentarians was complete. Shortly after, however, I find from these manuscripts, Grenville wrote from Okehampton to "his best friend" thus: "DEARE LOVE,—I will write a hasty line by my cos Parker. Wee march'd wth some foote and horse from Plympton to prevent the enjmy from gathering power at Tavistock, where he forbore to come for feare of us. Wee then marcht to Okehampton to finde him, wee being sure they were there wth 5000 men, butt they ran away before wee came. There were sent some horse and dragoons to Chagford to pursue them in the night, butt for want of good foote, & the approach to the towne being very hard, our men were forc't to retire againe after they were in, & one losse wee have sustain'd that is unvaluab^{le}, to witt, SIDNEY GODOLPHIN is slaine in the attempt, who was as gallant a gent. as the world had. I have time for no more. Y^{rs} ever, B. GRENVILLE."

Godolphin* was indeed a loss; and it is moreover clear from the tone of the letter, that the western Parliamentary men were rallying once more. They had, in fact, been elevated by the news of assistance providing for them by the Parliament, and Sir Ralph Hopton now foolishly offered siege to the unimportant garrison of Plympton, dividing his army for that purpose, instead of concentrating it on one point towards Tavistock, to clear the country to the eastward, where the Parliamentarians were collecting strength. The latter had been the advice of Grenville, whose next communications to his wife, crumpled, soiled, and torn as his fortunes, are accordingly most melancholy and desponding. The first is dated from Plympton, and presents several characteristic points.

"MY DEARE LOVE,—Y^t great care & good affection, as they are very remarkable, soe they deserve my best thanks, & I could wish that the subject w^{ch} you bestowe them upon could better requite you. I shall returne your Messenger wth but little certainty concerning our present Condition. Our Army lyes still in severall quarters. Sr Ra. Hopton, wth my Lo: Mohun, is upon the north side of Plimouth wth two Regim^{ts}; Collo: Ashbourn: Sr Js: Bark: & I, are on the east side wth two Regim^{ts}, & Sr Ni: Glan: with Jack Tfevan: & their two Regim^{ts}, were sent the last weeke to Modbury, to possesse that quarter before the enemy came, being the richest part of this Countrey, whence most of our provision and victualls does come. If it were taken from us, wee might be starv'd in our quarters. Modbury lyes 6 miles to the Eastward of us, & now the Enemy wth all the power y^e they can gather of those that wee dispersed at Okeham: & Chag: & other aydes advanc'd wthin two mile of ou . . . at Modbu: they are many thousand as the report goes, and wee are like to have speedy worke. Wee have sent more ayde to them both of horse and foote. God speed us well. Plimouth is still supplied wth men & all sorts of provision by sea, w^{ch} wee cannot hinder, & therefore, for my part, I see no hope of taking it. Soe now the most danger that hangs over the Kg's side is in these parts, for he hath had great successes in those parts where he is. Cissiter, w^{ch} Prince Rupert tooke, hath drawne in all Gloucestershire. The Cities of Gloucester & Bristol do offer to render themselves wthout force, & they are places of great importance. The Earle of Newcastle hath given the Parl^{ts} power a great defeat in Yorkshire. The Queene is cominge wth good Ayde to the King. The Parl: did attempt to force severall quarters where the Kg's Army lay, & were beaten off wth great losse to themselves in all places. Wee have advertiz^{mt}: that some ayde is coming from his Ma^{ty} to us, but it is soe slowe as wee shall need it before wee see it. But God's will be done; I am satisfied I canot expire in a better cause. I have given some directions to Jack for his study; pray cause him to putt them in execution, & to make some exercise in verse or prose every day. Intreat my Cos. . . & Bar: Geal: to take a little paines with him. I have releas'd the Prisoners that Bar: Geal: wrote for. Lett Cap: Stanb: know, it is all one to me whither he goe by Byd: or Pads: soe he make haste: & now to conclude, I beseech you take care of y^r health; I have nothing soe much in my prayers. Y^r Phisition Jennings is turn'd a Traytor wth the rest, whereby he hath lost my love, & I am doubtfull to trust you wth him. Present my humble duty & thanks to y^r moth^r; & I beseech God to blesse y^r young people. I rest y^r owne ever, BEVILLE GRENVILLE. . . My new cap is a little too straight. . . I know not what forme of a Certificate it is that Jo: Geal: desires, butt if he will send it to me drawne, I will gett it sign'd."

* Of this accomplished man, Clarendon speaks in a passage of his own life, which should not be omitted here: "There was never so great a mind and spirit contained in so little room; so large an understanding and so unrestrained a fancy in so very small a body; so that the Lord Falkland used to say merrily, that he thought it was a great ingredient into his friendship for Mr. Godolphin that he was pleased to be found in his company, where he was the properer man; and it may be, the very remarkableness of his little person made the sharpness of his wit and the composed quickness of his judgment and understanding the more notable. He had spent some years in France and in the Low Countries, and accompanied the Earl of Leicester in his ambassage into Denmark, before he resolved to be quiet, and attend some promotion in the court, where his excellent disposition and manners, and extraordinary qualifications, made him very acceptable. Though everybody loved his company very well, yet he loved very much to be alone, being in his constitution inclined somewhat to melancholy, and to retirement amongst his books; and was so far from being active, that he was contented to be reproached by his friends with laziness; and was of so nice and tender a composition, that a little rain or wind would disorder him, and divert him from any short journey he had most willingly proposed to himself; inasmuch as when he rid abroad with those in whose company he most delighted, if the wind chanced to be in his face, he would (after a little pleasant murmuring) suddenly turn his horse and go home: yet the civil war no sooner began (the first approaches towards which he discovered as soon as any man, by the proceedings in Parliament, where he was a member, and opposed with great indignation) than he put himself into the first troops which were raised in the west for the king, and bore the uneasiness and fatigue of winter marches with an exemplar courage and alacrity, until, by too brave a pursuit of the enemy into an obscure village in Devonshire, he was shot with a musket, with which (without saying any word more than, O God, I am hurt) he fell dead from his horse, to the excessive grief of his friends, who were all that knew him, and the irreparable damage of the public."

At last Hopton abandoned the siege of Plymouth, and joined his forces once more at Tavistock. Grenville immediately after writes thus to the Lady Grace: "DEARE LOVE,—There have been some changes since I wrote last; wee have raised our seige of Plimouth, w^{ch}, for my part, I never expected could have been successful, yet in submission to better judgm^t I gave way, & wee are now at Tavistock, united againe in one boddy. The party of ours w^{ch} was at Modbury indur'd a cruell assault for 12 howers against many thousand men, & kill'd many of them, wth the losse of fewe and some hurt, but ours at last were forc'd to retire to Plimpton for want of Amunition, having spent all their stock. Wee are still threatned, but I hope God's favour will not forsake vs. Y^r Neighbour of Gouldon, I heare, is one of the dead at Modbury, & will not now plunder y^r Countrey if it be true. If my Soldier Hugh Ching continue sick, pray lett there be care had of him, & lett him not want what you can helpe him. Bidd Tom Anley have speciall care of the busines I have now writt to him. Give my duty to y^r mother, & I beseech God to keepe and blesse you all, & if it be his will to send us a happie meeting, so prayeth y^r faithfull BEVILLE GRENVILLE . . . I have sent home some peare graffs; lett them be carefully graffed, some by Brute & some by Jo. Skiñer. I beseech you make Jack to pursue the directions I have given him. . . I did send home some Peare graffs from Truroe about Michaelmas; lett them be carefully graffed also, & note w^{ch} is one & w^{ch} the other."

The happy meeting prayed for in this touching letter was doomed never to take place. After some important successes gained by Hopton, Waller entered the western counties with a small but well-appointed army, and fought the disputed battle of Lansdowne, the result of which, let the victory be disputed as it may, certainly was to leave the Parliamentary general quartered that night in Bath, at the foot of the contested hill, while Hopton was borne off the field with heavy wounds, his army retreating at the same time towards Oxford, and leaving behind them, among the dead bodies of their chief officers, that of the brave and honourable Sir Bevill Grenville. A very short time elapsed, however, before the Royalists rallied, and in an action near Devizes totally routed and dispersed the army of Sir William Waller.

Waller, on his return to London, mortified, deserted, and defeated, was yet received with honour, "as if," says Clarendon, with wonder, "he had brought the king prisoner with him." Yet here admiration would be better timed than wonder. The feeling that inspired the Parliament in such a policy was that of the Roman Senate in congratulating the general who was defeated at Cannæ, that he had not despaired of his country. It was only by such noble and elevated disregard of all petty jealousies that these great statesmen held their forces together, and subdued the jealousies of their chiefs, till fortune flung upon their side once more the chances of battle.

Never was the cause of the Parliament in such danger as now. The divisions and jealousies that had sprung up; the fatal imbecility and suspected treachery of Essex; the crowning disaster of the death of Hampden, with the yet-unshrinking decision and fortitude of Pym, applied with success to the healing even of such wounds as these, have already been placed before the reader by the writer of this memoir.* In the life of Vane, the masterly act of statesmanship resolved on at this time has also been commemorated. The commissioners for the

* In the Lives of Pym and Hampden.

Solemn League and Covenant were now settling their great act in Edinburgh.

Exertions were not, meanwhile, wanting in England, while the Scottish supply was waited for. May, the historian of the Long Parliament, has described in a memorable passage the resolution shown by the Londoners when their great stronghold was threatened. "London," he says, "was at this time unfortified; nor could she, if the enemy, then master of the field, had come upon her, have opposed any walls but such as those old Sparta used, the hearts of her courageous citizens. But now was begun the large intrenchment, which encompassed not only the city, but the suburbs on every side, containing about twelve miles in circuit. That great work was by many hands completed in a short time, it being then the practice for thousands to go out every day to dig, all professions, trades, and occupations taking their turns; not the inferior tradesmen only, but gentlemen of the best quality, knights, and ladies, for the encouragement of others, resorted to the works daily, not as spectators, but assistants, carrying themselves spades, mattocks, and other suitable implements, so that it became a pleasant spectacle at London to see them going out in such order and numbers, with drums beating before them, which put life into the drooping people, being taken for a happy omen, that in so low a condition they yet seemed not to despair." The cause was one which admitted not of despair, which, in the words of one of its noblest advocates, gave life in death to all the owners of it and all the sufferers for it.

Essex, with his army re-enforced and his jealousies compromised, was now active in the field once more; while jealousies, worse than any that had affected the Parliament's success, ravaged the victorious forces of the king. Charles's original commander in chief, Lord Lindsey, had fallen in the Edgehill fight, and the chief command had then been given to the king's nephew, Prince Rupert, a young man only twenty-three years of age, brave, but rash, impetuous, and with all the headstrong and plundering propensities of a mere soldier of fortune. He received the appointment of general of the Royal horse, with a fatal clause in his commission, exempting him from receiving any orders but from Charles himself. The first effect of this was disastrous in the extreme; for if the high-spirited and chivalrous Newcastle had joined Charles and Rupert in the south after the victory of Atherton Moor, instead of marching back to the north to avoid the mortification of receiving orders and perhaps insolence from Rupert, the result might have been hard to tell. In the same way, Prince Maurice—a youth of only twenty-two, with all the bad qualities of his brother Rupert, and none of his talent—harassed Hertford, whose lieutenant-general in the command of the west he was, so as to render almost of no avail Fiennes' ill-fated surrender of Bristol. And now, instead of co-operating upon one great point, Charles was at Gloucester, and Newcastle sat down before Hull.

To Gloucester, therefore, Essex directed a movement with his re-enforced army, and so well did he perform it that the sound of his cannon was Charles's first announcement of his approach. The Royalists broke up in some confusion, and retired with the view of disputing the London road. Essex relieved and supplied Gloucester, and, anxious to avoid a battle with the king's superior cavalry, resolved to manœuvre his way back to London. He first marched to Tewkesbury, where he lay five days, and made demonstrations as if he had intended to proceed northward to Worcester. But, by a forced march during the night, he reached Cirencester, obtaining the double advantage of passing unmolested through an open country, and of surprising a convoy of provisions which lay in that town, where he also took upward of 400 prisoners. Having marched hence into Wiltshire, and now advancing towards the Auburn hills with the view of proceeding through an enclosed country to Newbury, Prince Rupert suddenly molested him with some divisions of horse, and in a skirmish some short distance from Hungerford nearly 2000 men were killed or wounded. In this skirmish an incident occurred, so characteristic yet so little known, that the reader will excuse its insertion from a rare tract entitled the "Life and Death of Robert Earl of Essex," by an officer who served under him. "Our horse," he says, "here made a great impression upon the queen's regiment of horse, and charged them again and again, and cut in pieces many of her life-guard. In this service the Marquis of Vivile was taken prisoner: it seems he would not be known who he was; but endeavouring to rescue himself from a lieutenant that took him prisoner, and thereupon, having his head almost cloven asunder with a pole-axe, he acknowledged himself, in the last words he spoke, which were, VOUS VOYEZ UN GRAND MARQUIS MOURANT! that is, you see a great marquis dying. His dead body was carried to Hungerford by the lord-general's command. It had not been long there, when the king did send a trumpet to his excellency, conceiving that the marquis had been wounded only and taken prisoner, and desired that his surgeons and doctors might have free access unto him for his recovery. His excellency certified the trumpet that he was dead, and returned his body to the king, to receive those funeral rites as his majesty would give it. Some say that his body was ransomed for 300 pieces of gold."

Essex arrived at Newbury at last, but, to his surprise, found that Charles and the Royalist army had been there two hours before him. An action was unavoidable now, and Essex met the crisis gallantly. He accepted the king's challenge for battle on the morning of the following day.

"All that night," says the officer I have just quoted, in a fine description, which appears in none of the histories, and therefore may be welcomed by the reader here, "all that night our army lay in the fields, impatient of the sloth of darkness, and wishing for the morning's light, to exercise their valour; and the rather, because the king had sent a challenge over night to the lord-general to give him battle the next morning. A great part of the enemy's army continued also in the field, incapable of sleep, their enemy being so nigh; and, sometimes looking on the ground, they thought upon the melancholy element of which they were composed, and to which they must return; and sometimes looking up, they observed the silent marches of the stars, and the moving scene of heaven. The day no sooner did appear, but they were marshalled into order, and advanced to the brow of the hill; and not long after, the ordnance was planted, and the whole body of their horse and foot stood in battalia. The officers and commanders of their foot did many of them leave off their doublets, and with daring resolution did bring on their men; and, as if they came rather to triumph than to fight, they, in their shirts, did lead them up to the battle. The first that gave the charge was the most noble Lord Roberts, whose actions speak him higher than our epithets. He performed it with great resolution, and by his own example showed excellent demonstrations of valour to his regiment. The cavalry of the enemy performed also their charge most bravely, and gave in with a mighty impression upon him. A prepared body of our army made haste to relieve him. Upon this, two regiments of the king's horse, with a fierce charge, saluted the blue regiment of the London trained-bands, who gallantly discharged upon them, and did beat them back; but they, being no whit daunted at it, wheeled about, and on a sudden charged them. Our musketeers did again discharge, and that with so much violence and success, that they sent them now, not wheeling, but reeling from them; and yet, for all that, they made a third assault, and coming in full squadrons, they did the utmost of their endeavour to break through our ranks; but a cloud of bullets came at once so thick from our muskets, and made such a havoc among them, both of men and horse, that in a fear, full of confused speed, they did fly before us, and did no more adventure upon so warm a service.

"In the mean time, Sir Philip Stapleton performed excellent service with the lord-general's regiment of horse, and five times together did charge the enemy; but, above all, the renown and glory of this day is most justly due unto the resolution and conduct of our general; for, before the battle was begun, he did ride from one regiment to another, and did inflame them with courage, and perceiving in them all an eager desire to battle with their enemies, he collected to himself a sure presage of victory to come. I have heard, that when, in the heat and tempest of the fight, some friends of his did advise him to leave off his white hat, because it rendered him an object too remarkable to the enemy: No, replied the earl, it is not the hat, but the heart. The hat is not capable either of fear or honour. He himself, being foremost in person, did lead up the city regiment, and when a vast body of the enemy's horse had given so violent a charge that they had broken quite through it, he quickly rallied his men together, and with undaunted courage did lead them up the hill. In his way he did beat the infantry of the king from hedge to hedge, and did so scatter them, that hardly any of the enemy's foot appeared at that present to him to keep together in a body. After six hours' long fight, with the assistance of his horse, he gained those advantages which the enemy possessed in the morning, which were the hill, the hedges, and the river.

"In the mean time, a party of the enemy's horse, in a great body, wheeled about, and about three quarters of a mile below the hill they did fall upon the rear of our army, where our carriages were placed; to relieve which, his excellency sent a selected party from the hill to assist their friends, who were deeply engaged in the fight. These forces marching down the hill, did meet a regiment of horse of the enemy's, who in their hats had branches of furz and broom, which our army did that day wear, for distinction sake, to be known by one another from their adversaries, and they cried out to our men, Friends, friends; but they being discovered to be enemies, our men gave fire upon them, and having some horse to second the execution, they did force them farther from them. Our men being now marched to the bottom of the hill, they increased the courage of their friends, and after a sharp conflict they forced the king's horse to fly with remarkable loss, having left the ground strewn with the carcasses of their horses and riders.

"And now his excellency, having planted his ordnance on the top of the hill, did thunder against the enemy where he found their numbers to be thickest, and the king's ordnance (being yet on the same hill) did play with the like fury against the forces of his excellency. The cannon on each side did dispute with one another, as if the battle was but new begun. The trained-bands of the city of London endured the chiefest heat of the day, and had the honour to win it; for, being now upon the brow of the hill, they lay not only open to the horse, but the cannon of the enemy; yet they stood undaunted, and conquerors against all; and, like a grove of pines in a day of wind and tempest, they only moved their heads or arms, but kept their footing sure, unless, by an improvement of honour, they advanced forward to pursue their advantage on their enemies.

"Although the night did now draw on, yet neither of the armies did draw off. The enemy's horse, in a great body, did stand on the farthest side of the hill, and the broken remainders of their foot behind them; and having made some pillage, about the middle of the night they drew off their ordnance, and retreated unto Newbury. On the next morning, his excellency, being absolute master of the field, did marshal again his soldiers into order to receive the enemy, if he had any stomach to the field, and to that purpose discharged a piece of ordnance; but no enemy appearing, he marched towards Reading. The loss which the king's forces received in this memorable battle is remarkable for, besides the multitudes that were carried away in carts, there were divers found that were buried in pits and ditches. There were many personages of note and honour slain, as the Earl of Carnarvon, the Earl of Sunderland, the Lord of Falkland, more famous for his pen than for his sword, Colonel Morgan, Lieutenant-colonel Fielding, Mr. Strode, and others: there were hurt the Lord Andover, Sir Charles Lucas, Colonel Charles Gerard, Colonel Ewers, the Earl of Carlisle, the Earl of Peterborough, Lieutenant-colonel George Lisle, Sir John Russell, Mr. Edward Sackville, Mr. Henry Howard, Mr. George Porter, Mr. Progers, Col. Darcy, Lieutenant-colonel Edward Villars, and many more of note and eminence, whose names are unknown unto us. . . . On the Parliament side, there were slain, Colonel Tucker, Captain George Massey, and Captain Hunt, and not any more of quality that I can learn."

In this very striking and beautiful description are presented all the more memorable characteristics of this fatal civil strife. We see the daring and impetuous dash of the Royalists, touched with something of unnecessary bravado, and met by the steady and immovable determination of the Parliamentarians. In vain, yet in vain, and again in vain, the impetuous Rupert dashes on the rampart of invincible pikes held by the raw recruits of London: men as Lord Clarendon observes in speaking of this action, "of whose inexperience of danger, or any kind of service beyond the easy practice of their postures in the artillery garden, men had, till then, too cheap an estimation."* We have before us, too, the most terrible feature of all, in those expedients to distinguish friends and foes, which had become so fearfully necessary among men whose faces were familiar as those of brother to brother, who owned the same country, who spoke the same language. The result of the battle has been disputed, but surely they must be supposed to have been the victors who gained possession of the town, and were suffered to proceed next morning, unmolested, on their march to London.

This fight of Newbury cannot be left without a word to the eminent men who fell there. Four earls perished on that field, and of them were the youthful and beloved Sunderland, and the travelled and accomplished Carnarvon. But the loss to the Royalist party most deeply deplored—"a loss which no time would suffer to be forgotten, and no success or good fortune could repair"—was that of Charles's secretary of state, Lord Falkland; a person, exclaims Lord Clarendon, in all the fervour of a true affection, "of such prodigious learning and knowledge, of such inimitable sweetness and delight in conversation, of so obliging a humanity and goodness to mankind, and of that primitive simplicity and integrity of life, that, if there were no other brand upon this odious and accursed civil war than that single loss, it must be most infamous and execrable to all posterity. . . . He was a great cherisher," his friend continues, "of wit and fancy and good parts in any man; and if he found them clouded with poverty or want, a most liberal and bountiful patron towards them, even above his fortune. . . . His house being within ten miles of Oxford, he contracted familiarity and friendship with the most polite and accurate men of that University, who found such an immenseness of wit and such a solidity of judgment in him; so infinite a fancy, bound in by a most logical ratiocination; such a vast knowledge that he was not ignorant in any thing, yet such an excessive humility as if he had known nothing, that they frequently resorted and dwelt with him, as in a college situated in a purer air; so that his house was a university in a less volume, whither they came not so much for repose as study, and to examine and refine those grosser propositions which laziness and consent made current in vulgar conversation. . . . From the entrance into this unnatural war, his natural cheerfulness and vivacity grew clouded, and a kind of sadness and dejection of spirit stole upon him which he had never been used to. . . . He who had been so exactly unreserved and affable to all men, that his face and countenance was always present, and vacant to his company, and held any cloudiness and less pleasantness of the visage a kind of rudeness or incivility, became, on a sudden, less communicable, and thence very sad, pale, and exceedingly affected with the spleen. In his clothes and habit, which he had intended before always with more neatness, and industry, and expense than is usual to so great a mind, he was now not only incurious, but too negligent; and in his reception of suitors, and the necessary or casual addresses to his place, so quick, and sharp, and severe, that there wanted not some men (who were strangers to his nature and disposition) who believed him proud and imperious, from which no mortal man was ever more free. . . . When there was any overture or hope of peace, he would be more erect and vigorous, and exceedingly solicitous to press any thing which he thought might promote it; and sitting among his friends, often, after a deep silence and frequent sighs, would, with a shriek and sad accent, ingeminate the word PEACE, PEACE, and would passionately profess 'that the very agony of the war, and the view of the calamities and desolation the kingdom did and must endure, took his sleep from him, and would shortly break his heart.' . . . In the morning before the battle, as always upon action, he was very cheerful, and put himself into the first rank of the Lord Byron's regiment, who was then advancing upon the enemy, who had lined the hedges on both sides with musketeers, from whence he was shot with a musket in the lower part of his belly, and in the instant falling from his horse, his body was not found till the next morning; till when, there was some hope he might have been a prisoner, though his nearest friends, who knew his temper, received small comfort from that imagination. Thus fell that incomparable young man, in the four-and-thirtieth year of his age, having so much despatched the business of life that the oldest rarely attain to that immense knowledge, and the youngest enter not into the world with more innocence: whosoever leads such a life, need not care upon how short warning it be taken from him."* In the presence of such

* His lordship adds that "they behaved themselves to wonder"—standing as a bulwark and rampire to defend the rest—enduring without a shock the charges of Rupert and his choicest horse, "who could make no impression on their stand of pikes, but was forced to wheel about."—Vol. iv., p. 236.

* Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, vol. iv., p. 240-257. From Lord Clarendon's life, I take a most graphic and singular description, little known, of Lord Falkland's person: "With these advantages, he had one great disadvantage (which in the first entrance into the world is attended with too much prejudice) in his person and presence, which was in no degree attractive or promising: his stature was low, and smaller than most men; his motion not graceful, and his aspect so far from inviting, that it had somewhat in it of simplicity; and his voice the worst of the three, and so untuned, that instead of reconciling, it offended the ear, so that nobody would have expected music from that tongue; and sure no man was less beholden to nature for its recommendation into the world, but then no man sooner, or more disappointed this general and customary prejudice; that little person and small stature was quickly found to contain a great heart, a courage so keen, and a nature so fearless, that no composition of the strongest limbs, and most harmonious and proportioned presence and strength, ever more disposed any man to the greatest enterprise, it being a eulogium, which in itself renders its object sacred, the faults or errors of Lord Falkland may not be remembered. Whitelocke and Rushworth have detailed in a similar strain the circumstances of his death. On the morning of the fight, they tell us, he called for a clean shirt, and told his friends gayly that if he were slain in the battle, they should not find his body in foul linen. In answer to their serious and passionate entreaty to him not to engage, "as not being a military man," he more seriously and with an air of inexpressible sadness replied that he was weary of his country's misery, and "did believe he should be out of it ere night."

During these eventful occurrences Cromwell remained in Lincolnshire, and performed so many signal acts of service in that and the neighbouring counties, that the Commons ordered a levy of an additional 2000 men* to be his greatest weakness to be too solicitous for such adventures; and that untuned tongue and voice easily discovered itself to be supplied and governed by a mind and understanding so excellent, that the wit and weight of all he said carried another kind of lustre and admiration in it, and even another kind of acceptance from the persons present, than any ornament of delivery could reasonably promise itself, or is usually attended with; and his disposition and nature was so gentle and obliging, so much delighted in courtesy, kindness, and generosity, that all mankind could not but admire and love him. . . . In a short time after he had possession of the estate his grandfather had left him, and before he was of age, he committed a fault against his father, in marrying a young lady whom he passionately loved, without any considerable portion. . . . He seemed to have his estate in trust for all worthy persons who stood in want of supplies and encouragement, as Ben Jonson, and many others of that time, whose fortunes required, and whose spirits made them superior to, ordinary obligations; which yet they were contented to receive from HIM, because his bounties were so generously distributed, and so much without vanity and ostentation, that except from those few persons from whom he sometimes received the characters of fit objects for his benefits, or whom he intrusted for the more secret deriving them to them, he did all he could that the persons themselves who received them should not know from what fountain they flowed; and when that could not be concealed, he sustained any acknowledgment from the persons obliged with so much trouble and bashfulness, that they might well perceive that he was even ashamed of the little he had given, and to receive so large a recompense from it." Nor can I conclude this note without other striking and characteristic anecdotes from the history. "He was so ill a dissembler of his dislike and disinclination to ill men, that it was not possible for such not to discern it. There was once, in the House of Commons, such a declared acceptance of the good service an eminent member had done to them, and, as they said, to the whole kingdom, that it was moved, he being present, 'that the speaker might, in the name of the whole House, give him thanks; and then, that every member might, as a testimony of his particular acknowledgment, stir or move his hat towards him:' the which (though not ordered), when very many did, the Lord Falkland (who believed the service itself not to be of that moment, and that an honourable and generous person would not have stooped to it for any recompense), instead of moving his hat, stretched both his arms out and clasped his hands together upon the crown of his hat, and held it close down to his head, that all men might see how odious that flattery was to him, and the very approbation of the person, though at that time most popular. . . . At the leaguer before Gloucester, when his friends passionately reprehended him for exposing his person unnecessarily to danger (as he delighted to visit the trenches and nearest approaches, and to discover what the enemy did), as being so much beside the duty of his place that it might be understood against it, he would say merrily, 'that his office could not take away the privileges of his age, and that a secretary in war might be present at the greatest secret of danger;' but withal alleged seriously, 'that it concerned him to be more active in enterprises of hazard than any other men, that all might see that his impatience for peace proceeded not from pusillanimity, or fear to adventure his own person.'"

* We find by a journal of the day that this new levy was at once placed under his peculiar discipline: "Now all the Lincolnshire forces are joined with Colonel Cromwell, God grant they manage the business they go about better than it was at Newark in their former action. As for Colonel placed under his command, and he was joined with Manchester (formerly Lord Kimbolton, but now raised to the peerage by his father's death) in the command of the six associated counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Hertford. The ill-advised separation of Newcastle and the king, among other disastrous effects of the royal cause, of course opened Manchester's passage from London to Lincolnshire, where, with upward of 7000 infantry, he at once joined Cromwell. At the same moment, Newcastle's advance against Hull released Sir Thomas Fairfax and his horse—of no service in a beleaguered town—and Cromwell was also joined in Lincolnshire by that already famous as modest soldier. It was now verging to the close of the fighting season of 1643. On the 9th of October the junction was effected at Boston, and on the 11th, the command being nominally Manchester's, but in reality Cromwell's, the campaign began.

On marching against Hull, Lord Newcastle, in addition to strong garrisons left in Lincoln and Gainsborough, had committed the royal posts of the county to a brave and veteran officer, Sir John Henderson, who earnestly desired and eagerly watched for an opportunity to measure swords with Cromwell. The opportunity occurred on the 12th, when, by a capital manœuvre, Henderson came up with Fairfax, Cromwell, and their cavalry at Waisby field, near Horncastle, while Manchester was yet with his infantry a long day's march in the rear, and threatened destruction to them with a force almost thrice as numerous as their own. Cromwell paused for a moment, drew up his men, and resolved to give battle. "Come," said the gallant Fairfax, with inspiration scarcely second to his own, "let us fall on! I never prospered better than when I fought against the enemy three or four to one."*

Then was seen the secret of Cromwell's extraordinary influence over his determined Ironsides. In an instant he circulated through their ranks the watchword—TRUTH and PEACE—gave out a psalm, which the officers and men at once, as the Greek soldiers took up their song of freedom, uplifted with united voices, and then rushed, on Cromwell's word to charge in the name of the Most High, on the astonished enemy. A volley struck them in mid-charge, but did little execution: they clapped spurs to their horses with more furious zeal, and receiving another volley as they fell upon the advancing Royalist column, it struck down the horse of Cromwell. His rider was in fright-

Cromwell, he hath 2000 more brave men, well disciplined. No man swears but he pays his twelve pence; if he be drunk, he is set in the stocks, or worse; if one calls the other Roundhead, he is cashiered: insomuch that the countries where they come leap for joy of them, and come in and join with them. How happy were it if all the forces were thus disciplined. Some say that the Lord Gray and Sir John Gell will join with them: they could not do a better work than to go and relieve that thrice noble and valiant Lord Fairfax, whose condition in Leeds is such as it wants relief."—Spec. Pas., May 9-16, 1643.

* The Scottish Dove, Oct. 13-20, 1643. The same journal closes its account thus: "There were slain in the pursuit (which was full six miles) about 600; and many drowned in the chase: 114 were found dead in the water and mires the next day: there was also about 700 or 800 taken prisoners, and 18 colours at the least; these were brought in the first night; also their wagons: many more colours, it is like, were lost in the chase; the horse and arms that were taken were more than the men doubled."

ful danger for a while, and as he rose from the ground was again struck down by the hand (as it was thought) of Sir Ingram Hopton. For some moments he lay unconscious among the slain. Again recovering, he seized a "sorry horse" from one of his troopers, and joined the hand to hand mêlée with terrible fierceness. The Royalists, broken, astonished, and dismayed, had never recovered the first shock. They now gave way in all directions, and did not stop their flight till, after suffering terrible slaughter, they had reached the gates of Lincoln.*

This engagement had a striking effect. It closed the disastrous campaign of 1643 with a gleam of brightest hope for the Parliamentary cause. It so startled Charles that he is reported to have exclaimed to his friends, "I would that some would do me the good fortune to bring Cromwell to me, alive or dead!" It moved Newcastle from his position, for, as soon as he heard of it, having also, just before, suffered from a gallant sortie out of Hull, conducted by Fairfax's father, he raised the siege and disposed his forces into winter-quarters.

Not so Cromwell and Manchester. They had yet some work to do. Castles and fortified towns were taken by them, money raised, Royalists kept in check, garrisons strengthened, and the entire borders of the eastern association placed in a state of security. Not till all this had been completely done, and the increasing severity of the weather left no opportunity for such exertions farther, were their forces disposed for the winter.

Yet not even this put a stop, however temporary, to the exertions of Cromwell. Under a commission from the Parliament, he was appointed lieutenant-governor of the Isle of Ely ("with the like power of levying money there for his forces as the Earl of Manchester had in the associated counties"), and he chiefly employed the winter in raising funds, by means allowable or otherwise, from the colleges in Cambridge and the cathedrals of Peterborough† and Ely, for the purposes of the ensuing campaign.

* Ludlow's account will be found to bear out this description. "At the words 'Truth and Peace,' Cromwell's 'thirty-seven troops of horse and dragoons,' he observes, 'himself at their head, advanced, singing psalms; reserving their charge, however, until Sir John Henderson's 'eighty-seven,' who were seen coming down upon them, had fired; for these latter," says Ludlow, "hearing that Col. Cromwell was drawn out with the horse, made haste to engage him before the foot could march up."

† The Royalist Mercurius Aulicus tells us that in "Cambridge the Lord Grey of Warke and Master Cromwell did the last week deal very earnestly with the heads of colleges to lend £6000 for the public use, and that the motion not being hearkened to, they kept them all in custody till midnight, except Dr. Brownrigg, the bishop of Exeter, and Dr. Love; that the said heads being advised to assemble the next day about it, and refusing to do so, were called to the Lord Grey's lodging, and being asked the reason of their refusal, made answer by the Bishop of Exeter, whom they had chosen for their speaker, that they had before consulted the whole University, who had resolved that they could not comply with their desires in that particular, as being directly against their consciences; that Cromwell, when he found them stick to their resolution, said to a friend of his who was then in the place, they would have been content with a £1000 or less for the present turn; not that so little money could have done them good, but that the people might have thought that one of the two universities had been on their side. And it was also certified, that when they failed to get money by that means, in a fair and voluntary way, they took by violence from the bursars of diverse colleges such moneys as were already brought in unto them, and from the tenants of such colleges as dwelt near at hand,

His exertions in Cambridge, however, had another and more important object in addition to this. The tendencies of both universities, it is almost needless to say, were of the strongest possible kind towards the cause of Charles, since the cause of the Church was supposed to be identified with his person. Their means of disseminating those opinions were also great, and their influence, in proportion, of a kind and degree which it was most necessary, if possible, to reduce. Oxford was in the power of the Royalists, and therefore out of the question, but Cambridge was happily in that part of the kingdom where the military strength of the Parliament lay. Cromwell accordingly, to prepare the way for the changes contemplated, garrisoned the town, and when, some short time after, Manchester visited the University with the Parliament's commission for effecting its reform, Cromwell was his chief adviser and agent in all that was done. Matters had changed a little now since the wild days of his studentship there!

The reform may be briefly described. It began by a recognition and confirmation of the foundation and revenues of the University, in the shape of an order issued by the two Houses, and declaring that—whereas doubts had been suggested, upon the ordinance for the sequestration of the estates of delinquents, whether the estates of the different bodies in that University came within the operation of the ordinance—the meaning of Parliament was, that these estates and revenues should be in no wise sequestrable, but that the sequestration should fall merely upon the individual who had been pronounced delinquent, and that no longer than during the time that he would otherwise have received or enjoyed those revenues. Another ordinance was then passed, empowering the Earl of Manchester to appoint committees, who were entitled to call before them all provosts, masters, fellows, and students of the University, and to hear complaints against such as were scandalous in their lives, ill affected to the Parliament, fomenters of the present unnatural war, or who had deserted the ordinary places of their residence, and to examine witnesses in support of these complaints. The committees were to make their report to the sergeant-major-general, who had power to eject such as he should judge unfit for their offices, and to put in their places persons whom he should nominate, and who should be approved by the Assembly of Divines sitting at Westminster.

Accordingly, immediately on Manchester's arrival, he issued his warrants to the different colleges and halls in the University forthwith to send to him their statutes, with the names such moneys as they had in readiness to pay their rents; and well we know what they were counted in the former times, when law and justice were in fashion, who, when a man refused to deliver his purse, used to take it from him. . . . It was advertised," says a subsequent number of the journal quoted above, "this day from Peterborough that Colonel Cromwell had bestowed a visit upon that little city, and put them to the charge of his entertainment, plundering a great part thereof to discharge the reckoning: and further, that in pursuance of the thorough reformation, he did most miserably deface the Cathedral Church, break down the organs, and destroy the glass windows, committing many outrages on the house of God, which were not acted by the Goths in the sack of Rome, and are most commonly forborne by the Turks when they possess themselves by force of a Christian city."

of their members, and to certify to him who were present and who absent, with the express time of their discontinuance. Two days later, he sent to the officers of the different colleges, requiring them to appear before him within a certain limited time, to answer such inquiries as he or his commissioners might judge fit to make. Three days after this stipulated period the great reform took place, and is thus described by Mr. Godwin: "The number of the colleges was sixteen, and of these, the heads of six were allowed, and gave their consent, to retain their former stations. Ten new heads of colleges were appointed, and these appear to have been selected with great propriety and judgment. Two of them were Benjamin Whichcote and Ralph Cudworth, men of unquestionable literary eminence, but particularly the latter, qualified to do honour to any seminary for education in the world. Another was Thomas Young, the preceptor and friend of Milton. The remainder, though their names are not so familiar to our ears, were men of great learning, high respectability, and unblemished life. A few days later, sixty-five fellows were ejected from the different colleges, and their places filled by others, nominated by Manchester, and approved by the Assembly of Divines. The ordinance of Parliament empowered the sergeant-major-general to dispose of a fifth part of all the estates or revenues he should sequester for the benefit of the relatives of the persons ejected."

The tremendous campaign of 1644 now began. On the 19th of January, 1644, 20,000 Scotchmen, for the most part veteran soldiers and under the guidance of experienced officers, crossed the Tweed to co-operate with the Parliamentary forces. Such was the opportune fruit borne by that solemn League and Covenant which the genius of Vane had achieved.* Charles, meanwhile, had made truce with the rebels† in Ireland, and thousands at this time joining the royal standard from that ill-fated country, enlarged and exasperated the now incurable and deadly division between Charles and his more determined subjects.

The forces of the Parliament were at the opening of this campaign distributed in four great divisions. Essex and Waller had each 10,000 men for the midland counties and the west: under Manchester and Cromwell (who now held the superior commission of lieutenant-general), 14,000 men, chiefly of Cromwell's invincible model, were enrolled for the associated counties of the east; and Fairfax and his father were ordered to co-operate with the Scots.

* See Life of Vane, p. 263-286.

† Mr. Godwin has selected, from Wood, an anecdote of the king singularly illustrative of his feelings on the subject of Ireland. It appears that a manuscript copy was found, after the battle of Naseby, of Sir Edward Walker's Discourses of the events of the civil war, in which, among several corrections in the king's own handwriting, it was observed that in one place, where the writer had occasion to speak of these insurgents, and had styled them "rebels," the king had drawn his pen through the word "rebels," and had substituted the term "Irish" in its stead. In reality, Charles felt an unconquerable repugnance to the classing the Catholics of Ireland with the men who in England and Scotland had sought to curtail his prerogatives. The Catholics, however he might disapprove of much of their conduct, he still regarded as his friends, and still expected (which was realized at last) that they would furnish an army to support his claims against his rebel subjects in England.

Charles, on the other hand, held a force of 10,000 at Oxford, and in the north, under Newcastle, a force of 14,000. Ireland poured him forth auxiliaries also as from an inexhaustible hive, and in various quarters of the land garrisons and flying bands supplied him at his need. With the obstinate weakness of his character, however, while the rising genius of such men as Cromwell and Fairfax threatened an opposition in which even numbers should be as nothing, he named for his commander-in-chief, in the teeth of much remonstrance, Ruthven, a Scot, now created Earl of Brentford, of whom Lord Clarendon says, "he was much decayed in his parts, which had never been vigorous, being now dozed with the custom of immoderate drinking. He was illiterate to the greatest degree that can be imagined, and very deaf; a man of few words, but who usually delivered that as his opinion which he foresaw would be grateful to the king." Herein was the secret of his appointment.

Fairfax made the first movement of the campaign in marching from Lincolnshire, through the depths of a terrible winter, against Lord Byron, who, with an army of Irish, was then besieging Nantwich in Cheshire. Here Byron was routed with severe loss; of the 3000 foot he commanded, only 1000 having escaped death or capture. Fairfax was deficient in horse, and thereby the enemy's horse escaped. The notorious George Monk was taken prisoner in this action, and after some imprisonment in the Tower, entered the Parliament's service, became an active and influential general, and in the end the vile and appropriate instrument of the Restoration.

Answering the orders of the Parliament, Fairfax now marched back to Yorkshire, joined his father Lord Fairfax, with whom he defeated at Selby the Royalist governor of York, Colonel Bellasis, who had striven to interpose between the junction, and, once more master of the midland Yorkshire districts, prepared to march to the relief of the army of the Covenant. The latter, under the command of Lord Levan, were at this time much distressed in Northumberland by the force of the Marquis of Newcastle; they had crossed the Tyne, vainly threatened the town of Newcastle, and, as much harassed by want of provisions and forage as by the enemy's constant skirmishes and the weather, continued in face of the marquis's army without venturing to advance against him.

At this critical moment, when some resolution on the part of the Royalist chief might have put a sudden and premature period to our old friends of the Covenant, Fairfax's victory at Selby created a panic at York, and the Marquis of Newcastle, at the earnest entreaty of his friends in that city (now so fearfully exposed), fell back on York, and opened for his enemies their most desired position. Fairfax and Leven met with their forces at Wetherby on the 20th of April, and at once proceeded to invest York, into which the marquis had retired with his Cavaliers. And now, by a most opportune movement, Manchester and Cromwell (young Vane at this time travelled with them) joined their splendid forces to those of the besiegers, broke off at once an armistice into which Newcastle, seriously alarmed for his safety, had contrived to inveigle Fairfax, and pushed their combined batteries against York with all necessary vigour. The attack of a town in those days, however, was not the matter of science it has since become; the forces, combined as they were, were yet insufficient for any regular investment of such a wide extent of walls divided by a river; and the siege of York was nothing more than an irregular blockade, diversified with furious sorties, and now and then some desperate assaults on the outworks.

Meanwhile the movements of the midland and western forces claim our attention. Essex and Waller, with their 20,000 men, had marched against Charles in two divisions, with the intention of shutting him up in Oxford. His situation became even more critical than that of Newcastle at York. The Isis was crossed by Waller, the Charwell by Essex, and the two armies seemed to hold in the forces of Charles, to be driven at will within the walls of the city.

In this extremity it was that one of the very ablest manœuvres of the whole war was accomplished by this unfortunate prince. A body of foot, with cannon, was ordered out to the south entrance of the city, as if for Abingdon, for the purpose of drawing Waller's attention on that side; and then the king, with all the cavalry, and 2500 chosen foot, quitted Oxford in silence at the north gate as soon as night set in on the 3d of June, and, marching between the two armies of the enemy, arrived at Hanborough by daybreak of the 4th, and in the afternoon halted for a short time at Burford. By quick and secret marches thus he arrived at Worcester, and from Worcester at Bewdley.

While at Tickenhall (then called Ticknill), near Bewdley, news reached him from York of the dangerous position of the Marquis of Newcastle, who had written that he could not hold out more than six weeks or two months without being relieved. The fate of the city and its besieged then at once struck Charles to be the imminent crisis of his cause, since, supposing York surrendered, or the army of Newcastle were beaten or dispersed, Essex and Waller, already strong enough for him in the south and west, would become altogether irresistible by the accession of the northern armies. Flinging aside, therefore, his first project of effecting an ultimate and speedy junction in the south with Rupert (whose impetuosity had just effected some daring successes and diversions in Cheshire and Lancashire), and thus, at least, securing the probable safety of the midland counties, he at once sat down and wrote the following letter (dated Ticknill, 14 June, 1644) to his nephew. I copy it from the original, among the papers with which the kindness of Lord Nugent has intrusted me.* The writing is shaken and unsteady. The hand of the writer, almost always unusually firm and beautiful, had been unable to hold its precision in that anxious and fatiguing moment. The letter presents a singular contrast in this respect to a short note to Rupert in the same collection, written from Newport, with extreme beauty and most exquisite firmness, within a few months of his execution.*

"NEPHEW,—First I must congratulate with you for your good successes, assuring you that the things themselves are now more welcome to me than that you are the means: I know the importance of the supplying you with powder, for which I have taken all possible ways, having sent both to Ireland & Bristow; as from Oxford, this bearer is well satisfied that it is impossible to have at present; but if he tell you that I may spare them from hence, I leave you to judge, having but 36 left; but what I can get from Bristow (of which there is not much certainty, it being threatened to be besieged) you shall have. . . . But now I must give you the true stat of my affaires, which, if their condition be such as enforces me to give you more peremptorie commands than I would willingly doe, you must not take it ill. If Yorke be lost, I shall esteeme my Crowne little lesse, unless supported by your suddaine Marche to me, & a Miraculous Conquest in the South, before the effects of the Northern power can be found heere; but if Yorke be relived, & you beate the Rebelles Armies of bothe Kingdomes which are before it, then, but otherwaies not, I may possibly make a shift (upon the defensive) to spin out tyme untill you come to assist me: Wherefor I command & conjure you, by the dewty & affection which I know you beare me, that (all new enterpryses laide asyde) you immediately march (according to your first intention) with all your force to the reliefe of Yorke; but if that be eather lost, or have fried themselves from the beseigers, or that, for want of powder, you cannot undertake that worke, that you immediately march, with your whole strenth, directly to Woster, to assist me & my Army, without which, or your having relived Yorke by beating the Scots, all the Successes you can afterwards have most infallibly will be uselesse unto me. You may believe that nothing but an extreame necessity could make me wryte thus unto you; wherfor, in this case, I can no wayes dout of your punctuall compliance with your loving Oncle & most faithful frend, CHARLES R. . . . I commanded this bearer to speake to you concerning Vavisor."

This letter, no doubt, completely vindicates Rupert in the course he adopted on receiving it, though it does not excuse his haughty pride in concealing the fact of his having received such a letter.* But I am anticipating. When

* The mere style and manner of writing to his nephew in this note is also very touching. It is written on small note paper, and looks as if it had undergone much trouble and many adventures before it reached its destination:

"Newport, Saturday: 28 of Oct., 1648. DEAREST NEPHEW,—For want of a cypher, I have chosen this most trusty messenger, Will. Lysle, to acquaint you with a business which is of great importance for my service; for which I have commanded him to desyre, in my name, both your advice & assistance; of which knowing your affection to me, I am soe confident, that I will say no more, but only to desyre you to give full credit to this bearer; & to give him a quick dispatch for his sake who is your loving Oncle and most faithful friend, CHARLES R."

† In the absence of this evidence of his own complete exculpation, he has been made the subject of attack by almost every Royalist historian, for the unfortunate result of Marston Moor. Clarendon thus alludes to him and Newcastle: "The times afterward grew so bad, and the king's affairs succeeded so ill, that there was no opportunity to call either of those two great persons to account for what they had done or what they had left undone. Nor did either of them ever think fit to make any particular relation of the ground of their proceeding, or the causes of their misadventures."

* It was, however, in a slightly incorrect state, printed from some copy taken at the time (and preserved among Sir Edward Nicholas's manuscripts) in the Evelyn Memoirs a few years ago.

his uncle's commands reached him, he made at once for York. Some time before, he had relieved Newark, taken Stockport, Bolton, and Liverpool, and raised the siege of Latham House, after its gallant defence by the famous Countess of Derby. He was therefore moved with the elation of a victor, added to his natural rashness. He took with him some newly-arrived Irish regiments, picked up Newcastle's cavalry by the way, captured several posts as he went along, and penetrated into Yorkshire.

During the progress of this march the king was executing another admirable movement. Essex and Waller took for granted that his previous forced march must be for Liverpool to join Rupert, and therefore Waller threw himself at once between Charles and Shrewsbury to intercept his passage. Essex, in the mean time, having the greater ordnance and the heavier carriages, felt these quick marches to be too much for his men, and, setting out for the west, left Waller to harass Charles. This was the very object the king had sought to accomplish—the two armies were separated. He at once hastened back to Oxford by marches as quick as those of his masterly egress from it; and Waller, smarting with the additional deceit thus practised on him, again returned to the banks of the Charwell, and, somewhat hotly and indiscreetly offering battle there, was defeated with considerable loss.

Rupert was now within sight of York with an army of 20,000 men. The besiegers broke up on his approach, and after an attempt to intercept him, which was well conducted by Fairfax, but which Rupert evaded by fetching a masterly compass with his army, they withdrew to Hessey Moor. Here, in a council of war, a difference of opinion arose—the Scots were for retreating, the English for fighting—and by some considerations that do not appear, the council for retreat prevailed for a time (amid jealousies which already shook the confederacy to the centre, and warned Cromwell and Fairfax of what they had next to do!), and they fell back on Tadcaster.

A discussion as painful, but with results more fatal, was at the same instant going on within the walls of York. What the chivalrous and somewhat fantastic* marquis had dreaded, was now at hand. The young, rough, proud, by way of excuse to the king, or for their own vindication. Prince Rupert, only to his friends, and after the murder of the king, produced a letter in the king's own hand, which he received when he was upon his march from Lancashire towards York, in which his majesty said 'that his affairs were in so very ill a state, that it would not be enough, though his highness raised the siege from York, if he had not likewise beaten the Scotch army,' which he understood to amount to no less than a peremptory order to fight, 'upon what disadvantage soever,' and added, 'that the disadvantage was so great, the enemy being so much superior in number, it was no wonder he lost the day.' But as the king's letter would not bear that sense, so the greatest cause of the misfortune was the precipitate entering upon the battle as soon as the enemy drew off, and without consulting at all with the Marquis of Newcastle and his officers, who must needs know more of the enemy, and, consequently, how they were best to be dealt with, than his highness could do." The noble historian had evidently neither seen the letter in the text, nor been correctly informed of its contents.

* Somewhat fantastic in some things, certainly, but not deserving of Warburton's nickname, "the fantastic virtuoso on horseback." See what a lovely character his noble-hearted duchess (Charles Lamb's favourite!) left of him in one of her pleasant folios.

overbearing, fiery Rupert was in contact with the ceremonious, courteous, refined, and high-minded Newcastle; and a quarrel directly followed. Newcastle had wisely counselled delay; pointed out the advantage already gained by the prince's arrival alone; described the differences which he had reason to suspect already distracted the councils of the enemy, and the enormous benefit of merely leaving their dissensions to ripen; and closed with an earnest entreaty to Rupert, that, having thrown merely a fresh supply of men and provisions into York, he would at once march back to the king's assistance at Oxford. Rupert, in answer, pleaded orders from the king, which (being too haughty to produce them) Newcastle is supposed to have disbelieved; but, more strongly than on these orders, the prince stood out on his own conviction of the necessity of some daring achievement that should "disperse and annihilate" the enemy. Newcastle smiled in scorn, but submitted. Some of his friends implored him not to take part in the battle, since it seemed his command was taken from him; to which he answered that, happen what would, he would not shun fight, for he had no other ambition than to live and die a loyal subject.*

On Marston Moor the rival armies met. The Parliamentarians were in retreat on the Tadcaster Road, when a cloud of Rupert's horse threatened their rear. Orders ran along the line at once to countermand the march; the troops of the van were recalled, and a position taken up for battle as favourable as the time allowed. So many contradictory statements have been published of the memorable fight which followed, that it requires no little care to present it fairly and intelligibly to the reader.

Across a portion of the Parliamentary front ran a broad and deep drain. To the right the ground was broken, and intrenched, as it were, with natural fences and lanes, though far beyond the flank was the open moor. To the left the ground was entirely barren, unencumbered, and unprotected, terminating also in the moor. In the centre Lords Fairfax and Leven formed, with a reserve of horse for the second line of infantry: on either wing (an advantageous position, it will be at once observed) the cavalry was brought up and planted. Sir Thomas Fairfax held the right, Cromwell and Manchester the left.

Rupert gazed at a distance while these thick and dark masses were forming before him. His customary haste had far outstripped his own glittering thousands behind, but they now came rapidly up and formed at his command. At the drain he planted four infantry brigades, supporting them with Goring's horse against the enemy's left; he disposed with great skill large masses of troops against the right of the combined armies, and took up a position there with his own cavalry opposite the horse of Fairfax.

And now, on the 2d of July, 1644, gazing with silent and inveterate determination at each other, these 46,000 subjects of one king stood upon Marston Moor, eight miles from a city wherein every boom of the distant cannon would strike upon the inhabitants as the death-knell of a friend or brother. The lines of the

* The Life of Newcastle, p. 47.

Parliamentarians had begun to form as early as ten in the morning; the Royalist preparations were complete at five o'clock in the afternoon: it was now within a quarter of seven, yet there still stood those formidable armies, each awaiting from the other, with a silent and awful suspense, the signal of battle.

A stir was seen at last in the dark quarter of Manchester's and Cromwell's Independents, and a part of their infantry moved upon the drain. Secure from behind the ditch, Rupert's musketeers at once poured out upon this advancing column a heavy and murderous fire, and it was in vain the Parliamentarians attempted to form under the plunging batteries directed against them simultaneously from the rear. At that moment was seen the genius of Cromwell. With a passionate exclamation to his Ironsides, he ordered them to sweep round the ditch to their right, clear the broken ground, and fall in with himself upon the cavalry of the dissolute Goring. The movement occupied some time, and fearful slaughter was meanwhile suffered by Manchester's infantry; but, having once emerged, these inveterate Republicans stood, for an instant, to receive, like a rock, the onset of Goring's horse, and then, "like a rock tumbled from its basis by an earthquake," rolled back upon them. Nothing could withstand that astonishing charge. The Cavaliers who survived offered no farther resistance, but wheeled off to join the horse of Rupert. Cromwell and his men next struck the guns and sabred the artillerymen beside them, and then, with as much leisurely order as at parade, rode towards the drain. Every place was deserted as they advanced. One spot of ground only still held upon it, for an instant, the Marquis of Newcastle's unflinching regiment of old tenants and retainers, and was covered the instant after with an "unbroken line" of honourable dead. Their victory was complete, and the right wing of the Royalists irrecoverably broken.

Rupert and his cavalry had meanwhile obtained as great a victory on the left. The encumbered ground on which Fairfax stood was most unfavourable to an advancing movement. Rupert accordingly stood keenly by till he saw the Parliamentary forces stagger under the heavy charges poured upon them as they emerged in narrow columns through ditches and lanes, and then, with his characteristic impetuosity, charged, overthrew, routed, and dispersed both foot and cavalry, with tremendous slaughter.

The after meeting of the two victors decided the day. While the centres were unsteadily engaged, Cromwell, who had held his triumphant Ironsides steadily in hand, and checked their pursuit in the very nick of time, ordered them suddenly to face round and wheel upon their centre to the left. Rupert had given a similar order to his conquering cavalry to wheel round on their centre to the right; and now, with a shock more terrible than any of this terrible day, these desperate leaders, each supposing himself the victor, dashed each in front of a victorious foe! Cromwell received a wound in the neck, and the alarm for his safety gave a slight appearance of momentary unsteadiness even to his gallant Ironsides; but they rallied with redoubled fury, and in conjunction with Lesly, an accomplished Scotch officer, who led up at the moment a brilliant attack, fairly swept Rupert off the field.*

It was now ten o'clock, and by the melancholy dusk which enveloped the moor might be seen

* This description is founded on a careful perusal of the various accounts of the time. I subjoin a few points in illustration or addition, from the gazettes of the day: "There was a great ditch between the enemy and us, which ran along the front of the battle, only between the Earl of Manchester's foot and the enemy there was a plain. In this ditch the enemy had placed four brigades of their best foot, which, upon the advance of our battle, were forced to give ground. The right wing of our foot had several misfortunes, for betwixt them and the enemy there was no passage but at a narrow lane, where they could not march above three or four in front; upon the one side of the lane was a ditch, and on the other a hedge, both whereof were lined with musketeers. notwithstanding Sir Thomas Fairfax charged gallantly, but the enemy keeping themselves in a body, and receiving them by threes and fours, as they marched out of the lane; and (by what mistake I know not) Sir Thomas Fairfax, his new-levied regiments being in the van, they wheeled about, and being hotly pursued by the enemy, came back upon the Lord Fairfax's foot and the reserve of the Scottish foot, broke them wholly, and trod the most part of them under foot. . . . Lieut.-gen. Cromwell charged Prince Rupert's horse with exceeding great resolution, and maintained his charge with no less valour. Gen.-major Lesly charged the Earl of Newcastle's brigade of White Coats, and cut them wholly off, forty excepted, who were taken prisoners; and after them charged a brigade of Green Coats, whereof they cut off a great number, and put the rest to the rout; which service being performed, he charged the enemy's horse (with whom Lieut.-general Cromwell was engaged) upon the flank, and in a very short space the enemy's whole cavalry was routed, on whom our fore troops did execution to the walls of York, but our body of horse kept their ground. Lieut.-gen. Cromwell and Major-gen. Lesly being joined, and receiving advertisement that our foot were engaged with the enemy's horse and foot, marched to their assistance, and met with the enemy's horse (being retreated upon the repulse they had from the Scottish foot) at the same place of disadvantage where they had routed our horse formerly; and, indeed, their success was answerable, if not much worse, for we routed them wholly, killed and took their chief officers, and most part of their standards. After which we set upon the rear of their foot, and with the assistance of our main battle, which all this time stood firm, we put them wholly to the rout, killed many, and took their officers and colours, and by this time we had no enemy in the field. We took all their ordnance, being in number 25, near 130 barrels of powder, besides what was blown up by the common soldiers, above a hundred colours, and 10,000 arms, besides two wagons of carabines and pistols of spare arms. There were killed upon the place 3000, whereof, upon a judicious view of the dead bodies, two parts appeared to be gentlemen and officers. There were 1500 prisoners taken. whereof Sir Charles Lucas, lieut.-gen. of the Earl of Newcastle's horse, Major-gen. Porter, and Major-gen. Tillier, besides divers colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors. The loss upon our part, blessed be God, is not great, being only one lieutenant-colonel, some few captains, and not 300 common soldiers."—(M. v. Brit., 8 July, 1644.) . . . "The battle being begun, at the first some of our horse were put into disorder, but rallying again, we fell on with our whole body, killed and took their chief officers, and took most part of their standards and colours, 25 pieces of ordnance, near 130 barrels of powder, 10,000 arms, two wagons of carabines and pistols, killed 3000, and 1500 prisoners taken."—(Perf. Diar., 9 July, 1644.) . . . "It will not be amiss, therefore, to insert something which came not before now to our knowledge, which is, that there were slain of the enemy's side the Lord Carew, son to the Earl of Monmouth, Sir William Lampton, Davenant the poet, and many others also; that the councils of the prince and others designed the most valiant of the popish party to encounter the wing commanded by Lieut.-gen. Cromwell; and, in particular, Prince Rupert had designed certain troops of horse, all Irish and all papists, to give the first charge to that brigade or party in which Col. Cromwell was; and that they did confidently believe there was not a man of them but would die rather than fly; but they missed their expectations, for many of them being slain in the place, the rest fled."—(Parl. Scout, 18 July, 1644.) . . . "Col. Cromwell finding the passages strait, and musketeers lining the hedges, thought it not fit to advance any farther after the prince, but is returned to York with his horse, not worn to skin and bone, but only breathed a little."—(Parl. Scout, 19 July, 1644.)

a fearful sight. Five thousand dead bodies of Englishmen lay heaped upon that fatal ground. The distinctions which separated in life these sons of a common country seemed trifling now! The plumed helmet embraced the strong steel cap as they rolled on the heath together, and the loose love-lock of the careless Cavalier lay drenched in the dark blood of the enthusiastic Republican.

But it is not with such thoughts the victors trouble themselves now. They have achieved the greatest conquest of the war, and the whole of the northern counties of England are open to the Parliament's sway. The headstrong Rupert has received a memorable lesson, and retreats in calamity and disgrace towards Chester. The Marquis of Newcastle, weary of a strife never suited to his taste, but hateful to him now, crosses the sea an exile.* Fifteen hundred prisoners remain with Manchester, Fairfax, Leven, and Cromwell; the valuable ordnance of the vanquished; artillery, small arms, tents, baggage, and military chest, all has been left in their victorious hands.

Nearly half of his entire kingdom was now hopelessly lost to Charles I. Was it possible he should ever be able to recover it? The question was one which no doubt rose again and again in the breast of Cromwell, as he lay in his tent the night after this memorable battle. By one of two means he might recover

* He remained abroad till the Restoration. I subjoin portions of Clarendon's character of him, which, if not fair in all things, is in all things graphic and amusing: "It was a greater wonder that he sustained the vexation and fatigue of war so long, than that he broke from it with so little circumspection: He was a very fine gentleman, active and full of courage, and most accomplished in those qualities of horsemanship, dancing, and fencing, which accompany a good breeding, in which his delight was. Besides that, he was amorous in poetry and music, in which he indulged the greatest part of his time; and nothing could have tempted him out of those paths of pleasure which he enjoyed in a full and ample fortune, but honour and ambition to serve the king when he saw him in distress, and abandoned by most of those who were in the highest degree obliged to him and by him. He loved monarchy, as it was the foundation and support of his own greatness; and the Church, as it was well constituted for the splendour and security of the crown; and religion, as it cherished and maintained that order and obedience that was necessary to both; without any other passion for the particular opinions which were grown up in it, and distinguished it into parties, than as he detested whatsoever was like to disturb the public peace. He had a particular reverence for the person of the king, and the more extraordinary devotion for that of the prince, as he had had the honour to be trusted with his education as his governor. . . . He liked the pomp and absolute authority of a general well, and preserved the dignity of it to the full; and for the discharge of the outward state, and circumstances of it, in acts of courtesy, affability, bounty, and generosity, he abounded; which in the infancy of a war became him, and made him, for some time, very acceptable to men of all conditions. But the substantial part, and fatigue of a general, he did not in any degree understand (being utterly unacquainted with war), nor could submit to it, but referred all matters of that nature to the discretion of his lieutenant-general, King, who, no doubt, was an officer of great experience and ability, yet, being a Scotchman, was in that conjuncture upon more disadvantage than he would have been if the general himself had been more intent upon his command. In all actions of the field he was still present, and never absent in any battle; in all which he gave instances of an invincible courage and fearlessness in danger; in which the exposing himself notoriously did sometimes change the fortune of the day, when his troops began to give ground. Such articles of action were no sooner over, than he retired to his delightful company, music, or his softer pleasures, to all which he was so indulgent, and to his ease, that he would not be interrupted upon what occasion soever, inasmuch as he sometimes denied admission to the chiefest officers of the army, even to General King himself, for two days together, from whence many inconveniences fell out."

all. The succession of necessary victories to achieve it by force could hardly be hoped for; but there was such a thing as treachery; such a thing as success afraid of the slight shadow it cast before its mighty shape; such a thing as imbecility, worse than treachery—as bigotry, worse than all; and unless these vile forces could be conquered, of what avail had been all other victories—of what avail would be all the sufferings, and sacrifices, and triumphs yet to come? No doubt these thoughts, far more than the fatigues and anxieties of the day, or the wound he had received in the last decisive charge, made that night a sleepless night for Cromwell.

The wound, however, was certainly slight, since it neither prevented his second rally for the final charge, nor withheld him from discharging a sacred office of friendship to one of his brothers-in-law, by communicating, in the following letter (dated July 5, 1644), the melancholy tidings of a son's death. How well it is adapted to its purpose! The exaltation of the victory which opens the letter, and which, in those days of public enthusiasm, might possibly assist in alleviating even such a private sorrow—then the affectionate praise of the dead, which so tenderly embalms his memory. It is strange that such letters as these have not before enriched the records of Cromwell's character or history.

"DEERE SIR,—It's our duty to sympathize in all mercies; that wee praise the Lorde together, in Chastisements or Tryalls, that soe wee may sorrowe together. Truly England, and the Church of God, hath had a great favour from the Lorde in this great Victorie given unto us, such as the like never was since this War begunn. It had all the evidences of an absolute Victorie obtained by the Lord's blessing upon the Godly partie principally. Wee never charged but wee routed the enimie. The lefte Wing which I commanded, being our owne horse, saving a few Scottes in our reere, beat all the Prince's Horse. God made them as stubble to our Swords. Wee charged their regiments of foote with our horse, and routed all wee charged. The particulars I cannot relate now; butt I believe of twenty thousand, the Prince hath not four thousand left. Give Glory, all the Glory to God. . . . Sir, God hath taken away your eldest Sonn by a Cannon Shott. It brake his legge. Wee were necessitated to have it cutt off, whereof he died. . . . Sir, you knowe my tryalls this way, butt the Lorde supported me with this, that the Lorde tooke him into the happiness wee all pant after and live for. There is your precious Child, full of Glory, to knowe sinn nor sorrow any more. He was a gallant younge man, exceedinge gracious. God give you his comfort. Before his death he was soe full of comfort, that to Frank Russell and myselfe he could not expresse it,—it was soe great above his paine. This he said to us. Indeed it was admirable. A little after he said, one thinge lay upon his spirit; I asked him what that was; he told me that it was that God had not suffered him to be noe more the executioner of his Enimies. At this fall, his horse beinge killed with the bullet, and, as I am informed, three horses more, I am told he bid them open to the right and left, that he might see the rogues run. Truly he was exceedingly beloved in the Army of all that knew him. Butt few knew him; for he was a precious young man, fitt for God. You have cause to blesse the Lord. He is a glorious Sainct in Heaven, wherein you ought exceedingly to rejoyce. Lett this drinke up your sorrowe. Seeing theise are not fayned words to comfort you; butt the thinge is soe real and undoubted a truth. You may doe all thinges by the strength of Christ. Seeke that, and you shall easily beare your tryall. Lett this publike mercy to the Church of God make you to forgett your private sorrowe. The Lord be your strength; soe prayes Your truly faythfull and Lovinge Brother, OLIVER CROMWELL. My love to your daughter and my Cozen Perceval, sister Desbrowe, and all friends with you."

In the life of Vane, the rise of the Independents, as a great civil power in the state, has been minutely detailed. Its influence in the army is included in the simple fact that its simple, tolerant, and enlarged views of liberty were shared by Cromwell's troops. At this moment its disputes with the Presbyterians were rife in London. The services rendered by the army of Scots had strengthened the Presbyterian claims. The formidable mass of the Assembly of Divines seconded them with Laud-like zeal.* With appalling vehemence, a bigoted uniformity in Church government was pressed for, and a restriction of what was called the licentiousness of the press in its opening freedom of thought. In vain the immortal voice of Milton was heard in his famous "Areopagitica"—in vain, that is, so far as the assembly to which it was addressed moved to answer the appeal; but not in vain on at least one of the victors of Marston Moor.

Nor were the threatenings from London all that might be considered formidable. In the aristocratic leaders of the army itself, elements of danger existed more fearful still. They had already more than once shown an indisposition to look steadily in the face that triumphant result of the war which the Cromwells, Vanes, and Fairfaxes were now bent upon achieving; and in the tent of almost every officer pitched on that northern moor were jealousies, discussions, and heartburnings that, even in such an hour of present victory, augured a gloomy close. In the southern and western counties what was meanwhile the condition of affairs?

At Copredy Bridge, we have seen, Waller

* To recall the reader's attention to the crisis already described in Vane's Memoir, it may be only necessary to remind him that at this time the Presbyterians infinitely outnumbered their opponents in the Assembly: a great majority of the citizens of London were Presbyterian; and the party was now fearfully and formidably re-enforced by the general consent of the Scottish nation. The Scottish Parliament and General Assembly had entered into the recently concluded alliance, solely or principally from their devoted love to Presbyterianism. They had sent up their commissioners (the commissioners of the Scottish Parliament arrived on the 5th of February) to watch that the League should be executed in the strictest construction which their party put upon it, by establishing an entire uniformity of church government. A Scots army of more than twenty thousand men had entered England in the commencement of the year; and one of the Scottish divines sent up on the occasion very frankly acknowledged, "We purpose not to meddle in haste with a point of so high consequence, till it please God to advance our army, which we expect will much assist our arguments."—Godwin's Commonwealth.

had sustained defeat by Charles, who afterwards, pursuing his successes, turned upon Essex, and, by a series of masterly military manœuvres, cooped him up in Cornwall. That well-intentioned but fretful general had, like a spoiled child, moved into the west in jealousy of Waller. The west was Charles's stronghold. The principle of this has been admirably explained by the Royalist historian, Walker, whose history had the honour to be corrected and interlined by the king. It is a principle which in some sort explains, too, the character of the war. "The gentry of this country," he remarks, "retain their old possessions, their old tenants, and expect from them their ancient reverence and obedience. And, give me leave to say, if many of the nobility and gentry of this unhappy kingdom had not fallen from the lustre, virtue, and honour of their ancestors, and by their luxury been necessitated to manumise their villains, but had paid that awful reverence to the majesty and greatness of their sovereign as they ought, they might have expected the same proportionably from their inferiors and tenants; and, instead of having them their companions, or, rather, masters (as they now are), they might have had them their servants; and then I believe this war, which, under pretence of religion and liberties, is to introduce heresy in doctrine, parity in conditions, and to destroy the king, nobility, and gentry, in probability had not been."

Essex, cooped up in the west, expected relief from Waller, but Waller felt no inclination to move to the relief of Essex. Such was the present condition of the Parliamentary army and its chiefs! The men, meanwhile, burning to fight, could neither fight nor escape. In this state of things, Charles wrote to Essex with his own hand, and told him that the season was now arrived when he had it in his power to redeem his country and the crown, and to confer the highest obligation on his king. He proposed a frank negotiation, and that they should join their two armies without delay. He concluded with engaging that "word of a king" he was fated to engage and break so often, that he would confer unequivocal marks of his esteem on both him and his army, and remain ever their faithful friend. Essex, without a moment's hesitation, rejected the offer. He was weak, but not a traitor. In a former day of triumph he had hesitated, but in his adversity he stood firm. He enclosed Charles's letter to the Parliament, and thus concluded his letter. "If succour comes not speedily, we shall be put to great extremity. If we were in a country where we could force the enemy to fight, it would be some comfort; but this place consists so much of passes, that he who can subsist longest must have the better of it; which is a great grief to me, who have the command of so many gallant men." No succour arrived; but some days after this letter, he managed, by a well-directed movement, to pass his horse between two divisions of the royal army; he himself then took sea for Plymouth; and his main army surrendered on condition of delivering up their arms, and of being passed to the ports of their nearest friends. Thus, as was remarked, "the king obtained what he stood extremely in need of;

and the Parliament, having preserved the men, lost what they could easily repair."

The Commons met their unsuccessful general, too, with their usual high-minded policy. They assured him that the Parliament's good affections to his person, and opinion of his fidelity and merit, were no wise lessened by this reverse, and that they resolved not to be wanting in their best endeavours for repairing the loss they had sustained, and placing such a force under his command as might best conduce to the successful termination of the war. To this end they actively moved accordingly. His army was reassembled in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth and Southampton. Waller was directed to co-operate with it, and the conquerors of Marston Moor were summoned to the same service.

York had surrendered, and Manchester, with Cromwell, at once obeyed this summons. The Scots army were in Northumberland, where the town of Newcastle subsequently surrendered. Manchester and Cromwell, Essex and Waller, marched against the king. Cromwell commanded the horse.

The royal position was a strong one—a formidable alignment in and about the town of Newbury, where Falkland had fallen the year before. To this spot the king, whose genius appears to have fitted him for such manœuvres in war, had conducted his march out of Cornwall with consummate skill, relieving by the way the garrisons of Basing House, Banbury, and Dennington Castle. The River Kennett protected him here on one flank, the guns of Dennington Castle covered him in some sort on the other, and his front was strengthened by throwing up a breastwork, and by occupying in force several villas and gardens "which extended conveniently beyond the town."* One house in especial, called Doleman's house, stood in good position, notwithstanding its being exposed to a raking fire on all sides, since it was a little in advance of the breastwork and of a row of lesser houses. This house was filled with troops; the gardens attached to it were strengthened by thick embankments; skirmishers swarmed among all the neighbouring hedges and ditches; artillery threatened from every mound about. But, with all these advantages, there was one assailable point, which none better than Cromwell knew how to seize. Within distance of a musket-shot in the enemy's front stood a fatal hill, behind which, secure and undiscovered, columns of attack had every facility to form. The open meadows, again, between the castle and the town, were sadly exposed, and the reserve, which should have supported the scattered infantry, was every way deficient.

The more serious fight began on the 27th of October. During the two previous days a smart cannonading had been kept up, from the hill on one side and the town on the other. Little effect, however, was produced, till towards the evening of the 26th, when the Royalists transported a couple of cannon across the river, and enfiladed the line of the Parliamentarians as far as a bend in the eminence exposed it, doing dreadful damage to Ludlow's regiment of cavalry. The night passed in awful uncertainty of the morrow. Then, on that morrow of the 27th, the genius of Cromwell poured down the fatal hill. Two heavy columns suddenly appeared upon its summit and descended, while along the whole line one tremendous cannonade distracted attention from the spot where the terrible blow was about to fall. The columns as suddenly divided; one fell upon the open space between Dennington and the town, and with the shattering speed of lightning pierced and routed the line of the Cavaliers, some of whom rushed within the works at Dennington, while the others fell back in precipitate confusion on the town. Cromwell and his Ironsides were here. The other column had paused an instant, but now apparently urged by that astonishing success to venture a desperate action, fell upon the quarter of Doleman's house. In an instant every spot around was covered with dead Republicans. Party after party cleared the hedges and ditches, even the garden wall, nay, to the very lawn of the house; but there—such as escaped so far—the deadly shot of the concealed musketeers struck them down. The contest lasted four hours in this quarter, and the loss was terrible. It would have been annihilation but for the heroic devotion of Ludlow's cavalry, who moved forward and consented to sacrifice themselves to cover the retrogression.

It was a moonlight night which followed, and anxious thoughts occupied both camps of the desperate strife that must decide the morrow. Suddenly the penetrating and sleepless eye of Cromwell saw the Royalists move. It was so. Charles, having utterly lost his left position, had despaired of the poor chance that remained to him in face of such a foe. His army were now busy, in that moonlight, conveying into the castle, by a circuitous route, their guns and heavy stores, while behind, battalion after battalion was noiselessly quitting its ground, and marching off as silently in the direction of Oxford. Over and over again Cromwell entreated Manchester to suffer him to execute a forward movement with his cavalry: at that critical moment he would have prostrated Charles. Manchester refused. A show was made next morning of pursuit, but of course without effect: Charles, with all his matériel and prisoners, had effected a clear escape. Nor was this all. While the castle of Dennington remained unmolested amid the dreadful dissensions which after this event raged through the Parliamentarian camp, the king, having been re-enforced by Rupert, and an excellent troop of horse, returned twelve days after, assumed the offensive in the face of his now inactive conquerors, carried off all his cannon and heavy stores from out of the castle, coolly and uninterruptedly fell back again, and marched unmolested into Oxford.

So disastrously closed that campaign in which the victory of Marston Moor had been won. The army of Essex and Manchester went into winter cantonments in and about Reading. Cromwell, bent upon resolute changes, repaired to London.

All was now lost, he clearly saw, without a rapidly decisive movement, and he sought

* See vol. i., p. 245, of Lives of Eminent Military Commanders in this series: a work I may be allowed to refer to as a very able one, since I have enjoyed the advantage of many of its suggestions.

counsel and co-operation from the genius of the younger Vane. His faith in the Earl of Manchester had been shaken before the affair of Dennington; even under the walls of York, the intrigues of an extremely paltry person, a Scot and Presbyterian of the name of Crawford, who had been passed from the Scotch host to a major-generalship in Manchester's army,* had been suffered to prevail against him. Manchester, though on the whole an amiable, generous, and honest man, was in truth a very weak one, and when he found himself on the eve of great results, such as stimulated a man like Cromwell only to deeds of greater daring, was struck with hesitation, fear, irresolution. Hence, in those moments, Crawford offered more agreeable advice than Cromwell, and the end had been, in short, to place even the wretched and fawning major-general in that position of confidence with Manchester which once belonged only to the great and gallant leader of the Ironsides.

But, secure in the hearts of those men no less than in their strength, Cromwell had now resolved to venture a decisive stroke against the Presbyterian councils and their favourers, no matter of what degree, in the Parliamentary army. He had, before the affair of Dennington, suddenly shown himself in London from York, and by a masterly piece of policy, already illustrated in the life of Vane, had, with the help of that statesman, moved and carried a vote in the House of Commons, that the Committee of Lords and Commons appointed to treat with the commissioners from Scotland, and the committee of the Assembly, should take into consideration the differences in opinion of the members of the Assembly in point of Church government, and endeavour a union if it were possible; and, in case that could not be done, that they should essay to find out some methods by which tender consciences, who could not in all things submit to the common rule which might be established, might be borne with, consistently with Scripture and the public peace, that so the proceedings of the Assembly might not be so much retarded. This was the first startling exhibition of the legislative influence of the Independents.

Cromwell and Vane were now in London together, devising the great scheme by which future victories should not be surrendered as soon as gotten, but made serviceable to some decisive end; by which the summer's triumph should become something more than the mere winter's story, and the lives of gallant men be no longer wasted in vain. They consulted, in a word, how best to rid the army of men who had shown a miserable unfitness for the posts they held; who had, besides, peculiar personal motives for checking its career at some point short of a final victory; and who, thinking liberty a good thing, could not forget that they had privileges of their own, and that monarchy had honours of its own, which were good things also.

Here, it is to be observed, the best friends of freedom had at this time perfect faith in Cromwell. Ireton bore him the most entire affection; young Ludlow looked up to him with implicit zeal and admiration; Marten laughed with him and loved him; Vane was to him as a brother. Yet on all these men not a breath of suspicion in the matter of political sincerity rests—not a stain. Fairfax, again, though a weak man, was the very soul of sincerity and honour; and the honesty of Milton was unimpeachable as his genius. By what means, then, shall we suppose that Cromwell deceived these men? for he deceived them all. Was he sincere now, and only tempted from sincerity in after years by the temptation of too large a power suddenly sprung up within his hands? or was he from the first a deliberate and grand impostor? The difficulty which a friend of the principles of freedom and just government (which throughout sincerely actuated such men as Vane) has to encounter in deciding on the character of Cromwell, is this—that up to the victories of Worcester and Dunbar, it would be difficult to say in what respect he had sinned against those very principles, of which, on the sudden, he then declared himself the most deliberate foe. Was he, in truth, that compound he seemed to be of profound policy, and of the most wild and undisciplined rashness? When he went down to Westminster to play the military tyrant over the Assembly which had given him power and assisted even him to greatness, did he really “not think to have done that?” Was his tyranny the deliberate plot of a life—the rash impulse of a repented hour, or the result of sincerely wild and ungovernable fancies, which had rendered him at last, in his own mind, a selected instrument of destiny?

A better opportunity than this to which we have arrived will probably not exist for offering some materials to the reader on which he may revolve these questions. We stand on the eve of the origin of Cromwell's greatness and influence as a politician, and to seek in any way to unfold intelligibly the means by which he henceforward trode steadily on to the Protectorate, it will be necessary to bring events together which, in the ordinary course of narrative, long years would separate, but the combination of which is yet most necessary to a right understanding of each or of all.

* The name of Crawford is rendered in some degree memorable from the circumstance of his being the true and original authority for fastening on Cromwell the imputation of cowardice! The accusation is given at large in Hollis's Memoirs, and turns on the assertion that Cromwell, with his body of horse, stood still without making any charge, while the battle of Marston Moor was deciding, and that, when they did advance, Cromwell was no longer among them!! The reader has seen, in a faithful account of the battle, what imputation could rest for this monstrous charge. It requires no other notice than a word of scorn. Why, Cromwell's enemies, Royalist and Republican, admit that his astonishing bravery won that battle! Warwick says that he and his Ironsides “mowed down” the enemy “like a meadow,” and Mrs. Hutchinson says in her account that the day had been “lost, but that Cromwell, with five thousand men which he commanded, routed Prince Rupert, restored the other routed Parliamentarians, and gained the most complete victory that had been obtained in the whole warre.” Very characteristic of Hollis, and the mean, poor nature of the man, is his notice of the matter. Observe how he seems to have delighted in the recital: “I have several times heard it from Crawford's own mouth, and I think I shall not be mistaken if I say Cromwell himself has heard it from him, for he once said it aloud in Westminster Hall, when Cromwell passed by him, with a design he might hear him.” A corporal or colonel of the name of Dalbier was Crawford's second. The matter is really scarcely worth laughing at. “How,” exclaims Horace Walpole, “how a judicatory in the Temple of Fame would laugh at such witnesses as Major general Crawford and a Colonel Dalbier! Cesar and Cromwell are not amenable to a commission of oyer and terminer.”

"What can be more extraordinary," says the poet Cowley, "than that a person of mean birth, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body, which have sometimes, or of mind, which have often, raised men to the highest dignities, should have the courage to attempt, and the happiness to succeed in, so improbable a design as the destruction of one of the most ancient and most solidly-founded monarchies upon earth; that he should have the power or boldness to put his prince and master to an open and infamous death; to banish that numerous and strongly-allied family; to do all this under the name and wages of a Parliament; to trample upon them, too, as he pleased, and spurn them out of doors when he grew weary of them; to raise up a new and unheard-of monster out of their ashes; to stifle that in the very infancy, and to set up himself above all things that ever were called sovereign in England; to oppress all his enemies by arms, and all his friends afterward by artifice; to serve all parties patiently for a while, and to command them victoriously at last; to overrun each corner of the three nations, and overcome with equal facility both the riches of the south and the poverty of the north; to be pleased and courted by all foreign princes, and adopted a brother to the gods of the earth; to call together Parliaments with a word of his pen, and scatter them again with the breath of his mouth; to be humbly and daily petitioned that he would please to be hired at the rate of two millions a year, to be the master of those that hired him before to be their servant; to have the estates and lives of three kingdoms as much at his disposal as was the little inheritance of his father, and to be as noble and liberal in the spending of them; and, lastly (for there is no end of all the particulars of his glory), to bequeath all these with one word to his posterity; to die with peace at home and triumph abroad; to be buried among kings, and with more than regal solemnity; and to leave a name behind him not to be extinguished but with the whole world, which, as it is not too little for his praises, so might have been too for his conquests, if the short line of his human life could have been stretched out to the extent of his immortal designs!"

This is magnificent, but most untrue. The very expression that he served all parties patiently for a while, implies that others, and not himself, laid the most solid foundations of his power. And this was true. What has accumulated round the memory of Cromwell such an image of vastness in the power he wielded, was not simply his own greatness, but the greatness of the men to whose victories of statesmanship he had succeeded. This should never be lost sight of. Cromwell was associated with a band of the most accomplished statesmen the world has known, and to swell those individual glories which were already, for one man, astonishing enough, he appropriated theirs. To say this, it will be alleged, is merely to transfer admiration or praise from one set of characteristics to another: true; but not less should that be done. We may possibly find some diminution in the quality of praise that is due.

The first great point in Cromwell's character and history dates back to Huntingdon and St. Ives. It was there, as we have seen, he began the organization of that wonderful body of men which was the glorious agent by which he asserted liberty, and the fatal instrument with which he inflicted her mortal wound. He made his soldiers moral and sober; he gave them the elevation of religion, and that nervous strength of mind which a knowledge of the value of freedom teaches; inspired by his lessons, they trampled on all thought of danger in the grander thought of liberty; and then—he created himself their despot. We have scarcely fairly grappled with Cromwell's greatness, before what seems to an honest and generous mind his meanness and his vice intrude themselves forcibly upon us.

In another passage of his "Vision," the poet Cowley thus speaks of Cromwell. "If craft be wisdom, and dissimulation wit (assisted both and improved with hypocrisies and perjuries), I must not deny him to have been singular in both; but so gross was the manner in which he made use of them, that as wise men ought not to have believed him at first, so no man was fool enough to believe him at last; neither did any man seem to do it, but those who thought they gained as much by that dissembling as he did by his. His very actings of godliness grew at last as ridiculous, as if a player, by putting on a gown, should think he represented excellently a woman, though his beard at the same time were seen by all the spectators. If you ask me why they did not hiss, and explode him off the stage, I can only answer, that they durst not do so, because the actors and doorkeepers were too strong for the company. I must confess that by these arts (how grossly soever managed, as by hypocritical praying and silly preaching, by unmanly tears and whinings, by falsehoods and perjuries even diabolical) he had at first the good fortune (as men call it, that is, the ill fortune) to attain his ends, but it was because his ends were so unreasonable that no human wisdom could foresee them, which made them who had to do with him believe that he was rather a well-meaning and deluded bigot than a crafty and malicious impostor."

Cowley's division of the men whom Cromwell deceived into two classes is a striking and important consideration. There were men, he says, who suffered themselves to be deceived by him in his latter years, because the deceit at the same time answered their own ends; and there were "wise men," whom he deceived in earlier life, because of their utter ignorance of his objects, and their then belief in his sincerity. The consideration of the craft and dissimulation charged upon him will therefore imply, in relation to this passage, the other and equally important consideration of the possibility of his having been, in many cases of the latter sort of men, really and sincerely himself the victim of the delusion he practised upon them. For the first-named class of dupes, they may be surrendered, without scruple, to whatever imputations rest upon them.

The first thing to be noted in Cromwell as a striking aid towards the belief of his sincerity, was a certain extraordinary fluxional faculty of tears with which his constitution was happily endowed. "Had not his highness," says the author of the terrible pamphlet entitled "Killing no Murder," "had a faculty to be fluent in his tears and eloquent in his execrations; had he not had spongie eyes and a supple conscience; and besides, to do with people of great faith, but little wit, his courage and the rest of his moral virtues, with the help of his janizaries, had never been able so far to advance him out of the reach of justice that we should have need to call for any other hand to remove him but that of the hangman. . . . He hath found, indeed, that in godliness there is great gain; and that preaching and praying, well managed, will obtain other kingdoms as well as that of heaven. His, indeed, have been pious arms; for he hath conquered most by those of the Church—by prayers and tears. But the truth is, were it not for our honour to be governed by one that can manage both the spiritual and temporal sword, and, Roman like, to have our emperor our high priest, we might have had preaching at a much cheaper rate, and it would have cost us but our tithes, which now costs us all."

One scene will be perhaps enough to show this faculty in action. Bishop Burnet relates it on the authority of Sir Harbottle Grimston. It dates at the time of the purge, when he first showed that disregard of the representative privileges which was only excusable in consideration of the quasi rebellion into which the Presbyterians had cast the kingdom; a consideration satisfactory even to Ludlow and Ireton, and which prevented the opposition, though it did not secure the co-operation, of Vane. "When," says Burnet, "the House of Commons and the army were quarrelling, at a meeting of the officers it was proposed to purge the army better, that they might know whom to depend on. Cromwell upon that said, he was sure of the army; but there was another body that had more need of purging (naming the House of Commons), and he thought the army only could do that. Two officers that were present brought an account of this to Grimston, who carried them with him to the lobby of the House of Commons, they being resolved to justify it to the House. There was another debate then on foot; but Grimston diverted it, and said he had a matter of privilege of the highest sort to lay before them: it was about the being and freedom of the House. So he charged Cromwell with the design of putting a force on the House. He had his witnesses at the door, and desired they might be examined. They were brought to the bar, and justified all that they had said to him, and gave a full relation of all that had passed at their meetings. When they withdrew, Cromwell fell down on his knees, and made a solemn prayer to God, attesting his innocence, and his zeal for the service of the House: he submitted himself to the providence of God, who, it seems, thought fit to exercise him with calumny and slander, but he submitted his cause to him. This he did with great vehemence and with many tears. After this strange and bold preamble, he made so long a speech, justifying both himself and the rest of the officers, except a few that seemed inclined to return back to Egypt, that he wearied out the House, and wrought so much on his party, that what the witnesses had said was so little believed, that, had it been moved, Grimston thought that both he [Grimston] and they would have been sent to the Tower. But whether their guilt made them modest, or that they had no mind to have the matter much talked of, they let it fall, and there was no strength in the other side to carry it farther. To complete the scene, as soon as ever Cromwell got out of the House, he resolved to trust himself no more among them, but went to the army, and in a few days he brought them up, and forced a great many from the House." It is strange that such a scene as this should have occurred and left no trace of itself on the journals of the House. It is yet borne out by other events of that period.

This, indeed, is the time from which the extraordinary powers of duplicity in the man were gradually developed, and it is surprising that the means he must have declared with so little scruple to his Republican friends should not have put them on their guard more clearly as to the character, or, at least, possible tendency of his individual designs. But we are to take into consideration, at the same time, that the contest then going on between the Presbyterians and Independents was a matter of life and death, and that the struggle for existence is a question which, during its progress, is apt to exclude every other. Certain it is that there was Cromwell, at this period in the confidence of men the most sincere, acting with an insincerity as desperate as it was subtle; now in the country with the agitators of the army, whose rise and objects have been described in my last volume; now at Westminster on the benches of the House of Commons, he played off with unceasing and wonderful dexterity the power and claims of the one against the influence and position of the other. There is a passage in Hollis's Memoirs which gives us a lively idea of the rapidity of movement required in such a game. The first ground of mutiny with the agitators, it will be recollected, was the announced determination of the Presbyterian majority to reduce the power of the army by draughting off sundry regiments to Ireland. Hollis positively declares that it was Cromwell who upon this set the agitators in motion, though he concealed himself so artfully in the back ground, and employed instruments so singularly and well adapted to his purpose, that, according to other Presbyterian writers, not even Fairfax suspected his second in command of in any way favouring the acts of insubordination which no discipline could now suppress. In his memoirs, indeed, Fairfax afterward declared, with a reference not to be mistaken, that the success of his army in 1646 "was soon clouded with abominable hypocrisy and deceit, even in those men who had been instrumental in bringing the war to a conclusion. Here was the vertical point on which the army's reputation and honour turned into a reproach and scandal. Here the power of the army I once had was usurped by the agitators, the forerunners of confusion and anarchy."

This is the passage from Hollis: "In the mean while disclaiming it [the mutiny], blaming the soldiers at that distance (as Cromwell did openly in the House, protesting, for his part, he would stick to the Parliament), under-hand he sent them encouragements and directions; for nothing was done there but by advice and countenance from London, where the whole business was so laid, the rebellion resolved upon, and the officers that were in town so deeply engaged, that when the full time was come for putting things in execution, my friend Cromwell, who had been sent down by the Parliament to do good offices, was come up again without doing any; and he who had made those solemn protestations, with some great imprecations on himself if he failed in his performance, did, notwithstanding, privily convey thence his goods (which many of the Independents did likewise, leaving city and Parliament as marked out for destruction), and then, without leave of the House (after some members missing him, and fearing him gone, had moved to have him sent for; whereupon he being, as it seems, not yet gone, and having notice of it, came and showed himself a little in the House), did steal away that evening. I may say run away post down to the army, and presently join in the subscription of a rebellious letter."

Nor did any of the difficulties into which such duplicity cast him find him ever unprepared. Between all the suspicions of the Presbyterians, and all the headlong precipitancy of the agitators, Cromwell stood immovable and still triumphant in his stratagems. When Skippon, for instance, who had received the mutinous letter of the agitators,* suddenly (for he knew nothing of Cromwell's intrigues) produced it in the House, and being asked from whom he received it, answered, from three men of no command in the army, who were, he believed, at the door of the House, their names Edward Sexby, William Allen, and Thomas Shepperd, great excitement instantly followed. Some were for voting the letter seditious, and at once committing the messengers to prison; some were paralyzed by alarm, and threw hesitation on that course. In the midst of much confusion, Cromwell at last arose, and brought forward what has been called his master-piece of dissimulation. He solemnly protested that to his knowledge the army was greatly misunderstood and calumniated. They willingly put themselves into the hands of the national representative, and would conform to anything Parliament should please to ordain. If the House of Commons commanded them to disband, they would obey without a murmur, and pile up their arms at the door of that assembly. For himself, he entreated them to accept his assurance of his entire submission and obedience. He supplicated them, therefore, to bear in mind the long services, and the pure and entire loyalty

* The purport of this letter was to complain of the treatment the army had lately experienced, and in particular, that they had been proclaimed enemies. They said, they knew well how to deal with adversaries with swords in their hands, but that the foes with whom they had now to encounter were far more dangerous, being protected by persons intrusted with the government of the kingdom. They designated them as men who had lately tasted of sovereignty, and, being lifted above their ordinary sphere of servants, sought to become masters, and were degenerating into tyrants. Lastly, they plainly said, that, however cordially otherwise they were disposed to the expedition of Ireland, they must express themselves averse to that service until their desires were granted, and the just rights and liberties of the subject were vindicated and maintained. In particular, they complained of the want of a legal indemnity for what they had done in the prosecution of the war, and that the Irish expedition, in the shape in which it was now proposed, was nothing less than a plan for ruining the army and breaking it to pieces.—Godwin.

of that meritorious body, and to do nothing respecting them in anger, or under false and mistaken notions of resentment. The craft succeeded. The wildest of the Presbyterians were disarmed of their suspicions, the most fearful relieved from their alarms. Cromwell was implored to go down and compromise matters with the agitators: he went down and fostered the mutiny.

Clarendon confirms these evidences of the dark power of intrigue in Cromwell. He tells us that he was moved to the highest pitch of grief and anger whenever any intelligence was received from the mutinous regiments. He wept bitterly; he lamented the misfortunes of his country; and he advised the most violent measures for checking the insubordination of the troops. At the same time, he called heaven and earth to witness that his devoted attachment to the Parliament had rendered him so odious to the army, that his life, while among them, was in the utmost danger. The duplicity could not, however, go on continually; it was not Cromwell's purpose that it should. It was discovered, and the Presbyterians arranged a plot they thought as subtle, to have their deceiver moved into the Tower. But his affairs were ripe at last for action. He left London suddenly; was received by the great body of the army with acclamations; suppressed a really dangerous mutiny that threatened for the instant to thwart his plans, by riding up in the face of the mutineers, selecting twelve of the ringleaders, and shooting one on the instant; brought up some regiments afterward within reach of Westminster, purged the Parliament, and seized the king.

The imminent danger threatened by the Presbyterians to all those best interests of liberty for which so much blood had been shed, supplied Cromwell's excuse for even such duplicity as this in the breasts of the friends of liberty. Nor should it be lost sight of, in regard to them, that they may well have supposed the organization of an armed and enthusiastic democracy like this of the agitators, the last thing in the world that could have favoured the ultimate design of a tyrannical usurpation. Is such a consideration sufficient to cast a doubt on even the existence of such a design at this stage of Cromwell's career?

Ludlow would answer in the negative, and offer evidence of the present existence of the design. "Walking one day," he says, about this time, "with Lieutenant-general Cromwell in Sir Robert Cotton's garden, he inveighed bitterly against them (the Commons), saying, in a familiar way to me, 'If thy father were alive, he would let some of them hear what they deserved;' adding farther, 'that it was a miserable thing to serve a Parliament, to whom, let a man be never so faithful, if one pragmatical fellow rise up and asperse him, he shall never wipe it off; whereas,' said he, 'when one serves under a general, he may do as much service, and yet be free from all envy and blame.' This text, together with the comment which his after actions put upon it, hath since persuaded me that he had already conceived the design of destroying the civil authority and setting up of himself, and that he took that opportunity to feel my pulse, whether I were a fit instrument to be employed by him to those ends. But having replied to his discourse that we ought to perform the duty of our stations, and trust God with our honour, power, and all that is dear to us, not permitting any such considerations to discourage us from the prosecution of our duty, I never heard anything more from him upon that point." Again, in reference to Cromwell's affected negotiations with the king, his entertainment of Charles's proposal to give him the garter and the earldom of Essex, and his consequent seeming hostility to the course of bringing him to trial, as proposed by the Commonwealth's army men, Ludlow speaks in a subsequent passage of a dialogue which also occurred about this time. "Lieutenant-general Cromwell, who had made it his usual practice to gratify enemies, even by the oppression of those who were by principle his friends, began again to court the Commonwealth party, inviting some of them to confer with him at his chamber; with which acquainting me, the next time he came to the House of Commons I took the freedom to tell him that he knew how to cajole and give them good words when he had occasion to make use of them; whereat, breaking out into a rage, he said, they were a proud sort of people, and only considerable in their own conceits. But when, on tumults attending the petitions from Surrey, Essex, and Kent, the preparations in Scotland and the rising at Pembroke, he perceived the clouds to gather on every side, he complained to me, as we were walking in the Palace Yard, of the unhappiness of his condition, having made the greatest part of the nation his enemies by adhering to a just cause; but that which he pretended to be his greatest trouble was, that many who were engaged in the same cause with him had entertained a jealousy and suspicion of him, which he assured me was a great discouragement to him, asking my advice what method was best for him to take. I could not but acknowledge that he had many enemies for the sake of the cause in which he stood engaged, and also that many who were friends to that cause had conceived suspicions of him; but I observed to him that he could never oblige the former without betraying that cause wherein he was engaged, which if he should do, upon the account of an empty title, riches, or any other advantages, how those contracts would be kept with him was uncertain; but most certain it was, that his name would be abominated by all good men, and his memory abhorred by posterity. On the other side, if he persisted in the prosecution of our just intentions, it was the most probable way to subdue his enemies, to rectify the mistakes of those who had conceived a jealousy of him, and to convince his friends of his integrity; that if he should fall in the attempt, yet his loss would be lamented by all good men, and his name be transmitted to future ages with honour." If Ludlow's strong indignation after the event had occurred did not deceive him in all this, Cromwell certainly held his after designs even now, and was even now suspected of holding them.

The meeting which Ludlow alludes to in the latter quotation I have made soon after took place. Before it, however, Cromwell, then on the eve of starting from London to quell the second civil war, invited to dinner a number of the leading men of the Independents, and such of the Presbyterians as he was yet on terms with, for it was shortly before the purge, and strove hard to ascertain, during a personal conference, the points upon which they differed, and whether there were any common ground whereon they could meet to accomplish a hearty reconciliation. This at least, according to Ludlow, was the pretext under which he called them together; but the real object, he insinuates, was only to obtain such information as might enable him to direct his course with safety and success through the difficulties with which recent events had surrounded him. Whatever the object, however, it signally failed. The differences offered no chance of reconciliation or submission. He next brought about the other conference alluded to by Ludlow, consisting of the grantees, as they were called, of the House and army, on the one hand, and of a deputation of the Republicans on the other. At this conference, Ludlow proceeds to tell us, "the grantees, of whom Lieutenant-general Cromwell was the head, kept themselves in the clouds, and would not declare their judgments either for a monarchical, aristocratical, or democratical government, maintaining that any of them might be good in themselves or for us, according as Providence should direct us. The Commonwealth's-men declared that monarchy was neither good in itself nor for us; that it was not desirable in itself, they urged from the 8th chapter and 8th verse of the first book of Samuel, with divers more texts of Scripture to the same effect; and that it was no way conducing to the interests of this nation, was endeavoured to be proved by the infinite mischiefs and oppressions we had suffered under it and by it: that, indeed, our ancestors had consented to be governed by a single person, but with this proviso, that he should govern according to the direction of the law, which he always bound himself by oath to perform: that the king had broken this oath, and thereby dissolved our allegiance; protection and obedience being reciprocal: that, having appealed to the sword for the decision of things in dispute, and thereby caused the effusion of a deluge of the people's blood, it seemed to be a duty incumbent upon the representatives of the people to call him to an account for the same, more especially since the controversy was determined by the same means which he had chosen, and then to proceed to the establishment of an equal commonwealth, founded upon the consent of the people, and providing for the rights and liberties of all men, that we might have the hearts and hands of the nation to support it, as being most just, and in all respects most conducing to the happiness and prosperity thereof. Notwithstanding what was said, Lieutenant-general Cromwell, not for want of conviction, but in hopes of making a better bargain with another party, professed himself unresolved; and having learned what he could of the principles and inclinations of those present at the conference, took up a cushion and flung it at my head, and then ran down the stairs; but I overtook him with another, which made him hasten down faster than he desired. The next day, passing by me in the House, he told me he was convinced of the desirableness of what was proposed, but not of the feasibility of it; thereby, as I suppose, designing to encourage me to hope that he was willing to join with us, though unwilling to publish his opinion, lest the grantees should be informed of it, to whom, I presume, he professed himself to be of another judgment."

The extraordinary action incidentally mentioned by Ludlow shows better than any of the zealous Republican's suspicions what was going on in the mind of Cromwell. No doubt he flung the cushion at Ludlow's head, either because of something passing at the instant in his own heart which required relief, or of something he might have incautiously uttered that required diversion. It was not mere idleness here; of that we may be quite sure. Another action, however, which was noted shortly after this, is not so easily explicable. While the conquered and deserted king lay a prisoner at the inhospitable castle of Carisbrooke, Cromwell flung himself upon one of Charles's rich beds at Whitehall, and in that posture so managed a series of conferences with the subtlest lawyers of the day, as to induce them to lend their countenance and co-operation in a great degree to the new plan of government in meditation, although they had hesitated before to attend even their Parliamentary duties. This would seem to have been a piece of mean and low-thoughted ostentation, unless it could be shown it was designed, which is just possible, to strike at a weak point in the learned but commonplace minds of the grave lawyers in council.

Thus practising upon each set of men in turn, and selecting from each new accessions of power and influence—thus waiting, with wily patience, to divert from the favourable current of each man's thoughts something that would serve to swell that ocean of power on which he hoped to sail to sovereignty, is it possible to view in any other light than that of a deliberate usurper the character of Cromwell? Let us not fail to observe and admire the greatness of his genius, and the wonderful advantages which, in his way to usurpation, he no doubt effected for his country. Had he left them in that shape they first assumed, no gratification or affection too largely given could have been bestowed on his immortal name. But is it possible, in the midst of all these evidences, to suppose, with Mr. Godwin, that his purposes were honest still?

Ludlow's evidence, however, is not yet complete. That which I have now to quote is indeed the most important part of it, since it throws some question over his former assertions as to the suspicion with which Cromwell was viewed by the friends of liberty, even before the death of the king. The time of the following extract is on the return of Cromwell from his government, or rather his slaughter, in Ireland, when he was anxious that Ludlow should be despatched into service there, and when Fairfax's suicidal announcement of his resignation of the chief command was just opening the way to a consummation of all the wildest hopes or purposes entertained by Cromwell. Nevertheless, that subtle chief affected a desire for the continuance of Fairfax. "Lieutenant-general Cromwell," says Ludlow, "pressed that, notwithstanding the unwillingness of the Lord Fairfax to command upon this occasion, they would yet continue him to be general of the army; professing for himself that he would rather choose to serve under him in his post, than to command the greatest army in Europe. But the council of state not approving that advice, appointed a committee of some of themselves to confer farther with the general in order to his satisfaction. This committee was appointed upon the motion of the lieutenant-general, who acted his part so to the life that I really thought him in earnest, which obliged me to step to him as he was withdrawing with the rest of the committee out of the council chamber, and to desire him that he would not, in compliment and humility, obstruct the service of the nation by his refusal; but the consequence made it sufficiently evident that he had no such intention. The committee having spent some time in debate with the Lord Fairfax without any success, returned to the council of state, whereupon they ordered the report of this affair to be made to the Parliament; which being done, and some of the general's friends informing them that, though he had showed some unwillingness to be employed in this expedition himself, yet being more unwilling to hinder the undertaking of it by another, he had sent his secretary, who attended at the door, to surrender his commission, if they thought fit to receive it. The secretary was called in, and delivered the commission, which the Parliament having received, they proceeded to settle an annual revenue of £5000 upon the Lord Fairfax, in consideration of his former services, and then voted Lieutenant-general Cromwell to be captain-general of all their land forces, ordering a commission forthwith to be drawn up to that effect, and referred to the council of state to hasten the preparations for the northern expedition. A little after, as I sat in the House near General Cromwell, he told me that, having observed an alteration in my looks and carriage towards him, he apprehended that I entertained some suspicions of him; and that, being persuaded of the tendency of the designs of us both to the advancement of the public service, he desired that a meeting might be appointed, wherein with freedom we might discover the grounds of our mistakes and misapprehensions, and create a good understanding between us for the future. I answered, that he discovered in me what I had never perceived in myself; and that, if I troubled him not so frequently as formerly, it was either because I was conscious of that weight of business that lay upon him, or that I had nothing to importune him withal upon my own or any other account; yet since he was pleased to do me the honour to desire a free conversation with me, I assured him of my readiness therein; whereupon we resolved to meet that afternoon in the council of state, and from thence to withdraw to a private room, which we did accordingly in the queen's guard-chamber, where he endeavoured to persuade me of the necessity incumbent upon him to do several things that appeared extraordinary in the judgment of some men, who, in opposition to him, took such courses as would bring ruin upon themselves, as well as him and the public cause, affirming his intentions to be directed entirely to the good of the people, and professing his readiness to sacrifice his life in their service. I freely acknowledged my former dissatisfaction with him and the rest of the army when they were in treaty with the king, whom I looked upon as the only obstruction to the settlement of the nation, and with their actions at the rendezvous at Ware, where they shot a soldier to death, and imprisoned divers others upon the account of that treaty, which I conceived to have been done without authority and for sinister ends; yet, since they had manifested themselves convinced of those errors, and declared their adherence to the commonwealth, though too partial a hand was carried both by the Parliament and themselves in the distribution of preferments and gratuities, and too much severity exercised against some who had formerly been their friends, and, as I hoped, would be so still, with other things that I could not entirely approve, I was contented patiently to wait for the accomplishment of those good things which I expected, till they had overcome the difficulties they now laboured under, and suppressed their enemies that appeared both abroad and at home against them; hoping that then their principles and interest should lead them to do what was most agreeable to the constitution of a commonwealth and the good of mankind. He owned my dissatisfaction with the army while they were in treaty with the king to be founded upon good reasons, and excused the execution done upon the soldier at the rendezvous as absolutely necessary to keep things from falling into confusion, which must have ensued upon that division if it had not been timely prevented. He professed to desire nothing more than that the government of the nation might be settled in a free and equal commonwealth, acknowledging that there was no other probable means to keep out the old family and government from returning upon us; declaring that he looked upon the design of the Lord in this day to be the freeing of his people from every burden, and that he was now accomplishing what was prophesied in the 110th Psalm; from the consideration of which, he was often encouraged to attend the effecting those ends, spending at least an hour in the exposition of that psalm."

And so Ludlow, satisfied, or at least unable to express distrust of the honesty of Cromwell, went off to Ireland. It will not do to judge those friends of freedom too hastily who still held to the side of this man! Then, having completed the conquests of the Commonwealth—having freed himself of Ludlow's presence, and Ireton being removed by death, nothing stood in the way of the daring adventurer save the enthusiastic democracy of the army and its fiercely Republican officers. Yet this would have sufficed to check no ordinary man! Cromwell knew, however, that if he could propitiate the officers up to a certain point, he was sure of the great body of the army, and with this he could effect all. The army was now the first power of the state. It had become the result of their masterly discipline, as it must be in every army, being, in fact, the very condition of military existence to acknowledge and look up to a great controlling chief. To place himself, therefore, in the position of receiving this, in a political sense, from the first power of the state, was to become himself the first man of the state. The transition was easy to a throne; that is, he thought so. The circle of his reasoning was now wellnigh complete: the work begun at St. Ives promised a successful issue.

But then those Republican enthusiasts! A different mode was necessary here from that which had succeeded hitherto with Ludlow, and in part with Vane. His own enthusiasm must be called into play: an enthusiasm he possessed to such an extent as to qualify it fairly for all the effects of a real inspiration. Upon this, then, the question may occur, as to whether he had ever laboured in fact, in matters of religion, under a sincere self-delusion. "Though now," says our honest and zealous Ludlow, "he eagerly coveted his own advancement, he thought it not convenient yet to unmask himself, but rather to make higher pretences to honesty than ever he had done before, thereby to engage Major-general Harrison, Colonel Rich, and their party to himself. To this end, he took all occasions in their presence to asperse the Parliament, as not designing to do those good things they pretended to, but rather intending to support the corrupt interests of the clergy and lawyers; and though he was convinced they were hastening with all expedition to put a period to their sitting, having passed a vote that they would do it within the space of a year, and that they were making all possible preparations in order to it, yet did he industriously publish that they were so in love with their seats that they would use all means to perpetuate themselves. These and other calumnies he had with so much art insinuated into the belief of many honest and well-meaning people, that they began to wish him prosperity in his undertaking. Divers of the clergy, from their pulpits, began to prophesy the destruction of the Parliament, and to propose it openly as a thing desirable; insomuch that the general, who had all along concurred with this spirit in them, hypocritically complained to Quartermaster Vernon, that he was pushed on by two parties to do that, the consideration of the issue whereof made his hair to stand on end. One of these, said he, is headed by Major-general Lambert, who, in revenge of that injury the Parliament did him in not permitting him to go into Ireland with a character and conditions suitable to his merit, will be contented with nothing less than their dissolution; of the other, Major-general Harrison is the chief, who is an honest man, and aims at good things, yet, from the impatience of his spirit, will not wait the Lord's leisure, but hurries me on to do that which he and all honest men will have cause to repent. Thus," adds Ludlow, "did he craftily feel the pulse of men towards this work, endeavouring to cast the infamy of it on others, reserving to himself the appearance of tenderness to civil and religious liberty, and of screening the nation from the fury of the parties before mentioned."

The mention of Harrison subsequently draws from the Republican memorialist the following singular statement: "I went afterward (during Cromwell's usurpation) to make him a visit; and having told him that I was very desirous to be informed by him of the reasons that moved him to join with Cromwell in the interruption of the civil authority, he answered that he had done it because he was fully persuaded they had not a heart to do any more good for the Lord and his people. Then, said I, are you not now convinced of your error in entertaining such thoughts, especially since it has been seen what use has been made of the usurped power? To which he replied, upon their heads be the guilt who have made a wrong use of it; for my own part, my heart was upright and sincere in the thing. . . . His second reason for joining with Cromwell was because he pretended to love and favour a sort of men who acted upon higher principles than those of civil liberty. I replied, that I thought him mistaken in that also, since it had not appeared that he ever approved of any persons or things farther than he might make them subservient to his own ambitious designs. . . . The major-general then cited a passage of the Prophet Daniel, where it is said that the saints shall take the kingdom and possess it. To which he added another to the same effect, that the kingdom shall not be left to another people. I answered, that the same prophet says in another place, that the kingdom shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High; and that I conceived, if they should presume to take it before it was given, they would, at the best, be guilty of doing evil that good might come from it."

The reign of the saints, then, was the ground Cromwell took with these men. And did he believe a word of it? It is worth considering.

"I had much discourse on this head," says Bishop Burnet, "with one who knew Cromwell well and all that set of men, and asked him how they could excuse all the prevarications and other ill things of which they were visibly guilty in the conduct of their affairs. He told me they believed there were great occasions in which some men were called to great services, and in the doing of which they were excused from the common rules of morality: such were the practices of Ehud and Jael, Samson and David; and by this they fancied they had a privilege from observing the standing rules. It is very obvious how far this principle may be carried, and how all justice and mercy may be laid aside on this pretence by every bold enthusiast." True: and it does not seem that Cromwell is unfairly charged in this, or his dupes unfairly represented. Some, indeed, suspected him; and it is related, that on the eve of this great scheme, from which the present illustrations of his character are derived—his project of thrusting out the Long Parliament by the soldiery, and so flinging down the final obstacle to usurpation—Major Streater declared openly that he was sure "the general designed to set up for himself." To this the enthusiastic Harrison rejoined, that he did not believe it, but that "the general's aim was only to make way for the kingdom of Jesus." "Unless Jesus comes very suddenly, then," replied Streater, "he will come too late."

For even the Streater party, however, Cromwell had his resources. It would seem that up to the very time when he was driving out the members, and the council of officers sat in suspense at Whitehall, several of them had, in reality, no notion of what was going on, until

Cromwell suddenly reappeared among them—flushed and agitated with an extreme excitement, the keys of the House of Commons in his pocket, the "bawble" of its authority carelessly flung into an anteroom, Vane's celebrated act as carefully concealed—told them all that he had done; and added, that he did not think to have done it, but, "perceiving the Spirit of God so strong upon me, I could no longer consult flesh and blood." It would be within the bounds of probability that Cromwell had for an instant—for an instant only—actually experienced this emotion. While on the point of being tempted to believe it, the sequel of the scene checks every such temptation. Some of the recusant officers, having recovered their first wonder and uncertainty, went with a strong and decisive remonstrance to Cromwell, required an explanation of his extraordinary proceedings, and told him he was apparently providing ruin and confusion for the best interests of all. Upon this, we are informed, he stilled their murmurs with an assurance that he would do much more good to the country than could ever be expected from the Parliament; and made so many professions of patriotic feeling, that they resolved to wait the course of events rather than come to a downright quarrel with him, before his intentions could be fully known. Colonel Okey, however, suspecting that the end would be bad, as the means were so hypocritical, asked Desborough what could be passing in the mind of Cromwell when he praised the Parliament so highly to the council of officers, and yet proceeded almost immediately afterward to eject them with so much scorn and contempt. The other replied, "That if ever the general drolled in his life, he had drolled then."

Yet are there considerations still, connected with Cromwell's claims to be considered in many points a sincere enthusiast, which cannot be omitted in an inquiry of this kind. Do not let the character and tendency of the great age in which he lived be forgotten or treated lightly. It was, indeed, an age of wonders, in which majesty had been thrown prostrate and poverty exalted—in which wonderful declarations had seemed to issue from Heaven itself in favour of the cause he had engaged in. It is by supposing some such assurance as this pervading himself and his army that their singular mixture of real pride and apparent self-abasement meets with its best solution. What was a king in the presence of the King of kings? What was temporary suffering in the hope of eternal bliss? What even the form of a despotism over the disordered land, if it was merely to open out a passage to immortal freedom for God's own people?

In a very striking letter to the governor of the Castle of Edinburgh, dated September the 9th, 1650, Cromwell thus wrote: "We have said in our papers with what hearts and upon what account we came [into Scotland]; and the Lord hath heard us, though you would not, upon as solemn an appeal as any experience can parallel. And although they [the Scots] seem to comfort themselves with being the sons of Jacob, from whom (they say) God hath hid his face for a time, yet it's no wonder, when the Lord hath lift up his hand so eminently against a family, as he hath done so often against this [the Stuart], and men will not see his hand, if the Lord hide his face from such, putting them to shame, both for it and their hatred at his people, as it is this day. When they purely trust to the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God; which is powerful to bring down strong holds, and every imagination that exalts itself; which alone is able to square and fit the stones for the new Jerusalem, then, and not before, and by that means and no other, shall Jerusalem (which is to be the praise of the whole earth), the city of the Lord, be built, the Sion of the Holy One of Israel." In reply to this, the governor wrote to the English chief that the Scotch ministers directed him to say "that they had not so learned Christ as to hang the equity of their cause upon events." Cromwell at once answered, "In answer to the witness of God upon our solemn appeal, you say you have not so learned Christ to hang the equity of your cause upon events. We could wish blindness hath not been upon your eyes to all those marvellous dispensations which God hath wrought lately in England. But did not you solemnly appeal and pray? Did not we do so too? And ought not you and we to think with fear and trembling of the hand of the great God in this mighty and strange appearance of his? But can you slightly call it an event! Were not both yours and our expectations renewed from time to time, while we waited upon God, to see which way he would manifest himself upon our appeals? And shall we, after all these our prayers, fastings, tears, expectations, and solemn appeals, call these bare events! The Lord pity you. Surely we fear, because it hath been a merciful and gracious deliverance to us. I beseech you, in the bowels of Christ, search after the mind of the Lord in it towards you, and we shall help you by our prayers that you may find it out, for yet (if we know our hearts at all) our bowels do in Christ Jesus yearn after the godly in Scotland."

This looks like earnestness and sincerity. In the very same correspondence, however, there is something that contradicts it a little. Cromwell having invited, with an air of noble tolerance, the Presbyterian ministers, who had taken refuge in the castle, to resume their duties in the various chapels of the city, the governor intimates, in answer, that those reverend gentlemen have not been able to conquer some alarm of the preaching cuirassiers of the English army, and that "they are ready to be spent in their Master's service, and to refuse no suffering," yet, "finding nothing exprest in yours whereupon to build any security for their persons," they "are resolved to reserve themselves for better times, and to wait upon Him who hath hidden his face for a while from the sons of Jacob." To this, with something of an inconsiderate plainness, the impetuous English general, deserting his Bible phraseology, at once rejoins: "The kindness offered to the ministers with you was done with ingenuity, thinking it might have met with the like; but I am satisfied to tell those with you, that if their Master's service (as they call it) were chiefly in their eye, imagination of suffering would not have caused such a return, much less the practice by our party (as they are pleased to say), upon the ministers of Christ in England, have been an argument of personal prosecution. The ministers in England are supported, and have liberty to preach the Gospel, though not to raile, nor under pretence thereof to overthrow the civil power, or debase it as they please." This certainly looks amazingly like a sudden burst of laughter at the mutual affectation of phrase kept up by our biblical professors. It calls to mind the merry meeting of the brother-augurs in the streets of Rome.

But now let us observe, from other sources, what sort of style was adopted towards Cromwell by indifferent persons whom he had obliged, or who hoped for favours from him. They may suggest the sort of deliberate plan or system which his enthusiasm and religious repute served to or assumed. A Mr. Walter Cradock thus writes to the lord-general: "My heart is ready to burst oft in the weeke, not with jealousies, swellings, suspicions, or querulousness, as perhaps you may be tempted to think, but with a flood of affections, a conjunction of love, joy, delight, and earnest desire to salute you with a few unfeigned lines; all which, by three or four considerations—or, it may be, temptations—are damm'd up, as having no vent but in prayer and praises, which sometimes I make my businesse in a ditch, wood, or under a hay-mow, in your behalf. I pray believe not any that shall say that you are lesse beloved, honoured, or remembered by the Welsh saints than ever you were, or any man is. Let not, I beseech you, your catholique projects (though otherwise fundamentally good) seem to excuse your conscience for letting slip any particular present opportunity to scree the least saint. That renowned auncient saint, Mr. Rice Williams, of Newport, being one who hath served the state in many places, but not gained a penny therefrom, is pitched upon by the saints here a year agoe for that place of registering deeds; your favourable assistance is much desired therein by the godly of this country, in whose names I salute you in the Lord." And in another letter, a female friend of Mr. Cradock, Mrs. Mary Netheway, thus opens a budget of prayers and praises to the great lord-general. "Dere and honoured sur in the Lord,—Having travelled with the pepel of God in spretual labore, and haveing now bine a letel refreshed with God's renewed power and presents amongs the golden candelsticks, I have med bould to writ this few lynes to you, wherin I desier to bless God for his marsty to your poore soule, that was so much compast about with gret temptations. This is one thing I desier of you, to demolish thos monstres wich arr set up as ornaments in Privy-garden. Truly, sur, we stand on the sea of glase: O that we may have the harps of God in our hands, and may be in readiness when our Lord shall appear, for his appearing is near. Blessed is he that is sealed, and hath oyle in his vessel. Remember me to dere Mr. Cradock."

In such letters as these we may behold Cromwell in his intercourse with the humblest. They are all his equals. He shares their temptations, and humiliates himself to their own vilest condition. The imagination pictures him passing from tent to tent among his soldiers, with a prayer for one, a jest for another, equality and brotherhood for all.

And having thus exhibited what some may consider the meaner uses of his enthusiasm, observe it next on a grander theatre. Bishop Burnet, speaking of the straits to which he was reduced on the eve of the battle of Dunbar, proceeds thus: "The Scots drew near Cromwell, who, being pressed by them, retired towards Dunbar, where his ships and provisions lay. The Scots followed him, and were posted on a hill about a mile from thence, where there was no attacking them. Cromwell was then in great distress, and looked on himself as undone. There was no marching towards Berwick, the ground was too narrow; nor could he come back into the country without being separated from his ships and starving his army. The least evil seemed to be to kill his horses, and put his army on board, and sail back to Newcastle, which, in the disposition that England was in at that time, would have been all their destruction, for it would have occasioned a universal insurrection for the king. They had not above three days' forage for their horses: so Cromwell called his officers to a day of seeking the Lord, in their style. He loved to talk much of that matter all his life long afterward: he said he felt such an enlargement of heart in prayer, and such quiet upon it, that he bade all about him take heart, for God had certainly heard them, and would appear for them. After prayer, they walked in the Earl of Roxburgh's gardens, that lay under the hill, and by prospective glasses discerned a great motion in the Scottish camp; upon which Cromwell suddenly said, 'God is delivering them into our hands; they are coming down to us.'" That battle will be described hereafter, and another act of sudden enthusiasm noted, which had, even more than this, the aspect of real inspiration.

Nor was it on great public occasions, or to public persons, or to the common soldiers of his army, or to the mere private tools of his intrigues, that this remarkable intercourse of enthusiasm restricted itself in Cromwell. I shall hereafter show it, the same in kind, though in a less degree, among the most intimate members of his family; and to the officers with whom his daily life was passed, and to whom he could have scarcely written aught with which that daily life corresponded not, he held the same enthusiastic tone. Some of these letters I am able to produce. To the mild and sensible Fairfax, shortly after an illness which had moved the sympathy and concern of the latter, he thus writes on the 7th of March, 1647:

"SIR,—It hath pleased God to raise me out of a dangerous sickness; and I do most willingly acknowledge that the Lord hath (in this Visitation) exercised the bowels of a Father towards me. I received in myself the sentence of death, that I might learn to trust in Him that rayseth from the dead, and have no confidence in the flesh. It's a blessed thing to dye daylie: for what is there in this Worlde to be accounted of the best Men according to the flesh, and things are lighter than vanitie. I finde this onely good: to love the Lorde, and his poore despised people; to doe for them, and to be readie to suffer with them; and he that is found worthy of this hath obteyned great favour from the Lorde; and he that is established in this shall (beinge conformed to Christ and the reste of the bodie) participate in the Glorie of a resurrection which will answeare all. . . . Sir, I must thankfully confesse your favour in your last letter. I see I am not forgotten; and truly, to be kept in your remembrance is very great satisfaction to me, for I can say in the simplicitie of my harte, I putt a high and true valew upon your love, which when I forgett, I shall cease to be a gratefull and an honest man. I most humbly begg my service may be presented to your Ladie, to whome I wish all happiness and establishment in the truth. Sir, my prayers are for you, as becomes your excellencie's most humble servant, OLIVER CROMWELL. . . . Sir, Mr. Rushworth will write to you about the quarteringe and the letter lately sent you, and therefore I forbear."

To the Lord Wharton, a year after the foregoing date, we find him writing, less sensibly, indeed, than to the sensible Fairfax, but in a tone of still more striking humility and even passionate self-abasement. "My Lorde,—You knowe how untoward I am at this businesse of writinge; yett a word. . . . I beseeche the Lorde make us sensible of this great mercie heere, which surelie was much more than . . . the House expresseth. I trust (. . . the goodnesse of our God) time and oportunitie to speak of it with you face to face. When wee thinke of our God, what are wee! Oh! his mercie to the whole societie of Saincts, despised, jeered saincts! Lett them mocke on. Would wee were all saincts; the best of us are (God knowes) poore weake saincts, yett saincts; if not sheepe, yett lambes, and must be fedd. Wee have daylie bread, and shall have it, in despite of all enemies. There's enough in our Father's house, and he dispareth it as our eyes . . . behinde, then wee can . . . wee for him. I thinke thorough these outward mercies (as we call them), fayth, patience, love, hope, all are exercised and perfected, yea, Christ formed, and growes to a perfect man within us. I knowe not how well to distinguish; the difference is only in the subject: to a worldly man they are outward; to a Saint, Christian: but I dispute not, my lorde, I rejoyce in your perticular mercie. I hope that is soe to you; if soe, it shall not hurt you, not make you plott or shift for the younge baron to make him great. You will say, he is God's to dispose of, and guide for, and there you will leave him. My love to the deare little ladie, better than the child. The Lorde blesse you both. My love and service to all friends high and low; if you will, my Lorde and Ladie—Moulgrave and Will. Hill. I am truly your faythfull friend and humble servant,
O. CROMWELL."

Three years afterward, when he had conquered at Worcester, and was on the very eve of his usurpation, he thus, in preparation for the latter event, writes to his "esteemed friend Mr. Cotton, pastor at Boston," one of the early and famous ministers of New-England. This letter offers the most striking illustration that could be found of certain eminent peculiarities which lay at the very root of all the strength and all the weakness of his character. "WORTHY SIR AND MY CHRISTIAN FRIEND,—I received yours a few days sithence; it was wellcome to me, because signed by you, whome I love and honour in the Lorde; butt more to see some of the same grounds of our actinges stirrings in you, that have in us to quiet us in our worke, and support us therein; which hath had greatest difficultie in our engagement with Scotland, by reason wee have had to doe with some whoe were (I verilie thinke) godly, butt through weaknesse and the subtiltie of Sathan, involved in interest against the Lord and his people. With what tendernessee wee have proceeded with such, and that in sinceritie, our papers (which I suppose you have seen) will in part manifest, and I give you some comfortable . . . assurance of. The Lorde hath marvelously appeared: even against them. And now againe, when all the power was devolved into the Scottish Kinge and the malignant partie, they invading England, the Lorde rayned upon them such snares as the enclosed will shew, only the narrative is short in this, that of their whole armie when the narrative was framed, not five of their whole armie returned. Surely, St, the Lorde is greatly to be feared, as to be praised. Wee need your prayers in this as much as ever: how shall wee behave ourselves after such mercies! What is the Lord a doinge? What prophetes are now fulfillingge? Who is a God like ours! To knowe his will, to doe his will, are both of him. . . . I tooke this libertie from businesse to salute you thus in a word. Truly I am ready to serve you, and the rest of our brethren and the churches with you. I am a poore weake creature, and not worthy the name of a worrne, yett accepted to serve the Lord and his people. Indeed, my dear friend, between you and me, you knowe not me; my weakneses, my inordinate passions, my unskilfulnesse, and every way unfitnesse to my worke; yett, yett, the Lord, whoe will have mercie on whome he will, does as you see. Pray for me: salute all Christian friends, though unknown. I rest your affectionate friend to serve you, O. CROMWELL."

In the year 1646, after his mere military exertions had for a time been closed by the victory of Naseby, and his thoughts were busied with the important question of the person of the king, and all the strange and even fearful considerations it may well be supposed to have involved, we find him writing in a somewhat similar strain to his eldest daughter, whose Republican tendencies, cherished and strengthened by her husband Ireton, had even thus early declared themselves. The letter (which is dated the 25th of October, and addressed to "hys beloved daughter Bridget Ireton, at Cornbury, the Generall's quarters") contains several characteristic points, and not least among them is that sort of appeal to her from the defection of his younger daughter Elizabeth, who had Royalist tastes and predilections, and whose very weakness in that point seems, by a process of love not difficult to follow, to have endeared her even more than her other sisters to this always affectionate father. "DEERE DAUGHTER,—I write not to thy husband, partly to avoid trouble, for one line of mine begitts many of his, which I doubt makes him sitt up too late; partly because I am myselfe indisposed at this tyme, havinge some other considerations. Your friends at Ely are well: your sister Claypole is (I trust in mercie) exercised with some perplexed thoughts. She sees her owne vanitie and carnal minde. Bewaillinge it, she seekes after (as I hope alsoe) that wch will satisfie. And thus to be a seeker is to be of the best sect next a finder, and such an one shall every faythfull humble seeker be at the end. Happie seeker, happie finder. Whoe ever tasted that the Lord is gracious, without some sence of self-vanitie and badnesse! Whoe ever tasted that graciousnesse of his, and could goe lesse in desier, and lesse than pressinge after full enjoyment! Deere harte, presse on; lett not husband, lett not anythinge, coole thy affections after Christ. I hope he will be an occasion to enflame them. That wch is best worthy of love in thy husband is that of the image of Christ he beares. Looke on that, and love it best, and all the rest for that. I pray for thee and him; doe so for me. My service and deere affections to the Generall and Generallesse. I heare she is very kind to thee; it adds to all other obligations. My love to all. I am thy deere Father,

"O. CROMWELL."

The view which these letters present to us will be completed by two extracts from the letters of two very influential men of the time, unlike each other in all things save this, that both were zealous Republicans. They bear date at the commencement of the Worcester campaign. Even so late as this Cromwell had sustained appearances with the stern and inflexible Bradshaw; even in his present glory and power he had chiefly impressed the enthusiastic Harrison with the sense of his humility, and his desire to bear the burden of his greatness only by help of that comfort and grace which the meanest might share along with him. "My dear lord," exhorts Harrison, "lett waiting upon Jehovah bee the greatest and most considerable business yow have every daie; reckon itt soe more than to eate, sleepe, or counsell together. Run aside sometimes from your companie, and gett a word with the Lord. Why should not you have three or four precious soules alive standing att your elbow, with whom you might now and then turne into a corner. I have found refreshment and mercie in such a waie. Ah, the Lord of compassion owne, pittie your burdens, care for yow, stand by and refresh your harte each moment. I would I could in anie kind doe you good; my harte is with you, and my poore prayers to my God for you. The Allmightie Father carrie yow in his very bosome, and deliver yow (if itt bee his will) from touching a very haire of anie for whom Jesus hath bled. I expect a very gracious returne in this particular."

The more sober and manly tone of Bradshaw's letter yet intimates the strongest faith in the sincerity of Cromwell, and his just claim to assistance in his great work from the very hand of God: "MY LORD,—By the hands of this trustie bearer, accept, I pray you, of this paper remembrance and salutation from him who both upon the publike and his owne private account is verie much your dettor, and with other your poore friends here prays for and adores the manifestation of God's gracious presence with you in all your weyghty affaires; which, as they are undertaken in zeale to God's glory and his people's good, will, through contynuance of the same dyvine presence and mercy, be crowned with answerable successe; and whosoever belongs to God in the nation where you are, will in the close of all have cause to say perissemus nisi perissemus. In the mean tyme, God can and will tame those stubborn spirits, and convince them of their hypocrysy who create you all this trouble, and give a mercifull testimony to the sinceritie of his poore servants' hearts who have appealed unto him. . . . My Lord, I forbear particularizing things here : only this, God is gracious to us in discovery of many of our enemies' desynges (which thereby have proved abortive), and delyvering their counceills in a good measure into our hands ; and in watching over the common safetie, there is much acknowledgement due to the indefatigable industry of M. Generall Harrison, your faithfull servant and substitute in that worke here. Your Lordship will shortly heare of some numbers of godly persons in a regimentall forme here in London, whose example will be followed by others of like good mynd in Norwich, Kent, and other places, who have sent for Commissions to us for that purpose, and our resolution is they shall not want encouragement. . . . My Lord, I will trespass no further upon your tyme. The Lord of Hosts be with you ; the God of Jacob be your refuge. The humblest of your welwillers, fryends, and servants,

"JO. BRADSHAWE."

Is it possible, however, the reader will ask, to penetrate into the habits of Cromwell, such as they were, apart from the restraint imposed on them by letters, over which, however free or familiar the object to which they were addressed, the character of the age could not but cast, as it were insensibly and as a matter of course, its own air of elevation and enthusiasm ! Can we view Cromwell in his own home, or the homes of his friends, in the freedom and the abandonment of social intercourse ? If we might see him there, perhaps these strange discordances would in some sort vanish, and expose to view the natural man beneath them. The reader shall see him there, in so far as those private scenes or familiar habits have been happily handed down to us.

Whitelocke, in his "Memorials," relates the following anecdote. "From the council of state Cromwell and his son Ireton went home with me to supper, where they were very cheerful, and seemed extremely well pleased. We discoursed together till twelve o'clock at night, and they told me wonderful observations of God's providence in the affairs of the war, and in the business of the army's coming to London, and seizing the members of the House, in all which were miraculous passages." We find an air of reality and sincerity, at last, about this little supper. Here was the cheerful spirit of the men, unclouded by strange delusions or fanatic professions, and yet, slyly, though perhaps sincerely, lurking beneath it the materials for both.

In the next anecdote the picture is not so favourable, yet natural withal, and not, on the whole, unpleasing. I take it from the Life of Waller, written by the poet's intimate friend. "Mr. Waller," he says, speaking of his intimacy with Cromwell, who was, as formerly stated, his kinsman by marriage, "often took notice, that in the midst of their discourse a servant has come in to tell them such and such attended, upon which Cromwell would rise and stop them, talking at the door, where he could overhear them say, The Lord will reveal, The Lord will help, and several such expressions ; which, when he returned to Mr. Waller, he excused, saying, Cousin Waller, I must talk to these men after their own way ; and would then go on where they left off. This created in Mr. Waller an opinion that he secretly despised those whom he seemed to court." The opinion was surely a non sequitur. We may respect a man sincerely, whose style of speaking or of thinking we may yet as sincerely differ from. Were this anecdote unaccompanied with other evidence to show an unworthy condescension in Cromwell to the use of a like style of speaking for wicked and unworthy ends, it might stand merely as an excellent and sufficing proof of the courtesy and gentility of his spirit. The worst imputation in the anecdote, however, has been confirmed, on the authority of a friend of Oliver St. John, by an anonymous writer of repute. "The enthusiasm of Cromwell," says the author of a "Political History of the Age," "was entirely assumed and politic. Oliver St. John declared that Cromwell, being one day at table with his friends, and looking for the cork of a bottle of Champagne which he had opened, on being informed that some person attended for admittance to see him, 'Tell him,' says Cromwell, 'we are in search of the holy spirit.'"

If this was really said, it must have been in an incautious moment indeed, or for some hysterical relief from irritating or painful thought as the cushion supplied which he flung at Ludlow. In the general affairs of his household, in so far as religion and religious observances were concerned, he was strict, and even, in some cases, exacting. An unimpeachable witness, Calamy, in his Life of Howe, has the following statement. "I had heard from several (and it had been confirmed to me by Mr. Jeremy White, who lived at Whitehall at the very same time with Mr. Howe) that the notion of a particular faith in prayer prevailed much in Cromwell's court, and that it was a common opinion among them, that such as were in a special manner favoured of God, when they offered up prayers and supplications to him for his mercies, either for themselves or others, often had such impressions made on their minds and spirits by a divine hand, as signified to them, not only in the general, that their prayers would be heard and graciously answered, but that the particular mercies that were sought for would be certainly bestowed, nay, and sometimes also intimated to them in what way and manner they would be afforded ; and pointed out to them future events beforehand, which in reality is the same as inspiration. Having heard of mischief done by the prevalence of this notion, I took the opportunity that offered, when there was nothing to hinder the utmost freedom, to inquire of Mr. Howe what he had known about this matter, and what were his apprehensions concerning it. He told me the prevalence of the notion that I mentioned at Whitehall, at the time when he lived there, was too notorious to be called in question, and that not a little pains was taken to cultivate and support it ; and that he once heard a sermon there (from a person of note), the avowed design of which was to maintain and defend it. He said he was so fully convinced of the ill tendency of such a principle, that after the hearing this sermon, he thought himself bound in conscience, when it came next to his turn to preach before Cromwell, to set himself industriously to oppose it, and to beat down that spiritual pride and confidence which such fancied impulses and impressions were apt to produce and cherish. He told me he observed, that while he was in the pulpit, Cromwell heard him with great attention, but would sometimes knit his brows and discover great uneasiness. When the sermon was over, he told me a person of distinction came to him, and asked him if he knew what he had done, and signified it to him as his apprehension that Cromwell would be so incensed upon that discourse, that he would find it very difficult ever to make his peace with him, or secure his favour for the future. Mr. Howe replied that he had but discharged his conscience, and could leave the event with God. He told me he afterward observed Cromwell was cooler in his carriage to him than before, and sometimes thought he would have spoken to him of the matter, but he never did, and rather chose to forbear."

The wilderness of doubt which every inquirer into the life or character of this extraordinary man (however deeply his researches enable him, as he supposes, to penetrate beneath the surface) must yet find himself in, at the last, in regard to many of his motives and his aims, does not seem to receive any clew even from this striking and well-authenticated detail. Cromwell still appears in it rather as the politic than the fanatic person.

The very selection of his chaplains seems to countenance the notion that with him religion was rather a matter of policy than persuasion, and a matter, therefore, over which he preferred to have such placed in authority as he could himself in turn influence or rule. Thus he was ill at ease with Howe. His favourites were Hugh Peters, who savoured much of a madman; * Sterry, who appears to have been half madman and half fool; John Goodwin, who looked forward to the millennium; Thomas Goodwin, who raved about the five points; and Jeremy White—but a little anecdote connected with Cromwell will show what Jeremy White was.

Oldmixon relates it, and if, with others that need not be repeated here, it is received with belief, there can be little doubt that Cromwell, in engaging White as his chaplain, secured in him also a buffoon gratis. The Lady Frances, one of the parties to the anecdote, was the youngest and most beautiful of Cromwell's daughters, and had been set apart by the gossip of Europe for the queen of Charles II., being thus destined, it was said, to serve as the bond of union between the decaying Commonwealth and the renewing royalty of England. Charles II. had found a rival, however, in Mr. Jeremy White. "One of the Protector's domestic chaplains," says the historian of the Stuarts, "Mr. Jeremy White, a sprightly man, and a top wit of his court, was so ambitious as to make his addresses to Lady Frances, the Protector's youngest daughter. The young lady did not discourage him; and this piece of innocent gallantry, in such a court, could not be carried on without spies. Oliver was told of it, and he was much concerned at it, obliging the person who told him to be on the watch; and if he could give him any substantial proof, he should be well rewarded, and White severely punish'd. The spy follow'd the matter so close, that he hunted Jerry White, as he was generally termed, to the lady's chamber, and ran immediately to the Protector with this news. Oliver, in a rage, hasten'd thither himself, and going in hastily, found Jerry on his knees, kissing the lady's hand, or having just kiss'd it. Cromwell, in a fury, ask'd what was the meaning of that posture before his daughter Frank White, with a great deal of presence of mind, said, 'May it please your highness, I have a long time courted that young gentlewoman there, my lady's woman, and cannot prevail; I was therefore humbly praying her ladyship to intercede for me.' The Protector, turning to the young woman, cry'd, 'What's the meaning of this, hussy? Why do you refuse the honour Mr. White would do you? He is my friend, and I expect you should treat him as such.' My lady's woman, who desired nothing more, with a very low courtesy reply'd, 'If Mr. White intends me that honour, I shall not be against him.' 'Say'st thou so, my lass!' cry'd Cromwell; 'call Goodwyn; this business shall be done presently, before I go out of the room.' Mr. White was gone too far to go back. The parson came. Jerry and my lady's woman were marry'd in presence of the Protector, who gave her £500 for her portion; and that, with the money she had sav'd before, made Mr. White easy in his circumstances, except in one thing, which was, that he never lov'd his wife, nor she him, tho' they liv'd together near fifty years afterward. I knew them both, and heard this story told when Mrs. White was present, who did not contradict it, but own'd there was something in it." Supposing the religious pretensions to have been very much a matter of assumption with Cromwell, it would seem at once to explain the source of his remarkable fondness for buffoonery. It had become a necessary relief from the pain of so much insincerity, to fling himself, when he could, headlong into the other extreme. He kept four buffoons at Whitehall, and generally, when inclined to sport, made himself, a fifth. Here was the reality of his nature vindicating itself somehow! Dr. Hutton has preserved the record* of a very remarkable scene of this sort. "At the marriage of the Lady Frances Cromwell," he says, "to Mr. Rich, the grandson and heir of the Earl of Warwick, the Protector, whose mind at that moment was far from being at ease, amused himself by throwing about the sack-posset among the ladies to spoil their clothes, which they took as a favour, as also wet sweetmeats; and daubed all the stools where they were to sit with wet sweetmeats; and put off Rich's wig, and would have thrown it into the fire, but did not, yet he sat upon it. An old formal courtier, Sir Thomas Billingsley, that was gentleman usher to the Queen of Bohe-

* Harleian Miscellany.

* This reverend person sent a huge dog to Sweden with White Locke, by way of a present to Queen Christina. See Appendix F.: an article to which the reader's attention is asked, as it introduces, from a rare work by Lord White Locke, a series of dialogues illustrative of striking points in Cromwell's character, and of the interest or opinion inspired by the various scenes of his history, as well as of the English civil wars, in the greatest foreign minister of the time.

nia, was entertained amongst them, and he danced before them with his cloak and sword, and one of the four of the Protector's buffoons made his lip black like a beard, whereat the knight drew his knife, missing very little of killing the fellow."

A scene not unlike this—the merriment of a mind "ill at ease" plunging recklessly into a thoughtless coarseness—is described in a Royalist pamphlet, entitled "The Court and Kitchen of Mrs. Joan Cromwell." The reader will make allowance, however, for the scurrilous tone of the writer. "His feasts were none of the liberallest, and far from magnificence; even those two he gave the French ambassador and the Parliament in 1656, upon their gratulation of his Syndercombe deliverance, which last amounted not to above £1000, and she [the Protectress] saved £200 of it in the banquet. For a big-bellied woman, a spectator near Cromwell's table, upon the serving thereof with sweetmeats, desiring a few dry candies of ap-ricocks, Colonel Pride, sitting at the same, instantly threw into her apron a conserve of wet, with both his hands, and stained it all over; when, as if that had been the sign, Oliver catches up his napkin, and throws it at Pride, he at him again, while all the table were engaged in the scuffle, the noise whereof made the members rise before the sweetmeats were set down, and, believing dinner was done, go to this pastime of gambols, and be spectators of his highness's frolics. Were it worth a description, I could give the reader a just and particular account of that Ahab festival, as it was solemnized in the banquetting-house of Whitehall."

The story of Ludlow and the cushion has been told; that of Marten and Cromwell, on the eve of the king's execution, is given in the life of that statesman. It is also on record, that when Hugh Peters urged the execution of Charles from the pulpit, Cromwell suddenly burst into a loud laugh, to the scandal of all present, and was only excused on the score of an "infirmary." Waller's friend, whom I have before quoted, tells us: "Mr. Waller lived mostly at Beaconsfield, where his mother dwelt in her widowhood, and often entertained Oliver Cromwell there during his usurpation, he being related to her. But, notwithstanding her relation to the usurper and Colonel Hampden, she was a Royalist in her principles; and when Oliver visited her at Beaconsfield, she would frankly tell him how his pretensions would end. The usurper used merrily to throw a napkin at her in return, and said he would not enter into further disputes with his aunt—for so he used to call her, though not quite so nearly related." Cowley, in his "Vision," too, speaks of his "flinging of cushions and playing at snowballs with his servants" as a thing of familiar report.*

* The entire passage in the "Vision," where these words occur, is well worth subjoining: "This man was wanton and merry, unwittingly and ungracefully merry, with our sufferings; he loved to say and do senseless and fantastical things, only to show his power of doing or saying anything. It would ill befit mine, or any civil mouth, to repeat those words which he spoke concerning the most sacred of our English laws—the Petition of Right, and Magna Charta. [Clarendon mentions the same coarse jest.] To-day you should see him ranting so wildly that nobody durst come near him; the morrow, flinging of cushions and playing at snowballs with his servants. This month he assembles a Parliament, and professes himself, with humble tears, to be

But the most extraordinary evidence that exists of the extent to which these propensities were occasionally carried, is given by the learned Doctor Bates. "Minores ductores," says that writer, who was Cromwell's physician, "congiariis frequentius devincire, nonnunquam in media cibatione, fame nondum pacatâ gregarios milites pulsatis tympanis intrmittere ut semesas raptarent reliquias. Robustos ac vere militares nocivis & validis exercitiis tractare, veluti prunâ candente nonnunquam ocreis injectâ, vel culcitris hinc inde in capita vibratis. Semel autem præludiis hujusmodi probe lassos & risu laxatos præfectos ad cordis apertionem provocavit; eoque modo ab incautis elicuit arcanâ quadam, quæ perpetuis tenebris optabant postmodum involuta; dum ipse, sententias omnium scrutatus, celaret suam." "He would order (that is) great feasts for the inferior officers, and whilst they were feeding, and before they had satisfied their hunger, cause the drums to beat, and let in the private soldiers to fall on, and snatch away the half-eaten dishes. The robust and sturdy soldiers he loved to divert with violent and hazardous exercises, as by making them sometimes throw a burning coal into one another's boots, or cushions at one another's heads. When the officers had sufficiently laughed; and tired themselves with these preludes, he would wheedle them to open their hearts freely, and by that means he drew some secrets from the unwary which afterward they wished might have been wrapped up in everlasting darkness, while he, in the mean time, pumping the opinion of all others, concealed his own."

I close these notices of Cromwell's more familiar habits with two anecdotes of a pleasanter kind, related in Whitelocke's Memorials. The first refers to Cromwell and Ireton. "As they," says the lord-commissioner, "went home from my house, their coach was stopped and they examined by the guards, to whom they told their names; but the captain of the guards would not believe them, and threatened to carry these two great officers to the court of guard. Ireton grew a little angry, but Cromwell was cheerful with the soldiers, gave them twenty shillings, and commended them and their captain for doing their duty." Again Whitelocke tells us: "The only their servant and their minister; the next month he swears by the living God that he will turn them out of doors, and he does so, in his princely way of threatening, bidding them turn the buckles of their girdles behind them. The representative of a whole—nay, of three whole nations, was in his esteem so contemptible a meeting, that he thought the affronting and expelling of them to be a thing of so little consequence as not to deserve that he should advise with any mortal man about it. What shall we call this—boldness or brutishness, rashness or phrensy? There is no name can come up to it, and therefore we must leave it without one. Now a Parliament must be chosen in the new manner, next time in the old form, but all cashiered still after the newest model. Now he will govern by major-generals, now by one House, now by another House, now by no House; now the freak takes him, and he makes seventy peers of the land at one clap (extempore, and stans pede in uno); and, to manifest the absolute power of the potter, he chose not only the worst clay he could find, but picks up even the dirt and mire, to form out of it his vessels of honour. It was said anciently of Fortune, that when she had a mind to be merry and to divert herself, she was wont to raise up such kind of people to the highest dignities. This son of Fortune, Cromwell, who was himself one of the primest of her jests, found out the true hautgout of this pleasure, and rejoiced in the extravagance of his ways as the fullest demonstration of his uncontrollable sovereignty. Good God! what have we seen? and what have we suffered?"

Protector often advised about this [the Petition and Advice] and other great businesses with the Lord Broghill, Pierrepont, myself, Sir Charles Wolseley, and Thurloe, and would be shut up three or four hours together in private discourse, and none were admitted to come in to him; he would sometimes be very cheerful with us, and laying aside his greatness, he would be exceeding familiar with us, and by way of diversion, would make verses with us, and every one must try his fancy; he commonly call'd for tobacco, pipes, and a candle, and would now and then take tobacco himself; then he would fall again to his serious and great business, and advise with us in those affairs; and this he did often with us, and our counsel was accepted and followed by him in most of his greatest affairs."

The writer of these pages has no favourite theory to establish out of his records of the life of Cromwell: it is simply his aim to attempt to arrive at as fair and impartial a ground for judgment as the circumstances will enable him to attain. Therefore, standing at the threshold of that astonishing person's political greatness, he has thought it advisable to present to the reader thus, from every various quarter, the possible means and resources by the use of which he achieved it in the end. Out of these the reader will possibly have already formed his own judgment; yet let it for the present be suspended, till the progress of Cromwell's life has advanced some years with the light of these researches and inquiries cast upon it. Thus much, meanwhile, the writer may be allowed to say, in vindication of the somewhat unusual course he has taken, that the notion which seems to be held by many eminent writers, that Cromwell was, after all, perhaps, only the instrument of Fate, working its own wild will in the wild and changing humours of the army, is one which, however feasible in the main, could only have been arrived at by the course hitherto taken in the multitudinous accounts that exist of him, of judging by itself each separate incident of his extraordinary career in its single shape as it arose. This seemed to be productive of much error. He was too great a man, intellectually, to have worked without a plan, and yet was deficient in the element of moral greatness, which would, in itself, have withheld him from the plan he assumed. Viewed in his separate qualities, a greater man has probably never lived; a man with more eminent abilities for statesmanship; a more masterly soldier, judging him by the age in which he lived, and the objects he accomplished; a person more wonderfully gifted in all the attributes of subtlest thought, and of an intellect the most piercing and profound. The moral elevation, too, of his courage should be admitted by all, since in the days of his greatest danger, when assassins beset him round his bed and at his board, he gave way to no base thought of mere personal fear. His eminent and thoughtful sagacity has never been disputed, nor the vastness of his comprehension, nor the marvellous intrepidity of his purposes, nor the inexhaustible expedients and powers of his mind. Is it possible to suppose, then, that all these amazing faculties failed in their mission on earth—for they did fail—without some rooted curse that lay in his nature deeper than them all, and, when they sought to identify themselves with settled and lasting projects, that at once dispersed them to the winds!

That curse was his WANT OF TRUTH, and could only have been implanted in such a nature by some early scheme of the fatal ambition which he realized in later life. "Explica atque excute intelligentiam tuam," says the great Roman philosopher; "ut videas, quæ sit in ea species, forma, et notio viri boni." Cadit ergo in virum bonum mentiri emolumenti sui causa, criminari præripere, fallere? Nihil profecto minus. Est ergo ulla res tanti, aut commodum ullum tam expetendum, ut viri boni et splendorem et nomen amittas? Quid est, quod afferre tantum utilitas ista, quæ dicitur, possit, quantum auferre, si boni viri nomen eripuerit, fidem justitiamque detraxerit!" Oh no, nothing can supply its place; "utility" or profit without it have never yet made out their case in this world. The discovery of its absence here was fatal at once. The parties who had in turn trusted, and been in turn betrayed, fled all from Cromwell's side at last, and left him alone; and the vast designs he had hoped to leave permanently impressed upon the genius of the English people and the character of the English Constitution, sunk with him into his grave. But not these alone. He dragged there, too, in so far as it was possible for him to do so—for a good as well as great thought, once born in the world, can never wholly die—the more virtuous and more able designs of the yet immortal statesmen he supplanted, and left the path altogether clear for the base, the wicked, the licentious slavery of the restored monarch who succeeded him.

Still must some portion of the reality of that enthusiasm with which he wrought his unworthiest aims be permitted to remain with him. On his death-bed, we shall see, it shone suddenly forth, when all the insincerity and the trick of life and its designs had passed forever. Then broke forth that almost fierce sincerity and belief of inspiration with which his first exertions in the Republican cause began, and which, if grosser objects had not crossed it, would probably have realized the greatest career for Cromwell that had ever been flung open to mortal man. It is by leaving with him a portion of this true enthusiasm, even in his works of greatest insincerity; it is by supposing that one so accomplished in deluding others, might also, and that most deeply, have deluded himself, that the extraordinary inconsistencies which have been noted in him will find their sole solution at the last. With this, these suggestions towards his character may now be left, for the resumption of the story of his fortunes. The difficulties that stood in the way of a direct and simple narration of the latter, as they shaped their course from the opening of his political influence in the matter of the self-denying ordinance, have now been in a measure dispersed, and the reader may follow on the great points of their track clearly and uninterruptedly.

At the pause in our narrative Cromwell was left in consultation with Vane. Shortly afterward, namely, on the 23d of November, the House of Commons professed itself greatly discontented with the affair of Dennington Castle, and made an order that on the following Monday, Waller and Cromwell, two of the principal officers who were members of that House, should declare their whole knowledge and information respecting the late proceedings of the conjoined armies. What was the sum of Waller's declaration does not appear; but Cromwell at once seized the occasion to bring all matters in dispute between himself and the Earl of Manchester to a decision, in which other matters, not less important, would not less be involved.

He at once rose from his place, therefore, and alleged, according to Rushworth, that Manchester had always been backward to engagements in battle, and against ending the war with the sword, and had been the advocate of such a peace to which a victory in the field would have been an obstacle; that, since the taking of York (as if he thought the king was now low enough, and the Parliament too high), he had declined and shifted off whatever tended to further advantage upon the enemy, and especially at Dennington Castle; "for here," pursued Cromwell, "I showed him evidently how this success might be obtained, and only desired leave, with my own brigade of horse, to charge the king's army in their retreat, leaving it in the earl's choice, if he thought proper, to remain neutral with the rest of his forces; but, notwithstanding my importunity, he positively refused his consent, and gave no other reason but that, if we met with a defeat, there was an end of our pretensions: we should all be rebels and traitors, and be executed and forfeited by law." In continuation of his charges, Cromwell then added, that, before his conjunction with the other armies, he had drawn his army into, and detained it in, such situations as were favourable to the enemy's designs, against many commands of the committee of both kingdoms, and with contempt and vilifying of those commands; and since, sometimes against the council of war, and sometimes deluding the council, had neglected one opportunity with pretence of another, and that again of a third, and at last persuading them that it was better not to fight at all. In the details of his statement, Whitelocke observes, Cromwell seemed (but cautiously enough) to lay more blame upon the officers of Essex's army than upon any other. He adds, that Cromwell's narrative "gave great satisfaction to the assembly to which it was addressed."

Lord Manchester himself rose in the House of Lords the day after, and observed to their lordships that he had lately been in employment in the armies, and that certain proceedings of those armies had elsewhere been made a subject of censure: he therefore begged the House would appoint a day on which he might give an account of those transactions. The House at once acceded, and fixed the next day but one.

Manchester's narrative, delivered on the latter day, is said to have been fabricated by the united (and ever most worthily united) pens of Skeldon Crawford and Denzil Hollis. No doubt, however, there was a foundation of truth in it, or the earl would not have been prevailed upon to sign it. In some moment of greater faith in Manchester's political creed than the result warranted, Cromwell had spoken out rather too plainly; and in after annoyance with his generals after intrigues, had as inconsiderately given way to rage. Perhaps there was no inconsiderateness, however, either in the one or the other, for the charge, involving both, did no harm to Cromwell in the English army or with the English people!

It was to this effect. He first accused Cromwell, by his tardiness and disaffection, of being more than any other person the cause that the king had carried off his ordnance from Dennington Castle without molestation. This was tantamount to saying that Cromwell's services not having been taken when they could avail, they were, when utterly useless, only tardily offered. Not contented, however, with thus defending himself, Manchester added a separate statement of certain speeches of Cromwell, of deep concern to the peerage of England, and to the good understanding subsisting between England and Scotland. The sum of these speeches appears to have been, that it would never be well with England till the Earl of Manchester was made plain Mr. Montague;* that the Scots had crossed the Tweed for no other purpose than to establish Presbyterianism, and that in that cause he would as soon draw his sword against them as against the king; and lastly, that it was his purpose to form an army of sectaries, which might dictate to both king and Parliament such conditions as they should think proper.† Manchester delivered both these narratives in writing to the House on the 2d of December, and a formidable party appeared to be getting up to defend them. Essex suddenly arrived in London after his Cornish exploits, and attended several days to his "duty" in the House of Lords.

Meanwhile, measures of a stronger kind were in contemplation against Cromwell, in other places than in the House of Lords. These are graphically related by Whitelocke: "One evening very late," he tells us, "Maynard and I were sent for by the lord-general to Essex House, and there was no excuse to be admitted, nor did we know beforehand the occasion of our being sent for: when we came to Essex House, we were brought to the lord-general, and with him were the Scots commissioners, Mr. Hollis, Sir Philip Stapylton, Sir John Meyrick, and divers others of his special friends. After compliments, and that all were set down in council, the lord-general, in general terms having mentioned his having sent for them on important business, desired the lord-chancellor of Scotland to enter into the detail, which he did in the following manner: 'Master Maynard and Master Whitlock, I can assure you of the great opinion both my brethren and myself have of your worth and abilities, else we should not have desired this meeting with you; and since it is his excellency's pleasure

* These are the earl's words: "I knew the lieutenant-general to be a man of very deep designs; and he has even ventured to tell me, that it never would be well with England till I were Mr. Montague, and there were no earl or lord or peer in the kingdom."

† That advice was given thus: "My lord, if you will stick firm to honest men, you shall soon find yourself at the head of an army which shall give law to both king and Parliament."

that I should acquaint you with the matter upon whilke your counsel is desired, I shall obey his commands, and briefly recite the business to you. You ken very weel that Lieutenant-general Cromwell is no friend of ours, and since the advance of our army into England, he hath used all underhand and cunning means to take off from our honour and merit in this kingdom: an evil requital of all our hazards and services; but so it is, and we are nevertheless fully satisfied of the affections and gratitude of the gude people of this nation in the general. It is thought requisite for us, and for the carrying on of the cause of the two kingdoms, that this obstacle or remora may be removed out of the way, whom we foresee will otherwise be no small impediment to us, and the gude design we have undertaken. He not only is no friend to us and the government of our Church, but he is also no well-willer to his excellency, whom you and we all have cause to love and honour; and if he be permitted to go on in his ways, it may, I fear, endanger the whole business; therefore we are to advise of some course to be taken for prevention of that mischief. You ken very weel the accord 'twixt the two kingdoms, and the union by the Solemn League and Covenant, and if any be an incendiary between the two nations, how is he to be proceeded against? now the matter is, wherein we desire your opinions, what you tak the meaning of this word incendiary to be, and whether Lieutenant-general Cromwell be not sicke an incendiary as is meant thereby, and whilke way wud be best to tak to proceed against him, if he be proved to be sicke an incendiary, and that will clepe his wings from soaring to the prejudice of our cause. Now you may ken that by our law in Scotland we clepe him an incendiary wha kindleth coals of contention, and raiseth differences in the state to the publick damage, and he is tanquam publicus hostis patriæ; whether your law be the same or not, you ken best who are mickle learned therein, and therefore, with the favour of his excellency, we desire your judgments in these points." Whitelocke, in answer, having been also desired by Essex to deliver his opinion, observed, "that the sense of the word incendiary was the same in both nations; but whether Cromwell was one, depended on proofs; if proofs were wanting, he was none; if such were at hand, he might be proceeded against in Parliament." After farther advice on the necessity of having solid grounds for going upon any such charge, the cautious lawyer added: "Next, as to the person of him who is to be accused as an incendiary, it will be fit, in my humble opinion, to consider his present condition, and parts, and interest in the Parliament (wherein Mr. Maynard and myself, by our constant attendance in the House of Commons, are the more capable to give an account to your lordships), and for his interest in the army, some honourable persons here present, his excellency's officers, are best able to inform your lordships. I take Lieutenant-general Cromwell to be a gentleman of quick and subtle parts, and one who hath, especially of late, gained no small interest in the House of Commons, nor is wanting of friends in the House of Peers, nor of abilities in himself to manage his own part, or aejence, to the best advantage. If this be so, my lords, it will be more requisite to be well prepared against him before he be brought upon the stage, lest the issue of the business be not answerable to your expectations." Maynard having concurred in this opinion, the affair was brought to a stand, and nothing came of it, "though Mr. Hollis, and Sir Philip Stapylton, and some others, spake smartly to the business, and mentioned some particular passages, and words of Cromwell's, tending to prove him to be an incendiary; and they did not apprehend his interest in the House of Commons to be so much as was supposed; and they would willingly have been upon the accusation of him. . . . I had some cause to believe," Whitelocke concludes, "that at this debate, some who were present were false brethren, and informed Cromwell of all that passed among us, and after that Cromwell, though he took no notice of any particular passages at that time, yet he seemed more kind to me and Mr. Maynard than he had been formerly, and carried on his design more actively of making way for his own advancement."

Such was the perilous condition of affairs among the principal leaders of the Parliamentary armies at the close of the year 1644, when, to the amazement and dismay of the Presbyterians, the project of the Self-denying Ordinance was, on the 9th of December, suddenly brought forward in the House of Commons. The circumstances attending this have been minutely detailed in the life of Vane, and it only remains to exhibit Cromwell as he appeared in public connexion with them.

The House having resolved itself into a committee to consider of the sad condition of the kingdom, in reference to the intolerable burdens of the war, and the little prospect there was of its being speedily brought to a conclusion, there was "a general silence for a good space of time," when Cromwell rose to address them. His speech, even in the faint records now alone preserved of it, appears to have been masterly in the extreme. He began by observing that "it was now a time to speak, or forever to hold the tongue; the important occasion being no less than to save a nation out of a bleeding, nay, almost dying condition, which the long continuance of the war had already brought it into; so that, without a more speedy, vigorous, and effectual prosecution of the war, casting off all lingering proceedings, like soldiers of fortune beyond sea, to spin out a war, we shall make the kingdom weary of us, and hate the name of a Parliament. For what," continued Cromwell, "do the enemy say? Nay, what do many say that were friends at the beginning of the Parliament? Even this, that the members of both Houses have got places and commands, and the sword into their hands; and, what by interest in Parliament, and what by power in the army, will perpetually continue themselves in grandeur, and not permit the war speedily to end, lest their own power should determine with it. This I speak here to our own faces, it is but what others do utter abroad behind our backs. I am far from reflecting on any. I know the worth of those commanders, members of both Houses, who are yet in power; but if I may speak my conscience, without reflection upon any, I do conceive, if the army be not put into another method, and the war more vigorously prosecuted, the people can bear the war no longer, and will enforce you to a dishonourable peace. But this," added Cromwell, with consummate wisdom, "I would recommend to your prudence, not to insist upon any complaint or oversight of any commander-in-chief, upon any occasion whatsoever; for as I must acknowledge myself guilty of oversights, so I know they can rarely be avoided in military affairs; therefore, waving a strict inquiry into the causes of these things, let us apply ourselves to the remedy which is most necessary. And I hope we have such true English hearts and zealous affections towards the general weal of our mother-country, as no members of either House will scruple to deny themselves and their own private interests for the public good, nor account it to be a dishonour done to them, whatever the Parliament shall resolve upon in this weighty matter." Subsequently, on the same question, Cromwell took an occasion to enforce his views, and reply to the difficulties urged against them yet more strongly. "The Parliament had," he said, "done very wisely, in the entrance into the war, to engage many members of their own in the most dangerous parts of it, that the nation might see that they did not intend to embark them in perils of war, while themselves sat securely at home out of gunshot, but would march with them where the danger most threatened; and those honourable persons, who had exposed themselves this way, had merited so much of their country, that their memories should be held in perpetual veneration; and whatsoever should be well done after them, would be always imputed to their example; but God had so blessed their army, that there had grown up with it, and under it, very many excellent officers, who were fit for much greater charges than they were now possessed of; and he desired them not to be terrified with an imagination, that if the highest offices were vacant, they would not be able to put as fit men into them; for, besides that it was not good to put so much trust in any arm of flesh as to think such a cause as this depended upon any one man, he did take upon him to assure them that they had officers in their army who were fit to be generals in any enterprise in Christendom." For himself, he added, he was quite ready to lay down his commission of command in the army, since there was nothing he so anxiously desired as that "an ordinance might be prepared, by which it might be made unlawful for any member of either House of Parliament to hold any office or command in the army, or any place or employment of profit in the state." He concluded with an enlargement upon "the vices and corruptions which were gotten into the army; the profaneness, and impiety, and absence of all religion; the drinking and gaming, and all manner of license and laziness;" and said plainly, "that till the whole army were new modelled, and governed under a stricter discipline, they must not expect any notable success in anything they went about."

The progress of this measure—its defeat by the Lords—and the introduction of a second measure with a similar object, but a less extensive range, has been described in Vane's memoir. The first ordinance forbade any member of either House of Parliament from bearing any office, civil or military, during the war. The second did not carry its prospect into the future, but contented itself with merely discharging members of Parliament from the offices they now held. This variation has been supposed to have had reference to Cromwell, as the law thus modified did not expressly forbid the reappointment of officers so discharged. It subsequently admitted into the House a body of able and determined Republicans—the Ludlows, Iretons, Sidneys, and Blakes, even before the effect of the purge had required an infusion of new blood into that quarter on the formation of the Commonwealth. Exceptions were also voted, as in the first Self-denying Ordinance, in favour of the commissioners of the great seal, the commissioners of the admiralty and navy, and of the revenue. This ordinance passed into a law on the 3d of April; and the day before its introduction into the Upper House, Essex, Manchester, and Denbigh presented themselves in their places, and resigned their commissions.

The "new model" had meanwhile passed the Lower House. It proposed that the military force should consist of 7600 horse and 14,400 infantry, and be placed under the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax as lord-general, assisted by Skippon in the quality of major-general. Its arrangements had not been completed without much difficulty. Three armies of 10,000 men each were reduced to one army of 22,000. This could not be done without considerable derangements of detail; a number of officers were withdrawn from the service, because they were members of Parliament; a number, probably greater, were dismissed, because one army did not require so many as three before had required. The men dismissed were selected chiefly as dissolute or least deserving men. The soldiers were draughted out of old regiments into new; every thing, in a manner, was changed. This could not be without exciting singular discontents, and the dismissed officers got up a party called Reformados.

One circumstance, however, in the project of the new model, provoked remark beyond every other. The lord-general was named,* and a man better qualified than Fairfax, not less by his singular military talents than by the circumstance (which even in the new model had its weight, since it propitiated the prejudices of some, and offended the feelings of none) of his immediate connexion with an old aristocratic family, could not be found. A major-general was named also—Skippon, an excellent and faithful soldier. Twenty-four colonels were also specified, in the charge of as many regiments. But a blank was left for the name of the new lieutenant-general. That the blank was left for the after insertion of the name of Cromwell, no one can reasonably doubt. Happy had it been, in all human probability, for the Commonwealth if the blank had never been filled, supposing Cromwell's genius still to have remained in aid and counsel of the cause; but the fatal result he aimed at was not dreamed of then, and to have surrendered the services of the hero of Marston Moor, at such a crisis as the present, would have been to throw an irrecoverable damp over this new and grand undertaking which his genius had inspired, and only his genius, it was thought, could conduct to a glorious issue.

* I may add, that under this new model Sir Thomas Fairfax was not only appointed commander-in-chief, but also invested with the power of nominating all the officers under him, and with the execution of martial law. No mention is made of the king's authority, nor is any clause for the preservation of his person inserted in the ordinance; but the general is directed to "lead his armies against all and singular enemies, rebels, traitors, and other like offenders, and every of their adherents, and with them to fight, and them to invade, resist, repress, subdue, pursue, slay, kill, and put in execution of death, by all ways and means."

The question of Cromwell's own sincerity in proposing to resign his command under the measure is surely not worth discussing. It seems quite certain that he never contemplated the possibility of his being called on—however ready he might profess himself to answer the call in such a case—to do any such thing. It is not worth disguising the fact, that this ordinance was adopted less from its direct and professed tendency, than from the collateral and overpowering advantages that were to accrue from it in the removal of the aristocratic commanders, and in the reorganization, on the plan of Cromwell's own regiments, of the entire body of the army. Yet the observations of two able, and, on such a question, impartial historians, should not be withheld. Mr. Brodie argues that Cromwell, when he proposed the Self-denying Ordinance, must have acted from disinterested motives, both because he was himself to be subject to the operation of the new law, and also because, if it had passed when he first brought it forward, as he was not at the moment engaged in any military employment, he could not have found a pretext for continuing in the army. It was as late as the 27th of February, this historian remarks, that he was ordered by the Parliament, which he had till then attended, to join Sir William Waller (who had moved into the west), that he might assist him in carrying relief to Melcombe, as well as prevent levies from being made in that neighbourhood for the service of the king; hence, had the Self-denying Ordinance and that for the new model been passed as soon as was expected, both these officers, before the date just mentioned, must have been deprived of their commands, and even rendered incapable of any similar appointment. The conclusion which Mr. Brodie would draw is of course this: that in subsequently acting merely on successive indulgences of leave from the House, Cromwell obeyed an unforeseen difficulty from which he could not escape. Dr. Lingard argues in the same strain, to the effect that his continuation in the command was caused by a succession of events which he could not possibly have foreseen, and could not in honour escape from. "He had been sent," says that historian, "with Waller to oppose the progress of the Royalists in the west: on his return he was ordered to prevent the junction of the royal cavalry with their forces under the king, and he then received a commission to protect the associated counties from insult. While he was employed in this service, the term appointed by the ordinance approached; but Fairfax expressed his unwillingness to part with so experienced an officer at such a crisis, and the two Houses consented that he should remain forty days longer with the army. Before they expired, the great battle of Naseby had been fought: in consequence of the victory, the ordinance was suspended three months in his favour, and ever afterward the same indulgence was reiterated as often as it became necessary.

Be this as it may, "on the 10th of June, 1645," according to the journals of the House of Commons, a letter was read in the Commons from Sir Thomas Fairfax, and divers of the chief officers of his army, dated at Sherrington two days before, "desiring that Lieutenant-general Cromwell might command the horse in chief in Sir Thomas Fairfax his army." Whereupon it was resolved that Sir Thomas Fairfax be desired, if he thinks fit, "to appoint Lieutenant-general Cromwell to command the horse under Sir Thomas Fairfax as lieutenant-general, during such time as this House shall please to dispense with his attendance; and that Sir Thomas Widdrington prepare a letter to be signed by Mr. Speaker, and forthwith sent to Sir Thomas Fairfax, to acquaint him of this vote."

Fairfax's letter ran in these words: "Upon serious consideration how the horse of this army may be managed to the best advantage of the publique, which are at present without any general officer to command them, though as considerable a body as any you have had since the beginning of these unhappy troubles, we have taken the boldnes humbly to desire that this House would be pleased to appoint Lieutenant-general Cromwell to this service, while this hon. House shall think fit to spare him from his attendance in Parliament; the generall esteem and affection which he hath both with the officers and souldiers of this whole army, his own personall worth and ability for the employment, his great care, diligence, courage, and faithfulness in the services you have already employed him, with the constant presence and blessing of God that have accompanied him, make us look upon it as the duty we owe to you and the publique, to make it our humble and earnest suite (if it may seem good to you) to appoint him unto this employment, which shall be received by us with that thankfulness and acknowledgment of your favour which may best expresse how sensible we are of so great an obligation, and how much devoted to your and the kingdome's service."*

The new model had meanwhile been proceeding under Cromwell's direction. The men who composed it belonged chiefly to the Independents, and were selected after the rules Cromwell had originally laid down. The character of this army, so constituted, has been in other portions of this work placed before the reader. They were, perhaps, the most remarkable men who had ever, in any nation, taken up arms for liberty. Each individual soldier marched into battle with the sense of a glorious martyrdom in case of death, and of divine selection in case of life and triumph. One hand held the Bible, the other the sword. For them death had ceased his terrors, and by one overpowering emotion, the sense of pain, of suffering, or fatigue had been in them completely subdued. Not one of them but was a "vessel of glory," set apart for the purposes of heaven. And these soul-elevating thoughts, which gave them a common hope of glory, gave them, too, the united resolution to achieve it. No differences or jealousies struck between them on the eve of a day of battle. Each man's voice rose to heaven with that of his comrade in the same words of hymn and praise: their united swords were as one sword, "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon."

* Merc. Brit., June 9 to 16, 1645. "This desire," adds the journalist, was "assented to with all readiness by the House of Commons, and no doubt but he is exercising the office already."

Charles at this time was master of nearly the whole of the west of England, had a preponderance in the midland counties, held power even in the north, and was complete master of Wales. In a few short weeks he knew not where to turn!

On the failure of the treaty of Uxbridge the campaign of 1645 had commenced in earnest, and Cromwell had already, in virtue of his first dispensation from the House of Commons, and before he received his commission under Fairfax, performed some important services in it. The first was his interception of a body of troops at Islip Bridge, proceeding from the west towards Oxford, with the intention, it was thought, of re-enforcing the king, and of enabling him to march with his artillery against some of the garrisons held by the Parliamentary forces on the banks of the Severn. Having received secret intelligence of this, Cromwell at once put himself at the head of a few chosen squadrons, attacked and defeated the Royalists with great slaughter, took several prisoners, and made himself master of a standard which the queen had recently presented to her own regiment. Happening, too, at this time, to be in the neighbourhood of Blessington House, then a fortified place commanded by Colonel Windebank, Cromwell suddenly made an assault upon it while a number of ladies were within its walls on a visit to the governor's young wife. The terror of the women compelled the colonel to listen to terms, and finally to surrender the garrison, for which imbecility he was soon afterward tried by a court-martial at Oxford, and condemned to be shot. Nor was the energetic soldier less successful in a skirmish with Sir William Vaughan in the same vicinity, whom, with the greater part of his infantry, he is reported to have taken prisoner. In truth, wherever he led the way, victory followed. A reverse his regiment met with about this time was suffered in his absence. He had temporarily left his command on a mission of some importance, when Goring, ordered to that service by the king, executed a sudden and masterly movement against a portion of his troops, fell upon them while crossing the Isis, near Woodstock, and routed them with some loss and much confusion. This enabled the king and Rupert to join their forces; and having done so, they marched in a northerly direction.

Cromwell suspected his design, and communicated with the House of Commons. Orders were at once transmitted to the Scottish army, then before Carlisle. They raised the siege, advanced to the south, intercepted Charles, and foiled his plan. The policy resolved on at the constitution of the new model, and openly declared by Cromwell, was to strike at the king, and keep him constantly in pursuit. Fairfax, in the mean while, had sat down before Oxford. Charles suddenly turned back, with great vigour and resolution surprised and assaulted Leicester, and carried it the very same day he sat down before it. The garrison, to the amount of 1500 men, immediately surrendered themselves prisoners, and the town was given up to all the horrors of a place taken by storm, aggravated by the extreme licentiousness that then prevailed among the royal troops, who, as if in daring defiance and scorn of the men of the new model, had now become infinitely more reckless and dissolute than before.*

Fairfax, never accustomed to rely solely upon himself, began now to feel serious alarm for the safety of the eastern counties, mingled with a responsibility too heavy for himself to bear. He wrote to the House of Commons, as we have seen, to solicit the appointment and co-operation of Cromwell; then, having raised the siege of Oxford, he directed a pursuit against Charles, who had moved from Leicester, fixed his headquarters at Daventry, and there, while his soldiers ravaged and plundered the adjoining country, betaken himself to the pleasures of the chase. As Fairfax pursued his silent march, he received from London the welcome vote for which he had written, and without an instant's delay, thus wrote to Cromwell: "SIR,—You will find, by the enclosed vote of the House of Commons, a liberty given me to appoint you lieutenant-general of the horse of this army, during such time as that House shall be pleased to dispense with your attendance. You cannot expect but that I should make use of so good an advantage, as I apprehend this to be, to the public good, and therefore I desire you to make speedy repair to this army, and give order that the troops of horse you had from hence, and what other horse or dragoons can be spared from the attendance of your foot in their coming up, march hither with convenient speed; and as for any other forces you have there, I shall not need to desire you to dispose of them as you shall find most for the public advantage, which we here apprehend to be, that they march towards us by the way of Bedford. We are now quartered at Wilton, two miles from Northampton, the enemy still at Daventry. Our intelligence is, that they intend to move on Friday, but which way we cannot yet tell. There are, as we hear, more horse than foot, and make their horse their confidence: ours shall be in God. I pray all possible haste towards your affectionate friend to serve you, THOMAS FAIRFAX." This letter bore the date of the 11th of June. With astonishing promptitude, Cromwell, who had evidently not been taken unawares by his commission, drew together about 6000 chosen horse, marched after Fairfax, and on the evening of the 13th of June, came up with him at

* Charles was evidently much elated by these successes. In a letter of June the 9th, he writes to the queen: "I may (without being much too sanguine) affirm that, since this rebellion, my affairs were never in so fair and hopeful a way"—King Charles's Works, Letters, No. 37.

Northampton, where he lay within six miles of Charles.

The presence of Cromwell at once carried life and energy into the camp of Fairfax. He found the general still uncertain of the movements of the king, and, without hesitation, suggested the propriety of sending out a detachment of horse to ascertain the exact position of the Royalists, and to attack their rear should they persist in retiring from the scene of action. Cromwell, resolved to bring on a battle, intrusted this service to Ireton, on whom he could best rely, and who well justified his selection.

The night had scarcely fallen, when Ireton moved silently out with a choice party of men, charged and drove in the king's outposts, and brought back with him several prisoners, from whom all necessary intelligence as to the number and disposition of the enemy was immediately obtained. Cromwell, in great excitement, declared for a "decisive action" on the morrow. Fairfax acquiesced, and about an hour before dawn on the morning of the 14th of June, the whole army formed, and in deep silence and admirable order began its march.

A strange and agitated scene had meanwhile been acting in the camp of Charles. Ireton's assault upon the outposts spread alarm with the rapidity of wildfire; officers, summoned out of their beds to attend a council of war, were seen hurrying towards the king's tent in abrupt excitement and disordered dress, and after an hour's consultation, the whole camp was ordered into motion. With that careless and characteristic gallantry which, whatever their other failings, never failed the Cavaliers, the officers had resolved, notwithstanding their critical position, not only to risk, but to advance and offer battle.*

This resolution taken, the army was at once drawn up on a rising ground about a mile south from Harborough, a position of a most advantageous nature both for the foot, cavalry, and ordnance. The main body of the infantry, amounting to about 25,000, was put under the command of Lord Ashley; the right wing of horse, being somewhat less numerous, was led by Prince Rupert; while the left wing, consisting of cavalry from the northern counties, and of some detachments from Newark, in all not exceeding 1600, was intrusted to the charge of Sir Marmaduke Langdale. In the reserve were the king's life-guards, commanded by the Earl of Lindsey, Prince Rupert's regiment of foot, and the royal horse-guards, under Lord Bernard Stuart, recently created Earl of Litchfield. Here, after remaining in order of battle till eight o'clock (still the busy and fatal morning of the 14th of June!), Charles began to doubt the intelligence on which they had moved, when suddenly Prince Rupert, who had dashed forward with his characteristic impetuosity upward of two miles in front of his men to ascertain the intentions of Fairfax, galloped back, and sent word throughout the line that the enemy were about to turn their backs, and that one fierce attack in pursuit would utterly disperse them. The word was given; Charles put his army in motion; and, relinquishing the favourable ground he had originally occupied, led his battalions into the plain, or fallow field, about a mile in breadth, which separated Harborough from a village called Naseby.

Here, with no thought of retreat, the men of the new model had been drawn up by their great leaders. Here, at dawn in the morning, having sung a psalm in praise of their God, they had sat down composedly and in rank with their arms in their hands. Some few troops merely had been set in motion by Cromwell, and miserably had Rupert, self-deceived, deceived his unfortunate master!

The position, a remarkably strong one, had been selected by Cromwell, who, being satisfied early in the march (from catching a glimpse of a corps of Rupert's cavalry in motion) that the king had doubled back on his pursuers, and determined to give rather than receive battle, suggested to Fairfax the fallow field near Naseby. Along the ridge of a gentle eminence the men were drawn up, the infantry in the centre, the cavalry on either flank, and some twenty pieces of artillery so well planted as to cover every avenue of approach. Fairfax and Skippon commanded the main battle, Cromwell took the right wing, and at his request, Fairfax gave Ireton upon the field the rank of commissary-general, and the command of the horse on the left. The forces were nearly equal, and might amount altogether to about 36,000 men.

Rupert began the battle, and charged Ireton with such furious force that even the astonishing resistance of that lion-like soldier opposed the shock in vain. Again and again he strove to rally his men, but Rupert hewed down every thing before him. At the head of the last few troops who had kept their ground, Ireton then threw himself, with the terrible courage of despair, on a body of the royal infantry; their pikes pierced him in the face and thigh, he fell senseless from his horse, was taken prisoner, and only in the subsequent rout recovered by his friends. His division was now utterly dispersed, and Rupert, regardless, after his impetuous fashion, of the fate of the main body of the men engaged, rushed on after the fugitives, drove them through their reserves with the gay excitement that belonged to the hunting-field rather than the collected resolution and foresight necessary in such a momentous battle, and having reached the enemy's cannon and baggage in the rear, only turned round his jaded horsemen when they had lost all further opportunity of service.

Fairfax, meanwhile, maintained in the centre an unequal fight. Abandoning the privileges of a captain, he grappled personally with the foe, galloped through the thickest of the fray, and, his helmet having been beaten to pieces, still, bareheaded as he was, flamed resolution and courage everywhere among his men, when the colonel of his body-guard, Charles D'Oyley, threw himself before him with his own helmet, entreating him not to hazard unduly so rich a life. "'Tis well enough, Charles," said Fairfax, putting the proffered helmet by.*

* The rule of avoiding repetition of the same events in these biographies has been throughout carefully observed. It was necessary to transgress it in this instance, however, since the battle of Naseby, as described in the Life of Vane, was merely general, and had no relation to the special services of Cromwell.

* Whitelocke. This is possibly the same anecdote on which the author of the "Flagellum" has got up a joke

But, with total rout upon the left wing, and fearful uncertainty in the centre, Cromwell and his Ironsides now singly decided the battle. Langdale had charged after Rupert's example, but might as well have charged against a rock. Recoiling from the steady shock of that iron wall, Cromwell charged him in his turn, first with a heavy fire of carbines, next at the sword's point, routed the whole of his cavalry, sent three squadrons after them to prevent their rallying, and with the remaining four, which he had held steadily in hand, wheeled furiously round, and with loosened rein and spur in his horse's flanks, led them on with overpowering shock against the weary infantry engaged with Fairfax. Not for an instant could the Royalists resist that fell attack. They wavered, gave way, were cut through and through, and fled in all directions. One regiment alone preserved its ground, and scarcely a man of it survived to tell his courageous story.

Charles behaved with the bravery which never deserted him in war. At the head of the cavalry that remained—joined in the instant by Rupert's weary stragglers—he implored them to follow their king, and stand the coming shock. A terrible conviction of his hopeless ruin no doubt then flashed upon him. "One charge more," he exclaimed, "and we recover the day." It was too late; Rupert's cavalry were already worn out by their chase, and the rest had been panic-struck by the charge of the Ironsides. Never was rout so triumphantly complete. Two thousand men were left dead upon the field. The Royalists who were made prisoners were five thousand foot and three thousand horse. There were also captured the whole of Charles's artillery, eight thousand stand of arms, above one hundred pair of colours, the royal standard, the king's cabinet of letters, his coaches, and the whole spoil of his camp.*

against Cromwell. "A commander of the king's," says that ingenious writer, "knowing Cromwell, advanced smartly from the head of his troops to exchange a bullet singly with him, and was with the like gallantry encountered by him, both sides forbearing to come in, till their pistols being discharged, the cavalier, with a slanting back-blow of a broadsword, luckily cut the riband which tied his murrion, and with a draw threw it off his head, and now ready to repeat his stroke, his party came in and rescued him, and one of them alighting, threw up his headpiece into his saddle, which Oliver hastily catching, as being affrighted with the chance, clapped it the wrong way on his head, and so fought with it the rest of the day."

* It may interest the reader to give the first account of this memorable battle, which was published in the journals of the time. The supplementary notices, too, from other journals, are curious and interesting: "It hath pleased God to engage our men with the enemy in a pitched battle (as was then expected). We marched from Naseby early on Saturday morning, June the 14th, and hearing the king's army was near, we drew up into a body a mile or two from Naseby, expecting to be engaged with the king, whose horse suddenly after faced us till their foot drew up into battalia. There never was such rejoicing and courageous expressions used by soldiers as was then on both sides, both seeming willing to put an end to these differences. After we had recommended ourselves to the Almighty's protection, and gave the word (which was, on our side, God is our strength; on the king's side, Queen Mary), our warning piece shot off, upon which Prince Rupert, who then commanded the right wing of the king's horse, rode with a full career up towards our men, but went back. Our forlorn hope and theirs in the mean time met, and played very hot one upon the other, each seeking to gain the hill and wind, which was, at length, equally divided betwixt both parties. One of the Dutch princes (which we all suppose to be Rupert) led up their right wing, and put our left to a shameful retreat, though I confess two things may somewhat ex-

The first civil war was decided by this victory; and so, it is evident, Cromwell at once perceived, for nothing could equal his excitement after the day was won. He led the pursuit for upward of twelve miles, returned to Harborough (Haverbrowe it was then called), and, before taking rest or refreshment after toils that would have worn down the strength of a score of ordinary men, took up his pen and wrote news of the victory to the speaker of the House of Commons. The letter of the second officer in command reached Parliament a day before the letter of the lord-general. The circumstance created some sensation, and no doubt Cromwell intended that it should. The news which was to dismay the Presbyterians more than intelligence of a defeat would have dismayed them, the victory which was to elevate Vane and the Independents into enthusiastic strength and joy, should fitly issue first from him. And how the letter is written—with what an ill-subdued effort from exultation—in what curt regal sentences—with what resolute purpose against his political adversaries in the House! It is addressed to the speaker, and bears date from "Haverbrowe, June the 14th, 1645.

"SIR,—Being commanded by you to this service, I think myself bound to acquainte you with the good hand of God towards you and us. Wee marched yesterday after the kinge, whoe went before us from Daventree to Haverbroue, and quartered about six miles from him.

cuse them: First, the king's men had some marks to know each other by in the fight, and so they knew them not till they were upon them; secondly, in that they were new raised men out of the associated counties, better armed than hearted. Prince Rupert charged on them with such gallantry (as few in the army ever saw the like), and beat them down the hill to the very train, where Col. Bartlett's regiment and the firelocks that guarded the train beat them from it, and won the ground our horse had lost with as much resolution as the enemy gained it. In the mean while, the general who commanded the body of foot behaved himself very courageously in the front of the army; and Major-general Skippon, who is wounded in the side, but hopes of recovery, fell upon the enemy's foot; Lieut.-gen. Cromwell charging before them, with his horse broke into the king's body, routed them, seized upon all their train and cannon, took 4000 foot and horse prisoners, their standard, ensigns, 70 carriages, 12 pieces of ordnance, two of them being demy-cannon, took the king's own wagons, and in one of them a cabinet of letters, supposed to be of great consequence. Four hundred of their men slain in the field, besides many others, which were found dead in the way, and 7000 arms. Lieut.-gen. Cromwell pursued them to Leicester-towns-end, and still remains near it. On our side, we lost at most not above 100 men, whereof one Col. Francis, and two captains; all which, as near as I can guess, was done in the space of an hour and a half."—Extract from a Letter, signed Henry Maud, Harborough, June 15. Weekly Account, June 11 to 18, 1645. . . . "A list of the prisoners, ordnance, ammunition, &c., taken by Sir Thomas Fairfax, near Naseby, the 14th of June, 1645. 4000 prisoners, 600 slain, 4 colonels, 7 lieut.-colonels, 12 majors, 60 captains, 8000 arms, 40 barrels of powder, 12 pieces of ordnance, 200 carriages, 4 coaches, 2 sumpters, one of the king's, the other Prince Rupert's; all the king's plate, and good store of money. Ordered, that the messenger that brought the first intelligence from the general shall have £40; that a messenger from Lieut.-gen. Cromwell shall have £20."—Weekly Account, June 11 to 18, 1645. . . . "Ordered, that Lieut.-general Cromwell continue with the army three months after the 50 days assigned him are expired. I cannot believe that any will repine at so necessary an order."—Merc. Brit., June 16 to 23, 1645. . . . "We hear Cromwell's sometime regiment are grown wise, if it may be so called, for having helped to beat the enemy out of the field; they did not, as at Marston Moor, leave them that fought least to get most, but fell upon the good booty as well as others: some had jewels, others diamond rings, others gold, some were content with silver, good apparel, horses, and what else they could get."—Mod. Intel., 19 to 26, 1645.

This day wee marched towards him. He drew out to meet us. Both armies engaged. Wee, after three howers fight, very doubtfull, at last routed his armie; killed and tooke about 5000, very many officers, butt of what qualitie wee yett know not. Wee took also about 200 carrag—all he had, and all his gunnes, beinge 12 in number, whereof 2 were demie-cannon, 2 demie-culveringes, and (I thinke) the rest sacers. Wee pursued—enemie from 3 miles short of Ha—to nine beyond, even to sight of Leices—, whither the kinge fled. Sir, this is none other butt the hand of God, and to him alone belongs the glorie, wherein none are to share with him. The general served you with all faithfulness and honour; and the best commendations I can give him is, that I d—say he attributes all to God, and would rather perish than assume to himselfe; which is an honest and a thriving way, and yett as much for bravery may be given to him in this action as to a man. Honest men served you faithfully in this action. Sir, they are true. I beseeche you, in the name of God, not to discourage them. I wish this action may begett thankfulness and humilitie in all that are concerned in it. He that venter life for the libertie of his countrie, I wish he trust God for the libertie of his conscience, and you for the libertie he fights for. In this he rests whose is your most humble servant,

“OLIVER CROMWELL.”*

But not in the affairs of battle does the writer rest till all his work is done. After Naseby he overspread the land with his victorious forces, as with a devastating torrent. Leicester was immediately retaken; Taunton, besieged by the dissolute Goring and defended by the valiant Blake, was relieved; Goring himself was beaten, and obliged to retreat to Bridgewater. Here the prudence, not less than the valour, of Cromwell, shone forth most eminently. An advanced party of horse, with inconsiderate rashness, rushed forward to charge the enemy, when, with consummate presence of mind, he checked them until the whole of the cavalry had come up, and then putting himself at their head, attacked the Royalists with such vigour and success, that nearly their whole body of foot became his prisoners, while he captured also the greater part of their ordnance. From this he pushed on against the town itself, which he carried by storm against a heavy garrison. While engaged in this gallant work, he had a very narrow escape from a musket-ball of the enemy.†

* This letter is taken from the MS. in the British Museum. As a matter of course, Cromwell's power was visibly impressed on the people more strongly than ever by the circumstances of this victory. On the 16th of June, the very day the news of their great success reached Parliament, it was resolved that his services should be continued in the army under Sir Thomas Fairfax during the pleasure of both Houses. The Lords restricted it to three months. On the 8th of August, this disposition was renewed for four months longer; and on the 25d of January following, it was extended to six months additional. After this there were no more resolutions about Cromwell's absence from the lower House. He took it for granted that he had leave; “no one offered to move for recalling him; and he soon attained so great a power, that no one with safety could have dared to make such a motion.”

† On Friday last, Lieut.-gen. Cromwell, with some of his officers, made within twice pistol-shot of Bridgewater, to view the town; where, making some stay upon a discourse, the enemy shot a brace of musket bullets, which killed a cornet of his regiment near him, but the lieut.-gen. was preserved.”—Merc. Civ., July 10 to 17, 1645.

Nothing at this period could exceed his vigilance. With every energy apparently taxed by the war, he yet held a careful watch equally on friends and foes, and such as professed themselves to be neither the one nor the other. A kind of third army had recently sprung up in the western counties, calling themselves club-men, ostensibly with the purpose to defend themselves from the rapine and violence of the Royalists, but whose operations were found to be, in reality, as oppressive to the peacefully disposed as those of the Cavaliers had ever been. It was the peculiar interest of the Parliament at this moment to seem equally and eminently regardful of the comfort and welfare of all, and this escaped not Cromwell. By a masterly union of moderation and firmness he at once dispersed these club-men, and thus, in an animated letter to his general in chief (dated August 4, 1645), described the action: “SIR,—I marched this morning towards Shaftsburie; in my way I found a partie of club-men gathered together, about two miles of this side of the towne towards you, and one Mr. Newman in the head of them, whose was one of those that did attend you at Dorchester with Mr. Hollis: I sent to them to knowe the cause of their meeting; Mr. Newman came to me, and told me that the club-men in Dorset and Wilts, to the number of ten thousand, were to meet about their men which were taken away at Shaftsburie, and that their intendment was to secure themselves from plundering. To the first, I told them, that although noe account was due to them, yett I knew the men were taken by your authoritie to be tried judicially for raisinge a third partie in the kingdome, and if they should be found guiltie, they must suffer accordinge to the nature of their offence; if innocent, I assured them you would acquit them. Upon this they said, if they have deserved punishment, they would not have anything to doe with them, and soe were quieted as to that point. . . . For the other, I assured them that it was your great care not to suffer them in the least to be plundered, and that they should defend themselves from violence, and bring to your armie such as did them any wrong, where they should be punished with all severitie; upon this, very quietlie and peaceably they marched away to their houses, being very well satisfied and contented. Wee marched on to Shaftsburie, where wee heard a great bodie of them was drawn together about Hamilton Hill, where indeed neer two thousand were gathered; I sent a forlorne hope of about fifty horse, whose coming very civillie to them, they fired upon them, and they desiringe some of them to come to me, were refused with disdain. They were drawn into one of the old Camps, upon a very high Hill. I sent one Mr. Lee to them, to certifie the peaceableness of my intentions, and to desire them to peaceableness, and to submit to the Parliament; they refused, and fired at us. I sent him a second time, to lett them know that if they would lay downe their Armes, noe wrong should be done them. They still (through the animation of their leaders, and especially two vile Ministers) refused. I commanded your Captain-Lieutenant to draw up to them, to be in readinesse to charge, and if upon his fallinge on they would lay downe armes, to accept them, and spare them. When wee came neer, they refused his offer, and lett flie at him; killed about two of his men, and at least foure horses. The passage, not to be for above three abreast, kept them out, whereupon Major Deburgh wheeled about, got in the rear of them, beat them from the work, and did some small execution upon them—I believe, killed not twelve of them, butt cutt very many—and have taken about 300, many of which are poor sillie creatures, whom if you please to lett me send home, they promise to be very dutifull for time to come, and will be hanged before they come out againe. The ringleaders which we have I intend to bring to you: they had taken divers of the Parliament Souldiers Prisoners, besides Col. Fines his Men, and used them most barbarously, bragging they hoped to see my Lord Hoptons that he is to command them. They expected from Wilts great store, and gave out they meant to raise the siege at Sherburne when they were all mett. Wee have gotten great store of their armes, and they carried few or none home. Wee quarter about ten miles off, and purpose to draw our quarters neer to you to-morrow. Your most humble servant, OLIVER CROMWELL.*

After this Sherburne Castle surrendered, and before we have time to admire the bravery and rapidity of the movement which effected it, the lieutenant-general has sat down before Bristol, in company with Fairfax, whom he advises to storm a place of such importance, if other methods are not of speedy avail. Prince Rupert, who held it with about 5000 horse and foot, had declared that nothing should induce him to surrender, unless, as he had reason to fear, the inhabitants proved disaffected. Cromwell's counsel having been suddenly taken, however, by Fairfax, the attack was made with so much fury, that, though Rupert repelled it for a while, he feared to run the hazard of a second assault, and delivered up the city, and with it a large proportion of the king's magazines and warlike stores.†

* Cromwell's graphic account of this siege is given in the journals of the time: "A letter from Lieut.-gen. Cromwell to the Parliament, dated at Bristol, the 14th of September, was to this effect: That about one of the clock in the morning, Thursday, the 11th instant, Sir Thomas Fairfax stormed the city. The general's signal when to fall on was the burning straw, upon which the men went on with great resolution, and very presently recovered the line, making way for the horse to enter. Col. Montague and Col. Pickering, who stormed at Lawford's Gate, where was a double work well filled with men and cannon, presently entered, and with great resolution beat the enemy from their works, and possessed their cannon without any considerable loss, and laid down the bridges for the horse to enter. Major Desborough commanded the horse, who very gallantly seconded the foot; then our foot advanced to the city walls; there they possessed the great gate against the Castle Street, wherein were put 100 men, who made it good. Sir Hardress Waller, with his and the general's regiment, with no less resolution, entered on the other side of Lawford's Gate towards Avon River, and put themselves into an immediate conjunction with the rest of the brigade. During this, Col. Rainsborough and Col. Hammond attempted Prior's Hill Fort and the line downward towards Frome, Col. Birch and the major-general's regiment being to storm towards Frome River. Col. Hammond possessed the line immediately, and beat the enemy from it, and made way for our horse to enter. Col. Rainsborough, who had the hardest task of all at Prior Fort, attempted it, and fought very near three hours for it; and, indeed, there was great despair of carrying the place, it being exceeding high, a ladder of thirty rounds scarce reaching to the top thereof; but his resolution was such that he would not give it over. The enemy had four pieces of cannon upon it, which they played with round and case shot upon our men. His Lieut.-col. Bowen and others were two hours at push of pike,

Here, during the parley which preceded the capitulation, Cromwell, with Fairfax, again had a marvellous escape from the enemy. They were sitting together on the top of Prior's Hill Fort (which had been taken in the storming attempt), when a piece of ordnance in the castle being directed against that point, the ball grazed the fort within two hands' breadth of them, without doing the slightest injury to either. These were incidents Cromwell well knew how to turn to account, and the word therefore soon ran along the camp of the besiegers that none but an atheist could doubt that such a capture, attended with circumstances so remarkable, must have been the work of the Lord. So also he wrote to the speaker: "It may be thought that some praises are due to these gallant men, of whose valour so much mention is made. Their humble suit to you, and all that have an interest in this blessing, is, that in the remembrances of God's praises they may be forgotten. It is their joy that they are instruments of God's glory and their country's good; it is their honour that God vouchsafes to use them. Sir, they that have been employed in this service know that faith and prayer obtained this city for you; I do not say ours only, but of the people of God with you, and all England over, who have wrestled with God for a blessing in this very thing. Our desires are, that God may be glorified by the same spirit of faith, by which we ask all our sufficiency, and having received it, it's meet that he have all the praise.*"

Round every portion of this country, like a tempest, he now swept with his victorious army. Passing from Bristol to Devizes, he summoned that town to surrender. "Win it and wear it," was the answer of Sir Charles Lloyd, the governor. Cromwell did both. The place was carried by assault, and the greatest moderation shown towards its gallant defenders. After this he stormed Berkeley Castle, and threw himself before Winchester, which surrendered by capitulation.† And now, so severely strict standing upon the pallasades, but nevertheless they could not enter. Col. Hammond being entered the line, Capt. Ireton, with a forlorn of Col. Birch's regiment, interposed with his horse between the enemy's horse, and Col. Hammond received a shot with two pistol bullets, which broke his arm, but the entrance of Col. Hammond did storm the fort on that part which was inward; by which means Col. Rainsborough and Col. Hammond's men entered the fort, and immediately put to the sword almost all in it. And as this was the place of most difficulty, so of most loss to us on that side, and of very great honour to the undertaker. Being thus far possessed of the enemy's works, the town was fired in three places by the enemy, which we could not put out, which began to be a great trouble to the general and all his officers, that so famous a city should be wasted; but, whilst they were viewing that sad spectacle, the prince sent a trumpet to the general, desiring a treaty for the surrender, and so the fire was quenched, and articles agreed on, as you have formerly heard."—Merc. Vivid., Sept. 17–20, 1645.

* In the Kingdom's Weekly Intelligencer we find the following, which strikingly illustrates the use and value of such letters as this: "On the Lord's day, Sept. 21, according to order of Parliament, Lieut.-gen. Cromwell's letter of the taking of Bristol was read in several congregations about London, and thanks returned to Almighty God for the admirable and wonderful reducing of that city. The letter of that renowned commander is well worth observation, and especially these pious and self-denying expressions therein are very remarkable."

† A characteristic incident of this surrender is thus noticed in one of the journals: "We this day received intelligence that Lieut.-gen. Cromwell was come before Winchester with a resolution not to depart from it until he had reduced both town and castle to the obedience of the Parliament. The city made some opposition, contrary to his was Cromwell in exacting compliance from his own army with its articles, that, when information was laid before him by the vanquished that some of his soldiers had plundered them on leaving the city, contrary to the terms granted them, he ordered the offenders to be tried by court-martial, at which they were sentenced to death; whereupon he directed the unfortunate men, who were six in number, to cast lots for the first sufferer, and, after his execution, sent the remaining five, with a suitable explanation of the matter, to Sir Thomas Glenham, governor of Oxford, requesting him to deal with them as he thought fit: a piece of conduct which so charmed the Royalist officer, that he immediately returned the men to Cromwell, with a grateful compliment and expressions of much respect.*

In his account of the surrender of this city, again Cromwell wrote in his old and serviceable strain. "Sir," he said, "I came to Winchester on the Lord's day, the 28th of September, with Col. Pickering, commanding his own, Col. Montague's, and Sir Hardesse Waller's Regiments; after some dispute with the Governour, we entered the towne. I summoned the Castle, was denied; whereupon wee fell to prepare batteries, which wee could not perfect (some of our Gunnes being out of Order) untill Friday followinge. Our batterie was six gunnes, which being finished, after one fireinge round, I sent him a second Summons for a treaty, which they refused, whereupon wee went on with our Worke, and made a breach in the Wall near the Blacke Tower, which after about 200 shot wee thought stormable, and purposed on Munday morninge to attempt it. On Sunday night, about ten of the Clocke, the Governour beat a parley, desiringe to treat. I agreed unto it, and sent Col. Hammond and Major Harrison in to him, whose agreed upon these enclosed Articles. Sir, this is the addition of another mercie; you see God is not weary in doinge you good. I confesse, sir, his favour to you is as visible, when he comes by his power upon the hearts of your Enimies, makinge them quitt places of strength to you, as when he gives courage to your Souldiers to attempt hard things. His goodnesse in this is much to be acknowledged; for the expectation; but, having fire the bridge, he quickly found a means to enter the city and subdue it. We hear that he did send unto the Bishop of Winchester, and offered him a guard to secure his person, but the bishop, flying into the castle, refused the courtesy. Afterward, the castle being begun to be battered by two pieces of ordnance, he sent to the lieutenant-general, giving him thanks for the great favour offered to him, and being now more sensible what it was, he desired the enjoyment of it; to whom the wise lieutenant-general replied, that since he made not use of the courtesy, but wilfully did run away from it, he must partake of the same condition as the others who are with him in the castle, and if he were taken, he must expect to be used as a prisoner of war."

—Diary or ez. Jour., Oct. 2-29, 1645.

* A mistake in regard to the place was committed respecting this incident in the newspaper notices of it: Cromwell inclines to move no faster than his brigade: he went from Blandford to Cerne the 22d. At Blandford he had a council of war, at which was condemned six troopers to die: one was the next morning (to whose lot it fell) to be hanged in the head of the army; the other five are to be sent to the enemy, with a protestation against a detestation of the fact from the Gen. Excellency: when they come thence, they may do their pleasure with them. Their offences were the violation of a convoy, wherein the Lord Ogil suffered, and likewise of the articles at Langford; yet the goods were restored to the owners."—Mod. Int., Oct. 23-30, 1645.

castle was well manned with 680 horse and foot, there beinge neer 200 Gentlemen, Officers, and their Servants; well victualled with 15,000 wait of Cheese, very great store of wheat and beer, near 20 barrels of powder, 7 peeces of Cannon; the workes were exceedinge good and strong. It is very likely it would have cost much blood to have gained it by storme; wee have not lost 12 men. This is repeated to you, that God may have all the praise, for it is all his due. Sir, I rest your most humble Servant,

"OLIVER CROMWELL."

After Winchester, Basing fell before him. This was the seat of the Marquis of Winchester, one of the castellated mansions of those days which had been thought impregnable, having been previously assaulted in vain by Colonels Norton and Harvey and Sir William Waller. To Cromwell, however, "who never failed in any enterprise he undertook," even Basing surrendered, and with its master, the marquis himself, became his own. As soon as he had ascertained his complete success, he thus graphically described it (in a letter dated Basingstoke, 14th October, 1645) to the speaker: "SIR,—I thanke God I can give you a good account of Bazinge. After our Batteries were placed, wee settled the severall posts for the storme; Col. Dalbeire was to be on the north side of the House next the Grange; Col. Pickering on his left hande, and Sir Hardesse Waller's and Col. Montague's regiments next him. Wee stormed this morninge after six of the Clocke. The signall for fallinge on was the fireinge foure of our Cannon, which being done, our men fell on with great resolution and cheerfulness. Wee tooke the two houses without any considerable losse to ourselves. Col. Pickering stormed the new House, passed through, and got the gate of the old House, whereupon they summoned a parley, which our men would not heare. In the mean time, Col. Montague's and Sir Hardesse Waller's Regiments assaulted the strongest worke, where the enemy kept his Court of Guard, which with great resolution they recovered, beating the enemy from a whole culverin, and from that worke: which havinge done, they drew their ladders after them, and got over another worke and the house wall before they could enter. In this Sir Hardesse Waler, performinge his duty with honour and dilligence, was shott on the arme, butt not dangerous; wee have had little losse; many of the enemies our men put to the Sword, and some officers of qualitie. Most of the rest wee have Prisoners, amongst which the Marquisse, and Sir Robert Peake, with divers other Officers, whom I have ordered to be sent up to you. Wee have taken about ten peeces of Ordnance, with much Ammunition, and our Souldiers a good encouragement. I humbly offer to you to have this place utterly slighted, for these followinge reasons: It will aske about eight hundred men to manage it; it is no frontier; the Country is poore about it; the place exceedingly ruined by our batteries and mortar peeces, and a fire which fell upon the place since our takinge it. If you please to take the garizon at Farnham, some out of Chichester, and a good part of the foot which were here under Dalbeire, and make a strong quarter at Newberry with three or foure troupes of horse, I dare be confident it would not only be a curb to Dennington, but a security and a frontier to all these parts, inasmuch as Newbery lyes upon the River, and will prevent any incursion from Dennington, Wallingford, or Farringdon into these parts, and by lyeing there, will make the trade most secure betwene Bristol and London for all carriages; and I believe the Gentlemen of Sussex and Hampshire will with more cheerfulness contribute to maintaine a garizon on the frontier than in their Bowells, which will have lesse safety in it. Sir, I hope not to delay, butt march towards the west to-morrow, and to be as diligent as I may in my expedition thither. I must speake my Judgement to you, that if you intend to have your worke carried on, Recruits of foote must be had, and a course taken to pay your Armie, else believe me, Sir, it may not be able to answer the worke you have for it to doe. I intrusted Col. Hammond to wait upon you, whoe was taken by a mistake whilst wee lay before this Garizon, whome God safely delivered to us to our great joy, but to his losse of almost all he had, which the Enimy tooke from him. The Lorde grant that these mercies may be acknowledged with all thankfulness. God exceedingly abounds in his goodness to us, and will not be weary until righteousness and peace meet, and that he hath brought forth a glorious worke for the happinesse of this poore kingdom; wherein desires to serve God and you with a faithfull hand, your most humble servant,

"OLIVER CROMWELL."

Still victoriously sweeping on, the irresistible commander of horse next set himself down before Langford House, near Salisbury, which at the first summons surrendered to him. Posting then beyond Exeter, he fought Lord Wentworth at Bovey Tracy, and took from him 500 prisoners, horse and foot, with six standards, of which one was the king's. Next, uniting with Fairfax, they in conjunction took Dartmouth by storm, and defeated Lord Hopton, after a very gallant resistance, at Torrington; whence, pursuing the last remains of the Royalist army into Cornwall, mutiny and licentiousness did the work of victory, their commander being obliged to break them up, with the exception of a few who retired with him into Pendinnis Castle. Prince Charles, from whom Lord Hopton's forlorn charge had been delegated, had previously fled for safety, with several noblemen of his party, to the isles of Scilly. Sir Jacob Astley held the king's last remaining force of 3000 cavalry. But Sir Jacob also being defeated and made a prisoner, there remained not an enemy to the Parliament in the open field. "Now," said Astley, when his captors carried him off to their headquarters, "you have done your work, and may go to play; unless [but how propheticall was the reservation!] you choose to fall out among yourselves."

Charles had meanwhile, hopeless of another rally before these astonishing successes, shut himself up in Oxford. But even against Oxford itself was the triumphant army of the west, under Fairfax and Cromwell, now approaching. The unhappy king, in his misery, saw only one resource. With clipped beard and in the disguise of his attendant's groom, he escaped out of Oxford at three o'clock in a sharp morning of spring, and took his way to the Scottish camp.

Cromwell had meanwhile been received in London with extraordinary honours. The instant he entered the House the members rose and welcomed him, and the speaker, in their name, after an elaborate eulogium, delivered "the hearty thanks of the House for his great and many services." But the gratitude of Parliament was not confined to such demonstrations of their confidence and esteem. In the latter end of the year 1645, an annuity of £2500 appears to have been granted to Cromwell and his family for the services which he had performed to the public; and soon afterward it was ordered by the House of Commons, "that all the lands of the Earl of Worcester, Lord Herbert, and Sir John Somerset, his sons, in the county of Southampton, be settled upon Lieutenant-general Cromwell and his heirs, to be accounted as part of the £2500 per annum formerly appointed him by this House." To secure the full return of the stipulated income, it was further ordered, on the 31st of January, 1646, "that Mr. Lisle do bring in an ordinance for the full granting unto and settling upon Lieutenant-gen. Cromwell and his heirs the manors of Abberston and Itchell, with the rights, members, and appurtenances thereof, in the county of Southampton, being the lands of John, lord-marquis of Winchester, a delinquent that hath been in arms against the Parliament, and a papist."

Oliver St. John's letter, communicating to his great kinsman these accessions to his fortune, is too characteristic of what the writer must have known to be pleasing to Cromwell to be omitted here. "Deere sir," he wrote, "I have herewithall sente you the order of the House of Commons for settling £2500 per annum upon you and your heires, and the ordinance of Parliament in pursuance thereof, in part, whereby the landes therein mentioned, being all the landes of the Earle of Worcester in that county, are settled upon you. I have likewise sent you a rent-roll of the quit-rents. The manors consist most of old rents. There are the advowsons. I am told by Col. Norton and Mr. Wheeler, whoe knowe the landes, that they are accounted £100 per annum. . . . I endeavoured to passe this for the present, rather than to have stayed longer to make up the whole. Your patent was speedily prepared, and is this day passed the great seal. I have not sente it downe, but will keepe it for you, until I receive your direction to whome to deliver it. The charges of passing the ordinances to the clerkes, and of the seale, my clerke of the patents hath satisfied; you shall hereafter knowe what they come to. I delivered a copy of the ordinance to Mr. Lisle, to send it to the committee of sequestrations, whoe hath, together with a letter to them, desyred that the sequestrators take care that noe wrong bee done to the landes. That which principally moved mee to it was because I heard there were goodly woods, and tho' much had been formerly cutt, that for the future a stop might be made. By the ordinance sent you, you will be auctorized to send some bayliffe of your owne to husband the landes to your best advantage, which would bee done speedilie. There is another order of the House for preparing an ordinance for a goodly house and other landes in Hampshire, of the Marquisse of Winchester's. Wee had thought to have had them in the ordinance already passed, but by absence of some, when I brought in the other, that fayled. Perhaps it is better as it is, and that the addition might have staid this. You know to whome the marquisse hath relation;* and in regard that our commission for the seale ends with this month, I desyred rather for the presente to passe this, than to hazard the delay. Mr. Lisle was ordered to bring in the other ordinance: it is not yet done. Sir, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Lisle, Sir Thomas Germaine, have been real friends to you in this businesse, and heartilie desire to have you seated, if possible, in their countrie. Remember by the next to take notice hereof by letter unto them." The patent alluded to in this letter by St. John is no doubt explained by a previous resolution of the House, dated the 1st of December, 1645, and to be found in these words on the journals: "Resolved, that the title and dignity of a baron of the kingdom of England, with all rights, privileges, pre-eminencies, and precedencies to the said title and dignity belonging or appertaining, be conferred and settled on Lieutenant-general Oliver Cromwell, and the heirs male of his body; and that his majesty be desired in these propositions (for a piece) to grant and confer the said title and dignity upon him, and the heirs male of his body accordingly; and that it be referred to the former committee to consider of a fit way and manner for the perfecting thereof."

It does not fall within my purpose here to describe the long, the intricate, and not very interesting struggles which now took place between the Presbyterians and Independents for the custody of the person of the king, after the Scots had delivered him up once more into the power of the English commissioners. The civil strength of the Independents increased by the elections of Ireton, Ludlow, Sidney, Skippon, Hutchinson, and Blake—the wily advantage taken by Cromwell in the organization of the agitators—the scenes at Ware, and the seizure of the king by force, have already received incidental notice in the discussion of Cromwell's character and resources.

It will be sufficient to observe that, while Cromwell and Fairfax held Charles at Hampton Court, a vast variety of negotiations were opened with Cromwell by the king, and in the management of all he acted with the close counsel and assistance of his son-in-law Ireton. That a treaty was entered into by Charles with these generals—having for its basis his reinstatement on the throne, his surrender of his chief friends, his concession of every popular right, his wide and universal toleration in all matters of conscience, with, among other incidental conditions, the earldom of Essex, the garter, and the government of Ireland for Cromwell—is not disputed by any one; whether with any sincere purpose on the part of Cromwell, admits of most serious question; whether with any on the part of Charles, certainly admits of none. Here, as in all matters where what he supposed the prerogatives of his crown came in question, Charles was hopelessly insincere. Mrs. Hutchinson would have us suppose that Cromwell and Ireton acted throughout in good faith, and were only turned against the king at last by the discovery of bad faith in him. "To speak the truth," she says, "of all, Cromwell was at this period so uncorruptly faithful to his trust and to the people's interest, that he could not be drawn into the practice of his own usual and natural dissimulations in this occasion. His son-in-law Ireton, that was as faithful as he, was not so fully of the opinion (till he found the contrary) but that the king might be managed to comply with the public good of his people after he could no longer uphold his own violent will; but upon some discourses, the king uttering these words to him, 'I shall play my game as well as I can,' Ireton replied, 'If your majesty have a game to play, you must give us also the liberty to play ours.'" This would lead us to conclude, however, that Cromwell had never very favourably listened to the proposed treaty.

Ominous symptoms of distrust in both Cromwell and Ireton were speedily detected by the king's attendants. "Being commanded," says Ashburnham, "by his majesty to desire from Cromwell and Ireton that hee might remove Stoake to one of his owne houses, they told mee (with verie severe countenances) hee should go if hee pleased to Oatlands; but that they had mett with sufficient proof that the king had not only abetted and fomented the differences betweene them and their enemies, by commanding all his partie to take conditions under the (then) Parliament and city, but that likewise hee had (at that instant) a treatie with the Scots, when hee made greatest profession to close with them; for the justification of which, they affirmed that they had both his and the queene's letters to make it good, which were greate alloyes to their thoughts of serving him, and did verie much justifie the generall misfortune hee lived under of having the reputation of little faith in his dealings." And again, Ashburnham (whose intercourse with both Cromwell and the king was more free and unreserved than that of the other royal attendant Berkeley) tells us, that Cromwell, after the rejection of the proposals, professed himself still favourable to the king's restoration, but became more reserved and private, and that "he and Ireton withdrew themselves by degrees from the freedom of their wonted discourses of his majesty's recovery."

Those proposals*—noble, and liberal, and tolerant as they were—have been amply described and illustrated in the memoir of Mar-

* Winchester had married the half-sister of the Earl of Essex.

* I may mention, that during the negotiation of the "proposals," Fairfax obtained, with difficulty, the consent of the Parliament that the king should be allowed to see his children. The Dukes of York and Gloucester, aged respectively fourteen and seven, and the Princess Elizabeth, twelve years, met their father at Maidstone, and passed two days with him at Caversham. "The interview was so affecting that Cromwell, who was present, is said to have shed tears in describing it, and to have declared his conversion to the most implicit faith in the goodness of the king." Cromwell's tears, as we have seen, were on every occasion ready and serviceable, and it is not possible to suppose real emotion here. Our masterly painter, Macclise, has hit the truer thought in his noble expression, upon the face of Cromwell, of bold and resolute sagacity, touched with a forecast of the future, in his recent fine treatment of this extraordinary scene.

ten. After their rejection, no doubt Cromwell and Ireton felt the pressure of the army. From the memoirs of Berkeley, indeed, we distinctly learn that now the lieutenant-general absolutely affected to consider himself in danger, and requested that Berkely and Ashburnham would not repair so frequently and with so little disguise to his quarters. He still, indeed, declared his undiminished anxiety for an adjustment of all differences, imprecating on himself and his posterity the vengeance of heaven if he were not sincere in his endeavours to serve the king in that particular, but, at the same time, did not conceal his apprehensions in regard to the inconstancy of the army. Our former remarks on the character of the future lord-protector may possibly, in some sort, explain these apparent crafts and subtleties.

But now a decisive movement approached, which is thus curiously accounted for in the memoir prefixed to the State Letters of Orrery, better known by the name of Lord Broghill. It is a truly remarkable piece of secret history. "One time, particularly," says the writer, "in the year 1649, when Lord Broghill was riding, with Cromwell on one side of him, and Ireton on the other, at the head of their army, they fell into discourse about the late king's death. Cromwell declared, that if the king had followed his own mind, and had had trusty servants about him, he had fooled them all. And further said, that once they had a mind to have closed with him; but, upon something that happened, they fell off from their design again. My lord, finding Cromwell and Ireton in good humour, and no other person being within hearing, asked them if he might be so bold as to desire an account, 1st. Why they once would have closed with the king? and, 2dly. Why they did not? Cromwell very freely told him he would satisfy him in both his queries. The reason, says he, why we would once have closed with the king, was this: we found that the Scots and the Presbyterians began to be more powerful than we; and if they had made up matters with the king, we should have been left in the lurch; therefore, we thought it best to prevent them, by offering first to come in upon any reasonable conditions. But while we were busied with these thoughts, there came a letter from one of our spies, who was of the king's bedchamber, which acquainted us that on that day our doom was decreed; that he could not possibly tell what it was, but we might find it out if we could intercept a letter from the king to the queen, wherein he declared what he would do. The letter, he said, was sewed up in the skirt of a saddle, and the bearer of it would come with the saddle upon his head, about ten o'clock that night, to the Blue Boar inn in Holborn, for there he was to take horse and go to Dover with it. This messenger knew nothing of the letter in the saddle, but some persons in Dover did. We were at Windsor when we received the letter; and immediately upon the receipt of it, Ireton and I resolved to take one trusty fellow with us, and with troopers' habits to go to the inn in Holborn, which accordingly we did, and set our man at the gate of the inn, where the wicket only was open, to let people in and out. Our man was to give us notice when a person came there with a saddle, while we, in the disguise of common troopers, called for cans of beer, and continued drinking till about ten o'clock: the sentinel at the gate then gave notice that the man with the saddle was come in. Upon this we immediately rose, and, as the man was leading out his horse saddled, came up to him with drawn swords, and told him we were there to search all that went in and out; but as he looked like an honest man, we would only search his saddle, and so dismiss him. Upon that we ungirt the saddle, and carried it into the stall where we had been drinking, and left the horseman with our sentinel; then, ripping up one of the skirts of the saddle, we there found the letter of which we had been informed; and having got it into our hands, we delivered the saddle again to the man, telling him he was an honest man, and bidding him go about his business. The man, not knowing what had been done, went away to Dover. As soon as we had the letter we opened it, in which we found the king had acquainted the queen that he was now courted by both factions, the Scotch Presbyterians and the army, and which bid fairest for him should have him; but he thought he should close with the Scots sooner than the other, &c. Upon this, added Cromwell, we took horse and went to Windsor; and, finding we were not likely to have any tolerable terms from the king, we immediately, from that time forward, resolved his ruin."

This fatal letter, which, if this account is believed, may be said to have decided Charles's fate, is thus curiously described to us by the author of a work called Richardsoniana. "Lord Bolingbroke," he says, "told us [Mr. Pope, Lord Marchmont, and himself] that Lord Oxford had often told him that he had seen, and had in his hands, an original letter that King Charles I. wrote to the queen, in answer to one of hers that had been intercepted, and then forwarded to him, wherein she had reproached him for having made those villains too great concessions (viz., that Cromwell should be lord-lieutenant of Ireland for life without account; that that kingdom should be in the hands of the party, with an army there kept which should know no head but the lieutenant; that Cromwell should have a garter, &c.). That in this letter of the king's it was said that she should leave him to manage, who was better informed of all circumstances than she could be; but she might be entirely easy as to whatever concessions he should make them, for that he should know in due time how to deal with the rogues, who, instead of a silken garter, should be fitted with a hempen cord. So the letter ended: which answer, as they waited for, so they intercepted accordingly; and it determined his fate. This letter Lord Oxford said he had offered £500 for."

Whatever the actuating motives may have been—and perhaps, after all that has been said, the reader will have little difficulty in forming his conclusions of them—it is certain that affairs now took a gloomy turn for the king. Influenced by their own despair of Charles, or by the formidable attitude of the agitators (encouraged secretly, however, in their commencement by Cromwell), the great lieutenant-general and his son-in-law embarked with the extreme Republicanism of the army. Ashburnham has noted it down as a memorable circumstance, that at this time it was that Cromwell discoursed earnestly and elaborately with Colonel Rich of the happiness which would be the lot of the people of England with such a government as the Netherland States-General—and no doubt with such a protector, or Prince of Orange, as Lieutenant-general Cromwell himself could have furnished!

Charles's last fatal step was his flight to Carisbrooke. But let him not be censured too harshly for this, since there is strong ground for supposing that Cromwell secretly instigated him to a movement of some kind. There is no doubt the flight was made in consequence of a letter he received, hinting that his life was in danger from the army agitators; and that Cromwell had written to the officer in command at Hampton Court, is manifest from what transpired during the examination of the latter at the bar of the House of Commons. Addressing the speaker, Colonel Whaley says, "You demand of me what that letter was that I showed the king the day he went away. The letter I shall show you; but, with your leave, I shall first acquaint you with the author, and the ground of my showing it to the king. The author is Lieutenant-general Cromwell; the ground of my showing it was this: the letter intimates some murderous design, or at least some fear of it, against his majesty. When I read the letter, I was much astonished, abhorring that such a thing should be done, or so much as thought of by any that bear the name of Christians. When I had shown the letter to his majesty, I told him I was sent to safeguard him, and not to murder him; I wished him to be confident no such thing should be done; I would first die at his feet in his defence; and therefore I showed it to him, that he might be assured, though menacing speeches came frequently to his ear, our general officers abhorred so bloody and so villanous an act."

While this is admitted, however, let us add, that there is no reason for supposing Hammond in any way suborned by Cromwell or Ireton to the part he played with his royal prisoner, though when they found their kinsman in possession of such a prize, it seems certain they resolved to make the best of it. Ashburnham has given a very curious letter from Cromwell to "Colonel Robert Hammond," evidently designed to overweigh some objections entertained by the latter to the justice of any resistance on the part of the army to the power of the majority in Parliament. The wily lieutenant-general resorts to his stronghold of providence and the providential, and justifies such a resistance in a particular case. "Was there not," he asks, "a little of this [the providential] when Robert Hammond, through dissatisfaction too, desired retirement from the army, and thought of quiet in the Isle of Wight?" He proceeds: "You say 'God had appointed authorities among the nations, to which active or passive obedience is to be yielded. This resides in England in the Parliament. Therefore, active or passive, &c.' Authorities and powers are the ordinance of God. This or that species is of human institution, and limited, some with larger, others with stricter bonds, each one according to its constitution. I do not, therefore, think the authorities may do any thing, and yet such obedience due; but all agree, there are cases in which it is lawful to resist. If so, your ground fails, and so likewise the inference. Indeed, dear Robin, not to multiply words, the query is, whether ours be such a case? This ingenuously is the true question. To this I shall say nothing, though I could say very much; but only desire thee to see what thou findest in thy own heart as to two or three plain considerations: 1st, Whether salus populi be a sound position? 2dly, Whether, in the way in hand, really and before the Lord, before whom conscience must stand, this be provided for; or the whole fruit of the war like to be frustrated, and all most like to turn to what it was, and worse? And this contrary to engagements, declarations, implicit covenants with those who ventured their lives upon those covenants and engagements, without whom, perhaps, in equity, relaxation ought not to be. 3dly. Whether this army be not a lawful power, called by God to oppose and fight against the king upon some stated grounds; and being in power to such ends, may not oppose one name of authority for those ends as well as another, the outward authority that called them not by their power making the quarrel lawful, but it being so in itself? If so, it may be, acting will be justified in foro humano."

Dear Robin's scruples, however, were likely to be better satisfied by a succeeding letter, announcing glorious news, and every way most characteristic of the writer. "DEAREST ROBIN, —Now (blessed be God) I can write, and thou receive freely. I never in my life sawe more deepe sense, and less will to shewe it unchristianly, than in that w^{ch} thou diddest write to us at Windsor, and though in the midst of thy tentation, w^{ch} indeed (by what wee understood of it) was a great one, and occasioned the greater by the letter the generall sent thee, of w^{ch} thou wast not mistaken when thou diddest challenge me to be the penner. How good has God beene to dispose all to mercie; and although it was trouble for the present, yett Glorie is come out of it, for w^{ch} wee praise the Lorde with thee and for thee; and truly the carriage has beene such as occasions much honour to the name of God and  religion. Goe on in the strength of the Lord, and the Lorde be still with thee. But (deere Robin) this businesse hath been (I trust) a mightie providence to this poore Kingdome, and to us all. The House of Comons is very sensible of the K^s dealings, and of our Brethrens, in this late transaction. You should doe well (if you have anythinge that may discover juggling) to search it out and lett us knowe it; it may be of admirable use at this time, because wee shall (I hope) instantly goe upon businesses in relation to them, tendinge to prevent danger. The House of Comons has this day voted as follows: First, that they will make noe more addresses to the K. 2dly. No^e shall applie to him w^{thout} leave of the two Houses, upon paine of beinge guiltie of high treason. 3dly. They will receive nothinge from the Kinge, nor shall any other bringe anythinge to them from him, nor receive anythinge from the Kinge. Lastly, the Members of both Houses, who were of the Committee of both Kingdomes, are established in all that power in themselves for England and Ireland w^{ch} they had to act with both Kingdomes, and Sr. John Evelin of Wilts is added in the roome of Mr. Recorder, and Rath. F. Fiennys in the roome of Sir Phillip Stapleton, and my Lorde of Kent in the roome of the Earl of Essex. I think it good you take notice of this, the sooner the better. . . . Lett us knowe how it's with you in point of strength, and what you neede from us : some of us thinke the Kinge well with you, and that it concerns us to keep that Island in great securitie, because of the French, &c. And if soe, where can the kinge be better? If you have more force, you will suer of full provision for them. The Lorde blesse thee : pray for thy deere friend and servant,

"O. CROMWELL."

The debate referred to here had been a momentous one indeed, declaring openly the purpose of a republic, and the fate that impended over the king. Ireton spoke with a calm and deadly resolution. He said, "The king had denied the protection to the people which was the condition of obedience to him ; that, after long patience, they should now, at last, show themselves resolute ; that they should not desert the brave men—the many thousand godly men—who had fought for them beyond all possibility of retreat or forgiveness, and who would never forsake the Parliament, unless the Parliament first forsook them." "After some farther debate," says the author who has recorded these speeches, "Cromwell brought up the rear. 'It was time,' he said, 'to answer the public expectation, that they were able and resolved to govern and defend the kingdom by their own power, and teach the people they had nothing to hope from a man whose heart God hardened in obstinacy.' 'Do not,' said he, after giving a flattering character of the army, whose valour and godliness he extolled in the highest degree, 'let the army think themselves betrayed to the rage and malice of an irreconcilable enemy, whom they have subdued for your sake, from whom they should meet revenge and justice ; do not drive them to despair, lest they seek safety by other means than adhering to you, who will not stick to yourselves ; and (laying his hand on his sword) how destructive such a resolution in them will be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to judge.'"¹

The resolutions for holding no more treaties with the king—in other words, for establishing a republic in England—passed by a majority of 141 to 92.

The immediate effect of this outside the House was startling, and considerable agitation appeared in various quarters. An alarming tumult in the city, in which the apprentices forced the guard, and ventured to engage the military under the command of the general, was quickly followed by similar disturbances in Norwich, Canterbury, Exeter, and several other places. At the same time, petitions from different public bodies poured into the two Houses, all concurring in the same prayer, that the army should be disbanded, and the king brought back. Even now some project of a despotism seemed dreaded. Cromwell and his friends aware that it would not be in their power to control the city while their forces were employed in the field, withdrew their opposition in the lower chamber so far as to permit the Presbyterian party to carry a vote that no change should be made in the fundamental government of the realm by king, Lords, and Commons ; and on this ground the citizens declared themselves engaged to live and to die with the Parliament.*

The "men of Kent," under Hales and Goring, had, meanwhile, encouraged by these city tumults, flown to arms, and engaged the troops commanded by Fairfax and Major-general Skippon. They were defeated, but the resolution with which they fought at Maidstone startled Cromwell into personal exertion once again on the field of battle. The Welsh had, at the same time, assembled under the banners of their chiefs ; and Colonel Poyer, the governor of Pembroke Castle, an officer in the service of the Parliament, joined by Colonels Langhorne and Powell, had proclaimed Charles, and defied his enemies.

Several towns followed the example with which they were thus supplied, and in some skirmishes which followed, the advantage was on the side of the Royalists ; but the approach of Cromwell at the head of a few regiments of veterans crushed the hopes of the insurgents. Having driven them within their walls, the lieutenant-general immediately invested Pembroke, resolved to carry the fortress in his usual manner by a spirited assault. His men, cheered by the presence of their invincible leader, and inflamed by the fanatical discourses of Hugh Peters, "dashed into the ditch, ascended the ramparts, and were about to throw themselves upon the garrison," whom they had hoped to find unprepared, when, on a sudden, they were attacked with the utmost fury, and, after a sanguinary conflict amid the darkness and confusion of night, compelled to return to their camp considerably diminished in number. For two months the castle held out, and then surrendered under circumstances which left no hope of mercy. Yet Cromwell was not unmerciful. Langhorne, Poyer, and Powell were condemned to death as traitors. After several months' imprisonment, it was ordered that one only, to be determined by lot, should suffer. The lot fell upon Poyer, and he was executed.

Cromwell's amazingly watchful activity at this time may be well illustrated by a letter of his (in the British Museum), addressed to some officers in the Welsh counties. It tells its own story : "I send," he says, "this enclosed by itself, because it's of greater moment. The other you may communicate to Mr. Rumsey as far as you thinke fitt, and I have written. I would not have him or other honest men be discouraged that I thinke it not fitt at present to enter into contests ; it will be good to yeeld a little for publique advantage, and truly that is my end, wherein I desire you to satisfie them. . . . I have sent, as my letter mentions, to have you remove out of Brecknoksheire, indeed into that part of Glamorgansheire w^{ch} lyeth next Munmouthsheire, for this end. . . . Wee have plaine discoveries that Sir Trevor Williams, of Langevie, about two miles from Uske, in the countie of Munmouth, was very deepe in the plott of betrayinge Chepstowe Castle, soe that wee are out of doubt of his guiltinesse thereof. . . I doe hereby authorize you to seize him, as also the high sheriffe of Munmouth, Mr. Morgan, whoe was in the same plott. . . But because Sir Trevor Williams is the more dangerous man by farr, I would have you to seize him first, and the other will easilie be had. To the end you may not be frustrated, and that you be not deceived, I thinke fitt to give you some caracters of the man, and some intimations how things stand. He is a man (as I am informed) full of craft and subtiltie, very bould and resolute, hath a house at Langevie well stored with armes, and very stronge, his neighbours about him very malignant and much for him, whoe are apt to rescue him if apprehended, much more to discover anything which may prevent it. He is full of iealosie, partly out of guilt, butt much more because he doubts some that were in the businesse have discovered him, which indeed they have, and alsoe because he knowes that his servant is brought hither, and a minister to be examined here, whoe are able to discover the whole plott. If you should march directly into that countie and neer him, it's odds he either fortifies his house, or gives you the slip, soe alsoe if you should goe to his house and not finde him there, or if you attempt to take him and misse to effect it, or if you make any known enquire after him, it will be discovered. . . Wherefore to the first you have a faire pretence of goinge out of Brecknoksheire to quarter about Newport and Carleon, which is not above 4 or 5 miles from his house. You may send to Col. Herbert, whose house lyeth in Munmouthsheire, whoe will certaintie acquaintance you where he is. You are alsoe to send to Capt. Nicolas, whoe is at Chepstowe, to require him to assiste you if he should gett into his house, and stand upon his guard. Sam Jones, whoe is quartered to Col. Herbert's troupe, will be very assistinge to you if you send to him to meete you at your quarters, both by lettinge you knowe where he is, and alsoe in all matters of intelligence. If theire shall be neede, Capt. Burge his troupe, now quartering in Glamorgansheire, shall be directed to receive orders from you. You perceive by all this that wee are (it may be) a little too much sollicitous in this businesse; it's our fault; and, indeed, such a temper causeth us often to overact businesse, wherefore without more adoe wee leave it to you, and you to the guidance of God herein, and rest yours, O. CROMWELL. . . If you seize him, bring & lett him be brought with a strong guard to me. If Capt. Nicolas should light on him at Chepstowe, doe you strengthen him with a good guard to bring him. . . If you seize his person, disarme his house, butt lett not his armes be imbeziled. . . If you need Capt. Burge his troupe, it quarters betweene Newport and Cardiffe."

* Lingard, vol. x.

Then followed the Presbyterian invasion by the Covenanters' army of the Scots, and the regular commencement of the second civil war. Cromwell, advised of this, at once put his forces in motion to join Lambert in the north, and give the Covenanters battle. He did this, it may be supposed, with especial zeal, and the battle of Preston, fought August 17th, 1648, threw both kingdoms into the hands of the Republicans. The Scots, "who found some difficulty in comprehending that Cromwell was not still in Wales" (with such rapidity had he approached), even by this their decisive overthrow in Lancashire, were commanded by Duke Hamilton; the English, who sided with them, by the same Sir Marmaduke Langdale whom Cromwell had beaten at Naseby. Their armies together numbered 21,000; the force under Cromwell, including Lambert's, which had effected a junction with him on his approach, did not in all, according to Whitelocke, exceed 8600. Nothing but the event could have justified the instant assault of the Royalists with this vast disparity of force. But the bigotry of the Scots gave Cromwell an advantage which he had no doubt well calculated on: "their sectarian hatred of the Cavalier army, notwithstanding their engagement in the same cause, leading them to withhold their support from their English allies, when the latter were separately attacked;"* and their own perfect overthrow justly and most retributively followed. As to the north countrymen under Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Cromwell confessed that never had he seen foot fight so desperately as they. But nothing could withstand the furious charges of Cromwell and his old gallant Ironsides. Two thousand men were slain in the battle, and as many prisoners taken by the Republicans (including the Duke of Hamilton himself, the leader of the confederates) as exceeded in number their own entire army.

On the 20th of August, Cromwell wrote to the speaker of the House of Commons a most striking despatch of this battle. "After the conjunction of that party," he begins, "which I brought with me out of Wales with the northern forces about Knaresborough and Wetherby, hearing that the enemy was advanced with their army into Lancashire, we came the 6th instant to Hodder Bridge, over Ribble, where we had a council of war, and upon advertisement the enemy intended southward, and since

* This is alleged in various authorities. The rage of the Cavaliers knew no bounds, as may be seen in the following extract from the Parliament Porter: "Nothing is heard now among the brethren but triumph and joy, singing and mirth, for their happy success (thanks to the devil first, and next to Noll Cromwell's nose) against the Scots, when they vaunt they have beaten to dust. The truth is, even Duke Hamilton himself was corrupted with money; why else did he deliver 5000 foot and 2000 horse unto the command of Major-gen. Bailly, a sworn servant of the Kirkmen of Scotland, who surrendered them all up into the hands of Cromwell, without striking one stroke? The truth is, the Scots army is totally routed (so great are our sins, and so fierce is the wrath of the Almighty against us). Duke Hamilton being besieged in the town of Uttoxeter, was forced to yield himself and the small handful with him; and as if the devil had got to himself the sole sway of mundane affairs, the most valiant and heroic knight, Sir Marmaduke, was unluckily surprised, with some other worthy Loyalists, as they were sitting in a blind alehouse, where they supposed themselves secure, and carried prisoners to Nottingham Castle. But Monro, one of the best soldiers in Christendom, is coming on with a powerful army, to give Noll Cromwell another field fight. He hath sent to the estates of Scotland, imploring them for a recruit both of men and money, which they have ordered him: the renowned Earl of Callender, with some troops of horse, is escaped to him, with whom he hath united his remnant: if Cromwell can shatter this army also, he will prove himself one of the most fortunate villains that ever acted mischief. He will find hard play here, for these will not be laughed out of their loyalty, nor frightened out of themselves with the blazing of his beacon nose."—Parl. Port., Aug. 28 to Sept. 4, 1648 confirmed that they resolved for London itself, and information that the Irish forces, under Monro, lately come out of Ireland, which consisted of 1200 horse and 1500 foot, were on their march towards Lancaster, to join with them, it was thought that to engage the enemy to fight was our business, and accordingly we marched over the bridge that night, and quartered the whole army in the fields. Next morning we marched towards Preston, having intelligence that the enemy was drawing together thereabouts from all his out-quarters.

We drew out a forlorn of about 200 horse and 400 foot: these gallantly engaged the enemy's scouts and outguards until we had opportunity to bring up our whole army. So soon as our foot and horse were come up, we resolved that night to engage them if we could, and therefore advancing with our forlorns, and putting the rest of the army into as good a posture as the ground would bear (which was totally inconvenient for our horse, being all enclosure, and miry ground), we pressed upon them through a lane, forced them from their ground after four hours' dispute, until we came to the town, into which four troops of my regiment first entered, and being well seconded by Col. Harrison's regiment, charged the enemy in, the town, and cleared the streets. At the last the enemy was put into disorder, many men slain, many prisoners taken; the duke, with most of the Scots horse and foot, retreated over the bridge, where, after a very hot dispute betwixt the Lancashire regiments, part of my lord-general's and them being at push of pike, they were beaten from the bridge, and our horse and foot following them, killed many, and took divers prisoners, and we possessed the bridge over Darwent, and a few houses there; the enemy being drawn up within musket shot of us, where we lay that night, we not being able to attempt further upon the enemy, the night preventing us. In this posture did the enemy and we lie the most part of that night. Upon our entering the town, many of the enemy's horse fled towards Lancaster, in the chase of whom went divers of our horse, who pursued them near ten miles, and had execution of them, and took about 500 horse, and many prisoners. We possessed in the fight very much of the enemy's ammunition. I believe they lost 4 or 5000 arms; the number of slain we judge to be about 1000; the prisoners we took were about 4000. In the night they marched away 7 or 8000 foot, and about 4000 horse; we followed them with about 3000 foot, and about 2500 horse and dragoons; and in this prosecution, that worthy gentleman, Col. Thornbaugh, pressing too boldly, was slain, being run into the body, and thigh, and head by the enemy's lancers. Our horse still prosecuted the enemy, killing and taking divers all the way; but by that time our army was come up, they recovered Wiggon, before we could attempt anything upon them. We lay that night in the field, close by the enemy, being very dirty and weary, where we had some skirmishing, &c. We took Major-general Van Druske, Col. Hurrey, and Lieut.-col. Ennis. The next morning the enemy marched towards Warrington, made a stand at a pass near Winwick; we held them in some dispute until our army was come up, they maintaining the pass with great resolution for many hours, but our men, by the blessing of God, charged very home upon them, beat them from their standing, where we killed about 1000 of them, and took (as we believe) about 2000 prisoners, and prosecuted them home to Warrington town, where they possessed the bridge. As soon as we came thither, I received a message from Lieut.-gen. Bailly, desiring some capitulation, to which I yielded; gave him these terms: That he should surrender himself, and all his officers, and prisoners of war, with all his arms, and ammunition, and horses, upon quarter for life, which accordingly is done. Here we took about 4000 complete arms, and as many prisoners, and thus you have their infantry ruined. The duke is marched with his remaining horse, which are about 3000, towards Nantwich, where the gentlemen of the country have taken about 500 of them; the country will scarce suffer any of my men to pass, but bring them in and kill divers, as they light upon them. I have sent post to my Lord Grey, to Sir Henry Cholmeley, and Sir Edward Roads, to gather all together with speed for their prosecution. Monro is about Cumberland, with the horse that ran away, and his Irish horse and foot, but I have left a considerable strength I hope to make resistance till we can come up to them. Thus you have the narrative of the particulars of the success. I could hardly tell how to say less, there being so much of God, and I was not willing to say more, lest there should seem to be anything of man. Only give me leave to add one word, showing the disparity of the forces on both sides, that so you may see, and all the world acknowledge, the great hand of God in this business. The Scots army could not be less than 12,000 foot, well armed, and 5000 horse; Langdale not less than 2500 foot and 1500 horse; in all, 21,000. Ours, in all, about 8600. And by computation, about 2000 of the enemy slain, betwixt 8000 and 9000 prisoners, besides what are lurking in hedges and private places, which the country daily bring in or destroy!" The force, precision, and graphic beauty of this description could not possibly be excelled.

And now Cromwell, following up his blow, marched on for Scotland* to extinguish all tra-

* On the eve of marching from Berwick, he wrote again to the House: "A letter was this day read in the House from Lieut.-gen. Cromwell, out of Scotland, the most material part we will give you as followeth: 'Upon Friday, Sept. 29, came an order from the Earl of Lanerick, and divers Lords of his partie, requiring the Governour of Berwick to marche out of the Town, which accordingly he did on Saturday, Sept. 30, at which time I entered, having placed a garizon there for your use. The Governour would faine have capitulated for the English, but wee having this advantage upon him, would not hear of it, soe that they are submitted to your mercie, and are under the consideration of Sir Arthur Haslerige, whose (I believe) will give you a good account of them, and whose hath already turned out the malignant Major, and putt an honest man in his room. I have also received an Order for Carlisle, and have sent Col. Bright, with Horse and Foot, to receive it; Sir Andrew Car and Col. Scot being gone with him to require an observance of the Order, there having been a treaty and an agreement betwixt the two parties in Scotland to disband all forces, except fifteen hundred horse and foot, under the Earl of Leven, which are to be kept to see all remaining forces disbanded: and having some other things to desire from the Committee of estates at Edinburgh for your service, I am myself going thitherward this day, and soe soon as I shall be able to give you a further Account thereof, I shall do it. In the mean time, I make it my desire that the Garizon of Berwick (into which I have placed a Regiment of foot, and shall be attended alsoe by a Regi-

ces of Hamilton's party, and on his march preserved such remarkable discipline, that never, according to the Scotch, had they "seen such a civil people in all their days." Better evidence of this, however, will not be asked than what is offered by the following truly admirable proclamation: "Whereas wee are marching with the Parliament's Armie into the Kingdome of Scotland, in pursuance of the remaining part of the Enemy whoe lately invaded the Kingdome of England, and for the recoverie of the Garizons of Berwick and Carlisle, these are to declare, that if any officer or souldier under my Command shall take, or demand any monie, or shall violently take any horses, goods, or victuall without Order, or shall abuse the People in any sort, He shall be tryed by a Councell of War, and the said person so offending shall be punished according to the Articles of War, made for the Government of the Armie in the Kingdome of England, which is death. Each Colonel, or other chiefe Officer in every Regiment, is to transcribe the Copie of this, and to cause the same to be delivered to each Captain of his regiment; and every said Captain of each respective troupe and companie is to publish the same to his Troupe or Companie, and to take a strict course that nothinge be done contrary hereunto. Given under my hand, this 20th Sept., 1638. CROMWELL."

Arrived at Edinburgh, the victorious general was received with enthusiasm, and even called "the deliverer of the kirk." He conferred with commissioners, had visits from the provost and Scottish nobles, and received gorgeous entertainments at the public cost. General Leven, the Lord Argyle, and several other noblemen, invited him and his suite to a sumptuous banquet in the castle just before his departure; and, adds Whitelocke, when he left the place, the majestic fortress saluted him with its great guns, and numerous lords conveyed him beyond the city precincts.

Cromwell's return to the capital settled the fate of Charles. Yet he had not returned without one frightful dash of gloom pervading all his glory. In one of the closing skirmishes of the campaign he had lost his eldest son, Oliver,* ment of Horse) may be provided for, and that Sir Arthur Hasleridge may receive commands to supply it with guns and ammunition from Newcastle; and be otherwise enabled by you to furnish this Garizon with all other necessities, accordinge as a place of that importance will require. Desiringe that these mercies may begett trust and thankfulness to God, the only Author of them, and an improvement of them to his glorie and the Good of this poor Kingdome, I rest your most humble Servant, O. CROMWELL. Berwick, 2d October, 1648."—Perf. Diur., Oct. 9-16, 1648.

"This young man," says Noble, in his Memoirs of the Protectoral House, "was, at the breaking out of the civil war, about nineteen, soon after which, by his father's interest, he procured a commission in the Parliament army; and it is certain that this Oliver was a captain so early as April, 1643, for a soldier going to burn a MS. relating to the antiquities of Peterborough, where the soldiers, under his father, were making great devastation, especially in the painted glass in the Cathedral, at which the elder Oliver assisted, Mr. Hustin redeemed the MS. for ten shillings, and persuaded the soldier to write the following acknowledgment: 'I pray let this scripture book alone, for he hath paid me for it; and therefore I would desire you to let it alone, by me Henry Topelyffe, souldier under Captain Cromwell, Colonel Cromwell's son, therefore I pray let it alone, Henry Topelyffe, April 23, 1643.' As a further proof of this, Lilburne, the factious, accuses Oliver, his father, in 1647, with having several relations in the army; and among others, two of his own sons, one a captain of the general's life-guard, the other a captain of a troop of horse who held a commission of captain in the regiment of horse commanded by Harrison. This young man appears to have possessed, with Henry, the greatest share of his father's respect and confidence—all his children had his love—and was remembered by him in his dying hour, when his mind seemed wandering for the Protectorate's successor.

Richard was now Cromwell's eldest son. He was not in the army, though he accepted a nominal commission under the Protectorate. If it is within the limit of probability that the triumphant soldier meditated, even thus early, any seizure of the supreme power, it must have added to his grief in losing the first-born of his children, to reflect that his heir now was an idle youth, given to somewhat dissolute gayeties, suspected, moreover, of Royalist prejudices, and without a particle of vigour or firmness about him.

A negotiation for the marriage of Richard with the daughter of a Mr. Major (the representative of an old and wealthy family of Hampshire, and himself high sheriff of that county in 1640) had been broken off, for some unexplained reason, before the campaign of the second civil war, resumed after its close, again broken off on a question of pecuniary settlement, and again, within a year of the present time, renewed. I have found Cromwell's own letters relating to it, and they exhibit this extraordinary man in so striking and characteristic an attitude among his family, that it is difficult to understand why they should hitherto have been so strangely neglected by his biographers.

The first of these letters is dated on the 26th of February, 1647, and addressed to a friend, "idle Dick Norton," a colonel in his army, and a man evidently endeared to him by many affectionate ties, notwithstanding idleness and apparently reckless habits. "DEERE NORTON, —I have sent my sonn over to thee, beinge willinge to answeare Providence, and although I confesse I have had an offer of a very great proposition from a father of his daughter, yett truly I rather encline to this in my thoughts, because, though the other be very farr greater, yett I see different tyes, and not that assurance of godlinesse, yett indeede fairnesse. I confesse that which is told me concerninge the estate of Mr. M. is more than I can looke for as thinges now stand. . . . If God please to bringe it about, the consideration of pietie in the parents, and such hopes of the gentlewoman in that respect, make the businesse to me a great mercie, concerninge wch I desier to waite upon God. . . . I am confident of thy love, and desier thinges may be carried with privacie. The Lorde doe his in Col. Harrison's regiment; both, says Lilburne, raw and unexperienced soldiers. It is well known that Rich., his then second son, was not designed for the sword, but the bar, and had no commission in the army until long after his father had been declared Protector, so that the sons of Oliver then in the army must be this gentleman and Henry his brother: but it is observable that Henry, who certainly was captain of the life-guard, is mentioned first. Scarce any author notices this son Oliver at all, and none, that I know of, has given us any account of what became of him. He was killed in July, 1648, in attempting to repulse the Scotch army that invaded England under the Duke of Hamilton, at which time Col. Harrison was wounded: the latter circumstance clearly evinces that it was him who was killed, as he is just above mentioned as being a captain in Harrison's regiment." will, that's best, to w^{ch} submitte, I rest your humble servant,

O. CROMWELL."

This refers to the opening of the negotiation. Mr. Major appears to have broken it off; however, for some secret reason of objection. A year after overtures began again, "Mr. Robinson, a preacher at Southampton," having been apparently selected for the purpose, either by the still love-sick Richard, or by the second and wiser thoughts of Mr. Major himself. To Mr. Robinson, Cromwell thus writes on the 1st of February, 1648.

"S^r,—I thank you for your kinde letter. As to the businesse you mention, I desire to use this plainnesse with you. When the last overture was betwene me and Mr. Major, by the mediation of Coll. Norton, after the meetinge I had with Mr. Major at Farnham, I desired the Coll. (findinge, as I thought, some scruples and hesitation in Mr. Major) to knowe of him whether his minde was free to the thinge or not. Coll. Norton gave me this accompt, that Mr. Major, by reason of some matters as they then stood, was not very free thereunto, whereupon I did acquiesce, submitting to the providence of God. Upon your revivinge of the businesse to me, & your letter, I thinke fitt to returne you this answer, & to say in plainnesse of spirit to you, That upon your testimonie of the gentlewoman's worth & the common reporte of the pietie of the familie, I shall be willinge to entertaine the renewing of the motion upon such considerations as may be to mutuall satisfaction, only I thinke that a speedie resolution will be very convenient to both parties. The Lorde direct all to his glory. I desier your prayers therein, and rest your very affectionate friend,
O. CROMWELL."

And eleven days after, I find the following letter written to Mr. Major himself, describing passages of the interval. "S^r,—I received some intimations formerly, & by the last returne from Southampton a letter from Mr. Robinson, concerning the revivinge the last yeare's motion touchinge my sonn and your daughter. Mr. Robinson was alsoe pleased to send inclosed in his a letter from you to him, bearinge date the 5th of this instant February, wherein I finde your willingnesse to entertaine any good meanes for the compleatinge of that businesse. From whence I take encouragement to send my sonn to wayte upon you, & by him to lett you knowe that my desiers are (if Providence soe dispose) very full & free to the thinge, if upon an interview theire prove alsoe a freedom in the youngne persons thereunto. What libertie you will give heerein I wholly submit to you. I thought fitt, in my letter to Mr. Robinson, to mention somewhat of expedition, because indeed I knowe not how soone I may be called into the feild, or other occasions may remove me from hence, havinge for the present some libertie of stay in London. The Lord direct all to his glorie. I rest, S^r, your very humble servant, O. CROMWELL."

Again, to his "very worthie friend" Mr. Major, on the 26th of February, the lieutenant-general writes yet more characteristically. "S^r,—I received yours by Mr. Stapleton, together with an account of the kinde reception & the many civilities afforded them, especially to my sonn in the libertie given him to waite upon your worthie daughter, the report of whose vertue and godlinesse has soe great a place in my harte that I thinke fitt not to neglect anything on my parte which may conduce to consummate a close of the businesse, if God please to dispose the youngne ones' hartes thereunto, & other suitable orderinge affaires towards mutuall satisfaction appeare in the dispensation of Providence. For which purpose, and to the end matters may be brought to as neer an issue as they are capable of (not being at libertie, by reason of publique occasions, to waite upon you, nor, as I understand, your health permitting), I thought fitt to send this gentleman, Mr. Stapleton, instructed with my minde to see how neer wee may come to an understandinge one of another therein; & although I could have wished the consideration of thinges had bene between us two, it beinge of soe neer concernement, yet Providence for the present not allowinge, I desier you to give him credence on my behalfe. S^r, all thinges which yourselfe & I had in conference at Farnham doe not occur to my memorie thorough multiplictie of businesse interveninge, I hope I shall, with a very free harte, testifie my readinesse to that which may be expected from me. I have noe more at present, butt desiringe the Lorde to order this affair to his glory & the comfort of his servants, I rest, S^r, your humble servant, O. CROMWELL."

Negotiations thicken, and Cromwell appears somewhat shrewd and calculating, and conveniently forgetful, in his next missive, dated the 8th of March, 1648, to his "worthie friend" Mr. Major.

"S^r,—Yours I have received, & have given further instructions to this bearer, Mr. Stapleton, to treat with you about the businesse in agitation betwene your daughter and my sonn. I am ingag'd to you for all your civilities, & respects already manifested. I trust there will be a right understandinge betwene us and a good conclusion; and though I cannot particularly remember the thinges spoken off at Farnham, to which your letter seemes to referre me, yett I doubt not butt I have sent the offer of such thinges now, which will give mutuall satisfaction to us both. My attendance upon publique affairs will not give me leave to come downe unto you myselfe. I have sent unto you this gentleman with my mind. I salute M^{rs}. Major, though unknowne, with the rest of your family. I commit you, with the progresse of the businesse, to the Lorde, and rest, S^r, your assured friend to serve you, O. CROMWELL."

The next letter, after an interval of eight days, is a long one, and shows that the lieutenant-general arranged a marriage for his son as he would have manœuvred a battle for the Commonwealth. It is scrawled over, in what seems to be Mr. Major's handwriting, "L. G. Cromwell's letter of exceptions," and truly very formidable exceptions they are, and put with an air of probably unconscious egotism, as though his conveniences should, as a matter of course, be paramount.

"S^r,—I received your paper by the handes of Mr. Stapleton. I desier your leave to returne my dissatisfaction therewith. I shall not neede to premise how much I have desired (I hope upon the best groundes) to match with you; the same desier still continues in me, if Providence see it fitt. Butt I may not be soe much wantinge to myselfe nor familie as not to have some equalitie of consideration towards it. *I have two younge daughters to bestowe, if God give them life and oportunitie. Accordinge to your offer, I have nothinge for them, nothinge at all in hand. If my sonn dye, what consideration is there to me? And yett a jouncture parted with, if she dye there is little, if you have an heire male then butt £3000 without tyme ascertained. Butt for theise things, I doubt not butt one interview betweene you and myselfe they might be accomodated to mutual satisfaction, and in relation to theise I thinke wee should hardlie part, or have many wordes, soe much doe I desier a closure with you. Butt, to deale freely with you, the setlinge of the manor of Hursley, as you propose, it stickes soe much with me, that either I understand you not, or else it much failes my expectation. As you offer it here is £400 per annum charged upon it. For the £150 to your ladie for a life as jouncture I stick not at that, butt the £250 per annum until Mr. Ludlow's lease expires, the tenure wherof I knowe not, and soe much of the £250 per annum as exceeds that lease in annual valew for some time alsoe after the expiration of the 3^d lease, gives such a maim to the manor of Hursley as indeed renders the rest of the manor very inconsiderable. Sr, if I concur to denie myselfe in point of present monies, as alsoe in the other things mentioned as aforesaid, I may and I doe expect the manor of Hursley to be settled without any charge upon it after your decease, savinge your ladie's jouncture of £150 per annum, which if you should thinke fitt to increase I should not stand upon it. Your own estate is best known to you; but surelie your personall estate beinge free for you to dispose, will, with some small matter of addition, begett a neernesse of equalitie, if I heare well from others; and if the difference in that were not very considerable, I should not insist upon it. What you demand of me is very high in all pointes. I am willinge to settle as you desier in everythinge, savinge for present maintenance £400 per annum. £300 per annum I would have somewhat free to be thanked by them for. The £300 per annum of my oul'd land, for a jouncture after my wife's decease, I shall settle, and in the mean time, out of other landes at your election, and truely, Sr, if that be not good, nor will any landes I doubt. I doe not much distrust your principles in other things have acted you towards confidence. You demand, in case my sonn have none issue male, butt only daughters, then the lands in Hantsheire, Munmouth, and Gloucestersheire to descend to the daughters, or £3000 apiece. The first would be most unquall, the latter is too high. They will be well provided for by beinge inheritrices to their mother, and I am willinge to £2000 apiece to be charged upon those landes. Sr, I cannot butt with very many thankes acknowledge your good opinion of me and of my sonn, as alsoe your great civilities towards him, and your daughter's good respects (whose goodness, though known to me only at such a distance by the report of others) I much valew, and, indeed, that causeth me soe cheerfully to denie myselfe as I doe in the point of monies, and soe willinge to complie in other things. Butt if I should not insist as before, I should in a greater measure denie both my owne reason and the advise of my friends than were meete; which I may not doe. Indeed, Sr, I have not closed with a farr greater offer of estate, butt rather chose to fix heere. I hope I have not bene wanting to Providence in this. I have made myselfe plaine to you, desiringe you will make my sonn the messenger of your pleasure and resolution herein as speedilie as with conveniency you may. I take leave, and rest, your affectionate servant, O. CROMWELL. I desier my service may be presented to your ladie and daughters."

The interview followed, Mr. Major no doubt supposing that anything would be preferable to letters of this sort. The interview seems to have been only partially satisfactory, however, and in the next letter of the series, to his friend Norton, there is a curious allusion to some personal objections to himself which Mr. Major would appear to have urged. The date of this is the 28th of March, 1648.

"DEERE DICK,—It had bene a favour indeed to have mett you heere at Farnham, butt I heare you are a man of great businesse! . . . Therefore I say noe more. If it be a favour to the House of Comons to enjoy you, what is it to me? Butt, in good earnest, when wi . . . you and your brother Russell be a lit . . . honest, and attend your charge surelie so . . . expect it, especially the good fellows wh . . . chose you . . . I have mett wth Mr. Major; we spent two or 3 howers together last night. I perceive the gentleman is very wise and honest, and, indeed, much to be valewed. Some things of common fame did a little sticke. I gladlie heard his doubts, and gave such answer as was next at hand, I beleive to some satisfaction. Nevertheless, I exceedingly liked the gentleman's plainnesse and free dealinge wth me. I knowe God has bene above all ill reports, and will in his own time vindicate me. I have noe cause to complaine. I see nothinge butt that this particular businesse betweene him and me may goe on. The Lorde's will be donn. For newes out of the north there is little, only the Mal. partie is prevailinge in the Par^lmt of S. They are earnest for a warr; the ministers oppose, as yett. . . Mr. Marshall is returned, whoe says soe; and soe doe many of our letters. Their great committee of dangers have 2 malig. for one right. It's sayd they have voted an armie of 40,000 in Par^lmt: soe some of yesterday's letters. Butt I account my newes ill bestowed, because upon an idle person. . . I shall take speedy course in the businesse concerninge my tenants, for w^{ch} thankes, my service to your ladie, I am really your affectionate servant, O. CROMWELL."

A second letter to Norton, dated the 3d of April, 1648, put a second period to these laborious negotiations. A supplementary interview, less successful than the first, is here described, with various points of an extremely interesting kind. Never, surely, did the ministers of a crowned head look so carefully about them in diplomatizing an affair of marriage. There is again in this letter a tone of strong personal exaction, of which the writer might or might not have been conscious. "DEERE NORTON,—I could not in my last give you a perfect accompt of what passed betweene me and Mr. M., because wee were to have a conclusion of our speed that morninge after I wrote my letter to you, which wee had, and havinge had a full interview of one another's mindes, wee parted with this, that both would consider with our relations, and accordinge to satisfactions given there, acquaint each other with our mindes. . . I cannot tell how better to doe it, to receive or give satisfaction, than by you, whose (as I remember) in your last sayd that if thinges did stick betweene us, you would use your endeavour towards a close. . . The thinges insisted upon were these (as I take it). Mr. Major desired 400 p. annum of inheritance lyinge in Cambridgesheire and Norfolk, to be presently settled, and to be for maintenance, wherein I desired to be advised by my wife. . . I offered the land in Hampshire for present maintenance, w^{ch} I dare say, with copses and ordinarie fells, will be communibus annis £500 p. annum, besides £500 per annum in tenant's handes holdinge butt for one life, and about £300 p. ann., some for two lives, some for three lives. . . Butt as to this, if the latter be not liked of, I shall be willinge a farther conference be had in the first. . . In point of jouncture I shall give satisfaction. And as to the settlement of landes given me by the Par^{mt}, satisfaction to be given in like manner, accordinge as wee discoursed. . . In what else was demanded of me, I am willinge (so farr as I remember any demand was) to give satisfaction. . . Only I haveing beene informed by Mr. Robinson that Mr. Major did upon a former match offer to settle the manor wherein he lived, and to give £2000 in monie, I did insist upon that, and doe desire it may not be with difficultie. The monie I shall neede for my two little wenches, and thereby I shall free my sonn from venge charged with them. Mr. Major parts wth nothing in præsent but that monie, savinge their board, w^{ch} I shoulde not be unwillinge to give them to enjoy the comfort of their societie, w^{ch} it's reason he smarte for, if he will robb me altogether of them. Truly the land to be settled, both what the Par^{mt} gives me and my owne, is very little lesse than £3000 per annum, all thinges considered, if I be rightly informed. . . And a lawyer of Lincoln's Inn haveing searched all the Marquisse of Worcester's writings w^{ch} were taken at Ragland and sent for by the Par^{mt}, and this gentleman appointed by the committee to search the sayd writings, assures me there is noe scruple concerninge the title; and it soe fell out that this gentleman whose searched was my owne lawyer, a very godly, able man, and my deere friend, w^{ch} I reckon noe small mercie. He is also possesst of the writings for me. . . I thought fit to give you this account, desiringe you to make such use of it as God shall direct you, and I doubt not butt you will doe the part of a friend betweene two friends. I account myselfe one, and I have heard you say Mr. Major was entirely soe to you. What the good pleasure of God is I shall waite; there is onely rest. Præsent my service to your ladie, to Mr. Major, &c. I rest your affectionate servant, O. CROMWELL. I desier you to carrie this businesse with all privacie. I beseeche you to doe soe, as you love me. Let me entreat you not to lose a day herein, that I may knowe Mr. Major's minde, for I thinke I may be at leizure for a weeke to attende this businesse to give and take satisfaction, from w^{ch}, perhaps, I may be shutt up afterwards by employment. I knowe thou art an idle fellowe, butt prithe neglect me not now. Delay may be very inconvenient to me. I much relie upon you. Lett me heare from you in two or 3 days. I confesse the principall consideration as to me is the absolute settlement of the manor where he lives; w^{ch} he would doe butt conditionally in case he prove to have noe sonn, and but £3000 in case he have a sonn. Butt as to this I hope farther reason may worke him to more."

* His second daughter, Elizabeth, had recently married Claypole, a man of Royalist prepossessions.

But now, on the return from the second civil war, the young people appear to have lost none of their liking for each other, and Mr. Major has opened negotiations once more. Cromwell answers on the 25th of March, 1649, and though his words are fair, not less distressingly minute than ever does Mr. Major find him in the realities. "S^a,—You will pardon the brevitye of these lines; the haste I am in by reason of busineses occasions it. To testifie the earnest desier I have to see a happy period to this treatie betweene us, I give you to understand that I agree to £150 pr. annum out of the £300 pr. annum of my ould land for your daughter's jouncture over the £150 where you please. . . £400 pr. annum for present maintenance where you shall choose, either in Hantsheire, Gloucester, or Munmouthsheire. . . Those landes settled upon my sonn and his heires male by your daughter, and in case of daughters only £2000 apiece charged upon those landes. . . £400 per annum free to raise portions for my two daughters. I expect the manor of Hursley to be settled upon your eldest daughter and her heires, the heires of her bodie. . . Your ladie a jouncture of £150 per annum out of it. . . For compensation to your younger daughter, I agree to leave it in your power, after your decease, to charge it with as much as will buye in the lease of the Farme at Allington by a just computation. . . I expect, soe long as they live with you, their diet as you expressed, or, in case of voluntarie partinge, £150 pr. annum; £3000 in case you have a sonn, to be payed in two yeares next followinge. . . In case your daughter die without issue, £1000 within six months. Sr, if this satisfie, I desier a speedie resolution; I should the rather desier soe, because of what your kinsman can satisfie you in. The Lorde blesse you and your familie, to whome I desier my affections and service may be presented. I rest your humble servant,

"O. CROMWELL."

On the 28th, Mr. Major solicits an alteration in one point. On the 30th Cromwell refuses it. "S^a,—I received yours of the 28th instant. I desier the matter of compensation may be as in my last to you; you propose another way, which truly seemes to me very inconvenient. I have agreed to all other thinges as you take me (and that rightly), repeating particulars in your paper. The Lorde dispose this great businesse (great betweene you & me) for good. You mention to send by the post on Tuesday. I shall speede thinges heere as I may; I am designed for Ireland, which will be speedie. I should be very glad to see thinges settled before

I goe, if the Lorde will. My service to all your familie. I rest, sir, your affectionate

"OLIVER CROMWELL."

Some hope for the poor young lovers appears at last, and they do not seem, from this pretty allusion in the lord-lieutenant's letter (for Cromwell was now lord-lieutenant of Ireland), to have been quite tired out with waiting for it. The date is April the 6th, 1649. "S^r,"—I received your papers enclosed in your letter, although I knowe not howe to make soe good use of them as otherwise might have bene to have saved expence of tyme, if the arrest of your lawyer had not fallen out at this time. I conceive a draught to your satisfaction by your owne lawyer would have saved much time, which to me is precious. I hope you will send some up perfectlie instructed. I shall endeavour to speed what is to be donn on my part, not knowing how soone I may be sent downe towards my charge for Ireland. And I hope to perform punctually with you. S^r, my sonn had a great desier to come down & waite upon your daughter. I perceive he minds that more than to attend businesses heere. I should be glad to see him settled and all things finished before I goe. I trust not to be wantinge therein. The Lorde direct all our hartes into his good pleasure. I rest, S^r, your affectionate servant, O. CROMWELL. . . . My service to your ladie & family."

Most characteristically, however, does one letter of exception more close this very singular series. It is addressed to Mr. Major, nine days later than the last. "S^a,"—Your kinsman Mr. Barton and myself repayinge to our counsell for the perfectinge this businesse soe much concerninge us, did upon Saturday, this 15th of April, drawe our counsell to a meetinge, whereupon consideration had of my letter to yourselfe expressinge my consent to particulars which Mr. Barton brought to your counsell, Mr. Hales of Lincoln's Inn. Upon the readinge that which expresseth the way of your settlinge Hursley, your kinsman expressed a sence of yours contrarie to the paper under my hand, as alsoe to that under your hand of the 28th of March, which was the same with mine as to that particular, and I knowe nothinge of doubt in that which I am to doe, butt doe agree it all to your kinsman his satisfaction. Nor is there much materiall difference save in this, wherein both my paper sent by you to your counsell and yours of the 28th doe in all littrell and all equitable construction agree, viz., to settle an estate in fee simple upon your daughter after your decease, which Mr. Barton affirms not to be your meaninge, although he has not (as to me) formerlie made this any objection, nor can the words beare it, nor have I anythinge more considerable in lewe of what I part with than this. And I have appealed to yours or any counsell in England whether it be not just and equal that I insist thereupon. And this misunderstandinge (if it be yours as it is your kinsman's) putt a stop to the businesse, so that our counsell could not proceed untill your pleasure herein were known, wherefore it was thought fitt to desier Mr. Barton to have recourse to you to knowe your minde, he alledginge he had noe authoritie to understand that expression soe, butt the contrarie, which was thought not a little strange even by your own counsell. I confesse I did apprehend wee should be incident to mistakes, treatinge at such a distance, although I may take the boldnesse to say there is nothinge expected from me, butt I agree it to your kinsman's sense to a tittle. S^r, I desired to knowe what commission your kinsman had to helpe this doubt by an expedient, who denied to have any, butt did thinke it were better for you to part with some monie, and keepe the power in your owne handes as to the lande, to dispose thereof as you should see cause. Whereupon an overture was made, and himselfe and your counsell desired to draw it up; the effect whereof this enclosed paper containes; and although I should not like change of agreements, yett to shew how much I desier the perfectinge of this businesse, if you like thereof (though this be farr the worse bargain), I shall submitt thereunto: your counsell thinkinge that things may be settled this way with more clearnesse & lesse intricacie. There is mention made of £900 pr. annum to be reserved, butt it comes to butt about £800. My landes in Glamorgansheire being butt little above £400 pr. annum, and the £400 pr. annum out of my manor in Gloucester & Munmouthsheire. I wish a cleere understandinge may be betweene us. Truly I would not willingle mistake, desiringe to waite upon Providence in this businesse. I rest, S^r, your affectionate friend & servant, O. CROMWELL. . . . I desier my service may be presented to your ladie & daughters."

Very probably Mr. Major now conceded everything without farther dispute, for in a fortnight after, on the 1st of May, 1649, Richard Cromwell was married to Dorothy Major, in Hursley Church, Hampshire. She was a modest, unobtrusive, kind-hearted woman, and bore her husband nine children.*

The reader might suppose, from the character of these most elaborate arrangements, that Cromwell had been a "family man," with much time on his hands, and no business save what he could ingeniously, and with much pains, fashion out of his private affairs to attend to. Yet, in the interval comprised by these letters, what mighty events he had created and controlled!

The trial and execution of Charles I., with

* In article B. of the Appendix I have sketched the lineal descendants of Cromwell to the present time. Of Richard's wife Mr. Noble observes: "It is extraordinary that we know so little of her, considering that she was, at one time, the second person in the kingdom: there is every reason to suppose that she was scarce ever at court during Oliver's Protectorate. She felt the reverse of fortune in the most poignant manner, and wanted the comforts of the clergy to reconcile her to what she judged the greatest misfortune. Among all the illiberal things that were levelled against the protectorate house of Cromwell, her character is almost the only one that scandal has left untouched; she never (it is most reasonable to think) saw her husband after he retired to France in 1660; she died Jan. 5, 1675-6, in the forty-ninth year of her age, and was buried in the chancel of Hursley Church. The only character of her that I have ever met with is that given by Mr. John Maidstone, who says, 'she was a prudent, godly, practical Christian.' She was certainly once at court during the government of her father-in-law, from the following item in Mr. Major, her father's memorandum-book, still preserved: '1657, May 21, Daughter Cromwell went to London,' but as she had a child baptized at Hursley in September following, her stay must have been short; and from an item of her father's disordered reeve, it appears, she was at Whitehall when her husband lost his power, after which she retired to 'Hursley Lodge, and lived upon her own lands.'" all their attendant circumstances, and their vast result in the establishment of the Commonwealth, have been treated in the life of Henry Marten. Cromwell did not appear more openly in them than any of the other statesmen or officers—perhaps he was even less seen in them than any—but it was well known that the majority of the men concerned in the deed confessed to his extraordinary influence and control, while he, in his turn, if Bishop Burnet may be believed, was not without his controller also. "Ireton," says the bishop, "was the person that drove it on, for Cromwell was all the while in some suspense about it. Ireton had the principles and the temper of a Cassius in him: he stuck at nothing that might have turned England to a commonwealth." The scurrilous falsehoods of the period, contained in that disgusting book which goes by the name of "The Trials of the Regicides," are scouted now by all well-informed persons, but two anecdotes of the time personally relating to Cromwell may properly find a place here.

"I know nothing in particular," says Bishop Burnet, "of the sequel of the war, nor of all the confusions that happened till the murder of King Charles the First: only one passage I had from Lieutenant-general Drummond, afterward Lord Strathallan. He served on the king's side; but he had many friends among those who were for the Covenant: so the king's affairs being now ruined, he was recommended to Cromwell, being then in a treaty with the Spanish ambassador, who was negotiating for some regiments to be levied and sent over from Scotland to Flanders. He happened to be with Cromwell when the commissioners sent from Scotland to protest against the putting the king to death came to argue the matter with him. Cromwell bade Drummond stay and hear the conference, which he did. They began in a heavy, languid style, to lay, indeed, great load on the king; but they still insisted on that clause in the Covenant by which they swore they would be faithful in the preservation of his majesty's person. With this they showed upon what terms Scotland, as well as the two Houses, had engaged in the war, and what solemn declarations of their zeal and duty to the king they all along published; which would now appear, to the scandal and reproach of the Christian name, to have been false pretences, if, when the king was in their power, they should proceed to extremities. Upon this, Cromwell entered into a long discourse on the nature of the regal power, according to the principles of Mariana and Buchanan: he thought a breach of trust in a king ought to be punished more than any other crime whatsoever: he said, as to their covenant, they swore to the preservation of the king's person in defence of the true religion; if, then, it appeared that the settlement of the true religion was obstructed by the king, so that they could not come at it but by putting him out of the way, then their oath could not bind them to the preserving him any longer. He said also, their covenant did bind them to bring all malignants, incendiaries, and enemies to the cause to condign punishment; and was not this to be executed impartially? What were all those on whom public justice had been done, especially those who suffered for joining with Montrose, but small offenders, acting by commission from the king, who was, therefore, the principal, and so the most guilty? Drummond said, Cromwell had plainly the better of them at their own weapon and upon their own principles. At this time Presbytery was at its height in Scotland."

The other anecdote has reference to a cousin of Cromwell's, who, on the eve of Charles I.'s execution, was commissioned to grant any conditions which the lieutenant-general might demand, if he would consent to preserve the life of Charles. Colonel John Cromwell is said to have been encouraged to undertake this mission by the recollection of an assurance given to him some time before by his great cousin, that he would rather draw his sword in favour of the king than allow the Republicans to make any attempt on his person. Upon his arrival in the metropolis, however, he found that his kinsman had shut himself up so closely in his chamber, and issued such strict orders that no one should be admitted to him, that it was not without some difficulty he obtained an interview. The envoy having performed his mission with undaunted zeal and earnestness, Cromwell, says Heath, fell to his old shifts, telling him that it was not he, but the army, who were about to inflict justice on the king; that it is true he did once use such words as those which the colonel had repeated, but times were now altered, and Providence seemed to dispose things otherwise. He added, that he had prayed and fasted for the king, but no return that way was yet made to him. Upon this the visitor fastened the door, which till then had continued open, and going close up to Cromwell, said, "Cousin, it is no time to dally with words in this matter; look you here"—showing his credentials, and a carte blanche with which he had been supplied—"it is in your power not only to make yourself, but your posterity, family, and relations, happy and honourable forever: otherwise, as they have changed their name before from Williams to Cromwell, so now they must be forced to change it again; for this fact will bring such an ignominy upon the whole generation of them, that no time will be able to wipe it away." Here Cromwell seemed to be shaken in his resolution, and to ponder on the communication which had just been made to him. After a little space, he replied, "Cousin, I desire you will give me till night to consider of it; and do you go to your inn, but go not to bed till you hear from me: I will confer and consider farther about the business." The colonel did so; and about one o'clock a messenger came to him, and told him he might go to bed, and expect no other answer to carry to the prince; for the council of officers had been seeking God, as Cromwell himself had also done, and it was resolved by them all that the king must die.

The execution followed. Some have said that Cromwell was praying when the axe fell, and some that he was indulging an ill-considered act of buffoonery. It is hard to say which was most likely. It seems to be confessed, however, that he sought from the guard to whom the body was intrusted permission to view it as it lay. Bowtell, a private soldier, who stood by at the time, said "that Cromwell could not open the coffin with his staff, but, taking the other's sword, effected it with the hilt of it." He then stood and gazed at it steadily, till, Bowtell asking him what government they should have now, he said hastily, turning round, "The same that then was;" and turning again to the body of the king, calmly observed, that it appeared sound and well made for a long life.

The Commonwealth had scarcely been established, and the Levellers, with Lilburne, temporarily quelled by Cromwell, when the council of state offered him the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland. The affairs of that kingdom were now in such a miserable condition of rebellion and disorder, that in no services but his could they entertain the slightest hope of relieving them. Ormond had proclaimed Charles II., and that prince was about to start for Dublin.

Cromwell was prepared for the offer, yet on presenting himself in the House of Commons to accept his new office, affected surprise at the nomination, and made his acknowledgments with much hesitation and perplexity. He spoke of his great unworthiness, and even of his inability to undertake so weighty a charge; but yet he professed "that the difficulty which appeared in the expedition was his chief motive for engaging in it;" and that, though he could hardly expect to prevail over the rebels, he hoped, nevertheless, to preserve to the Commonwealth some footing in that kingdom. We have it farther, on the authority of Whitelocke and the Journals, that when the appointment was offered to Cromwell, he hesitated, and requested that two officers from each corps might meet him at Whitehall, and seek the Lord in prayer. After a delay of two weeks, he condescended to submit his shoulders to the burden, because he had learned it was the will of Heaven.

He next made his demand for men and means. He asked from the House 12,000 horse and foot, selected by himself from those veterans whom he had taught to conquer every enemy; a plentiful supply of provisions and ammunition; and a military chest containing £100,000 in ready money. He received, in the name of outfit, £3000; £10 a day as general while he remained in England; and £2000 per quarter in Ireland, besides his pay in his new office. He demanded also that Ireton should accompany him with the second command. His title was Lord-lieutenant-general and General Governor of Ireland.

In the morning of the 10th of July, a large number of his friends were assembled at Whitehall, and three ministers invoked a blessing on his banners, as about to fight the battle of the Lord against the blinded Roman Catholics of Ireland. These functionaries were succeeded by three officers, Goffe, Harrison, and Cromwell himself, who expounded the Scriptures "excellently well, and pertinently to the occasion." This strange scene over, the lieutenant-general mounted his splendid carriage, drawn by "six Flanders mares of whitish gray." He was accompanied by the great officers of state and of the army. His life-guard, consisting of eighty young men, all of quality, and several of them holding commissions as majors and colonels, surprised the spectators by their splendid uniforms and gallant bearing. The streets of the metropolis resounded, as he drove towards Windsor, with the acclamations of the populace and the clangour of military music.*

He was met at Bristol with great pomp and ceremony, but found time, when the fatigue of his reception was over, to write a very delightful letter to the father of Richard's wife, with whom, by the arrangement of the marriage, the young couple were now domiciled. "LOVING BROTHER,—I received your Letter by Major Longe, and doe in answer thereunto according to my best understanding, with a due consideration of those Gentlemen whoe have abid the brunt of the service. I am very glad to heare of your welfare, and that our Children have soe good leizure to make a journie to eate cherries. It's very excuseable in my daughter; I hope she may have a very good pretence for it. I assure you, Sr, I wish her very well, and I believe she knows it. I pray you tell her from me, I expect she writes often to me, by which I shall understand how all your Familie doth, and she will be kept in some exercise. I have delivered my sonn up to you, and I hope you will counsell him. He will neede it. And, indeed, I believe he likes well what you say, and will be advised by you. I wish he may be serious; the times requier it. I hope my Sister is in health, to whome I desire my very heartie affections and service may be presented, as also to my Cozen Ann,† to whome I wish a good husband. I desier my affections may be presented to all your Familie, to which I wish a blessing from the Lorde. I hope I shall have your prayers in the businesse to which I am called. My Wife, I trust, will be with you before it be longe, in her way towards Bristol. Sr, discompose not your thoughts nor estate for what you are to pay me. . . . Lett me knowe wherein I may complay with your occasions and minde, and be confident you will finde me to you as your owne harte. Wishinge your prosperitie and contentment very sincerelie, with the remembrance of my love I rest your affectionate brother and servant,

"O. CROMWELL."

In this letter (dated July 19th, 1649) begin a series of entreaties respecting Richard, which may afford curious matter for consideration. Under ordinary circumstances, it was somewhat too late to have set this married young gentleman to his studies again, yet if a certain new necessity had risen in Cromwell's mind, it was even now not yet too late, for at least an effort, to infuse some spirit, and energy, and knowledge into the mind of Richard Cromwell. At all events, it was worth the trial. A year ago, Oliver would have succeeded to whatever trusts he might have it in his power to bequeath ; but now, in the ordinary course of things, it must be Richard. And what a trust he might possibly have to bequeath to him !

* Whitelocke. An extract from a journal of the day is very graphic: "This evening (July 10), about five of the clock, the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland began his journey by the way of Windsor and so to Bristol. He went forth in that state and equipage as the like hath hardly been seen, himself in a coach with six gallant Flanders mares, whitish gray, divers coaches accompanying him, and very many great officers of the army; his life-guard consisting of eighty gallant men, the meanest whereof a commander or esquire in stately habit, with trumpets sounding almost to the shaking of Charing Cross had it been now standing. Of his life-guard many are colonels, and believe it, it's such a guard as is hardly to be paralleled in the world; and now have at you, my Lord of Ormond; you will have men of gallantry to encounter, who to overcome will be honour sufficient, and to be beaten by them will be no great blemish to their reputation; if you say, Caesar, or nothing; they say, a republic or nothing. The lord-lieutenant's colours are white."—Mod. Intel. July 5-12, 1649.

† Mrs. Richard Cromwell's youngest sister.

Among Lord Nugent's manuscripts, I have found a letter written just before his entrance into Dublin to this same Mr. Major. It suggests these considerations again, with more shape and likelihood. How striking is that passage, wherein, having implored his brother-in-law to lay down certain rules of study for his son, he adds, that "these fit for public services for which a man is born." The letter is dated "the 13th of August, 1649, from aboard the John," and runs thus : "I could not satisfie myselfe to omit this oportunitie by my Sonn of writinge to you, especially there beinge soe late and great an occasion of acquaintinge you with the happy newes I receaved from Lt. Genl. Jones yesterday. The Marquisse of Ormond besieged Dublin with 19,000 men or therabouts. 7000 Scotts and 3000 more were cominge to that worke. Jones issued out of Dublin wth 4000 foote and 1200 horse, routed his whole armie, killed about 4000 upon the place, and tooke 2517 Prisoners, above 300 Officers, some of great qualittie. This is an astonishinge mercie, soe great and seasonable, as indeed wee are like them that dreamed. What can wee say ! The Lorde fill our souls with thankfulnessse that our mouths may be full of his praise, and our lues too, and graunt wee neuer forgett his goodness to vs. These things seeme to strengthen our faith and loue against more difficult times. Sr, pray for me, that I may walke worthy of the Lorde in all that He hath called me vnto. I have committed my Sonn to you ; pray give him advise : I envie him not his contents, butt I feare he should be swallowed vp of them. I would have him minde and vnderstand businesse, reade a little historie, studie the mathematicks and cosmografie ; these are good wth subordination to the thinges of God ; better than idleness, or more outward worldly contents ; these fit for publick services for wth a man is borne. Pardon this trouble ; I am thus bould, because I knowe you loue me as indeed I doe you and yours. My loue to my deere Sister, and my Cozen Ann your Daughter, and all friends. I rest, Sr, youre louinge Brother, O. CROMWELL. Aug. 13th, 1649, from aboard the John. Sr, I desire you not to discomodate yourselfe because of the monie due to me ; lett not that trouble you ; your welfare is as mine, and therefore lett me knowe from time to time what will convenience you in any forbearance ; I shall answer you in it, and be readie to accomodate you, and therefore doe your other businesse ; lett not this hinder."

The same packet, too, which conveyed that letter, conveyed another with the same date to "his beloved daughter Dorothy Cromwell at Hursley," eminently characteristic of the writer. "MY DEERE DAUGHTER,—Your letter was very welcome to me. I like to see anything from your hande, because indeed I sticke not to saye I doe intyrely love you, and therefore I hope a word of advise will not be unwelcome nor unacceptable to thee. I desier you both to make it above all thinges your businesse to seeke the Lorde, to be frequently callinge upon him that He would manifest himselfe to you in his Sonn, and be listninge what returnes He makes to you, for He will be speakinge in your care and in your harte, if you attend thereunto. I desire you to provoke your Husband likewise thereunto. As for the pleasures of this life and outward businesse, lett that be upon the by. Be above all these thinges by faith in Christ, and then you shall have the true use and comfort of them, and not otherwise. I have much satisfaction in hope your spirit is this way sett, and I desier you may growe in grace and in the knowledge of our Lorde and Saviour Jesus Christ, and that I may heare thereof. The Lorde is very neer, w^{ch} wee see by his wonderfull workes ; and therefore He looks that wee of this generation draw neer him. This late great mercie of Ireland is a great manifestation thereof. Your Husband will acquaint you with it. Wee should be much stirred up in our spirits to thankfulnessse. Wee much need the spirit of Christ to enable us to praise God for so admirable a mercie. The Lorde bless thee, my deere daughter. I rest thy louinge father, O. CROMWELL. . . . I heare thou didst lately miscarrie ; prithee take heede of a coach by all means ; borrow thy father's nagg when thou intendest to goe abroad."

Of the same character, and suggestive of the same thoughts, is a note to Mr. Major, written exactly three months afterward, but which, as it completes my collection of his private letters from Ireland, may be inserted, though somewhat prematurely, here. "DEERE BROTHER,—I am not often at leizure, nor now, to salute my friendes, yett unwillinglie to lose this oportunitie, I take it onely to lett you knowe that you and your familie are often in my prayers. I wish the younge ones well, though they vouchsafe not to write to me. As for Dick, I doe not much expect it from him, knowinge his idleness ; butt I am angry with my daughter as a promise breaker. Pray you tell her soe ; butt I hope she will redeeme herselfe. . . . It has pleased the Lorde to give us (since the takinge of Wexford and Rosse) a good interest in Munster by the access of Cork and Youghall, which are both submitted. Their Commissioners are now with me. Diverse other lesser garizons are come in alsoe. The Lorde is wonderfull in these thinges ; it's his hand alone does them. O that all the praise might be ascribed to Him. I have been crazie in my health, butt the Lorde is pleased to sustain me. I begg your prayers ; I desier you to call upon my Sonn to minde the thinges of God more and more ; Alas ! what profit is there in the thinges of this Worlde ? except they be enjoyed in Christ, they are snares. I wish he may enjoy his Wife soe, and she him ; I wish I may enjoy them both soe. My service to my deere Sister, Cozen Ann, my blessinge to my Children, and love to my Cozen Barton and the rest. Sir, I am your affectionate Brother and Servant, O. CROMWELL."

On the 15th of August Cromwell reached Dublin. He allowed his men two weeks to prepare for the labours of the campaign. Three fourths of the island acknowledged at this time Ormond's sway. In the course of the campaign of the past year, he had reduced Drogheda, Dundalk, Newry, Carlingford, and Trim, and had expelled Monk out of Ireland. Dublin, the capital, and Derry in the north, held out against him alone. For his first object of attack, Cromwell selected Drogheda.

Ormond had placed it in a good state of defence, and furnished it with a garrison of two or three thousand of his best troops. On the 3d of September Cromwell had completed his batteries. On the 10th, he sent in a summons to the governor to surrender. It was rejected. The next day he effected a breach, and set about taking the place by storm. This was on the 10th of September. Twice Cromwell's forces mounted the breach, and twice they were repelled. Observing this, he led himself the third assault, and was victorious. The enemy had thrown up three intrenchments within the walls. They defended every inch of ground, and fought bravely and desperately at the corner of every street. The blood recoils from the horror that remains to be told. The reader would disbelieve it, unless he heard it, as it were, from Cromwell's own lips.

Let him take it, then, from them. After describing, in a despatch written on the spot, the desperate resistance of the enemy, admitting that "through the advantages of the place, and the courage God was pleased to give the defenders, our men were forced to retreat quite out of the breach, not without some considerable loss," he adds that his veterans were induced to make a second attempt, "wherein," says he, "God was pleased to animate them so that they got ground of the enemy, and by the goodness of God forced him to quit his intrenchments, and after a very hot dispute, the enemy having both horse and foot, and we foot only within the walls, the enemy gave ground, and our men became masters." Then he adds, having effected a passage for his cavalry into the town, "the enemy retreated, divers into the Mill Mount, a place very strong and of difficult access, being exceeding high, having a good graft, and strongly palisadoed; the governor, Sir Arthur Ashton, and divers considerable officers being there, our men getting up to them, were ordered by me to put them all to the sword; and indeed, being in the heat of action, I forbade them to spare any that were in arms in the town, and I think that night they put to the sword about two thousand men. Divers of the officers and soldiers being fled over the bridge into the other part of the town, where about one hundred of them possessed St. Peter's Church steeple, some the west gate, and others a strong round tower next the gate, called St. Sunday—these being summoned to yield to mercy, refused; whereupon I ordered the steeple of St. Peter's Church to be fired. The next day the other two towers were summoned, in one of which was about six or seven score, but they refused to yield themselves; and we, knowing that hunger must compel them, set only good guards to secure them from running away, till their stomachs were come down. From one of the said towers, notwithstanding their condition, they killed and wounded some of our men; when they submitted, their officers were knocked on the head, and every tenth man of the soldiers killed, and the rest shipped for the Barbadoes; the soldiers in the other tower were all spared, as to their lives only, and shipped likewise for the Barbadoes. I believe all the friars were knocked on the head promiscuously but two, the one of which was Father Peter Taaf, brother to the Lord Taaf, whom the soldiers took the next day and made an end of; the other was taken in the round tower, under the repute of lieutenant, and when he understood that the officers in that town had no quarter, he confessed he was a friar, but that did not save him."

In a subsequent passage of the same despatch, he offers, in apparent extenuation of this horrible deed, the fact that the barbarous wretches whom he put to the sword had imbrued their hands in much innocent blood, alluding to the massacres which disgraced the insurrection of 1641. But had infants or women done this? for infants and women perished now in Drogheda. Nor is it true that the defenders of Drogheda were chiefly Irish. Ludlow, on the contrary, assures us that, when Cromwell arrived at Dublin, the Royalists "put most of their army into their garrisons, having placed three or four thousand of the best of their men, being mostly English, in the town of Tredagh [so Drogheda was then called], and made Sir Arthur Ashton governor thereof." The same author mentions, that when the place was taken, "the slaughter continued all that day and the next, which extraordinary severity, I presume, was used to discourage others from making opposition."

This was the real secret of Cromwell's present policy. It had no relation to the future condition of Ireland as a civil state, but purely and solely to a matter of convenience of his own. He wished to reduce the country with all possible despatch, avoid unnecessary delays and trouble, and get back as soon as he could to his great designs in England.

In a subsequent letter on the same subject, indeed, he confesses this. "I am persuaded," he says, "that this is a righteous judgment of God upon these barbarous wretches who have imbrued their hands in so much innocent blood, and that it will tend to prevent the effusion of blood for the future, which are the satisfactory grounds to such actions, which otherwise cannot but work remorse and regret. And now give me leave to say how it comes to pass that this work is wrought. It was set upon some of our hearts that a great thing should be done, not by power or might, but by the Spirit of God; and is it not clearly that which caused your men to storm so courageously? It was the Spirit of God who gave your men courage and took it away again, and gave the enemy courage and took it away again, and gave your men courage again, and therewith this happy success; and therefore it is good that God alone have all the glory." Well had it been for Cromwell and his fame if of such deeds as these he could have handed over from himself the glory!

His anticipations were well founded as to the result. He passed on from town to castle in a species of grim and bloody triumph, each and all opening their gates before him. At last he reached Wexford, and here opposition having been made, another deluge of blood* was offer-

* The same rule precisely was followed here as at Drogheda. No distinction was made between the armed soldier and the defenceless townsman. Even women were put to the edge of the sword. Three hundred of the latter flocked round the great cross which stood in the street, hoping that Christian soldiers would be so far softened by sight of that ed up to the convenience of the governor, and the barbarous anti-Catholic passions of his soldiers. In his despatch he reckons that there were lost of the enemy not many less than 2000, while of the besiegers not twenty were killed. "This," he adds, "is not without cause deeply set to our hearts, we having intended better to this place than so great a ruin." From Wexford he passed to Rosse, which surrendered to him after three days.* Cork, Kinsale, and Youghal had surrendered to his officers. On the 24th of November he set himself down before Waterford, but on the eighth day found himself obliged to break up the siege. He was more successful at Dungarvan; but at this place had the misfortune to lose by sudden sickness his lieutenant-general, Michael Jones, to whom Ireton, with admirable modesty, had given way on observing his greater knowledge of the country and the service. The manner in which Cromwell expresses himself on this occasion is worthy of record. "The noble lieutenant-general, whose finger, to our knowledge, never ached in all these expeditions, fell sick, upon a cold taken in our late wet march and ill accommodation, and went to Dungarvan, where, struggling some four or five days with a fever, he died, having run his course with so much honour, courage, and fidelity; as his actions better speak than my pen. What England lost hereby is above me to speak; I am sure I lost a noble friend and companion in labours. You see how God mingles out the cup to us."

Cromwell did not enter winter-quarters in Ireland till late, and he left them early. At the end of January he reopened the campaign. Its horrors have no interest, and can teach no lesson. Suffice it to say, that Fethard, Callen, Gowran, and Kilkenny surrendered in quick succession. His last undertaking was against Clonmel, and here he met with a gallant resistance.† Eager, however, to return to England, he listened to a parley, granted an honourable capitulation, appointed Ireton lord-deputy, and sailed for England.

Some extracts from Cromwell's despatches will fitly close this brief sketch of this terrible Irish government. They are, in the main, masterly documents, and should not be lost sight of in any attempt to illustrate his character.

He thus describes the march from Dublin to Wexford: "The army marched from Dublin about the 23d of September, into the county of Wicklow, where the enemy had a garrison about fourteen miles from Dublin, called Killingerick, which they quitting, a company of the army was put therein. From thence the army marched through almost a desolated country, until it came to a passage over the River Doro, about a mile above the castle of Arklow, the first seat and honour of the Marquis of Ormond's family, which he had strongly fortified, but was, upon the approach of the army, quitted. Herein we left another company of foot. From thence the army marched towards Wexford, where in the way was a strong and large castle, at a town called Limerick, the ancient seat of the Esmonds, where the enemy had a strong garrison, which they burned and quitted the day before our coming thither. From thence we marched towards Ferns, an episcopal seat, where was a castle, to which I sent Col. Reynolds with a party to summon it, which accordingly he did, and it was surrendered to him; where we having put a company, advanced the army to a passage over the River Slaney, which runs down to Wexford, and that night marched into the fields of a village called Eniscorfy, belonging to Mr. Robert Wallop, where was a strong castle very well manned and provided for by the enemy, and close under it a very fair house belonging to the same worthy person. A monastery of Franciscan Friars, the considerablest in all Ireland, run away the night before we came. We summoned the castle, and they refused to yield at the first, but upon better consideration they were willing to deliver the place to us, which accordingly they did, leaving their guns, arms, ammunition, and provisions behind them."

The siege and massacre of Wexford are given under his strong and rough hand, thus: After repeating the demand for surrender and the governor's refusal, the despatch proceeds: "While these papers were passing between us, I sent the lieutenant-general with a party of dragoons, horse and foot, to endeavour to reduce their fort, which lay at the mouth of their harbour, about ten miles distant from us, to which he sent a troop of dragoons; but the enemy quit their fort, leaving behind them about seven great guns, betook themselves by the help of their boat to a frigate of 12 guns lying in the harbour, within cannon shot of the fort. The dragoons possessed the fort, and some seamen belonging to your fleet coming happily in at the same time, they bent their guns at the frigate, and she immediately yielded to mercy, both herself, the soldiers that had been in the fort, and the seamen that manned her; and while our men were in her, the town, not knowing what had happened, sent another vessel to her, which our men also took. The governor of the town having obtained from me a safe-conduct for the four persons (mentioned in one of the papers) to come and treat with me about the surrender of the town, I expected they should have done so; but instead thereof, the Earl of Castlehaven brought to their relief on the north side of the river about five hundred foot, which occasioned their refusal to send out any to treat, and caused me to revoke my safe-conduct, not thinking it fit to leave it for them to make use of it when they pleased. Our cannon being emblem of mercy as to spare the lives of unresisting women; but the victors, enraged at such superstition, and regarding it, perhaps, as a proof that they were Roman Catholics, and therefore fit objects of military fury, rushed forward and put them all to death.

* A circumstance claims our notice in the terms of this surrender, which proves how thoroughly Cromwell had now entered into rehearsal for the Protectorate. He consented to give up the town on condition of being permitted to march out with the honours of war, and to assure the inhabitants that their private property would be respected. An attempt was made to secure the free exercise of religion on the usual plea of liberty of conscience. Cromwell replied, "I meddle not with any man's conscience, but if by liberty of conscience you mean a liberty to exercise the mass, I judge it best to use plain dealing, and to let you know, where the Parliament of England have power, that will not be allowed of."

† An eminent commander, who assisted in the action, reported: "We found in Clonmel the stoutest enemy that our army has encountered in Ireland; and it is my opinion, and that of many more, that no storm of so long continuance, and so gallantly contended, has been seen in these wars, either in England or Ireland."

landed, and we having removed all our quarters to the southeast end of the town, near the castle, it was generally agreed that we should bend the whole strength of our artillery upon the castle, being persuaded that if we got the castle, the town would easily follow. Upon Thursday the 11th instant (our batteries being finished the night before) we began to play betimes in the morning, and having spent near a hundred shot, the governor's stomach came down, and he sent to me to give leave for four persons intrusted by him to come unto me, and offer terms of surrender, which I condescending to, two field officers, with an alderman of the town, and the captain of the castle, brought out the propositions enclosed, which for their abominableness, manifesting also the impudency of the men, I thought fit to present to your view, together with my answer, which, indeed, had no effect; for while I was preparing of it, studying to preserve the town from plunder, that it might be of the more use to you and your army, the captain, who was one of the commissioners, being fairly treated, yielded up the castle to us; upon the top of which our men no sooner appeared, but the enemy quitted the walls of the town, which our men perceiving, ran violently upon the town with their ladders, and stormed it; and when they were come into the marketplace, the enemy making a stiff resistance, our forces brake them, and then put all to the sword that came in their way. Two boatfuls of the enemy attempting to escape, being overpressed with numbers, sunk, whereby were drowned near three hundred of them. I believe in all there was lost of the enemy not many less than two thousand, and I believe not twenty of yours killed from first to last of the siege; and indeed it hath not without cause been deeply set upon our hearts, that we intending better to this place than so great a ruin, hoping the town might be of more use to you and your army, yet God would not have it so, but by an unexpected providence, in his righteous justice, brought a just judgment upon them, causing them to become a prey to the soldier, who in their piracies had made preys of so many families, and made with their bloods to answer the cruelties which they had exercised upon the lives of divers poor Protestants, two of which I have been lately acquainted with. About seven or eight score poor Protestants were by them put into an old vessel, which being, as some say, bulged by them, the vessel sunk, and they were all presently drowned in the harbour. The other was thus: they put divers poor Protestants into a chapel, which since they have used for a mass house, and in which one or more of their priests were now killed, where they were famished to death. . . . The soldiers got a very good booty in this place, and had they had opportunity to carry their goods over the river while we besieged it, it would have been much more. I could have wished, for their own good and the good of the garrison, they had been more moderate. Some things which were not easily portable we hope we shall make use of to your behoof. There are great quantities of iron, hides, tallow, salt, pipe and barrel staves, which are under commissioner's hands to be secured. We believe there are near a hundred cannon in the fort, and elsewhere in and about the town: here is likewise some very good shipping; here are three vessels, one of them of 34 guns, which a week's time would fit to sea; there is another of about 20 guns, very near ready likewise; and one other frigate of 20 guns, upon the stocks, made for sailing, which is built up to the uppermost deck; for her handsomeness sake, I have appointed the workmen to finish her, here being materials to do it, if you or the council of state shall approve thereof. The frigate also taken by the fort is a most excellent vessel for sailing, besides divers other ships and vessels in the harbour. This town is now so in your power, that the former inhabitants, I believe scarce one in twenty, can challenge any property in their houses. Most of them are run away, and many of them killed in this service; and it were to be wished that an honest people would come and plant here, where are very good houses and other accommodations fitted to their hands, and may by your favour be made of encouragement to them; as also a seat of good trade, both inward and outward, and of marvellous great advantage in the point of the herring and other fishing. The town is pleasantly seated and strong, having a rampart of earth within the wall near fifteen foot thick. Thus it hath pleased God to give into your hands this other mercy, for which, as for all, we pray, God may have all the glory. Indeed, your instruments are poor and weak, and can do nothing but through believing, and that is the gift of God also."

In that despatch we see some glimpses of Cromwell's wiser policy; but the mind revolts from the price at which he would have purchased the advantages of such a scheme. In the following he describes very forcibly the rare occurrence of an incidental engagement with the enemy. "Wee having left diverse sick men, both horse and foote, at Dublin, hearing many of them were recovered, sent them orders to march up to us, which accordingly they did. Coming to Arkloe on Munday, the first of this instant, being about 350 horse and about 800 foote, the enemy hearing of them (through the great advantage they have in point of intelligence), drew together a bodie of horse and foote, near 3000, which Inchequeen commanded. There went alsoe with this party Sir Tho^o Armstrong, Col. Trevor, and most of their great Rantors. Wee sent 15 or 16 Troupes to their rescue neer eight houres too late. It pleased God wee sent them worde by a neerer way, to march close, and be circumspect, and to make what haste they could to Wexford, by the Seaside. They had marched neer 18 miles, and were come within 7 miles of Wexford (the foote beinge miserablie wearied), when the Enemy gave the scouts of the rear garde an alarm; whereupon they immediatlie drew up in the best order they could upon the sands, the sea on the one hand, and the rocks on the other, where the enemy made a very furious charge, overbearinge our horse with their numbers (which, as some of their Prisoners confesse, was 1500 of their best horse), and forcing them in some disorder backe to the foote. Our foote stood, forbearinge their fringe till the enemy was come almost within pistoll shot, and then lett fly very full in the faces of them, whereby some of them began to tumble, the rest runninge off in a very great disorder, and faced not about untill they got above musket shot off. Upon this our horse tooke incouragement, drawinge up againe, bringinge up some foote to flanke them. And a Gentleman of ours, that had charged through before, beinge amongst them undiscerned, havinge put his signall into his hat, as they did, tooke his oportunitie and came off, lettinge our men knowe that the enemy was in great confusion and disorder, and that if they could attempt another Charge, he was confident good might be done on them. It pleased God to give our Men courage; they advanced, and fallinge upon the enemy, totally routed them, took two colours and diverse Prisoners, and killed diverse upon the place and in the pursuit. I doe not heare that wee have two Men killed, and butt one mortally wounded, and not five that are taken prisoners."

In a subsequent letter, having described other overwhelming successes, the lord-lieutenant, who had probably, at the instant, a strong conception upon him of the purposes for which he already panted to be in England, subjoins these extraordinary reflections: "Sir, what can be said in these things? Is it an arme of flesh that hath done these things? Is it the wisdom, and councill, or strength of men? It is the Lorde onely. God will curse that man and his house that dares to thinke otherwise. Sir, you see the worke is done by a divine leadinge. God gets into the hartes of men, and perswades them to come unto you. I tell you a considerable part of your armie is fitter for an hospital than the field: if the enemy did not know it, I should have held it impoliticke to have writ this; they knowe it, yett they knowe not what to doe. I humbly begg leave to offer a word or two. I begg of those that are faithfull that they give Glorie to God. I wish it may have influence upon the hartes and spirits of all those that are now in place of government, in the greatest trust; that they may all in harte draw neer to God, givinge him glorie by holinesse of life and conversation; that these unspeakable mercies may teach dissentinge Brethren on all sides to agree, at least in praisinge God. And if the Father of the Familie be so kinde, why should there be such jarrings and harte-burninges amongst the Children? And if it will not be received that these are the seales of God's approbation of your great change of Government, which indeed was noe more yours than these victories and successes are ours, yett lett them with us say (even the most unsatisfied harte amongst them) that both are the righteous judgements and mightie workes of God; that he hath pulled the mightie from his seat, who calls to an account innocent blood; that he thus breakes the enemies of his Church in peeces; and lett them not be sullen, butt praise the Lorde, and thinke of us as they please, and wee shall be satisfied; and pray for them, and waite upon our God; and wee hope wee shall seeke the welfare and peace of our native country; and the Lorde give them hartes to doe soe too. Indeed, Sir, I was constrained in my Bowells to write this much."

Our last extract shall be taken from a very elaborate despatch, descriptive of some of the later incidents in the campaign: "I marched from Roghill Castle over the Shewer with very much difficultie, and from thence to Fethard, almost in the harte of the county of Tipperary, where was a garizon of the enemy. The towne is most pleasantlie seated, havinge a very good wall with round and square bulwarks, after the old manner of fortifications. Wee came thither in the night, and indeed were very much distressed by sore and tempestuous wind and raine. After a long marche, wee knew not well how to dispose of ourselves, but findinge an old abbey in the suburbs, and some cabbins, and poore houses, wee got into them, and had oportunitie to send them a summons. They shott at my Trumpet, and would not listen to him for an hour's space; butt havinge some officers in our partie which they knewe, I sent them, to lett them knowe I was there with a good part of the armie. We shott not a shott at them, butt they were very angry, and fired very earnestlie upon us, tellinge us that it was not a time of night to send a summons; butt yett, in the end, the governor was willinge to send out two commissioners, I think rather to see whether there was a force sufficient to force him than to any other end. After almost a whole night spent in treatie, the towne was delivered to me the next morninge upon terms which wee usually call honourable, which I was the willinge to give, because I had little above 200 foote, and neither ladders nor gunnes, nor anythinge else to force them that night. There beinge about seventeen companies of the Ulster foote in Cashel, above five miles from thence, they quit it in some disorder, and the sovereigne and the aldermen since sent to me a petition, desiringe that I would protect them, which I have also made a quarter. From thence I marched towards Callen, hearinge that Col. Reynolds was there with the partie before mentioned. When I came thither I found he had fallen upon the enemy's horse and routed them, beinge about 100, with his forlorne, took my Lorde of Ossory's capt.-lieutenant, and another lieutenant of horse, prisoners; and one of those who betrayed our garizon of Eniscorfy, whom we hanged. The enemy had possessed three castles in the towne, one of them belonginge to one Butler, very considerable; the other two had about 100 or 120 men in them, which he attempted, and they refusinge conditions seasonably offered, were put all to the sword. Indeed, some of your souldiers did attempt very notably in this service; I doe not hear there were 6 men of ours lost. Butler's castle was delivered upon conditions for all to march away, leavinge their armes behinde them, wherein I have placed a companie of foote and a troupe of horse, under the command of my Lorde Colvil, the place beinge six miles from Kilkenny. From hence Col. Reynolds was sent with his regiment to remove a garizon of the enemy's from Knocktofer (beinge the way of our communication to Rosse), which accordinglie he did. Wee marched back with the rest of the body to Fethard and Cashel, where wee are now quartered, havinge good plentie both of horse meat and man's meat for a time; and beinge indeed, wee may say, even almost in the harte and bowells of the enemy, ready to attempt what God shall next direct. And blessed be his name onely for this good successe; and for tis, that wee doe not finde that our men are at all considerably sicke upon this expedition, though indeed it hath been very blustering weather.

"I had almost forgot one businesse. The major-general was very desirous to gaine a passe over the Shewer, where, indeed, wee had none butt by boat, or when the weather served; wherefore, on Saturday in the eveninge, he marched with a partie of horse and foote to Arsinom, where was a bridge, and at the foote of it a stronge castle, which he, about four o'clocke the next morning, attempted, killed about thirteen of the enemy's outguard, lost butt two men, and eight or ten wounded. The enemy yeelded the place to him, and wee are possessed of it, beinge a very considerable passe, and the nearest to our passe at Cappoquin over the Black Water, whither wee can bringe gunnes, ammunition, or other thinges from Youghall by water, and over this passe to the armie. The countie of Tipperary have submitted to £1500 a month contribution, although they have six or seven of the enemy's garizons yet upon them.

"... Sir, I desier the charge of England as to this war may be abated as much as may be, and as wee knowe you doe desier out of your care to the Commonwealth; butt if you expect your worke to be done (if the marchinge armie be not constantly paid, and the course taken that hath been humbly represented), indeed it will not be for the thrift of England, as far as England is concerned in the speedie reduction of Ireland. The monie we raise upon the countiees maintains the garizon forces, and hardlie that; if the active force be not maintained, and all contingencies defrayed, how can you expect butt to have a lingering businesse of it! Surelie we desier not to spend a shillinge of your treasure wherein our consciences do not prompt us. Wee serve you, wee are willinge to be out of our trade of war, and shall hasten (by God's assistance and grace) to the end of our worke, as the labourer doth to be at his rest. This makes us bolde to be earnest with you for necessarie supplies; that of monie is one; and there be some other thinges which indeed I doe not thinke for your service to speak of publickely, which I shall humbly represent to the councill of state, wherewith I desier wee may be accomodated. Sir, the Lorde, who doth all these thinges, gives hopes of a speedie issue to this businesse, and I am perswaded will graciously appear in it; and truly there is no feare of the strength and combination of enemies round about, nor of slanderous tongues at home: God hath hitherto fenced you against all those, to wonder and amazement; they are tokens of your prosperitie and successe: onely it will be good for you, and us that serve you, to fear the Lorde, to fear unbeleef, self seekinge, confidence in an arm of flesh, and opinion of any instruments that they are other than as dry bones."

Cromwell is now in England once more. On his arrival, the last obstacle to his mighty hopes were removed by Fairfax's ill-fated surrender of the command of the army; he was appointed general in chief, and at the same instant directed to proceed to Scotland to reduce rebellion there.

Now again was seen a singular change in his manner, such as has been noticed in the course of this work at various momentous periods of his history. The consummation of all his hopes and aims was at last approaching. I have already observed upon the alterations of look and manner noticed by Ludlow. Others noticed them with deeper sympathy than that enthusiastic Republican, and listened, as to one indeed inspired, when he stated his conviction that it was the design of the Lord, in their days, to deliver his people from every burden, and that he was now bringing to pass what was prophesied in the hundred and tenth psalm; from the consideration of which, he was often encouraged to promote by himself the accomplishment of those ends which were indicated by the finger of Providence. It was to this psalm Ludlow listened impatiently. But imagine Harrison and Cromwell expounding these passages together! "The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath. . . . He shall fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries. . . . The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of his Zion; rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. . . . The people shall be willing in the day of thy power; thou art a priest forever!"

On the 23d of July, Cromwell entered Scotland with 11,000 horse and foot, commanded under him by Generals Fleetwood, Lambert, and Whaley, Colonels Pride, Overton, and Monk. He found before him "solitude and devastation." The Scotch clergy had described the English as monsters, delighting in the murder or mutilation of women and children; and the peasantry having destroyed what they must have left, fled with whatever they could remove. Cromwell's proclamations and severe discipline soon readjusted their notions, and they either returned to their habitations or waited his approach.*

The enemy made the first attack—with a party of 800 horse—on the headquarters near Musselburgh. After some sharp fighting, these were repulsed with much loss. "The enemy came on," said Cromwell, in a despatch to the president of the council, "with a great deal of resolution, beat in our guards, and put a regiment of horse in some disorder; but our men speedily taking the alarm, charged the enemy, routed them, took many prisoners, killed a great many of them, and did execution within a quarter of a mile of Edinburgh. Indeed this is a sweet beginning of your business, or rather of the Lord's, and I believe it is not very satisfactory to the enemy, especially to the Kirk party: and I trust this work, which is the Lord's, will prosper in the hands of his servants."

David Leslie, a gallant and highly-accomplished soldier, was the commander-in-chief of the Scottish army. No man of that day, perhaps, could have been so well matched against Cromwell. This the latter general soon felt and acknowledged. Leslie, in a strong position between Edinburgh and Leith, and with an army double that of Cromwell, harassed him, withdrew from the districts attempted on his march all possibility of procuring corn or cattle for his soldiery, and, in fact, by a series of skilful movements, obliged him at last to fall back upon Dunbar. A variety of movements succeeded this, the object of which, on the part of Cromwell, was to bring on a battle, which Leslie had resolved, if possible, to avoid, while he meanwhile protected Edinburgh and destroyed Cromwell's resources. At one place, where the small river Leith separated the camps, the English pushed on their lines with the intention of making an attack. The word given out was "Rise, Lord!" The body of foot advanced within 300 yards, when they discovered such a bog on both their wings of horse that they could not pass over. "Thus," says Hodgson, who was there, "by this very unexpected hand of Providence were we prevented, and had only liberty to play with our cannon that evening and part of the next morning, which did good execution, as we believe, upon them. We had very strange and remarkable deliverances from theirs, though they played very hard upon us, and that with much art; but the Lord suffered them not to do us much hurt; we had not slain and wounded above five-and-twenty men." Cromwell was present in person on this occasion. He even headed the advanced party, and approached so near to the Scottish lines that one of the enemy fired a carbine at him with the view of checking his progress. Cromwell, upon this, shouted out in sport to the trooper, "that if he were one of his soldiers, he would cashier him for discharging his piece at such a distance." The man, who had formerly served in England under Lieutenant-general Lesley, instantly recognised the leader of the Ironsides, and spread the information that the officer at whom he had aimed was no other than Cromwell himself, whom he had often seen in company with Lord Leven when the army was in Yorkshire.*

* History from Mackintosh, vol. vi., p. 148.

Again Cromwell retreated to Musselburgh, and had nearly approached that place, when a body of Leslie's cavalry fell upon his rear, and left him only a narrow outlet of escape. "By the time," wrote Cromwell, "we had got the van-brigade of our horse, and our foot and train into their quarters, the enemy was marched with that expedition, that they fell upon the rear forlorn of our horse, and put it in some disorder; and, indeed, had like to have engaged our rear-brigade of horse with their whole army, had not the Lord, by his providence, put a cloud over the moon, thereby giving us an opportunity to draw off those horse to the rest of the army, which accordingly was done without any loss."

Leslie, thus far, had achieved an unquestionable success. Cromwell, again defeated in his great object of the campaign, once more fell back upon Dunbar, which he entered on the 1st of September.

Nothing, under the circumstances, could have been more dangerous to this position. Dunbar, a seaport town, lies in a valley surrounded on three sides by an amphitheatre of hills, in which there are two narrow openings, one on the north, the other on the south, where the road passes from Berwick to Edinburgh. Of these hills, as well as of both the passes, the Scots were in actual possession; and the labour of a few hours would have sufficed to throw up such works as, with their superior numbers, might have defied the utmost exertions of their enemies.* Instead of this, however, Leslie yielded, as it is said, to the fanaticism of the ministers in his camp, who, being apprehensive lest the sectaries should escape from their hands, are said to have compelled the general to descend from the high ground of which he had taken possession, in order to intercept their retreat along the coast. Cromwell himself, in his after despatch, justifies this statement. "I hear," he wrote, "that when the enemy marched last up to us, the ministers pressed their army to interpose between us and home, the chief officers desiring rather that we should have way made, though it were by a golden bridge; but the clergy's counsel prevailed, to their no great comfort, through the goodness of God."

While these fatal counsels were being urged in the Scottish camp, Cromwell, in deep anxiety, had his men all under arms, ready to take advantage of the slightest move in Leslie's position. His own feelings at the moment he has himself described: "Their [the Scots] whole army was in march after us; and, indeed, our drawing back in this manner, with the addition of three new regiments added to them, did much heighten their confidence, if not presumption and arrogance. The enemy that night we perceived gathered towards the hills, labouring to make a perfect interposition between us and Berwick (having in his posture a great advantage, through his better knowledge of the country), which he effected by sending a considerable party to the strait pass at Copperspath, where ten men to hinder are better than forty to make their way. And truly this was an exigent to us, whereby the enemy reproached us with that condition the Parliament's army was in when it made its hard conditions with the king in Cornwall. By some reports that have come to us, they had disposed of us and of their business, in sufficient revenge and wrath towards our persons, and had swallowed up the poor interest of England, believing that their army and their king would have marched to London without any interruption, it being told us, we know not how truly, by a prisoner we took the night before the fight, that their king was very suddenly to come among them, with those English they allowed to be about him. But in what they were thus lifted up, the Lord was above them. The enemy lying in the posture before mentioned, having those advantages, we lay very near him, being sensible of our disadvantages, having some weakness of flesh, but yet consolation and support from the Lord himself to our poor weak faith, wherein I believe not a few among us shared, that because of their numbers, because of their advantages, because of their confidence, because of our weakness, because of our strait, we were in the mount, and in the mount the Lord would be seen, and that he would find out a way of deliverance and salvation for us; and, indeed, we had our consolations and our hopes."

On the night of the 2d Cromwell held a council of war. Here various schemes were urged, which showed the extremity more than aught else could. The propriety of embarking the foot, and striving to force a passage for the horse, was debated; but the wind being boisterous, and the surf running high, the project was pronounced altogether inadmissible. It was next suggested, as a sort of forlorn hope, that a strong reconnoissance should be pushed, a little before dawn, in the direction of the right, and that according to the result of this movement future operations should be guided. This masterly thought was of course the suggestion of Cromwell. He had, in the course of the afternoon, observed the Scottish general bring his main strength of horse and artillery towards his right wing, and, with the wonderful foresight that almost justified the inspiration attributed to him, he at once anticipated some false movement by which they might be able to "attempt" the enemy. "We could not well imagine," he wrote, "but that the enemy intended to attempt upon us, or to place themselves in a more exact condition of interposition. Major-general Lambert and myself coming to the Earl of Roxburgh's house and observing this posture, I told him I thought it did give us an opportunity and advantage to attempt upon the enemy, to which he immediately replied that he had thought to have said the same thing to me: so that it pleased the Lord to set this apprehension upon our hearts at the same moment. We called for Colonel Monk, and showed him the thing; and, coming to our quarters at night, and demonstrating our apprehensions to some of the colonels, they also cheerfully concurred."

* Dr. Russell's able Life of Cromwell.

* Lives of Eminent Commanders, vol. i., p. 282.

At three o'clock on the morning of the 3d of September, Cromwell was examining closely with his glass every quarter of the enemy's position, with a view to the resolution he had taken. Suddenly he saw a column in motion down the southern pass, and, at the instant, tossing his arms in the air, exclaimed, with phrensied joy, "THE LORD HATH DELIVERED THEM INTO OUR HANDS!"

He gave the word to his men, and the armies met midway between the hills and the sea, not far from Roxburgh House. The word issued by Leslie was the "Covenant;" that on the side of the Parliamentarians was "the Lord of Hosts." The conflict, which began with the horse, was obstinate and bloody—a fierce and terrible dispute at the point of the sword. The first division of the English foot was overpowered and driven back, when Cromwell ordered up his own regiment, under Lieutenant-colonel Goffe, who made their way against all opposition: "At the point of pike," wrote Cromwell, proudly, "they did repel the stoutest regiment the enemy had there, merely with the courage the Lord was pleased to give, which proved a great amazement to the residue of their foot." The cavalry followed up this advantage, charged the infantry, who were already outflanked and deprived of their usual support, and carried confusion into the whole line. Hodgson says, "One of the Scots brigades of foot would not yield, though at point of pike and butt-end of the musket, until a troop of our horse charged from the one end to the other of them, and so left them to the mercy of the foot." In truth, after the right wing was broken, the Scots, to use the language of the same writer, "routed one another," and fell into the most shameful disorder.* The cause of this was obvious enough. Their superiority of numbers was now changed from a gain to a grievous loss. Their front once broken, the fugitives, in rushing over the uneven ground, trampled down the men that would in other circumstances have supported them.

A thick fog had hitherto enveloped the scene of action. It was just before the moment of victory that the sun suddenly appeared upon the sea, and the voice of Cromwell was heard in the accent and with the manner of one indeed inspired—inspired by the thought of a triumph so mighty and resistless—"NOW LET THE LORD ARISE, AND HIS ENEMIES SHALL BE SCATTERED!"*

At this, a shout broke forth from the English soldiers which seemed to rend the sky, and the rout of the enemy was complete and frightful. "The horse," says Hodgson, "fled what way they could get; ours pursued towards Haddington; and the general made a halt, and sung the hundred and seventeenth psalm; and by the time they had done, their party was increased and advancing; the Scots ran, and were no more heard of that fight. The commander of our army was busy in securing prisoners, and the whole bag and baggage; and afterward we returned to bless God in our tents like Issachar, for the great salvation afforded to us that day."

Cromwell, in his despatch, written the day after the fight, estimated the amount of killed on the part of his antagonists at 3000. The prisoners were rated at 10,000; while the whole baggage and train, all the artillery, amounting to thirty guns, 200 colours, with 15,000 stand of arms, which fell into the hands of the English, contributed to attest the extent of their triumph. Cromwell boasted also that his soldiers had the "chace and execution" of the fugitives near eight miles; and there is little doubt that more men were slain in the flight than in the brief struggle of the battle. This despatch partook of the extraordinary excitement of the writer after this memorable battle, and closed with a sort of spiritual admonition to the Parliament, well calculated to advance his aims. "May it please you," he said, "to give me the leave of a few words: it is easy to say the Lord hath done this: it would do you good to see and hear our poor foot go up and down making their boast of God. But, sir, it is in your hands, and by these eminent mercies God puts it more into your hands, to give glory to him, to improve your power and his blessings to his praise. We that serve you beg of you not to own us, but God alone; we pray your own his people more and more, for they are the chariots and horsemen of Israel. Disown yourselves, but own your authority, and improve it to curb the proud and the insolent, such as would disturb the tranquillity of England, though under what specious pretences soever. Relieve the oppressed, hear the groans of poor prisoners in England; be pleased to reform the abuses

* This anecdote is told by Captain Hodgson. The English cavalry had charged and shaken the Scots, when "the general himself comes in the rear of our regiment, and commands to incline to the left, that is, to take more ground to be clear of all bodies: and we did so; and horse and foot were engaged all over the field, and the Scots all in confusion. And the sun appearing upon the sea, I heard Noll say, 'Now let God arise, and his enemies shall be scattered;' and he following us, as we slowly marched, I heard him say, 'I profess they run;' and there was the Scots army all in disorder and running, both right wing and left, and main battle."

* Russell's Life of Cromwell.

of all professions; and if there be any one that makes many poor to make a few rich, that suits not a commonwealth. Since we came into Scotland, it hath been our desire and longing to have avoided blood in this business, by reason that God hath a people here fearing his name, though deceived: and to that end have we offered much love unto such in the bowels of Christ, and concerning the truth of our hearts therein have we appealed unto the Lord. The ministers of Scotland have hindered the passage of these things to the hearts of those to whom we intended them; and now we hear that not only the deceived people, but some of the ministers, are also fallen in the battle. This is the great hand of the Lord, and worthy of the consideration of all those who, taking into their hands the instruments of a foolish shepherd, to wit, meddling with worldly policies and mixtures of earthly power, to set up that which they call the kingdom of Christ—which is neither it, nor if it were, would such means be found effectual to that end—neglect or trust not to the word of God, the sword of the spirit, which is alone powerful and able for the setting up of that kingdom; and when trusted to, will be found effectually able for that end, and will also do it. This is humbly offered for their sakes, who have lately too much turned aside, that they might return again to preach Jesus Christ according to the simplicity of the Gospel, and then, no doubt, they will discover and find your protection and encouragement.”

It was in a different and more pleasing spirit he wrote, on the same day as to the Parliament, to his “loving brother Richard Major at Hursley.” “DEERE BROTHER,—Havinge soe good an occasion as the impartinge soe great a mercie as the Lorde hath vouchsafed unto us in Scotland, I would not omitt the impartinge thereof to you, though I be full of businesse. Upon Wednesd. wee fought the Scottish Armie. They were in number, accordinge to all computation, above twentie thousand, wee hardly eleven thousand, havinge great sicknesses upon our Armie. After much appealing to God, the fight lasted above an hower. Wee killed (as most thinke) three thousand, tooke near ten thousand prisoners, all their traine, about thirtie gunnes, great and smale, besides bullett, match, and powder, very considerable officers, about two hundred colours, above ten thousand armes. Lost not thirtie men. This is the Lorde's doinge, and it is marvelous in our eyes. Good Sr, give God all the glorie; stir up all yours, and all about you, to doe soe: pray for your affectionate Brother, O. CROMWELL. . . . I desier my love may be presented to my deere sister and to all your familie. I pray tell Doll I doe not forget her nor her little bratt. She writes very cunninglie and complementally to me; I expect a letter of plaine dealinge from her. She is too modest to tell me whether she breeds or not. I wish a blessinge upon her and her husband. The Lord make them fruitfull in all that's good. They are at leizure to write often; butt indeed they are both idle and worthie of blame.”

Nor should the opportunity be lost of presenting here, in connexion with Cromwell's greatest triumph, and on the eve of his greatest crime, some farther evidence from these private sources of his gentle and affectionate relations with the members of his family.

Shortly after the battle, his wife wrote to him thus. The allusions to the great officers of state whom she fears he is about to estrange himself from, possess much interest, and the entire wording of the letter is in accordance with the writer's modest and amiable history. “MY DEARIST,—I wonder you should blame me for writing noe oftner, when I have sent three for one. I canenot but think they are miscarid. Truly if I knog my one hart, I should ase sounne neglect myself ase to . . . the least thought towards you. In doing of it, I must doe it to myself. But when I do writ, my dear, I seldome have any satisfactore answer, which make me think my writting is slited, as well it mae; but yett I cannot but think your love coverse my weaknisis and infirmetes. I should rejoyce to hear your desire in seeing mee, but I desire to submit to the providens of God, howping the Lord, houe hath separated us, and hath oftune brought us together agane, will in heis good time bring us agane, to the praise of his name. Truly my lif is but half a lif in your absence—did not the Lord make it up in heimsel, which I must acknoleg to the prase of heis grace. I would you would think to writ sometimes to your deare frend me Lord. Chef Justes, of hom I have oftune put you in mind: and truly, my deare, if you would think of what I put you in mind of sune, it might be of ase much purpose ase others, writting sometimes a letter to the President, and sometimes to the Speiker. Indeid, my deare, you cannot think the rong you doe yourself in the whant of a letter, though it wer but seldome. I pray think of, and soe rest yours in all faithfulnessne, ELIZABETH CROMWELL.”

The same tender and gentle tone pervades Cromwell's letters to her. “MY DEEREST,—I could not satisfise myselfe to omitt this poast, although I have not much to write, yett indeed I love to write to my deere, who is very much in my harte. It joys me to heare thy soule prospereth; the Lorde increase his favours to thee more and more. The great good thy soule can wish is that the Lorde lift upon thee the light of his Countenance, which is better than life. The Lorde blesse all thy good counsell and example to those about thee, and heare all thy prayers, and accept thee alwayes. I am glad to heare thy Sonn and Daughter ar with thee. I hope thou wilt have some good oportunitie of good advise to him. Present my duty to my mother, my love to all the Familie. Still pray for thine, O. CROMWELL.”

Other letters belong also to this date, which, while they let in light upon the kindest and most private corner of Cromwell's heart, bring out into still more distinct shape the suggestion I have ventured concerning his son. The first is to Richard himself.

“DICK CROMWELL,—I take your letters kindly. I like expressions when they come plainlie from the harte, and are not strayned nor affected. I am perswaded it's the Lorde's mercie to place you where you ar; I wish you may owne it and be thankfull, fulfillingge all relations to the Glorie of God. Seeke the Lorde and his face continually; lett this be the businesse of your life and strength. And lett all thinges be subservient and in order to this. You cannot find, nor behold the face of God butt in Christ, therefore labour to knowe God in Christ, w^{ch} the Scripture makes to be the sum of all, even life externall. Because the true knowledge is not literall or speculative, butt inward, transforminge the minde to it, its unitinge to, and participatinge of the Divine nature (2 Pet., i., 4). It's such a knowledge as Paul speaks of (Philipp., iii., 8, 9, 10). How little of this knowledge of Christ is there amongst us! My weake prayers shall be for you. Take heede of an unactive vaine spirit. Recreate yourself wth Sr Walter Raleigh's Historie; it's a bodie of historie, and will add much more to your understandinge than fragments of storie. Intend to understand the estate I have settled: it's your concernment to knowe it all, and how it stands. I have heretofore suffered much by too much trustinge others. I know my Brother Major will be helpfull to you in all this. You will thinke (perhaps) I need not advise you to love your Wife. The Lorde teach you how to doe it, or else it will be done illfavouredly. Though Marriage be noe instituted Sacrament, yett where the undefiled bed is, and love, this Union aptly resembles Christ and his Church. If you can truely love your Wife, what doeth Christ beare to his Church and every poore soule therein, whoe gave himselfe for it and to it. Comend me to your Wife; tell her I entyrelly love her, and rejoyce in the goodness of the Lorde to her. I wish her every way fruitfull. I thanke her for her lovinge letter. I have presented my love to my Sister and Cozen Ann, etc., in my letter to my Brother Major. I would not have him alter his affaires because of my debt. My purse is as his; my present thoughts are butt to lodge such a sum for my two little gyrls: it's in his hand as well as anywhere. I shall not be wantinge to accomodate him to his minde. I would not have him sollicitous. Dick, the Lorde blesse you every way. I rest, your loving Father,

"O. CROMWELL."

To Mr. Major he again writes in the old mingled strain. "DEERE BROTHER,—The exceedinge croude of businesse I had at London is the best excuse I can make for my silence this way. Indeed, Sir, my harte heareth me witness, I want noe affection to you or yours; you are all often in my poore prayers. I should be glad to heare how the little bratt doth. I could chide both father and mother for their neglects of me: I knowe my sonn is idle, butt I had better thoughts of Doll; I doubt now her husband hath spoyle her; I pray tell her soe from me. If I had as good leisure as they, I should write sometimes. If my daughter be breedinge, I will excuse her, butt not for her nurserie; the Lorde blesse them. I hope you give my Sonn good counsell; I believe he needs it. He is in the dangerous time of his age, and it's a very vaine worlde. O how good it is to close with Christ betimes; there is nothinge else worth the looking after. I beseech you call upon him. I hope you will discharge my dutie and your owne love: you see how I am employed. I neede pittye. I knowe what I feele. Great place and businesse in the worlde is not worth the looking after: I should have no comfort in mine butt that my hope is in the Lorde's presence. I have not sought these thinges; truly I have bene called to them by the Lorde, and therefore am not without some good assurance that he will inable his poore worne and weake servant to doe his will and to fulfill my generation. In this I begg your prayers: desiringe to be lovinglie remembred to my deere Sister, to our Sonn and Daughter, my Cozen Ann, and the good familie. I rest your affectionate brother,

"O. CROMWELL."

The last I shall quote, however, is the most striking and earnest of all. "DEERE BROTHER,—I was glad to receive a letter from you, for indeed anything that comes from you is very wellcome to me. I believe your expectation of my sonn's cominge is deferred. I wish he may see a happie deliverie of his wife first, for whom I frequently pray. . . . I heare my sonn hath exceeded his allowance, and is in debt; truly I cannot comend him therein, wisdom requiringe his livinge within compasse, and callinge for it at his handes. And in my judgement, the reputation arisinge from thence would have been more real honour than what is attained the other way. I believe vaine men will speake well of him that does ill. I desier to be understood that I grudge him not laudable recreations, nor an honourable carriage of himselfe in them, nor is any matter of charge like to fall to my share a stick with me. Truly I can finde in my harte to allow him not only a sufficiency, butt more for his good; butt if pleasure and self-satisfaction he made the businesse of a man's life, soe much cost layed out upon it, soe much time spent in it, as rather answers appetite than the will of God, or is comely before his Saints, I scruple to feed this humour, and God forbid that his beinge my sonn should be his allowance to live not pleasinglie to our heavenlie Father, who hath raised me out of the dust to what I am. I desier your faithfulness (he beinge alsoe your concernment as well as mine) to advise him to approve himselfe to the Lorde in his course of life, and to search his statutes for a rule to conscience, and to seeke grace from Christ to enable him to walke therein. This hath life in it, and will come to somewhat. What is a poore creature without this? This will not abridge of lawfull pleasures, butt teach such an use of them as will have the peace of a good conscience goinge alonge with it. Sr, I write what is in my harte; I pray you communicate my mind herein to my sonn, and be his Remembrancer in these thinges. Truely I love him; he is deere to me; soe is his Wife; and for their sakes doe I thus write. They shall not want comfort nor incouragement from me, so far as I may afford it; butt indeed I cannot thinke I doe well to feede a voluptuous humour in my sonn, if he should make pleasures the businesse of his life in a time when some precious saincts are bleedinge and breathinge out their last for the good and safetie of the rest. Memorabile is the speech of Urijah to David, 2 Chron., xi., 11. . . . Sr, I beseech you believe I heare say not this to save my purse, for I shall willinglie doe what is convenient to satisfie his occasions as I have oportunitie; butt as I pray he may not walke in a course not pleasinge to the Lorde, so thinke it lyeth upon me to give him (in love) the best Counsell I may, and knowe not how better to convey it to him than by soe good a hand as yours. . . . Sr, I pray you acquaint him with these thoughts of mine, and remember my love to my daughter, for whose sake I shall be induced to doe any reasonable thinge. I pray for her happie deliverance frequently and earnestly. . . . I am sorry to heare my haylie in Hantshire should doe to my sonn as is intimated by your letter. I assure you I shall not allowe any such thinge. If there be any suspicion of his abuse of the woode, I desier it may be looked after and inquired into, that soe if thinges appear true he may be removed, although indeed I must needs say he had the report of a godlie man by diverse that knewe him when I placed him there. . . . Sir, I desier my hartie affection may be presented to my Sister, my Cozen Ann and her husband,* though unknowne. . . . I praise the Lorde I have obtained much mercie in respect of my health; the Lorde give me a truely thankfull harte. I desier your prayers, and rest your very affectionate brother and servant, O. CROMWELL."

After the victory of Dunbar Cromwell occupied Glasgow and Edinburgh (in which latter city the castle soon submitted), and spent the winter in polemical discussions, in correspondence with various ministers, in regulating the affairs of the army, in reducing certain small fortresses on the shores of the Firth, and in attempts to gain over to his cause the more violent members of the Scottish assembly. Meanwhile the Parliament poured honours and favours on him, and I observe a letter, with one or two interesting touches in it, wherein he replies to their application that he would suffer an artist to take a sketch of his head for a medal in honour of his last victory. The modest request the general sends back was not, it would seem, granted, since the Dunbar medal by the artist in question presents a very fine face of Cromwell. "GENTL.—It was not a little wonder to me to see that you should send Mr. Symonds so great a journe about a business importing so little, as far as it relates to me; whereas, if my poore opinion may not be rejected by you, I have to offer to that ^{wh} I thinke the most noble end—to witt, the commemoracon of that great mercie at Dunbar, and the gratuitie to the Armie—that it might better be expressed upon the meddall by engravinge, as on the one side the Parliam^t (^{wh} I heare was intended and will do singularly well), soe on the other side an Armie, ^{wh} this inscription over the head of it, 'The Lord of Hosts,' ^{wh} was o^r word that day. Wherefore, if I may begg it as a favour from you, I most earnestly beseech you, if I may doe it ^{wh}out offence, that it may be soe; and if you thinke not fitt to have it as I offer, you may alter it as you see cause; only I doe thinke I may truely say it will be very thankfully acknowledged by me if you will spare the havinge my effigies in it. . . . The gentleman's paynes and trouble hither have been very great; and I shall make it my second suite unto you, that you will please to conferr upon him that employ^t in yo^r service ^{wh} Nicholas Briott had before him. Indeed, the man is ingenious, and worthie of encouragem^t. I may not presume much, butt if by my request and for my sake he may obteyn this favour, I shall put it upon the accompt of my obligacons, ^{wh} are not a few, and I hope shall be found readie gratefully to acknowledge, and to approve myselfe, Gentl., Yo^r most real serv^t, O. CROMWELL."

With the advance of winter an attack of ague seized Cromwell, but after severe suffering he rallied, and in time for that ill-judged movement of the young king of Scots which brought on the battle of Worcester.

The Presbyterian army, restored to a numerous and most effective force, now held a strong position near Stirling. Charles II. commanded it in person. Taught by the fatal experience of Dunbar, however, they kept acting on the defensive, and could not be drawn from their well-selected ground. As a last effort with this view, Cromwell, with singular daring, transported his army into Fife, and proceeded towards Perth, which he captured after a siege of two days. The stratagem succeeded in one sense, but, besides moving the Scots from their stronghold, it had also induced Charles to adopt the plan of marching into England. It is said that in this he yielded to the advice of his English followers, who overruled the more prudent Argyle, looked with contempt upon the Parliament, and counted upon the numerical majority of the English nation as unquestionably in his favour. On the 31st of July he broke up his camp near the Torwood, and on the 6th of August reached Carlisle.

Cromwell was engaged in the superintendence of a new citadel by means of which he designed to hold Perth in subjection, when the news reached him of the movement of the Presbyterians and the king. His spirit rose to that crisis with a renewal of the excitement which men noted in him at Dunbar. He wrote at once to London to give all necessary courage and confidence to the council and citizens. After informing them of the meditated invasion hanging over them, he observed that it "was not out of choice on our part;" and did not conceal his fear that it would trouble some men's thoughts, and occasion some inconvenience. But, he adds, "this is our comfort, that in simplicitie of harte as to God, wee have done to the best of our judgements, knowing that, if some issue were not putt to this business, it would occasion another winter's war, to the ruin of your soldiery, for whom the Scotts are too hard in respect of enduring the winter difficulties of this countrie, and have been under the endless expense of the treasure of England in prosecuting this war. It may be supposed wee might have kept the enemy from this by interposing between him and England, which truely I believe wee might; but how to remove him out of this place without doinge what we have done, unlesse wee had a comanding armie on both sides of the River of Forth, is not clear to us, or how to answer the inconveniences afore mentioned, wee understand not." He then entreats that the council of state would collect what forces they could without loss of time, to give the enemy some check until he should be able to overtake them. Meantime, he sent Lambert at the head of the cavalry, who, upon joining with Harrison, whose forces were at Newcastle, was ordered to advance through the western parts of Northumberland, to intercept the Scots in their progress through Lancashire, to watch their motions, straiten their quarters, impede their progress in every way, but not to risk a battle.

* John Dunch, Esq., of Pusey, in Berkshire; where the original of this letter was found and transcribed by Horace Walpole.

Charles, meanwhile, with but sorry success, had pushed on by Kendal and Preston to Warrington, where, at the bridge, he received a momentary check from Lambert and Harrison. He still forced his way, summoned Shrewsbury in passing, but without effect, and at last made for Worcester, where he was proclaimed, according to Clarendon, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland.

London, anticipating his entry almost every hour, gave way to fearful alarms. Even Bradshaw himself, it is said, lion-hearted as he was, could not, among his private friends, conceal his fears. Some raged against Cromwell, and uttered deep suspicions of his fidelity. No one could understand his intentions, nor where he was, nor why he had allowed an enemy to enter the land, when there were no troops to oppose them. Both the city and the country, says Mrs. Hutchinson (by the angry Presbyterians wavering in their constancy to them and the liberties they had purchased), were all amazed, and doubtful of their own and the Commonwealth's safety. Some could not hide very pale and unmanly fears, and were in such distraction of spirit as much disturbed their counsels.

Yet truly there was little need. The genius of Cromwell had already saved them. He had collected a tremendous force—nearly 30,000 men—and on the 28th of August had them all in position within two miles of Worcester. The Presbyterian force was greatly inferior, but the almost impregnable site of the city of Worcester was an ample set-off against that circumstance.

Built along the right bank of the Severn, it defied immediate assault, and Charles's officers had of course done their best to increase its already splendid resources of resistance and defence. Cromwell found the bridges broken above and below; every boat removed; not even a punt to be seen; and in the extensive line of fires above, saw how strongly the heights of the place were occupied. But not for a moment did he hesitate. Inspired by the genius which had served him so often, and never failed him yet, he took the sudden and daring resolve of throwing his army astride upon two rivers—of forcing at their higher transits a passage across both the Severn and the Team—and of coming down at once upon the enemy from the eastern and western heights overlooking Worcester!

The preparations for this daring exploit were completed on the 2d of September; for Cromwell had, moreover, determined to fight this decisive battle for the possession of three disputed kingdoms on what he called his FORTUNATE DAY—his day of Dunbar. Skirmishes meanwhile took place between the outposts on both sides of the river, and, before the morning of the 3d, a desperate struggle had passed at the half-broken Upton Bridge, between Lambert and its gallant defender Massey. Lambert carried it at last, repaired the broken arch, and conducted across 10,000 men, who took their ground along the course of the Team.

It was now the morning of the 3d. The Presbyterians had the day before, in alarm at Lambert's movement, destroyed every bridge upon that river. Yet Cromwell—not caring to husband life at any time, and still less now, when his superior numbers gave him so many lives to play with—sent out an order to Fleetwood to force, at any loss, his detached corps across the Team. Cromwell, at the same moment, threw a bridge of boats over the Severn at Bunhill, near the confluence of the two rivers, and restored the communication that had been partially cut off. A hot fire near Powick—so sudden were these movements—was the first thing that attracted the attention of Charles, who, from one of the towers of the Cathedral, was examining the positions of the enemy; when, finding that an attack was begun in that quarter, he instantly despatched a reinforcement of horse and foot to the spot, and gave instructions to the commanding officer to prevent, if possible, the formation of the bridge. But a similar addition had been made to the detachment under Fleetwood, who again outnumbered his opponents, and pressed them with great vivacity towards Worcester. "The Scots, in the hope that, by occupying so large a force, they might afford to their countrymen on the other side of the Severn an opportunity of breaking the regiments under Cromwell, maintained the most obstinate resistance." They disputed every inch of ground which presented the slightest advantage; fought from hedge to hedge; and frequently charged with the pike, to check the advance of the enemy.

For an instant this rolled the tide of battle back towards the Team; but fresh battalion after battalion arrived to the support of Fleetwood, who then bore the Scots by fair force of numbers even across the bridge.

Cromwell was meanwhile deciding the battle under the walls of the town; and here, or on both sides of the river, from two o'clock in the morning till nightfall, had this terrible contest raged with unceasing fury. The main body of the enemy's infantry had advanced out of the city against the renowned chief of the Ironsides, and the conflict upon one spot in this quarter, Cromwell wrote in his despatch, lasted three hours. It was closed by the veteran regiment which had so often closed the battles of the Parliament, and which now, for the last time, advanced at the word of Cromwell. The victory was complete—gloriously complete, as the lord-general exultingly wrote, and "gained after as stiff a contest for many hours—including both sides of the river"—as he had ever seen. The fort having been summoned, and Colonel Drummond still refusing to surrender it, it was carried, in all the wild triumph of the victory, by a furious storm, wherein fifteen hundred men were put to the sword. Charles, flying through the streets in piteous despair, in vain attempted to rally his troops, and finding they would no longer move, is said to have cried out, with a burst of passionate tears, "Then shoot me dead, rather than let me live to see the sad consequences of this day!" A crown had vanished from his grasp.

On another man who still stood upon that field a crown was now descending. He stood there, some time after the day was won, in a state of uncontrollable emotion; then calling Fleetwood and Lambert to his side, he told them, with a fit of boisterous laughter, that he would knight them, as heroes of old were knighted (he did not say by kings), on the field where they had achieved their glory. The excitement subdued, he retired to his tent, and there, at "10 o'clock at night," "weary and scarce able to write," he yet wrote to the Parliament of England these memorable words: "The dimensions of this mercy are above my thoughts. It is, for aught I know, a crowning mercy."

A CROWNING MERCY indeed!

AFTER the defeat of Worcester, it is remarked by Lord Clarendon, all the royal and loyal party lay grovelling and prostrate, under desolate apprehensions.* A glance at the position of the Republican leaders will show that never were such apprehensions so justly grounded or so little overcharged.

Resistance to the great design of a republic was now at an end in England, Ireland, and Scotland. In England, the avowed hostility of the Levellers had become as harmless as the secret machinations of the Loyalists. In Ireland, submission and solitude had been substituted, by an awful and unsparing hand, for turbulence and rebellion. In Scotland, the sturdy Presbyterian had at last surrendered to the victorious soldiers of Independency even the sectarian loveliness and supremacy of his darling kirk. Scarcely a spot of British ground remained on which, in right of a triumphant conquest, the banner of the English Commonwealth did not stand firmly planted.

Nor had its champions won less consideration for it in distant lands. Through every country in Europe they had proclaimed their purpose, and vanquished enemies on all sides bore testimony to their power. The proud Don John of Portugal lay like the humblest vassal at the feet of Blake; the haughty insolence of Spain had crawled into subservient alliance; the Dutch had surrendered their cherished title of sovereigns of the sea; and, held down by the vigour and genius of our Republican statesmen, the remaining potentates of Europe "stood still with awful eye."

But at the very root of such vast strength there lurked a mortal weakness. The government under which these results had been achieved, and by which alone the frame of things was now kept together, was avowedly a provisional government. It rested on no direct authority from the people. The men who were at the head of affairs had, by sublime talents and unconquerable energy, placed themselves there; but in continuing to hold to office by no other bond, they seemed to confess that the people were against them. Daring and resolute in all things else, they fell short of their own high souls in this. It was because in other things they held their personal safety to be risked alone, while in this they saw some peril to that grand design by which, as they fondly hoped, they were destined to secure the happiness of unborn generations of their countrymen. We alone, they reasoned, to whom this glorious republic owes its birth, are fit to watch over its tender years. Our duty cannot be done till we have taught England the practical blessings of the new system we have wrought. Under a republic she shall find herself greater than under any of her kings. Wealthy and secure, respected and honoured, she will recognise the value and the potency of the government we have formed; and, by her gratitude well repaid, we may then with safety deliver back into the hands of the people the authority we have wielded throughout for their benefit alone.

The reasoning, up to a certain point, must possibly be conceded as just, and worthy of the men.* There cannot be a doubt, that at the day when the axe descended on the neck of Charles I., a majority of the people were still strongly attached to the forms of monarchical government. But on the other side were a most formidable minority, comprising within itself the greatest amount of energy, genius, and moral force that had yet been exhibited upon the stage of public affairs in England. To elevate the whole nation to that standard was a design at once grand and simple, worthy of the age, and of the deeds already done in it; for, be it kept in mind, Republicanism was of recent growth even in the breasts of these founders of the new republic. The most influential of them had not played the lofty part they did from any preconceived notion of the abstract excellence of that form of civil society. It has been abundantly shown in this work that what such men as VANE sought was popular and good government, embracing extensive representation, security for person and property, freedom of thought, freedom of the press, and entire liberty of conscience. It was only because they could not find these under a monarchy that they became Republicans; but under a monarchy they would have been content with these. From the head of no Jupiter sprang the armed republic of England, but even from the weak and faithless head of her own Charles Stuart. Practical and most protracted experience of the utter impossibility of bringing that monarch to terms of good faith, destroyed, in the breasts of a formidable minority of the nation, all farther faith in monarchy itself. It only remained, by means as powerful, to wean the rest from that old allegiance and long-descended love, by exhibiting to them in enlarged prosperity, safety, and honour, the superior forces that were inherent in the Republican form. Hence it came to be urged, as no less a matter of necessity than duty, to hold fast by the act which Englishmen who have read the history of their country aright know to be the corner-stone of all the freedom that now exists in it, and which declared the Parliament that assembled in 1640 indissoluble save by its own consent. By such a course only, in the midst of the clouds that hung over the minds of men after the memorable action of the 30th of January, was it felt that even the common frame of society could be held together. Only so could the chance, however distant, of another trial of the family of Stuart, be averted from the land which they had cursed so heavily. By this alone could that calm be cast upon the troubled waters out of which order and happiness must ever rise. But it was a course which in any case carried along with it one most peremptory condition. Justified by necessity alone, the limits of necessity sternly bound it in. The day that saw it no longer essential to safety, saw it the most fatal instrument of danger.

* I have already treated this subject in the "Life of Vane," with less consideration, probably, for the part that statesmen took in it, than I have felt it only due to the general body of Republicans to concede in this place.

That day had now, at least, arrived. The first act of the statesmen of Westminster, after the Worcester victory, should have been the passing of their bill for an amended representation, and the dissolution of the Parliament in which they sat. In the restless anxiety of the thoughtful Vane, which followed close upon that event, might be detected the fear that there had already been a delay too long. No merely administrative glory, however great and brilliant, can be expected to produce a lasting beneficial impression on the minds or the condition of a people. The government of the new form had now brought to a successful issue its struggle for existence: scattered or prostrate enemies on all sides bore witness to the solid foundations it had laid. The next, the greatest, and most serviceable stone of the superstructure, should have been a fearless appeal to the people. More was to be gained, as events will show hereafter, by trusting than by distrusting them. They had now, moreover, the indisputable right to demand—what such a course was only the first step to—new political institutions, such as Vane's later experience inculcated, to be founded on the principles of the old, and in which should be kept, as far as it was possible, the spirit of those fundamental laws and usages to which they had been for centuries accustomed, and under which, in their purer shapes, they had grown in civilization and in virtue. Assuming, on the other hand, the injustice of such demands, and the inexpediency of granting them, what was the single security left to the new commonwealth, even in the midst of all its triumphs? Nothing but the sword that had struck for them; nothing but the force which, obedient to an impulse from without, might as readily answer to a bidding from within. Here lurked the danger that was mightiest, because least seen. The serpent that had the deadliest sting for the new commonwealth lay coiled and cherished within its own bosom. Every man in that army, which now rested, after its loftiest and last triumph, within a few days' march of London, should have been made, in his very first hour of consciousness of victory, to feel that his sword had at length become useless, for that higher duties awaited its gallant owner. The great invitation of citizenship should have pierced like a trumpet into every tent: You have won the privileges of freemen. Come now, and actively participate in them!

The course of events to which our narrative turns will present, towards the just appreciation of the various great questions involved in this momentous subject, a series of sad, though salutary illustrations.

Within a few hours after the news from Worcester reached London, soul-stirring despatches from Cromwell were read from the speaker's chair to the assembled Commons, and from every chapel in the vast city to its crowded and excited congregation. "We beat the enemy," they said, "from hedge to hedge, till we beat them into Worcester. The dispute was long and very near at hand, and often at push of pike from one defence to another. . . . We fought in the streets of the town together for three hours' space; but in the end we beat the enemy totally. . . . We pursued him to his royal fort, which we took, and have beaten indeed his whole army. . . . When we took his fort, we turned his own guns upon him. . . . This hath been a very glorious mercy, and as stiff a contest for four or five hours as ever I have seen. Both your old forces, and those new raised, have behaved themselves with very great courage; and He that made them come out, made them willing to fight for you. . . . We have seven thousand prisoners, many of them officers and noblemen of quality. . . . If this provoke those that are concerned in it to thankfulness, and the Parliament to do the will of Him who had done his will for it and for the nation—whose good pleasure is to establish the nation and the change of the government, by making the people so willing to the defence thereof, and so signally to bless the endeavours of your servants in this late great work—I am bold humbly to beg that all thoughts may tend to the promoting of His honour who hath wrought so great salvation; and that the fatness of these continued mercies may not occasion pride and wantonness, as formerly the like hath done to a chosen nation, but that the fear of the Lord, even for his mercies, may keep an authority and a people so prospered and blessed, and witnessed unto, humble and faithful, and that justice and righteousness, mercy and truth, may flow from you as a thankful return to our gracious God."*

The earnest and loud amens which these characteristic phrases and adjurings drew forth from crowded congregations of the faithful, were echoed along the less crowded benches of the Commons; and well had it been for the members assembled there, as in all probability for posterity to come, if upon such fervent thanks, so simply and honestly given to their great general, they had been content to rest their gratitude to him (already laden as he was with more worldly testimonies of the richness of their bounty), and on the instant proceeded to offer to the Providence that had again blessed with victory the cause which engaged his arms, the fittest and most "thankful return" which free men could make, by inviting their fellow-countrymen to partake of the blessings so triumphantly won, and by fixing on the broad and strong basis of popular consent, sympathy, and regard, their new fabric of Republican government. For the servants of that government, it should have been enough in any case to know that they had done their duty, and deserved well of their country. Anything beyond this could indeed serve the purposes of "pride and wantonness" alone. The writer, whose duty it is to record the proceedings of the time, can only mention the vote of the House at this memorable crisis with a feeling of reluctance akin to shame.

* From a newspaper of the time. Sev. Proc. in Parliament, Sept. 4th to Sept. 11th. This last despatch was delivered to the House by Major Cobbet, a man of much spirit and resolution, who produced with it a collar of SS, belonging to young Charles, and his garter, both which he had taken in the royal tent. A characteristic postscript at the close of the despatch he bore, evidenced at once Cromwell's regard for the interests of his officers, and the legitimate means by which he achieved influence with them. "Your officers," it ran, "behaved themselves with much honour in this service; and the person who is the bearer hereof was equal in the performance of his duty to most that served you that day." An estate of a hundred a year was on this voted to Cobbet.

To the Lord-general Cromwell an estate in land of four thousand a year was voted,* and a royal residence, the palace of Hampton Court, was ordered to be prepared for his future abode. Nor these alone. The honour of the chancellorship of the University of Oxford was at the same time conferred upon him; and a deputation of four of the first members of the government—of that government which should have held its least powerful member of higher dignity and account than its most successful soldier-servant—were appointed to meet and congratulate the lord-general at Aylesbury, on his way to the capital, with every form of honour and subservience. By the same votes, a series of estates, descending in value from £2000 to £300 a year, were voted respectively to Ireton, Lambert, Monk, Whaley, Okey, and Alured.*

The instructions given to the commissioners of congratulation complete this unworthy picture. Whitelock and Lisle, the lord-keepers of the seal; Oliver St. John, chief-justice of England; and Sir Gilbert Pickering, a councillor of state, having been named for the service, were thus addressed from the speaker's chair: "You are, in the name of Parliament, to congratulate his lordship's good recovery of health after his dangerous sickness, and to take notice of his unwearied labours and pains in the late expedition into Scotland for the service of this Commonwealth; of his diligence in prosecution of the enemy when he fled into England; of the great hardships and hazards he hath exposed himself to, and particularly at the late fight at Worcester; of the prudent and faithful managing and conducting throughout this great and important affair, which the Lord from heaven hath so signally blessed, and crowned with so complete and glorious an issue: of all which you are to make known to his lordship that the Parliament hath thought fit by you to certify their good acceptance and great satisfaction therein, and for the same you are to return, in the name of the Parliament and Commonwealth of England, their most hearty thanks, as also to the rest of the officers and soldiers, for their great and gallant services done to the Commonwealth. You are likewise to let his lordship know, that since, by the great blessing of God upon his lordship's and the army's endeavours, the enemy is so totally defeated, and the state of affairs, as well in England as in Scotland, such as may very well dispense with his lordship's continuance in the field, they do desire his lordship, for the better settlement of his health, to take such rest and repose as he shall find most requisite and conducing thereunto; and for that purpose, to make his repair to and residence at or within some few miles of this place, whereby also 'he Parliament may have the assistance of his presence in the great and important consultations for the farther settlement of this commonwealth which they are now upon.'" In farther testimony of a thankful acceptance by the government of the great and faithful services performed by the lord-general, the commissioners had to acquaint him that an act had been passed, not only to do honour to this victory of Worcester on one special and early day throughout the three kingdoms,† but also to appoint an annual commemoration of the victory on the 3d of September "for all time to come."‡

The triumphant soldier for whom all these honours were designed was meanwhile in slow progress with his army towards London. The excitement of the battle was still strong upon him. "That Cromwell," said Hugh Peters,* * Journals; and see Parliamentary Hist., vol. xx., p. 48.

† To render this practicable everywhere on the same day, the 24th of September was named.—Journals.

‡ The treatment of the Royalists captured in this great battle deserves mention. Among the prisoners were the Duke of Hamilton, mortally wounded; Earls of Lauderdale, Rothes, Carnwath, Kelly, Derby, Cleveland, Shrewsbury; Lord Sinclair; Lords Spynie, Kenmore, Grandison; Sir Timothy Featherstonehaugh, Sir J. Packington, Sir Charles Cunningham, Sir Ralph Clare, and Mr. R. Fanshawe, secretary to the king; Generals Lesley, Massey, Middleton, Montgomery, Piscotty, Wemyss, Waddell, White, Faucet, Captain Benbow; besides nine ministers, nine surgeons, the mayor and sheriff of Worcester, and all the aldermen. Out of these, the council of state named nine persons as fit to be brought to trial and made examples of justice: the Duke of Hamilton; the Earls of Derby, Lauderdale, and Cleveland; Sir Timothy Featherstonehaugh, Gen. Massey, Captain Benbow, and the mayor and sheriff of Worcester. Derby, Featherstonehaugh, and Benbow were tried by court-martial at Chester, and suffered in October. Benbow was shot; the other two died on the scaffold. James, earl of Derby, who perished thus, was one of the gentlest and strongest-hearted of men. It was he who, with cold and bleeding wounds, had led the distracted Charles, after this fatal fight, to the outlet of escape he won; and when the axe descended, prayers were on his lips for God's blessing to his king, to his wife (the famous countess in "Peveril of the Peak"), his "dear Mall, and Ned, and Billy"—the children who were left to mourn him. His scaffold had been erected in his own town of Bolton-le-Moors. Of his fellow-prisoners, so selected as above, I may add brief mention. Nine days after the victory, the Duke of Hamilton died of his wounds. Massey and Middleton escaped from the Tower, and reached France. Lauderdale was kept in prison till the Restoration; and Rothes was not liberated till the year 1655. We find the names of the Earl of Kelly, Viscount Kenmore, and of Lords Spynie and Sinclair, among the exceptions in Cromwell's Act of Oblivion for Scotland in 1654. The first-named earl, however, was suffered to go to the Continent. This detail is, on the whole, most favourable to the spirit of clemency and forbearance which generally distinguished the government of the Commonwealth; and however much we may deplore what seems a partial and unjust severity in the first cases referred to, it is only fair to presume (in the absence of any of the details of their court-martials) that a special reason existed for it. I grieve to have to state that the spirit of mercy is by no means equally apparent in the treatment of the inferior prisoners. The greater part of the common soldiers taken were sent to the Plantations, and fifteen hundred were granted to the Guinea merchants, and employed to work in the mines of Africa. This had been the policy of Cromwell in Ireland, and he followed it up in like manner at Dunbar, where the few that survived the Presbyterian wreck were shipped to the West Indies, and sold to the factors of sugar estates. Some Royalist rebels to the Protectorate shared the same fate.

§ At this time Cromwell's chaplain. See Ludlow, vol. ii., p. 447.

* Ludlow urges, in extenuation of this vote, that the present income, in addition to his old grant of £3500 a year, was meant to keep Cromwell steady (a difficult matter, requiring heavy ballast) in obligation to his duty, or to "leave him without excuse if he should depart from it" (vol. i., p. 371). If this was the motive, it adds to the shortsightedness of the entire proceeding. History and human nature, to say nothing of common justice to the common people, should have dictated a different method.

† To Ireton, two thousand a year was voted; Lambert had a thousand a year; Monk and Whaley, five hundred; Okey, three hundred; and Alured, two. In the following year, Harrison received five hundred a year; Lord Grey of Groby, a thousand; Reynolds, five hundred; and Joice, a hundred.—Journals.

‡ The vote bears date the 9th Sept., 1651-2.

§ Cromwell, as I have before stated, held a patent of poeage, though he never availed himself of it. The present title was one of courtesy.

"would make himself king." That such was the great conception with which the mind of Cromwell heaved at last, no reasonable doubt can be entertained. Whether, till now, such sovereign aspirations had descended on him—whether, before this period, his vast position as the chief director of one of the mightiest movements the world had known, contented him—is perhaps a problem forever hopeless of entire solution. There is one thing certain, that it contented him no longer. The great prize hung glittering within his reach—the temptation of it had entered his soul—and the only restraint or check that could have been laid on his power of seizing it was already well-nigh neutralized by the statesmen at Whitehall. At the head of thousands of armed men, whose zeal had been always guided to victory by his genius—who looked up to him with implicit faith and unbounded admiration, and by whom his ears were saluted with loftier and more reverent adulation* than ever charmed the sense of a descendant of a hundred kings—he was now on his way to where more than the honours of royalty itself awaited him: the splendours of a regal palace, the subservience of the mightiest in the land, the thanks and blessings of the low. It ceases to be a matter of wonder that he should have shown unusual exultation; that in his steps were uncontrollable buoyancy and eagerness of anticipation; that the "golden round" which at last played visibly above his brows, should have betrayed him into forgetfulness of his profounder habits of concealment and self-control; and that his Republican chaplain, watching all signs and portents as he moved along, should have exclaimed to wondering companions, "That man would make himself our king!"†

The Parliamentary commissioners met the conqueror at a short distance from Aylesbury. His excitement had been brought under some subduement; but yet the air of courtesy and condescension with which he received these carriers of honours had a regal stamp upon it. Whitelocke has himself unconsciously described it. On the 11th of September, he tells us in his "Memorials,"‡ "the four members went from Aylesbury on the way the general was to come, and met him, and delivered their message to him from the Parliament. The general received them with all kindness and respect, and after salutations and ceremonials past, he rode with them 'cross the fields, where Mr. Winwood's hawks met them; and the general, with them and many officers, went a little out of the way a hawking, and came that night to Aylesbury. There they had much discourse

* Despatches from the general officers conclude after this fashion: "We humbly lay ourselves with these thoughts, in 'this emergency, at your excellency's feet.'" The ministers of Newcastle make their humble addresses to his "godly wisdom," and submit their "suits to God and his excellency." Petitioners from different counties solicit him to mediate for them to the Parliament, "because God had not put the sword in his hand in vain."

† Ludlow distinctly tells us that, among other actions denoting his treacherous purpose at this period, instead of acknowledging the services of those who came from all parts to assist against the common enemy, though he knew they had deserved as much honour as himself and the standing army, "he frowned upon them," and the very next day after the fight, dismissed and sent them home, well knowing that an experienced militia was more likely to obstruct than to second him in his ambitious designs

‡ P. 448.

(and my Lord-chief-justice St. John more than all the rest*) with the general, and they supped together. The general gave to each of them that were sent to him a horse and two Scots prisoners, for a present and token of his thankful reception of the Parliament's respect to him in sending them to meet and congratulate him." Our grave memorialist adds, that his horse was a very handsome, gallant young nag of good breed, and one of his prisoners a gentleman of quality. He gave their liberty to both prisoners, and passes to return to Scotland.

The day following this the lord-general entered London. "He came," says Whitelocke, "in great solemnity and triumph, accompanied with the four commissioners of Parliament, many chief officers of the army, and others of quality. There met him in the fields the speaker of Parliament, the lord-president, and many members of Parliament and of the council of state; the lord-mayor, sheriffs, and aldermen of London; the militia, and many thousand others of quality. There was a great guard of soldiers, horse and foot, and multitudes of people in the fields and in the streets. He was entertained all the way as he passed to his house with volleys of great and small shot, and loud acclamations and shouts of the people."‡ All which, observes Ludlow in his memoirs, tended not a little to heighten the spirit of this haughty gentleman.

Heightened his spirit might be; but he had again, with inimitable craft and skill, assumed the old garb of sanctity and patience. His design was complete and safely planned, but the machinery for its action was not ready yet. Accordingly, in these triumphant passages of his entry into the capital, we learn from Whitelocke that "he carried himself with great affability and seeming humility, and, in all his discourses about the business of Worcester, would seldom mention anything of himself, but of the gallantry of the officers and soldiers, and gave (as was due) all the glory of the action unto God."

In the same apparently unselfish spirit, but in reality shaped and fashioned for his most selfish ends, was the conduct of this crafty soldier on taking his seat in Parliament for the first time after his return. It is marked in a memorable note by Whitelocke, referring to the 16th of September. "Cromwell sat in the House, and the speaker made a speech to him, and gave him the thanks of the House for his great services. . . . Cromwell and most of the members of Parliament, and divers commanders of the army, were feasted by the lord-mayor in London. . . . The Parliament resumed the debate touching a new representative.†" This "new representative," the reader need not be told,‡ was the act which was to put a period to the sittings of this famous assembly, and to call

* St. John, it is unnecessary to remind the reader, was Cromwell's kinsman, and deeper in his confidence than any other man of the time.

† A journalist of the time (Nouvelles Ordinaires de Londres, published in French, by authority of the council of state) adds, that it was at Acton the speaker and the authorities swelled the conqueror's train; and that it was in a "coach of state" that Cromwell entered the city, where he "was received with all possible acclamations of joy."

‡ Memorials, p. 485.

§ See Life of Vane, p. 309.

together a new Parliament, on the improved basis of an extended and popular suffrage.

Cromwell, in resuming his Parliamentary duties by a revival of this debate, at once fixed public attention on the weak point of the present government, and diverted it from any suspicion of his own designs. The wily blow had been in some sort warded off by the previous movements of Vane;* but it fell heavily still. There was another measure which he forced upon the House, with a like dishonest aim, and which finds mention by Whitelocke in the record of the same day's proceedings: "Debate of an act of oblivion and general pardon, with some expedients for satisfaction of the soldiery and the ease of the people."† In other words, the all-powerful conqueror, out of the first excitement of gratitude in the midst of which he stood, forced from the reluctant statesmen their assent to a resolution of amnesty so wide, that it almost struck at the root of the Commonwealth.‡ It was, in effect, resolved, that all political offences committed before the battle of Worcester should be forgiven, with the exception of certain cases, which seemed to demand the visitation of public justice: a decision which, though it implied a gross injustice to those who had already been mulcted heavily, relieved the Royalists from all apprehension of farther penalties. Cromwell, in this, served a twofold purpose. He largely increased the number of his personal friends, and, taking advantage of the opposition of the chief members of the government, he was able to increase the number of their personal enemies. Proscription and confiscation are at all times admirable charges to build a prejudice upon. It was not the least of his incidental advantages, moreover, that he considerably weakened the resources of the Republican exchequer.

At this crisis, too, it was, that a higher than human power gave still greater impulse and practical efficacy to his vast design. On the 8th of December the fatal news reached London of the sudden death of the gallant and virtuous Ireton. It snapped the last bond which could, in the last extremity, have bound Cromwell to his duty, or imposed restraint on his parricide ambition.§ Mrs. Hutchinson tells us, that on the very eve of this calamity, "Ireton had determined to come over to England, in order to divert Cromwell from his destructive course." Whatever truth or error there may be in this assertion, it indicates at least the inflexible sentiments of this famous person. His last public action in regard to the Commonwealth was worthy of his entire life. When the vote was transmitted to him, immediately after the Worcester victory, by which he received an estate of two thousand a year, he alone, of all whom such grants enriched, refused acceptance. In the spirit of the antique days of Roman virtue,* he answered to the Parliament that their gift was unacceptable to him. "They had many just debts," he added, "which he desired they would pay before they made any such presents; that he had no need of their land, and therefore would not have it; and that he should be more contented to see them doing the service of the nation than so liberal in disposing of the public treasure."† His death, Whitelocke afterward tells us, struck a sadness into Cromwell. This may well be doubted. The first momentary grief which such tidings must have caused, appears to have been absorbed at once in those projects of ambition from which the single remaining check had been thus suddenly and opportunely snatched away. His next thought, after the mournful tidings, was not of grief, but glory. The body of Ireton was ordered—in deference to the wishes of "the lord-general and of some of his relations," who, according to Ludlow, "were not ignorant of his vast designs now on foot"—to be brought over to England, and to be laid, after a magnificent funeral at the public charge, among the tombs of kings, in the Abbey of Westminster. And, detailing this, Ludlow exclaims, with affectionate and high-souled enthusiasm, that if the great deceased could have foreseen what was thus done, he would certainly have made it his desire that his body might have found a grave where his soul left it, so much did he despise those pompous and expensive vanities, having erected for himself a more glorious monument in the hearts of good men by his affection to his country, his abilities of mind, his impartial justice, his diligence in the public service, and his other virtues, which were a far greater honour to his memory than a dormitory among the ashes of kings.

But if any doubt remained that grief at this event held no supremacy in the breast of Cromwell, and that the event itself did not rather clear the great path before him, it is set at rest by a remarkable incident, which dates on the second day after the news reached London. On the 10th of December, Cromwell summoned and held a meeting at the speaker's house, of those friends, military and civil, who were supposed to be well affected towards his own political views. The two or three honest men who attended must have been startled at the question first propounded there, but the majority of the meeting had few natural emotions to thrust in the way of anything that either honesty or dishonesty might propose. They were lawyers chiefly; and Whitelocke, one of them, has happily left on record some detail of what passed.

The ground which Cromwell took in addressing these assembled gentlemen was, "that now the old king being dead, and his son being defeated, he held it necessary to come to a settlement of the nation," and, in order thereunto, "he had requested this meeting, that they to

* See the detail of them in the Memoir of Vane, where the present subject is treated at much greater length.

† Memorials, p. 485.

‡ They assented, Ludlow observes, "the Parliament being unwilling to deny Cromwell anything for which there was the least colour of reason." Vol. ii., p. 448.

§ Whitelocke says of him that he was "very stiff in his ways and purposes;" a quality our supple lawyer could scarcely understand or appreciate the value of. "He was," he proceeds, "of good abilities for council as well as action, and made much use of his pen. . . Cromwell had a great opinion of him, and no man could prevail so much, or order him so far, as Ireton could. . . He was stout in the field, and wary and prudent in his counsel, and exceedingly forward as to the business of a commonwealth."

* Bishop Burnet likened him to Cassius.

† Biog. Britt., 3109. Ludlow adds, "And truly I believe he was in earnest; for as he was always careful to husband those things that belonged to the state to the best advantage, so was he most liberal in employing his own purse and person in the public service."—Memoirs, vol. i., p. 371.

gether might consider and advise what was fit to be done, and presented to the Parliament." By what pretension, it may be asked, could a servant of the Republic thus presume to call its stability in question? It is clear that, in the mere act of doing it, he was guilty of treason to the government then existing, and of which he was himself a member. Whitelocke tells us that a "great many" were at the meeting . . . "divers members of Parliament, and some chief officers of the army." But Bradshaw would not attend, nor Vane, nor Marten, nor Scot, nor Blake, nor Harrington. Ludlow, by the wily craft of Cromwell, was in a sort of honourable banishment in Ireland, and what once was the soul of Ireton lay a senseless clod on that distant shore. The meeting was obviously summoned in defiance of the council of the Commonwealth; only the lawyers who belonged to it, and who would as readily belong to anything else, attended. It is clear that all who were emphatically called the statesmen held aloof from it; and it would be an instance of their forgetfulness of duty, at once marvellous and irreconcilable with their previous character and actions, to have suffered such a meeting to go on, presuming that they knew its object, were it not a proof more certain still, that in a sudden and general, and now, for the first time, visible and declared defection of the army from their cause, they had lost all present power of prevention. To the people remained their last appeal, and this they had now resolved to make; too late, alas! for present success, but not too late for a lesson to posterity.

The speaker of the House of Commons opened the conference. "My lord," he said, addressing Cromwell, "this company were very ready to attend your excellency, and the business you are pleased to propound to us is very necessary to be considered. God hath given marvellous success to our forces under your command; and if we do not improve these mercies to some settlement, such as may be to God's honour and the good of this Commonwealth, we shall be very much blameworthy." Hereupon, one of the few honest men who were present, but who was not more honest than gullible, Major-general Harrison, interposed a few words, which are enough to express the delusions already widely spread among the Republican officers as to the possibility of erecting a democracy of saints on the ruins of civil authority.* "I think," he remarked, "that which my lord-general hath propounded is to advise as to a settlement both of our civil and spiritual liberties, and so that the mercies which the Lord hath given unto us may not be cast away. How this may be done is the great question." And now much might have arisen from this of a very awkward bearing on the designs of Cromwell, had it not been for the lucky interposition of that most grave and accomplished lawyer, the Lord-commissioner Whitelocke. "It is a great question, indeed," he observes, "and not suddenly to be resolved; yet it were pity that a meeting of so many able and worthy persons as I see here should be fruitless. I should humbly offer, in the first place, whether it be not requisite to be understood in what way this settlement is desired, whether of an absolute republic, or with any mixture of monarchy?" This was, to use a homely expression, hitting the nail on the right head, and accordingly, with equal force and promptitude, Cromwell followed up the blow. "My Lord-commissioner Whitelocke," he exclaimed, "hath put us upon the right point. It is, indeed, my meaning that we should consider whether a republic, or a mixed monarchical government, will be best to be settled; and," he added, with that careless air which so often veiled the profoundest workings of ambition in him, "if anything monarchical, then in whom that power shall be placed?"

The discussion thus fairly launched, the various speakers embarked in it without farther hesitation. Sir Thomas Widdrington (who was in so far honestly disposed to monarchy that he had resigned the commission of the great seal upon the passing of that memorable vote* which should have brought these ingenious gentlemen debaters within the penalties of treason) at once, with much candour—a great deal too much for Cromwell—thus tendered his opinion: "I think a mixed monarchical government will be most suitable to the laws and people of the nation; and if anything monarchical, I suppose we shall hold it most just to place that power in one of the sons of the late king." Cromwell betraying some uneasiness at this, his friend Colonel Fleetwood, who afterward married the widow of Ireton, and was a man of reasonable, but not very strong inclinations to a republic, advanced to his relief, and again generalized the discussion after this vague fashion: "I think that the question whether an absolute republic or a mixed monarchy is best to be settled in this nation will not be very easy to be determined." Upon this, the lord-chief-justice, Oliver Saint John, offered a remark of much general force and no particular application, which was all the better for his great cousin and confidant Cromwell: "It will be found," he said, "that the government of this nation, without something of monarchical power, will be very difficult to be so settled as not to shake the foundation of our laws and the liberties of the people." The speaker chimed in with this: "It will breed a strange confusion," he remarked, "to settle a government of this nation without something of a monarchy." He had scarcely made the remark, however, when a thoroughly honest man, of short-sighted zeal, but most sincere purpose, turned round to St. John, and put this startling question: "I beseech you, my lord, why may not this, as well as other nations, be governed in the way of a republic?" The Lord-commissioner Whitelocke made reply to it: "The laws of England are so interwoven with the power and practice of monarchy, that to settle a government without something of monarchy would make so great an alteration in the proceedings of our laws, that you have scarce time to rectify, nor can we well foresee, the inconveniences which will arise thereby." Most shallow, learned, and lawyer-like reply!

* Harrison's faith in Cromwell was (and the other Republican enthusiasts in the army shared it), that he "pretended to love and favour a sort of men who acted upon higher principles than those of civil liberty."

* "THAT THE OFFICE OF KING IN THIS NATION, OR TO HAVE THE POWER IN A SINGLE PERSON, IS UNNECESSARY, BURDENSOME, AND DANGEROUS TO THE LIBERTY, SAFETY, AND PUBLIC INTEREST OF THE PEOPLE."

The only other man who seems to have spoken with an appearance of honesty, rose after it had been delivered, and frankly observed that it was unintelligible to him. "I do not," added Colonel Whaley, "well understand matters of law, but it seems to me the best way not to have anything of monarchical power in the settlement of our government; and if we should resolve upon any, whom have we to pitch upon? The king's eldest son hath been in arms against us, and his second son is likewise our enemy." If Whaley here intended, however (for his close relationship to Cromwell and his subsequent crawling subservience to him cannot fail to induce suspicion), merely to narrow the question of a kingly successor to some great man taken from the people—as it is clear that Cromwell throughout the meeting desired—Widdrington foiled the attempt by this earnest and honest proposition: "But the late king's third son, the Duke of Gloucester, is still among us, and too young to have been in arms against us, or infected with the principles of our enemies." Whitelocke, upon this, as if to shift the question once more to some point of general disagreement, and so relieve the uneasiness of Cromwell, revived one of the old proposals. "There may," he said, "be a day given for the king's eldest son, or for the Duke of York, his brother, to come into the Parliament, and, upon such terms as shall be thought fit and agreeable, both to our civil and spiritual liberties, a settlement may be made with them."

Cromwell, however, who had been restless and dissatisfied as these latter views were urged, here interposed with a statement of some force and brevity, and obviously designed to wind up the conference. "That," he said, in reference to Whitelocke's last remark, "will be a business of more than ordinary difficulty; but really, I think, if it may be done with safety and preservation of our rights, both as Englishmen and Christians, THAT A SETTLEMENT WITH SOMEWHAT OF MONARCHICAL POWER IN IT WOULD BE VERY EFFECTUAL."

The memorialist concludes his account by saying that "much other discourse was by divers gentlemen then present held upon other points, and too large to be here inserted. Generally, the soldiers were against anything of monarchy, though every one of them was a monarch in his own regiment or company; the lawyers were generally for a mixed monarchical government, and many were for the Duke of Gloucester to be made king; but Cromwell still put off that debate, and came off to some other point; and in conclusion, after a long debate, the company parted without coming to any result at all; only Cromwell discovered by this meeting the inclinations of the persons that spake, for which he fished, and made use of what he then discerned." But, if words bear any meaning, he had also, while doing this, revealed his own inclinations. No man who attended that meeting could thereafter doubt that he was for a "settlement with somewhat of monarchical power in it."

The guardians of the Republic had not been idle meanwhile. On the 18th of the preceding month,* after a long and severe struggle, the details of which have found a more appropriate place in another portion of this work,* a bill was passed to limit the duration of the Parliament then sitting at Westminster to the 3d of November, 1654. Numerous and close divisions attested the energy and excitement of both parties in the House at this memorable crisis. Each alternately triumphed. Cromwell professed to have achieved his desire by forcing on the House a defined period for its dissolution; the statesmen had most assuredly achieved theirs in accompanying the act with a proviso, that, for a certain period at least, the new elections should not interfere with the right of the present members to retain their privileges and seats. This was made the bitterest charge against them afterward, and Cromwell relied upon it for the main justification of his subsequent disgraceful dissolution of them. But they were entitled, as events well proved, to have reasoned on the matter as they did. The first occasion for trusting the people having been lost, it became a duty of deep and deliberate caution how best to select or shape the second. The suspected intrigues of Cromwell and his officers—the half-declared discontents which pervaded the great body of the army—the birth of the venomous reptiles that had only started into power from the warmth of the bosoms against which they now traitorously turned—these warned the founders and guardians of the Commonwealth that, the first opportunity of entire faith in the people having been lost, the second had not yet arrived. Marten's simile—here came again to their aid.† When "Moses was found upon the river, and brought to Pharaoh's daughter, she took care that the mother might be found out, to whose care he might be committed to be nursed. . . . Their commonwealth was yet an infant, of a weak growth, and a very tender constitution; and, therefore, his opinion was, that nobody could be so fit to nurse it as the mother who brought it forth; and that they should not think of putting it in any other hands until it had obtained more years and vigour." Arguing from this, they held, that to leave the cradle of the Republic unwatched by some staunch and reliable friends, at a time when the sword flashed danger above it, and safety was not altogether discernible in the features or attitude of the great mass of the people, would be a danger to its life and growth little short of the treason that threatened it more openly. In all this Vane does not seem to have thoroughly concurred. He would now have acted in mainly reparation of what he felt to have been the first error of the fathers of the Commonwealth, and would have trusted—with a faith that was honourable to his high spirit and pure soul—to the beneficial result of some general convention of the people or of the people's just representatives. Beyond a doubt he was overruled; but whether wisely or not, in the present instance, admits of question, since every day that had passed since the Worcester victory had served to accumulate greater dangers and difficulties around the paths and policy of the statesmen. The bill they passed instead was at least a generous and (if the expression is allowed) a fearless compromise. Reserving for the councils of the

* See Parl. Hist., vol. xx., p. 78.

* Life of Vane.

† See Life of Marten, p. 379.

Commonwealth the wisdom and experience of the men who had framed them first, it threw, at the same time, into the hands of the people the power of sending into the House a large majority of their own. The lofty motives and services of its leading advocates should be a warrant for the justice of all else which they designed to accomplish by it; and in proof of these lofty motives, little is necessary to the readers of this work beyond a mention of their names. Besides Vane, there were Bradshaw, Marten, Harrington, Scot, Sidney, Hazlerig, Neville, and Blake. On the opposite side were ranged Cromwell, all his military myrmidons, and a decided majority of the lawyers.

The next grand question taken up by the statesmen struck at the root of Cromwell's power. This was a reduction of the army. Never had the number of men in arms, under the direction of the English government, been so great as at the period of the battle of Worcester.* The number of the land forces amounted to upward of fifty thousand men, and the monthly assessment necessary for their support amounted to a hundred and twenty thousand pounds. Within six days after the battle of Worcester, Vane had commenced the agitation of this question, on a motion that Parliament should instantly take into consideration how to decrease the charge of the Commonwealth; and within a few weeks he had, to a certain extent, achieved his point. The forces were then diminished, we find, by upward of a fourth, and the amount of assessment stood at ninety thousand pounds. Five months passed, and the subject was again in discussion. It appears, however, to have been brought to a temporary pause by a letter from Cromwell to the speaker, the mention of which, without any detail of its contents, is to be found in the journals of the time. With the lapse of two months more, we find the question once more revived; and on the 12th of August, 1652, there is a resolution on the journals that it be referred to the council of state to give an account, with all convenient speed, of the former vote respecting the retrenchment of the forces.

* Exclusively of the forces on actual service in Ireland, Cromwell had at this time under his command thirty regiments of horse, one of dragoons, and eighteen of foot, which, computing by the standard of February, 1648, amounted to 10,440 horse and 24,000 foot; they certainly rather exceeded than fell short of this number. The institution of the militia had fallen into disuse during the civil war, the militia regiments having been merged in the regulars. This institution had been handed down to us from our Saxon ancestors, and consisted of a certain number of the inhabitants of every county, chosen by lot for three years, officered by the lord-lieutenant, the deputy lieutenants, and principal landholders, who were exercised for a few days in each year, and were not compellable to march out of their own counties, except in cases of invasion or rebellion. On the ceasing of the civil war, this institution was revived by an act of the 11th of July, 1650, and again of the 28th of January, 1651. Each of these acts was in force for six months, and the last appears to have been suffered to expire. In contemplation, however, of the Scottish invasion, 3000 horse and 1000 dragoons, for six months, were voted to be added to the forces in lieu of the militia on the 8th of April; and 4000 foot, for three months, on the 1st of August. On the 12th, intelligence of an actual invasion being received, an act passed through all its stages in that one day, for reviving and renewing the expired act concerning the militia, to continue in force till the 1st of December; and it appears that the regiments of militia, being everywhere in arms, hindered the king's friends from assembling to support him. Three regiments of volunteers were also raised, to be employed on the present emergency. —Godwin's History.

This seems to have decided Cromwell. Upon one burning purpose he instantly concentrated all his energies and all his power. He declared open war upon the Parliament. He harangued his officers on the infirmities and self-seekings of its leading members. His own object, he declared, was equality, and a pure commonwealth, without a king, or permanent chief magistrate of any kind. He had sought the Lord, and divine symbols of grace had been manifested to him! Their present governors were lazy, baleful, unclean men: ungrateful to the army, which had perilled all for them; insensible to their God, who had Himself declared for England! The kingdom of Christ was near, if the saints would only strike for it! The same excitement which had descended on him at the eves of Worcester and Dunbar, promised him now no less a victory.

On the 12th of August—the very day on which, as I have stated, the fatal subject of military retrenchment was resumed in the House of Commons—a council of officers was held at Whitehall.* On the 13th of August, a petition was presented to the Parliament by them, which no longer limited its view to their own particular concerns, but comprehended a general survey of the affairs of the nation, and dictated, as from master to servant, what would be best and most wisely done.

This petition is of too much importance in every sense to be omitted here. It began with stating that, having had divers meetings to seek the Lord, and to speak of the great things God had done for the Commonwealth, it had been set on their hearts as their duty to offer such things on behalf of their country as in their judgments and consciences might tend to its peace and well-being. In pursuance of this design, they therefore had, with one consent, thought fit humbly to present to the House the following particulars, desiring they might be taken into early and serious consideration. First, that speedy and effectual means might be taken for the propagation of the Gospel; that profane, scandalous, and ignorant ministers might be ejected, and men approved for godliness and gifts encouraged; that a convenient maintenance might be provided for them; and the unequal, troublesome, and contentious way of tithes be taken away. Secondly, that a speedy and effectual course might be pursued for the regulation of law, in matter, form, and administration, in all particulars in which it was needlessly vexatious, or burdensome to the people: for this purpose, they recommended that the results already agreed on by the committee appointed for that end might be without delay taken into consideration, and that the committee might be encouraged to proceed. Thirdly,

* Several Proceedings, No. 151.

† Journals. Whitelocke, p. 516. I should mention, that on the 27th of the preceding January a petition had been presented from the council of war to the Parliament, a thing of ill example from officers with swords in their hands. But this related merely to arrears due to the army in Scotland. It was referred to the committee of Parliament for military affairs; and, by their recommendation, a bill was passed on the 7th of April, directing the application of £150,000 to the discharge of those arrears. And, while on this subject, I may mention here, that in the following month Cromwell declined the prolongation of his commission of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and that, on the 9th of July, Fleetwood was appointed to the chief command of the forces in that country.

that a speedy and effectual course might be taken, by act of Parliament or otherwise, that such as were profane, scandalous, or disaffected in all places of authority and public trust, might be removed, and their places filled with men of good public affections and blameless lives, it being the desire of all good men that the magistrates, and such as have public trust, might be men of truth, fearing God, and hating covetousness. Fourthly, that a committee might be appointed in each county to redress the abuses of the excise. Fifthly, that such as had freely lent on the public faith, or deeply suffered for their constant and good affections to the public, might be considered, and a way found out to give them satisfaction; and, first of all, the poorer sort, who were not able to subsist without it; and this to be chiefly regarded, before any more of the revenue should be given to particular persons. The sixth and seventh articles related to the arrears of the soldier, and the articles of war granted to the enemy, which were by all means to be made good. Eighthly, that the whole revenue of the state might be brought into one treasury, and the account of receipts and disbursements be published yearly or half yearly. Ninthly, that, in regard of the present great affairs of the Parliament, a committee might be appointed of persons not members, to consider of the charge and inconvenience that arose to the Commonwealth from monopolies, pluralities of places and profits, unnecessary places, and large salaries. Tenthly, that a way might be considered of for a thorough and effectual suppressing of all vagabonds and common beggars, by setting to work such as were capable, and providing for the subsistence of such as through age and decrepitude were unable to relieve themselves. Eleventhly, that effectual provision might be made that such as had served the Parliament in the late wars should not be bereaved of the fruits of their industry by the exclusive nature of several corporations. Twelfthly, that, for the public satisfaction of the good people of this nation, speedy consideration might be had of such qualifications for future and successive Parliaments as should tend to the election only of such as were pious, and faithful to the interests of the Commonwealth.*

Insincerity and selfishness are most apparent in this petition. It bears very impressively upon it, in all its main features, the character of the source from which it issued. It is not that the requests urged in it are unjust, but that they are partial, and leave unsolicited, save by the most general phrase, those claims which only two months before had been urged in detail upon Parliament by thousands of the common people,† and which were known to be at that instant in the consideration of the House. The officers here would separate themselves from the common mass of popular petitioners. They set themselves up as a party in the state. They put forward their petition as a leader of opposition in Parliament puts forth an anti-ministerial resolution. Nor is it difficult to detect in it that anxiety for the predominance of "higher principles than those of civil liberty" in the councils of the state, which Harrison afterward avowed to Ludlow had been the staple of Cromwell's eloquence and persuasion at the meetings of the military enthusiasts.

It was carried into the House by a deputation of six, every one of whom was Cromwell's creature: Commissary-general Whaley, Colonels Hacker, Barkstead, Okey, and Goffe, and Lieutenant-colonel Worsley. The authorities of the House received it with a prudent respect and consideration, which did not restrain, in various quarters, the expression of widely different views. "Many," according to the sober Whitelocke, who, it is to be observed, generally limits his disapproval of Cromwell's acts to the mere desire that he had chosen other methods of advancing them, "many were unsatisfied with this petition, looking upon it as improper, if not arrogant, from the officers of the army to the Parliament their masters; and and solicits the jury trials in every case; and the third, that "no man be compelled by oath to answer against himself." The fourth requires, what is, after upward of two centuries, only feebly advancing in the House of Commons of our own day, the establishment of county courts. The words employed are memorable: "That all suits may be determined without appeal, by a prefixed time, in the hundred, or county courts by juries; and no more tedious travelling to London; nor vexation, and consumption of men's estates, by the chancery and other courts of Westminster; nor further attendance upon committees; nor long imprisonments; that malefactors may have speedy trials; that bail may not be denied where it ought to be taken; that food and necessities may be provided for prisoners at the common charge, and no fees taken by jailers; that all proceedings in law may be free from the parties to the officers." The fifth section remonstrates against various inequalities and absurdities in punishments and in the administration of law; and the sixth and seventh run in these memorable words: "That none be questioned or molested for matter of conscience or religion, the grounds of implacable trouble, and the very spawn of tyranny and superstition; and that tithes sprung from the same root and tending to the same ends, and to the obstruction of tillage and industry, may also cease, and no enforced maintenance imposed in the place thereof; and that copyholds and the like, and the Court of Wards, and unjust descents to the eldest son only, the principal remaining badges of the Norman Conquest, and main support of regal tyranny, may be taken away." Nor are the closing passages of this remarkable document less worthy of most attentive consideration. They express, with condensed wisdom and force, many of the worst grievances under which, to the shame of all the Parliaments that have since sat at Westminster be it spoken, the common people of England labour still, and the wiser and more prudent of their representatives still vainly struggle for. "That there be no imprisonment for debt" requires the eighth section, "but all estates be made liable to make satisfaction, NOR THE RICH TURN PRISONS INTO PLACES OF PROTECTION." The ninth and tenth solicit thus: "That none be pressed for war, the power of countries being sufficient to suppress all insurrections and foreign invasions. That TRADE BE FREE, and exempt from monopolies, and disturbing customs, excise, and all charges; and all public moneys to be equally raised." The last three sections are in these words: "That all sheriffs, justices, coroners, constables, and the like, be annually chosen by those of the place; that all laws contrary to these fundamentals be repealed; that Parliaments or common councils of England may be returned to the old course to be annually elected; and satisfaction given to the nation in point of accounts; and the public faith satisfied; arrears of soldiers paid; juries duly chosen; registers appointed to ascertain all mortgages and sale of lands; care taken of the poor, and waste places assigned for them; the printing presses set at liberty."

* This is taken from Several Proceedings, No. 151; and see Godwin's Commonwealth, vol. iii., p. 421.

† In a most striking document which I find among the records of the time. Far different was this prayer from that of the discontented officers. It was "signed by many thousands," and began by setting forth the "miseries of the war," which they had cheerfully endured, in the hope that "their rights and the fundamental laws (formerly corrupted by the king, with his instruments, the clergy, lawyers, and statesmen) would be restored, as was promised, by the Parliament and army." The first section then asks for the restoration of the "old law of the land" in all matters of attachment and trial, and that "whatsoever hath been done contrary therunto, by committees, courts martial, high courts of justice, or the like, may be abolished." The sec-

Cromwell was advised* to stop this way of their petitioning by the officers of the army, with their swords in their hands, lest in time it may come too home to himself. But he seemed to slight, or, rather, to have some design by it, in order to which he put them to prepare the way for him." Waiving all sense of any such possible projects or designs, the authorities of the House acted with greater dignity. They resolved to refer the petition to a committee consisting of Cromwell himself, Whitelocke, Lisle, the Earl of Pembroke, Marten, Scot, Harrison, and twenty-five other members, who were directed to inquire how many of the particulars in the petition were already under consideration; how far they had been proceeded in; and whether any new powers were necessary to enable the persons commissioned to proceed more effectually; and to report accordingly. The speaker also, by the direction of the House, gave thanks to the petitioners, both for their good affections formerly displayed, and their care of the public expressed on the present occasion: and so ended the first act of the war between the Parliament and the army, leaving with the statesmen, beyond a possibility of doubt, the praise of superior generalship.

Not for this did Cromwell relax in his efforts. It is, however, an indisputable test of the violent, gratuitous, and most unjust character of the deed he had resolved, that we find every step in his course towards it beset with difficulties which in no other object of his life he had encountered, and which, if Parliament had been brave enough a little earlier to have placed confidence in the people, he would have found altogether insurmountable. It is not thus that historians have generally written this history, or the details might scarcely have claimed a place here. The poor Rump, according to them, was merely contemptible. One kick, however careless or feeble, was the sufficient warrant for its disappearance, its dispersion, its death, its utter and final oblivion!

The first step taken in the House after the business of the military petition had reference to the bill for the dissolution of the Parliament, and the provision for future Parliaments in succession. A report was made by Vane from the committee to whom it had been intrusted, and the result was a dissolution of the grand committee, or committee of the whole House, which had sat on the bill at intervals for the last eleven months, and the sending back the measure itself to be perfected to the committee from whom they received the present report. The tendency of this was to simplify future proceedings on this important subject, and to bring them as speedily as possible to a close. And hardly was it done, before the question of military retrenchments again reared its formidable head. Vane and his friends rightly judged, in thus striking through the army, powerful as it was, for support in the sympathies of the people. It at least, if too late now for more immediate advantage, unfitted them for Cromwell's tyranny. On no subject did they feel with the statesmen so strongly as on this. And with reason! Taxes had ground them to the earth, and without some instant diminution of the military establishments, it was vain even to talk of a fit remission of their burdens.

It marks still the doubt, the anxiety, the fear of Cromwell, that the next step he took in his great game argues a new distrust of the machinery he had been so long providing to work the designs of his ambition with. His project of usurpation upon the supreme power is unswerving throughout; but the extreme agitation with which, from side to side, he seeks differing means of achieving it, betrays the utter falsehood of the pretence of public acquiescence and desire to which he afterward attempted to resort. At one instant we behold him trying the temper of the swords of his veteran Ironsides, at another exploring the quality of mettle that lurked beneath the gowns and wigs of the lawyers of the state.

Thus the incident which awaits us now is a conference that passed between Cromwell and the Lord-commissioner Whitelocke. They met, by accident or design, on the evening of the 8th of November, in the present year, in a retired part of St. James's Park. The lord-general, on seeing the lord-commissioner, "saluted him with more than ordinary courtesy, and desired him to walk aside with him, that they might have some private discourse together." This private discourse Whitelocke set down in his diary, and after the Restoration it was given to the world.

"My Lord Whitelocke," Cromwell began, "I know your faithfulness and engagement in the same good cause with myself and the rest of our friends, and I know your ability in judgment, and your particular friendship and affection for me; indeed, I am sufficiently satisfied in these things, and therefore I desire to advise with you in the main and most important affairs relating to our present condition. . . . I have cause to be, and am, without the least scruple of your faithfulness; and I know your kindness to me your old friend, and your abilities to serve the Commonwealth; and there are enough besides me that can testify it. And I believe our engagements for this Commonwealth have been and are as deep as most men's; and there never was more need of advice, and solid, hearty counsel, than the present state of our affairs doth require."

To this invitation for "solid, hearty counsel" in the specious name of the good cause, the prudent lawyer responded in general terms of caution, and then added, "The goodness of your own nature and personal knowledge of me will keep you from any jealousy of my faithfulness." To this Cromwell, with many protestations of belief and trust, discreetly rejoined. "I wish there was no more ground of suspicion of others than of you. I can trust you with my life, and the most secret matters relating to our business; and to that end I have now desired a little private discourse with you; and really, my lord, there is very great cause for us to consider the dangerous condition we are all in, and how to make good our station, to improve the mercies and successes which God hath given us, and not to be fooled out of them again, nor to be broken in pieces by our particular jarrings and animosities one against another, but to unite our counsels, and hands, and hearts, to make good what we have so dearly bought, with so much hazard, blood, and treasure; and that, the Lord having given us an entire conquest over our enemies, we should not now hazard all again by our private janglings, and bring those mischiefs upon ourselves which our enemies could never do."

* By Whitelocke himself.

The lord-commissioner, flattered by this cordial look of confidence, appears to have shown an instant disposition to enter into the heart of the business. "My lord," he said, "I look upon our present danger as greater than ever it was in the field, and (as your excellency truly observes) our proneness to destroy ourselves, when our enemies could not do it. It is no strange thing for a gallant army as yours is, after full conquest of their enemies, to grow into factions and ambitious designs." "I have used," interposed Cromwell, "and shall use, the utmost of my poor endeavours to keep them all in order and obedience." "Your excellency," admitted Whitelocke, courteously, "hath done it hitherto even to admiration."

Taking advantage of this, the lord-general proceeded to observe with much fervour, and a marvellous lack of shame, on the discontents he had himself cherished, for his own purposes, in the military councils. "Truly," he said, first answering to the lord-commissioner's compliment, "God hath blessed me in it exceedingly, and I hope will do so still. Your lordship hath observed most truly the inclinations of the officers of the army to particular factions, and to murmurings that they are not rewarded according to their deserts; that others, who have adventured least, have gained most; and they have neither profit, nor preferment, nor place in government, which others hold, who have undergone no hardships nor hazards for the Commonwealth; and herein they have too much of truth; yet their insolency is very great, and their influence upon the private soldiers works them to the like discontent and murmurings. Then, as for the members of Parliament, the army begins to have a strange distaste against them, and I wish there were not too much cause for it; and really their pride, ambition, and self-seeking, engrossing all places of honour and profit to themselves and their friends, and their daily breaking forth into new and violent parties and factions; their delays of business, and designs to perpetuate themselves, and to continue the power in their own hands; their meddling in private matters between party and party, contrary to the institution of Parliaments, and their unjustness and partiality in these matters, and the scandalous lives of some of the chief of them—these things, my lord, do give too much ground for people to open their mouths against them, and to dislike them. Nor can they be kept within the bounds of justice, law, or reason, they themselves being the supreme power of the nation, liable to no account to any, nor to be controlled or regulated by any other power, there being none superior, or co-ordinate with them: so that, unless there be some authority and power so full and so high as to restrain and keep things in better order, and that may be a check to these exorbitancies, it will be impossible, in human reason, to prevent our ruin."

But the wily lawyer was not to be caught so fast. He admitted much, but kept more in reserve. "I confess," he said, "the danger we are all in by these extravagances and inordinate powers is more than, I doubt, is generally apprehended. . . . As to the members of Parliament, I confess the greatest difficulty lies there; your commission being from them, and they being acknowledged the supreme power of the nation, subject to no control, nor allowing any appeal from them. Yet I am sure your excellency will not look upon them as generally depraved; too many of them are much to blame in those things you have mentioned, and many unfit things have passed among them; but I hope well of the major part of them, when great matters come to a decision." Cromwell, upon this, with well-painted passion, made the show of an earnest appeal to his lawyer-friend. "My lord, my lord, there is little hopes of a settlement to be made by them—really there is not; but a great deal of fear that they will destroy again what the Lord hath done graciously for them and us. We all forget God, and God will forget us, and give us up to confusion; and these men will help it on, if they be suffered to proceed in their ways. Some course must be thought on to curb and restrain them, or we shall be ruined by them." Whitelocke quietly remarked to this, "We ourselves have acknowledged them the supreme power, and taken our commissions and authority in the highest concerns from them; and how to curb them, after this, it will be hard to find out a way for it."

This was the very point to which the energetic captain desired to bring his learned and most meditative associate. Flinging off all farther reserve, he frankly, boldly, and abruptly asked, "WHAT IF A MAN SHOULD TAKE UPON HIM TO BE KING?"

This question, be it observed, was addressed to one who stood high in the confidence of the leaders of the Republic, and who himself, indeed, was one of its chief administrators. But no shadow of anger or remonstrance fell upon the treasonable thought. Most quiet and civil was the lord-commissioner's reply: "I think that remedy would be worse than the disease." Cromwell subjoined quickly, "Why do you think so?"

In his answer, most memorable for that, the thorough-paced master of law and stratagem soothed the excitement of the great soldier by pointing out to him all he might do, while he affected to advise him as to what should not be done. He "settled" on the instant a "draught" of the Protectorate! "As to your own person, the title of king would be of no advantage, because you have the full kingly power in you already concerning the militia, as you are general. As to the nomination of civil officers, those whom you think fittest are seldom refused; and although you have no negative vote in the passing of laws, yet what you dislike will not easily be carried; and the taxes are already settled, and in your power to dispose the money raised. And as to foreign affairs, though the ceremonial application be made to the Parliament, yet the expectation of good or bad success in it is from your excellency, and particular solicitations of foreign ministers are made to you only; so that I apprehend, indeed, less envy, and danger, and pomp, but not less power, and real opportunities of doing good, in your being general, than would be if you had assumed the title of king."

It is clear that the only sensible difference between the interlocutors in this famous dialogue was one of time. Whitelocke's protectorate would scarcely have been so sudden. But such a difference was more than enough for Cromwell. His active share in the conference ended at this point; and in all that followed he was simply unrolling, for self-guidance on minor matters, the entire map of the lord-commissioner's plan.

First meeting him with his own weapons, he fathomed the lawyer's view of the popular feeling of the nation. "I have heard," said Cromwell, "some of your profession observe, that he who is actually king, whether by election or descent, yet being once king, all acts done by him as king are as lawful and justifiable as by any king who hath the crown by inheritance from his forefathers; and that, by an act of Parliament in Henry the Seventh's time, it is safer for those who act under a king, be his title what it will, than for those who act under any other power. And surely the power of a king is so great and high, and so universally understood and revered by the people of this nation, that the title of it might not only indemnify, in a great measure, those that act under it, but likewise be of great use and advantage, in such times as these, to curb the insolence of those whom the present powers cannot control, or, at least, are the persons themselves who are thus insolent." Whitelocke, in answering this, more plainly insinuated his doubts as to time. "I agree in the general with what you are pleased to observe as to this title of king; but whether for your excellency to take this title upon you as things now are, will be for the good and advantage either of yourself and friends, or of the Commonwealth, I do very much doubt, notwithstanding that act of Parliament, 11 Hen. VII., which will be little regarded, or observed to us by our enemies, if they should come to get the upper hand of us."

Upon this the lord-general fairly asked, "What do you apprehend would be the danger of taking this title?" And Whitelocke as fairly answered, "The danger, I think, would be this: One of the main points of controversy betwixt us and our adversaries is, whether the government of this nation shall be established in monarchy, or in a free state or commonwealth. And most of our friends have engaged with us upon the hopes of having the government settled in a free state; and to effect that, have undergone all their hazards and difficulties, they being persuaded, though I think much mistaken, that under the government of a commonwealth they shall enjoy more liberty and right, both as to their spiritual and civil concerns, than they shall under a monarchy, the pressures and dislike whereof are so fresh in their memories and sufferings. Now, if your excellency should take upon you the title of king, this state of your cause will be thereby wholly determined, and monarchy established in your person; and the question will be no more, whether our government shall be by a monarch or by a free state, but whether Cromwell or Stuart shall be our king and monarch. And that question, whereinbefore so great parties of the nation were engaged, and which was universal, will by this means become, in effect, a private controversy only. Before it was national, What kind of government we should have? Now it will become particular, Who shall be our governor, whether of the family of the Stuarts, or of the family of the Cromwells? Thus the state of our controversy being totally changed, all those who were for a commonwealth (and they are a very great and considerable party), having their hopes therein frustrated, will desert you; your hands will be weakened, your interests straitened, and your cause in apparent danger to be ruined."

Here, however, all semblance of sincerity or fairness seems to vanish from the worthy lord-commissioner, and we are irresistibly called upon to remember the significant fact that the conference was not published till after the Restoration. A slight preliminary interchange of compliment and courtesy first claims record. It ran thus:

"CROMWELL. I confess you speak reason in this; but what other things can you propound that may obviate the present dangers and difficulties wherein we are all engaged? WHITELOCKE. It will be the greatest difficulty to find out such an expedient. I have had many things in my private thoughts upon this business, some of which, perhaps, are not fit or safe for me to communicate. CROMWELL. I pray, my lord, what are they? You may trust me with them; there shall no prejudice come to you by any private discourse betwixt us. I shall never betray my friend; you may be as free with me as with your own heart, and shall never suffer by it. WHITELOCKE. I make no scruple to put my life and fortune into your excellency's hand; and so I shall, if I impart these fancies to you, which are weak, and perhaps may prove offensive to your excellency; therefore my best way will be to smother them. CROMWELL. Nay, I prithee, my Lord Whitelocke, let me know them: be they what they will, they cannot be offensive to me, but I shall take it kindly from you; therefore, I pray, do not conceal those thoughts of yours from your faithful friend. WHITELOCKE. Your excellency honours me with a title far above me; and since you are pleased to command it, I shall discover to you my thoughts herein, and humbly desire you not to take in ill part what I shall say to you. CROMWELL. Indeed I shall not; but I shall take it, as I said, very kindly from you. WHITELOCKE. Give me leave, then, first to consider your excellency's condition. You are environed with secret enemies. Upon your subduing of the public enemy, the officers of your army account themselves all victors, and to have had an equal share in the conquest with you. The success which God hath given us hath not a little elated their minds; and many of them are busy and of turbulent spirits, and are not without their designs how they may dismount your excellency, and some of themselves get up into the saddle; how they may bring you down, and set up themselves. They want not counsel and encouragement herein; it may be from some members of the Parliament, who may be jealous of your power and greatness, lest you should grow too high for them, and in time overmaster them; and they will plot to bring you down first, or to clip your wings. CROMWELL. I thank you that you so fully consider my condition; it is a testimony of your love to me, and care of me, and you have rightly considered it; and I may say, without vanity, that in my condition yours is involved, and all our friends; and those that plot my ruin will hardly bear your continuance in any condition worthy of you. Besides this, the cause itself may possibly receive some disadvantage by the strugglings and contentions among ourselves. But what, sir, are your thoughts for prevention of those mischiefs that hang over our heads?"

Those thoughts are then recorded thus; and when they first saw the light, Charles II. had pardoned the safe rebellion of Whitelocke, and was revelling and rejoicing on his pensioned throne. "Pardon me, sir, in the next place, a little to consider the condition of the King of Scots. This prince being now by your valour, and the success which God hath given to the Parliament, and to the army under your command, reduced to a very low condition, both he, and all about him, cannot but be very inclinable to hearken to any terms whereby their lost hopes may be revived of his being restored to the crown, and they to their fortunes and native country. By a private treaty with him you may secure yourself, and your friends and their fortunes; you may make yourself and your posterity as great and permanent, to all human probability, as ever any subject was, and provide for your friends; you may put such limits to monarchical power as will secure our spiritual and civil liberties, and you may secure the cause in which we are all engaged; and this may be effectually done by having the power of the militia continued in yourself, and whom you shall agree upon after you. I propound, therefore, for you excellency to send to the King of Scots, and to have a private treaty with him for this purpose; and I beseech you to pardon what I have said upon the occasion. It is out of my affection and service to your excellency and to all honest men; and I humbly pray you not to have any jealousy thereupon of my approved faithfulness to your excellency and to this Commonwealth."

If anything like this were really said, there is much pleasant contempt in the tone of Cromwell's reply! "I have not," he remarked, "I assure you, the least distrust of your faithfulness and friendship to me, and to the cause of this Commonwealth, and I think you have much reason for what you propound; but it is a matter of so high importance and difficulty, that it deserves more time of consideration and debate than is at present allowed us. We shall therefore take a further time to discourse of it." "And with this," adds our memorialist, "the general brake off, and went to other company, and so into Whitehall, seeming, by his countenance and carriage, displeased with what had been said; yet he never objected it against Mr. Whitelocke in any public meeting afterward; only his carriage towards him, from that time, was altered, and his advising with him not so frequent and intimate as before; and it was not long after that he found an occasion, by an honourable employment, to send him out of the way (as some of his nearest relations, particularly his daughter Claypole, confessed), that he might be no obstacle or impediment to his ambitious designs."

Making every due concession to Whitelocke's amusing self-conceit, and to Lady Claypole's womanly good-humour in flattering it, it is incumbent upon us to state our strong impression that Cromwell never at any time proposed to himself the unnecessary trouble of erecting the pliant lord-commissioner into anything like an obstacle or impediment, and also to subjoin the fact that the "honourable employment" for sending our state lawyer "out of the way"* was not even thought of, till, by a most atrocious act of usurpation, Cromwell had not only declared his ambitious designs, but proved the innocent helplessness of any obstacle that Whitelocke could possibly oppose to them. It was merely to prevent the intrusion of needless and impertinent forms into the detailed project of the Protectorate that, on the eve of the regular instalment of that mode of despotism, the Swedish embassy† was devised for the meddling man of law. Of the conference itself, it is only needful to remark farther, that it was chiefly useful to Cromwell in proving the aid of Whitelocke useless. He turned back to his military council.

Lambert's influence he had already won over to his project; a vain and weak man, influential with the army, and not ill inclined towards the civil authorities, till the craft of Cromwell worked his vanity and revolt against them, and his very ambition into aid towards himself. For Ireton's office, which was voted to Lambert on the death of that virtuous soldier, having been subsequently deprived of its accompanying title of lord-deputy (an omission rendered necessary by Cromwell's own intimation that he desired no longer to continue in his own person the rank of lord-lieutenant‡), Lam-

* Another person of somewhat greater importance was also, within three months of this time, sent out of the way by Cromwell's influence. Henry, duke of Gloucester, and the Princess Elizabeth, children of Charles I., were in England at their father's death. The council of the Commonwealth had proposed, in 1650, to send the duke to his brother in Scotland, and the princess to her sister in Holland, allowing a thousand a year to each quandú se bene gesserint. (See Journals, July 24 and Sept. 11 in that year.) But on the 8th of Sept. Elizabeth suddenly died, and the young brother remained under the charge of the governor of Carisbrook till within three months of the period I am now describing. Then it was that Cromwell advised the young prince's tutor, Lovel, whom Clarendon speaks of highly, to ask permission from the government for his safe removal to his sister, the Princess of Orange. This the high-minded Republicans granted at once, and accompanied the concession with the sum of £500 to defray the expense of his voyage, and the promise of an annual stipend if he would not join the rebellious scheme of his elder brothers. This act of magnanimity, not a singular act with these high-souled men, has been commonly attributed to the influence of Cromwell, who thus sought to remove a rival from his path. Perhaps it may, in one sense, have been so; for Widdington and the lawyers, it will be recollected, had urged the claims of this youthful Henry Stuart to the throne, under a new settlement, as the only member of the royal family unspotted with the blood of Englishmen. Not the less, however, was the concession to such a request evidence of high generosity on the part of the then rulers of the state. And not the less, let me add, is it a proof how the greatest men are dwarfed by mean and unworthy designs, when we behold the powerful Cromwell, the veteran of a hundred victories, reduced to the wretched need of recognising a rival in a powerless lad of twelve years old!

† See Appendix E., CROMWELL AND CHRISTINA.

‡ The title of general-in-chief of all the forces there was substituted. The "lord-deputy," in consequence, became "lieutenant-general" merely. Ludlow thus adverts to the new appointment. After observing on Cromwell's reluctance to continue him in the military command of Ireland, in consequence of "the jealousy which General Cromwell had conceived of me, that I might prove an obstruction to the design he was carrying on, to advance himself by the ruin of the Commonwealth," he adds, "and therefore, since bert's vanity was easily moved to believe that an empty title, omitted for the purpose of avoiding a practical absurdity, was omitted for the purpose of slighting him. He rejected the appointment in disgust.* More easily still was his ambition played with, since the lord-general threw out obscure hints of the necessity that would arise of fixing some order of succession in case of any recasting of the supreme power; and who so fit to succeed the first man of the army as he who was indisputably the second?†

Major-general Lambert refused to go over with any character less than that of deputy, he resolved by any means to place Lieutenant-general Fleetwood at the head of affairs in Ireland; by which conduct he procured two great advantages to himself, thereby putting the army in Ireland into the hands of a person secured to his interest by the marriage of his daughter, and, drawing Major-general Lambert into an enmity towards the Parliament, prepared him to join with him in opposition to them, when he should find it convenient to put his design in execution."

* Mrs. Hutchinson, in her memoirs, gives the following account of this transaction, and of an incident of Royalist report, which is mentioned in my next paragraph. The account is only correct in the general impression it conveys. "After the death of Ireton," says Mrs. Hutchinson, "Lambert was voted deputy of Ireland, and commander-in-chief there, who, being at that time in the north, was exceedingly elevated with the honour, and courted all Fairfax's old commanders, and other gentlemen, who, upon his promises of preferment, quitted their places, and many of them came to London and made him up there a very proud train, which still exalted him, so that too soon he put on the prince, immediately laying out £5000 for his own particular equipage, and looking upon all the Parliament men, who had conferred this honour upon him, as underlings, and scarce worth the great man's nod. This untimely declaration of his pride gave great offence to the Parliament, who, having only given him a commission for six months for his deputyship, made a vote that, after the expiration of that time, the presidency of the civil and military power of that nation should no more be in his nor any one man's hands again. This vote was upon Cromwell's procurement, who hereby designed to make way for his new son-in-law, Col. Fleetwood, who had married the widow of the late deputy, Ireton. There went a story, that as my Lady Ireton was walking in St. James's Park, the Lady Lambert, as proud as her husband, came by where she was, and as the present princess always had precedence of the relic of the dead prince, so she put my Lady Ireton below, who, notwithstanding her piety and humility, was a little grieved at the affront. Col. Fleetwood being then present, in mourning for his wife, who died at the same time her lord did, took occasion to introduce himself, and was immediately accepted by the lady and her father, who designed thus to restore his daughter to the honour she was fallen from. His plot took as himself could wish; for Lambert, who saw himself thus cut off from half his exaltation, sent the House an insolent message, 'that if they found him so unworthy of the honour they had given him as so soon to repent it, he would not retard their remedy for six months, but was ready to surrender their commission before he entered into his office.' They took him at his word, and made Fleetwood deputy, and Ludlow commander of the horse; whereupon Lambert, with a heart full of spite, malice, and revenge, retreated to his palace at Wimbledon, and sat there watching an opportunity to destroy the Parliament. Cromwell, although he chiefly wrought this business in the House, yet flattered with Lambert, and having another reach of ambition in his breast, helped to inflame Lambert against those of the Parliament who were not his creatures, and to cast the odium of his disgrace upon them, and profess his own clearness in it, and pity of him, that should be drawn into such an inconvenience as the charge of putting himself into equipage, and the loss of all that provision; which Cromwell, pretending generosity, took all upon his own account, and delivered him of the debt."

† I may quote on this point a curious passage from the Flagellum: "Major-general Lambert, nevertheless, did concur with him (Cromwell) in every particular, the whole design being secretly imparted to him, and he promised, as a reward for his assistance, the succession to the supreme power. This intimacy of Lambert was of a long standing, ever since Preston fight, and was cemented the faster by that complacency Oliver took in his wife, a woman of good birth and parts, and of pleasing attractions both for mind and body. The voice of the people was, that she was more familiar with him than the honour of her sex would allow, and that she had some extraordinary kindnesses for him which she had not for her husband; and that, being the

The result of this intrigue was beneficial in another shape. Cromwell had designed the command in Ireland for an instrument of his own, Charles Fleetwood, to whom he at this time also induced his daughter Bridget, who had not yet put off her mourning for Ireton, to consent to give her hand. The Royalist writers have a story about this marriage which may be worth mentioning, though it is refuted by the proofs already offered in this work of the high spirit and masculine good sense of Cromwell's eldest daughter. They say that Charles Fleetwood one day met Bridget Ireton in tears, and on inquiring the cause, found she was giving way to a fit of feminine spleen in consequence of having just before been forced to give way to the wife of Lambert, in St. James's Park. They were both at this instant in mourning, one for a wife, the other for a husband. An offer of the widower's hand was made and accepted on the spot, and the widow found herself speedily restored to precedence as the wife of the Lieutenant-general of Ireland! The story is amusing, but not credible. The wife of Ireton might possibly have consented to sacrifice her affections to the state policy of her father, but she would not have betrayed a mind of superior virtue and character to the miserable satisfaction of her own wounded vanity.

But now the contest between the chiefs of the Commonwealth and their too powerful servant, though in full career towards its memorable and miserable close, received temporary check in two directions. On the one hand, dissension reared its head suddenly in the minds of Cromwell's military cabal; while, on the other, the grand position assumed by the Republican leaders in closing their war with the Dutch seems to have suspended for a brief space, whether in prudence or in awe, even the sacrilegious purposes of Cromwell himself.

Both events are marked beyond a doubt in a Royalist production of the time, and they reflect considerations of the utmost importance and interest on the view of the last days of the English Commonwealth, which is here sought to be impartially conveyed. The first, descriptive of the meetings and dissensions of the military cabal, is thus given. The writer, be it recollected, contemplating both parties in the struggle with equal hatred, may here lay claim to some of the best privileges of impartiality. "Every other day almost, more fasts, or some such religious exercise, was managed by Cromwell and Harrison, who promoted the proposals for a new representative, in order to the personal reign of Christ, and that therefore it was high time the government was placed in the hands of his saints, for all the glorious prophecies thereof were now ready to be fulfilled; and this was cried up as the doctrine of the times. Cromwell seemed to be of the same judgment, and of that millenary principle, designing (as he said) nothing of those mutations of government which were agitating but in tendency to that great revolution; so that he had absolutely fooled Harrison into a confidence of his good intentions, and that he aimed not at his own medium of reciprocation of intelligence between them, she did communicate all her husband's designs, and conceal some of the others; though she needed not to have been so squeamish or reserved, for one whose depths were never fathomed or discovered to any mortal, Ireton excepted."

greatness; and thereupon all the party Harrison could make, which was Feaks's, Rogers's, and Sympton's congregations, were impatient to have the Parliament ousted, and their fine module to take place, wherein righteousness and holiness should be exalted in the kingdoms of the world. And now the Turk and the Pope were horribly threatened, and Oliver looked upon as the great instrument that should confound anti-Christ. But, though most of the officers were thus bewitched and besotted, yet a great many of them had just and strong suspicions what his dissolution of the Parliament would end in, and therefore secret consultations were held how to oppose these practices upon the Parliament, in whose authority conserved and secured, they were so wise as to think themselves safe and defended from the after-claps of the rebellion. Among the rest, several officers of note came voluntarily out of Ireland (as some out of Scotland), who had, by their general fasts, perceived the drift of their general, to withstand him, and publicly protest against the conduct of this business, as directly tending to the overthrow and undoing all, for which so much blood had been spilled, and giving up the most glorious cause in the world to its vanquished enemies—Noll's own argument. . . . Of those that thus opposed him, Colonel Venables, scout-master General Downing, and Major Streater, were the most eminent, who to that purpose, as above said, came out of Ireland; but Colonel Venables was soon wrought upon; and Mr. Downing offering to speak against it in the council of officers, and getting upon the table for better audience, was bid to come down by Cromwell, asking him what he did there. Only Colonel Streater persisted in his resolution of giving reasons against it, and being flamm'd by Harrison with Christ's personal reign, and that he was assured the lord-general sought not himself, but that King Jesus might take the sceptre, he presently replied that Christ must come before Christmas, or else he would come too late. For this opportune opposition, and ten queries then published by him in the army, he was afterward committed to the Gate House, and looked upon by Cromwell as his mortal enemy.*

On the other, and, to our present purpose, the more important matter of consideration adverted to, the Royalist writer uses language even stronger and more significant. Having spoken of the last great effort of the Dutch to recover the supremacy of the sea, he proceeds to characterize it as a grave stumbling-block to the designs of Cromwell. "It was a hazardous enterprise," he says, "to be fighting with two commonwealths together, and to which his confidence and resolution could not raise him, without a surer interest in the people who were to undergo his tyranny. This now reprieved the members from his decree of dissolution, while they had tried the fortune of war with the Dutch, and had put things into such a posture and certainty that no home alteration could discompose or disorder it, the treasury for the support of the war being now a filling, a naval force rigging and equipping, and the honour and glory of the nation engaged and concerned."*

* Flagellum, by Heath.

It would be difficult to bear better testimony than this to a statesmanlike fitness for power in the men who at present held it, or to a gross falsehood in the pretence on which it was so soon to be wrested from them. And they fully justified these demands upon their last exertions. With unexampled capacity and energy they refilled the drained exchequer, refitted their naval power, sent Blake to sea with the noblest squadron he had yet commanded and finally shattered to pieces the last resources of the Dutch. Again, therefore, but for the last time now, had this great administrative genius averted mortal danger from the Commonwealth. Men's homes were safe, the honour of the Republic safe, and every enemy to England beaten back with ignominy to his own shore. "We never," said an illustrious agent in the work,† as he proudly recalled the history of the despised Rump under Richard Cromwell's Protectorate, "we never bid fairer to be masters of the whole world." From the highest point of elevation indeed were they doomed to hasten to their setting; in its ripest season was the pear fated to be plucked by Cromwell; and (least merited of all!) the fame which history should surely have awarded, in some sort, to the men beneath the light and warmth of whose genius it had attained so full a richness, she exclusively bestowed, without reserve or stint, on the successful usurper!

Very ominous warnings were thickening around him when he ventured his final move. In renovating the exchequer for the war, Vane had proposed a sale of the estate of Hampton Court, then held in trust by the great soldier;‡ and the first act of the same statesman, after that Blake was fairly at sea, and while the contest was of course undecided, had been to procure a vote from the House, appointing the 3d of November, 1653, instead of that day in the year 1654, for the dissolution of Parliament. What, indeed, were the exact views and prospects to which that true friend of freedom still clung in hope, even so late as this, may be gathered without much difficulty from what Roger Williams, a staunch Republican, and his associate of early years in the government of New-England (who was now staying at our English statesman's country residence in Lincolnshire), wrote to his transatlantic friends. "Here," he says, "is great thoughts and preparations for a new Parliament. Some of our friends are apt to think a new Parliament will favour us and our cause." Certain it was that the time had now arrived for Cromwell's usurpation, if it was to arrive ever. Each day that passed over the statesmen in their new and well-won safety from foreign attack, promised to be laden with events that must tend to establish far more decisively than ever their internal power.

It is very curious, and highly instructive, to note down exact dates at the various points in

* Thomas Scot. See Life of Marten, p. 385.

† Ludlow thus speaks of "two ways" by which Vane and his associates sought to "countermine" Cromwell. "First, by balancing his interest in the army with that of the fleet, procuring an order from the Parliament, by reason of the importance of the war with the Dutch, to send some regiments of the army to strengthen the fleet; and, secondly, by recommending, as an easy way to raise money in that emergency, the sale of Hampton Court and other places, that were esteemed as baits to tempt some ambitious man to ascend the throne."—Vol. ii., p. 451.

this famous struggle. For example, in the memorials of even the cautious and Cromwell-serving Whitelocke, we find that the same note which records the last great victory of Blake and the "Parliament's forces at sea," contains also these significant allusions to Cromwell and his officers: "And they now began to assume to themselves all the honour of the past actions, and of the conquests by them achieved, scarce owning the Parliament, and their assistance and provision for them; but taxing and censuring the members of Parliament for injustice and delay of business, and for seeking to prolong their power, and promote their private interest, and satisfy their own ambition. With these and many others the like censures, they endeavoured to calumniate the Parliament, and judge them guilty of those crimes whereof themselves were faulty; not looking into their own actions, nor perceiving their own defaults, yet censuring the actions and proceedings of the Parliament very opprobriously." The opprobrium must have been sharp indeed which startled even this considerate and compliant lawyer into so decided a sense of it. In the next record of his diary he thus proceeds: "The drift of Cromwell and his officers was to put an end to this Parliament, which many wondered at, and sought to dissuade him from, upon all opportunities, as far as was thought convenient, and that they might not appear desirous to continue their own powers and sitting in Parliament, whereof they had cause to be sufficiently weary."

In this passage Whitelocke seems to me to describe, with sufficient accuracy, one of those great sources of danger to a political cause which seldom rise to the surface of history, but which evidently now beset with very formidable obstructions that strenuous and determined policy by which the statesmen struggled to maintain their ground. All great parties, since the world began, have had to complain of their too moderate or over-sensitive men; men overstocked with delicacies; who are more apt to regulate their course by the derision of opponents than by the approval of conscience or of friend; who will shape hostility according to the convenience of the party to whom they are hostile; and who are, above all things, fond to talk of being weary of the burden their own virtues or their own party may have imposed upon them. We now behold such, by the help of Whitelocke, among the members of the House who supported Vane; and can we doubt that that statesman, who would have thought it treason to his country to consult the convenience of her enemies, and have sunk lifeless in his place before he indulged the luxury of being "weary" in her service—can we doubt that he suffered, far more than by the worst difficulties, dangers, or toils of the cause, from the holiday sensibilities and delicate indifference of such gentlemen as these? It matters seldom that they happen to be few. The example goes forth to the great body of the people, who find it hard to discriminate, in such circumstances, between service and betrayal.

More treacherous enemies, at the same time, beset Vane and his party, even among the civil members of that House for whose independence they were now perilling all that makes life dear to man. Whitelocke describes them also, in the same passage of apparent self-reference already quoted. "Neither," he continues, as if to excuse the views of the moderate men, "neither could it clearly be foreseen that the design of Cromwell and his officers was to rout the present power, and so set up themselves; against the which they were advised, as pulling down the foundation of their own interest and power, and the way to weaken themselves, and to hazard both their cause and persons. Yet still they seemed zealous, upon their common pretensions of 'right,' and 'justice,' and 'public liberty,' to put a period to this Parliament, and that if the Parliament would not shortly do it themselves, that then the soldiers must do it. Some who earnestly declared their judgment against this, as 'the most dangerous and the most ungrateful thing that could be practised,' by this freedom gained no favour with Cromwell and his officers. But there wanted not some Parliament men, perhaps to flatter with them, who soothed them in this unhand-some design, and were complotting with them to ruin themselves, as by the consequence will appear."

One of Cromwell's falsest pretences is shadowed forth in this extract, but it is a pretence which has unhappily passed into history, and claims, therefore, serious disproof. This, it may be here remarked, is the first time that the testimonies of living witnesses as to these memorable occurrences have been brought face to face; and it is not an ungratifying circumstance to note what a perfect agreement there is as to all the main considerations they suggest, in the relations of men of such different parties, writing at such different times, and only alike in the fact of having themselves witnessed what they thus record. The result will show, among other things, that the only reasonable pretext by which history has attempted to justify the usurpation of Cromwell is based upon a falsehood.

The question of dissolution is stated by Whitelocke to have been urged by the soldiers as of "right," "justice," and "public liberty," and to have left a reasonable alternative to those friends of freedom who had not lost faith in that sacred thing. "You must put a period to this Parliament," urge the soldiers. "If, however, you do not shortly do this yourselves, then the soldiers must do it." Now it is quite true that this tone was for a time adopted in the councils of Cromwell, but only for such a time as might render feasible a subsequent mean perversion of the truth to the English people. Ludlow states some singular facts on this head. While Cromwell, he says, was "making the most solemn professions of fidelity to the Parliament, assuring them that, if they would command the army to break their swords over their heads, and to throw them into the sea, he would undertake they should do it, he privately engaged the officers of the army to draw up a petition to the Parliament, that, for the satisfaction of the nation, they would put that vote which they had made for fixing a period to their sitting into an act; which, while the officers were forming and debating, the general having, it seems, for that time altered his counsels, sent Colonel Desborough, one of his instruments, to the council of officers, who told them they were a sort of men whom nothing could satisfy; that the Parliament were more ready to do any good than they to desire it; that they ought to rely upon their word and promise to dissolve themselves by the time prefixed; and that to petition them to put their vote into an act would manifest a diffidence of them, and lessen their authority, which was so necessary to the army. The general, coming into the council while Desborough was speaking, seconded him; to which some of the officers took the liberty to reply that they had the same opinion of the Parliament and petition with them, and that the chief argument that moved them to take this matter into consideration was the intimation they had received that it was according to the desires of those who had now spoken against it, and whose latter motion they were much more ready to comply with than their former."

Quite true it was that it had once been, for good reasons, according to the desires of those who now, for better reasons, spoke against it. In such curious details we behold each fluctuation of the struggle; for at this moment, the very crisis of all, Vane had baffled Cromwell upon his own ground and with his own weapons, and it was nothing more nor less than a sudden discovery of that circumstance which "altered the counsels of the general." Ludlow describes what Vane had done in a general remark on the sudden change in the policy of the Parliament. "Now, perceiving to what kind of excesses the madness of the army was like to carry them, the Parliament resolved to leave as a legacy to the people the government of a commonwealth by their representatives when assembled in Parliament, and in the intervals thereof by a council of state chosen by them, and to continue till the meeting of the next succeeding Parliament, to whom they were to give an account of their conduct and management. To this end they resolved, without any farther delay, to pass the act for their own dissolution." Vane had within the last few days, in fact, by his own individual and almost unaided exertions, hastened to its latter stages the memorable bill for a "new representative." Thus, as the sharp crisis approached, there appeared even an activity and energy that could cope with Cromwell's own. Silently but resolutely Vane had achieved the major part of the amendments recommended in his own report,* and little now remained save the final sanction of the House to give to the measure the force of law. Cromwell then, for the first time, while in absolute triumphal progress on the strongest position of the war he had engaged in, looked up and saw it in firm possession of the enemy.

The aspect of the contest between the Parliament and their general changes from this instant. It loses, on the side of Cromwell, every element, or even pretence, of fairness. It at once became evident that the musket could arbitrate it only, and even Cromwell's most plausible craft was unmasked suddenly into a bare image of tyranny and force. Up to this point he had a certain hollow case to rest upon with the people, and was at least going forward to his aim with a stealthier step and the help of a less startling falsehood. The very circumstances which had justified to the statesmen even their share in the existence of that popular discontent, now spread in various directions (and which clamoured in its less scrupulous quarters of the "despotism" of many), would have served to justify, in some sort also, Cromwell's subtle measures for the substitution of a despotism of one. All that was now at an end. Truth took its stand on one side, falsehood fronted it on the other, and the most momentous interests of humanity, present and future, trembled in the impending issue. Religion and liberty, the right of action and of thought, honours won upon earth, deliverances vouchsafed from heaven—all that had rendered the English people a praise and wonder to the earth during their contest with their king, were now committed in this struggle for the existence of representation in our country. The example of the rulers of England had, during all that time, been the life of virtue in her people. It was by the Eliots, the Pymes, the Hampdens, and the Vanes, that an enlightening influence, as from heaven itself, had pierced into the humblest and remotest corners of the land. To blight this as suddenly as it had risen, and to promote a second growth of ignorance and of slavery, only less bad because less enduring than the first, it was simply necessary to exhibit once more in the high places of England that very oppression, coercion, and arbitrary rule from which she had been freed so lately. And this was the miserable work which Cromwell had now in hand, and for which he was content to peril greater and purer fame than had fallen within the grasp of Englishman before him.

The first thing to be noted in the closing scenes of the struggle, so far as we are able to penetrate the obscurity which unhappily has veiled them too long, is the fierce contempt exhibited by Cromwell for the popular pretences on which he rested first. As soon as he saw that Vane had resolved to test them, he flung them scornfully to the wind. In the life of Henry Neville, for example, a virtuous and exemplary man, a scene of this exact time is given as from Neville's lips. "Cromwell upon this great occasion sent for some of the chief city divines, as if he made it a matter of conscience to be determined by their advice. Among these was the leading Mr. Calamy, who very boldly opposed Mr. Cromwell's project, and offered to prove it both unlawful and impracticable. Cromwell answered readily upon the first head of unlawful, and appealed to the safety of the nation being the supreme law. 'But,' says he, 'pray, Mr. Calamy, why impracticable?' Calamy replied, 'Oh! 'tis against the voice of the nation; there will be nine in ten against you.' 'Very well,' says Cromwell; 'but what if I should disarm the nine, and put a sword into the tenth man's hand, would not that do the business?'"* The next scene, with the same moral, took place on a different theatre, with actors somewhat different, and is told by an anti-Republican of uncompromising fierceness. "The next scene of this applauded comedy," he writes, so characterizing a tragedy fraught with the lives of thousands of living men, and with the liberties of unborn millions, "was laid at the Cockpit by Whitehall, where Cromwell, concealing the number of the beast in his apocalypse, declared to his council of officers 'that if they should trust the people in an election of a new Parliament according to the old Constitution, it would be a tempting of God; and that his confidence was, that God did intend to save and deliver this nation by few, as he had done in former times; and that five or six men, and some few more, setting themselves to the work, might do more in one day than the Parliament had or would do in a hundred, as far as he could perceive; and that such unbiassed men were like to be the only instruments of the people's happiness.'"

* See Life of Vane, p. 314-317.

* Life of Henry Neville, p. 35.

Not succeeding with this proposal, it is to be presumed, to the extent of his desire, we find it somewhat enlarged and modified in the next council held; for the chosen few, who were to be heaven-selected for supreme power, are there suddenly extended to the significant number of forty. This was the revival of a project which had occupied the mind of Cromwell previously.* Its plain object was to pave as smooth a way to tyranny as possible, by first removing every existing legislative and executive body that had the appearance of being founded upon English institutions, or in any way based on English customs. To that end the design was admirably shaped. The Parliament having been dissolved, the sovereign power of government was to be placed for a time in commission, consisting of forty persons, chosen from the defunct House of Commons, the council of state, and the army. The mere proposed constitution of this body exhibits the kind of difficulties that Cromwell had to encounter in every stage of these extraordinary intrigues, and is in itself an implied refutation of the historical slander which treats the whole body of statesmen, the council of the Commonwealth, and the poor Rump of their once great House, with measureless scorn. Supposing the proposition sincere or insincere, which would have composed out of these various elements the new Council of Forty for England, it carries with it, not the less, an undoubted concession to the claims of the subsisting government for no little consideration at even the hands of those who had thus resolved its downfall. The people were obviously to be induced to believe that members of that famous House which had conducted the contest to its successful close were still to govern them; that power was yet to remain with at least the heads of that great body which, as council of the state, had established the Commonwealth in the respect of surrounding nations. Cromwell was at the same time quite safe in making such a project the basis of his tyranny. It was a sop for all parties, and a satisfaction for none. The Harrisons and Okeys, who looked for a reign of saints, saw, in near prospect already, the mystic number of those sacred rulers; the Streeters, Lamberts, and Salways viewed with much complacency themselves in power, and their own peculiar crotchets in advanced realization; the moderate and indifferent men, the waiters upon Providence and upon Cromwell, were content with it, as they would have been contented with anything that promised them as much ease with as little responsibility; and the only prominent dissenter or objector would seem to have been Whitelocke himself, who, in his secret and subtle love for all that was old, venerable, or like law, saw little good in forty, and much virtue in one. But Cromwell could have eased his mind on that score with an exercise of little candour. Secretly laughing down these various hopes, he stood triumphant in the security of his own. His creatures, he knew, or creatures he could mould into his, should pack that convenient council; and for the result, what would be easier or more natural than a "manifestation of Providence?"

The grand preliminary difficulty was the mode in which the first step was to be achieved—the dissolution of the Parliament. A section of the officers, backed by a section of the lawyers, argued that this should be the voluntary act of the House itself; but Vane had baffled this, so far as it could have tended to serve the views of Cromwell, by provisions* with which he had accompanied the act of dissolution, securing to the people a new and enlarged system of representation, and enlisting on the side of liberal and popular government their best sympathies and most enduring affections. The other and larger section of negotiators, or conspirators (for here there can be little choice between the words), were in favour of a compulsory dissolution, but never seem to have contemplated the extreme of that desperate course which was already working darkly in Cromwell's mind. As yet, darkly; but never, through his whole career, had the mind of that extraordinary person appeared wrapped in what looked like a helpless or chaotic confusion, that there did not lie coiled and hidden beneath it more energy and quick-sighted resolve, more rigid and straightforward determination, a purpose more sharply shaped, and readier to start into instant life and action, than have ever yet shone forth in guise the most nimble, or with an address the most accomplished. And what he now gazed at, in that internal mind of his, calmly and resolvedly—involving, as it did, not only an act without precedent in nations, but the very existence of rights, thereafter to be sports for children, which had once been watchwords of the greatest fight for liberty yet fought in the world—he at the same time as coolly designed to prepare in some sort the minds of the common people for, by the use of his favourite engine of fanaticism. The suddenness of the shock to be apprehended in some would thus at least be broken.

Ludlow is the evidence on this point. At this time, he says, "divers of the clergy, from their pulpits, began to prophesy the destruction of the Parliament, and to propose it openly as a thing desirable; insomuch that the general, who had all along concurred with this spirit in them, hypocritically complained to Quarter-master-general Vernon, 'that he was pushed on by two parties to do that, the consideration of the issue whereof made his hair to stand on end. One of these,' said he, 'is headed by Major-general Lambert, who, in revenge of that injury the Parliament did him, in not permitting him to go into Ireland with a character and conditions suitable to his merit, will be contented with nothing less than their dissolution. Of the other, Major-general Harrison is the chief, who is an honest man, and aims at good things, yet from the impatience of his spirit will not wait the Lord's leisure, but hurries me on to that which he and all honest men will have cause to repent."

* See Life of Vane, p. 313.

* See Life of Vane, p. 316, 317.

The final scene in this extraordinary and most memorable series of intrigues against liberty, carried on by men who had fought for the fame of her best and bravest champions, now draws nigh. On the 19th of April, 1653, the traitorous council, framed by Cromwell, held their famous and last meeting. About twenty members of Parliament are said to have been present, of the character already attributed to these gentlemen "negotiators." The proposition offered by Cromwell's creatures has been already described, and will farther appear in a celebrated note taken at the time by Whitelocke (who was present), of the occurrences of the meeting.

"Yesterday," says the lord-commissioner, writing on the fatal 20th of April, "there having been a great meeting, at Cromwell's lodgings in Whitehall, of Parliament-men and several officers of the army, sent to by Cromwell to be there, and a large discourse and debate having been among them touching some expedient to be found out for the present carrying on of the government of the Commonwealth, and putting a period to this present Parliament, it was offered by divers as a most dangerous thing to dissolve the present Parliament, and to set up any other government, and that it would neither be warrantable in conscience nor wisdom so to do; yet none of them expressed themselves so freely to that purpose as Sir Thomas Widdrington and Whitelocke then did. Of the other opinion, as to putting an end forthwith to this Parliament, St. John was one of the chief, and many more with him; and generally all the officers of the army, who stuck close in this likewise to their general; and the better to make way for themselves, and their ambitious design of advancing them to the civil government as well as they were in the military power, they and their party declared their opinions 'that it was necessary the same should be done one way or other, and the members of Parliament not permitted to prolong their own power:' at which expression Cromwell seemed to reprove some of them; and this conference lasted till late at night, when Widdrington and Whitelocke went home weary, and troubled to see the indiscretion and ingratitude of those men, and the way they designed to ruin themselves."

The reader will have an opportunity of contrasting this account with that which Cromwell subsequently gave of the same transaction, and in the course of which he grounded a complaint of insincerity against Whitelocke and his friends, on the alleged circumstance of their having left the meeting on this famous night with an express understanding that the leaders of the House of Commons would suspend all farther proceedings on the act for dissolution and a new representative till the result of the conference of next day. But if Whitelocke gave such a pledge, which his entire silence on that head renders at least doubtful, he did so without authority, and in the absence of any means of redeeming it. The course which Vane held at present had been deliberately chosen by that determined man, and it would have demanded a more than human power to induce him, for any consideration left upon the earth, to peril by another hour's delay the popular claim to popular rights delayed already to the endangerment of liberty. The whole of the 19th of April, so spent, as we have seen, at Whitehall, in consultation between the lawyers, temporizers, and traitors,* was passed by Vane at Westminster, in resolute amendment of the details of the bill which was at once to close the existence of the greatest Parliament that had ever sat within the walls of the old chapel of St. Stephen's, and to call into life throughout England the greatest amount of representative freedom that had yet been enjoyed by her people: and never, surely, did sun rise on a loftier or more honourable strength of purpose in the breast of any man, than that which, early on the morning on the 20th of April, sustained Sir Henry Vane as he passed into the House of Commons to strike his last blow for the sacred cause to which, from earliest youth, and in resistance to all temptations, his life had been devoted with a touching constancy. The same hour of the same ever-memorable morning saw Whitelocke and his friends on their way to Cromwell's house.

Therefore, proceeds the memorialist, in continuation of the passage already quoted, "these came early again this morning, according to appointment, to Cromwell's lodging, where there were but few Parliament-men and a few officers of the army. A point was again stirred, which had been debated the last night, 'Whether forty persons, or about that number of Parliament-men and officers of the army, should be nominated by the Parliament, and empowered for the managing the affairs of the Commonwealth till a new Parliament should meet, and so the present Parliament to be forthwith dissolved.' Whitelocke was against this proposal, and the more, fearing lest he might be one of these forty, who, he thought, would be in a desperate condition after the Parliament should be dissolved; but others were very ambitious to be of this number and council, and to be invested with this exorbitant power in them. Cromwell being informed during this debate that the Parliament was sitting, and that it was hoped they would put a period to themselves, which would be the most honourable dissolution for them, hereupon he broke off the meeting, and the members of the Parliament left him at his lodging and went to the House."

Vane, Marten, Algernon Sidney, and others of the chief men had been there some time, and

* The only sincere (however wrong-headed) Republican, of whose attendance at these councils I can find any evidence, is Sir Arthur Hazlerig. That he did so is clear from a manuscript report of a speech delivered by him in Richard Cromwell's Parliament. "I heard, being seventy miles off, that it was propounded that we should dissolve our trust, and devolve it into a few hands. I came up and found it so: that it was resolved in a junto at the Cockpit. I trembled at it, and was, after, there, and bore my testimony against it. I told them the work they went about was accursed. I told them it was impossible to devolve this trust."

had succeeded in forcing to its final stage the act for the new representative. Some of Cromwell's creatures had also shown themselves early in their places, with a view to watch the proceedings for him, and to interpose the forms of the House, if necessary, for the purpose of giving time and room to his designs. Thus, when Vane rose to urge the necessity of passing the bill into a law at once, one of these convenient gentlemen was despatched, as we have seen, to interrupt the debate at Cromwell's lodgings; while another, no less than Major-general Harrison himself, rose with the dignified purpose of talking against time, and "most sweetly and humbly" conjured the members assembled to pause before they took so important a step as that which Vane recommended. The warmth and earnestness of Vane's reply were the signal for a second messenger to Cromwell, and Ingoldsby was observed to leave the House in some haste and excitement.

The Cromwell section of officers were still in consultation with Cromwell himself at the lodging of the lord-general. The first news of the morning had "broken off" what might be called the negotiatory part of the meeting; but the military cabal had resumed their private councils, when Ingoldsby's sudden appearance in the room, with the excitement upon him of the great scene he had left, again interrupted their discussions. "If you mean to do anything decisive," he exclaimed to Cromwell, "you have no time to lose." Cromwell rose hastily, commanded a party of soldiers to be marched round to the House of Commons, and left the room without another word. Lambert and "five or six" of the more determined officers followed him. The rest remained sitting where they were, in wonder, uncertainty, and dread.

Cromwell made no pause till he stood before the door of the House of Commons. Here he planted a body of soldiers, stationed another in the lobby, and led round some files of musketeers to a position without the chamber where the members were seated. His manner, at this momentous instant, was observed to be calm, and his very dress was noted for its peaceful contrast to his purposes. Vane had again risen, and was speaking on the dissolution bill in a passionate strain, when he quietly appeared at the door, "clad in plain black clothes, with gray worsted stockings,"* quite unattended and alone. About a hundred members were at this time present.† He stood for a moment on the spot at which he entered, and then "sat down as he used to do in an ordinary place." Here he was instantly joined by his kinsman Saint John, to whom he said, with inexpressible humility of manner, that "he was come to do that which grieved him to the very soul, and that he had earnestly, with tears, prayed to God against: nay, that he had rather be torn in pieces than do it; but there was a necessity laid upon him therein, in order to the glory of God and the good of the nation." Saint John answered that "he knew not what he meant; but did pray that what it was which must be done might have a happy issue for the general good." With this, that crafty lawyer went back to his own seat, to wait the issue of all those dark intrigues in which he had himself played so prominent a part.

Vane still held on unflinchingly to his great purpose. He urged, with increased earnestness, the necessity of proceeding at once to the last stage of the bill, and with that view adjured them to dispense with even the ceremony of engrossing, and other immaterial forms. Cromwell, at this, beckoned Harrison. "Now is the time," he said to that enthusiast; "I must do it!" Harrison's answer would imply that he knew the meditated outrage,* but felt the force of the eloquence of Vane. "The work, sir," he said, after advising him to consider, "is very great and dangerous." "You say well," hastily retorted Cromwell, and "sat still for another quarter of an hour." It would then seem that Vane had succeeded in his purpose; for the speaker had actually risen to put the question,† when Cromwell started up, "put off his hat," and began to speak. "At first," Lord Leicester tells us, "and for a good while, he spoke in commendation of the Parliament for their pains and care of the public good; but afterward he changed his style; told them of their injustice, delays of justice, self-interest, and other faults;" charging them, according to Ludlow, with "not having a heart to do anything for the public good," and accusing them "of an intention to perpetuate themselves in power, had they not been forced to the passing of this act, which he affirmed they designed never to observe." But, he added, with a violent and harsh abruptness, "Your time is come! The Lord has done with you! He has chosen other instruments for the carrying on His work that are more worthy." All this seemed nothing less than inspiration to his fanatical followers. They marked the extraordinary changes in his voice and manner as new births of Providence within him, and exclaimed that it was the Lord had taken him by the hand, and set him on to do that thing. Plainer men saw the tyrant only, the slave within the grasp of tyrannous ambition. "He spoke," says Ludlow, "with so much passion and discomposure of mind, as if he had been distracted."

Meanwhile Vane had risen, Wentworth and Marten too, "but he would suffer none to speak but himself."‡ At the same time, as if himself astonished at the unprecedented part he was playing, he cried out to those who had risen, "You think, perhaps, that this is not Parliamentary language; I know it." In spite of all resistance, however, the voice of Sir Peter Wentworth, who stood up by the side of Vane, forced itself at last upon the House. He de-

* It was believed at the time that Sir Gilbert Pickering, and some few other members (out of those that had attended the Whitehall councils), were also acquainted with what Cromwell purposed. It is certain, according to the author of the Flagellum, that Sir Gilbert was privy to it, since "he had held consultation the night before with him, and was up armed in his chamber till the very time."

† Ludlow, Lord Leicester (who received his information from Algernon Sidney), and Sir Arthur Hazlerig (who was present) agree on this point. "We were labouring here in the House," says Hazlerig, in that speech in Richard Cromwell's Parliament to which I have already adverted, "on an act to put an end to that Parliament, and to call another. I desired the passing of it with all my soul. The question was putting for it, when our general stood up and stopped the question, and called in his lieutenant, with two files of musketeers, with their hats on their heads, and their guns loaded with bullets."

‡ Whitelocke, p. 529.

* Lord Leicester's Journal, p. 139.

† Ludlow, vol. ii., p. 455.

clared that this was indeed "the first time that he had ever heard such unbecoming language given to the Parliament, and that it was the more horrid in that it came from their servant, and their servant whom they had so highly trusted and obliged, and whom, by their unprecedented bounty, they had made what he was."* Whether these words really transported Cromwell, on the instant, beyond the bounds of even his self-command, or merely rendered necessary a farther display of what his deluded followers might take to be genuine inspiration, the reader will best judge from what actually followed, as an honest eyewitness has delivered it to us.

Cromwell instantly thrust his hat down upon his head, sprang from his seat into the centre of the floor of the House, and shouted out, "Come, come, I'll put an end to your prating." Then, adds Lord Leicester, on the relation of Algernon Sidney, "he walked up and down the stage or floor in the midst of the House, with his hat on his head, and chid the members soundly, looking sometimes, and pointing particularly, upon some persons, as Sir B. Whitelocke, one of the commissioners for the great seal, and Sir Henry Vane, to whom he gave very sharp language, though he named them not, but by his gestures it was well known he meant them." But even while he raved and chafed in this desperate fashion ("walking up and down," Ludlow tells us, "like a madman, and kicking the ground with his feet"), Vane succeeded in making himself heard once more. At this Cromwell stopped and called Vane by his name. "You," he said, "might have prevented this extraordinary course; but you are a juggler, and have not so much as common honesty."† "I have been forced to this," he continued. "I have sought the Lord, night and day, that he would rather slay me than put me upon the doing of this work. But now begone. You are no Parliament. I say, you are no Parliament! I'll put an end to your sitting. Begone! Give way to honest men."‡ Stamping his foot, as he spoke thus, very heavily on the floor, the door was flung open suddenly, and he stood in the midst of "five or six files of musketeers," with their arms ready!

In that moment perished, for a time, the rights in whose name twelve years of the miseries of civil war had been unrepiningly encountered, "making vain and viler than dirt the blood of so many faithful and valiant Englishmen, who had left their countrymen in this liberty of Parliament, bought with their lives." It is needless to say that resistance, to any successful end, was idle; yet not without such resistance as might serve to enter their immortal protest with posterity did these lion-hearted Republicans leave the scene (now degraded and profaned) of their yet glorious and undying triumphs. "Then the general," pursues Lord Leicester, "pointing to the speaker in his chair, said to Harrison, 'Fetch him down.' Harrison went to the speaker, and spoke to him to come down; but the speaker sat still and said nothing 'Take him down!' said the general; then Harrison went and pulled the speaker by the gown, and he came down.* It happened that day that Algernon Sidney sat next to the speaker on the right hand. The general said to Harrison, 'Put him out!' Harrison spake to Sidney to go out; but he said he would not go out, and sat still. The general said again, 'Put him out!' Then Harrison and Worsley (who commanded the general's own regiment of foot) put their hands upon Sidney's shoulders, as if they would force him to go out. Then he rose and went towards the door. Then the general went to the table where the mace lay, which used to be carried before the speaker, and said, 'Take away these bawbles!' so the soldiers took away the mace."

While this extraordinary scene of violence proceeded thus, the majority of the members had gradually withdrawn; and now, as the more eminent men, who had waited to the last, moved slowly towards the door, through files of musketeers drawn up on either side, they received to the last, in passionate insults from Cromwell, the tribute which their defence of the Commonwealth had well merited from the lips of its destroyer. Nicknames were flung in the face of each. Challoner was pointed to as a drunkard;† Sir Peter Wentworth was accused of adultery; Alderman Allen of public embezzlements; even poor Whitelocke of gross injustice; and as the lord-general's old friend, Harry Marten, passed, he was asked if a whoremaster was fit to sit and govern.‡ Among the latest of all came Vane; and as he came, he once again protested "in a loud voice" against the fatal scene which had been acted. "This is not honest," he said. "Yea, it is against morality and common honesty." At that instant, it is possible Cromwell felt some shame. He paused, as though to rally himself with the recollection of some personal or private vice he might fling against his great rival, but when he spoke, his harsh voice had a troubled tone, and he merely uttered the few words that have become so memorable, "Sir Harry Vane, Sir Harry Vane! the Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" No voice would stick, even as a lie, against the virtue and simplicity of the most spotless statesman in our annals. Vane passed on, and no nickname followed him.

Cromwell was now virtually lord of England, and stood with a heavier and more daring foot upon her neck than had ever been placed there by any of her kings. "He seized," says Ludlow, "on the records that were in the House

* Lenthall was by no means a man of gallantry or heroism. On many occasions, indeed, he showed himself deficient in the most ordinary spirit; but there were two incidents in his life, when the very extent of the outrage committed on the authority with which he was invested seems to have positively lifted him far above the strain of common men. These incidents were Charles's attempted arrest of the five members, and Cromwell's present and greater crime. Sir Arthur Hazlerig corroborates the account of the text in his speech already quoted. "The speaker," he said, "a stout man, was not willing to go. He was so noble, that he frowned, and said he would not go out of the chair till he was plucked out, which was quickly done, without much compliment, by two soldiers." Ludlow also tells us, that when Harrison went up to move the speaker from his chair, Lenthall at once told him "that he would not come down unless he were forced." 'Sir,' said Harrison, 'I will lend you my hand,' and thereupon, putting his hand within his, the speaker came down." One matter of consideration should, however, not be omitted: Lenthall had good reason to expect being brought to a severe account, if he had not shown resistance thus. † Drysdale, p. 405

* Ludlow, vol. ii., p. 456; and see Lingard's History, vol. ii., p. 171. † Leicester's Journal, p. 141.

‡ Perfect Politician, p. 169.

‡ Perfect Politician, p. 168.

and at Mr. Scobell's;* after which he went to the clerk, and snatching the act of dissolution, which was ready to pass, out of his hand, he put it under his cloak, and having commanded the doors to be locked up, went away to Whitehall."†

The officers he had left were still sitting together when Cromwell reappeared, flushed and excited as they had always seen him after victory, and, flinging on the table before them the key of the House of Commons (the "bawble" had been tossed into the outer room), told them all that he had done. "When I went there," he added, "I did not think to have done this; but, perceiving the spirit of God so strong upon me, I would not consult flesh and blood." Yet even in that cabal there were found some voices to question the justice of an act, no matter by what pretence defended, of unparalleled and awful outrage. Colonel Okey and others, it would seem, spoke out in condemnation of it, "conceiving that the way they were now going tended to ruin and confusion. To these, having not yet taken off his mask, but pretending to more honesty and self-denial than ever, he professed himself resolved to do much more good, and with more expedition, than could be expected from the Parliament, which professions from him put most of them to silence, and moved them to a resolution of waiting for a farther discovery of his design before they would proceed to a breach and division from him. But Colonel Okey, being jealous that the end would be bad, because the means were such as made them justly suspected of hypocrisy, inquired of Col. Desborough what his meaning was, to give such high commendations to the Parliament when he endeavoured to dissuade the officers of the army from petitioning them for a dissolution, and so short a time after to eject them with so much scorn and contempt; who had no other answer to make but that, if ever he drolled in his life, he had drolled then."‡ It is a pity that, in proportion as these Republican officers admitted glimmerings of conscience or fair intention into their plans, they seem to have lost altogether what could alone effectually serve them in the peculiar policy they favoured—their craft and cunning. It is wonderful to contemplate the simplicity they exhibit; amusing it might be, no less, were it not for the serious mischief it inflicted on our country.

A far different scene, however, from that which he encountered at the military cabal, awaited Cromwell at the council of state. In the afternoon of this still eventful day, the triumphant usurper, attended by Lambert and Harrison, entered the chamber of the council. The famous Bradshaw had that morning taken his seat on his fresh election to the presidency, and it thus fitly devolved upon him, from whose lips had issued the sentence which doomed a legitimate king to death for crimes committed against the people, to rebuke a traitorous usurper upon the threshold of his ill-gotten power. Cromwell broke the silence which followed his sudden appearance in the chamber: "Gentlemen," he said, "if you are met here as private persons, you shall not be disturbed; but if as a council of state, this is no place for you; and, since you can't but know what was done at the House in the morning, so take notice that the Parliament is dissolved." To this Bradshaw rose and at once replied: "Sir, we have heard what you did at the House in the morning, and before many hours all England will hear it. But, sir, you are mistaken to think that the Parliament is dissolved, for no power under heaven can dissolve them but themselves: therefore take you notice of that." With these words fell the Commonwealth of England, leaving behind it a memory which is immortal, and results that are destined to live and bear fruit forever. Each member present in council at once rose and withdrew, Scot, Hazlerig, and Love briefly and emphatically repeating, as they went, the solemn protest of Bradshaw.* Cromwell made no reply.

At early dawn of the 21st of April, a large placard was seen pasted on the door of the House of Commons—"This house to be let, unfurnished"—the work of some Royalist wit of the preceding night, after orgies which had no doubt worthily celebrated the downfall of the only sufficient or lasting barrier between England and the Stuarts.† On the morning of the same day a sort of government gazette was issued from Whitehall to the following effect: "The lord-general delivered yesterday in Parliament divers reasons wherefore a present period should be put to the sitting of this Parliament, and it was accordingly done, the speaker and the members all departing; the grounds of which proceedings will ('tis probable) be practices, and no less confident that the principles of some men who joined in this attempt were directed to the good of the nation; and that, though some might be such arrant knaves as to have other designs, yet, trusting that an impossibility of accomplishing the same would oblige them to fall in with the public interest, and not to be so very foolish to attempt the setting up for themselves—though we could not but have some doubts of the ill consequences of these things, yet thought ourselves, by the rules of charity, obliged to hope the best, and therefore continued to act in our places and stations as before." * Ludlow, vol. ii., p. 461.

† For the rejoicings of Charles Stuart himself, see Evelyn's Correspondence, vol. ii., p. 215.

* At that time clerk of the House.

† Unable to omit this remarkable scene in a memoir of Cromwell, I have endeavoured to justify its repetition (in transgression of a rule which has been strictly observed in this series of biographies) by certain new elements of character and interest that have occurred to me since the notice of Vane was written. A curious circumstance may be added, illustrative of the stern and undying spirit of the leaders of this famous Long Parliament. Treating Cromwell's act of violence as though it had never disgraced our annals, that Parliament, entitled, if any ever was, to boast itself indestructible, resuscitated itself, as the reader knows, on the death of Cromwell; and, in looking over the journals of the 7th of January, 1659, I find this characteristic passage: "Whereas this House do find an entry in the Journal Book of the 20th of April, 1653, in these words, 'This day his excellency the lord-general dissolved this Parliament;' which was done without consent of Parliament; which this House doth accordingly declare to be a forgery; and do order Mr. Scobell to be sent for to the bar to answer it." From other minutes in the same journal, I find farther that Mr. Scobell appeared before the House duly to answer this offence, and that the obnoxious entry having been shown him, he was asked who made it. He acknowledged upon this that it was his own handwriting, and that he did it without the direction of any person whatever. The House immediately ordered the entry to be expunged out of the journals, and referred it to a committee to consider "whether the then late act of indemnity extended to pardon that offence, and report their opinion of it to the House." I find nothing more of it, however; matters of greater moment had meanwhile occurred for consideration!

‡ Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii., p. 460. The memorialist (who then held command in Ireland) adds, "We who were in Ireland, being not so well informed of these clandestine shortly made public." In speedy redemption of this pledge, a declaration of the "grounds and reasons for dissolving the Parliament," in the name of the lord-general and his council of officers, came forth, in English and French, on the 22d of April.

It is due to candour and to truth, wherein will be always found a solid vindication of the Commonwealth against its betrayer, to give the essential part of this declaration, and of what other defence Cromwell may have sought to place on record, in the dread of a verdict by posterity against his action of the 20th of April. To bring such a document as this declaration, for example, to the light of the truth which is here attempted to be cast, for the first time, into every corner of these strange transactions, is to unravel at once its cunning and false pretences. And much more than this will necessarily receive illustration from any careful endeavour to show in detail what various influences were in action at that time upon the people; what miserable self-delusions or wretched vanities held spellbound even Cromwell's agents in his tyrannous work; and for what considerations of dignity, prudence, or superior and unselfish care for the general safety, the baffled and slandered statesmen were content to "bide their time."

The declaration opens with a well-devised allusion to the grounds which had first moved the undersigned officers to take up arms, and engage their lives and all that was dear to them in the cause; to the various and signal dispensations through which Divine Providence had led them; and to the witness the Lord himself had borne to their unwearied efforts. They have been necessitated, they then with apparent frankness state, "for the defence of the same cause they first asserted, to have recourse unto extraordinary actions," which they thus proceed to describe and defend.

"After it had pleased God not only to reduce Ireland and give in Scotland, but so marvelously to appear for his people at Worcester that these nations were reduced to a great degree of peace and England to perfect quiet, and thereby the Parliament had opportunity to give the people the harvest of their labour, blood, and treasure, and to settle a due liberty both in reference to civil and spiritual things, whereunto they were obliged by their duty, their engagements, as also the great and wonderful things which God had wrought for them; it was a matter of much grief to the good and well-affected of the land to observe the little progress which was made therein, who thereupon applied to the army, expecting redress by their means; notwithstanding which, the army, being unwilling to meddle with the civil authority in matters so properly appertaining to it, it was agreed that his excellency, and officers of the army which were members of Parliament, should be desired to move the Parliament to proceed vigorously in performing what was amiss in government, and to the settling of the Commonwealth upon a foundation of justice and righteousness; which having done, we hoped that the Parliament would seasonably have answered our expectation. But finding (to our grief) delays therein, we renewed our desires in an humble petition to them, which was presented in August last; and although they at that time, signifying their good acceptance thereof, returned us thanks, and referred the particulars thereof to a committee of the House, yet no considerable effect was produced, nor any such progress made as might imply their real intentions to accomplish what was petitioned for; but, on the contrary, there more and more appeared among them an aversion to the things themselves, with much bitterness and opposition to the people of God, and his Spirit acting in them; which grew so prevalent, that those persons of honour and integrity among them who had eminently appeared for God and the public good both before and throughout this war, were rendered of no farther use in Parliament, than, by meeting with a corrupt party, to give them countenance to carry on their ends, and for effecting the desire they had of perpetuating themselves in the supreme government. For which purpose the said party long opposed, and frequently declared themselves against having, a new representative; and when they saw themselves necessitated to take that bill into consideration, they resolved to make use of it to recruit the House with persons of the same spirit and temper, thereby to perpetuate their own sitting, which intention divers of the activist among them did manifest, labouring to persuade others to a consent therein: and the better to effect this, divers petitions, preparing from several counties for the continuance of this Parliament, were encouraged, if not set on foot, by many of them.

"For obviating of these evils, the officers of the army obtained several meetings with some of the Parliament to consider what fitting means and remedy might be applied to prevent the same; but such endeavours proving altogether ineffectual, it became most evident to the army, as they doubt not it also is to all considering persons, that this Parliament, through the corruption of some, the jealousy of others, the non-attendance and negligence of many, would never answer those ends which God, his people, and the whole nation expected from them, but that this cause, which the Lord hath so greatly blessed, and bore witness to, should languish under their hands, and by degrees be wholly lost, and the lives, liberties, and comforts of his people delivered into their enemies' hands.

"All which being sadly and seriously considered by the honest people of this nation, as well as by the army, and wisdom and direction being sought from the Lord, it seemed to be a duty incumbent upon us, who had seen so much of the power and presence of God going along with us, to consider of some more effectual means to secure the cause which the good people of this Commonwealth had been so long engaged in, and to establish righteousness and peace in these nations.

"After much debate, it was judged necessary, and agreed upon, that the supreme authority should be by the Parliament devolved upon known persons—men fearing God and of approved integrity—and the government of the Commonwealth committed unto them for a time, as the most hopeful way to encourage and countenance all God's people, reform the laws, and administer justice impartially; hoping thereby the people may forget monarchy, and, understanding their true election of successive Parliaments, may have the government settled upon a true basis, without hazard to this glorious cause, or necessitating to keep up armies for the defence of the same. And being still resolved to use all means possible to avoid extraordinary courses, we prevailed with about twenty members of Parliament to give us a conference, with whom we freely and plainly debated the necessity and justness of our proposals on that behalf, and did evidence that those, and not the act under their consideration, would most probably bring forth something answerable to that work, the foundation whereof God himself hath laid, and is now carrying on in the world; the which, notwithstanding, found no acceptance; but instead thereof, it was offered, that the way was to continue still this present Parliament, as being that from which we might reasonably expect all good things; and this, being vehemently insisted upon, did much confirm us in our apprehensions, that not any love to a representative, but the making use thereof to recruit and so perpetuate themselves, was their aim.

"They being plainly dealt with about this, and told that neither the nation, the honest interest, nor we ourselves would be deluded by such dealings, they did agree to meet again the next day in the afternoon for mutual satisfaction, it being consented to by the members present, that endeavour should be used that nothing in the mean time should be done in Parliament that might exclude or frustrate the proposals before mentioned.

"Notwithstanding this, the next morning the Parliament did make more haste than usual in carrying on their said act, being helped on therein by some of the persons engaged to us the night before, none of them which were then present endeavouring to oppose the same; and being ready to put the main question for consummating the said act, whereby our aforesaid proposals would have been rendered void, and the way of bringing them into a fair and full debate of Parliament obstructed; for preventing thereof, and all the sad and evil consequences which must, upon the grounds aforesaid, have ensued, and whereby, at one blow, the interest of all honest men, and of this glorious cause, had been in danger to be laid in the dust, and these nations embroiled in new troubles, at a time when our enemies abroad are watching all advantages against us, and some of them actually engaged in war with us, we have been necessitated, though with much reluctance, to put an end to this Parliament; which yet we have done (we hope) out of an honest heart, preferring this cause above our names, lives, families, or interests, how dear soever, with clear intention and real purposes of heart to call to the government persons of approved fidelity and honesty, believing that, as no wise men will expect to gather grapes of thorns, so good men will hope that, if persons so qualified be chosen, the fruits of a just and righteous reformation, so long prayed and wished for, will, by the blessing of God, be in due time obtained, to the refreshing of all those good hearts who have been panting after these things.

"Much more might have been said," the declaration proceeded, "if it had been our desire to justify ourselves by aspersing others, and raking into the misgovernment of affairs; but we shall conclude with this: that as we have been led by necessity and Providence to act as we have done, even beyond and above our own thoughts and desires, so we shall, and do, in that part of this great work which is behind, put ourselves wholly upon the Lord for a blessing, professing we look not to stand one day without his support, much less to bring to pass all the things mentioned and desired without his assistance; and therefore do solemnly desire and expect that all men, as they would not provoke the Lord to their own destruction, should wait for such issue as He should bring forth, and to follow their business with peaceable spirits, wherein we promise them protection, by his assistance.

"And for those who profess their fear and love to the name of God, that, seeing in great measure for their sakes, and for righteousness' sake, we have taken our lives in our hands to do these things, they would be constant with the Lord day and night on our behalf, that we may obtain grace from him; and seeing we have made so often mention of his name, that we may not do the least dishonour thereunto—which, indeed, would be our confusion, and a stain to the whole profession of godliness—we beseech them also to live in all humility, meekness, righteousness, and love one towards another and towards all men, that so they may put to silence the ignorance of the foolish who falsely accuse them, and to know that the late great and glorious dispensations, wherein the Lord hath so wonderfully appeared in bringing forth these things by the travail and blood of his children, ought to oblige them so to walk in the wisdom and love of Christ as may cause others to honour their holy profession, because they see Christ to be in them of a truth."

With these words the declaration closed: "We do farther purpose, before it be long, more particularly to show the grounds of our proceedings, and the reasons of this late great action and change, which in this we have but hinted at. And we do lastly declare, that all judges, sheriffs, justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, committees, and commissioners, and all other civil officers and public ministers whatsoever, within this Commonwealth or any part thereof, do proceed in their respective places and offices; and all persons whatsoever are to give obedience to them, as fully as when the Parliament was sitting."*

After an unholy act, there is nothing so natural as holy profession. Through no gaps have spiritual ebullitions of this sort vented themselves so freely as through those of unrighteousness. In the whole of this declaration there is nothing tangible or substantial; it is profession throughout; and in professing too much, as these officers are made to do, they declare a conscious deficiency. What they allege respecting the purpose of the statesmen not to dissolve of their own accord, is flatly disproved by the scenes of debate and council which preceded, and were even interrupted by, the outrage of the 20th of April; and this contradiction is indeed so flagrant, that in a later part of the declaration it is not sought to be concealed, but an attempt is made to compromise it by an assertion that when they discovered that sudden change of the policy of the statesmen, they had good reason to "apprehend" that its aim was not "any love to a new representative, but the making use thereof to recruit and so perpetuate themselves." The disingenuous sophism carries its own refutation with it. Not by its result in that sense was such a measure to be tested, but by the justice and fairness of its own provisions. Would these officers have dared to publish a copy of the bill in question? Cromwell had seized the only one in existence (it had not been printed, or even engrossed) on the day of the dissolution; had carried it himself, under his cloak, to his own house at Whitehall, and was never afterward known to refer to it in any way. An attempt has already been made in this work, however, to recover the substance of its main provisions,* which there is every reason to believe, as I shall hereafter show, were tried and found too popular in the issue of writs for certain Parliaments of the Protectorate. Too popular for the purposes of despotism they might be expected to have proved.† They embodied, in truth, a fair, a reasonable, a perfectly honest appeal to the intelligent classes of the people. The measure was worthy of such a statesman as Sir Henry Vane, and was, in all respects, what he might fearlessly have rested his case upon with the people and with posterity. The officers expose, unconsciously, their weakness and insecurity alone, when they confess that the result of such a measure would have been to restore the statesmen to power with additional strength for the realization of their wise purposes. These hundred and thirty men were at once to be re-enforced by three hundred and thirty supporters, who should speak; not their sentiments only, but also those of the people!

* Copied from the original editor in the British Museum published by Hills and Brewster, printers to the army.

What else is said in this declaration and defence? A few things, which may be well to remember. It is declared that the new government had been specially called into existence in order to "settle the Commonwealth on a foundation of justice and righteousness;" that the people of God, and his Spirit acting in them, were to be the main agents of the work; that a new interest of that kind had arisen, which the nation was now to look to chiefly, namely, that of the people of God in question, or, in other words, the honest people, the honest interest; that, in accordance with this, persons of that class, and of approved fidelity and honesty, would instantly be called into the government. In short, it is plainly sought to be conveyed that the reign of saints was about to begin; and, to do them justice, some of the officers believed in the delusion which the rest thus skilfully practised. It is deserving of remark, also, that the very statesmen who on the day of dissolution had been covered with foulest epithets of insult, are here in shame admitted to be persons of honour and integrity, who had eminently appeared for God and the public good both before and throughout the war. Be it remembered, too, that the declaration confesses the existence of considerable sympathy with the last Parliament in the minds of the people (though it would imply its having been unfairly obtained), and plainly dreads the outbreak of more. It refers uneasily to divers petitions from several counties for the Parliament's continuance, and finds it needful to implore "all men," as they would not provoke the Lord to their own destruction, to wait patiently for such issue as He should bring forth, and to follow their business meanwhile with peaceable spirits. Finally, the authors of this declaration, as if in betrayal of even their own sense of the inadequacy of all the reasons they had attempted for the late mischievous outrage, declare it to be their purpose, "before it be long," to show more particularly the grounds of their proceedings, and the reasons of the late great action and change.

And it was not long, it may be confessed—a day or two only had elapsed—when a second declaration appeared accordingly. It was brief, however; contained nothing that had not been said in even greater detail in the first;* was merely a compromise for additional delay; and may fairly be taken to imply a farther doubt, on the part of Cromwell and his officers, of the quiet or patience of the people in the new and strange order of things. It was followed by a third and more memorable declaration, which appeared significantly in the name of "Oliver Cromwell, captain-general," only. This was published on the last day of April; was comprised in about twenty lines; and stated, that whereas it had been promised, in the declaration of the 22d, that persons of approved fidelity and honesty should be called from the several parts of the Commonwealth to the supreme authority, it now appeared that some time must necessarily elapse before such an assembly could be brought together. It was therefore judged proper, to prevent the mischief and inconveniences which might in the mean time arise to the Commonwealth, that a council of state should be constituted, to take care of and superintend the peace, safety, and present management of public affairs.†

It is a very remarkable circumstance, however, as the reader will at once perceive, if he glances a page or two back, that no such pledge as this, which plainly implies a Parliament, had been given in the declaration of the 22d. The words there used were, that it was the intention "to call to the government persons of approved fidelity and honesty." The only inference undoubtedly was that of an election of a council of state, and most certainly not of any "assembly" from "several parts of the Commonwealth." Whence, then, had arisen this so sudden change? Whence could it possibly have arisen, but from some paramount necessity, as suddenly made apparent in the nation, and which declared to Cromwell the expediency of rendering that military council of his somewhat more palatable to the people, even separated and distracted as they were, by a certain show of civil countenance and concurrence? Such facts as these, and the considerations they carry with them, are of singular importance towards a due estimate of this momentous crisis. It was clearly by steps the most gradual our Cromwell was mounting his throne. From the body of the king, he had stepped upon the ruins of the Parliament of statesmen; and from the carcass of a second Parliament of saints, he proposed to vault into the Protector's throne.

* It would be useless to quote it here, as there is not a single new point in it. It may be found in Several Proceedings, No. 187, British Museum Library.

† Moderate Publisher, 131. Perfect Politician, 173. Godwin's Commonwealth, vol. iii., p. 520.

* See Life of Vane, p. 316, 317.

It is instructive to know that any instant declaration of his despotic purpose, after his action of the 20th of April, might still have been fatal to the scheme. It argues much for the germs of good that were in the people yet, deluded as they had been by their enemies, mistaken by their friends, and now on the eve of a consummation of delusion and mistake at once fatal and never to be redeemed. We see that they had been accustomed to associate for so many years their security and rights with the great thought of Parliament, that its very name was to prove a sufficient veil to hide from them the darkest designs; and a merest shadow and pretence of its great significance to all that was held valuable in England was to enable Cromwell to pass for something less than the usurper his precipitate deed of the 20th was calculated to declare him, and indeed to wipe out no small or indifferent portion of the very crime of that deed, forced on him, as it was, before his plans were ripe, by the intrepid and self-possessed resolution of Vane and his friends. Sympathies were thus to be divided between the old and new Parliaments; the expectation of the new birth would greatly suspend any violent workings of judgment against the old murder; the troublesome honesty of the few officers who might happen to stick to the saints' reign would be more easily dealt with; and, finally, explanations might be much better given to an assembly of that description, and through them to the country, by some speech which the captain-general could at once deliver, on his own ground, supported by the prestige of his name and influence, and without control from any possible quarter, than any such farther declaration as had been promised from the military council could in any case supply.

And in this way, it happened accordingly, such explanations were actually given. They shall be noticed in this place, because, though they do not thus occur in order of time, the subject to which they relate is under discussion here, and could never be disposed of in any degree fairly or conclusively without listening to all that Cromwell himself, coolly and cautiously meditating the matter, may at any time, or under any circumstances, have either divulged or sought to conceal respecting it.

After various striking allusions (which will more properly find insertion in another place) to the commencement of the war, following its progress up to the settlement of the government in "the name, at least, of a commonwealth," and specially developing what he called "God's mercies" in it, the captain-general thus proceeded: "I shall now begin a little to remember you of the passages that have been transacted since Worcester fight; whence coming with my fellow-officers and soldiers, we expected—and had some reasonable confidence that our expectations should not be frustrated—that the authority that then was, having such a history to look back unto, such a God that appeared for them so eminently, so visibly, that even our enemies many times confessed that God himself was engaged against them, or they should never have been brought so low, nor disappointed in every undertaking—for that may be said, by the way, had we miscarried but once, where had we been!—I say, we did think, and had some reasonable confidence, that, coming up then, the mercies that God had showed, the expectations that were in the hearts of all good men, would have prompted those that were in authority to have done those good things which might, by honest men, have been judged a return fit for such a God and worthy of such mercies, and, indeed, a discharge of duty to those for whom all these mercies have been showed, that is, the interest of the three nations—the true interest of the three nations.

"And if I should now labour to be particular in enumerating some businesses that have been transacted from that time till the dissolution of the late Parliament, indeed I should be upon a theme that would be very troublesome to myself; for I must say for myself and fellow-officers, we have rather desired and studied healing, than to rake into sores and look backward, to render things in those colours that would not be very well pleasing to any good eye to look upon. Only this we must say, for our own exoneraton, and as thereby laying some foundation for the making evident the necessity and duty that was incumbent upon us to make this last great change, I think it will not be amiss to offer a word or two in that, not taking pleasure to rake into the business, were there not some kind of necessity so to do.

"Indeed we may say, without commending ourselves—I mean myself, and those gentlemen that have been engaged in the military affairs—that, upon our return, we came fully bent in our hearts and thoughts to desire and use all fair and lawful means we could to have had the nation to reap the fruit of all that blood and treasure that had been expended in this cause; and we have had many desires and thirstings in our spirits to find out ways and means wherein we might any ways be instrumental to help it forward; and we were very tender, for a long time, so much as to petition, till August last or thereabouts; we never offered to petition; but some of our then members, and others, having good acquaintance and relation to divers members of the Parliament, we did, from time to time, solicit that which we thought (if there had been nobody to prompt them, nobody to call upon them) would have been listened to, out of ingenuity and integrity in them, that had opportunity to have answered our expectations; and truly, when we saw nothing would be done, we did, as we thought, according to our duty, remind them by a petition—which petition I suppose the most of you have seen—which we delivered either in July or August last: what effect that had is likewise very well known. The truth is, we had no return at all that was satisfaction for us, but a few words given us. The businesses petitioned for, most of them, we were told, were under consideration; and those that were not had very little or no consideration at all."

Up to this point nothing is to be observed but a vague repetition of the declaration of the officers on the 22d of April. Some remarkable passages follow, however, in which much that is most worthy of attention will be found. Pretences of the dissatisfaction of the people, "in every corner of the land," are set forth; the meetings of the cabal of soldiers and moderate or dishonest members are craftily described as of authority from the Parliament; the principle of the bill prepared by Vane is acknowledged to be just, though a want of "integrity and caution" is alleged against its details; the absolute intention of the Parliament to dissolve themselves is not sought to be denied; and the whole is wrapped up in a cloud of words, implying communications with "the Lord," which is certainly well adapted to mystify whatever glimmerings or professions of substantial or honest meaning might, without it, have hoped to settle upon the minds of the assembly. It is worth remark, moreover, that the motives of reserving these explanations to such an occasion is fairly avowed.

"Finding the people dissatisfied in every corner of the nation, and bringing home to our doors the non-performance of those things that had been promised, and were of due to be performed, we did think ourselves concerned; we endeavoured, as became honest men, to keep up the reputation of honest men in the world, and therefore we had, divers times, endeavoured to obtain a meeting with divers members of Parliament; and truly we did not begin this till October last, and in those meetings did, in all faithfulness and sincerity, beseech them that they would be mindful of their duty to God and man, and of the discharge of their trust to God and man. I believe these gentlemen that are many of them here can tell that we had, at the least, ten or twelve meetings, most humbly begging and beseeching them that, of their own accords, they would do those good things that had been promised, that so it might appear they did not do them by any suggestion from the army, but of their own ingenuity, so tender were we to preserve them in the reputation and opinion of the people to the uttermost. And having had many of those meetings, and declaring plainly that the issue would be the judgment and displeasure of God against them, the dissatisfaction of the people, and the putting things into a confusion, yet how little we did prevail we well know, and, we believe, is not unknown to you: At the last, when we saw, indeed, that things would not be laid to heart, we had a serious consideration among ourselves what other way to have recourse unto; and when, indeed, we came to those close considerations, they began to take the act of the new representative to heart, and seemed exceeding willing to put it on; the which, had it been done, or would it have been done with that integrity, with that caution, that would have saved this cause and the interest we have been so long engaged in, there could nothing have happened to our judgments more welcome than that would have been; but finding plainly that the intendment of it was not to give the people that right of choice, although it had been but a ceding right, or the seeming to give the people that choice, intended and designed to recruit the House, the better to perpetuate themselves. And truly divers of us, being spoken to to that end that we should give way to it, a thing to which we had a perpetual aversion, which we did abominate the thoughts of, we always declared our judgments against it, and our dissatisfaction; but yet they would not hear of a representative before it lay three years before them, without proceeding with one line considerably in it. They that could not endure to hear of it, *then, when we came to our close considerations, then, instead of protracting, they did make as much preposterous haste on the other hand, and ran into that extremity; and finding that this spirit was not according to God, and that the whole weight of this cause, which must needs have been very dear unto us, who have so often adventured our lives for it, and we believe is so to you—when we saw plainly that there was not so much consideration how to assert it or to provide security for it, and, indeed, to cross those that they reckoned the most troublesome people they had to deal with, which was the army, which by this time was sufficiently their displeasure—when we saw this, truly, that had power in our hands, to let the business go to such an issue as this was to throw back the cause into the hands of them we first fought with, we came to this first conclusion among ourselves, that if we had been fought out of it, necessity would have taught us patience; but to be taken from us so unworthily, we should be rendered the worst people in the world, and should become traitors both to God and man; and when God had laid this to our hearts, and that we found the interest of his people was grown cheap, and not laid to heart, and, if we came to competition of things, the cause even among themselves would even, almost in everything, go to the ground, this did add more consideration to us, that there was a duty incumbent upon us; and truly I speak it in the presence of some that are here, that were at the close consultations—I may say, as before the Lord, the thinking of an act of violence was, to us, worse than any engagement that ever we were in yet, and worse to us than the utmost hazard of our lives that could be; so uncivil were we, so tender were we, so desirous were we, if it were possible, that these men might have quit their places with honour. And, truly, this I am the longer upon, because it hath been, in our hearts and consciences, our justification, and hath never yet been imparted thorough to the nation; and we had rather begin with you to do it than to have done it before; and do think, indeed, that these transactions be more proper for a verbal communication than to have put it into writing. I doubt, whosoever had put it on would have been tempted to have dipped his pen in anger and wrath; but affairs being at this posture, that we saw plainly and evidently, in some critical things, that the cause of the people of God was a despised thing, truly then we did believe that the hands of other men must be the hands that must be trusted with it; and then we thought it high time for us to look about us, and to be sensible of our duty."*

This extraordinary narrative, or "justification," not until now "imparted thorough to the nation," is afterward continued in a still more singular, involved, and wellnigh incomprehensible style. The entire passage demands quotation, since it is a fair test of the essential character of the justification itself, that it was found necessary to multiply into such a rhapsody of words the few bare pretences on which alone it rests. How widely different from the state documents under the hand of Cromwell that have elsewhere been quoted in this work, when truth clothes him in her own language, and—better sustained by that simple and homely inspiration within his soul, than by any tawdry affectation of those superior judgments, or “births of providence,” which are never called in but in aid of miserable pretence, or to prop up shattered conviction—his arguments are as clear and bright to the eyes of men, as to their minds they are solid, masterly, convincing! There is a memorable lesson to be read in this contrast alone.

In continuation of the assertions already given, Cromwell thus went on: “If I should take up your time to tell you what instances we have to satisfy our judgments and consciences that these things were not vain imaginations and things that were petitioned for, but that fell within the compass of our certain knowledge and sense—should I repeat these things to you, I should do that which I would avoid, to rake into these things too much; only this: if anybody were in competition for any place of real and signal trust, how hard and difficult a thing it was to get anything to be carried without making parties—without things, indeed, unworthy of a Parliament! And when things must be carried so in a supreme authority, indeed, I think it is not as it ought to be; but when it came to other trials, in that case of Wales,* which I must confess, for my own part, I set myself upon—if I should inform you what discountenance that business of the poor people of God there had, who had watchings over them, men like so many wolves ready to catch the lamb as soon as it was brought out into the world! how signally they threw that business under foot, to the discountenancing of the honest people there, and to the countenancing of the malignant party of this Commonwealth! I need but say it was so; many have felt, by sad experience, it was so, who will better impart that business to you; which, for myself and fellow-officers, I think it was as perfect a trial of our spirits as anything; it being known to many of us that God kindles a seed there, indeed, hardly to be paralleled since the primitive times. I would this had been all the instances; but finding which way their spirits went, and finding that good was never intended to the people of God—I mean, when I say so, that large comprehension of them under the several forms of godliness in this nation—when I saw that tenderness was forgotten to them all (though it was very true that, by their hands and means, through the blessing of God, they sat where they did), and affairs, not to speak it boastingly, had been instrumentally brought to that issue they were brought to by the hands of those poor creatures, we thought this an evil requital. I will not say they were at the uttermost pitch of reformation, although I could say that one thing, the regulation of the law, so much groaned under in that posture it now is in, there were many words spoken for it, yet we know many months together was not time enough to pass over one word called incumbances; I say, finding that this was the spirit and complexion of them, that though these were faults for which no man should have dared to lift his hand, simply for faults and failings, when yet we saw their intentment was to perpetuate themselves and men of this spirit, for some had it from their own mouths, from their own designs, who could not endure to hear of being dissolved—this was a high breach of trust; if they had been a Parliament never violated, sitting as free and as clear as ever any sat in England, yet, if they would go about to perpetuate themselves, we did think this so great a breach of trust as greater could not be. And we did not go by guess in this; and to be out of doubt in it, we did (having that conference among ourselves whereof we gave account) desire once more, the night before the dissolution; and it had been in our desires some two or three days before, that we might speak with some of the principal persons of the House, that we might, with ingenuity, open our ears to them, to the end we might be either convinced of the ground of their principles and intentions to the good of the nation, or, if we could not be convinced, they would hear our offer or expedient to prevent this mischief; and, indeed, we could not prevail for two or three days till the night before the dissolution. There is a touch of this in that our declaration: we had often desired it. At that time we attained it, there were above twenty of them who were members, not of the least consideration for interest and ability, with whom we desired to discourse those things, and had discourse with them; and it pleased the gentlemen-officers of the army to desire me to offer their sense to them, and, indeed, it was shortly carried thus. We told them that the reason of our desire to wait upon them was, that we might know from them what security lay in the way of their proceeding so hastily with their representative, wherein they had made a few qualifications, such as they were; and how the whole business should be executed we had no account of; and we desired them they would be pleased, and we thought we had an interest in our lives, estates, and families, as well as the worst people of the nation, and that we might be bold to ask satisfaction in that; and if they did proceed in honest ways, as might be safe to the nation, we might acquiesce therein. When we pressed them to give satisfaction in this, the answer was made that nothing could be good to the nation but the continuance of this Parliament. We wondered that we should have such a return; we said little to that; but, seeing they would not give us that which might satisfy us that their way was honest and safe, they would give us leave to make our objections.

“We did tell them that we thought that way they were going in would be impracticable: we could not tell them how it would be brought to pass to send out an act of Parliament into the country, to have qualifications in an act to be the rules of electors and elected, and not to know who should execute this. Desired to know whether the next Parliament were not like to be all Presbyters? Whether those qualifications would hinder them, or neutrals? And though it be our desire to value and esteem persons of that judgment, only they having been as we know, having deserted this cause and interest upon the king's account, and upon that closure between them and the neighbour nation, we do think we must profess we had as good have delivered up our cause into the hands of any as into the hands of interested and biased men; for it is one thing to live friendly and brotherly, to bear with, and love, a person of another judgment in religion, another thing to have any so far set into the saddle upon that account as it should be in them to have all the rest of their brethren at mercy. Having had this discourse, making these objections of bringing in neutrals, or such as should impose upon their brethren, or such as had given testimony to the king's party, and objecting to the danger of it in drawing the concourse of all people to arraign every individual person which indeed did fall obviously in, and the issue would certainly have been the putting it into the hands of men that had little affection to this cause, the answer again was made, and it was confessed by some, that these objections did lie; but answer was made by a very eminent person, at the same time as before, that nothing would save the nation but the continuance of this Parliament. This being so, we humbly proposed an expedient of ours, which was, indeed, to desire, that the government being in that condition it was, and things being under so much ill sense abroad, and so likely to come to confusion in every respect if it went on—so we desired they would devolve the trust over to persons of honour and integrity, that were well known, men well affected to religion and the interest of the nation, which we told them, and was confessed, had been no new thing when these nations had been under the like hurly-burly and distractions; and it was confessed by them it had been no new thing. We had been at labour to get precedents to convince them of it, and we told them these things we offered out of that deep sense we had of the good of the nation and the cause of Christ; and were answered to that, nothing would save the nation but the continuance of the Parliament, although they would not say they would perpetuate it, at that time least of all.

* I cannot exactly make out the allusion here; but it seems to have been some complaint of too impartial administration of the law in Wales (impartiality, at this time, is generally well defined by the expression of countenancing the malignant party), since one of the first acts of Cromwell, before the summoning of this saintly Parliament, had been to suspend (by the affected authority of the new council of state) four judges of South Wales—Eltonhead, Norbury, Powell, and Clerke, and to appoint two new judges, Corbet and Haggitt, for that district. An extraordinary stretch of power, indeed, in a government that did not even arrogate to itself the shadow of a final or sufficient authority!

"But, finding their endeavours did directly tend to it, they gave us this answer, that the things we had offered were of a tender and very weighty consideration. They did make objections how we should raise money, and some other objections. We told them that that we offered as an expedient, because we thought better than that for which no reason was or thought would be given. We desired them to lay the thing seriously to heart. They told us they would take consideration of these things till the morning—that they would sleep upon them; and I think that there was scarce any day that there sat above fifty, or fifty-two, or fifty-three. At the parting, two or three of the chief ones—the very chiefest of them—did tell us that they would endeavour the suspending the pro- *ceedings of the representative the next day till they had a further conference; and we did acquiesce, and had hope, if our expedient would take up a loving debate, the next day we should have some such issue of our debate as would have given a satisfaction to all. They went away late at night; and the next morning, we considering how to order that which we had to offer to them, when they were to meet in the evening, word was brought they were proceeding with a representative with all the eagerness they could: we did not believe persons of such quality could do it. A second and third messenger told us they had almost finished it, and had brought it to that issue with that haste that had never been known before; leaving out the things that did necessarily relate to due qualifications, as we have heard since; resolved to make it a paper bill, not to engross it, that they might make the quicker despatch of it, thus to have thrown all the liberties of the nation into the hands that never bled for it: upon this account, we thought it our duty not to suffer it, and upon this the House was dissolved.

In all this fanfaronade of words, it appears to me that there are only two substantial statements worthy of special remark beyond those adverted to already. The first is, that a disposition against the farther existence of the Parliament had been manifested in "every corner of the land;" and the second, that, if they had been permitted to pass the act of self-dissolution, its immediate result would have been to "throw all the liberties of the nation into the hands that never had bled for it," by returning a majority of Presbyterians to recruit the forces of the old members. In other words, the statesmen were to be recruited by the help of their bitterest foes. The lion was to lie down with the fox. The Independent and the Presbyterian were to rush into sudden embrace. The thick, the sordid, and unhealthy atmosphere of arrogant and intolerant bigotry was to melt suddenly into the clear and generous air of perfect religious freedom. Ridiculous as such pretences are—for everything that is devoid of truth must, some time or other, become a thing ridiculous—history has not chosen to reject them.

Both are sanctioned, for example, by one of the ablest, and (taking all things into consideration) the most impartial of modern historians. Doctor Lingard tells us that this Long Parliament "fell without a struggle or a groan, unpitied and unregretted.† The members slunk

* I have copied these passages from the original edition, which is thus entitled: "The Lord-general's Speech, delivered in the council-chamber upon the 4th of July, 1653, to the persons then assembled and intrusted with the supreme authority of the nation. This is a true copy, published for information and to prevent mistakes." It has the date of 1654.

† Mr. Hallam has done still greater injustice (in Const. Hist., vol. ii., p. 394-5) to these celebrated men. "The Parliament," he takes occasion to say, in one passage, "in its present wreck, contained few leaders of superior ability." Why, it contained Vane, Scot, Algernon Sidney, Fiennes, Blake, Ludlow, Bradshaw, Marten, Harrington, Neville, Whitelocke, Hazlerig! all the leaders that had ever sat in it to the advantage of their own fame or of the public good, save the great dead, Pym and Hampden: Cromwell, too, Oliver St. John, and the chief of the army officers, were members still, though traitors. If Mr. Hallam would imply that the Long Parliament lost its character and virtue when it lost the crafty Hyde, the venomous Prynne, the mean and arrogant Hollis, the nervous and fearful Rudyard, and all those other men whose names have happily perished, but whose votes declare them of the same poor and pitiful away to their homes, where they sought by submission to purchase the forbearance of their new master; and their partisans, if partisans they had, reserved themselves in silence for a day of retribution, which came not before Cromwell slept in his grave." It is a pity that in such a history should be copied the mere ribald slander of the time. "The news of this Luciferian fall," says a contemporary libel, "was quietly spread throughout the city, and from thence into the kingdom, being related and received with all imaginable gladness, while the members slunk away, muttering to themselves the affront they had received, and laying their heads together how to retrieve themselves; for loth they were to suffer this violence, or acknowledge their dissolution, which they would by no means hear of. But, whatever they fancied to the contrary, raving at this boldness and audaciousness of their servant, as they styled Cromwell, he minded it not, but went on in his work." The manifest contradiction in all this need not be remarked upon. Their righteous and brave denial of the legality of the act that had dispersed them is not compatible with the cowardly slinking away; the alleged submission to their new master is flatly disproved by their open and loud "raving" against the audaciousness and boldness of their old servant. What, then, was the simple fact? In what regard did their memory really stand, after their dispersion, with the people they had served so well?

Cromwell has charged upon them the popular hatred and indifference, and a desire to strengthen themselves by the help of Presbyterianism. It most fortunately happens that an answer on both these charges is left to us, from the lips of one who sealed his truthfulness with his blood. Thomas Scot, who was Vane's equal in virtue, and only second to him in intellect, and whose last utterance, before he surrendered his neck to the executioner, was a blessing to God that he had "devoted his life to a cause that was not to be repented of,"* spoke these words in the first Parliament of Richard Cromwell.† Mr. Bulkeley, a fierce Presbyterian, had repeated Cromwell's first charge of the popular indifference, characterizing the government of the Commonwealth as "a monster" that was suddenly dissolved, "without either coroner or inquest upon it;" when Scot answered him thus: "That gentleman says the Parliament went out, and no complaining in the streets, no inquiry after them.

That is according to the company men keep. Men suit the letter to their lips. It is as men converse. I never met a zealous assertor of that cause, but lamented it, to see faith broken, and somewhat else. I will say no more. It was as much bewailed as the instrument of government. A petition, the day after the Parliament was stamp, then only what he says is intelligible, and will receive the consideration due to it. He proceeds to call the statesmen "the creatures of military force;" an ill-considered and unwise phrase to apply to the men who alone gave efficacy to that force, who were its authors to all good ends, who pointed the road to victory, and who consolidated its advantages when gained. "Their claim to a legal authority," Mr. Hallam continues, "and to the name of representatives of a people who rejected and abhorred them, was perfectly impudent." Of the probable truth of such a decisive assertion, founded as it is on pure surmise, the reader will perhaps receive some means of judging, if he reads a few pages onward.

* See Life of Marten, p. 386.

† Reported in the Diary of Thomas Burton.

dissolved, from forty of the chief officers, the aldermen of the city of London, and many godly divines (except the rigid Presbyterians, too well wishers to Mr. Love's treason), besought to have that Parliament restored. But the Protector, being resolved to carry on his work, threatened, terrified, and displaced them: and who would, for such a shattered thing, venture their all? You have had five changes—this is the fifth; and yet the people have not rest."

Rest—rest: there is much in that word which is significant at all times; nor, since the world began, have greater sacrifices been made for freedom by the conscientious and the bold, than have been made for rest by even the virtuous and the well-intentioned. It is scarcely unnatural that it should be so. Political struggles of a great character are for the future rather than the present, as the petty squabbles of party politicians are for the present and never for the future. The people who have suffered most in these great struggles are precisely those who reap the least, and who have the fewest resources of imagination against a failure in the realities. They have fought and bled, they have toiled, suffered, been plundered and taxed, and, after twelve years of the horrors of a war of brother against brother, and homestead against homestead, they discover that they are, in all worldly advantages, to appearance where they first began. They know not of the seed they have planted for posterity; they see not long lines of their children's children better and happier for them; they know only that bread is as dear as it was, that the state has its exactions still; and that, though they have won the freedom to follow the dictates of their conscience, and worship their Maker as they please—though they have pushed from before their daily path the public robber, the rack, the pestilential jail—yet life is not to them less laden with toil, or redeemed by comfort or rest. The wages of the earth have become even more niggard than they were by the claims of these long years of contest—the tithe for their fair support less freely yielded from its "cold, hard bosom." The enthusiasm which first sustained them, too, has gradually worn itself down; and they are suddenly made sensible of wretched discords and divisions, where they should still have been able to recognise a bond of union, one and indivisible, between every actor or sufferer in the cause. These things should be remembered in judging what is called the fickleness of the people, and then it may be freely and fairly admitted that they did not support the statesmen by all the means that were in their power. In other words, they made no demonstration for them. They could scarcely be expected to know the importance of all that was at stake. It is not till we have retired to a distance from the actual scene of such a political conflict as this was, that the men and things engaged in it assume their due proportions. Not till then is the good that has been bravely done estimated in connexion with the difficulty of doing it, or the tyranny that has been strangely suffered in connexion with the plausible pretences it was based on.

And in speaking of the people in these terms, let me be understood to include, not only the lower orders of men in the labouring districts and the towns, but the smaller tenants and householders, the industrious workmen, the penniless students, even the Levellers and the Diggers*—all who had borne arms or supplied materials, or in action or patience suffered, in behalf of the Parliament against the king. To all of these, in a greater or less degree, it must have occurred to undergo what I have described. The enthusiast saw too great a preference for civil over spiritual freedom; there was too much protection for property to please the Leveller; too great a latitude for conscience to please the bigot; and, of all to be most regretted, an unwise dread of the power and purposes of the bad, had worked to the disadvantage and dissatisfaction of the good and well-intentioned. None could have estimated rightly the position of the statesmen during the difficulties that beset the Commonwealth in its early years; few could be other than unjust in a natural resentment of the continued reservation of those rights of citizenship and privileges of representation which had been won as worthily as they seemed to be undeservedly withheld. And hence it was, that when a new party had risen, with these words ever on their lips, and with still loftier promises there for sudden and sublime realization, it was found too late to redress the errors of the old. The force of habit in those sections of the people I have named, who still continued to bear arms under Cromwell's command, induced an instinctive reverence for his movements stronger than any that could be set up against them. His voice was the trumpet that preceded victory to them, and to follow any other would be to challenge disaster or defeat. Others there were among those classes, some Anabaptists, some Fifth Monarchy-men, some Levellers even,† in sincere delusion as to the wonderful things to be done in the reign of sanctity upon earth, in the person of Harrison and his friends.

would quarrel with Lilburne, and Lilburne with John Every act of kindness shown him in his life (see the Memoir of Marten, p. 358 and p. 380) was only the signal for a pouring down of fresh abuse on the indiscreet generosity that performed it. Even when he had received compensation for his sufferings in the Star Chamber, he at once turned fiercely round on the men who gave it, as if, in taking from him the privilege of being considered an ill-used person, they had abridged his means of livelihood. This was the style of his conduct throughout his life. His whole being was made up of violent, selfish passions, the nature of which, and, indeed, the general temperament of the man, may be gathered from a short passage in his pamphlet called "A Just Reproof to Haberdashers' Hall," one of those thousand paper trumpets through which he was continually pouring the bad breath of his ridiculous self-conceit. He had some supposed claim on Hazlerig for money, and thus (in 1651) refers to it. "Meeting Mr. Pearson at the George, in Channel Row, I told him, if his master thought to keep my money while I sued him at law, it was a vain thought; for he was too great for me to encounter him that way, and I had neither money nor time to spend upon him: therefore I entreated him, as he loved Sir Arthur's life and welfare, to say to him that I wore a good dagger by my right side, and a good rapier by my left side, and if within eight days he did not send me all my money, and give me some rational satisfaction, let him look to himself; for after that day, wherever I met him, I would pay him for all together, though I were cut into a thousand pieces on the very place." That such a man could have any sincere political object in view is not for an instant conceivable. He merely sought about, in some day's new fit of wilful discontent, for mean jealousies and violent passions among the lower sections of the army, and had little difficulty in finding them. The mutinies which followed, and which, though always promptly suppressed, have given the Levellers (for such was the name assumed by these Lilburne factions, though they disclaimed any levelling designs on property) a place in history, had never any defined object, unless the promotion of disorder and confusion can be so designated. It is quite impossible to discern at any time a steady purpose in Lilburne, save that at all times he would seem to have looked with a keen eye to his own profit and loss. It is equally clear that his intemperate followers derived all their importance from the great stock of which they were the paltry offshoot, or, rather, refuse—the army, on the therefore unsullied brightness of whose military discipline they cast an unexpected stain. Still, as in every movement of this kind during a period of general unrest, honest men were deluded into their body, and to these allusion is made in the text. So far as the object of such can be ascertained, through the extraordinary clouds of selfish pretension that envelop all Lilburne's writings, it would seem to have been much of the same sort as that of Harrison and the Anabaptists, or Fifth Monarchy-men, making allowance for the religious peculiarities of the latter. They demanded annual Parliaments, and a sort of universal representation of the "universal elect" among the people. They held, not only that Christianity forbade the rule of a single person on the earth, but that it was irreconcilable with many civil institutions which Vane and the statesmen considered to be essential to the liberties of England. They desired an almost entire alteration of the common law, and were clamorous for the total abolition of tithes, and, indeed, of all regular stipends to the ministry. The chief men among the more honest were Thomas Prince, Richard Overton, and William Walwyn; and it is a very curious and memorable circumstance, that in certain writings of the last two men, which are to be found among the pamphlets of the time, decided avowals of disbelief (almost the only instances of such, perhaps, in these pious days) are to be found. Overton, for example, wrote a tract, entitled "Man's Mortality; or, a Treatise proving Man (quatenus animal rationale) a Compound wholly Mortal." His proofs are drawn from reason and Scripture; and his ostensible doctrine is, that "condemnation in hell is not properly, but remotely, the reward of Adam's fall, and is the wages of infidelity, or unbelief in Christ, as salvation is of belief;" and that the whole human species, to whom the Christian faith has not been proposed, are merely mortal. But, as the purpose of his entire treatise is to establish man's mortality, and the immortality of those to whom Christianity is proposed is dismissed in a few lines, it is not unreasonable to conclude, with a writer who notices the subject, that this is introduced only as a palliation, to take off the general odium to which the author might otherwise have been exposed, and also to retain the particular influence with those Levellers and mutineers which to an infidel or scoffer would have been indignantly refused. Walwyn did not publish his peculiar sentiments himself, but they were placarded for him in "Walwyn's Wiles, or the Manifestors Manifested."

* These Diggers (not a very large, but a very curious sect, and very expressive of the hope and the despondency of this strange and memorable time) were something in the nature of the Spencean philosophers, who made themselves notorious some twenty years since. The names of two of their leaders have come down to us, Gerrard Winstanley and Everard. Winstanley wrote numerous tracts in support of their tenets; and from these we learn that their principles were, that God gave all things in common, and that every man has a right to the fruits of the earth. They professed an intention not to disturb any one in his possessions; but they asserted that the time was come when the whole world would shortly espouse their principles. They made their appearance at St. George's Hill, near Walton, in Surry, Winstanley and Everard being at their head, with about thirty followers; and, resorting to an open common, they began to dig the earth, and deposit in it seeds and roots. They were not, however, permitted to proceed in this very innocent and primitive occupation; for, alas! Fairfax sent two troops of horse to disperse them, who destroyed some of their implements and tools, and conducted a few of the more obstinate and petulant of themselves to prison. See White Locke, Pamphlets by Winstanley. Cause of the Diggers, &c. Godwin, vol. ii., p. 82.

† There were undoubtedly some sincere men among the Levellers, though they were more rare in this than in any other section or party of the time. Nearly all of them partook, in a greater or less degree, of the violent, self-willed, and intemperate character of their leader, John Lilburne, who was a Cobbett without his intellect: altogether a most vain, vulgar, and irrational person. Confusion was his panacea for everything. At once the most credulous and the most suspicious of men, he fancied that all the honesty left in the world had suddenly taken up its abode in the breast of John Lilburne, and his atrocious and abominable detraction was accordingly poured out in never-ceasing succession upon every party in the state. He could live only in the heated and disordered air of abuse and quarrel. Even stronger than his self-love was his love of this, and hence arose that famous saying of the great wit of the Commonwealth, that, if only he were left upon the earth, John Moderate Royalists there were, too, even in these popular divisions, who had gone out upon the question of a limited monarchy; who had remained constant to that throughout; and who, in fact, turned the scale of the entire population in decided favour of a monarchical system. Then there were the indifferent, and the restless, and the conceited men, who were in favour of themselves chiefly, and the five senses that composed them, and to whom anything new, which could gratify one of these, had a merit at once admirable and indescribable. For all such, five years of a commonwealth were quite enough of one thing. These are the men that play the fashionable host in politics; who "slightly shakes his parting guest by the hand, but with his arms outstretched, as he would fly, grasps in the comer."* Finally—and be they still and ever remembered with peculiar honour, as they were remembered by Vane when he addressed the crowd who surrounded his scaffold, in words which all England, as England then was, should have blushed to hear—there were men who, "whatever defections did happen by apostates, hypocrites, and time-serving worldlings, continued firm, sincere, and chaste unto the cause to the last, and loved it better than their very lives." Of such were the men just named by Scot, as threatened, terrified, displaced, oppressed by Cromwell, and trampled on by his creatures, for their love to that "shattered thing," the self-governed Commonwealth of England.

That the effect produced on all these sections of men by the forcible dispersion of the Long Parliament and the government of statesmen was most fatal and disastrous, there cannot be a reasonable doubt. The bond which had hitherto held such various elements together was by that act violently broken. Men might disagree on every variety of minor matter which did not compromise the virtue and good faith of the leaders under whose banners they had fought, and by whose example they had conquered. So long as these remained entire, a great common agreement, for the sake of a cause in which all had already staked so much in common, could neither be hopeless, nor even distant far. But this potent charm once gone, all else went with it. There lay the crime of Cromwell, still more than in his disregard of truth, or of his own so solemnly sworn assertions. Whatever for twelve memorable years had been thought sacred, he made profane; whatever men had begun to think most durable, he scattered to the winds. While Vane was struggling to seize advantage of the dawn of a better day, which had more or less arisen to the minds of all his countrymen, and use it to the elevation of each in the social and intellectual scale, Cromwell only worked in the night that still hung about the dawn, and, by studying old prejudices and habits not yet past, sought first to elevate himself upon a throne. What Vane proposed to have done, in general amelioration of the minds and habits of Englishmen, was flung back for an indefinite and almost hopeless time by the act of the 20th of April; what Cromwell resolved to achieve for himself was half accomplished by that act alone. Let this determine its character. The people throughout the country saw suddenly the most venerated and illustrious names in the land covered with ribaldry and insult; and they beheld the grave assembly which had built up the Commonwealth, which had scourged its enemies into the dust, and held its false friends cowering and crouching down—that assembly, so learned, so valiant, and so powerful, under which the English people at least enjoyed what liberties they then had, and from which they would have patiently waited still, in expectation of new and unknown blessings—they beheld it one day receiving homage, in the name of a free people, from ambassadors of princes, and in the next they saw it hooted out of its place, in the name of jugglers, drunkards, adulterers, and cheats, by the muskets of its own servant. The moral effect of that deed was never to be recalled. Honour was a pretence, piety a pretence, and the substance of all things good evaporated into air. It would occur to few among the ordinary masses of the people to ask the reason or the justice. Enough for them that what had been was no more. It would least of all occur to the state of society or of parties I have attempted to describe, to cling for support, in this common want or common sorrow, to faith in the still superior virtue of the cause, under the very name and pretence of which these strange outrages had been committed. It had been tried already, and found wanting. It had held together for upward of twelve years, and through every kind of doubt, defection, toil, dread, and triumph, the soul of the Parliament and the struggle, bound as with links of adamant; and now, in one little instant, these had broken like a rope of sand. Nothing of a permanent or substantial character could ever hope thereafter to belong to it. It no longer implied a solid truth, against which the giddy factions, the minor differences and divisions of the hour, might dash themselves in vain; it held forth nothing now that was defined or certain; there was never more to be included in it a general and common object which all might pursue; no longer a quiet haven which, through what different passages soever, all could still hope to reach; it was resolved suddenly into no more than one of the indifferent chances or casualties of the world, and had become a trick for the luckiest man to make the most of, a stake for the best gambler to win. And meanwhile, in the various uncertainties of the present, what offered most fairly would be of course most greedily taken; whatever looked like rest, or held up convenience of any kind, would doubtless gather round it for the time the parties who were capable of greatest zeal, and had the largest amount of activity in them. Cromwell and his reign of saints were worth a trial.

Such, then, with the masses of the people at large, was the position of the statesmen after the action of the 20th of April, 1653. In the midst of neither hatred nor contempt they fell,

* Of these, it is needless to say, after the preceding note, John Lilburne is the great and most restless type. Baffled and banished, in the plenitude of the power of the Parliament, he opened a negotiation in Holland with Charles Stuart; in the midst of it, suddenly made aware of the dispersion of the Parliament by Cromwell, he reappeared in London to attempt conciliation with the usurper. It was very vain, as we shall see, but not the less significant of the man and his faction.

but in general wonder, some indifference, and some sorrow. They did not slink away to their homes, nor by undignified submission purchase safety or forbearance. They were content to retire, indeed, without empty brawling, or a vain show of braggart passion. They had left deeds behind them which, though but imperfectly developed as yet in direct action upon the personal comforts of the people, were the immortal seed of all the blessings of liberty, personal and political, which that people have since enjoyed. With such deeds on record, never to be denied or undone, they required no other defence; and, wisely satisfied to wait till the bubble of this saint's reign had burst, and the apples of its fools' paradise had turned to their inevitable and most bitter sour, they offered none.

They found generous defenders, notwithstanding, whose voices ought to have utterance here, in connexion with the actions they commemorated. For it is surely just that, by a fair exhibition of the case of this dispersed and insulted body of statesmen, the claims of Cromwell and the Protectorate should be tested and understood. Necessity was a favourite plea with the partisans of Cromwell; it can thus only be made apparent whether that necessity existed. Granting that the government of the Long Parliament was as anomalous and unauthorized as that of the Protectorate confessedly was, the important question remains of the relative superiority of either in regard to benefits conferred, or proposed to be conferred, upon the people governed. This is a question which admits of one mode of solution only. The measures that were in either case pursued, recommended, or adopted, must be impartially judged together by their tendencies and results. A present glance at the past rule of the statesmen will be the only fair and sufficient light that can guide us through the Protectorate.

Mrs. Hutchinson thus generally describes the condition of the Commonwealth on the eve of its fall. The whole passage is worth consideration, though it includes some points described already. It is the evidence of as gentle and brave-hearted a woman as ever suffered for truth or love. "The Parliament," she says, "had now, by the blessing of God, restored the Commonwealth to such a happy, rich, and plentiful condition as it was not so flourishing before the war; and although the taxes that were paid were great, yet the people were rich and able to pay them: they (the Parliament) were in a way of paying all the soldiers' arrears, had some hundred thousand pounds in their purses, and were free from enemies in arms within and without, except the Dutch, whom they had beaten, and brought to seek peace upon honourable terms to the English; and now they thought it was time to sweeten the people, and deliver them from their burdens. This could not be but by disbanding the unnecessary officers and soldiers; and, when things were thus settled, they had prepared a bill to put a period to their own sitting, and provide for new successors. But when the great officers understood that they were to resign their honours, and no more triumph in the burdens of the people, they easily induced the inferior officers and soldiers to set up for themselves with them; and, while these things were passing, Cromwell, with an armed force, assisted by Lambert and Harrison, came into the House and dissolved the Parliament, pulling out the members, foaming and raging, and calling them undeserved and base names; and when the speaker refused to come out of his chair, Harrison plucked him out. These gentlemen, having done this, took to themselves the administration of all things; and a few slaves of the House consulted with them, and would have truckled under them, but not many. Meanwhile they and their soldiers could no way palliate their rebellion but by making false criminations of the Parliament-men, as that they meant to perpetuate themselves in honour and office, that they had gotten vast estates, and perverted justice for gain, and were imposing upon men for conscience, and a thousand such like things, which time manifested to be false, and truth retorted all upon themselves that they had injuriously cast at the others."* Mrs. Hutchinson has here considerably underrated, as will be shown hereafter, the financial resources of the Commonwealth.

Edmund Ludlow, a witness whose interest in the matters he describes, great as it was, was not too great for his honesty, and whose authority has been sanctioned by even his bitterest adversaries, thus, at a distance from the scene of the dispersion of his old associates, described and mourned them. A Parliament, he calls them, "that had performed such great things, having subdued their enemies in England, Scotland, and Ireland; established the liberty of the people; reduced the kingdom of Portugal to such terms as they thought fit to grant; maintained a war against the Dutch with that conduct and success that it seemed now drawing to a happy conclusion; recovered our reputation at sea; secured our trade; and provided a powerful fleet for the service of the nation: and however the malice of their enemies may endeavour to deprive them of the glory which they justly merited, yet it will appear to unprejudiced posterity that they were a disinterested and impartial Parliament, who, though they had the sovereign power of the three nations in their hands for the space of ten or twelve years, did not in all that time give away among themselves so much as their forces spent in three months—no, not so much as they spent in one—from the time that the Parliament consisted but of one House, and the government was formed into a commonwealth. To which ought to be added, that after so many toils and hazards, so much trouble and loss for the public good, they were not unwilling to put an end to their power, and to content themselves with an equal share with the others for the whole reward of their labours."†

In like manner, the sincere and gallant Sidney set apart, in his noble discourses of government, a niche for the government of the Commonwealth. "When Van Tromp," he says, in his high strain of chivalrous pride—"when Van Tromp set upon Blake in Folkestone Bay, the Parliament had not above thirteen ships against threescore, and not a man that had ever seen any other fight at sea than between a merchant ship and a pirate, to oppose the best captain in the world; attended with many others in valour and experience not much inferior to him. Many other difficulties were observed in the unsettled state: few ships, want of money, several factions, and some who, to advance particular interests, betrayed the public. But, such was the power of wisdom and integrity in those that sat at the helm, and their diligence in choosing men only for their merit was blessed with such success, that in two years our fleets grew to be as famous as our land armies; the reputation and power of our nation rose to a greater height than when we possessed the better half of France, and the kings of Fance and Scotland were our prisoners. All the states, kings, and potentates of Europe most respectfully, not to say submissively, sought our friendship; and Rome was more afraid of Blake and his fleet than they had been of the great King of Sweden, when he was ready to invade Italy with a hundred thousand men."*

* Life of Colonel Hutchinson, vol. ii., p. 197, 198.

† Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii., p. 452, 453. Portions of some of these "Epitaphs" on the Parliament have been given in the Life of Vane; but the present statement of them, in a less mutilated shape, seemed necessary here.

Nor is the tone of even the cautious White-locke less enthusiastic than this. Writing with Cromwell's personal influence strong upon him, and with the additional restraint of an official relation to Cromwell, he yet writes in these words. "Thus was this great Parliament, which had done so great things, wholly at this time routed by those whom they had set up, and that took their commissions and authority from them; nor could they in the least justify any action they had done, or one drop of blood they had spilled, but by this authority. Yet now the servants rose against their masters, and most ungratefully and disingenuously, as well as rashly and imprudently, they dissolved that power by which themselves were created officers and soldiers; and now they took what they designed, all power into their own hands. All honest and prudent indifferent men were highly distasted at this unworthy action, which occasioned much rejoicing in the king's party.† . . . Thus it pleased God," he continues, "that this assembly, famous through the world for its undertakings, actions, and successes, having subdued all their enemies, were themselves overthrown and ruined by their own servants, and those whom they had raised now pulled down their masters: an example never to be forgotten, and scarcely to be paralleled in any story, by which all persons may be instructed how uncertain and subject to change all worldly affairs are; how apt to fall when we think them highest; and how God makes use of strange and unexpected means to bring his purposes to pass."‡

At a distance, too, from the scene of their great exertions, and uninfluenced by any of the passions which mingled with them, the politician who was thought wisest of his age withheld not his approbation and esteem. Basnage tells us, in his "Annals of the United Provinces," that the famous Swedish chancellor, Oxenstierna, "blamed, indeed, the extreme barbarity committed on the person of the late King of England, but commended and admired almost every part of the plan of that great design which Parliament had formed." It was a design, Oxenstierna added, "that had been conducted with distinguished prudence, and those who then governed in England acted upon such principles of policy as were founded in truth and experience."*

Nor should the testimony of an accomplished foreign writer be omitted in this record. "The new Republic," says the Abbé Raynal, in his "History of the Parliament of England," "procured England a tranquillity which it no longer hoped for, and gave it a lustre which it had not had for several centuries. It had just been agitated by a most violent tempest, and now all was calm; it had thought itself on the brink of ruin, and was now in condition to give law. It is melancholy, for the honour of virtue, that one of the best and greatest spectacles which the annals of nations present should be the work of rebellion. Everything appeared wonderful in this revolution. The Royalists conformed to a kind of government ill adapted to their tempers, and disapproved by their consciences. The grantees, accustomed to the part of legislators, remained quietly in the rank of private subjects. The Irish and Scots, who had taken up arms, the first from an attachment to their kings, the other to efface the horror of their treachery, were unhappily subdued. The Dutch, who had taken the advantage of the calamities of England to usurp the empire of the seas, were humbled. France and Spain, who had been always rivals, always enemies, meanly courted the friendship of the usurpers. The sovereigns who ought to have united to revenge an outrage to which all kings were exposed, either through fear or interest applauded the injustice. All Europe debased itself, was silent, or admired."

Finally, even their enemies were awed from insult into praise, in the presence of that gigantic memory their actions left behind them. Roger Coke not only lays aside his customary bitterness and scorn, but adopts a striking tone of just and reverential respect. "Thus,"† he says, "by their own mercenary servants, and not a sword drawn in their defence, fell the haughty and victorious Rump, whose mighty actions will scarcely find belief in future generations; and, to say the truth, they were a race of men most indefatigable and industrious in business, always seeking for men fit for it, and never preferring any for favour nor by importunity. You scarce ever heard of any revolting from them; no murmur or complaint of seamen or soldiers; nor do I find that they ever pressed any in all their wars. And as they excelled in the manage-

* Algernon Sidney on Government, cap. ii., sect. 28.

† This is further corroborated by even a member of the Lord Protector's household, and one of his enthusiastic partisans. Mr. John Maidstone (whose very striking letter to a friend, descriptive of the popular struggles for their commencement to the eve of the Restoration, will be found in Appendix A.) remarks upon the dissolution thus: "Great dissatisfaction sprung from this action, and such as is not yet forgotten among good men." In another part of the same interesting sketch he observes, emphatically, that the English people of that day were wont "to deify their representatives."

‡ Memorials, p. 529, 530.

* This is mentioned by M. Chanat, both in the appendix to Keyser's Travels, and in Basnage's book. See Puffendorf's observations on the resolution of the last Swedish diet, &c., in the appendix to Keyser's Travels, vol. iv., p. 51, and Basnage's Annals of the United Provinces, vol. i., p. 243. See also Harris's Life of Cromwell, p. 316.

† Detection of the Court and State of England, vol. ii., p. 30.

ment of civil affairs, so it must be owned they exercised in matters ecclesiastic no such severities as either the Covenanters or others before them did, upon such as dissented from them; nor were they less forward in reforming the abuses of the common law."

And now a brief sketch of the measures by which these statesmen made themselves so famous will show how well they merited even this lofty praise.

Finance was necessarily a subject which largely employed their attention and taxed their powers, in consequence of the unceasing wars, by land or sea, in which the Commonwealth was engaged. The chief sources of revenue were five: the excise; the customs; the sale of fee-farm rents,* of the lands of the crown, and of those belonging to the bishops, deans, and chapters; the sequestration and forfeiture of the estates of delinquents; and, finally, the postoffice. For the establishment of the latter we are indebted to Edmund Prideaux,† who held the office of attorney-general to the Commonwealth at the period of its destruction. We first observe him chairman of a committee for considering what rates should be set upon inland letters; then, by an ordinance passed shortly before the death of the king, we find him created postmaster-general; and, finally, we see, by a report on the journals of the House, dated the 21st of March, 1650, that he had established a weekly conveyance of letters into all parts of the nation, and kept up a regular intercourse of packets between England and Ireland.

The introduction of the system of excise by Pym has been referred to in this work. It was borrowed from the financial proceedings of Holland, and worked with most consummate skill during the wars with that Republic. And here I am tempted to borrow from the historian of the Commonwealth‡ the only intelligible definition of excise that has occurred to my reading. Excise, it may be stated on that authority, is a tax upon the manufacture of a commodity, paid by the manufacturer; also on the importation of goods, upon which, if manufactured at home, an excise duty would be required, an equivalent sum in that case being demanded from the importer. The retailer of excisable commodities has likewise, in many cases, to pay for an annual license. It is a tax, for many reasons, well adapted for popular imposition. It differs from the duty denominated customs in this, that the latter, being paid upon the exportation or importation of commodities, will often fall on the raw material, whereas the former is only collected upon a commodity ready for sale to the consumer. It is therefore peculiarly distinguished by its being imposed at the latest practicable period, and is in that sense the most economical of all taxes. The earlier any impost is paid, the heavier it falls upon the consumer in the end, since every trader through whose hands the commodity passes must have a profit, not only upon the raw material, and his own labour and time, but also upon the tax itself, which is paid by him long before he is remunerated by the consumer. Notwithstanding which, it has been observed, that the duties earliest paid are least felt by the people, the merchant being sensible that they do not eventually and in the last result fall upon him, and the consumer being induced to confound them with the intrinsic price of the commodity. But this very circumstance renders customs, and duties imposed on the raw material, taxes for slaves; and an excise, or a duty on goods already prepared for consumption, a tax for men who feel that what they pay for is a substantial benefit to themselves. When men are contending for their liberties and everything that is dear to them, they are prepared to make great sacrifices; and such a people, as Montesquieu says, will frequently take on themselves, of voluntary choice, imposts more severe than the most arbitrary prince would dare to lay on his subjects. Another objection that is frequently made to the duty of excise is the severity of its collection, since it is found necessary to give to its officers a power of entering into and searching the houses of those who deal in the commodities on which it is laid, at any hour of the day, and sometimes of the night. But this objection is of the same description as the preceding. "Undoubtedly," Mr. Godwin proceeds, "a softer and more forbearing mode of treatment may be attained in a mixed than in a Republican government. In the former the individual is more considered; in the latter, the public. He who is not contented to sacrifice, in a certain degree, his individuality, and some of his indulgences, to the well-being of the whole, is not yet sufficiently prepared to become a citizen under the purest and noblest kind of political administration."*

Great financial ability, it is obvious, was the first condition of success in the vast struggle. Without that, the entire amount of other genius developed in military or civil matters would have been little better than useless and unprofitable. In the various deliberations that arose on a subject so important, it was impossible that its furtherance by means of sequestration could be in any way avoided; and this is a part of the policy of these statesmen which is most frequently remembered to their disadvantage.† Let it be fairly looked at, and

* Mr. Godwin intimates that the substance of this passage was communicated to him by his friend Booth, the mathematician. It will be curious to subjoin Blackstone's definition of excise, adopted in all the encyclopedias, as a puzzle for the reader's ingenuity. "Excise," he says, "is an inland imposition, paid sometimes upon the consumption of the commodity, or frequently upon the retail sale, which is the last stage before the consumption."—Com., book 1, cap. viii.

† This, and another favourite charge, already indignantly repelled by the great authorities I have quoted, namely, that of a desire they always manifested of filling their own pockets, and enriching their poor estates with the wealth of others: a charge which might be dismissed with silent contempt, if silent contempt were at any time a serviceable thing. It rests on lists published by the sour and disappointed Presbyterian, Clement Walker, subsequently embodied in a tract against the "Rump" (published in the auspicious era of the Restoration, and entitled the "Mystery of the Good Old Cause Unfolded"), and finally adopted by such historians as Clarendon and Hume. Walker's lists were called "Lists of Names of Members of the House of Commons, annexing to each such sums of money, offices, and lands as they had given to themselves for service done it is far from that of which they or their friends should be ashamed.

* The clear annual income from this source amounted to £77,000; and we find that, in January, 1651, £25,300 of this income had been sold for £225,650.—Lingard, vol. ii., p. 176.

† The youngest son of Sir Edmund Prideaux of Devonshire, created a baronet by James I.—Prince's Worthies of Devon, p. 508.

‡ Godwin, vol. iii., p. 489.

They enacted, at the commencement of the war, a seizure of the revenues of the estates of such as openly appeared in arms against them, or voluntarily contributed to the support of the king's forces; and this was an act, all the circumstances considered, justified by the demands of the time. The only fair ground of objection to it must surely rest on the mode in which it was carried into effect, and on the strict and virtuous application of the funds so raised. These, indeed, are the chief points of attack selected by the enemy. Hollis boldly affirms that the style of proceeding under the sequestration committees was like that of Ahab in the case of Naboth's vineyard, which coveting, and not being able otherwise to obtain, he "suborned certain men, sons of Belial, to bear witness against Naboth, saying, 'Thou didst blaspheme God and the king,' and thus destroyed the proprietor, and got possession of the property." To which Clement Walker adds, "You may as easily find charity in hell as justice in any committee; so that, where the king hath taken down one Star Chamber, the Parliament hath set up a hundred." It stamps the character of these scurrilous libels* and to be done against the king and kingdom." Mr. Godwin has pointed out, in his distinctions between the two self-denying ordinances (see Life of Vane, p. 296), the gross mistake, or more properly, falsehood, on which these lists were made out. Their compiler's object was to collect a list of the names of such as held offices, as he says, "contrary to the Self-denying Ordinance." Now it has already appeared that there were two self-denying ordinances; and it has been the artifice of the enemies of the Commonwealth-men to confound these two together. The first ordinance forbade any member of either House of Parliament from bearing any office, civil or military, during the war. This ordinance was proposed in the House of Commons on the 9th of December, 1644, and was rejected by the Lords on the 13th of January following. A second self-denying ordinance was then brought in, and passed into a law on the 3d of April, 1645. This was essentially a temporary measure, and extended no farther than the discharging members of either House of Parliament from the offices they then held, without so much as forbidding their reappointment. The question with Clement Walker and his fellows was, whether the members of the House of Commons were not bound in delicacy to conform to the law which they had passed and the Lords had rejected. This idea, however, was set aside, not covertly and clandestinely, but in the most open manner. When it was determined, in the autumn of 1645, to recruit the House of Commons by issuing writs for new elections in the room of those members who had deserted their seats by adhering to the king, Fairfax, Blake, Ludlow, Algernon Sidney, Ireton, Skippon, Mussey, and Hutchinson, some of the most considerable officers in the army, were among the persons returned to occupy the vacant seats. Walker's list, therefore, which forms the most considerable part of that in the "Mystery of the Good Old Cause," contains names which can by no construction be considered as those of corrupt placemen. Twenty-one persons are put down merely because they were at one and the same time members of Parliament and colonels in the army. Blake, Dean, and Rainsborough appear for no reason but because they were admirals. Algernon Sidney, and six others, because they were the commanders of garrisons; Strickland, because he was an ambassador; and Sir William Armine, because he was a commissioner in Scotland. It was expressly provided by the second self-denying ordinance that the commissioners of the great seal, and the commissioners of the admiralty, navy, and revenue, should not even be disturbed in their places; yet their names swell the list. It includes some of the most notorious Presbyterians, Hollis, Sir John Meyrick, and Sir William Waller. It includes Hampden. Finally, it is worth notice, in completion of the false pretences on which this charge against the statesmen was grounded, that the lists which furnish the chief material of slander were drawn up and published before the triumph of the Independents and the death of the king.

* In another passage of his memoirs, Hollis says, "Now I appeal to all men who they were that had the hand in when we state simply, without any other comment, that these men, Hollis and Clement Walker, were among the chief authors of the system of sequestration, and only clamoured against it thus when baffled spleen, disappointed ambition, and hatred against the men who had triumphantly finished the work which they had basely deserted, drove them to seek shelter once more under the monster-covering garment of royalty.

The first measure on the subject was passed in the shape of an ordinance, in March, 1643, when committees of sequestration were appointed in the counties, cities, and different places of England, to conduct the business in a regular and orderly manner. Two thirds of the revenues of all Roman Catholics were, by the same ordinance, included in the sequestration. And upon the construction and conduct of these committees for the various counties, and whether their manner of proceeding was in truth "regular and orderly," the question would seem to turn.

Of their general character, some idea may be formed by a few of the chief names that are to be found in all of them: Lord Fairfax, for example; his son, Sir Thomas, the great general; the resolute, but most just Pym; the virtuous Hampden; the witty and good-humoured Marten; the gallant Blake; the mild, and, by his own showing, the mercy-loving Hollis (!); the formal and scrupulous White-locke; Widdrington, Stapleton, Gerard, and others of position as high, and of motives as unquestioned. Of their manner of proceeding, it also happens most fortunately that we have evidence yet more decisive: Their absolute records, supposed for some time to have been lost, have of late been most happily recovered, and are deposited in the State-paper Office. They consist of several hundred volumes, which exhibit not merely the names of the delinquents and Catholics through the kingdom, with the particulars and value of their respective properties, but also the nature of the acts of delinquency severally charged against them, by which each person was brought within the scope of some or other of the provisions of the several ordinances. To these are added the grounds upon which the alleged delinquents ask to be admitted to compound (for all those in whose case there were any mitigating circumstances were allowed to pay a fine for their indiscretions, instead of losing their entire revenue); the depositions of witnesses examined as to the truth of these statements; and the reasons for indemnity or allowances in respect to particular items offered by the different claimants, together with the entire proceedings upon each man's forfeiture or composition. It is not thus, the historian of the Commonwealth may well observe, that acts of wanton spoliation and violence are conducted. He adds, with good reason, that however severe was the execution of these ordinances of sequestration, all was making all these penal ordinances, so severe for sequestrations, so high for compositions, so ensnaring and bloody for making new treasons, and little things to be capital crimes; that no man almost was safe, free from question, and few or none were questioned but were sure to be destroyed. What committees were set up! That of Haberdashers' Hall, to pill and poll men, even fetching in some members of the House to whom they had a displeasure, and generally all men who had crossed or opposed them in anything!"

proceeded in regularly, with the forms of justice, and under sanction of the venerable name of law.* The right of appeal was given to every one who found himself aggrieved; a right perpetually exercised, and therefore, we may be well assured, not nugatory or fruitless. All the money raised under these ordinances was strictly required to be paid into the hands of the treasurers at Guildhall, from whence it was again issued for the pay and subsistence of the army, and for such other uses as the Parliament should direct. With these statements the whole subject may be confidently left to an honest and impartial judgment.†

Passing from the subject of finance to those higher questions which involve the freedom and independence of man, the claims of these famous statesmen to eternal gratitude and honour become apparent indeed. They settled, upon a basis never to be disputed more, the right of every Englishman, in all grades of life, to his writ of habeas corpus; by the exercise of which, if on any pretence cast into prison, he could demand to be brought before the judges of the land, to ascertain the cause of his imprisonment; if with any charge of crime accused, he could insist that the accusation against him should be put into the way of trial with all convenient speed; or, supposing no satisfactory answer were given in either case, he had then the great privilege of insisting upon his right to immediate liberation.‡

Scarcely less important than this was their settlement of the tenure by which the judges—arbiters of law between man and man, of justice between sovereign and subject—should in all time to come hold their solemn office. The condition of the old and corrupt system, durante bene placito, was overthrown by the introduction of letters patent, with the stipulation of quamdiu se bene gesserint. The working of the old system, thus beneficially changed forever, is aptly described by Neal in his “History of the Puritans.” “The judges,” he says, “were generally of a stamp, that, instead of upholding the law as the defence and security of the subjects’ privileges, they set it aside on every little occasion, distinguishing between a rule of law and a rule of government. They held their places during the king’s pleasure; and when the prerogative was to be stretched in any particular instance, Laud would send for their opinions beforehand, to give the greater sanction to the proceedings of the council and the Star Chamber, by whom they were often put in mind that, if they did not do the king’s business to satisfaction, they would be removed.”*

With the destruction of that infamous power, a memorable lesson was taught forever. One of the judges, who had debased himself by trampling law and justice under his feet, was publicly dragged from the bench he had degraded, and, still clad in his soiled and spotted ermine, was taken through the open streets to prison.† And as with lawyers who had overthrown law, so also with bishops who had corrupted religion. All ranks, including royalty itself, were made amenable to Truth, and bowed perforce before it. The crown was for all time to come restrained from arbitrary taxation; all irregular or despotic practices against property or freedom were abolished;‡ every state criminal, unjust monopolist, fraudulent patentee, were unshrinkingly struck down; and in the bill for triennial Parliaments, and other measures, which were afterward lost for a time in the unexpected results of the war, the shattered fabric of the old constitution of limited monarchy was consolidated and restored.

The next great act to be specially commemorated has been described by Blackstone as “a greater acquisition to the civil property of the kingdom than even Magna Charta itself,”§ This was the abolition of the Court of Wards, and of all those tenures which were the subject of its jurisdiction. Wardship was a part of the old feudal system. All landed property, according to that system, began with the king. He distributed his domains among his feudal tenants, or, in other words, the officers of his army, and they, in return, were obliged to serve him in his wars with a stipulated number of followers. But in this obligation it was implied that the tenant in chief should be capable of military service. There were two cases where this could not happen: first, where the heir was a female, or, secondly, was a minor. It became, therefore, the established law under this system, that the king could dispose of the female heir in marriage as he pleased, and that he received the whole produce of the estate during a minority. It is easy to see how this prerogative would be abused. “It was intended merely to prevent the damage the king might sustain by the loss of the stipulated military service. It grew into a resource by which he might feed the rapacity of his hungry courtiers. To an idle and insinuating favourite he had the undisputed prerogative of giving a great heiress in marriage; or to an individual of that character he might give the wardship of a minor, in consequence of which the receiver entered into absolute possession of the produce of an estate, with no other duty in return than that he must provide in some way for the subsistence and education of the heir.”|| And as the uses of the Court of Wards had grown into

* Godwin’s Commonwealth, vol. iii., p. 495, 496.

† The only act in these confiscations which seems to me to deserve any part of the extreme censure applied to them was the sale of the Earl of Craven’s estate. Though the earl had been out of England during the war, his estate was sold, on the ground of his having had personal correspondence with Charles Stuart abroad. This was an indefensible action; but it is just to remember that this was an action not only undefended, but strenuously opposed, by many of the most virtuous and eminent members of the House. The division was a singularly narrow one; the majority which carried the confiscation and sale was two only, and Vane, always on the side of kindness and humanity, was teller for the minority. Hazlerig (who appears for the majority), and the less considerate politicians of the House, unwisely and unjustly, but there is no reason to believe dishonestly, carried their point thus closely against him.—See Journals, 22d of June, 1652.

‡ This habeas corpus enactment formed the main part of the act for taking away the Star Chamber.

* Book ii., cap. iii.

† This was Sir Robert Berkeley. See Whitelocke, p. 39; the Life of Pym, p. 179.

‡ The act they passed against impressment elicits the unqualified praise of Hallam (Const. Hist., vol. ii., p. 137), and the famous enactment in their tonnage and poundage bill is well known: “that it is and hath been the ancient right of the subjects of this realm, that no subsidy, custom, impost, or other charge whatsoever, ought or may be laid or imposed upon any merchandise exported or imported by subjects, denizens, or aliens, without common consent in Parliament.”

§ Commentaries, book ii., cap. v.

|| Godwin’s Commonwealth, vol. iii., p. 500.

such gross abuse, so the military services themselves, out of which it rose, had long, as the feudal system gradually declined, been compounded and exchanged for a different species of payment, though still under the same name and pretence, and rendered sources of cruelty, tyranny, and oppression, in every kind of shape.

Both enormities were struck down together by the leaders of the Long Parliament. A resolution of the House, dated the 24th of February, 1646, declared that the Court of Wards, and all tenures by homage and knight's service, with all fines, licenses, seizures, pardons for alienation, and other charges arising from such tenures, should from that day be taken away. Cromwell found this resolution on the journals in the Protectorate, and prudently turned it into a regular act of Parliament, which, with additional clauses, was re-enacted after the Restoration. Blackstone remarks, of the various benefits conferred by this law, that, in its indirect operation, "it opened a wider door to the power of bequeathing property generally than had previously subsisted. By a statute of Henry VIII., all persons were empowered to bequeath two thirds of their lands held in feudal tenure, and the whole of such as were not subjected to such services; and the present law, abolishing all such tenures, gave, by consequence, an unlimited power to the possessor of landed property, under certain restrictions, to dispose of the whole by will as he pleased."*

Their noble efforts in the great cause of religious toleration claim grateful mention next. They first established in the policy of the state that greatest human privilege, that every man should be free to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience. Enactments followed as a natural consequence, that, whenever a certain number of men agreed to worship their Maker after a given mode, they should consider themselves at liberty to choose their own preacher and officers to their churches, and to arrange, without interference or molestation, all their selected ceremonies and forms.

Mr. Godwin has selected from the Journals of the House of Commons† the chief legislative provisions on this subject. The most remarkable appears to have been an act of the 27th of September, 1650, which repealed various acts of Elizabeth, whose professed object had been to establish throughout England a uniformity of religious faith and worship. The chief of these acts were, 1 Elizabeth, chapter 2, commonly called the Act of Uniformity; and 23 Elizabeth, chapter 1, and 35 Elizabeth, chapter 1, each of them entitled "An Act for retaining the Queen's Subjects in their due Obedience." The last of these is the most memorable. It ordains, among other things, that whoever shall be convicted before a magistrate of absenting himself (or herself) from the Established Church for one month shall be detained in prison till he conforms; or, if after three months he persists in his nonconformity, shall be required to abjure the realm of England, and shall transport himself out of the country accordingly; or, lastly, if he refuses to abjure, or, abjuring, does not transport himself, or, having departed the realm, shall return, shall be adjudged a felon, and shall suffer accordingly. All these gross provisions disappeared before the wiser and more humane policy of the Independent leaders of our great Parliament, who provided a full toleration* for every form of religion, with the exception of prelacy, necessarily excluded by its political tendencies, and popery, which Vane and a few others had, however, struggled hard to procure the toleration of also.†

The limits they imposed to this system of toleration will scarcely find favour in many eyes; but it is just to give them here, with the remark, that various circumstances of the time had rendered them wellnigh needful. A bill was passed in 1651 with a view to correct certain extravagances in the professors of religion. There was a sect who had taken to themselves the name of Ranters. The Parliament appointed a committee to consider of the suppression of the "obscene, licentious, and impious practices" used by these persons. A law was, in consequence, made for the "punishment of atheistical, blasphemous, and execrable opinions." The crimes condemned by this act are, for any person, not under the influence of sickness or distraction, to affirm of him or her self, or of any other mere creature, that he is God; or that the acts of uncleanness and the like are not forbidden by God; or that lying, stealing, and fraud, or murder, adultery, fornication, sodomy, drunkenness, profane swearing, and lascivious talk, are in their own nature as holy and righteous as the duties of prayer, preaching, or thanksgiving; or that there is no such thing as unrighteousness and sin, but as a man or woman judges thereof.

* This toleration, of course, did not interfere with the revenues of the Church, out of which every minister, duly appointed to a living, received the income thereto belonging.

† Dr. Lingard mentions a petition from Catholic recusants, presented to the House on the 30th of June, 1652, in which they solicit such indulgence "as might be thought consistent with the public peace, and their comfortable subsistence in their native country." The petition, says Lingard, "was read; Sir Harry Vane spoke in its favour; but the House was deaf to the voice of reason and humanity." Vane's equally generous and gallant, but more successful exertions in behalf of Biddle, the father of English Unitarians, have been related in this work; but Mr. Godwin has a remark on the motives of the men who opposed Vane on these points which should not, in fairness, be omitted. Speaking of the circumstance of Biddle, after his first release, being again committed by an order signed "John Bradshaw," he thus proceeds: "We are told that Biddle was recalled, and once more committed to custody by an order from Bradshaw, whom Biddle's biographer designates as his mortal enemy. What is the precise truth on the subject I have not been able to discover. If he were committed by a warrant from Bradshaw, it is very probable that this statesman signed it officially only, as president of the council. But I have not been able to trace such a warrant in the order books. If it were in any respect the personal act of Bradshaw, however much we may regret that he should have differed in this particular from his illustrious coadjutor, Vane, who had learned to know both spiritual power and civil, what each means, what severs each, which few have done, yet it is but just that we should distinguish between one species of persecutor and another. The Episcopalians and the Presbyterians persecuted, having for their object religious uniformity, and being determined, to the extent of their power, that only one creed should be known through the land. Bradshaw, if he were a persecutor, certainly agreed with his brother Independents in a free allowance of varieties of religious opinion, and had no wish to enslave the energies of mind to a vain effort after uniformity, but had the weakness to be shocked at what he thought blasphemous opinions, and to hold it his duty by the civil arm to counteract so dire a contagion." Biddle was finally set free in February, 1652. I have elsewhere urged what fairly rests in extenuation of the non-tolerance of popery, in the memoirs of Eliot and Pym.

* Blackstone, book ii., c. 23. Godwin, vol. iii., p. 503.

† Vol. iii., p. 504.

The punishment of these crimes is, for the first offence, six months' imprisonment; and for any subsequent conviction, to abjure the dominions of the Commonwealth; and, in case of return, to suffer death as a felon. The only qualification of the severity is, that the party shall be indicted within six months of his having committed the alleged offence: * a provision which serves well to show the still prevailing sense of equity and fairness which presided over what would seem the harshest measures of these statesmen.

Their acts of toleration in matters of religion were at the same time accompanied with a declared resolution, adopted from one of the army petitions, that, while they were favourable to liberty of conscience, they did not desire that the least indulgence should be shown to licentiousness or profaneness; and, accordingly, a bill was brought in, in the beginning of 1651, and shortly after passed into a law, for the suppression of incest, adultery, and fornication. The punishment of the two former, an exception being made of the case of a woman whose husband should have been three years absent (adultery in this act is understood to relate to woman in the state of marriage), was ordered to be death; and the punishment of fornication was three months' imprisonment. Every keeper of a brothel was also made liable, for the first offence, to be whipped and branded, and for the second, to suffer death as a felon.† When these acts were passed, however, Vane and Marten both predicted, in opposition to them, that the severity of the punishment would defeat the purpose of the law: a prediction confirmed so fully, that, in consequence of Marten's continued agitation of the subject, the severities were afterward relaxed.

And be it not forgotten, in this detail, that measures of law reform, to a very large and various extent, were in deliberation at the period of Cromwell's act of tyranny. They had passed, on the 8th of November, 1651, a memorable measure, which was understood to be only the forerunner of several others,‡ that the books of law already written and in force should be translated into English: § that all law-books in future should be written in English; and that all law proceedings should be conducted in the English language. || What would have followed in, furtherance of their great design on this head (frequently declared, in emphatic phrase), to make the law more simple, and, by means of a better promulgation, to abridge its powers of ensnaring the people who were called on to obey it, was checked by their forcible dispersion, to be again resumed, indeed, as we shall see, by the next assemblage of men who sat in their House, but only to be again arrested by a second dispersion of legislators, who refused to be made the direct tools of tyranny.

Finally, it becomes us to speak of the strictly administrative genius of these statesmen, dispersed by Cromwell and his muskets as idle and incapable! unclean birds, that had, by insolent success, been unfairly perched upon Fortune's top! slugs, that preyed upon the vitals of the Commonwealth!

History, even as history is commonly written, has not dared to dispute that, during the whole period of their supremacy, they upheld with unceasing dignity and spirit the national honour. They made the arms of England the terror of the world abroad, as they had made the engines of their government the terror of enemies at home; and it was from them, and from them alone, that Cromwell inherited the respect and awe of the whole Continent of Europe. They had declared that they would not rest till they had vindicated and asserted the ancient right of their country to the sov-and have the more hopes to obtain it from so many worthy English gentlemen, when that which I have said was chiefly in vindication of their own native laws, unto which I held myself the more obliged by the duty of my profession; and I account it an honour to me to be a lawyer. As to the debate and matter of the act now before you, I have delivered no opinion against it; nor do I think it reasonable that the generality of the people of England should, by an implicit faith, depend upon the knowledge of others in that which concerns them most of all. It was the Romish policy to keep them in ignorance of matters pertaining to their soul's health; let them not be in ignorance of matters pertaining to their bodies, estates, and all their worldly comfort. It is not unreasonable that the law should be in that language which may best be understood by those whose lives and fortunes are subject to it, and are to be governed by it. Moses read all the laws openly before the people in their mother tongue. God directed him to write it, and to expound it to the people in their own native language, that what concerned their lives, liberties, and estates might be made known unto them in the most perspicuous way. The laws of the Eastern nations were in their proper tongue; the laws at Constantinople were in Greek; at Rome, in Latin; in France, Spain, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, and other nations, their laws are published in their native idiom. For our own country, there is no man that can read the Saxon character but may find the laws of your ancestors yet extant in the English tongue. Duke William himself commanded the laws to be proclaimed in English, that none might pretend ignorance of them. It was the judgment of the Parliament, 36 Edward III., that pleadings should be in English; and in the reigns of those kings, when our statutes were enrolled in French and English, yet then the sheriffs in their several counties were to proclaim them in English. I shall conclude with a complaint of what I have met with abroad from some military persons; nothing but scoffs and invectives against our law, and threats to take it away; but the law is above the reach of those weapons, which, at one time or another, will return upon those that use them. Solid arguments, strong reasons, and satisfaction of different judgments. When the emperor took a bishop in complete armour in a battle, he sent the armour to the pope with this word, Haccine sunt vestes filii tui? so may I say to those gentlemen abroad as to their railings, taunts, and threats against the law, Haccine sunt argumenta horum antinomianorum? They will be found of no force, but recoiling arms. Nor is it ingenuous or prudent for Englishmen to deprave their birthright—the laws of their own country. But to return to the matter in debate: I can find neither strangeness, nor foresee great inconvenience, by passing this act; and therefore, if the House shall think fit to have the question put for the passing of it I am ready to give my affirmative."

* Godwin's Commonwealth, vol. iii., p. 507, 508.

† Godwin, vol. iii., p. 506.

‡ See Journals of May 10, November 22, 1651. Whitelocke, p. 460. Lingard's History, vol. xi., p. 175.

§ The exact terms of the resolution were, "That all report books of the resolution of judges, and other books of the law of England, shall be translated into the English tongue; and all writs, processes, and returns thereof, pleadings, rules, orders, indictments, injunctions, certificates, patents, and all acts, deeds, and proceedings whatsoever, shall be only in the English tongue, in the ordinary usual hand, and not in court hand."

|| On this question (which, before it was carried, provoked a "very long and smart debate;" in which debate, we are likewise told, many "spoke in derogation and dishonour of law," and the necessity of its reform, Whitelocke delivered a speech on the origin and character of the English laws, vindicating their Saxon birth from the reproach of having been imposed upon the land by William the Norman, which, for its singularly argumentative character and wonderful minuteness of research, must always be considered a stupendous monument of antiquarian and legal learning. He concluded thus—the entire speech may be found in his own memorials, p. 460-465: "But, Mr. Speaker, if I have been tedious, I humbly ask your pardon;

ereignty of the seas; nor did they rest till it was done. They sought even to interest the commonest people in this proud achievement, and with that view circulated, by thousands, a translation, made at their expense and suggestion, of Selden's Mare Clausum, seu, Dominio Maris.^{} This alone would declare them no ordinary or selfish men. They were the authors, too, be it remembered, of the famous navigation act,[†] afterward passed into our statute-books as one of the grandest sources of England's unrivalled commercial greatness, and only recently abandoned for those more philosophical views of trade it was chiefly instrumental in producing. They projected also, and went far towards accomplishing, the union between Scotland and England.[‡] They placed in their service men of the greatest genius, in various departments of the state, that, since their day, have been produced by our nation; they patronized, without ceasing, literature and learned men; they declared, on assuming power, that they would neither write to other states, nor receive answers, but in the tongue which was common to all countries, and fittest to record great things, the subject of future history. They first employed, in the service of England, the thoughts and the pen of Milton, even in that day the greatest of her living children; they presented a thousand pounds to him on the publication of his "Answer to Salmasius;" they appointed him Latin secretary to the Commonwealth; they gave him the means of entertaining foreign ministers on their arrival in England, and of welcoming first at his own table, though at the public charge, the visits of eminent strangers who brought with them the reputation of wisdom or of learning.^{} They showed, in like manner, true respect for whatever had a good and legitimate object: they enriched the universities, and having voted a resolution against the principle of tithes, they placed upon a most equal and commendable footing the revenues of the clergy of the state.[‡] Cer-

^{*} Marchmont Needham was the translator, and the book was published, by special command, in November, 1652. In an admirable dedication to the "Parliament of the Commonwealth of England," the translator, after observing that "it is a gallant sight to see the sword and pen in victorious equipage together; for this subdues the souls of men by reason, that only their bodies by force," thus spiritedly proceeds: "What true English heart will not swell when it shall be made clear and evident (as in this book) that the sovereignty of the seas, flowing about this island, hath, in all times whereof there remains any written testimony, both before the old Roman invasion and since, under every revolution down to the present age, been held and acknowledged by all the world as an inseparable appendant of the British empire; and that, by virtue thereof, the kings of England successively have had the sovereign guard of the seas; that they have imposed taxes and tributes upon all ships passing and fishing therein; that they have obstructed and opened the passage thereof to strangers at their own pleasure, and done all other things that may testify an absolute sea dominion—what English heart, I say, can consider these things, together with the late actings of the Netherlands, set forth in your public declaration, and not be inflamed with an indignation answerable to their insolence, that these people, raised out of the dust at first into a state of liberty, and at length to a high degree of power and felicity by the arms and benevolence of England—that they who, in times past, durst never enter our seas to touch a herring, without license first obtained by petition from the Governor of Scarborough Castle, should now presume to invade them with armed fleets, and, by a most unjust war, bid defiance to the united powers of these three nations!"

[†] The preamble to this act (passed on the 9th of October, 1651) was short, but most expressive. It runs thus: "For the increase of the shipping and encouragement of the navigation of this nation, which, under the good providence and protection of God, is so great a means of the welfare and safety of this Commonwealth, be it enacted" Dr. Harris gives the following summary, from Scobell's collections, of the clauses in this famous act. They are, "that no goods shall be imported from Asia, Africa, or America, but in English ships, under the penalty of forfeiture of the said goods and ships; nor from any part of Europe, except in such vessels as belong to the people of that country of which the goods are the growth or manufacture, under the like penalty; that no salt fish, whale-fins, or oil should be imported; but what were caught or made by the people of England; nor no salt fish to be exported, or carried from one port to another in this nation, but in English vessels, under the like penalty; but commodities from the Levant seas, the East Indies, the ports of Spain or Portugal, might be imported from the usual ports or places of trading used heretofore, though the said commodities were not the very growth of the said places. The act did not extend to bullion or prize goods, nor to silk or silk wares, brought by land from Italy to Ostend, Amsterdam, Newport, Rotterdam, Middleburgh, provided the owners and proprietors, being of the English Commonwealth, first made oath by themselves, or other credible witnesses, that the goods were bought with the proceed of English commodities, sold either for money or in barter." It is worth adding what Sir Josias Child says of the act in his celebrated work on trade. "The act of navigation," he remarks, "deserves to be called our charta maritima. . . For my own part," he adds, "I am of opinion that, in relation to trade, shipping, profit, and power, it is one of the choicest and most prudent acts that ever was made in England, and without which we had not now been owners of one half of the shipping, nor trade, nor employed one half of the seamen which we do at present."

[‡] The proceedings towards accomplishing this great design have been partially described in the life of Vane. I will give here, however, a curious passage from the writings of Dr. Gumble respecting it, because it bears emphatic testimony to the eminent merits of the statesmen (though it gives an odd reason for them), and is surely most valuable when the time at which it was written, and the gross prejudices of the writer, are all taken into account. "The English pretended Commonwealth," he says, "having reduced the whole nation of Scotland and Ireland, they having a great calm of peace and tranquillity, they fell upon a project (though practised by usurpers, and men who had great fears, because of their great crimes, and of much care and diligence, because of their future danger to be brought to condign punishment) to unite all the three nations into one government, and to meet in one Parliament, a work which they did effect by the present advantages of conquest, and by a pretended consent of some elected deputies: this union being a work which King James, of blessed memory, set on foot, and renewed by our gracious sovereign King Charles II. (whom God direct to the conclusion); an affair that would as much tend to the peace and public security of all the three nations as any other design that can be imagined."

^{*} Toland says, on this point, that Milton "was allowed a weekly table by the Parliament for the entertainment of foreign ministers, especially such as came from Protestant states, and for the learned, which allowance was afterward continued by Cromwell."

[†] The bishops, it is known, were at an early period excluded from the House of Lords; but it was not till October 9th, 1646, that an ordinance of both Houses abolished their office, and settled their lands and possessions upon trustees, for the use of the Commonwealth. A second ordinance, bearing date the 3d of October, 1648, ordered "the trustees to give warrants to the treasurers for the issuing out and paying of the rents and revenues of parsonages, impropriate tithes, oblations, obventions, pensions, portions of tithes, parsonages and vicarages, as have been or shall be received by the said treasurers, and have not otherwise been disposed of for the maintenance of ministers, to such person or persons respectively to whom the said rents and revenues have been or shall be ordered or assigned by the committee for plundered ministers, for augmentation of maintenance for officiating in any church or chapel in England and Wales." This was the last enactment on the subject previous to the Commonwealth. We observe, however, that on the 30th of April, 1649, an act was passed "for the abolishing of deans and chapters, canons, prebends, and other officers and titles, of or belonging to any cathedral or collegiate church or chapel within England or Wales." The plea put forth in the preamble to this bill was the very sufficient one of necessity—nor, indeed, a plea at all unreasonable, when all the circumstances are considered. "Having seriously weighed," say its enactors, "the necessity of raising a present supply of money for the present safety of this Commonwealth, and finding that their other securities are not satisfactory to lenders, nor sufficient to raise so considerable a sum as will be necessary for the tain it is, moreover, that in all they applied themselves to (their object in all, even when mistaken most, being still the advancement of the welfare of England), they distinguished themselves by indefatigable perseverance and unwearied toil.* And then, to crown and consummate the fame of these lasting things, which shall surely be held supreme above their temporary errors, they were on the point of giving a just charter of representative franchise to the great body of the nation, when they fell beneath the violence of Cromwell.

Was that fall merited? Does the plea of necessity hold good? Had these men rendered themselves suddenly incapable of the trust of government they had held so long, by insolent said service, are necessitated to sell the lands of the deans and chapters, for the paying of public debts, and for the raising of £300,000 for the present supply of the pressing necessities of the Commonwealth, do enact." &c. These lands, it should be mentioned at the same time, notwithstanding the urgent necessity, were not to be sold under twelve years' purchase, though the lands of the bishops had been allowed to be sold for ten; not a bad price, considering the high interest of money, at this time about eight per cent., and recollecting the possibility, also, of the lands being one time or other reclaimed by their former possessors. I now come to the equal and sufficient revenues alluded to in the text. Out of the lands thus appointed to be sold, a subsequent act of the 8th of June, 1649, excepted expressly "all tithes appropriate, oblations, obventions, portions of tithes appropriate, or of belonging to the archbishops, bishops, deans, and deans and chapters, all which, together with £20,000 yearly rent, formerly belonging to the crown of England, the Commons thought fit to be settled for a competent maintenance of preaching ministers, where it was wanting, in England and Wales." This competent maintenance was £100 a year, equally awarded to the state preachers. Nothing, at the same time, was taken from the rectories, which, whatever their revenue might be, were preserved entire. This system, founded on justice and common sense, worked admirably; nor, it may be safely added, will any church, whether voluntary or of the state, work to the satisfaction of its ministers, or of the people it should be designed to benefit, till it is taken from the temptation of too much wealth on the one hand, and the degradation of too much poverty on the other. What I have said in the text on the subject of the universities claims a concluding word. One of the enactments supplementary to the foregoing ordered, "That the trustees, in whose hands the dean and chapter lands were vested for the use of the public, shall, from time to time, pay out of the above-mentioned £20,000, £2000 yearly, for the increase of the maintenance of the masterships of colleges, in both universities, where maintenance is wanting, regard being to be had unto the number of houses of learning in each university that are fit to have an increase of maintenance; and to make an assignment of maintenance unto them accordingly, provided it do not exceed £100 per annum to any one of them." Nor was this bounty ill rewarded. The names of Cudworth, Whichcote, Wilkins, and many others, bear witness to the quality of intellect the universities of the Commonwealth produced; men who educated and gave to the world the Tillotsons and Barrows. As to the general patronage bestowed by the statesmen on literature and learned men, it is only needful to add to the names of Milton, Needham, and others, those of Marvel and the two Parkers. I had wellnigh forgotten to state, too, that on the 18th of June, 1651, a committee appointed by these accomplished and truly "liberal" statesmen reported in favour of the endowment of a third university in Durham, out of the overgrown wealth of the chapter lands. The project, we shall see, was revived in the Protectorate. Even Mr. Hallam (generally unjust, I regret to say, to these great men) can say of this that it "was a design of great importance to education and literature in this country."

* Not long after the first meeting of this famous assembly of men, we find that above forty committees were appointed to investigate and prepare so many different subjects for the consideration of the House of Commons; and as these committees, upon an average, consisted of twenty persons, and sometimes of double that number, almost every member must be supposed to have been upon some committee, and the same member was often upon several. The House usually sat in the morning, the committees in the evening. The larger committees had a power of appointing sub-committees of their own body, either for expedition, or for a more accurate examination of the subjects that came before them.

assertions of undue power, and selfish preferences of their own ends before the welfare and the good of England, when Cromwell, speaking the voice of the people, doomed them to dispersion and contempt, as an expiation of their sin! Their actions are now before the reader; their errors have not been concealed; and by the result of both, let them be finally and fairly judged. It is our duty at present to follow Cromwell's fortunes in the new scenes opened to his vast ambition. Means will thus be offered in abundance of determining how far the result justified the outrage of the 20th of April, and whether its author then executed the righteous sentence of the nation, or merely practised on its weakness and divisions. With all the strange indifference, or, rather, as it may be better termed, the suspense between anger and hope, by which that outrage seemed to have half received the popular sanction, there was yet enough of the elements of good in our countrymen to render it needful that still under the show and by the pretences of Parliamentary authority should despotism effect its crafty march upon them. But this is anticipating what will soon reveal itself, in a political lesson of no indifferent value. It will speedily be manifest whether the reign of saints was a more practicable thing than the reign of statesmen, and whether the last was indeed a failure, since the first achieved success. It will also be made evident under which anomalous authority—the Parliament or the Protectorate—the people of England enjoyed most freedom. Let the palm be given to that which only has deserved best, when some proof is offered that under it the people were better governed; that by its means our England had increased in wealth at home and honour abroad; that vice was trampled under foot; that property was protected; that personal and political liberty were enjoyed; and, in one word, that this authority, which claims to be remembered with our greatest respect, had discountenanced all possible revival of servile thoughts and Royalist vices in the new Republic, and promoted only the growth of popular intelligence, of sobriety, and virtue.

Be it, then, once more remembered, before proceeding to these means of final judgment, that Cromwell, by a peculiar combination of circumstances, most rare in the history of usurpers, had been able to overthrow the government of the Commonwealth, not in its hour of weakness or decay, but at what seemed to be the "highest point of all its glory." The Dutch were virtually subdued;* the Portuguese and the Danes had humbled themselves to England; and with all the other powers of Europe

* So completely were many parties at a loss toathom the first inducement of Cromwell to assault the Parliament at such an hour, that a story became very current at the time, that, immediately after Blake's last victory over the Dutch, the great loss of the latter had "so sensibly affected the states of Holland and West Friesland, that they despatched letters to the English Parliament to endeavour, after some means, for putting an end to this cruel war. This negotiation had no effect, though it was particularly promoted by General Cromwell himself, who was very desirous to have a peace concluded. The states had offered to acknowledge the English sovereignty of the British seas, and to pay £300,000 to the English Commonwealth; but, finding this was not likely to succeed, they applied themselves (as we are told) more directly to General Cromwell, promising him vast sums if he would venture to depose and dissolve the Parliament." This is told in a life of the Lord Protector not at all inimical to Cromwell.

the leaders of the Commonwealth were at peace. They were in sole possession of the Spanish trade, and were gradually, though slowly, diminishing the burdens of the people. They had given safety, at least, to each man's home, and commerce was once more lifting up its head throughout the country. On the day of their dissolution there were upward of £500,000 in the public treasury, and the value of £700,000 in the magazines; their power at sea was giving law to the world,* and they had refused £900,000 a year for the customs and excise.† Finally, they had then resolved to submit their stewardship to the judgment of the nation; to test, by new institutions, the capacity of the people for Republican government; and to stand or fall by the result. Bishop Warburton, in a few celebrated words, has stated the matter as we may now be well content to leave it. "Cromwell," he says, "seemeth to be distinguished in the most eminent manner, with regard to his abilities, from all other great and wicked men who have overturned the liberties of their country. The times in which others succeeded in this attempt were such as saw the spirit of liberty suppressed and stifled by a general luxury and venality; but Cromwell subdued his country when this spirit was at its height, by a successful struggle against court oppression, and while it was conducted and supported by a SET OF THE GREATEST GENIUSES FOR GOVERNMENT THE WORLD EVER SAW EMBARKED TOGETHER IN ONE COMMON CAUSE."

It only remains that the names of these statesmen should be placed on record beside this mention of their deeds. A list of them was published, as they reassembled after the death of Cromwell, and to this, which follows, I have added such as declined to reassume their seats, or had perished in the interval. It may be held, therefore, very nearly complete; and embracing, as it does, the most eminent of the men who assembled on the 3d of November, 1640, and all who held their seats between the 30th of January, 1649, and the 20th of April, 1653, the reader has thus before him, recollecting the immortal memories of Eliot, Pym, and Hampden, and making needful allowance for the indifferent or the traitorous among them, the great authors of all the legislative triumphs this work has recorded, and, indeed, of all the essential political liberty that our country has enjoyed.

William Lenthall, speaker. Earl of Salisbury. Philip earl of Pembroke. Philip lord-viscount Lisle. Edward lord Howard of Escricke. Thomas lord Halifax. William lord Monson. Oliver St. John, lord-chief-justice. John Wild, lord-chief-baron. Lord-commiss. John Lisle. Lord-commiss. Bulstrode Whitelocke. Oliver Cromwell, lord-general. Henry Ireton, lieutenant-general. Lieutenant-general Fleetwood. Lieutenant-general Ludlow. Major-general Skippon. Sir Arthur Hazlerig. Sir Henry Vane. Sir Thomas Wroth. Sir Thomas Walsingham. Sir Henry Mildmay. Sir Michael Livesey. Sir Robert Goodwin. Sir John Trevor. Sir William Brereton. Sir Thomas Widdrington. Sir Richard Lucy. Sir Francis Russel. Sir John Lenthall. Sir William Armine. Sir William Strickland. Sir John Burchier. Sir Gilbert Pickering. Sir Peter Wentworth. Sir James Harrington. Edmund Prideaux, attorney-general. Roger Hill, sergeant-at-law. Erasmus Earle, sergeant-at-law. Robert Blake. John Jones. James Challoner. John Moyle. Thomas Crompton. Christopher Martin. Henry Smith. Miles Corbet. Michael Oldsworth. Carew Raleigh. Edward Howard. John Gurdon. John Fielder. John Fry. Thomas Atkin. John Hutchinson. Edmund Dunch. Thomas Pury, Sen. Thomas Challoner. William Leman. Edmund Harvey. Henry Marten. Benjamin Weston. William Heveningham. John Barker. George Thomson. Luke Robinson. Gilbert Millington. Augustine Garland. Henry Neville. Robert Andrews. Thomas Lister. Peter Brook. John Trenchard. Nathaniel Rich. Nicholas Gould. Algernon Sidney. John Lowry. William Say. John Selden. Edward Neville. John Wastell. Henry Darley. Francis Lassels. William Purefoy. Nicholas Letchmere. Thomas Allen. John Dormer. Francis Rouse. William Cawley. John Nut. Richard Ingoldsby. Cornelius Holland. Edmund Wilde. John Corbet. James Ash. John Goodwin. Richard Sawley. Herbert Morley. James Nelthorpe. Robert Brewster. John Dixwell. Thomas Harrison. John Downs. John Anlaby. Simon Meyne. Thomas Scot. George Fleetwood. Thomas Pury, Jun. William Eyre. Thomas Boone. Edmund West. Robert Reynolds. William White. Richard Darley. John Carew. Augustine Skinner. John Dove. Thomas Birch. Nicholas Love. Philip Smith. Valentine Wauton. Alexander Popham. Robert Cecil. Isaac Pennington. John Fag. William Hay. Nathaniel Hallowes. Thomas Wayte. Henry Arthington. Walter Strickland. John Pyne. Thomas Mackworth. Gervas Pigot. Francis Thorp. Robert Bennet. Robert Nicholas. Richard Norton. John Stevens. Peter Temple. James Temple. John Weaver. Thomas Wogan. Brampton Gurdon. Robert Wallop.

* Biog. Brit., art. Cromwell, ed. Kippis, vol. iv., p. 525. The History of Mrs. Macaulay. The author of "The World's Mistake in Oliver Cromwell" (published in 1666) distinctly says, that the prosperity of trade "appeared by the great sums offered them for the customs and excise, £900,000 a year being refused. The riches of the nation showed itself in the high value that land and all our native commodities bore, which are the certain marks of opulence. Our honour was made known to all the world by a conquering navy, which had brought the proud Hollanders upon their knees, to beg peace of us upon our own conditions, keeping all other nations in awe. And, besides these advantages, the public stock was £500,000 in ready money; the value of £700,000 in stores; and the whole army in advance, some four, and none under two months; so that, though there might be a debt of near £5000 upon the kingdom, he met with above twice the value in lieu of it." This tract was written by Slingsby Bethel, and carries considerable authority with it. He was the son of Sir Walter Bethel, by a sister of the sturdy and celebrated Cavalier, Sir Henry Slingsby, who expired on the scaffold his love for monarchy. Bethel, who was sheriff of London in 1680, played a conspicuous part in the agitations of the Popish Plot and the Exclusion Bill; and, as a staunch partisan of Shaftesbury and Monmouth, fell under the terrible lash of Dryden. He is the Shimei of "Absalom and Achitophel."

"When two or three were gathered to declaim
Against the monarch of Jerusalem,
Shimei was always in the midst of them;
And, if they cursed the king when he was by,
Would rather curse than break good company."

"If any leisure time he had from power,
Because 'tis sin to misemploy an hour—
His business was, by writing, to persuade
That kings were useless, and a clog to trade."

William Sydenham. John Bingham. Philip Jones. John Palmer. William Ellis.

Cromwell had been some days engaged in the establishment of the council of state before he described it to the nation in his declaration of the 30th of April.* It was not an easy matter to establish, for all his officers thought themselves entitled to have an opinion concerning it, and it was his policy, for the present, to seem to give them their way. The discussions that ensued were, accordingly, highly characteristic.

Lambert, and a few of the more worldly of these gentlemen, proposed that it should consist of ten members; Harrison, and a section of his party, were for the number of seventy, after the model of the Jewish Sanhedrin; Okey, and others of the saints, were for thirteen, in imitation of Christ and his twelve apostles. The last scheme, embracing at once the scriptural and convenient, was favoured for this and other peculiar reasons by Cromwell, and ultimately adopted. On the 29th of April they had taken their seats, for the first time, as rulers of the Commonwealth. With Cromwell were associated eight officers of high rank† and four civilians.‡ The last would thus seem to have been thrown in as a convenient screen alone; for this council of state, so constituted, was to all intents and purposes a military council.

It will scarcely be believed, notwithstanding, that a desperate attempt was made to secure, in the position of one of the civilians, the name and authority of Sir Henry Vane. Idle effort! but not less zealously made; for none knew better than Cromwell that any damage to such a character must be self-inflicted, and none more certain than he that such co-operation, by any argument secured, would altogether avert the possibility of a popular outbreak before his plans were ripe. No argument was therefore forgotten, no inducement omitted, to achieve the services of the "juggling" Vane. But the manner of their reception became his character. As he had treated the insult, he treated the mean submission. From his house in Lincolnshire, to which he had at once retired after the 20th of April, he wrote a brief answer to the application from the council, that "though the reign of saints was now no doubt begun, he was willing, for his part, to defer his share in it till he should go to heaven."§ Heartily Cromwell wished him there—who can doubt!

Decidedly warlike, however, as the new council of state was in its construction, the old council of officers held, not the less, to their existence as a quasi-authoritative body, of which the lord-general, Cromwell himself, was the natural and most authoritative mouthpiece. Under no lack of governors, therefore, did England labour after the dispersion of her statesmen. A fortnight had not elapsed after that event before acts of the highest authority were seen to emanate, with equal force and potency, from three several executive powers. Englishmen were now called on to obey the council of state, now to submit to the council of officers; in one day they were to receive, with deference, the law of the Lord-general Cromwell, speaking on behalf of the officers, and in the next they were to welcome the orders of the Lord-president Cromwell, as the mouthpiece of the state.*

Such, however, were the trifling peculiarities that might well precede a reign of saints, and men waited in hope accordingly. Scarcely a day passed that did not bring to the council its "humble and thankful congratulation from some that fear the Lord," in anticipation of the great things they were to do, and not seldom a mission or address of the following fashion reached the devout hands of the lord-general or the lord-president, Oliver Cromwell. "After so many throes and pangs—severe contests between the powers of the world and the interest of Christ—we conceive the great and long-desired reformation is near the birth. We bless the God of Heaven, who hath called you forth and led you on, not only in the high places of the field, making you a terror to the enemy, but also (among those mighty ones whom God hath left) to the dissolving of the late Parliament. O my lord, what are you, that you should be the instrument to translate the nation from oppression to liberty, from the hands of corrupt persons to the saints? And who are we, that we should live to see these days which our fathers longed to see, and reap the harvest of their hopes? To be low in our own eyes, when God lifteth us, is a true testimony of humility and uprightness. No action of service or honour ever swelled the bosom of Christ; him, we believe, you make your pattern. Let the high praises of God be in our mouths, and the generations to come tell of his wonders. Let the improvement of this opportunity be your care and our prayer, that you may follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, and we attend you with our persons,

* See ante, p. 515. A curious letter, of a few days later date, shows the suspicions already begun to be entertained as to his purposes. "This declaration," says the writer, "is in his own name, and signed by himself, Oliver Cromwell, which shewes what henceforward he aims at."—Thurloe's State Papers, vol. i., p. 240.

† These were Lambert, Harrison, Desborough, Thomlinson, Bennet, Sydenham, Stapely, and another whose name I cannot precisely ascertain, in the confusion of the additions subsequently made, and of the second council of state so soon afterward appointed. I take him, however, to have been Colonel Philip Jones.

‡ These were, Strickland, late ambassador to the United Provinces; Sir Gilbert Pickering, John Carew, and Samuel Moyer. A new president was weekly chosen, Lambert being the first, Pickering the second, and Harrison the third.

§ See an intercepted letter of Mr. T. Robinson to Mr. Stoneham, at the Hague, in Thurloe's State Papers, vol. i., p. 265.

* See Whitelocke, p. 530-533. Among other acts done, judges were displaced, appointed, superseded; new treasury and admiralty commissioners were named; even the monthly assessment (so clamoured against in the time of the statesmen!) of £120,000 was renewed for an additional half year; and all these various powers assumed by authorities as various. (See Leicester's Journal, p. 142. Merc. Pol., No. 157.) The chief civil offices had in the main gone forward without intermission, in obedience to the order contained in the declaration of officers. (See ante, p. 514.) It is amusing to mark Whitelocke's manner of shuffling over, in his Memorials, the fact of his first adhesion to this anomalous and most un-lawyer-like state of things. Alluding to the appearance of this declaration, and of the more particular passage to which I have referred, he says, "The commissioners did not proceed in the business of the great seal till after this declaration; and then, considering that they had their authority from the Parliament, they did proceed." This "Parliament" must have been the Parliament remotely and mysteriously alluded to in the declaration as likely, probable, impossible to be summoned!

petitions, purses, lives, and all that is dear to us."*

The Royalists had a somewhat different mode of regarding the recent occurrences—more sensible as a matter of reasoning, but still mistaken in point of fact, or, rather, in point of time. They wrote exultingly to every quarter of the Continent that their great enemies were gone, that the regicide Parliament was no more, that a "notable crisis" was at hand; they revelled in the thought of "the noble confusion" Cromwell had made;† they said that their cause, low as it was, should spring back higher than ever; in plain and prophetic terms, they told the personal friends of Stuart that he should have his throne again; and all these things they mixed as freely as their draughts, in ribald songs at their Royalist taverns.

"Some think that Cromwell with Charles is agreed,

And say 'twere good policy if it were so,

Let the Hollander, French, the Dane, and the Swede,
Do bring him again whether he will or no.

"And now I would gladly conclude my song

With a prayer, as ballads are wont to do;

But yet I'll forbear, for I think, ere 't be long,

We may have a king and a Parliament too."‡

The only man in the midst of these strange doings who already knew their result as thoroughly as he coolly and determinedly contemplated it, was Cromwell himself. It is a singular proof of the complete self-possession with which he had long been quietly providing for the movement he had resolved sooner or later to make, that he sent confidentially to the great rival of Mazarin, in the very instant of the brief triumph which preceded the fall of that statesman, to bespeak his interest and friendship. I find the following note in the Memoirs of the Cardinal de Retz. He had been on some certain night to negotiate a money loan for Charles Stuart, who was then in Paris, and thus relates the evening's adventures. "It is remarkable that the same night, as I was going home, I met one Tilney, an Englishman, whom I had formerly known at Rome, who told me that Vere, a great Parliamentarian and a favourite of Cromwell, was arrived at Paris, and had orders to see me. I was a little perplexed; however, I thought it would be improper to refuse him an interview. He gave me a letter from Cromwell, in the nature of credentials, importing that the sentiments I had discovered in the defence of public liberty added to my reputation, and had induced him to enter into the strictest friendship with me. It was a most civil, complaisant letter, and I answered it with a great deal of respect, but in such a manner as became a true Catholic and an honest Frenchman."

But yet, as surely as his designs were held, did this extraordinary man contrive, among his own partisans, to throw every kind of doubt and uncertainty over them. A memorable instance at this period is related by Edmund Ludlow. Among the deluded agents in the dispersion of the Parliament, Major Salway has been mentioned. He appears to have been too self-willed for introduction among the new council, and yet too influential with some sections of the army to be passed over without a certain show of deference and conciliation. To him, therefore, Cromwell had sent shortly after the fall of the Commonwealth, and Salway, "with his friend Mr. John Carew," at once obeyed the invitation. Then Cromwell, according to the report of Ludlow, complained to them of "the great weight of affairs that by this means was fallen upon him, affirming that the thoughts of the consequence thereof made him to tremble, and therefore desired them to free him from the temptations that might be laid before him, and to that end to go immediately to the Chief-justice St. John, and Mr. Selden, and some others, and endeavour to persuade them to draw up some instrument of government that might put the power out of his hands." To this Major Salway at once answered with dignity and spirit, yet, at the same time, no recorded distrust of Cromwell, "The way, sir, to free you from this temptation, is for you not to look upon yourself to be under it, but to rest persuaded that the power of this nation is in the good people of England, as formerly it was." Good advice, but by no means so acceptable in the quarter addressed as the pretences which had scattered the statesmen might have led poor Salway to suppose! Yet it was advice which Cromwell no doubt received with all gracious profession, since it confirmed in one convenient sense, if not in the speaker's own, a determination which already existed in the lord-general's mind, and by a well-devised realization of which he hoped to settle the "popular representative" and the "reign of saints" together, in a prescription that should serve for both. Salway, there is little reason to doubt, was sent away perfectly contented.

Meanwhile everything was working in public as Cromwell could have best desired. The frame of affairs seemed to be breaking asunder. Each day brought fresh rumours to agitate and confuse the public; each day was the birth of a new project that was to glorify and exalt, or of some design that was sure to betray, the people. Now one excited group met another, and exchanged beliefs that Cromwell had offered to recall the royal family on condition that Charles should marry one of his daughters;* then might be seen, next day, a knot of disturbed and threatening men, who were telling each other that Cromwell intended himself to ascend the throne, and that the insignia for his coronation were actually prepared; finally, aloof

* I take the following from a curious letter in Thurloe (vol. i., p. 254), dated at the close of May, 1653: such extracts might be given in abundance: "I expected some news in the letters concerning the King of Scots, which was strongly reported here a fortnight or three weeks ago to be gone for Holland; and now the fresh reports are, that it's lowly spoken in the court that he is to marry one of Cromwell's daughters, so to be brought again to his three lost crowns. This is also muttered here, but not believed, Cromwell professing himself a constant enemy to monarchy, and that the height of his ambition is to be a vassal of the Commonwealth, although it's thought by many he is at his wit's end, not content with what he hath got, nor knowing how to get absolute hold of the sceptre, or to content all, the soldiers being much divided by their several interests. It is said again, he hath sent for all the soldiers to come up; and what will be done when they come (if indeed they do come), I cannot divine. Our city is earnest, either to have the old Parliament brought to sit again, or to have a new one. Cromwell will never yield to the first, but rather punish the motioners; what he will do to the second, time must show."

* Ellis's Letters, second series, vol. iii., p. 368.

† Evelyn, vol. ii., p. 215. Letter of Sir Edward Hyde.

‡ Ellis's Letters. Abundant proofs of this state of Royalist feeling and anticipation may be seen in the Papers of Evelyn and Thurloe.

from all these, excited enthusiasts gathered together in various quarters of the city, to predict a speedy advent for those halcyon days which would at last fulfil God's promises to man. In one street signatures were solicited to a petition for the re-establishment of the ancient Constitution; in another, for a pure republic, with the government of successive Parliaments; in a third, for welcome to that "Lamb of the Lord," which had exhibited itself in the new military councils. All this was to have been expected in the state of society and of parties already described. Some addresses declared the conviction of their subscribers that the late dissolution was a crime, some that it was a blessing; some were for having the statesmen back, some were rather impatient, and not very implicit, about the assembling of the saints. From the country, too, various rumours arrived in quick and startling succession. Here there was "gathering of hands" for the fallen Commonwealth, there for the rising king;* and only one thing reigned alike everywhere, THE SPIRIT OF CONFUSION.

And thus arose the instrument of Cromwell's vast design! "Sure," wrote Hyde from Paris a few weeks later, "sure the confusion is very high in England, and you must declare for Cromwell, that his single influence may compose these distractions, which the multitude cannot do." It is good to make our giants first, since it is certain that we kill them then more easily.

The time had certainly arrived, if not for that of a declaration in behalf of Cromwell, at least for his own trial of the last grand cheat he had been so long preparing. It was observed for some weeks that he had never seemed to wear such gracious aspects of humility and godliness as at this peculiar time; his prayers had peculiar relish in them, and a most extraordinary fervour; his preachings were also very frequent in the council; and it was the report of men more immediately about his person in confidential relations, that he had certainly, of late, received absolute communications from the Holy Spirit.†

* I refrain from overlaying the text with details on these matters, which might be multiplied to an interminable extent. I give another curious letter, however, which bears upon the subject generally, and sufficiently illustrates the view I have given of the state of society: it is to be found in Thurloe, vol. i., p. 249, 250: "We talk merrily of a petition coming out of Surrey for making their general king. The foolish, senseless, stupid citizens were so sotish as to petition their lord-general to have at least some who were thought good men of the Parliament to sit again; but he gave them an answer no ways to their desire. He intends to be king in effect, though loth to take upon him the title. The apparition of the city's petition was seen a fortnight ago in several places of this town; but it soon vanished in the thoughts of wise men. The council often are at a non-plus, for they know not what to do; they have added three more to their number. The general's picture was set up at the Exchange, with verses under it, tending much to his honour: it was brought to him by the lord-mayor, who, it is thought, was the contriver of the setting of it up. White-locke declareth that the Parliament is not dissolved, and there is a gathering of hands for a king. This is both in town and country. Essex and Buckinghamshire are sending a petition for a king. Thus things stand in a great confusion. As things stand now, we know not what to think or say. The time was, when the challenging of five members was cried out upon for an unheard-of breach of privilege of Parliament; but afterward the impeaching of eleven members was a greater, and made a mighty noise among the Presbyterians. What think you now of turning them all out of doors?"

† The assertion is thought worthy of grave contradiction

The secret of these spiritual throes and heavings made its appearance in due course. It had been immediately preceded by eight days' close consultation between Cromwell and his military divan: a circumstance duly noted with all kinds of lofty and indistinct surmises by the Whitehall newspapers,* and for the result of by one of Cromwell's common-sense partisans: M. de Bordeaux, for example, the French resident in England, and for many reasons well affected to Cromwell, thus writes to Monsieur de Brienne, the French secretary of state: "Les bruits, qu'on fait courir du général [Cromwell] ne sont pas vrais: il affecte bien une grande piété, mais par une particulière communication avec le St. Esprit; et n'est pas si faible, que de se laisser prendre par des flateries. Je sais que l'amb. de Portugal lui en aiant fait sur ce changement, il en fait raillerie." An extract from a Royalist pamphlet of the day will show, however, the peculiar interests that now subsisted between this Frenchman and Cromwell. Alluding to the addresses which were got up after the fall of the Parliament "to strengthen the hands of this dictator in carrying on the work of Zion," it thus proceeds: "He was also complimented by the French ambassador Bordeaux, who had made applications to the Parliament, but was doubtful of effecting his errand with those highest and mightiest states who were grown formidable not only to the Dutch, but to his master, who willingly courted them to prevent their closing with his rebels of Bordeaux; only Oliver, as we have seen, valued them no more than scoundrels or rake-shames, nor would give ear to any more enemies of monarchy." Advice in the foreign policy of the Protectorate is here glanced at.

* It is needless to observe that the breathless interest with which intelligence of each new incident or circumstance of the war was looked for, had greatly tended to the increase of newspapers, both in numbers and influence. About twelve were now regularly published, all of them weekly newspapers, besides those occasional assaults on the popular party which came out in the shape of Royalist journals. On Monday appeared the Perfect Diurnal, and the Moderate Intelligencer; on Tuesday, Several Proceedings in Parliament, a publication of authority; the Weekly Intelligencer, and the Faithful Post; on Wednesday, Mercurius Democritus, and the Perfect Account; on Thursday, Several Proceedings in State Affairs, a publication of some authority, and Mercurius Politicus, a sort of state gazette; and on Friday, the Moderate Publisher, the Faithful Post, by a different publisher from that of Tuesday, and the Faithful Scout. There was no newspaper on Saturday, probably because that would have been considered as too nearly trenching on the Lord's Day. Among the various writers whose names have come down to us, that of Marchmont Needham, the editor of the Mercurius Politicus, best deserves mention. He had written against the liberal cause in the commencement of the war, yet the statesmen not only pardoned him this, but extended to his undoubted talents the patronage they loved to bestow universally on literature and learned men. Eventually he "was induced to become an advocate for them and liberty." He was a writer worth gaining. This is his character by Anthony à Wood: "His Mercurius Politicus, which came out by authority, and flew every week into all parts of the nation for more than ten years, had very great influence upon numbers of inconsiderable persons, such as have a strong presumption that all must needs be true that is in print. He was the Goliath of the Philistines, the great champion of the late usurper, whose pen, in comparison of others, was like a weaver's beam. And certainly he that will or can peruse those his intelligences called Merc. Politici, will judge that had the devil himself (the father of all lies) been in this Goliath's office, he could not have exceeded him; as having with profound malice calumniated his sovereign, with scurrility abused the nobility, with impudence blasphemed the Church and members thereof, and with industry poisoned the people with dangerous principles." The reader will know how to translate this into an admission of Needham's great talents, and his power of making them available. He may still wish to judge for himself, however, as to the quality of the newspaper-writing in that age, and I therefore subjoin a passage from the 108th number of "Mercurius Politicus," on what are called "Reasons of State." "The regulation of affairs by reason of state, not the strict rule of honesty, has been an epidemical one. But, for fear I be mistaken," continues he, "you are to understand, that by reason of state here we do not condemn the equitable result of prudence and right reason—for upon determinations of this nature depends the safety of all states and princes—but that reason of state which flows from a corrupt principle to an indirect end; that reason of state which is the statesman's reason, or, rather, his will and lust, when he admits ambition to be a reason—preferment, power, profit, revenge, which all parties in the metropolis appear to have waited with an extreme intensity of interest. It was early in June when its disclosure appeared, and it announced a Parliament. A Parliament! That name which a short month past was said to have become hateful to the English people, was now confessed to be the one feasible mode of inducing satisfaction and content. A Parliament of statesmen! Some hearts, it might be, leaped high again with the generous hope, which in generous nature survives distrust and fear, and saw the men of the army powerless, and the Commonwealth restored. A Parliament of saints! At that rapt announcement, enthusiasts who walked the city with their faces too much fixed on heaven to see ordinary wants or human fears, beheld the prayed for movements in the clouds that were to sweep away forever iniquity and sorrow, but were, alas! struck blind to movements reviving on the earth, which, in a few brief years, would sweep themselves away with a most triumphant scorn.

A Parliament of saints it was indeed to be! The ignorant and enthusiast still believed; the poor were obliged to hope, since it was something still to cling to; the statesmen grieved or smiled; the indifferent calculated chances; while the irreverent exultation of the Royalists scattered questions along the streets, to ask if the image of him who rode into Jerusalem upon an ass's foal were any more than a type of the new deliverer, who was about to ride into his throne upon the backs of a hundred and twenty asses, selected out of several counties for the especial purpose.*

But were the people to return these saints? Were the asses to be of popular selection? The pretences urged against the statesmen would surely, at least, be permitted to survive so far. It would be hardly credible, that within a month of the violent destruction of a Parliament on the plea that it had refused to place faith in the people, its destroyers should take on themselves to call another Parliament together without even the semblance of a popular appeal. And yet this was what was now done, as any other thing equally monstrous might have been done and opportunity, to be reasons sufficient to put him upon any design or action that may tend to present advantage, though contrary to the law of God, or the law of common honesty and of nations. Reason of state is the most sovereign command and the most important counsellor. Reason of state is the card and compass of the ship. Reason of state is many times the religion of a state—the law, the life of a state; that which answers all objections and quarrels about mal-government; that which wages war, imposes taxes, cuts off offenders, pardons offenders, sends and treats ambassadors. It can say and unsay; do and undo; balk the common road, make high-ways to become by-ways, and the farthest about to become the nearest cut. If a difficult knot come to be untied, which neither the divine by Scripture, nor lawyer by case or precedent can untie, then reason of state, or an hundred ways more which idiots know not, dissolve it. This is that great empress which the Italians call Ragione di Stato; it can rant as a soldier, compliment as a monsieur, trick it as a juggler, strut it as a statesman, and is as changeable as the moon in the variety of her appearances.† This is admirable satire, expressed with admirable correctness and ease. I should not omit to add that one of the ablest works produced by Needham was written at the request of the Parliamentary leaders, and thus entitled: “The Case of the Commonwealth of England stated, with a Discourse of the Excellencie of a Free State above a Kingly Government.” I shall have an opportunity of returning to this work.

* Lord Somers's Tracts by Scott, vol. vii., p. 97. Placards containing such sneers as these were dropped in various places throughout the city.

in that condition of affairs. When men have been induced, no matter by what disunion or distraction, to countenance one great falsehood, they have then surrendered the privileges with the protection of truth. A lie can only generate a lie, and he who has acknowledged the parent, dares not deny or reject the offspring. The first result of the pernicious fraud which perverts the intellect is the habitual indifference or insincerity which debases and corrupts the heart.

The new Parliament was to be summoned on principles unheard of in all time before. The qualification of its members was to be sanctity of principles and holiness of life, and their election was to proceed, heaven-directed, from the choice of the council of officers. With this view, ministers in various parts of the country, on whom the council could rely, had been directed to take the sense of the “Congregational churches” in their several counties, and to send up to the lord-general and his officers' returns containing the names of persons “able, loving truth, fearing God, and hating covetousness,” whom they judged “qualified to manage a trust in the ensuing government.”* Out of these, with the assistance of various names selected for their own more immediate ends, the council of officers, in the presence of the lord-general,† now proceeded to select a convention of 139 representatives, divided thus : for England, 122 ; for Wales six ; six for Ireland ; and five for Scotland ; and to all these, summonses were at once sent out.

* I subjoin from Thurlow a specimen of one of these Congregational documents. “Letter from the people of Bedfordshire to the Lord-general Cromwell and the council of the army. May it please your lordship and the rest of the council of the army, We (we trust), the servants of Jesus Christ, inhabitants in the county of Bedford, having fresh upon our hearts the sad oppressions we have (a long while) groaned under from the late Parliament, and now eyeing and owning (through grace) the good hand of God in this great turn of providence, being persuaded it is from the Lord that you should be instruments in his hand at such a time as this, for the electing of such persons who may go in and out before his people in righteousness, and govern these nations in judgment, we having sought the Lord for you, and hoping that God will still do great things by you, understanding that it is in your hearts (through the Lord's assistance) to establish an authority, consisting of men able, loving truth, fearing God, and hating covetousness; and we having had some experience of men with us, we have judged it our duty to God, to you, and to the rest of his people, humbly to present two men, viz., Nathaniel Taylor and John Croke, now justices of peace in our county, whom we judge in the Lord qualified to manage a trust in the ensuing government. All which we humbly refer to your serious considerations, and subscribe our names, this 13th day of May, 1653.” A memorandum of the “Dutch deputies in England,” dated the 12th of August, 1653, states that the new council, “by the direction and the name of the Lord-general Cromwell, against the 4th of July, 1653, have summoned a new representation of 120 English, five Scotch, and five Irish commissioners, out of the respective counties and a few towns: who, upon the letter of the said general, after a foregoing communication with the ministers of the Independent party, which are spread through all England under the name of the gathered churches, and do keep a mutual correspondence, were chosen, and have appeared here.” It is worthy of remark, at the same time, that the lord-general and his council exercised their own right of choice at all times when it happened to differ from their Congregational advisers; and that, for example, though Nathaniel Taylor in the above recommendation was “called,” John Croke was not. “Edward Cater” was summoned in his stead.

† It is a singular circumstance, that what was called the council of state took no authoritative share in this proceeding, and, accordingly, no notice of the subject is to be found in their order book: it was solely the work of Cromwell and his officers. A characteristic circumstance should also be noted. Major Salway, though not a member of the military council, was present at these meetings, invited there by Cromwell, who thus, by an extreme appearance of confidence and favour, disarmed the suspicions of a gentleman equally credulous and troublesome.

The form of the summons was as extraordinary as its origin. It was issued in the sole name of Oliver Cromwell, as though in these two words already lodged the sovereign authority of England ; and it ran thus : " Forasmuch as, upon the dissolution of the late Parliament, it became necessary that the peace, safety, and government of this Commonwealth should be provided for ; and in order thereunto, divers persons fearing God, and of approved fidelity and honesty, are by myself, with the advice of my council of officers, nominated, to whom the charge of trust of so weighty affairs is to be committed ; and having good assurance of your love to, and courage for, God and the interest of this cause, and of the good people of this Commonwealth, I, Oliver Cromwell, captain-general and commander-in-chief of all the armies and forces raised and to be raised within this Commonwealth, do hereby summon and require you, —, Esquire (being one of the persons nominated), personally to be and appear at the council-chamber at Whitehall, within the city of Westminster, upon the 4th day of July next ensuing the date hereof, then and there to take upon you the said trust, unto which you are hereby called and appointed to serve as a member for the county (or city) of —. And hereof you are not to fail. Given under my hand and seal, the 6th day of June, 1653.

OLIVER CROMWELL.*

Nor did any fail excepting two. Two men only refused to answer to the summons. The rest, in wonder or enthusiasm, obeyed. It is indeed recorded of the majority that they took the very extraordinary manner of their election as a sufficient proof that the call was from heaven.† This was natural enough, since men who have been fed with prodigies once, will feed themselves with prodigies still ; nor is a falsehood itself more self-productive than a miracle : and thus did everything work to the usurper's wish. Temporal and spiritual pride went hand in hand to the work, trusting each to the blindness of the other, and both resolved to get what they could, of their respective yet most opposite desires, out of the " mysterious knack," as one of the Royalist papers not inaptly called it, " of a new, unheard-of legislative authority, who, by the name of men of integrity and fidelity to the cause of God, were by a bare summons from Oliver called to the settlement of the state—that was, to be stirrups or footsteps to the throne whereon Cromwell should tread."*

Faithful to the day appointed in the summons, these wonderfully-selected, able, truth-loving, God-fearing, covetousness-hating, and Cromwell-obeying men, presented themselves on the 4th of July, 1653, at the council-chamber in Whitehall. A more extraordinary assemblage had assuredly never been seen within the walls of any place of power. Mean men were among them, and for this they have been flung aside in the mass as a set of ignorant mechanics and adventurers, low born, low bred, illiterate, and vile ; indifferent and reckless men were among them, and for this they have been scorned and branded by history as hypocrites and madmen.‡ Yet were they none of these. De-

* It will be worth quoting another Royalist comment of the time on the present proceedings, more especially as it contains a curious illustration of the origin of the slanders against the quality and condition of the men who composed this convention. " As for news here, we have none but good, for the lord-general goes on like himself, a conqueror and a king, as it is hoped he will shortly be ; for there is a privy seal made, a sword with three crowns upon it, to borrow moneys with it. And it is told me by some that I know in Whitehall, that there is brought in there a royal crown and a sceptre ; and I wish him as much joy with it as you do, or can do. His excellency and his privy council, which consist of as many Christ and his apostles, all godly men, have made two acts lately, equal to the former acts of Parliament : the one for the continuance of our monthly tax ; the other for the convening of a new representative at Whitehall, on purpose, as is expected, to crown his excellency. They are elected out of all counties, but not by the counties of England, but by the special appointment of him and his council ; and his warrant to them runs thus : ' I and my council do will and command you to appear at Whitehall,' &c. ; and I assure you we shall have a blessed government, for though all the elected are mean men, yet they are godly men, and the most of them gifted men, fit to govern both in Church and government. By the next I shall give you their names. In the mean time, take the names of some good and gracious, elected for Westminster and London : Mr. Syah, some time clerk to Sir Edward Povey ; another, a leather-seller, over Ram Alley, in Fleet-street, a very ram, a man well known to your bed-fellow ; another, a scrivener in St. Thomas Apostle's, a pure apostle, Mr. Colburne by name ; another, an aqua vita man, near Aldgate, to furnish the state with a dram out of the bottle to comfort their hearts." The " leather-seller" referred to here was the notorious Barbone, and it is singular that there is no such attempt to play the same trick with his name on the part of this scurrilous Royalist as our grave historians have since played.

† " Much the major part of them," Lord Clarendon tells us, " consisted of inferior persons of no quality or name, artificers of the meanest trades, known only by their gifts in praying and preaching, which was now practised by all degrees of men, but scholars, throughout the kingdom. In which number, that there may be a better judgment made of the rest, it will not be amiss to name one, from whom that Parliament itself was afterward denominated, who was Praise-God (that was his Christian name) Barbone, a leather-seller in Fleet-street ; from whom, he being an eminent speaker in it, it was afterward called Praise-God Barbone's Parliament. In a word, they were a pack of weak, senseless fellows, fit only to bring the name and reputation of Parliaments lower than it was yet." Another contemporary styles them, " A set of men for the most part of such mean and ignoble extraction, that so far were they from being taken notice of by their shires, each of whom (but two or three) represented, that they were scarce known in the very towns wherein they were born, or afterward inhaled, till the excise, then committees for sequestration, and the war in the respective counties, made them infamously known. The rest were of Cromwell's partisans in the Parliament and high Court of Justice." Whitelocke remarks, however, " That many of this assembly being persons of fortune and knowledge, it was much wondered by some that they would at this summons, and from such hands, take upon them the supreme authority of this nation, considering how little authority Cromwell and his officers had to give it, or these gentlemen to take it." It may be worth

* Lord Somers's Tracts, vol. vi., p. 247.

† The author of " An Exact Relation of the Proceedings and Transactions of the late Parliament, their beginning and ending ; by a Member" (printed in the year 1654, and to be found in Somers's Tracts, vol. vi., p. 266), tells us, " It is very observable, that of all that were chosen and summoned to appear for the end aforesaid, being 140 persons, there were but two that refused the call and work, so unanimous a concurrence was there found as to the service, though they knew well their call was not according to ancient formality and the way of the nation. There seemed to be two reasons wherein there was satisfaction : first, that Divine Providence had cast it on them, without their seeking in the least ; secondly, the necessity, as the case of the Commonwealth stood, of having some to act and carry on affairs in way of government till there might be an attainer to a better way of settlement, by the choice of the good people of this nation, which was not to be denied to be their just and dearly-purchased liberty." The last passage proves that a certain set of men in this Parliament had been able to combine a conscientious sense and care of public liberty, with even the rapt and excited phrensies of religious enthusiasm.

scribe them, as such an assemblage claims to be described, by the general characteristics of the great majority of its members—and let laughter still flow freely as it will at the monstrous origin of their authority, and the ludicrous pretences of their sanctity, the more grave and the more respectful will be our mention of the personal qualities of the men. They were earnest and sincere. They had great truth of purpose, unquestionable good faith, and a zeal that set life and labour at naught in the service to which they had been called. They believed much, and they acted as men who believed. They wildly thought themselves, indeed, the heralds of a new and glorious era of unearthly happiness to earth, and of immortal peace and good-will to mortal men; but to this service of overheated imaginations they brought the aid of judgment, upon various and most essential things, at once sober, correct, and practical, which should for itself alone command the admiration and respect of all reasoning or reflecting persons. Finally, they were men of no common worldly esteem. "It was much wondered at by some," says Whitelocke, "that these gentlemen, many of them being persons of fortune and knowledge, would, at this summons and from these hands, take upon them the supreme authority of the nation." There were many more things wonderful which Whitelocke's philosophy preferred to leave undreamed of, though it might, perchance, have explained them. It was possibly much wondered at by some, for example, that such gentlemen as these, many of them being persons of knowledge, would have been called upon, under a summons from such hands, to assume the supreme authority of the nation; yet none knew better than Whitelocke and his class what Cromwell's objects were, and none better than they could have told how even such men as these would be made the instruments to advance them. This will speedily become manifest.

Thus, then, assembled in this Whitehall council-chamber the celebrated Barebone's Parliament: a title by which grave historians, taking advantage of the lucky accident of the name of one of its members, have sought to make it ridiculous in history. A cheap thing is ridicule; and a most precious instrument of unprincipled power, the facility of coining nicknames! The ingenious device of changing Barbone into Barebone, and the constant repetition of the latter word in its most ridiculous sense, have been successful in persuading historical readers for nearly two centuries that this assemblage of men, wealthy, high born, wise, as many of them were, was little better, to all sensible or rational purposes, than an assemblage of literal bare bones* might have been!

subjoining, also, the character of the members of this convention from Ludlow, who tells us, "That many of the members of this assembly had manifested a good affection to the public cause; but some there were among them who were brought in as spies and trepanners; and though they had been always of the contrary party, made the highest pretensions to honesty and the service of the nation. This assembly, therefore, being composed, for the most part, of honest and well-meaning persons (who, having good intentions, were less ready to suspect the evil designs of others), thought themselves in full possession of the power and authority of the nation, and therefore proceeded to the making of laws relating to the public."

* Voltaire gravely translates Barbone's name into os décharné!

so true it is that men are not made less contemptible because their nickname happens to be nonsense. It is all the better for revealing no shadow of the qualities they may have, whether vile or great, since it only flings the more insignificance over them in expressing, as it were, a very abstraction of the contemptible. The return of Praise-God Barbone as one of the members for the city of London hath had truly a portentous influence on the memory of this Parliament!

Besides Barbone, however, it will become us to recollect in this narrative that Henry Cromwell, a man of no insignificance any way, was summoned; that the whole of what was called the council of state, with the exception of the

* Mr. Godwin (in the Hist. of the Commonwealth, vol. iii., p. 324) first exposed the trick of this altered name, and, on the authority of four undisputed contemporary lists of this Parliament, published by the council of the state, wrote it Barbone. He suggested, at the same time, as to the Christian prefix, that it was scarcely more fanatical than Deodatus, a name to be found in the records of most of the countries of Europe. He might have said more for the name itself, which is capable of the classic translation of Timotheus. It would be scarcely necessary to refer to the numberless vulgar slanders and ridiculous fictions that have sprung out of this notorious name, but that it too well expresses the spirit in which the history of these times has (until of late) been written, to be altogether omitted. For example, one historian talks of "Praise-God Barebone" having had two brothers, the Christian name of the first of whom was Christ came into the world to save, and of the second, If Christ had not died, thou hadst been damned. He introduces his anecdote with the suspicious words, "I have been informed that there were three brothers," and adds, that "some people, tired of the long name of the younger brother, ore said to have omitted the former part of the sentence, and to have called him familiarly Damned Barebone." Another writer, according to Mr. Godwin, the Reverend James Brome, in a book of Travels over England, Scotland, and Wales, second edition, 1707, has endeavoured to render the satire more complete by giving the names of a "jury returned in the county of Sussex, in the late rebellious, troublesome times, as follows (p. 279): Accepted Terror, of Norsham; Redeemed Compton, of Battel; Faint not Hewet, of Heathfield; Make-peace Heaton, of Haro; God-reward Smart, of Titchurst; Stand-fast-on-high Stringer, of Crowhurst; Earth Adams, of Warbleton; Called Lower, of the same; Kill-sin Pimple, of Witham; Return Spelman, of Watling; Be-faithful Joiner, of Brinting; Fly-debate Roberts, of the same; Fight-the-good-fight-of-faith White, of Eimer; More-front Fowler, of East Hoxley; Hope-for Bending, of the same; Graceful Harding, of Lewes; Weep-not Billing, of the same; Meek Brewer, of Okeham." It is really scarcely credible that this list should have been copied into Hume's History of England: so it is, however, and Dr. Zachary Grey had previously given it the authority of his name, if his name had been capable of bearing authority in matters which involved hatred to the Puritans. Unblinded by such hatred, these men would have been the first to see that this notable list was a mere piece of mauvaise plaisanterie. If any doubt remained about it, however, it fortunately happens, from Mr. Godwin's researches, that the Rev. James Brome (the original reporter) has furnished a sufficiently satisfactory clew to the whole, by premising to this list of the Sussex jury that it was given him "by the same worthy hand" that had supplied him with the names of the Huntingdon jury in a preceding page. The story of the Huntingdon jury runs thus: "The following is the copy of a jury taken before Judge Doddridge at the assizes holden in this place, July, 1619, which is the more remarkable, because the surnames of some of the inhabitants would seem to make them at first sight persons of very great renown and quality (p. 56): Maximilian King, of Foseland; Henry Prince, of Godmanchester; George Duke, of Somersham; William Marquess, of Stukeley; Edmund Earl, of Hartford; Richard Baron, of Bythorn; Stephen Pope, of Newton; Stephen Cardinal, of Kimbolton; Humphrey Bishop, of Bugden; Robert Lord, of Waseley; Robert Knight, of Winwick; William Abbot, of Stukeley; Robert Baron, of St. Neot's; William Dean, of Old Weston; John Archdeacon, of Paxton; Peter Esquire, of Easton; Edward Friar, of Ellington; Henry Monk, of Stukeley; George Gentleman, of Spaldock; George Priest, of Graffin; Richard Deacon, of Catworth; Thomas Yeoman, of Barham." It is altogether a joke, the reader perceives, and, what is worse, by no means a good one!

four general officers and Colonel Thomlinson, appeared; and that among the names of influence and consideration which were to be found among them were those of Viscount Lisle; George lord Eure; Major Salway; Lockhart, afterward French ambassador; Montague, afterward Earl of Sandwich; Howard, afterward Earl of Carlisle; Sir Robert King, of Dublin; Sir Charles Wolseley, of Oxfordshire; Sir William Brownlow, of Lincolnshire; Sir William Roberts, of Middlesex; Sir James Hope, of Hopetown; and Colonels Duckenfield, Bennet, Fenwick, Barton, Sydenham, Bingham, Lawrence, Blount, Kenrick, West, Danvers, Jones, Pyne, Norton, Clark, James, and Hutchinson; with Majors Saunders and Horseman, Captain Stone, and others that had served with singular credit in the war. The illustrious name of Robert Blake appeared also in the list, with eleven others, including Francis Rouse, the provost of Eton College, who had sat with him in the Long Parliament itself.*

Two names remain to be mentioned, whose appearance may now be held to have been truly ominous of the crisis to which the public cause was approaching fast, and of the strange and sad prospects that were in wait for liberty. These were George Monk, and Anthony Ashley Cooper—the “scoundrel of fortune” who restored Charles II., and the renegade who sat in judgment on the judges of Charles I. From this period both date their fortunes. Monk had already been selected by Cromwell to supersede Blake in the naval command; and Cooper, whose “venal wit” had hitherto been aptly used for royalty, now recognised the period of his great advancement come, and set that wit to work to profit by it.

“He cast himself into the saint-like mould,
Grown’d, sigh’d, and pray’d, while godliness was gain,
The loudest bagpipe of the squeaking train!”

No surer mark can we find of the present aspect of affairs than in the rise of such men as these. They determine, with an almost unerring accuracy, from the distance at which we regard them, the character of the crisis which suddenly gave them power. England had become little better than a wide theatre for the struggle of selfish passions. With no paramount principle to bind men together—with no ties of acknowledged allegiance to restrain them, the intrepid and the bold; the men who had sufficient daring to execute what they had craft enough to plan; the unscrupulous and the restless; the souls for close designs and crooked counsels, for storm, for confusion, for anything but calm—all these would naturally start above the surface. We see the types of such men in George Monk and Anthony Ashley Cooper. We see the demoralizing action on the people, in the state to which they had been brought, and can discern, “as in a map, the end of all.” Policy measured by passion; rules of government, various as the various temperaments of men, set up each day; plots and conspiracies, unheard of during the sway of the statesmen, hatched each night; but George Monk still faithful to George Monk, Anthony Cooper losing no love for Anthony Cooper, and at no great distance from the sad scene, the brutal and wicked orgies of the Restoration! He who now cants for tyranny under Cromwell with pious breath, will soon practise it under Charles II. with iron heel.*

The 4th of July was a very sultry day, and the council-chamber at Whitehall was of moderate dimensions, but upward of 130 of the “elect” legislators had on that day assembled in that place, to receive into their own hands the supreme authority of the nation; and, “seated round the room on chairs,” waited for the entrance of the lord-general and his officers. After a brief delay, Cromwell appeared, followed by the chiefs of his military council. Every one present at once rose and uncovered.† Upon this, Cromwell also removed his hat, and, advancing up the room to the “middle window,” took his station there with a considerable body of his officers on either hand, and, “leaning upon the back of a chair, with his own back to the window,”‡ proceeded to address that remarkable meeting in a speech of profoundest art. It occupied upward of an hour in deliv-

* Not to acquaint the reader with a satire which he has no doubt admired, but to place on record a noble delineation of the kind of qualities which were now, as in a hot-bed, nursed in England, I subjoin the character of Shaftesbury from Dryden’s great hand:

“Of these the false Achitophel was first,
A name to all succeeding ages cursed.
For close designs and crooked counsels fit,
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit,
Restless, unfix’d in principles and place,
In power unpleased, impatient of disgrace;
A fiery soul, which, working out its way,
Fretted the pigmy body to decay,
And o’er-informed the tenement of clay.
A daring pilot in extremity;
Pleased with the danger when the waves went high,
He sought the storms; but for a calm unfit,
Would steer too nigh the sands to boast his wit.
Great wits are sure to madness near allied,
And thin partitions do their bounds divide;
Else why should he, with wealth and honour bless’d,
Refuse his age the heedful hours of rest?
Punish a body which he could not please,
Bankrupt of life, yet prodigal of ease?
And all to leave what with his toil he won.
To that unfeather’d, two-legged thing, a son;
Got while his soul did huddle notions try,
And born a shapeless lump like anarchy.
In friendship false, implacable in hate,
Resolved to ruin or to rule the state.
To compass this the triple bond he broke,
The pillars of the public safety shook,
And fitted Israel for a foreign yoke:
Then seized with fear, yet still affecting fame,
Usurp’d a patriot’s all-atoning name.
So easy still it proves in factious times,
With public zeal to cancel private crimes.
How safe is treason, and how sacred ill,
Where none can sin against the people’s will!
Where crowds can wink, and no offence be known,
Since in another’s guilt they find their own!
Yet fame deserved no enemy can grudge;
The statesmen we abhor, but praise the judge.
In Israel’s courts ne’er sat an Abethdin
With more discerning eyes, or hands more clean;
Unbribed, unsought, the wretched to redress;
Swift of despatch, and easy of access.
Oh! had he been content to serve the crown,
With virtues only proper to the gown,
Or had the rankness of the soil been freed
From cockle, that oppress’d the noble seed,
David for him his tuneful harp had strung,
And heaven had wanted one immortal song!
But wild ambition loves to slide, not stand,
And Fortune’s ice prefers to Virtue’s land.
Achitophel, grown weary to possess
A lawful fame and lazy happiness,
Disdain’d the golden fruit to gather free,
And lent the crowd his arm to shake the tree.”

* These were Lisle, Pickering, Christopher Martin, Francis Rouse, Harrison, George Fleetwood, Carew Strickland, Richard Norton, Sydenham, and Jones.

† Lord Leicester’s Journals, p. 147.

‡ Ibid.

ery, and is said* to have been pronounced in so excellent a manner "as sufficiently manifested that—as the lord-general himself was thoroughly persuaded—the Spirit of God acted in him and by him." The convention had by this time resumed their seats, but Cromwell and his officers still stood.

He began by observing that no doubt the summons they had all received would have explained to them the cause of their being in that room; he had, however, something more "significant" than that summons to offer them now, in the shape of "an instrument drawn up by the consent and advice of the principal officers of the army." "And," he added, "we have somewhat likewise farther to say to you for our own exonerat[i]on, and we hope it may be somewhat farther to your satisfaction; and, therefore, seeing you sit here somewhat uneasy, by reason of the scantness of the room and the heat of the weather, I shall contract myself with respect to that." This was merely one of those pleasant promises which orators often make and seldom keep. His very next sentence confessed what a long story he had resolved to tell.

"I have not thought it amiss a little to mind you of that series of providences wherein the Lord hitherto hath dispensed wonderful things to these nations, from the beginning of our troubles to this very day. If I should look much backward, we might remember the state of affairs as they were before the short, and that which was the last Parliament. In what a posture the things of this nation stood, doth so well, I presume, occur to all your memories and knowledges, that I shall not need to look so far backward, nor yet to the beginning of those hostile actions that passed between the king that was and the then Parliament; and, indeed, should I begin this labour, the things that would fall necessarily before you would rather be fit for a history than for a discourse at this present.

"But thus far we may look back. You very well know, after divers turnings of affairs, it pleased God, much about the midst of this war, to winnow, as I may so say, the forces of this nation, and to put them into the hands of men of other principles than those that did engage at first. By what strange providences that also was brought about, would ask more time than is allotted me to remember you of. Indeed, there are stories that do recite those transactions, and give narratives of matter of fact. But those things wherein the life and power of them lay; those strange windings and turnings of Providence; those very great appearances of God, in crossing and thwarting the designs of men, that he might raise up a poor and a contemptible company of men, neither versed in military affairs nor having much natural propensity to them even through the owning of a principle of godliness, of religion, which, so soon as it came to be owned, the state of affairs put upon that foot of account—how God blessed them, and all undertakings, by the rising of that most improbable, despicable, contemptible means—for that we must forever own—you very well know.

"What the several successes have been is not fit to mention at this time neither, though I must confess I thought to have enlarged myself upon this subject, forasmuch as the considering the works of God and the operation of his hands is a principal part of our duty, and a great encouragement to the strengthening of our hands, and of our faith for that which is behind. And then, having given us those marvellous dispensations among other ends—for that was a most principal end—as to us, in this revolution of affairs and issues of those successes God was pleased to give this nation and the authority that then stood, were very great things brought about—besides those dints that were upon those nations and places where they were carried on, even in the civil affairs, to the bringing offenders to justice, even the greatest—to the bringing the state of this government to the name, at least, of a commonwealth—to the searching and sifting of all places and persons—the king removed, and brought to justice, and many great ones with him; the House of Peers laid aside; the House of Commons, the representatives of the people of England, itself winnowed, sifted and brought to a handful—you may very well remember!"

Having thus obscurely reminded them of what they very clearly remembered, the lord-general went on to characterize the year 1648, more especially, as the "most memorable that ever this nation saw," by reason of "so many insurrections, invasions, secret designs, open and public attempts, quashed in so short a time by the very signal appearances of God himself." He then briefly referred to the defection of the Presbyterians, and their treasonable attempts to treat with the king, "whereby we should have put into his hands all that cause and interest we had opposed, and have had nothing secured to us but a little piece of paper." He next, in a strain of enthusiasm, recalled "what God wrought in Ireland and Scotland, until the Lord had finished all farther trouble upon the matter by the marvellous salvation wrought at Worcester." And then followed that elaborate and worthless attempt to vindicate the dispersion of the Long Parliament which has been elsewhere quoted,* and by which the speaker could scarcely himself have hoped to mystify the apprehensions of his hearers.†

* See anté, p. 516 to p. 519.

† Twelve, as I have already mentioned, had been themselves members of the Long Parliament, but nearly all of these were tools of Cromwell. The nobler occupation of Vane, and others of the chief men of that still great though broken body, has been already glanced at in these pages. A passage from Mrs. Hutchinson's delightful memoirs will more distinctly describe the generous thoughts that supported them in their unmerited exile from power. Speaking of her husband, she says, he was travelling up from his country business, "when news met him upon the road, near London, that Cromwell had broken the Parliament. Notwithstanding, he went on, and found divers of the members there, resolved to submit to this providence of God, and to wait till he should clear their integrity, and to disprove those people who had taxed them of ambition, by sitting still, when they had friends enough in the army, city, and country to have disputed the matter, and probably vanquished these usurpers. They thought that if they should vex the land by war among themselves, the late subdued enemies, Royalists and Presbyterians, would have an opportunity to prevail on their dissensions, to the ruin of both; if these should govern well, and righteously, and moderately, they should enjoy the benefit of their good government, and would not envy them the honourable toil; if they did otherwise, they should be ready to assist and vindicate their oppressed country when the ungrateful people were made sensible of their true champions and protectors. Col. Hutch

* By Carrington, one of his biographers. (Life of Cromwell, p. 151.)

Passing from this subject with the manner of one who had discharged an irksome and painful task, his tone suddenly changed. He addressed himself more directly to the individuals so strangely assembled before him, and declared his persuasion that they were men who knew the Lord. He congratulated them on their sudden call, and told them to be proud that it had not been of their own seeking. "Now do you know," he continued, "that what hath been done in the dissolution of that Parliament was as necessary to be done as the preservation of this cause; and that necessity, that led us to do that, hath brought us to this issue of exercising an extraordinary way and course to draw yourselves together upon this account—that you are men who know the Lord, and have made observations of his marvellous dispensations, and may be trusted with this cause. It remains—for I shall not acquaint you farther with what relates to your taking upon you this great business, that being contained in this paper in my hand, which I do offer presently to you to read—having done that which we thought to have done upon this ground of necessity, which we know was not feigned necessity, but real and true, to the end the government might not be at a loss, to the end we might manifest to the world the singleness of our hearts, and integrity, who did those things, not to grasp after the power ourselves, to keep it in a military hand, no, not for a day, but, as far as God enables us with strength and ability, to put it into the hands that might be called from several parts of the nation—this necessity I say, and we hope may say for ourselves, this integrity, of labouring to divest the sword of the power and authority, in the civil administration of it, hath been that that hath moved us to conclude of this course; and having done that, we think we cannot, with the discharge of our consciences, but offer somewhat unto you, as I said before, for our own exoneration, it having been the practice of others who have voluntarily and out of sense of duty divested themselves, and devolved the government into the hands of others—it having been the practice, where such things have been done, and very consonant to reason, together with the authority, to lay a charge in such a way as we hope we do, and to press to the duty, which we have a word or two to offer to you. Truly God hath called you to this work by, I think, as wonderful providences as ever passed upon the sons of men in so short a time. And truly I think, taking the inson, in his own particular, was very glad of this release from that employment, which he managed with fidelity and uprightness, but not only without delight, but with a great deal of trouble and expense, in the contest for truth and righteousness upon all occasions." Nor can I refrain from giving another extract from the same charming book, which will show what the nature of Colonel Hutchinson's country occupations were. "He carefully attended," his wife says, in a passage which describes as well the country residences of Vane and Scot, "to the administration of justice in the country, and to the putting in execution of those wholesome laws and statutes of the land provided for the orderly regulation of the people. And it was wonderful how, in a short space, he reformed several abuses and customary neglects in that part of the country where he lived, which being a rich, fruitful vale, drew abundance of vagrant people to come and exercise the idle trade of wandering and begging; but he took such courses that there was very suddenly not a beggar left in the country, and all the poor in every town so maintained and provided for as they never were so liberally maintained and relieved before nor since."

arguments of necessity (for the government must not fall)—take the appearances of the will of God in this thing—I am sure you would have been loth it should have been resigned into the hands of wicked men and enemies. I am sure God would not have it so. It comes, therefore, to you by way of necessity; it comes to you by the way of the wise providence of God, though through weak hands; and therefore I think, it coming through our hands, though such as we are, it may not be taken ill if we offer to you something as to the discharge of that trust which is incumbent upon you. And although I seem to speak that which may have the face of a charge, it is a very humble one; and he that speaks it means to be a servant to you who are called to the exercise of the supreme authority—to discharge that which he conceives is his duty, in his own and his fellows' names, to you, who will, I hope, take it in good part. And truly I shall not hold you long in that, because I hope it is written in your hearts to approve yourselves to God; only this scripture I shall remember to you, which hath been much upon my spirit: Hosea, xi., ver. 12: 'Yet Judah ruleth with God, and is faithful among the saints.' It is said before, 'Ephraim did compass God about with lies, and Israel with deceit.' How God hath been compassed about with fastings, and thanksgivings, and other exercises and transactions, I think we have all to lament. Why, truly, you are called by God to rule with him and for him, and you are called to be faithful with the saints, who have been somewhat instrumental to your call! 'He that ruleth over men,' the Scripture saith, 'he must be just, ruling in the fear of God.'

One very cool inference may be detected in the midst of all this enthusiastic heat. It is clear that, in so emphatically divesting the sword of all power and authority, he meant it to go forth to the world that, in the event of any unexpected dissolution of the present "supreme authority," it would be impossible for the "council of officers" again to consider itself competent to provide for the weal and happiness of the nation. Some new government must then be formed, of a nature till then untied. He had himself appeared in the council-chamber that day to separate the sword forever from the retention of power over the state, and to profess that his fellow-officers as well as himself were thenceforward only servants to an authority more supreme.

Proceeding to that "humble charge," which now included all the duty that he and those officers, servants of the state, had to offer to its governors, he enforced the great advice, which still and always, in his worst temper, as in his most worthy, declared the greatness of his mind. He would pray, he said, that they might "exercise the judgment of mercy and truth," and still be "faithful to the saints," however those saints might differ respecting forms of worship. "It is better," he continued, "to pray for you, than to counsel you in that, that you may exercise the judgment of mercy and truth! I say, it is better for you to do it than to advise you; better to ask wisdom from heaven for you, which I am confident many thousands of saints do this day, and have done, and will do, through the permission of God, and his assistance to advise you ! Only, truly, I thought of a scripture likewise, that seems to be but a scripture of common application to every man as a Christian, wherein he is counselled to ask wisdom ; and he is told what is that wisdom that is from above : ' it is pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of good fruits, without partiality, without hypocrisy.' And my thoughts ran thus upon this, that the executing of the judgment of truth, for that is the judgment that you must have wisdom from above for, and that is pure, and that will teach you to execute the judgment of truth ; then, if God give you hearts to be easy to be entreated, to be peaceable spirits, to be full of good fruits, bearing good fruits to the nation, to men as men, to the people of God, to all in their several stations—this wisdom will teach you to execute the judgment of mercy and truth ; and I have little more to say to this ; I shall rather bend my prayers for you in that behalf (as I said before), and I know many others do also. Truly, the judgment of truth will teach you to be as just towards an unbeliever as towards a believer ; and it is our duty to be so. I confess, I have often said it foolishly, if I would miscarry, I would rather do it to a believer than to an unbeliever ; perhaps it is a paradox ; but let us take heed of doing it to either, exercising injustice to either. If God fill our heart with such a spirit as Moses and Paul had, which was not only a spirit for the believers among the people of God, but for the whole people (he would have died for them ; and so Paul to his countrymen according to the flesh, he would have died for them), truly, this will help us to execute the judgment of truth, and mercy also.

In the same truly beneficent spirit, however confusedly expressed, of religious toleration—that first and most sacred principle of civil government—Cromwell added this earnest and touching exhortation : " I hope, whatever others may think, it ought to be to us all matter of rejoicing, that as one person, our Saviour, was touched with our infirmities, that he might be pitiful, I do think this assembly, thus called, is very much touched with the common infirmity of the saints ; and I hope that will teach you to pity others, that so saints of one sort may not be our interest, but that we may have respect unto all, though of different judgments ; and if I did seem to speak anything that might seem to reflect upon those of the Presbyterian judgment, I think, if you have not an interest of love for them, you will hardly answer this faithfulness to his saints. I confess, in my pilgrimage, and some exercises I have had abroad, I did read that scripture often, in Isaiah, xli., 19, when God gave me and some of my fellows what he would do there and elsewhere, which he performed for us ; and what would he do ? To what end ? ' That he might plant in the wilderness the cedar, and the shittah-tree, and the myrtle-tree, and the palm-tree together.' To what end ? ' That they might know, and consider, and understand together that the hand of the Lord hath done this ;' and that the Lord hath created it ; that he wrought all salvation and deliverance, which he hath wrought, for the good of the whole flock ; therefore I beseech you (but I think I need not), have a care of the whole flock ; love all the sheep, love the lambs all ; and tender all, and cherish all, and countenance all, in all things that are good ; and if the poorest Christian, the most mistaken Christian, should desire to live peaceably and quietly under you, soberly and humbly desire to lead a life in godliness and honesty, let him be protected ! . . . I think I need as little advise you concerning the propagation of the Gospel, and encouraging such ministers and such a ministry as are faithful in the land, upon whom the true character is ; men that have truly received the spirit for such a use ; which Christians will be well able to discern, and do ; men that have received gifts from him that ascended on high, and led captivity captive, for the work before mentioned. And truly the apostle, Romans, xii., when he hath summoned up all the mercies of God, and the goodness of God, and hath discoursed of the foundations of the Gospel, and of the several things that are the subject of his discourse, in the eleven first chapters ; after he hath besought them to offer up their souls and bodies a living sacrifice to God, he beseecheth them not to esteem more highly of themselves than they ought ; but that they would be humble, and sober-minded, and not stretch themselves beyond their line, but they would have a care to those that had received gifts to the uses there mentioned. I speak not—it is far from my heart—for a ministry, deriving itself through the papacy, and pretending to that which is so much insisted upon to be succession. The true succession is through the spirit, given in that measure that the spirit is given ; and that is a right succession. But I need not discourse of these things to you ; I am persuaded you are taught of God in a greater measure than myself in those things ; indeed, I have but one word more to say, and that is (though in that, perhaps, I shall show my weakness), it is by way of encouragement to you to go on in this work."

But most striking and characteristic of all were the closing passages of this extraordinary address, where, kindling into an apparent passion of enthusiastic fervour, Cromwell spoke as if Futurity had suddenly revealed her secrets to his soul. The only war in England hereafter, he exclaimed, should be that of the Lamb against his enemies ! To the very threshold of the door, to the edge of the promises and prophecies, they had come at last ! Out of the depths of the sea God was about to bring home his people—even the very Jews themselves he would bring home to their station out of the isles of the sea ! And all this was to be the work of the men he saw before him, who had probably never seen each other's faces till that day, but who had answered a divine and miraculous call—who had owned Jesus Christ, and whom Jesus Christ had owned ! No man living would have thought, three little months before, to have seen such a company taking upon them the supreme authority ! But they had been called with a high call, and would do all that the good English people wished to bring them to their liberties ! I subjoin in detail these singular passages. They express, to its uttermost depths, the character of Cromwell, in its most startling phases of profound artifice and profounder self-delusion. No one, with a knowledge of the result that followed on so fast, can fail to discover in them the violent self-seeker, alternately quieting his nerves and encouraging his passions with a selfish religious creed, but yielding, in the same instant, to just so much of sincere delusion as the faith in his own immense power was likely to generate in such a man, and to just so much of real enthusiasm as can never be wholly separated, even in its falsest phrensies, from a mind of that peculiar order. Still be it kept in view, that through all, whether true or false, there yet sprang up his own advantage and advancement. There was no danger to him in revealing a false futurity, since by his own side he held fast the key of the true one; but how dangerous to those elect legislators, that they should be made responsible for blessings, over the generation of which they were soon to have no control, and that the people, to whom they were to give a new life of power and love, should speedily be fated to discover them incapable of common self-existence! In that mean position they were placed by these rhapsodies from Cromwell, to which they listened this day, no doubt, in unsuspecting gratitude.

"I confess I never looked to see such a day as this, it may be nor you, when Jesus Christ shall be owned, as he is this day and in this world. Jesus Christ is owned this day by you all, and you own him by your willingness in appearing here; and you manifest this (as far as poor creatures can) to be a day of the power of Christ by your willingness. I know you remember that scripture in Psalm cx., 3. The people shall be willing in the day of thy power. God doth manifest it to be a day of the power of Jesus Christ!"

"Having through so much blood, and so many trials as have been upon these nations, made this to be one of the greatest issues thereof, to have a people called to the supreme authority upon such an avowed account, God hath owned his Son by this; and you, by your willingness, do own Jesus Christ; and therefore, for my part, I confess I did never look to see such a sight. Perhaps you are not known by face one to another; but we must tell you this, that indeed we have not allowed ourselves in the choice of one person in whom we had not this good hope that there was faith in Jesus Christ, and love unto all his saints and people. And thus God hath owned you in the face and eyes of the world; and thus, by your coming hither, you have owned him, as it is in Isaiah, xliii., 21. It is a high expression, and look to your own hearts whether now or hereafter God shall apply it to you. 'This people,' saith he, 'I have formed for myself, that they might show forth my praise.' It is a memorable place, and, I hope, not unfitly applied; God apply it to each of your hearts. I shall not descend upon the words; they are plain. You are as like the forming of God as ever people were. If any man should ask you one by one, and should tender a book to you, you would dare to swear that neither directly nor indirectly did you seek to come hither. You have been passive in coming hither, in being called hither, and that is an active word—'This people I have formed.' Consider the circumstances by which you are called together; through what difficulties, through what strivings, through what blood, you are come hither. Neither you nor I, nor no man living, three months ago, had a thought to have seen such a company, taking upon them, or, rather, being called to the supreme authority, and therefore know now your call!"

"Indeed I think, as it may be truly said, that never was a supreme authority, consisting of so numerous a body as you are, which, I believe, are above one hundred and forty, ever in such a way of owning God and being owned by him, and therefore I say also, never a people formed for such a purpose (so called), if it were time to compare your standing with those that have been called by the suffrages of the people. Who can tell how soon God may FIT THE PEOPLE for such a thing, and who would desire anything more in the world but that it might be so? I would all the Lord's people were prophets—I would they were fit to be called, and FIT TO CALL; and it is the longing of our hearts to see them once own the interest of Jesus Christ. And give me leave to say, if I know anything in the world, what is there more like to win the people to the interest and love of God—nay, what a duty will lie upon you, to have your conversation such as that they may love you, that they may see you lay out your time and spirits for them? Is not this the most likely way to bring them to their liberties? And do you not, by this, put it upon God to find the time and the season for it, by pouring forth his spirit; at least by convincing them that, as men fearing God have fought them out of their thralldom and bondage under the royal power, so men fearing God rule them in the fear of God, and take care to administer good unto them? But this is some digression. I say, own your call, for indeed it is marvellous, and it is of God, and it hath been unprojected, unthought of by you and us; and that hath been the way God hath dealt with us all along, to keep things from our eyes, that what we have acted we have seen nothing before us, which also is a witness, in some measure, to our integrity. I say, you are called with a high call! And why should you be afraid to say or think that this way may be the door to usher in things that God hath promised and prophesied of, and to set the hearts of his people to wait for and expect? We know who they are that shall war with the Lamb against his enemies. They shall be a people, called, chosen, and faithful; and in the military way (we must speak it without flattery), I believe you know it, he hath acted with them and for them, and now in the civil power and authority; and these are not ill prognostications for that good we wait for. Indeed, I do think something is at the door; we are at the threshold; and therefore it becomes us to lift up our heads, and to encourage ourselves in the Lord; and we have some of us thought it our duty to endeavour this way, not vainly looking on that prophecy in Daniel, 'And the kingdom shall not be delivered to another people.' Truly God hath wrought it into your hands by his owning, and blessing, and calling out a military power; God hath persuaded their hearts to be instrumental in calling you, and this hath been set upon our hearts, and upon all the faithful in the land; it may be that it is not our duty to deliver it over to any other people, and that scripture may be fulfilling now to us. But I may be beyond my line.

"But I thank God I have my hopes exercised in these things, and so I am persuaded are yours. Truly, seeing that these things are so, that you are at the edge of the promises and prophecies at least, if there were neither promise for this nor prophecy, you are coveting the best things, endeavouring after the best things; and, as I have said elsewhere, if I were to choose the meanest officer in the army or Commonwealth, I would choose a godly man that hath principles, especially where trust is to be committed, because I know where to have a man that hath principles. I believe if any man of you should choose a servant, you would do so; and I would all our magistrates were so chosen, that there may be some effects of this. It is our duty to choose men that fear the Lord, to praise the Lord, yea, such as the Lord forms for himself, and he expects not praises from others. This being so, puts me in mind of another scripture, Psal. lxxviii., which indeed is a glorious prophecy, and I am persuaded of the Gospel, or it may be of the Jews; also there it is prophesied, 'He will bring his people again out of the depths of the sea, as once he led Israel through the Red Sea;' and it may be, some do think God is bringing the Jews home to their station from the isles of the sea! Surely, when God sets up the glory of the Gospel-church, it shall be gathering people out of deep waters, out of the multitude of waters! such are his people, drawn out of the multitudes of the nations and people of the world! And that psalm will be very glorious in many other parts of it, 'When he gave the word, great was the company of them that published it. Kings of the armies did fly apace, and she that tarried at home divided the spoil. And, although ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.' And, indeed, the triumph of that psalm is exceeding high and great, and God is accomplishing it! and the close of it closeth with my heart, and I am persuaded will with yours also! 'God shakes hills and mountains, and they reel; and God hath a hill too, and his hill is as the hill of Bashan, and the chariots of God are twenty thousand of angels, and God will dwell upon this hill forever.'"

Relapsing into his ordinary manner, the lord-general added these words: "Truly I am sorry that I have troubled you, in such a place of heat as this is, so long; all that I have to say in mine own name, and in the names of my fellow-officers, who have joined with me in this work, is, that we shall commend you to the grace of God and to the guidance of his Spirit; having thus far served you, or, rather, our Lord Jesus Christ in it, we are, as we hope, and shall be, ready in our stations, according as the providence of God shall lead us, to be subservient to the work of God, and the authority which, we reckon, God hath set over us. And although we have no formal thing to present you with, to which the hands and outward visible expressions of the hearts of the officers of the three nations are set, yet we may say for them, and we may also, with confidence, for our brethren at sea, with whom, neither in Scotland, nor Ireland, nor at sea, hath any artifice been used to persuade their approbations to this work; yet we can say that their consent and affections hath flowed in to us from all parts beyond our expectations; and we are confident we may say with all confidence that we have had their approbations and full consent, unsought indeed to the other work, so that you have their hearts and affections in this; and not only they, but we have very many papers from the churches of God throughout the nation, wonderfully both approving what hath been done in removing obstacles, and approving what we have done in this very thing. And, having said this, I shall trouble you no more; but if you will be pleased that this instrument may be read, which I have signed by the advice of the council of officers, we shall then leave you to your own thoughts and to the guidance of God, to order and dispose of yourselves for further meetings as you shall see cause."

Having thus closed this memorable address, this "grave, Christian, and seasonable speech," as his contemporary historian* terms it, he placed upon the table a formal instrument, engrossed on parchment, and bearing his hand and seal, by which, with the advice of his council of officers, he developed and intrusted the supreme authority and government of the Commonwealth into the hands of the persons there met, and declared that they were to be acknowledged for that authority, to whom all persons within this nation should yield obedience and subjection; that they were to sit till the 3d of November, 1654; and that, three months before that time, they should make choice of other persons to succeed them, who were not to sit longer than twelve months, and were then to determine respecting the succession of the government.†

And now, to all outward appearance, Cromwell stood in the proud position of one who, having virtually held the supreme government of England for upward of six weeks, had freely surrendered it from himself forever, and intrusted it to a convention of able, faithful, high-spirited, and holy men, with whom were to rest, not only the appointment of their successors in power, but the entire disposal of his own poor services, due, as from a private man, to the supreme governors of his country. His

* Carrington.

† It is a remarkable circumstance that this Instrument of Government, of the date of the 4th of July, 1653, is nowhere to be found in the state records of the time. It has perished with the act for dissolving the Long Parliament and providing a new representative. The following, however, is the official description of the instrument, in the Mercurius Politicus. After a brief sketch of Cromwell's speech, the writer says, "Which being ended, his lordship produced an instrument under his own hand and seal, whereby he did, with the advice of his officers, devolve and intrust the supreme authority and government of this Commonwealth into the hands of the persons there met; who, or any forty of them, are to be held and acknowledged the supreme authority of the nation; unto whom all persons within the same, and the territories thereunto belonging, are to yield obedience and subjection. And they are not to sit longer than the 3d of November, 1654. Three months before their dissolution, they are to make choice of other persons to succeed them, who are not to sit longer than a twelvemonth; but it is left to them to take care for a succession in government: which instrument being delivered to the persons aforesaid, his lordship commended them to the grace of God." Mr. Godwin not unfairly suggests it as an artifice of Cromwell, that while the authority of this assembly stood on so precarious a footing, he ostentatiously gave them an existence of sixteen months, adding twelve months more for their successors, that he might thus render their imbecility more apparent, and excite in his countrymen an anxious wish for a government more stable, and that should command a greater degree of respect at home and abroad.

resignation had been accompanied with all the forms that could declare it final and irrevocable. A fixed term was named for the existence of the present authority, and in the nomination of their successors he had reserved no personal control. Nay, more: a majority of those into whose hands he had just placed the Instrument of Government were men, as the result soon after proved, of whom his personal knowledge was little, and his means of personal influence or control still less. Finally, he had not reserved to himself a seat in their councils, nor cared to stipulate that even his officers should sit there. He had submitted in all things, and exacted in nothing. As lord-general of the army, he remained, indeed, servant to the state. In a political sense, he was nothing more than the brewer's son of Huntingdon.

Yet, if the majority present had only thought more of earth and less of heaven, it might have been manifest to all that Cromwell stood in that room on the threshold of his most ambitious designs, that his golden dream was wellnigh out, and that the glittering bawble he had so long set his heart upon was at last settling itself upon his head. There had been something in his manner, while he offered all these humble sacrifices, which half betrayed the secret of his soul. As his fancy kindled into the later and more passionate raptures of the exhortation, a characteristic incident was noted, which Lord Leicester has recorded in his journal. "He grew very hot," his lordship writes, "and put off his cloak, and gave it to one of the colonels, who took it, and held it like a servant. This was done as the king would sometimes do in great assemblies, but no man else."

The colonels, indeed, knew it all—every man who had been nominated by Cromwell himself to that convention knew it—and each had his part to play. A still larger body of honest men remained, and honest and enthusiastic as they were, they too had their parts to play. The instruments of Cromwell's ambition were as often sincere as false. His favourite policy was to win open trust, and pay it back with secret treachery. But such trust is most frequent in the true, and it was accordingly yet more by means of the honest than of the base that he strode into his throne. Here was a majority of honest and not unwise fanatics. He could rely upon their mode of action. He knew that they would conduct their proceedings as if the Divinity himself had, indeed, called them to their office. He had nothing of stratagem to fear from them. He knew that with himself they would keep the faith of honest men, if not of politic ones. He had in any case provided, besides, a secret current of counteraction against them in a formidable minority of their own body—a safety-valve in the moment of danger, which with his own hand he could shut or open. Their first legislative efforts, he was well aware, would raise formidable discontents in the people against them; the divine call he had imposed upon them was a death-warrant to class-interests, which would at once range themselves in fierce opposition; the lawyers, from the commonest scrivener up to the Lord-commissioner Whitelocke, would be called to arms for their fees; the ecclesiastical ministry and their patrons would be summoned forth in defence of advowsons and of tithes; the officers would have good reason to tremble for the security of their recent endowments; and what protection would all these think of in their hour of alarm, if not of that which he could afford them? He knew himself their sole refuge. Thus would vanish the last solid resistance to his daring project—and he had found far more conscientious resistance to it, even among his own relatives and creatures, than he had been at all prepared for—and he might ascend the chair of the Protectorate as indeed the saviour of the state, the protector of her interests, the sole apparent refuge of her civil and religious institutions, the composer of her quarrels and confusion, the harbinger of order and of peace. And this was the grave cheat of the 4th of July, 1653.

When Cromwell and his officers had left the room, it was merely voted that the Convention should meet on the following morning at eight o'clock, in the old Parliament House at Westminster. There and then they met accordingly, and devoted the greater part of the day to prayers.* "And the service," one of the body relates to us, "was performed by the members among themselves, eight or ten speaking in prayer to God, and some briefly from the word; much of the presence of Christ and his Spirit appearing that day, to the great gladdening of the hearts of many; some affirming they never enjoyed so much of the spirit and presence of Christ in any of the meetings and exercises of religion in all their lives as they did that day."†

After this auspicious commencement of their legislative duties, they elected a speaker in the person of Mr. Francis Rouse, a Devonshire man, of very good fortune, and provost of Eton College. They then separated for that day.

The record of the second day's proceedings has a more business-like aspect. After prayer, much more brief, which, according to the author of the "Exact Relation," "was daily performed by one member or other, as they were found free to perform it, they proceeded to call over the House; read and laid up the instrument of their empowering; chose a clerk,‡ and after a sergeant-at-arms; and chose a committee to consider what offices and attendants were necessary to be taken in, and to consider of the fees and salaries of such as should be employed; which, accordingly, was done and confirmed by the House." Their next action tended to show the correctness of the judgment formed by Cromwell. They sent a deputation, headed by Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, to invite the lord-general himself,§ the three major-generals, Harrison, Desborough, and Lambert, with Colonel Thomlinson, to assist in their deliberations as members of the House. This invitation was of course graciously accepted.

On the following day they voted that all ad-

* This fervent religious exercise lasted from eight o'clock in the morning till seven o'clock in the evening. The Dutch delegates then in London, however, carnal self-seekers as they were, transmitted to their Republic no other note of the prayers preferred than that one member prayed for a peace with the high and mighty states, their constituents.

† Exact Relation.

‡ Scobell was continued in this office, and Birkhead elected sergeant-at-arms.

§ They renewed to the lord-general also the offer of the palace of Hampton Court, in exchange for his house at Newhall.

dresses should be made to them under the name of "the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England." This passed by a division of sixty-five to forty-six. Their next movement of importance was the appointment of a new council of state, which they resolved should consist of thirty-one members. They left the old thirteen untouched, adding eighteen more. The mere names in this council would suffice to repress the favourite imputations of slander against its framers, since they made no effort to thrust members into it who had not already some public consideration or importance.* Two days after its appointment, another entire sitting of the House was devoted to prayer, "which accordingly," the "Exact Relation" tells us, "was done by the members, principally by such as had not done service before, when also the lord-general was present, and it was a very comfortable day." The practice after this period seems to have been very regularly observed, that, as soon as about twelve members were met, they began with prayer, and so continued praying, one after another, till a sufficient number had assembled to make up a House, when the speaker took the chair.

A special prayer-day, that is, a day entirely devoted to prayer, had generally a special object. Thus we find among the proceedings that on the 12th, "the House having spent the day before in prayer to God for his counsel and direction in their affairs, a committee was appointed to draw up a declaration, to invite the people of this Commonwealth to seek unto the Lord for the same blessing." This paper soon after appeared, and was sent round, for immediate promulgation, to all the various sheriffs and civil officers throughout England. Great care is taken in it to abstain from reflection or remark on the conduct or the dissolution of the late Parliament, and no other reference is made to the summons by which they had themselves assembled than in the simple statement, that, being in an extraordinary manner called together, and required to assume the supreme government, they had judged it meet and requisite to take upon themselves the charge assigned. They farther remark, that though, "compassed about," as they were, "with much weakness and human frailty," they were tender of pressing covenants and engagements on the people, yet they expected and believed that all peaceable and good citizens would conduct themselves suitably to the protection they looked for from the present authority. They were ample in expressing their purpose to proceed in all things as might best conduce to the good of all, and in declaring the watchfulness they would in every respect exercise. We will be as tender, they said, "of the lives, estates, liberties, just rights and properties of all others as we are of ourselves and our posterities, whom we expect still to be governed by successive Parliaments." Some remarkable passages followed. They revealed, though in language of noble elevation, that statesmanship was to be attended hereafter with certain mysterious and extravagant results, which men could never have dreamed of, until then. They fairly proclaimed the approaching advent of a reign of saints. They marked themselves out, in the midst of much honesty, and not a little of the true sense of government's wisest functions, as at once the instruments and the victims of Cromwell. Lest the people should think too highly of the means they were about to display of conferring happiness and order on the land, they declared at the very outset that the ultimate end they had in view was one which was utterly unattainable. But in no mean or vulgar strain was this done—in nothing of the debased spirit of fanaticism which has been attributed to them—but in language which was worthy of even the sublime source from which they sought its inspiration, and with a simplicity of soul which, while it too surely disclosed the sincerity of their own delusions, spoke not less surely for the proportionate success of Cromwell's scheme.

After calling the attention of the people to the great works recently done in England, "which have much filled all our enemies with amazement and our friends with admiration," they thus proceed: "Yet we cannot but acknowledge that we are not yet at rest, nor can believe we have yet enjoyed or seen enough to accomplish the ends of God, or satisfy the thoughts of men for that vast expense of blood and treasure, which could not have been endured with any patience but in hope that, at length, those bitter pangs and throes would make some way for that long-expected birth of peace, freedom, and happiness, both to the souls and bodies of the Lord's people; and although we do not see it fully brought forth, yet we do not despair but in God's due time it shall be so; and the dark black clouds of the night shall fly before the bright morning star, and the shakings of heaven and earth make way for the desire of all nations! Nay, there are many things which make us hope the time is near at hand. We see the clouds begin to scatter, and the dark shadows fly away! streams of light appear, and the day is surely dawning!"

Pursuing this through other scriptural allusions, they added, with a noble fervour, "And as we believe the Lord hath never yet stepped back, or withdrawn his mighty arm after he had gone so far and done so much, and had made his people willing and desirous still to follow him, so, we also hope, his great and free goodness will not forsake his people here, or suffer them to forsake him, or to deal falsely with him in his cause, till he hath accomplished his great works, and brought about his great ends, whose gifts and callings are without repentance! Is the Lord's hand shortened, that he cannot save? Is he a man, that he should turn, repent, withdraw, or look back? Shall he bring to the birth, and shall he not give strength enough to bring forth? He is the same God, and changeth not; and if this be of God, it shall stand ; and let every one take heed of fighting against God. This is all we say. If it be from God, let him prosper and bless it ; but if not, let it fall, though we fall before it."

* I subjoin the list: Oliver Cromwell, lord-general; John Lambert, major-general; Thomas Harrison, major-general; John Desborough, major-general; Colonel Anthony Stapely; Colonel William Sydenham; Colonel Philip Jones; Colonel Matthew Thomlinson; Colonel Robert Bennet; Sir Gilbert Pickering, Bart.; Walter Strickland; John Carew; Samuel Moyer; Richard Salway; Lord-viscount Lisle; Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Bart.; Sir Charles Wolseley, Bart.; Sir James Hope; Lieutenant-general Charles Fleetwood; Colonel John Hewson; Colonel Henry Lawrence; Colonel Richard Norton; Edward Montague; Charles Howard; Alderman Tichborn; Richard Major; Hugh Courteney; Thomas St. Nicholas; Dennis Hollister; Andrew Broughton; John Williams.

In the same spirit of exalted humility and faith they thus concluded. "However it shall please the Lord," they said, "to do by us or to deal with us, yet we humbly desire that ourselves and all the people of God may be still faithful and fervent with him, wrestling in prayers and supplications till he shall fully raise up his own tabernacle, and build his temple with his own spirit, which he hath promised to pour upon all flesh ! and raise up governors after his own heart, and teachers after his own will, to make exactors peace, and officers righteousness ! that he may overcome the evil of the world with his goodness, and fill the whole earth with his glory ! that his will may be done on earth as now in heaven ! that righteousness may spring out of the earth, and may dwell here, and righteousness and peace may kiss each other ! that all his people may have one lip, one heart, one consent, and one shoulder to bow down and worship him ! that the envy of Judah and Ephraim may be taken away, and that they may be one of the same fold with one shepherd ! that all wars may cease to the ends of the earth, and that all nations may turn their swords and spears into ploughshares and pruning-hooks ! that the wolf may feed with the lamb, and that the earth be full of the knowledge of God as waters cover the sea ! that upon every house or assembly may be a cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night, as is promised, and was of old upon the tabernacle ! that every one may be holy, and the pots, nay, the bells upon the horses, may be holiness to the Lord ! and that in peace and joy we may all wait, expect, and long for his glorious coming, who is King of kings and Lord of lords, our hope and righteousness ; who is still to ride on prosperously, conquering and to conquer, till he hath subdued all his enemies, and at length come to deliver up the kingdom to his Father, that God may reign, and be all in all."

The day after the issue of this extraordinary address was famous for the first movement in the House against tithes—that grand and primary source of contention, which stood in the way of the universal peace they promised. For several successive days the discussion on the subject was continued, but without any fixed result,* and the matter was at last referred to a special committee. The law and its grievances were doomed next, and, in entire realization of all that was anticipated by Cromwell, the work of provoking class-hostilities went indeed bravely on.

On one day alone, the 20th of July, eleven

* The author of the "Exact Relation" describes what the chief difference was, and marks also the wise and sober judgment which relieved even the wildest projects of these singular men. "Whereas all the House, for the most part, were sensible that tithe was a grievance fit to be removed, the difference was, some would not give way to the removal of it till some other thing were provided to be set in the room of it [this was precisely the state of the question on the dissolution of the Long Parliament] ; others would have it removed as a grievance in the first place, and then to make provision as God should direct. In the debate, difference was made betwixt improprisors and that which was otherwise ; and all seemed free and willing that improprisors should be satisfied the value ; and therefore, upon the choosing of a committee for tithes, only that of incumbents was to be considered of."

important questions were referred to as many committees. Two of these committees, for the affairs of Ireland and Scotland, had been named on the ninth, but they were now organized afresh, with some trifling alterations, and the names of Cromwell and Lambert inserted in the first, which had before stood only in the second. The other committees were for the law, the army, the revenue, petitions, trade and corporations, the poor and commissions of the peace, public debts and frauds, prisons, and the advancement of learning. The names of Cromwell and Lambert were in none of these. Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper was the first person named on the committee of the law. He was also on the committee for the advancement of learning. Barbone, represented by all the histories to have been so active and forward in everything, that he was, in fact, the "all in all" of the assembly, was only of the committee for petitions. A committee on the great subject of tithes had been named on the day preceding. The committees varied in the number of their members from twelve to nineteen.*

Leaving them for a while to their memorable duties, it is right that we should now record the incidents which marked the interval between the issue of the writs and their meeting in obedience to them, while the military council still held supreme power. These councils, as we already have had occasion to state, divided among themselves and their great chief all the necessary acts of government. They appointed a committee of five to finish the treaty begun by the statesmen with the Portuguese ambassador, Don Pantaleon Sa. To the same committee it was referred to consider of the treaty with the resident from France, M. de Bordeaux. The agent of the Duke of Tuscany was met by another committee, similarly appointed. But the main occurrences of the time were their reception of, and their negotiation with, the ambassadors of the United Provinces, who came, after a new battle of the 2d of June, to solicit peace, and their conduct on the sudden return of John Lilburne.†

One of the noblest of the legacies left by the Long Parliament to their destroyer was the great and well-appointed fleet by which they had already, in all essential respects, broken the strength of the Dutch, and one of Cromwell's first acts of power was the substitution of Monk for Blake in its chief command.‡ Distrusting the stanch Republicanism of Blake, he obviously apprehended some hostile movement from him when he should hear of the deed that had been done. Yet had that great commander, in the course he really took, administered to Cromwell and his creatures an ever-memorable lesson. As soon as the news of the forcible dispersion of his friends and associates reached him, he directed an order to be issued throughout the fleet, that "it was not the business of seamen to mind state affairs, but to keep foreigners from fooling us."* There, as in every other action of the life of Blake, spoke out the heroic spirit which moved, in later but not such glorious years, the passionate love and admiration of the English people at the mention of the name of Nelson. Monk was already on his way to assume supreme command, but Blake not less cheerfully submitted to command under him.

* The author of the "Exact Relation" says, "Then the House was methodized into several committees, for the better despatch of business, so as none might be idle, but all employed in public service. Besides the council of state, six or seven committees were chosen and set to work—the committee for the army, the committee for prisons and prisoners, the committee for regulating the law, the committee for justices and for the poor, the committee for public debts, the committee for the Scots and Irish affairs, the committee for petitions—which committees sat daily, and took great pains, morning and evening, almost every day in the week, to despatch business, and make things ready for the House ; and many things were fitted and prepared."

† See ante, notes to p. 521, 522.

‡ Clarendon thus describes the three admirals. "Blake, a man well known, but not thought entirely enough devoted to Cromwell ; Monk, whom he called out of Scotland as his own creature ; and Dean ; a mere seaman, grown from a common mariner to the reputation of a bold and excellent officer."

News of greater promise, or received with greater rapture, than that which told of the dissolution of the formidable Parliament of statesmen, was never heard in the Dutch Commonwealth. They seem to have beheld already England at their feet. Resolved, at all events, to make a strenuous effort to bring her there, they at once renewed their shattered fleets; and Van Tromp having safely convoyed the outward-bound trade of Holland, returned immediately with a force of a hundred sail to seek the English on their own coasts. He was accompanied by De Ruyter, De Witt, and Evertsens.

Monk, assisted by Dean, Penn, and Lawson, met the Dutch admiral off the North Foreland with about an equal number of ships. The action began on the 2d of June, and lasted for two entire days. On the night of the first, it was found that the Dutch had lost two sail; but for this superiority the English had paid a heavy price in the death of their great admiral, Dean. Struck, at the very commencement of the action, by a chain shot from the Dutch vice-admiral's ship, he fell lifeless at the feet of Monk. He was a man so worshipped by the seamen, from the midst of whom he sprung, that the knowledge of his fate at such a time might have turned the fortune of the fight. But the cool sagacity of Monk did not desert him. Quietly unfastening the cloak he wore, he dropped it over the dead body, and went on with the issue of his orders as though Dean had merely turned aside. The English seamen, unconscious of the fall of their beloved commander, fought with their accustomed gallantry; and before the dawn of the morning of the third, Blake's arrival, with eighteen ships, placed the issue beyond farther doubt. Van Tromp fought on that day with the most determined courage; but Blake's arrival acted as a panic to his fleet; his orders were disobeyed; several of his captains fled in confusion from the superior fire of their opponents;† and he was ultimately obliged to seek shelter within the Wielings, and along the shallow coast of Zeeland. Eleven of his ships had been captured, eight sunk, and two blown up with gunpowder; 1300 of his men had been left behind him as prisoners, and in proportion, on his side, were the killed and wounded. The English loss was slight in comparison.

Cromwell received this news, which arrived in London before the meeting of the Convention, with transports of rapture. It was not his victory—it was the victory of the government he had overthrown*—of the statesmen he had pursued with ridicule and insult: it was more especially the result of those exertions of Vane which had drawn down his signal hatred on that statesman—but it was an occurrence of superior good fortune, of which none knew better to avail themselves than he; and in every quarter of the country he ordered it to be proclaimed as a sudden manifestation of the Lord, an "answer to the faith and prayer of God's people." His council issued at the same time, on his suggestion, a declaration of extraordinary fervour, in which the whole people of England were called upon to set apart a day of public thanksgiving to the Almighty for such singular mercies. We shall conclude our exhortation, they said, with that of David: "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy. O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever. Let Israel now say that his mercy endureth forever. Let the house of Aaron now say that his mercy endureth forever. Let them now, that fear the Lord, say, that his mercy endureth forever. O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever." As the people heard such thanks proclaimed by order of the sheriffs in every English county, they might well indeed suspend all anger or impatience at the recent extraordinary change in wondering expectancy of a coming reign of sanctities and blessings!

On the 22d of June, twenty days after the victory, ambassadors from Holland arrived in London to negotiate for peace. Cromwell, still the holder of supreme power, received them coldly. On the 24th, the body of Admiral Dean arrived in the Thames, and Cromwell issued orders for its conveyance into London with every possible demonstration of gratitude, affection, and honour. A long line of mourning barges filled the river from Greenwich to Westminster Bridge, and as the body passed, all the ships upon the Thames, answered by minute guns from the Tower, offered it respect and reverence. In the evening of the same day it received state-burial, by torchlight, in the Abbey of Westminster; and Cromwell, "with all the officers of the army and navy then in town," attended as chief mourners. Thus early in his

* This is not denied by impartial historians. "The fleet," says Dr. Lingard, "owed its success to the exertions of the government which Cromwell had overthrown."

† Such, for example, as the proposed sale of Hampton Court, during Vane's remarkable exertions towards the preparation of this great fleet. It remains undeniable, and to the immortal honour of that eminent politician, that the greatest glories of our unrivalled English navy date from the naval administration over which Vane presided.

‡ The admirers and partisans of Cromwell were very busy on the appearance of this declaration in pointing to it as a striking proof of the humility and single-mindedness of the lord-general, that the people were invited, and not commanded, to the duty of thanksgiving. Whitelocke himself has the following remark concerning it: "It took the more," he says, "with many people, because it was not a command, and imposing upon men, but only an invitation of them to keep a day of public thanksgiving."

* Lives, English and Foreign, vol. ii., p. 109.

† It would seem, from the letters in Thurlow, that the English fought at the distance of half cannon shot till the enemy fell into confusion, and began to fly, when their disabled ships were surrounded and captured by the English frigates.

reign of power did this remarkable man demonstrate a rare administrative capacity. His unexampled honours to the memory of a commander so beloved, who had sprung from among the common sailors, and was venerated in an especial manner by all classes of the people, won for himself no little sympathy and gratitude: his repulsive treatment of the Dutch ambassadors propitiated the general pride.

Some circumstances connected with this Dutch embassy should not be omitted. As soon as Blake's great victory off the Isle of Portland became known in Holland, a general importunity had risen for peace, not less in the merchant classes than among the common people. Ambassadors for the management of a treaty were accordingly named. With the dissolution of the Long Parliament, however, and the tidings of hope it carried to all the enemies of England, hope revived in Holland also,* and the embassy was temporarily suspended. Again these anticipations fell when it was seen that Blake and the seamen had not deserted the new government, but accepted service under Monk; and again the Dutch implored their States for peace. It was accordingly resolved that the ambassadors formerly named should proceed to discharge their mission; but before they arrived in London, Van Tromp had provoked Monk to engage, with the disastrous result I have described; and, instead of presenting themselves on their arrival as men who might reasonably, from the chief of a new government, demand a fair and honourable peace, they appeared in the pitiful posture of suppliants, who deprecated fiercer rage than they had experienced yet, from a more triumphantly victorious conqueror. It is, under these circumstances, right to keep in mind that the presence of these pacific negotiators from the proud government of the United Provinces was a confession of the invincible capacity and energy of the statesmen of the Long Parliament, and not, as it has been esteemed, a tribute to the instant supremacy of Cromwell. When the lord-general seized the power of the state, he may be said to have inherited a well-appointed navy of upward of 100 sail, and the fruits of one of the noblest maritime victories on record: yet, when Van Tromp first appeared in the Channel, the committee of the Admiralty had only twenty sail in the Downs. All else had followed, with sundry victories in its course, from the exertions of Blake and Vane.

Cromwell, surrounded by his military council, received the Dutch delegates with a haughty pride. Their first proposition was, that, pending the present negotiation, all hostilities should cease. This he peremptorily refused. Their next had relation to what they termed the exorbitant demands formerly made by the Long Parliament, when St. John was ambassador at the Hague,† and some abatement of which, they contended, must form the basis of any new treaty. This proposition met with no better fate than the first. Cromwell refused to stir one jot from the ground taken up by his predecessors. Three weeks passed fruitlessly thus: the Dutchmen, in despair, demanded their passports, and would have gone at once, had not Cromwell condescended, for special purposes he had privately in view, to cajole and humour them: now he would chide them reproachfully for their impatience, and now, with tears in his eyes, for their carelessness of the miseries of war! The Convention meanwhile assembled, and it then favoured his purposes to represent himself as their servant merely, and the humble representative of a supreme power in the state. Two months at least passed in continual agitation of new proposals, and the transient glitter of new hopes, when he announced to them, on the behalf of "the Parliament of the Commonwealth," at an audience they had claimed from its new council of state, that England would waive her claim of pecuniary compensation from Holland, provided Van Tromp were for a while removed from the command of their fleet, in acknowledgment of his having been the aggressor; and provided, also, the States would consent to the incorporation of the two countries into one great maritime power, to be equally under the same government, consisting of individuals chosen out of both.* The last condition proved, as it was probably intended, a stumbling-block to the Dutch negotiation. It was a subject not embraced in their instructions. Ultimately, three of their number left London for the Hague, to procure larger powers: Beverningk, the representative of the States of Holland, alone remained.

But it was now the close of July, and exactly two days before the departure of the Dutchmen, another battle had been fought at sea, and another victory won for England. During the whole of the negotiations I have described, Van Tromp and De Witt had exerted themselves with unrelaxing zeal to retrieve their last disgrace, knowing well how little chance there is of honourable peace after ill-fought war. Tromp complained of the insubordination of his officers, and De Witt of the inadequacy of his ships. Tromp even threatened to withdraw from the command, while De Witt is recorded to have addressed, after this fashion, both the States-General and the States of Holland: "I am here before my sovereigns: of what use is it to dissemble? the English are our masters at sea, and things must so remain till we have ships built on a different scale."† To both the admirals a most respectful attention was at once paid. Full power was given to Van Tromp members of our Parliament advised that we should first finish that business—as we soon shall—and then expect your envoys on our shores. I thought better of you, and have misjudged; but trust me you will soon repent your rejection of the offers which we have made you." The statesmen kept their words. The equipment of a noble fleet, and the passing of the Navigation Act, were the immediate results of St. John's abrupt return.

* A vast number of papers will be found in Thurloe having reference to these negotiations. See, for example, in the first volume only, p. 268, 284, 302, 308, 313, 316, 340, 362, 370, 872, 381, 382, 394, 401. And see, for the best popular statement of these results, Dr. Lingard's History, vol. ii., p. 219-223.

† Thurloe, vol. i., p. 341; Le Clerc, vol. ii., p. 333, 334.

* Whitelocke adduces various letters to prove that "the Dutch much rejoiced at the dissolving of the Parliament, hoping for some disabling of the English fleet thereby; but, being disappointed thereof, the common people were earnest for a peace with England."

† This was before the victory of Worcester in 1651. The embassy was admirably discharged by St. John, who, as soon as he saw a disposition in the States to trifle with England, threw up his mission in these memorable words: "I perceive," he said to the States-General, "that you are waiting the issue of our war with the Scotch; and some to place and displace his officers at pleasure; * deputies were specially sent from the civil government to every crew in the service, exhorting and entreating them to make a last effort for their country, and promising them extraordinary advantages and rewards; while in the Dutch dockyards De Witt's orders reigned supreme. Unexpected success, in one sense, followed. Towards the end of July, Tromp was enabled to sail from the harbours of Zealand with about eighty ships, and De Witt had twenty-five more in readiness in the Texel, with which he afterward joined his chief. But the Dutchmen had lost the habit of victory.

Monk and Blake had for eight weeks blockaded the entrance of the Texel, when, on the evening of the 29th of July, near the coast of Holland, they cleared for a decisive action with Van Tromp and De Witt. On that evening Monk issued a memorable and most characteristic order through his ships, which were in number about equal to the Dutch force. He had found by experience, he said, that the taking the ships of the enemy consumed much precious time, while the sending the ships so taken into a place of security necessitated the detaching other vessels from the fleet to conduct them, and so weakened his force. He therefore gave positive instructions to the captains that no English ship should surrender to the enemy, and that they should accept no surrender of the vessels against which they fought. Their business was not to take ships, but to sink and destroy to the extent of their power.† Another circumstance, not less sagacious or cold-blooded, was observed in his conduct this famous evening. He sent out a sudden order to transpose the captains of the merchant-men which had been placed by him in the battle. In the former engagement, he had found that they committed themselves somewhat too cautiously, out of tenderness they had to the freight which belonged to their owners‡

The first evening's encounter was characterized by nothing decisive. The squally winds of the succeeding day prevented battle. The sun of the third, which was Sunday, the 31st of July, set in terrible streaks of blood. Its most illustrious victim was Van Tromp. "While he very signally," says Clarendon, "performed the office of a brave and bold commander, he was shot with a musket bullet into the heart, of which he fell dead without speaking a word. This blow broke the courage of the rest." After the fall of Van Tromp, the victory was indeed no longer doubtful. The Dutch at once wavered, in a short time fled, and pursuit lasted beyond midnight.§ On the English side, though few ships were lost, the loss of men was found to be considerable. Six captains and 500 sailors were killed, and six captains and 800 sailors wounded. A more terrible issue had befallen the Dutch. Nearly thirty of their ships were burned or sunk, and among them that of Vice-admiral Evertsens, who was himself made prisoner. Their loss of life was proportionately fearful, and 1200 of their seamen were carried into England as a trophy of the battle, having been taken as they escaped from the wrecks in their boats, or picked up as they were swimming in the sea.* But heavier news than that of all these losses to the people of Holland was the death of their famous Van Tromp.†

fleets prepared for a second engagement, the enemy bearing in upon us, having the wind of us. To this time the Lord seemed to encourage the enemy, by laying the scales, as it were, in a balance, so that neither could tell which had the better; but good was the Lord unto us, who knew the best time for manifestation of his own glory, in appearing for his own people, though unworthy of so great a mercy; for, about seven in the morning, the great ships from the Texel, being twenty-five in number (De Witt's fleet), having made a conjunction with them the day before, there began a very hot dispute with them, which so continued till one in the afternoon, the enemy having the wind of us all the while, whereby he had the opportunity of taking all advantages; yet truly may we say, great was the Lord, and marvellous, worthy to be praised for his glorious appearance on our behalf; for by this time the Lord had so daunted their spirits, that they began to bear away from us, making all the sail they could with the remainder of their fleet, being not above sixty of their whole number; for, so far as I can gather, there cannot be less than thirty or forty sunk, taken, and destroyed. We are now in pursuit with some of our best sailing frigates, bring almost up with some of their sternmost; and our expectations still are great, that the Lord will perfect the work thus far begun and carried on, which I hope will be to the glory of his grace in us, as well as without us. The enemy had nine flag-ships when he first engaged, and now but one left, and Tromp's tied to the topmast, as far as I can discern. But I saw two of our own fired by the enemy's fire-ships, whereof one was the Oak, whose men were most of them saved; the other a fire-ship. In the fight, the Resolution, with the Worcester frigate, led the English fleet in a desperate and gallant charge, through the whole Dutch fleet. Van Tromp's topmast was shot down, which he would have set up again, but could not, and so was fain to put his flag upon his rear masts. Those of the Dutch, that are got into the Texel, are much shattered; Tromp's vice-admiral sunk by his side." It is clear that Monk had not at this period become aware of the first source, as well as the greatest incident, of his victory—the death of Tromp. A brief letter from him arrived to announce it the next day.

* Several Proceedings. Heath, p. 348.

† Lord Clarendon tells us, that "on the Hollanders' part, between twenty and thirty of their ships of war were fired or sunk, and above 1000 prisoners taken. The victory cost the English dear too; for 400 common men and eight captains were slain outright, and above 700 common men and five captains wounded. But they lost only one ship, which was burned; and two or three more, though carried home were disabled for farther service. The most sensible part of the loss to the Dutch was the death of their admiral, Van Tromp, who, in respect of his maritime experience, and the frequent actions he had been engaged in, might very well be reckoned among the most eminent commanders at sea of that age, and to whose memory his country is farther indebted than they have yet acknowledged." Yet the States had given him a splendid triumphal funeral, and struck a medal to his memory. Ludlow thus describes, in his memoirs, the engagement of the last day. "Though many of our men were sick of the scurvy, and the Dutch had fire-ships, of which we had none, the wind also entirely favouring them, yet did the fight continue with equal balance till two or three in the afternoon, about which time their admiral, Van Tromp, was killed with a musket ball, as he walked upon the deck with his sword drawn. This so discouraged the enemy, that they made all the haste they could away towards the Texel, and were pursued with that diligence by ours, that the ship of Cornelius Evertsen was sunk, with about thirty more, as we were informed by the prisoners taken or saved from perishing. The victory was great, but cost us dear: for we lost eight of our brave captains, whose names were, Graves, Peacock, Taylor, Crisp, Newman, Cox, Owen, and Chapman, with about 400 men. We had also about 700 wounded, and among them five commanders, yet we lost but one ship in this fight."

* Thurloe, vol. i., p. 325.

† Gumble's Life of Monk, p. 62. ‡ Heath, p. 348.

§ During the continuance of this pursuit on the evening of the battle, Monk sent off a despatch to the lord-president of the council of state, dated from "on board the Resolution, off Camperdown," which, on its arrival in London, was received and read with much excitement in the House of Commons. Its description of the closing days was highly characteristic of Monk, and will give the reader a vivid picture of the scene. Having mentioned the result of the first day's encounter, he thus continues: "Yesterday little was done as to an engagement, both fleets finding it work enough to get off from the lee-shore, having the wind at W.N.W., blowing hard, with thick and dirty weather, which was the worst for us, being on an enemy's country. This morning, it being fair weather and little wind, both

The Parliament vied with Cromwell and the council of state in showering honours and rewards on the victorious English admirals. A grand dinner was given in the city of London to celebrate their return, at which Cromwell was requested to invest them with sundry gold chains and medals, which had been voted in commemoration of their exploits. Nor did this Parliament vent its gratitude in mere partial and unsubstantial honours: they gave orders, we ascertain from the papers of the time, "for taking care of necessaries for the relief of the sick and maimed seamen and soldiers." They also resolved that a convenient house should be provided in or near Dover, Deal, or Sandwich, for their accommodation; that one moiety of all the hospitals for sick throughout England be reserved for the service of the navy; and that provision be made for the wives and children of the captains and sailors slain in this engagement, who were also admitted to make probate of their husbands' and fathers' wills, without payment of any fees.*

But the case of Lilburne claims brief mention before the striking course of Parliamentary policy is resumed.* Banished from England for life in 1652, he had taken refuge in Holland, allied himself to the Royalists there,† and made formal proposals to them for the destruction of the Long Parliament and the then council of state, and for the murder of Cromwell, all of which he undertook to accomplish in six months, on the payment of ten thousand pounds.‡ His

* A passage from the "Exact Relation" may yet be subjoined, descriptive of matters already partly referred to, and which will not require farther statement. "By this time (the opening of August) many matters were fitted and prepared by the committees, who made their daily reports. The council of state having the pre-eminence to be first heard, divers things were offered by them, some of which had been considered of by them in the interval of Parliament. Many things passed, and were despatched, of what they reported, and which other committees did likewise report, which spent not a little time. Business came on so fast from committees, which did cause striving which should be first heard, and much time lost thereby. There were many particular things ordered and despatched by the House, as 'The relieving the sufferings of many by fires in many parts of the nation; some their grievances redressed; some their petitions and desires granted; some obstructions in all their purchases removed by the House.' The business of providing moneys (all other things ever giving way to that) occasioned expense of much time, and great debate of ways and means to that end. The fights at sea coming to knowledge by letters; the reading of them; the acknowledging God's goodness, and praising his holy name; the taking care to provide for the sick and maimed; the relieving the widows of such whose husbands were slain; the honouring with rewards the chieftains and commanders; with the bestowing several sums of money on the widows and children of such captains as were slain in the fight, in consideration of their loss of such husbands and fathers; all which were things just and honourable, but not done without expense of time. The despatch of ambassadors to foreign parts, as to Turkey and to Sweden, their letters of credence, and commissions signed and sealed, the receipt of letters from Switzerland and other free states, the reading of them and returning answers, may be reckoned into the expense of time. The council of state chose a second time by the box or glass, where every one put in his paper of names, and those that had most votes carried it, spent more time than one whole day."

† This is not denied even by himself. According to his own "Defensive Declaration," he entered into familiar intercourse with the Duke of Buckingham, Sir John Colepeper, Sir Ralph Hopton (distinguished followers of Charles the First, and who had been created peers by him in 1644), Bishop Branhall, and other eminent Royalists.

‡ When asked how he proposed to effect all this, he replied, by papers that he would print in Amsterdam, and send over and get dispersed by his agents in England. He affirmed that he had a numerous party in his native country, and that the majority of the army would easily be brought over to his views. It is fair to add that Lilburne has denied this part of the charges. His character and proposals, made in the autumn of 1652, were rejected, after some deliberation; yet he remained in Holland, where, on the 3d of May, 1653, the news of the dispersion of the statesmen reached him. Seeing the opportunity for disorder, he wrote at once and offered his allegiance to Cromwell, with the prayer that he might be allowed to return to England, to call to account the deceased authority that had banished him. The letter was loaded with abuse of the Parliamentary leaders—especially of Scot, whom it styled secretary of state—and with quiet hints of conciliation and respect for Cromwell, but unavailing. The lord-general avoided double-edged tools, and had profited by his old experience of Lilburne. The letter passed unanswered.

Lilburne then resolved on the daring step of an unsanctioned return to England. He supposed himself safe in the disorders and uncertainties of the time. The Duke of Buckingham is said to have accompanied him as far as Calais;* and it is certain that the council of state had received information, which left them little doubt of the desperate intentions with which he came. He arrived in the middle of June, was arrested the day after his arrival at a lodging in Little Moorfields, and shortly after committed to Newgate. The determination had at once been taken by Cromwell to send him to trial on the act which banished him, and which affixed to his unpermitted return the penalty of death. It was a case, moreover, wherein he thought he might safely trust a jury. The only matter submitted to their decision would be the simple proof of identity, since the felony was clearly established and declared. Thus would he, at the same instant, not only drive from his path a troublesome demagogue, but in all probability, by his very means of doing it, win the popular sympathies and regards. The result was another proof of his miscalculation. Nor of that only. It furnished decided evidence of that general condition of confusion and incertitude which was the follower of his act of usurpation.

habits, however, are a formidable support to it; and the informations, perfectly agreeing as to the facts, are sworn to by four persons, Isaac Berkenhead, Captain John Titus, Captain John Bartlett, and Richard Foot. In the evidence of the latter person some curious circumstances are stated. Describing the interval between the despatch of Lilburne's first letter to Cromwell and his subsequent departure in defiance of permission, Foot illustrated it by the following scene. "On Sunday, the 29th of May, Lilburne and Jamot being at a tavern called the Conserge, with one Captain Whittington and Colonel Layton, both of the king's party here in England, and two merchants, one of the company asked him what he would say if this pass came not; he said that, 'if my pass come not, and I find that it is Cromwell that hinders it, as it must be, for it lies in his power, I will either kill him myself, or send one to do it.' Then one of the merchants asked him how he could do such a thing with conscience: he answered, 'Tell me not of conscience in this case, for if that I am banished without law, conscience, or equity, and deprived of my natural air to breathe in, which is every man's birthright (with such like expressions), I may justly right myself if I can. If I would take a hare or a deer, I ought to give him fair play, because they are beasts of game; but if a fox or wolf, I may use what device I can to kill him; so if Cromwell keep himself above the law, that I cannot have my right by the law, I may kill him how I can.' Then presently his letters came, and after he had read them, and saw his pass was not come, he said, 'I am resolved to have one fling more at Cromwell.' Further he said, that 'Cromwell hath been an atheist these seven years, and that his design is and hath been to make himself king.'"

* Thurlow, vol. i., p. 306. Several Informations, p. 13.

As soon as Lilburne discovered the resolute front opposed to him, he took up his own old positions with all his accustomed obstinacy.* He set to work his friends to petition, and his own wits to baffle by all kinds of technical objection the legal proceedings already instituted. His first endeavour was to obtain a respite of the trial till the meeting of the Convention that had been summoned, and in this he succeeded. Cromwell was not unwilling to share with them the responsibility of some portion of what he had resolved to do. Within four or five days of their meeting, petitions were accordingly poured in upon the Parliament—petitions from Lilburne himself—petitions from Lilburne's wife—petitions from Lilburne's native county—petitions from London apprentices, who thought Lilburne a great man. It is instructive to know how much may be done, or, rather, how much always seems to be done, by one active person, during the inaction of everybody else. Several discussions arose on these petitions, and many divisions† were taken. "Some members of the House," according to the author of the "Exact Relation," "earnestly moving to have had his trial suspended, and the act called in question by which he was banished and made a felon, that the merit of the cause might be looked into; which they professed, again and again, they did not do so much in favour of Mr. Lilburne, as in the right of themselves and their posterities, and all Englishmen, which they judged highly concerned therein; but other gentlemen of note being very opposite, nothing came of the whole but expense of time." The real fact was, that the evidence of Lilburne's intentions, laid before the various members by the council of state, was, at last, too strong to be resisted.‡ His intrigues with the Royalists

* See note, ante, p. 521, 522.

† Thurlow, vol. i., p. 357.

‡ An amusing passage, from the examination of Captain Titus, will describe in detail a part of Lilburne's interview with the Duke of Buckingham in Holland. Independent of the entire corroboration it received from others, nothing can more exactly or characteristically express the style and manner of "free-born John." "This examinant farther saith, that at this same time the said Lilburne proposed to the said duke, that if he, the said duke, could but procure him £10,000, he, the said Lilburne, would have a piece of him mailed upon every post in Bruges, if he, the said Lilburne, did not overthrow and destroy those damnable villains in England: 'I mean,' said he, the said Lilburne, 'the Lord-general Cromwell, the Parliament, and that monstrous council of state.' To which the said duke replied, 'I pray you, sir, let me hear which way you will do this.' The said Lilburne replied, 'My lord, I'll tell you how: first I'll set my press on work (for which purpose I have bought one with letter at Amsterdam, which cost me thirty pounds), and then I'll send my papers over into England, which by my agents shall be spread all over the nation, and by my agents (for I have enough) my papers shall be brought into the army there (where I have double interest); and now every trooper begins to understand his own privilege, and so soon as these papers are spread, they'll fly in the faces of their officers, so that, with the help of my particular interest, the soldiery shall do all themselves, and I'll do nothing but sit in my chair and use my pen.' To which the duke replied, 'Sir, you may observe that in all your attempts the general outwitted you, and broke your business in the bud; besides, you may see, that on all occasions the soldiery hath been obedient unto his officer, so discreetly hath the general ordered his army.' 'Why, then,' saith the said Lilburne, 'I perceive you take the general for a wise man.' 'Yes,' said the duke; 'let the world read his stories, and they'll find him so.' 'No,' said the said Lilburne, 'I know him to be otherwise, for heretofore all his business was managed by Ireton, and is since by others; and for the general himself, he is as false a perfidious false-hearted rogue as ever lived in the world. And I know no reason why I should not vie with Cromwell, since I had once as great a had become too clear, and his intemperate style of abuse through all the proceedings had weakened what little sympathy remained for him. Parliament refused to interfere, and his trial was ordered to proceed. He was arraigned at the sessions in the middle of July, on the capital charge of having violated the statute of his banishment.

But to this statute he refused to plead; and for five successive days, with all the genuine accomplishments of a first-rate demagogue, he kept prosecutors and judges* at bay. He left not an inch of ground unfought; and at every turn in the case, covered every one opposed to him, not excepting the judges themselves, with charges of rascality and tyranny. First, he demanded counsel: that point was at once conceded, and, among others, he named Glyn, Maynard, and Hale, of whom Maynard, who lived to dabble in the blood of the regicides, took up his case with a real and very hearty zeal. Three days of the trial had meanwhile been exhausted. On the fourth, returning to the charge with renewed vivacity, Lilburne tendered a bill of exceptions.† The court refused it unless signed by counsel, and gave him till evening to repair the defect. But the majority of the counsel he had named were out of town, and his friends only narrowly achieved the good fortune of finding Maynard, who was himself on the point of setting out when they arrived. He signed the bill at once, and procured the signature of Norbury, a Welsh judge, who had recently been dismissed by Cromwell. The crafty lawyer sent, at the same time, a message to Lilburne of still greater value than his signature: he would baffle his judges most effectively, he told him, if he insisted on his oyer: a specification under the great seal of the statute on which he was tried, of the judgment of banishment given against him, and of the crime or crimes on which that judgment was founded.

Lilburne received this hint with becoming gratitude, and on the sixth day of the proceedings formally demanded his oyer. Maynard's anticipations proved correct. The court knew not how to refuse the request, since it was claimed as of right and necessary to defence; power as he had, and greater too, and am as good a gentleman, and of as good a family."

* Chief-baron Wild presided, assisted on the bench by the Lord-commissioner Kebble, Judge Warburton, the Recorder Steele, and, by some strange and unintelligible compromise with decency and justice, Attorney-general Prideaux.

† These exceptions were, first, that it did not appear on the face of the act that it was an act of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, or the Parliament sitting at Westminster, and might as well be an act of a Parliament in Naples, or any other country. Secondly, it did not appear that there was any judgment given upon which the sentence was founded. Before a judgment there must be indictment, presentment, or information; the party accused must appear, or must be outlawed for not appearing; he must either confess or plead; all of which circumstances were wanting, the least of them being enough to annihilate the proceeding. Thirdly, the act spoke of his not being allowed to remain in England, Scotland, or Ireland, after twenty days, but the vote of the House upon which the act was bottomed specified thirty days. Fourthly, the indictment now preferred against him was against John Lilburne, gentleman, while the act of banishment was against Lieutenant-colonel Lilburne; no proof being rendered that he was the person named in the act. He denied that he had been a lieutenant-colonel at the time of passing the act. There were several persons in England whose names and designation were John Lilburne, gentleman, and they might as well hang any one of these as hang him, under this act.

and assuredly they knew still less how to grant it, since no record of the charge or judgment was known to exist. They granted a specification of the act, and adjournment to the next sessions.

The proceedings were resumed in the middle of August by two days' argument on Lilburne's exceptions, and his right to the oyer. He consented to plead at last, under threat from the court that they would enter up judgment against him as contumacious. A jury was empanelled to try him on the 18th of August, and the trial lasted three days. The court was crowded within and without by the city apprentices, of whom Lilburne was the hero; some hundreds of them were said to have provided themselves with arms for his rescue if he should chance to be condemned; and threatening papers were dropped about in various directions (printed, no doubt, at the demagogue's own printing press!), to declare that if Lilburne perished, twenty thousand Englishmen would perish with him! Cromwell unwisely elevated these circumstances into an importance they could never themselves have claimed—for the great mass of the people were in truth looking indifferently on—by taking measures to strengthen and encourage the court. Two companies of soldiers were posted in the immediate vicinity; three regiments of infantry, and one of cavalry, were quartered in the city; and a considerable force without the gates received orders to march towards London.

The details of the trial itself, which lasted three days, have not been preserved. It is only known that the counsel for the prosecution restricted themselves to bare evidence of the prisoner's identity with the Lilburne named in the act of banishment; that the court charged the jury, in the same strain, that they had nothing to do but with the act of Parliament in question; and that Lilburne himself made a long and passionate speech, in which, among a vast variety of topics of argument and abuse, the chief were these: he denied the legal authority of the late Parliament to banish him, because it had in law expired with the death of the king, and because in no circumstances can a House of Commons assume the functions of a court of justice; he urged upon the jury, with elaborate vehemence, that they were judges of the law as well as of the fact; he maintained that they could not possibly, if they had any regard to justice or the peace of their own consciences, adjudge a man to death for a thing not done or proved, but merely because other men had ordered certain words to be written down on paper or parchment; * he finally adjured them to remember that an act of Parliament which was evidently unjust was essentially void, and that jurymen who pronounced according to it, and not according to their oaths, would have one day a heavy reckoning to answer. It was late in the night of the third day of the trial when the jury returned their verdict, and the shout of the apprentices in celebration of Lilburne's acquittal rang clamorously up Whitehall* to the residence of Cromwell.

I have thus glanced at this close of the wayward career of Lilburne, because in the marked distinction which separates it from his previous trials, a striking characteristic of the time may be noted. The plain and simple point involved in the present instance was the identity of Lilburne with the victim of the act of banishment. But with whom had that act of banishment originated; of which Cromwell now sought so vigorous an enforcement? It was peculiarly the work of the statesmen, whose authority, within the last four months, Cromwell had himself destroyed, and whose motives he had branded with the vilest and most insulting imputations. The act of banishment was, in fact, no other than a special assertion of that authority, no other than a terrible resentment of Lilburne's reckless disregard of its injunctions. But with the substance the shadow perished; doubts arose between the justice and the thief; the question of identity became a question of indifference; and in the same proportion as Cromwell might be held to represent the authority by which he claimed the forfeit life of Lilburne, did the shouts of the apprentices of London represent the voice of the English people. The true England was silent as the true statesmen. Yet Cromwell was troubled when those shouts reached him in Whitehall. It is the unhappy consequence of a great man's playing a mean part, that mean men may become suddenly, though for a brief space, respected and respectable. A lion in the skin of an ass gives propriety and elevation to an ass in his own skin.

Within a few days after the result of Lilburne's trial, measures for the establishment of a high court of justice were pressed forward in Parliament by Cromwell's partisans, for every instant, to them, seemed teeming with a new Lilburne. The time groaned, meanwhile, with much heavier dangers. The real indifference, languor, and incertitude of the people made themselves known in a more formidable shape.

* A few words will suffice to close Lilburne's career. The result of an examination of the judges and jurymen before the council of state; of the evidence of a certified copy of certain opprobrious expressions used by Lilburne in his defence; and, finally, of additional proof of his Royalist intrigues, was an order from the Parliament that, notwithstanding his acquittal, he should be confined in the Tower; and that no obedience should be paid to any writ of habeas corpus issued from the Court of Upper Bench in his behalf. These measures were loudly complained of by sensible and well-judging people, who had taken no interest in Lilburne, and stoutly resisted also by a minority in the Parliament. They were carried by the plea of state necessity. It was afterward supposed that Lilburne would be brought to trial for treason, with other conspirators, before a high court of justice, but he was at length sent a prisoner by Cromwell to Elizabeth Castle, in the Isle of Jersey. Here he deported himself with the greatest contumacy. He was finally, as we are told, being far gone in a consumption, liberated from confinement, and only turned out to die, which event occurred in August, 1657, at the age of thirty-nine. It is characteristic of all his life that he is recorded to have died in the faith of a Quaker! For various circumstances connected with these latter incidents of his most unprofitable life, see Thurlow, vol. i., p. 324, 367, 368, 369, 429, 430, 435, 441, 442, 451, 453. See, also, State Trials, vol. v., p. 415-450; Whitelocke, passim; and the Journals of the Commons, under dates already mentioned in the text.

* The original judgment against Lilburne was, no doubt, only defensible, on the ground of an elemental danger to society and government—both at that time in a state of revolution and transition—which the ordinary law and usage were incompetent to meet. He was condemned in a heavy fine, with banishment for life, on the ground of a breach of privilege. It is well to recollect that a previous vote of a precisely similar description against Lord Howard, of Escrick, and Captain Wenday Oxford, had been called by Lilburne (in his Just Reproof, &c.) "a gallant piece of justice." Still Vane and Marten strenuously opposed his banishment.

It had been a memorable incident in the history of the statesmen, that, after the death of the king, though there had been wars with the Royalists of Scotland and Ireland, and insurrections of that party when England was invaded by the enemy, no intestine commotion ever shook their power or weakened their general authority with the people. The argument of Whitelocke will also be in the reader's recollection.*

Protesting with real or feigned sincerity against the dissolution of the Parliamentary government, he observed with admirable foresight, "The question will then be no more whether our government shall be by a monarch or by a free state; but whether Cromwell or Stuart shall be our king. And thus that question, wherein before so great parties of the nation were engaged, and which was universal, will by this means become, in effect, a private controversy only. Before it was national, What kind of government we should have! Now it will become particular, Who shall be our governor, whether of the family of the Stuarts, or of the family of the Cromwells? Thus the state of our controversy being totally changed, all those who were for a commonwealth (and they are a very great and considerable party) having their hopes therein frustrated, will desert you; your hands will be weakened, your interest straitened, and your cause in apparent danger to be ruined." Substantially this time had now arrived, and its arrival made itself known in a series of Royalist conspiracies.

Its first herald, as we have seen, was Lilburne's arrival, under the tender escort, as far as Calais, of his grace the Duke of Buckingham. Then followed his acquittal. Then arose mysterious talk throughout London of secret correspondence and designs, and several persons of consideration were sent to the Tower.† Then, within some days after, we meet with accounts of ten or twelve colonels having been apprehended on the charge of having come over from abroad with a design to raise men in several places for the service of Charles Stuart. And at last a formal report of various conspiracies was presented to the Parliament by the council of state, with a view to expedite the proposed establishment of a high court of justice.

Cromwell saw in all this the worst disadvantages of an incomplete act of usurpation, unaccompanied by any of the strength or awe that would follow its final assertion. He began to look forward impatiently over the heads of his "faithful Commons." In a letter I have found to his son-in-law Fleetwood, who was now in Ireland with his wife, the significant humility, the discontented sanctity, the obscure anticipation, point directly at the Protector's chair. It is dated the 22d of August, 1653, and runs in these words: "DEERE CHARLES,—Although I doe not soe often (as is desired by me) acquaint you howe it is with me, yett I doubt not of your prayers in my behalfe that in all things I may walke as becometh the Gospell. Truly I never more needed all helps from my Christian friends than now. Fayne would I have my service accepted of the saints (if the Lorde will); butt it is not soe. Beinge of different judgments, and of each sort, most seekinge to propagatē their owne, that spirit of kinnesse that is to them all is hardly accepted of any. I hope I can say it, my life has beene a willinge sacrifice, and I hope is, for them all. Yett it much falls out as when the two Hebrews were rebuked, you know upon whom they turned their displeasure; butt the Lorde is wise, and will, I trust, make manifest that I am no enmy. Oh how easy is mercie to be abused! Perswade friends with you to be very sober. If the day of the Lorde be so neer (as some say), how should our moderation appeare! If every one (instead of contendinge) would justifie his forme by love and meeknesse, wisdom would be justified by her children. Butt alas! I am in my tentation ready to say, 'Oh, would I had winges like a dove, then would I,' &c.; butt this, I feare, is my hast. I blesse the Lorde I have somewhat keepes me alive, some sparkes of the light of his countenance, and some sinceritie above man's judgement. Excuse me thus unbewelling myselfe to you; pray for me, and desire my friends to doe soe alsoe. My love to thy deere wife, whom indeed I enterly love, both naturally, and upon the best account; and my blessinge (if it be worth anythinge) upon thy little babe. Sr. George Ascough havinge occasions with you, desired my letters to you on his behalfe; if he come or send, I pray you show him what favour you can. Indeed, his services have been considerable for the state, and I doubt he hath not been answered with suitable respect. Therefore again I desier you, and the commissioners, to take him into a very peticular care, and helpe him soe farr as justice and reason will any wayes afforde. Remember my heartie affections to all the officers. The Lorde bless you all, soe prayeth your truly lovinge father, O. CROMWELL. . . . All heere love you, and are in health, your children and all."

Another circumstance of the same date indicates the movement in Cromwell's mind. Whitelocke was suddenly sent off from London in the character of ambassador extraordinary to the Swedish queen Christina. No formidable opposition was thus removed, but many troublesome and annoying scruples. In vain poor Whitelocke struggled and objected; in vain he sought the aid and counsel of wife, of friends, of tenants. "There's no use in resisting the GREAT MAN," said one of the latter, "an ancient, sober, discreet, and faithful servant to Whitelocke and his father above forty years." Whitelocke rejoined that he was not "bound to obey" Cromwell. "I am deceived," said the shrewd old servant, "if he will not be obeyed in what he hath a mind to." "I am not under his command," retorted Whitelocke; "what can he do to me?" "What can he do?" exclaimed the experienced William Cooke; "what can he not do? Don't we all see he does what he list? We poor countrymen are forced to obey him to our cost; and if he have a mind to punish us or you, it's an old proverb that it's an easy thing to find a staff to beat a dog; and I would not have you to anger him, lest you bring danger, and trouble too, upon you and your family and state: that's the truth on't."*

* See ante, p. 502.

† See Thurloe, vol. i., p. 441, 442, 453.

* For an ample account of these conferences, and of Whitelocke's interviews with Christina herself, embodying many striking illustrations of Cromwell's character, see Appendix E., CROMWELL AND CHRISTINA.

The "Parliament of saints" had meanwhile been working to Cromwell's wish. Their measures of general polity and reform now claim from us a fair recital, and will be found, indeed, well worthy of it.

Be it first observed that they began their duties by establishing in all matters appertaining to the state a system of the most rigid economy. They revised the regulation of the excise; they simplified and improved the constitution of the treasury, by reducing into one the several receipts of the revenue; they abolished unnecessary offices, and reduced exorbitant salaries; they subjected to a most rigorous scrutiny the various public accounts, and gave new facilities to the sale of the lands now considered as national property. In all these things, as in others I will shortly name, the spirit of the Long Parliament had survived the dispersion of its members; in the fanaticism of language and occasional extravagance of argument by which the truth and advantages of such a course of policy were obscured in the Convention, we must at once, in fairness, recognise the original vice of its origin. It should never have been expected that anything could supply that grave defect in the minds of the more sensible English people.

Thus deficient in the only solid support they could hope to rest on, they had at once commenced their quarrel with the formidable class interests, and with the army first. It had been with visible reluctance that they voted the monthly tax of £120,000 for the support of the military and naval establishments. They were, indeed, careful not to complain of the amount; their objections were pointed against the nature of the tax, and the inequality of the assessments; but this pretext could not hide their real object from the jealousy of their adversaries; and their leaders were openly charged with seeking to reduce the number of the army, that they might lessen the influence of the lord-general.*

Their war with the lawyers was more daringly and openly conducted. Among the first acts they passed were those for taking away fines on bills, declarations, and original writs, and for the redress of delays and mischiefs arising out of writs of error. They passed, at the same time, an act respecting marriages, which, with several others, was sanctioned by their successors in 1656, and which declared that they should in all cases be preceded by publication of banns in church, or in the market-place on market-day; and a certificate being granted of such publication, together with the exception made, if any, that the ceremony should then take place before some justice of the peace within the county. This measure, which was strongly opposed by the clergy as well as the lawyers,† they accompanied with acts for the registration of marriages, and also of births and burials. They prepared and introduced other bills, with less success in passing them. Among them were, for example, an attempt to constitute by enactment a public committee for advance of trade; a new system of workhouses, and provision for the poor; and many admirable remedies for making the law more expeditious and less chargeable.*

Their next offence to the lawyers was not less a boon and blessing to the people, in answer to whose repeated prayers and entreaties† should make proof, by one or more credible witness upon oath, that either the husband or wife had committed the detestable sin of adultery during such marriage, then the said parties might be divorced by the sentence of three justices of the peace.†

* The author of the Exact Relation tells us that "about three days were spent in passing the excise rates, particularly, by vote. The old and new drapery, hats, caps, and tobacco-pipes, were by vote exempted from the duty of excise. The bill following, in order of the rates, was very large, of about eighty sheets of paper; spent one whole day in the hearing of it read; and there appeared so many snares and difficulties in it as to trade, as was judged no way fit to be put on a people that expected freedom at the price of their blood and treasure, by them spent in the late war; whereupon it was by a general consent waived and laid aside. There were divers bills prepared by several committees, some of which were read in the House, and others offered to have them read, but other business hindered; as, 'A bill for constituting a committee for advance of trade;' 'A bill for workhouses, and providing for the poor;' 'Divers bills for regulation of the law, and making it less chargeable to the poor, and more expeditious.'"

† I subjoin a striking extract from a petition against the system of imprisonment for debt, printed in the journals of the time. It is entitled the "humble petition of all the prisoners for debt within the several (both national and private) tyrannical dens of cruelty, called prisons, jails, counters, holes, and dungeons in this land." It opens with a laudation of the members of the Convention, as "the Lord's faithful ones," who had been called to restore England's fundamental laws, rights, and liberties. It proceeds: "In assurance of your speedy accomplishment of this so great good work, to God's glory, your country's happiness, and your own eternal fame to posterity, we are encouraged to show, though not unknown unto you, that the law of God is a law of mercy, peace, and preservation to the people, and not of strife, rigour, and destruction, as it is at this present time, in and by the chargeable, dilatory, and deceitful practice thereof; witness the numerous actions charged on men; vexatious and chargeable arrests, and dragging of men and women like dogs into holes and dungeons; false and endless imprisonment; the frequent commitments to prison, by the judges and justices, upon trivial matters; unjust decrees; false reports of masters in chancery; illegal outlawries; delay of justice; and, by the extraordinary charges in law and protraction of time, disheartening honest men from suing for their just debts and rights; together, also, with the most cruel usage and unreasonable exactions of bailiffs, sergeants, and jailers, to the utter ruin and destruction of thousands of families in the land; so as now, by the diabolically invented practices of the judges and lawyers, the law is become sharper than a two-edged sword, dividing the life from the body; working an endless separation between a man and his wife, children, and friends; deprivation of liberty and calling, and a total ruin of estate, to the great prejudice of this Commonwealth in general, but to the satisfaction of cruel, revengeful persons, and enrichment of lawyers and their dependants in particular. . . That restraint of men and women's persons in jail pays no debt, but defrauds the creditor, feeds the lawyers and jailers, and murders the debtors, witness the many thousands that have thus perished miserably, as the jailer's books, coroner's records, and committory rolls do testify. . . That imprisonment for debt is contrary to the law of God, to reason, justice, and charity, and to the law of this land, as appeareth by several statutes. The premises piously considered, your poor still enslaved brethren therefore humbly pray, that you may speedily break off this cruel, sinful yoke by the powerful rule of righteousness, justice, and mercy; that there may be no more arresting nor imprisonment for debt." The close of the petition suggested a provision in the stead of imprisonment not less just than humane—that "all able debtors might be, in some short time, enforced to satisfy their creditors out of the two-third parts of their estates, either in lands or goods; the other third part to be resolved to themselves for their support and education of their children."

* Exact Relation, p. 10. Thurloe, i., p. 755. Dr. Lingard, vol. ii., p. 193.

† A considerable time, the authors of the Parliamentary History tell us, was taken up in agitation of it. On the 25th of August it passed the House on the question, and was ordered to be printed and published. "This extraordinary act entirely took marriages out of the hands of the clergy, and put it into those of the justice of the peace. . . A very remarkable clause, add the compilers of the Parl. History, was proposed to be added upon the third reading, but passed in the negative. It was this: 'That if any person then married, or to be married according to this act, it was granted by these reformers. A bill was introduced "for relief of creditors and poor prisoners for debt," the immediate operation of which, besides its effects throughout the English provinces, was to release upward of 300 distressed men who were confined in different prisons in and near London alone. A brief sketch of its provisions will illustrate the judicious and equitable temper in which these "fanatics" approached a subject which involved so many nice and difficult questions of property and humanity.

Seventeen commissioners were appointed to act as judges in the case of prisoners "in the Upper Bench prison, the Fleet, the Gatehouse in Westminster, the Counter in Surrey, or prison in Whitechapel," with power to examine, and determine in a summary way, concerning the causes of such persons' imprisonment, their escapes and their estates, and to act as commissioners of bankrupts. They were to be allowed twopence in the pound out of the money arising by the sale of such prisoners' estates, for the charges of them and their clerks. A certain number of persons were also appointed to act in the same capacity for each county in England and Wales, with an allowance of sixpence in the pound. Prisoners not paying their debts in six months were to be deemed bankrupts; and in case of settlement of any part of a prisoner's estate in trust for himself or any other person, after the debt contracted or judgment obtained, these commissioners were empowered to sell the estate, and to fine any other person aiding or assisting in such fraud. Persons not able to pay such fine were to be adjudged to the pillory or workhouse. Prisoners able to pay their debts, and refusing so to do, were, if these commissioners thought fit, to be ordered to close imprisonment. The estates of any person for whose debts another should be imprisoned, were to be sold as fully as the estate of the prisoner himself; and where a prisoner made an escape, his estate not being sufficient to discharge his debts, the jailer and his security were to make good the deficiency. In the case of prisoners, however, against whom there had not been any declarations filed, these commissioners were to discharge them, and to give them damages for such vexatious imprisonment. In order to prevent prisoners, unable to pay their debts or fines, from perishing in prison, through the cruelty or obstinacy of any obdurate creditor, the commissioners were empowered to discharge, abate, or give respite of time to any such prisoner, according as the circumstances of the case might require, and to remove to the workhouse or house of correction any obstinate prisoner, who should be found to keep in prison through his own wilful default, or to have run into debt by a vicious course of life. They were also authorized to examine into the case of persons who had fraudulently got out of jail by means of former acts for relief of insolvent debtors, and to recommit them. They were to inquire into the abuse of charities given to prisoners, and to award punishment for it; to make orders for selling wholesome provisions to the prisoners at a reasonable price; and to cause a table of moderate fees to be hung up in every prison, the transgressor of which in any particular was to forfeit fourfold to the party injured, and to be set on the pillory. And in case of the death of a prisoner before his debts were paid, they were empowered to sell his estate for payment thereof. And though prisoners enlarged by this act were not liable to be arrested for debts due before, yet their estates were to remain subject to their creditors' satisfaction. Lastly, these commissioners were not to be responsible for their conduct but to Parliament; and in case of any difficulty, wherein they might apprehend they had not sufficient power for the relief of just creditors or poor prisoners, they were to certify the same to the House, with their opinion what farther provision was necessary to be made.

The four great votes which followed these measures sealed the fate of their unconscious originators. Before I proceed to describe them, it will be interesting to place on record a complete list of the enactments of general government and policy which were passed by the Convention. They embody, in connexion with the four votes in question, the last effort made to gather up the fruits of the struggle it has been the purpose of this work to record, in anything like a permanent result or legislative action on the people. Different scenes await us after these have passed. Scenes of mingled shame and glory; the administration of a despotism at once brilliant and mean; the oppressions it practised, the temporary honours it achieved, the few vain benefits it bestowed, the partial but glorious resistance it overcame, the serious and solemn lesson it taught to posterity; but none of those higher aims which belong to the higher provinces of statesmanship, and by which alone may be connected and consolidated the interests and the happiness of men in distant ages.

The list, compiled from the imperfect journals of the House, and the relation of one of its members, who adopts the signature of "L. D.," may be given thus: First. "An act for the committee of the army, and treasurers of war." Second. "An act for constituting commissioners for ordering and managing the admiralty and the navy." Third. "An act for settling the Court of Admiralty." "Much time," we are told, "spent in fixing on judges." Fourth. "An act for taking away fines on original writs," which, L. D. adds, "was, as some knowing gentlemen of worth in the House affirmed, to the saving of the people of this Commonwealth £120,000 per annum, only £10,000 or £12,000 thereof coming to the state." Fifth. "An act touching the several receipts of the revenue and treasuries of the Commonwealth, and the bringing them into one treasury." Sixth. "An act for marriages, and the registering of them; as also births and burials." "Much time," subjoins our relator, "spent in the debate about marriages, there being many niceties and difficult cases relating to that subject." Seventh. "An act for the more speedy bringing in of the arrears of the excise, and settling commissioners to that end." Eighth. "An act concerning the planters of tobacco in Gloucestershire and elsewhere." Ninth. "An act to continue the receipts of the excise till the 29th of December last." Tenth. "An act, additional and explanatory, for the sale of the remaining fee-farm rents, and finishing the whole business." Eleventh. "An act for settling Ireland, and making it a part of the Commonwealth, and satisfying the adventurers and soldiers with lands;" which act, we are told, "being very large and comprehensive, took many days' debate before it could be passed as a law." Twelfth. "An act for the relief of creditors and poor prisoners." "The fruit of it," L. D. observes, with a justifiable pride, "hath shown the worth of it, 300 poor starving souls having been freed thereby in and about London: a law so just and honourable as England hath few better; which passed not without serious debate." Thirteenth. "An act for accounts, and clearing public debts, and for the discovery of fraud, and concealment of anything due to the Commonwealth." Fourteenth. "An act for empowering the committee of the army to state and determine the accounts of all soldiers and others employed by them, for moneys by them received from the 26th of March, 1647, until the 25th of July, 1653." Fifteenth. "An act for redress of delays and mischiefs arising by writs of error, and writs of false judgment, in several cases." Sixteenth. "An act for repealing of a branch of an act of the late Parliament, intituled 'An act for subscribing the engagement,'" which was made, L. D. quietly adds, "to the ease and profit of the people, and to the loss of the lawyers." Seventeenth. "An act for the regulating the making of stuffs in the county of Norwich and Norfolk." Eighteenth. "An act for a high court of justice." Upon this, L. D.'s remark is characteristic: "It cost," he says, "indeed but one day's time, the reading, debate, and passing for a law, by reason of the great haste some gentlemen made, pretending great danger to themselves and the Commonwealth, so as no reasons could prevail to have it recommitted, as some desired; or that the acts for treasons might be read which the commissioners were to proceed upon, as others moved to have them; nor yet that the bill might be engrossed, being to be a law that concerned life, for then it could not have passed till the next day, when some that were perceived that day absent (being praying at the Blackfriars) might be present, and hinder, as it is likely to be feared, the passing of it; which had they done, they had saved much the credit of the council, for to wise men it seemed a very weak piece. And experience hath (thanks be to God) shown there was not that sudden danger as some gentlemen suggested, who did not let to say (in answer to those that would have had it engrossed against the next morning) 'that they knew not but by that time they might have their throats cut.'" In explanation of this, the case of Lilburne need only be recalled. Nineteenth. "An act for deofforisation and improvement of the forests, and of the honours, manors, lands, and tenements within the limits and perambulations of the same, heretofore belonging to the king, queen, and prince." This was, we are told, "a very large act, and comprehensive in the particulars, wherein the old farmers of the custom-house, that lent the old king money to make war with the Scots, were admitted to have their old debts made public faith, to double on, to the sum of two hundred seventy-six thousand pounds, to the end to be sure to have money against the spring. It was complied with; and some very eminent and wise gentlemen made others believe there was no question but the money would be provided ready against the times; other members of less note [no doubt our present informant] told the House what they thought, even as it is come to pass." Twentieth. "An act confirming the purchasers of Sir John Stowel's lands, what they had purchased of the state." Twenty-first. "An act for an assessment at the rate of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds a month, for six months, for the maintenance of the armies and navy of this Commonwealth."* Twenty-second. "An act for continuing the privileges and jurisdiction of the county of Lancaster." Twenty-third. "An act touching idiots and lunatics." Twenty-fourth. "An act for enabling commissioners of Parliament for compounding with delinquents to dispose of two parts of the lands and estates of recusants, for the benefit of the Commonwealth." This act, we again learn from L. D., "cost much time in the debate of it; for that some gentlemen fearing it amounted to the toleration of popery, did strongly oppose it, and caused it to be so modeled as that it was never like to attain the end aimed at, as some then declared; of which experience now can best declare and speak." Twenty-fifth. "A second act for the constituting commissioners for ordering and managing of the Admiralty and navy." Twenty-sixth.

* "This," says the author of the Exact Relation (the curious pamphlet I have already quoted), "was a very large act, and took up many days in the debate and passing of it, there being a desire, if possible it might have been, to have abated something of that sum, and that it might be laid equally. Many votes passed, and very sharp debates, by reason of the great inequality that was evident in the laying of the tax, some countries bearing beyond their proportion, and some much less, which made the burden more grievous than otherwise it would be. When, after many days spent in the modeling of the bill, and it came to be passed, some gentlemen gave their reasons why they could not give their yea to pass it for a law, for the unrighteousness that was in it (and something else), which had been laid forth in the debate; the great inequality betwixt country and country, city and city, hundred and hundred; and so of particular estates, some paying but two or three shillings in the pound, and others four and five, yea, some ten or twelve shillings for their real estate, besides what they paid for their personal; some of London passionately complained of being overrated, they paying £8000 a month, the fifteenth part of the whole assessment of the Commonwealth, when, as they with great confidence affirmed, they were not the fortieth part of the Commonwealth in value, as their case now was. The act engrossed, and the question being put, the noes (as to the making it a law that very day), had they been prosecuted to the pole, had hazarded the passing of it, it having been earnestly pressed that it might be amended at the table, or recommitted to be amended against the next day. A gentleman that first moved to have the House give up that morning they were dissolved, made this one of his reasons why he could sit no longer with his fellows, because of their dealing so disingenuously with the army, some other gentleman having spoken to the same account; but as to this, those that gave their noes against the then passing of the bill upon the account before, can say, they never were in arms against the Parliament and army, nor were ever in Oxford, or any other garrison that stood in opposition to them. And for their constant cordial affection to them, they may safely say, without boasting, they have been but a very little behind them that have been the highest and best affected in the nation, whatever those gentlemen please to say. To endeavour to have the assessment equally laid and borne tended much to the army's good rather than hurt, whereby they might continue to enjoy the love and affection of the people unto them." So began, as I have already observed, the quarrels and contentions, which in the four concluding votes received their final consummation. The writer of this passage seems to have taken a decided part himself.

"An act for the better and more effectual discovery of thieves and highwaymen." We have to add, in concluding the list, that "there was also a bill brought in and read, and debated, for the uniting of Scotland to the Commonwealth of England, as a part of it, with equal privileges, which spent two or three days' debate in a grand committee of the House, before it was ordered to be engrossed, being a thing of very great weight and concernment: being engrossed, it lay ready on the table to be read and passed; but the Highlanders putting the country into distemper, it was not put to be passed for a law while the House continued."*

* It is scarcely worth while nowadays to refute the calumnies which Lord Clarendon so notoriously indulged against his opponents; but after this list, it may amuse the reader to hear the noble historian coolly observe that "these men who took upon themselves the supreme authority of the nation, and continued to act in that capacity near six months, to the amazement and even mirth of the people, never entered upon any grave or serious debate that might tend to any settlement, but generally expressed great sharpness and animosity against the clergy, and against all learning, out of which they thought the clergy had grown, and still would grow. They looked upon the function itself to be anti-Christian, the persons to be burdensome to the people, and the requiring and paying of tithes to be absolute Judaism, and so thought fit that they should be abolished together. And that there might not, for the time to come, be any race of people who might revive these pretences, they proposed that all lands belonging to the universities, and colleges in those universities, might be sold, and that the money arising thereby should be disposed of for the public service, and to ease the people from the payment of taxes and contributions." It is unnecessary to observe that no shadow of any such motion or proposal relating to the universities was ever made in the House. The only attempt that carried even the smallest tendency that way was the scheme for abolishing of tithes. "And this project," as we are assured by a member, "was so far from being intended to the prejudice of the parochial clergy, that the design was only to take away the manner of maintenance by tithes as unequal, burdensome, and being the occasion of litigious law-suits; and that a bill was offered, on the day of the Parliament's resignation, for rendering the revenues of the clergy more certain and equal, by reducing benefices of £200 a year and upward, and advancing those of a smaller income, and also for making a provision for the widows and children of ministers; but that this equitable proposal was refused a reading, and that therefore the charge against one part of the House, of an intent to destroy the ministry, was a groundless reproach, cast upon those who endeavoured only to take off oppressions and grievances." The truth of this assertion is the less liable to be controverted, after the statement already proved in this work that the Long Parliament, when they abolished episcopacy, and sold the temporal revenues of the bishops, deans, and chapters, &c., made an express reserve of all their impropriations, which were to be applied to the increase of the revenues of the parochial clergy and heads of colleges. The same reserve of impropriations was made in the act passed by this Convention for enabling delinquents to compound for their estates. In connexion with these calumnies, it is only fair to add what is said on the subject by the author of the Exact Relation. "The House," he observes, "was at least not altogether idle, nor at a stand in their work, so as there was no need to have them dissolved on that score; indeed, much more might have been done and proceeded in, if there had not been something that did let. The two great grievances of the law and tithes had such friends in the House, as that, when either of those things came into debate, the House was as divided into two parts: the one very indulgent, still pleading and making defence in their behalf; the other endeavouring the redress of them. Great counsels agree not in all things presently: yet is that no good ground of their dissolution. That the House was not idle, nor at a stand, nor in an incapacity to do the work of the nation, though so divided as aforesaid, may, besides what appeareth already, be farther taken knowledge of by these ensuing votes which follow. There were four great votes that passed in the time of the sitting of the House, which some interests were much displeased at, and they passed not without great debate. First, a vote for abolishing and taking away the Court of Chancery; 2dly, a vote for a new body or model of the law; 3dly, a vote to take away the power of patrons to make presentations; 4thly, that innocent negative vote of not agreeing with the report of the committee for tithes, touching what they reported, as the best way to

The first of the four famous votes which alone remain to be mentioned was a declaration that the Court of Chancery should be totally taken away and abolished. In almost every recent petition of the people to the supreme authority of the nation, complaints had been made of the Court of Chancery; of its dilatory proceedings; of the enormous expense which it entailed on its suitors; and of the suspicious nature of its decisions, so liable to be influenced by the personal partialities and interests of the judge. At last this "little Parliament" grappled with the mighty evil! The debate, which was filled with interest and excitement, lasted two days.* The enemies of the court mustered all their force against it, and, on the main question, the resistance of its friends was feeble. It was beyond a doubt, the movers of the vote affirmed, the greatest grievance of the nation. For dilatoriness, chargeableness, and a faculty of bleeding the people in the purse-vein, even to their utter perishing and undoing, it might compare with, if not surpass, any court in the world. It was confidently asserted by persons of great weight that there were depending in that court 23,000 causes, some of which had been going on for five, ten, twenty, and thirty years! that there had been spent therein thousands of pounds, to the ruin, nay, utter undoing, of many families! that no ship (that is, cause) almost sailed in the sea of the law, but, first or last, it put into that port, where it suffered so much loss that the remedy was worse than the disease; that what was ordered in it one day was contradicted the next, so that in some causes there had been 500 orders or more; and that, at last, when the purses of clients began to be emptied, and their spirits a little cooled, then, by a reference to some gentleman in the country, the cause came to be suddenly ended! In one word, that the Court of Chancery was no better than "a mystery of wickedness and a standing cheat."† The friends of the court, in apparent inability to weaken the popular strength of these arguments, reserved themselves for the more difficult question of detail; and, after a brief and ineffectual resistance, suffered the Court of Chancery to be "voted down."‡

Then arose that question of detail—how to give to the vote the shape and efficacy of law—how, in other words, to dispose of the causes actually pending in the court, and to substitute a less objectionable tribunal in its place. It was referred to the committee on law affairs, but the first bill they prepared was rejected. Its provisions were deemed inadequate to the proper arrangement of what should be done, after the court was abolished, respecting causes actually before it. A second bill underwent the same fate. A third was judged by the authors of the vote to have had too much of the lawyers themselves in its concoction, and the eject scandalous, prophane, and ignorant ministers, &c., on which presently followed the dissolution of the House."

* Whitelocke's Memorials.

† The debate is so described in the Exact Relation, p. 12.

‡ "How did good people rejoice," says a writer of the time, "when they heard of that vote, and how sad and sorrowful were the lawyers and clerks for the fear of the loss of their great Diana, may be remembered, with their great joy in making bonfires and drinking sack when they were delivered from their fears by the dissolution of the late Parliament!"

remedies it prescribed were imagined worse than the disease." It was, without hesitation, rejected. Term now approached; and the members who had taken foremost part against the lawyers and "their great Diana," resolutely put forth a bill to suspend all chancery proceedings for one month, till an effectual provision could be made to meet every difficulty. To this, however, the lawyers and their partisans offered the most determined resistance they had yet ventured to make. Cromwell openly assisted them;* and, taking advantage of the absence of some of their more strenuous adversaries from town, they managed to fling the measure out†. Exasperated to conduct as extreme, the reformers in turn collected all the power they could command in the House, brought up their absent members, prepared themselves for a final rally against what they termed the "nuisance of the nation," and within a few days presented a fourth bill! In this, the defects of all the previous attempts, and particularly of the first bill, were remedied, provision being made in it, in particular, for a proper conclusion to suits now in hand, as well as for the termination of such causes as were ordinarily brought into chancery, so that they should be decided in a short time, and for the most part at an expense of thirty or forty shillings! All opposition to this bill was overborne. It was read twice in one day, and committed, and would most certainly have passed, had not subsequent proceedings been cut short by the dissolution of the Parliament.

But the Court of Chancery was only one stall in the Augean stable of the law, and in this little Parliament had the very soul of a Hercules sprang forth against all such impurities of the time. Their second great vote to be recorded was for a general revision and new modelling of the whole body of the law. That design, which the greatest jurists and philosophers of our country, from Bacon to Bentham, have won fame by merely propounding and shaping forth in theory, has alone been boldly and practically grappled with by this so-called mean and ignorant assembly! What, they asked, made up the law? A voluminous collection of statutes, many of them almost unknown, and many inapplicable in existing circumstances; the dicta of judges, perhaps ignorant, frequently partial and interested; the reports of cases, but so contradictory, that they were regularly marshalled in hosts against each other; and the usages of particular districts, only to be ascertained through the treacherous memories of the most aged of the inhabitants. Englishmen had a right to know the laws by which they were to be governed; it was easy to collect from the present system all that was really useful; to improve it by necessary additions; and to comprise the whole within the shape and compass of a single reasonably-sized volume. A debate was accordingly held, which lasted, in the midst of very great excitement and a furious opposition, for two days. The result was a vote to express the necessity of the measure, and to refer its details to the committee already appointed, of whom, as I have said, Anthony Ashley Cooper, afterward lord-high-chancellor of England, was a chief member. The committee began with crimes—treason in the first place, and secondly murder. The plan was, that this "new body of law," when formed by the committee, was to undergo the patient revision of the House, and, as they should see cause, to be in each of its parts adopted or rejected.

Meanwhile the opposition was tremendous, and every inch of ground without and within the House was fought indeed desperately, and with all the basest expedients of faction. The first point laid hold of after the vote was an error of the clerk of the House in wording it. "The clerk," says the author of the Exact Relation, "in drawing up the question, put the word body instead of model, which some members, for the passing of the vote before and after, desired to have altered; but others, lovers of the law as now it is, opposed the alteration of the word, being very angry at the vote; and so it went as it was, with some seeming disadvantage by means of the word body, which some of those aforesaid, being angry, would need fancy, and accordingly reported, as if it were intended to destroy the law, and take away the laws we had been fighting for all this while as our birthright and inheritance; and such a noise was made about it, that made many believe that the House was modeled of monsters rather than men of reason and judgment." The writer adds that, notwithstanding, "there were very sober and moderate gentlemen in the account of all men, that concurred heartily in this vote, and upon whom little blemish will stick." And no doubt, being such, these hard words did not much affect them, since all reformers must wear that epithet of monsters till they transfer it finally to the abuses they have resolved to overthrow.

Cromwell assisted, with all his energy, the outcry raised against the vote, and, strengthened by his authority, there arose from out of the courts and purlieus of Westminster such a multitudinous and tumultuous clamour of voices and of pens, that the like had not been heard before, to "protect from ruin the venerable fabric of English jurisprudence." The presumption of these ignorant and fanatical legislators was ridiculed by every device of falsehood; the design was ascribed to them of substituting the law of Moses for the law of the land; and the people were earnestly conjured to unite in defence of their "birthright and inheritance," for the preservation of which so many miseries had been endured and so much blood had been shed. This charge of an intention to overthrow all custom and common sense

* Godwin, vol. iii., p. 572.

† When Cromwell, however, had fairly settled himself in power, he did not scruple, in the year following, to act upon the vote he thus opposed! In 1655 he issued an ordinance, consisting of sixty-seven articles, "for the better regulating and limiting the jurisdiction of the High Court of Chancery." The commissioners of the great seal, Widdrington and Whitelocke, with Lenthall, the master of the rolls, informed him by letter, on its appearance, that they had sought the Lord, but did not find themselves free to act according to the ordinance. But, alas for them! the slightest good-will from the people had become more important to the Lord Protector than the most potent sanction of the lawyers; and therefore Cromwell, without the smallest delay or scruple, took the seals from the first two, and gave them to Piennes and Lisle. Lenthall opportunely overcame his scruples, and remained in office. See Scobell, p. 324, for the ordinance.

in favour of the law of Moses was afterward frequently insisted on by Cromwell. It rested altogether on a single expression used in the debate, that neither the infliction of the punishment of death for theft, nor the sparing the lives of men for murder, under the notion and name of manslaughter, ought to be sanctioned in the new code, because no such things were to be found in the "law of God" or the sanction of "right reason."

But a vindication of the purpose and necessity of this vote, and of the intentions of its originators, has been left on record by one of themselves, and possesses too much interest and value to be here omitted. The main grounds for it, he tells us, as rested upon in the debate, were the "intricacy, uncertainty, and incongruity of the laws as now they are. First," he continues, "that whereas the laws ought to be easy, plain, and short, so that they who were to be subject to them, and have benefit by them, might be able to know and understand them in some good measure, they are now so voluminous, and thereby intricate and uncertain, dark and concealed, as few are able to come to the knowledge of them. Those of the profession of the law differ, in very many cases, what the law is, and are of several opinions about this thing and the other; and then how should others, though highly concerned, be able to understand them, and their interest therein contained, there being so many law-books of great bulk, so many old musty records, reports, and book-cases, as that, after the time spent in school-learning, the rest of the time of the flower of a man's years would be little enough to read them over and peruse them; and besides, those records and book-cases are very ill guides or lights to go by, for who knoweth the circumstances that did attend them, which often alter the whole case? Who knoweth whether, in those cases, bribery did not make the judgment; or the powerfulness of some great man; or the love or hatred of the judge; or the negligence or corruption of the advocate? And, besides, in those law cases, some precedents are directly contrary to others; and an advocate or counsel allegeth one case or report, and another another; and then the judge followeth which he pleaseth. How arbitrary is the law in this case! And at what uncertainty are the great interests and properties of men! . . . Besides, how various are the customs which, notwithstanding, pass for law! usually unknown but to some old man of the place, which, though it be ever so unrighteous and unreasonable, time out of mind carries it. How bulky and voluminous are the statute-books! and of so great a price that few are able to buy them; and so large that few can spare time to read them, to know their right, and how they are concerned in them; and yet they must be judged, and stand or fall by them. And many times some musty statute, of a hundred years old and more imprinted, is found and made use of by some crafty lawyer, to the undoing of an honest man that meant no hurt, nor knew anything at all of the danger."

The wisdom and humanity of these arguments are surely not to be disputed. The writer afterward goes on to describe the measures adopted in realization of them. "Upon something," he says, "held forth to this effect, the vote was first carried for a new body or model of the law; and a committee chosen to that end, who met often, and had the help of some gentlemen of worth, that had deserved well of their country, being true patriots; who liked well the thing, as very useful and desirable; it being not a destroying of the law, or putting it down, as some scandalously reported, but a reducing the whole, just, and good laws into a body, from them that are useless and out of date; such as concerned the bishops and Holy Church, so called, and were made in favour of kings, and the lusts of great men, of which there are very many. If the law of God be eyed, and right reason looked into in all, there be some laws that are contrary to both, as the putting men to death for theft, the sparing the lives of men for murder, under the notion and name of manslaughter—a term and distinction not found in the righteous law of God; and that unreasonable law, that if a wagon or cart, &c., driven by the owner or some other, with never so much care, fall and kill any person, the owner, though it were his own son or servant, that could no way help it, shall lose his horse and wagon by the profane and superstitious name of deodand; and the owners of the goods shall lose them also upon the same account, though they were as innocent as Abel. Other instances might also be given. The way the committee took in order to their work, which must needs be elaborate, was, by reducing the several laws to their proper heads to which they did belong, and so modelizing or embodying of them; taking knowledge of the nature of them, and what the law of God said in the case, and how agreeable to right reason they were; likewise how proportionable the punishment was to the offence or crime; and wherein there seemed anything either deficient or excessive, to offer a supply and remedy, in order to rectifying the whole. The committee began with criminals. Treason being the highest, they considered the kinds thereof; what was meet to be adjudged treason in a free commonwealth, and what was meet to be the punishment of grand and petty treason. Then they proceeded to murder, the kinds of it, and what was to be so adjudged, and the punishment thereof. The like they intended concerning theft, and, after, to have ascertained and secured property; as also the executive part of the law, so as a person should not need to part with one property to secure and keep another, as now it is; persons being forced to lose the property of their cow to keep the property of their horse, or one parcel of land to preserve and keep another. This body of law, when modelized, was to be reported to the House to be considered of, and passed by them as they should see cause: a work in itself great, and of high esteem with many, for the good fruit and benefit that would arise from it; by which means the huge volumes of the law would come to be reduced into the bigness of a pocket-book, as it is proportionably in New-England and elsewhere. A thing of so great worth and benefit as England is not yet worthy of, nor likely in a short time to be so blessed as to enjoy. And this being the true end and endeavour of those members that laboured in that committee, it is submitted to every godly and rational man in the nation, whether, as is most falsely and wickedly reported and charged upon persons acting in so much love to their country, their endeavours tended to destroy the whole laws, and pulling them up by the roots."

The appeal will be honestly answered at last, even though deferred till now. Nor are there many rational men among us who, while they offer their hearty sympathy to the honourable motives and exertions of this writer and his associates, will not also avow, in shame and regret, that the design they had thus commenced two hundred years ago was indeed a thing of so great worth and benefit that England is not yet worthy of it, nor likely in a short time to be so blessed as to enjoy it!

The soldiers and lawyers having thus been thoroughly roused by the first two of these famous votes, it was reserved for the remaining two to provoke the parsons and the patrons of livings. The third great vote, for example, involved the subject of presentations to benefices. It assailed "Satan himself" in his "stronghold" of advowsons. Nothing could certainly be more adverse to that religious spirit—call it fervent or fanatical, seek it among Independents or Presbyterians—now in undoubted prevalence with a majority of the English people, than these rights of presentation and advowson, where in the first case the possessor of a certain property claimed the power of naming the priest of the parish where his property lay, and in the second (as the term is used in ordinary acceptation), for a given sum of money disposed of that right to another, against the first vacancy that should occur. It was, the originators of this vote contended, contrary to reason that any private individual should possess the power of imposing a spiritual guide upon his neighbours, and therefore they argued that presentations should be abolished, and the choice of the minister be vested in the body of the parishioners, who might thus have the power, in selecting a preacher that was to lead them in the ways of eternal life, to secure one whose modes of thinking coincided with their own, and whose temper, general carriage, and habits of life were agreeable to them. Meanwhile, the question had deeply interested and aroused vast numbers of patrons of livings and influential men of that class, who sought against Parliamentary oppression the "protection" of the lord-general; and an earnest stand was accordingly made in their favour. The vote was carried, however, on the 17th of November, that the right of presentation to benefices should be taken away, and the people in the several parishes be authorized to choose their own instructors. A bill to that effect was at the same time ordered to be brought in.

The last and most fatal of all the votes involved the much-vexed question of tithes, and was somewhat strangely brought, as by a "side wind," before the House. The result of a "large debate" at the commencement of the session had been an understanding or agreement that tithes ought to be abolished, and that in their stead a compensation should be made to the impropriators, and a decent maintenance provided for the clergy. We have seen, accordingly, that one of the committees which were named for the discussion and arrangement of many of the most important questions of public policy was chosen to examine into tithes, with a special instruction to inquire into the alleged sacredness of the property which was thus constituted. Great were the fluctuations and vicissitudes of the Parliament during the subsequent months; and it was not till the 2d of December that the committee made its report; nor is it supposed, indeed, that the report would even then have been presented, but with the hope of arresting, in some sort, the farther agitation of the question of advowsons. The report was entitled "respecting the method of rejecting scandalous, and settling godly ministers;" but its chief article was a distinct opinion of the committee appended to it as a sort of second section, that incumbents, rectors, and impropriators had a property in tithes. This report provoked a most earnest and singular debate of five days,* and when the question was put

† The author of the "Exact Relation" gives a detailed description, which is as correct as it is vivid, of the circumstances of this debate, and of the real bearing of this celebrated vote. "The fourth vote," he says, "whereupon followed the dissolution of the Parliament, was that harmless negative of not complying with the report of the committee, touching what they offered as the best way to eject ignorant, profane, and scandalous ministers, and encouraging them that are good, &c.; of which two things, and so an end of this discourse: first, of the proceed to it, and in the debate of it, and then that which followed after it, till the House was dissolved. The proceed was shortly this: after the aforesaid vote had passed, and some of the gentlemen of the House were in readiness to offer the bill, the committee for tithes, to counterwork and keep that off, as some thought, did on Monday morning offer this report, and many were for the taking of it on; others were against the meddling with it at that time; some moving to have the bill taken in concerning presentations, some to fall on things of more present concernment, as the bill for uniting Scotland to England. Reasons were offered on every side, and after one o'clock the House rose, and nothing fastened on. The next morning, those that were for the report to be taken in the day before moved again, and the other not opposing, it was taken in, but not without being put to the vote whether the House would take it in, which was carried in the affirmative; and so the debate began, and continued day after day, till after one o'clock each day, the speaker being aged, and not able to sit longer. The debate was managed day by day with very great seriousness, many arguments, and scriptures being alleged. The House being evenly poised, and great attendance been given by the members, waiting the time of the vote; and though any member might, by the rules of the House, have spoken every day as long as the debate continued, yet such was the modesty showed, that hardly any on all the five days spake twice; very little of heat or passion being showed all that time; only one gentleman or two that were for the report, seeing themselves and their party so engaged, flew out a little, complaining of the expense of time, to have given a check to the going on of the debate. But the orders of the House being called for by some of the other side of the speaker, he declared it to be the right of every one to be heard, and that the question could not be put so long as any would speak to it; withal, those gentlemen were told of their restlessness to take on the debate, and how they wanted patience to wait the issue of it. After three or four days, a member that was against the report offered an expedient, but was not accepted. At last, on Saturday, towards noon, the question drew near, as did also the end of the Parliament; some members that were against the report having not spoken, and essaying to speak, were persuaded to forbear, who only gathered the issue and result of the whole, and left it to the House; which was, whether, upon the whole, this which is in the report was the best expedient for that end? which some on the other side, that were for the report, perceiving the stress of the question put there, moved that the word 'best' might be put out; but it was not admitted, having been in the report all the time of the debate; so about one of the clock the vote passed, and upon dividing the House was carried in the negative. A debate of that nature and length, in so great a council, hardly ever passed with such soberness, and little heat or passion. The business was in statu quo as to any one's being either better or worse; the report was laid aside, for that the first part of it, whereon the other part depended, was rejected; to wit, that the best way to eject ignorant, profane, and on the first section as to an entertainment of the mode of settling godly ministers, though the committee, assisted in all respects by Cromwell, had mustered the whole force of the Independents in its favour, it was rejected on the 10th of December by a majority of two. The numbers were fifty-six to fifty-four. The second part, respecting the property in tithes, was in reality not put to the vote at all; its fate was held to be included in that of the former; and it was at once, with the rapidity of lightning, circulated through London, that Parliament had voted the abolition of tithes, and with them of the ministry, which derived its maintenance from tithes!

The time had arrived for the master-stroke of Cromwell.* Every power in the land that could make itself felt above the general indifference of the people was now in arms against the only body which stood between him and absolute rule. The compact between Cromwell and these various powers was thoroughly scandalous ministers, and to encourage them that are good, by sending certain commissioners empowered to do it, as at full length hath been put forth in print already. There was, at the passing of this vote, 115 members, whereof 54 were the affirmative, and 56 for the negative, and two gentlemen, tellers for each side, and the speaker, which make up that number."

* I should observe, that besides the scenes of Parliament that had paved the way for it, other causes had worked as strongly. On every Monday during the session, Fenkes and Powell, two Anabaptist preachers, had delivered weekly lectures to numerous audiences at Blackfriars. They certainly appear to have been eloquent enthusiasts, commissioned, as they fancied, by God himself, and regardless of earthly control. They introduced into their sermons most of the subjects discussed in Parliament, and advocated the principles of their sect with a force and extravagance which had powerfully advanced the object of Cromwell and his council; because, in investing with their fanatical and fantastical phrases the various measures of the Convention, they managed to conceal very effectually from the understandings of common men their really temperate wisdom and correct bearing on the true interests of the people. Their favourite topic was the Dutch war. God, they maintained, had given Holland into the hands of the English; it was to be the landing-place of the saints, whence they should proceed to pluck the w— of Babylon from her chair, and to establish the kingdom of Christ on the Continent; and they threatened with every kind of temporal and everlasting woe the man who should advise peace on any other terms than the incorporation of the United Provinces with the Commonwealth of England. When it was suspected, for example, that Cromwell had receded from this demand, their indignation stripped the pope of many of those titles "with which," as Dr. Lingard observes, "he had so long been honoured by the Protestant churches, and the lord-general was publicly declared to be the beast in the Apocalypse, the old dragon, and the man of sin." Unwilling even to appear to evade the liberty of religious meetings, Cromwell had for some time borne these insults with an air of indifference; at last he summoned the two preachers before himself and the council; but the "heralds of the Lord of Hosts quailed not before the servants of an earthly commonwealth;" they returned rebuke for rebuke, charged Cromwell with an unjustifiable assumption of power, and departed from the conference unpunished and unabashed. By the common and generally indifferent public, as a matter of course, these sermons at Blackfriars were considered as strictly and entirely explanatory of the views and principles of the reformers in the House, and the poor reformers suffered accordingly. Their enemies multiplied daily; ridicule and abuse were poured upon them from every quarter, and "it became evident to all but themselves that the hour of their fall was rapidly approaching." In illustration of Messrs. Fenkes and Powell's style of preaching, it will only be necessary to quote the mention of the sermons on one occasion, by Beveringh, the Dutch ambassador, who went out of curiosity to hear them. It is given in Thurlow, vol. i., p. 442. "The scope and intention," he says, "is to preach down governments, and to stir up the people against the united Netherlands. Being then in the assembly of the saints, I heard one prayer, two sermons; but, good God! what cruel, and abominable, and most horrid trumpets of fire, murder, and flame!"

understood. The sacrifices to be made on the one hand, the "protection" to be given on the other, were as thoroughly prepared.

The day after the vote against the report on tithes happened to be Sunday. Cromwell passed it in his own house, in secret consultation with his friends; and the result of this consultation appeared early on the morning of the day following. On Monday, the 12th of December, a considerable number of members in the interest of Cromwell were observed to enter the House of Commons at an unusually early hour. Old Francis Rouse, the speaker, arrived some minutes after them, and a House was at once formed. No question of superior interest had been entered for discussion that day, and the number of the extreme party of reformers who happened to be present was singularly few. When, however, Cromwell's men were observed to enter in such unusual strength, suspicions arose, and messengers were despatched by the reformers for reinforcements against them.

They had scarcely left the House—prayers were briefly said—when Colonel Sydenham rose to address the speaker. He must take leave, he said, to unburden himself of some things that had long lain upon his heart. He had to speak, not of matters relating to the well-being of the Commonwealth, but that were inseparable from its very existence. He proceeded to load the measures of the Parliament, and particularly of a majority of its members, with the most monstrous charges and accusations. He said that they aimed at no less than destroying the clergy, the law, and the property of the subject. Their purpose was to take away the law of the land, and the birthrights of Englishmen, for which all had so long been contending with their blood, and to substitute in their room a code, modelled on the law of Moses, and which was adapted only for the nation of the Jews. In the heat of a preposterous fervour, they had even laid the axe to the root of the Christian ministry, alleging that it was Babylonish, and that it was anti-Christ. They were the enemies of all intellectual cultivation and all learning.* He noticed a motion which had been made by some member, that the great officers of the army should be treated with to serve without pay for one year, and another suggestion that had been offered, in the progress of the bill of assessment for six months for the maintenance of the army and navy, that the bill should be laid aside till a plan had been arranged for a more equal taxation of the subject: symptoms, he added, which, in no equivocal manner, indicated a deep-laid design in some for the total dissolution of the army.† In these circumstances, he said that he could no longer satisfy

* How little has the style of abuse, in matters appertaining to reform of law or church, changed with the passage of two centuries! Is there an Exeter Hall declaimer against education who might not adopt this argument of Sydenham as a text of faith? Is there a party man of religion, above the rank of curate or rector, who does not think the love of tithes synonymous with the love of learning?

† But Sydenham himself confessed that this was a mere single and unsupported idea of a single member of the House, taken up by no one after it was broached, dying as soon as born; and therefore his argument was ridiculous, save as a mere party weapon—"a stick to beat a dogge."

himself to sit in that House; and he moved that the continuance of this Parliament, as now constituted, would not be for the good of the Commonwealth, and that therefore it was requisite that the House, in a body, should repair to the lord-general, to deliver back into his hands the powers which they had received from him. His motion was seconded by Sir Charles Wolseley.

One of the most eloquent of the reformers (his name has not been preserved by the reporter of his speech) then rose and earnestly protested against the motion. He defended the character of the Parliament so unnaturally deserted by its own members; he challenged every statement made by Sydenham on the question of tithes. What had been proposed, he said, was so far from being intended to the prejudice of the parochial clergy, that its express object was to render the revenues of the clergy more certain and equal, by reducing benefices of £200 a year and upward, by increasing those of smaller income, and also by making a provision for the widows and children of ministers. As the Long Parliament, when they abolished Episcopacy, and sold the temporal revenues of the bishops, deans, and chapters, made an express reserve of all appropriations, which were to be applied to increase the revenues of the parochial clergy and the universities, so had a precisely similar reserve been made by the present assembly in their act for enabling delinquents to compound for their estates. He then enumerated the various measures conducive to the public advantage that were in progress, and extolled in the highest terms the disinterestedness and diligence of the Parliament and its committees. He protested, in conclusion, with passionate earnestness, against a measure fraught with such incalculable calamity as the dispersion of that Parliament would prove. Several other reformers followed on the same side with equal warmth, and the debate promised to be of considerable duration. Other reformers, who had been sent for, were now also fast arriving, and the issue seemed at the least doubtful. The number of Cromwell's partisans might be about forty; the reformers had by this time mustered between thirty and thirty-five.*

* This is according to the double evidence of the author of the Exact Relation and of the New Narrative of the Dissolution. A letter from one of the members to his brother, contained in Thurloe, gives the same number to the Cromwell party, and says, that when the latter had left, only twenty-seven reformers stayed behind. The other eight, no doubt, felt that any farther resistance would be idle. I subjoin this letter, from Bussy Mansel to Edward Pritchard, which derives its interest from the fact of its writer having been present. "Since I writ my last to you, and some days before, we were about a report from the committee of tithes, about sending commissioners to the several circuits to cast out all that they judged to be unfit to be ministers, and to put in all they judged to be fit upon the last day of the week. This power and its appurtenances came to the question, and it was carried in the negative. Hereupon those gentlemen that were for the report came sooner than their usual hower upon Monday to the House, and there spoke of the unlikelihood of doing good, and instanced in several things that they judged evil that was done, and therefore desired that they would goe, and returne that power they had from whence they received it; and thereupon about forty, and the speaker, went to the generall, and did accordingly. Twenty-seven stayed in the House a little time speaking to one another; and going to speak to the Lord in prayer, Col. Goffe and Lieut.-col. White came into the House, and desired them that were there to come out. Some answered that they were there by a call from the

All doubt, however, was suddenly ended by the extraordinary conduct of the speaker, Francis Rouse, who had become one of Cromwell's most thorough-going tools. Acting on an evidently preconceived plan, he suddenly rose and left the chair. The sergeant took up the mace and carried it before him as he quitted the hall; even the clerk rose and went out at the same instant; while as many members as were favourable to the motion followed, and repaired at once to Whitehall, to demand admission to Cromwell. Some few reformers left also, in hopelessness and disgust. Twenty-seven of the more fervent and enthusiastic remained, gazing on each other in wonder at what had passed, insufficient in numbers to make a House, and without a speaker had they been so inclined. Harrison appears to have been one of these, as well as one of the orators in the debate that had preceded. They continued thus for some time, in helpless consultation as to what was to be done, and had just proposed to fall to prayers, when two officers, Colonel Goffe and Major White,* suddenly entered, and requested them to withdraw. Harrison demanded by what warrant, and Major White called in a file of musketeers. No farther resistance was offered; the House was expeditiously cleared, and the keys left with the guard.

The speaker, meanwhile, preceded by the mace, and followed by Sydenham and his party, walked through the streets to Cromwell's residence at Whitehall. Some few members, who were on their way to the House, joined him, in curiosity, as he passed; some few, in fear. Having arrived at Whitehall, they withdrew into one of the apartments, and placed a few hurried lines on paper expressive of the resignation of their power into Cromwell's hands. This was as hastily engrossed by the clerk, subscribed by the speaker and his followers, generall, and would not come ont by their desire, unless they had a command from him. They returned noe answer, but went out and fetched two files of musqueters, and did as good as force them out, amongst whom I was an unworthy one."

* A vulgar piece of pleasantry, on the part of this Major White, has been suffered to creep into history. He is said to have asked, on his entrance, "What they did there?" to have been answered by Harrison, "That they were seeking the Lord;" and to have rejoined, "Then you may go elsewhere, for to my knowledge he has not been here for several years past." The anecdote rests on the authority of a piece of Royalist scurrility, in which the circumstance of the dissolution is described after this fashion: "In the mean time, Rouse, the speaker, with the mace before him (and his followers), came to Whitehall, and there resigned the instrument he gave them, by which they were constituted a Parliament, and gave them likewise to understand how they had left their fellows. Their surrender y was kindly received by Oliver, and they thanked for the pains they had taken in the service of the Commonwealth, however he and they had miss'd of their intentions of the good should thereby have come to the Commonwealth, which a strange spirit and perverse principle in some of the members had solely hindered: and as to them yet sitting in the Parliament House, he despatched away Lieutenant-colonel White, a confident of his, to dislodge them, who accordingly, with a guard of red-coats, came thither, and entering the House, demanded them, in the name of the generall, to depart, for the Parliament was dissolved; who, replying to the contrary, and telling him they were upon business, and ought not thus to be disturbed, he asked, 'What business?' They answered, 'We are seeking of God.' 'Pugh!' saith he, 'is that all? That's to no purpose, for God hath not been within these walls these twelve years;' and so fairly compelled them out, muttering with the same wrath and sorrowful looks back as those that had sat thirty times the same term, and could have almost pleaded prescription."

and tendered by them to Cromwell, who at once put on a well-painted air of surprise, asseverated that he was not prepared for such an offer, and protested that he could not load himself with so heavy and serious a burden.* But his reluctance yielded at last to the remonstrances and entreaties of Lambert and the officers, and the instrument was laid in a chamber of the palace for the convenience of such members as had not yet subscribed their names.

It lay there three days, and, though only signed at first by Sydenham's party, it is said to have exhibited, at the close of the third day, very nearly eighty names—a majority of the whole assembly; nor do I find any distinct authority that questions this. In what way these signatures were obtained, or whether they were in all respects genuine, is a matter scarcely worth discussion. The existence of the Convention sprang out of cheat and delusion; and though its career was elevated into respect by the unlooked-for gravity of its counsels and the wise determination of its measures, its abrupt

* It seems hardly credible that such hypocrisy as this could have been attempted; but Cromwell had now lost, in matters of this kind, all sense of ingenuousness or shame. His tools and creatures would seem to believe anything, for the pleasure, in being duped, of duping others in turn; and he himself would seem ready to say or do anything at all times, only to show his power of doing or saying it. He had the deliberate effrontery, for example, to repeat the present farce of falsehood to the first Parliament of the Protectorate, whom he assured, in the most solemn manner, "that he was so far from having any hand in the project, that he was an absolute stranger to the design, till the speaker, with the major part of the House, came to him with the instrument of their resignation." It was in the same speech, I may add, that he used the characteristic expression, "I have appealed to God before you already; I know that it is a tender thing to make appeals to God." I do not insult the common sense of the reader by affecting to inquire into the possibility of sincere self-delusion here. Setting aside the plain-course of his policy, from the first moment of the existence of this Parliament to his last deliberation with his officers before its fall, will any rational person believe that a file of musketeers could be marched into the House of Parliament, the members turned out, and the door of the House locked, without the knowledge of the lord-general? I subjoin an extract from Ludlow, in corroboration of the views already urged in the text. "The perfidious Cromwell having forgot his most solemn professions and former vows, as well as the blood and treasure that had been spent in this contest, thought it high time to take off the mask, and resolved to sacrifice all our victories and deliverances to his pride and ambition, under colour of taking upon him the office, as it were, of a high constable, in order to keep the peace of the nation, and to restrain men from cutting one another's throats. One difficulty yet remained to obstruct his design, and that was the Convention, which he had assembled and invested with power, as well as earnestly solicited to reform the law, and reduce the clergy to a more evangelical constitution; and having sufficiently alarmed those interests, and shown them their danger from the Convention, he informs them farther that they cannot be ignorant of the confusion that all things are brought into by the immoderate zeal of those in authority, and to what extremities matters might be reduced if permitted to go on—possibly, said he, to the utter extirpation of law and Gospel from among us; and therefore advised that they would join their interests to his, in order to prevent this inundation. His proposition was readily embraced by the corrupt part of the lawyers and clergy, and so he became their protector, and they the humble supporters of his tyranny. But that his usurpation might seem less horrid, he so contrived it, by his instruments, that some of the Convention must openly manifest their disapprobation of their own proceedings, and under divers specious pretences put a period to their sitting. When the instrument of resignation was brought to Cromwell, 'tis said he lifted up his eyes with astonishment, and with no less seeming modesty refused to receive it; but at length, through the importunity of Major-general Lambert and others, representing to him that the welfare of the nation absolutely required his acceptance of the Parliament's resignation, he thought fit to comply with their request."

and iniquitous end was nothing more than the natural consummation of its monstrous origin. Some of the members, it is said, were induced to yield their signatures to the solicitations of the friends of Cromwell; some to fear, and a reluctance to incur the displeasure of the powerful; several, according to one of their own members, because certain of their companions and allies had done it already; several, happy that they might so be rid of a troublesome and thankless employment; and several, because they would not expose themselves to the charge of ambition, and an overweening love of dignity and power.* Thus was a majority at last obtained, and within a few hours afterward came forth the new constitution of government, in which Oliver Cromwell openly stood supreme.

On Friday, the 16th of December, 1653—an ominous day—the lord-general set out in his carriage, at about one in the afternoon, from his own residence to Westminster Hall, through two lines of soldiery, composed of five regiments of foot and three of horse. When he arrived at the door of the Hall, a procession formed, of persons who there awaited him, and wonderfully complete were the various arrangements for an event, of the possibility of which the chief actor, only three days before, had solemnly asseverated his utter and hopeless ignorance! The aldermen entered first, then the judges, the commissioners of the great seal (Keble and Lisle), and the lord-mayor. Behind these were the two councils, of state and the army. They ascended to the court of chancery, where a chair of state with a cushion had been placed on a rich carpet, and here arranged themselves—Keble on the right hand of the chair, and Lisle on the left; the judges on both sides; the lord-mayor and aldermen on the right, and the members of the two councils on the left. It was a brilliant scene: the robes of the civilians blended with the full dress equipments of the soldiers in a most imposing picture, and excitement stirred on every face.

* Exact Relation. There are some other points of detail in the account of the writer of the Exact Relation, which make it worth while to subjoin the description of the whole scene of the dissolution in his own words: "The speaker, forgetting the duty of his place, though he was earnestly called unto to keep the chair, he left it; and the sergeant, as if he had been of council, took up the mace and carried it before him, though he was spoken unto to the contrary, as in like manner did the chief clerks; and thus, in an irruptious way going out of the House without any adjournment or vote, left sitting thirty or thirty-five members in the House. Whether those that so went away were a greater, or lesser number, as is more likely, it is hard to be determined, though it be thought by some there were not seventy so early in the House. Those that went out of the House, going towards Whitehall, met some coming to the House, who, seeing them go in that manner, thought they had adjourned thither, and so went along with them: others they sent for up and down, where they could find them, to come to them to the House chamber, where they were. Those in the House immediately betook themselves to consider what they had to do, being so deserted of their fellows; and telling over their number, they found themselves but thirty-four or thirty-five, which could not make a House, forty being the least number that might act in a Parliamentary way. As they were going to consider among themselves, a colonel and lieutenant-colonel entered the House, and desired them to depart. The members desired them to withdraw, for that they, as members of Parliament, had warrant to be there; and if they had warrant to put them out, they wished them to show it; but not many words passed; they went back and opened the doors, and brought in the soldiers with their muskets, and then the gentlemen rose and went out, which was done before the other were half way at Whitehall; and some so put out of the House went after to Whitehall, to see what they were doing, and found them in the House chamber, preparing a writing of surrender of their power back into his hands from whom they had received it. If they had been his council, and not legislators or a Parliament, much might have been in it; it was three or four lines written in four or six several papers, that so the gentlemen might more easily read and see what it was; which, when the clerk engrossed on parchment, then they signed it by subscribing their names, as many as would; first the speaker, and then others, according to their quality. It may be wondered at that so great a power should be passed by so slow and little an instrument. Some gentlemen went three or four days after, and set their hands to it. They that subscribed it did it on several grounds and reasons: some did it knowingly to dissolve the House, before dissolved by the soldiers, and their disorderly going away, which they had plotted and resolved before; some because some eminent persons of their party did it before them, expecting by that means to have been rid of some of the other party at the least, and they to have continued in power without them, wherein they were deceived, and not a little vexed; some therein looked no farther than at their own quiet, and to be rid of a troublesome employment; some, that they might not be thought lovers of power and dignity; and some, out of weakness and fear of the loss of some worldly enjoyment, which they have sufficiently repented and been sorry for since."

Cromwell entered, and every person in the hall uncovered. He advanced, and took his place next the Lord-commissioner Lisle. He was plainly dressed—a secret artifice of pride. He wore neither robes nor uniform, but a simple suit and cloak of black velvet, with long boots, and a broad gold band round his hat. As soon as he had taken his position, Lambert advanced from the circle and addressed him. He declared the dissolution of the late Parliament; observed that the exigency of the time required a strong and stable government; and prayed his excellency, in the name of the army and the three nations, to accept the office of Protector of the Commonwealth, or chief magistrate, under a new Constitution, which had been prepared by the council of the army and sanctioned by the principal officers of state.*

* There can be scarcely a doubt that this assertion was only part of the entire delusion, and that the form as well as details of the new Constitution had been, in fact, the entire suggestion and arrangement of Cromwell himself. Ludlow says, in the sole account preserved of its origin or authorship, that it had been in deliberation for upward of two months before this memorable day, and many other circumstances strongly corroborate this most probable assertion. Not the least striking of these, I may add, is the fact (which I have established in the Life of Vane) that the best provisions in this "instrument," relating to the establishment of new constituencies, are bodily taken out of the famous reform act of Vane, which Cromwell brought away with him under his cloak, uncopied and unengrossed on the fatal 20th of April. Another remarkable fact which tends to prove it is, that when the idea of a new Instrument of Government was first submitted to Cromwell in private, the title appropriated to the chief magistrate in the first article would seem to have been that of king. To this Cromwell at once objected. No doubt he wished to receive the offer from a less questionable authority, and had secretly resolved, also, that the minds of the people and of his own partisans should be better prepared, before he ventured on a step so hazardous. The Dutch ambassador (see Thurlow, vol. i., p. 644) seems to have received a confused statement of this circumstance; for he says that it was Cromwell's first project to be declared king, and that he only desisted because of the reluctance of his officers. The contrary would decidedly appear (if we may trust an authority by no means indisputable) from a speech of Cromwell to the body of 100 officers, who waited on him in February, 1657, to remonstrate against the title of king. He plainly tells them that they had on the former occasion offered him the title, and that he had refused it. (MSS. Additions to Ayscough, appended by Mr. Rutt to Burton's Diary. And Bates, in his Elenchus Motuum, part ii., p. 166, observes on the occasion, "Yet Cromwell would not accept of the government by the title of king, though he was persuaded to it by many.") The obscure statement of the official account is merely that "the Parliament having surrendered its powers into the hands of the lord-general, from whom it had received them, he called a council of the Lambert, as he concluded, turned to one of the clerks of the council, Jessop, and ordered him to read aloud the act or instrument in which this new Constitution was embodied. The reading of this act, entitled "the Government of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging," occupied upward of half an hour. It was a document of unquestionable ability, as even the brief abstract which may be admitted here will show.

Its first and most essential article was, that the supreme legislative authority should be in one person, and the people in Parliament assembled; and that the style of that person should be Lord Protector. It proceeded, that the Protector should be assisted with a council, of not fewer than thirteen, nor more than twenty-one persons; * that all writs, processes, commissions, and grants should run in his name; and that from him should be derived all magistracy and honours; that he should order the militia and forces both by sea and land, and with his council should have the power of war principal officers of the army, and advised with other persons of interest in the nation, who, after three days seeking God and consulting on the subject, concluded upon the form of the government of the Commonwealth. (Declaration of the Lord Protector." Perfect Diurnal, Dec. 19. Weekly Intelligencer, Dec. 20.) This council is said to have been opened by the lord-general with a most excellent, wise, gracious, and pious speech. (Several Proceedings, Dec. 15.) Ludlow's account, corroborating many of these points, is as follows: "After," he says, "a few days, a council of field-officers was summoned, where Major-general Lambert having rehearsed the several steps and degrees by which things had been brought to the present state wherein they were, and pressed the necessity incumbent upon the army to provide something in the room of what was lately taken away, presented to them a paper intitled 'An Instrument of Government,' which he read in his place. Some of the officers being convinced that the contents of this instrument tended to the sacrificing all our labours to the lust and ambition of a single person, began to declare their unwillingness to concur in it. But they were interrupted by the major-general, and informed that it was not now to be disputed whether this should be the form of government or not, for that was already resolved, it having been under consideration for two months past; neither was it brought before them with any other intention than to give them permission to offer any amendments they should think fit, with a promise they should be taken into consideration. The council of officers, perceiving to what terms they were restrained, proposed that it might be declared in this instrument that the general of the army should, after this first time, be held incapable of being Protector (for that was the title given by this instrument to the chief magistrate, though some were said to have moved that it might be king); that none of the relations of the last Protector should be chosen at the next succeeding election, and that a general council of all the commission officers who were about the town should be summoned to consider thereof. To these propositions they could obtain no other answer than that they should be offered to the general, which was the title they yet gave to Cromwell. At the next meeting of the officers it was not thought fit to consult with them at all; but they were openly told by Major-general Lambert that the general would take care of managing the civil government; and then, having required them to repair to their respective charges, where their troops and companies lay, that they might preserve the public peace, he dismissed them."

By observing the first council appointed by the new Protector under this institute, we may fairly make out Cromwell's chief creatures and most favourite advisers through all the recent extraordinary scenes. Of the twelve original counsellors named by him in the preceding April, six were preserved, Laubert, Desborough, Strickland, Sydenham, Philip Jones, and Sir Gilbert Pickering; and six omitted, Harrison, Tomlinson, Stapley, Carew, Moyer, and Bennet. To the six preserved were added seven from among those who had been named by the Parliament at their meeting, Lord Lisle, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sir Charles Wolsey, Fleetwood, Montague, Richard Major, and Henry Lawrence. To these counsellors were now first added by Cromwell, Major-general Skippon, and Francis Rouse, the late speaker.

and peace; that no law should be altered, suspended, abrogated, or repealed; but by the authority of Parliament; and that a Parliament should be summoned in every third year. It directed that the summons to Parliament should be by writ under the great seal, and that, if the Protector should neglect to order these writs, the keeper or keepers of the seal should issue them on their own authority, under pain of high treason. Also, in case of similar neglect in these officers, the sheriffs of the counties were to proceed in the election in the same manner as if the writs had been issued, under the like penalty. Each Parliament was to sit five months; and if an intermediate Parliament was called by the Lord Protector, it was not to be prorogued or dissolved within three months, unless by its own consent. In case of war with any foreign state, a Parliament was to be summoned immediately. The institute determined that every person possessing an estate, real or personal, to the value of two hundred pounds, should have a vote at the election of members of Parliament, excepting such as had been concerned in the war against the Parliament or in the rebellion in Ireland. It ordered, that all bills passed by the Parliament should be presented to the Lord Protector for his assent, and if he did not assent within twenty days, the Parliament might declare his neglect, and the bills should then become law notwithstanding. The army was limited not to exceed ten thousand horse and twenty thousand foot. It was also directed, in an article which disclosed the secret and naked despotism which lurked beneath it all, that, till the meeting of the first triennial Parliament in September, 1654, the Protector and council might have power to raise money for the public defence, and to make such laws and ordinances as the welfare of the nation should require. No member could be removed from the council but for corruption, or such other miscarriage as should be judged by a committee from the Parliament and the council, together with the keeper or keepers of the seal; the removal during the intervals of Parliament to be made by the council itself, with the consent of the Protector. The institute farther ordered that the keeper or keepers of the seal, the treasurer, the admiral, the chief justices of the two benches, and the chief governors of Scotland and Ireland, should be nominated by Parliament, and in the intervals of Parliament by the Protector and council; that, as soon as might be, a provision should be made for the maintenance of the clergy, less subject to scruple and contention, and more certain, than the way of tithes; and that no person should be compelled to conform to the Established Church; nor should any be restrained, but all protected, in the profession and exercise of his religion, with an exception of the adherents of popery and prelacy. It was one article in the Institute of Government, that Oliver Cromwell should be declared Lord Protector for life, and that, in case of his demise, the council of state should assemble to the number of not fewer than thirteen, and immediately elect his successor. This clause was generally supposed to have been inserted to conciliate Lambert, and to feed him with the hope of being second lord protector. It was altered in the subsequent Petition and Advice, and the power surrendered to Cromwell. The plan for the future representation of the people was, as I have already endeavoured to show, in all its essentials, copied from the celebrated act which was on the point of passing into a law on that fatal twentieth of the preceding April. The representatives for England were to be four hundred. All petty boroughs where there was scarcely a single house were suppressed, and the representation, as nearly as might be, proportioned to the amount of taxation. Of these, 251 were to be county members, besides six for London, two for the Isle of Ely, two for the Isle of Wight, and two each for Exeter, Plymouth, York, Colchester, Gloucester, Canterbury, Leicester, Lincoln, Westminster, Norwich, Lynn, Yarmouth, Nottingham, Shrewsbury, Taunton, Bristol, Ipswich, Bury, Southwark, Coventry, Worcester, and Salisbury, one each for the two universities, and one each for all the towns and boroughs that were thought proper to be represented, among which Manchester is named. In addition to these, there were to be 30 representatives for Scotland, and 30 for Ireland; the distribution of the counties, cities, and places represented, and the number of their representatives respectively, being to be determined by the Lord Protector and his council previously to issuing the writs.

When the reading had closed, Lisle turned to Cromwell to administer to him his oath as Lord Protector of the Commonwealth; but even at this instant the habit of dissimulation prevailed over every other, and scruples appeared, and a wonderful humility and a most touching reluctance, which only gave way at last to an assent more touching still, in its seeming sacrifice of every selfish wish to the interests of his country! Then, raising his right hand and his eyes to heaven with great solemnity, Cromwell swore to observe, and cause to be observed, all the articles of the Instrument; and Lambert, falling on his knees, offered to the Lord Protector a civic sword in the scabbard, which he accepted, laying aside his own, to denote that he meant to govern by constitutional, and not by military authority! He then seated himself in the chair of state provided for him; put on his hat while the rest still stood uncovered; received the great seal from the commissioners, the sword of state from the lord-mayor, formally delivering them back again; and, having exercised these acts of sovereign authority, returned in procession to his carriage, and drove back to his palace at Whitehall with the state and majesty of a king.

In the evening of the same day proclamation was made in every quarter of London—accompanied by all the ceremonies that had hitherto been used on the accession of a new monarch—of the establishment of a new government by means of a chief magistrate and triennial Parliaments; and the people were called upon to offer their allegiance and obedience in all things to

OLIVER CROMWELL,
LORD PROTECTOR OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

Cromwell's first act was to revive the forms of monarchy. He issued new patents to the judges, as on the occasion of a succession to the crown*. He then completed the arrangements of his council, as named in the Instru-

* It appears from the order-books and law records that the first law-term of the year commenced on the 23d of January; and, accordingly, four days before, a fresh patent was issued to Rolfe, chief justice of the upper, and Atkins, one of the puisne judges of the common bench; on the first day of term, a similar patent was granted to St. John, chief justice of the common bench; and before the end of the month, patents were made out to Aske, a puisne judge of the upper bench, and Thorpe, a baron of the Exchequer. At the same time, Matthew Hale (I borrow many of these details from Mr. Godwin's Researches) was made a judge of the common bench, and Robert Nicholas, who had previously been a judge in the upper bench, was added to Thorpe in the Exchequer. Wild, who had been made chief baron in the year before the king's death, was desirous of being continued in his office, but could not obtain that favour from the Protector. Shortly after these appointments, a list was formed of twelve persons to hold the assizes at the principal towns of England for the spring circuit. Secret instructions were at the same time given to such as the new Protector could rely on, that they were "to take especial care to extend all favour and kindness to the Cavalier party." (Ludlow, vol. ii., p. 489.) Rolfe and Glyn were named for the western circuit, St. John and Atkins for the Oxford, Aske and Richard Newdigate for the home, Thorpe and Richard Pepys for the midland, Nicholas and William Conyers for the Norfolk, and Hale and Hugh Windham for the northern. Five of these persons, Glyn, Newdigate, Pepys, Conyers, and Windham, had not received patents as judges, and must therefore have officiated merely pro hac vice. Hale, Pepys, Newdigate, and Windham were called to the degree of sergeant at this time, together with Steele, the recorder, Maynard, Thomas Fletcher, and Thomas Twisden. Glyn and Conyers had been made sergeants in August, 1648. The names of Glyn and Maynard are emphatic proofs that these wily men anticipated a brilliant prospect for their detestable principles under this reign of Cromwell. Attorney-general Prideaux had a fresh patent from the Protector (docket-book of the Crown Office), January 23, 1654, and William Ellis was made solicitor-general (ibid.), May 24. The appointment of St. John is curious when we recall his own defence of himself under Charles the Second, and instead of corroborating that defence, would go to prove an extreme interest and confidence reposed in him by Cromwell. "It is said that I was the dark lantern and privy counsellor in setting up and managing affairs in the late Oliver Protector's time. This wholly denied, and the contrary true, and many witnesses of my manifesting my dislike. In October I fell sick so dangerously, that from that time till the end of May my friends expected death; I think in December or January he was set up, when I was at the worst." But I have already given abundant proofs of St. John's servile assistance to his great relation in all his worst designs. I cannot suffer the more honourable name of MATTHEW HALE to pass even in a note without giving (from Burnet's History of his own Time) two memorable instances of the way in which he discharged the functions of that office, to which it is one of the greatest merits of Cromwell to have appointed him. "Not long," says the bishop, "after he was made a judge, when he went the circuit, a trial was brought before him at Lincoln concerning the murder of one of the townsmen, who had been of the king's party, and was killed by a soldier of the garrison there. He was in the fields with a fowling-piece on his shoulder, which the soldier seeing, he came to him, and said it was contrary to an order which the Protector had made, that none who had been of the king's party should carry arms, and so he would have forced it from him; but as the other did not regard the order, so being stronger than the soldier, he threw him down, and having beat him, he left him. The soldier went into the town, and told one of his fellow-soldiers how he had been used, and got him to go with him, and lie in wait for the man, that he might be revenged on him. They both watched his coming to town, and one of them went to him to demand his gun, which he refusing, the soldier struck at him, and as they were struggling, the other came behind, and ran his sword into his body, of which he presently died. It was in the time of the assizes, so they were both tried. Against the one there was no evidence of forethought felony, so he was only found guilty of manslaughter, and burned on the hand; but the other was found guilty of murder; and though Colonel Whaley, that commanded the garrison, came into the court, and urged that the man was killed for disobeying the Protector's orders, and that the soldier was but doing his duty, yet the judge regarded both his reasons and threatenings very little, and therefore he not only gave sentence against him, but ordered the execution to be so suddenly done that it might not be possible to procure a reprieve, which he believed would have been obtained if there had been time enough granted for it. An-ment of Government, in the mode best fitted to promote his aims.* Colonel Henry Lawrence was nominated president for a month, reappointed at its expiration till farther orders, and, in fact, retained the office during the whole of the Protectorate. Thurloe, a man of thorough fitness for the work, was named secretary to the council, or, as he is frequently styled, secretary of state; and Walter Frost, the secretary under the Commonwealth, was appointed to an office which was called treasurer for the council's contingencies. Philip Meadows was chosen secretary for the Latin tongue, the office held under the statesmen by Milton; and Milton's name was entered in the order-book along with these, but unaccompanied with any specification of salary, or of the business in which he was to be employed.†

other occasion was given him of showing both his justice and courage, when he was in another circuit. He understood that the Protector had ordered a jury to be returned for a trial in which he was more than ordinarily concerned. Upon this information he examined the sheriff about it, who knew nothing of it, for he said he referred all such things to the under sheriff; and having next asked the under sheriff concerning it, he found the jury had been returned by order from Cromwell; upon which he showed the statute, that all juries ought to be returned by the sheriff or his lawful officer; and this not being done according to law, he dismissed the jury, and would not try the cause; upon which the Protector was highly displeased with him, and at his return from the circuit, told him in anger he was not fit to be a judge; to which all the answer he made was, that it was very true."

* The following is the list, as published officially, of the names of the councillors: Philip Viscount Lisle; Charles Fleetwood; John Lambert; Edward Montague; John Desborough; Walter Strickland; Henry Lawrence; Sir Gilbert Pickering, Bart.; Sir Charles Wolsley, Bart.; Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Bart.; William Sydenham; Philip Jones; Richard Major; Francis Rouse; Philip Skippon. To these were added, February 7, 1654, Humphrey Mackworth; April 27, Nathaniel Fiennes; and June 30, Edmund Sheffield, earl of Mulgrave. The salary of each councillor was £1000 per annum. (See Thurloe, vol. iii., p. 581.) One of the first orders issued was, that the council should sit on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, in the morning, and on Friday both morning and afternoon, and not at other times without special direction from the Lord Protector. The sittings were to commence at nine, and not to continue after one; and each member who did not appear at nine, and was absent without reasonable excuse, was to forfeit two shillings and sixpence.

† Mr. Godwin has directed special attention to the constitution of this council. The members, he would have us recollect, were named in the Act of Government, which was always represented by Cromwell himself as of such paramount authority, that even the Parliament itself was not entitled to call it in question. No one of them could be displaced, but for corruption or other miscarriage in his trust; and in that case the Parliament was to appoint seven of its members, and the council six, who, together with the lord-chancellor, lord-keeper, or commissioners of the great seal for the time being, should have power to hear and determine such corruption or miscarriage, and to award and inflict such punishment as the nature of the offence might deserve, which punishment should not be pardoned or remitted by the Lord Protector: the major part of the council, with the consent of the Protector, being authorized, in the intervals of Parliament, to suspend any of their number till the accusation against him could be heard and examined in the manner prescribed. The counsellors appointed by the act were fifteen; and the Protector, with the advice of his council, might increase their number to twenty-one; but, in case of death or other removal, the Parliament was to nominate six candidates for the vacant place, out of which the council might name two, between whom the Protector was to elect the successor. All this may be quite true; and such a boon was naturally enough given at first setting out to the restless and selfish officers, who were to believe that the new form of government was as much an aristocracy or oligarchy as a monarchy. But Cromwell was not long in teaching them their mistake. He only wanted to be more firmly planted in his chair, and then did not scruple to proceed in the most important matters without an order of council, and, as it should seem, without even consulting his assessors of state.

While the council arrangements proceeded, the most extravagant rumours became rife in London. The new Protector had already been secretly crowned; Lambert was commander-in-chief and a duke, Oliver St. John lord-treasurer, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper lord-chancellor, and Lord Say chamberlain of the household.* The peerage of England was to be restored; the various lords were to repair immediately to London, and submit to the new government; plays and players were to "go up" again, and all was to jog merrily on once more in the old road.† This was a little too fast for Cromwell. He went to work in a more gradual way. His next actions were directed, indeed, to that most miserable result, but though they argued more than the power of monarchy, they were as yet content to fall somewhat short of its forms. He proceeded to exhibit in practice that monstrous clause in the act of his authority which gave, before the assembling of Parliament, absolute legislative as well as executive power to him and his council‡

One of his first ordinances was, in a manner, to abolish the Commonwealth he had been called in to protect. It publicly repealed the memorable engagement imposed on the English people by the statesmen, to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England, as then established, without king or House of Lords.§ A second ordinance significantly declared the new offences that were to be taken and adjudged for treason. These were, to compass or imagine the death of the Lord Protector; to raise forces against the present government; to deny that the Protector and the people assembled in Parliament are the supreme authority of the nation, or that the exercise of the chief magistracy is centred in him; to affirm that the government is tyrannical, usurped, or illegal, or that there is any Parliament now in being; and, finally, the effort to proclaim, or in any wise to promote, any of the posterity of the late king to be king or chief magistrate of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any of the dominions thereunto belonging.

Other ordinances, either of this or a somewhat later date, may also claim mention here. Various duties and imposts, as those of excise, were continued for a certain term, and one of two acts which had been brought to their last stage of completion by the statesmen of the Long Parliament now received the efficacy of law. Among these were the ordinance of union between England and Scotland, and that of grace and oblivion to the people of Scotland,* which formed its proper companion. The same course was adopted also with regard to a few acts of the little Parliament, as in that which brought the public revenue into the treasury; and that which was designed to compromise the question of chancery reform by simplifying the process of the court, and reducing its expenses.† Two ordinances passed at the same time for the distribution of persons to be chosen to serve in Parliament for Scotland and Ireland; one for commissioners to approve of public preachers; and one for the ejection of scandalous, ignorant, and insufficient ministers.

The latter ordinances had been in some sort clamoured for by sections of the people, and were wily instances of Cromwell's power of coercing, while he seemed to be most freely giving way. A slight description of them will show of what good they were capable, and of how much monstrous evil. The commissioners under that for the approval of preachers were thirty-eight, nine of whom were laymen, and the rest divines. At their head was Cromwell's convenient old friend and counsellor, Francis Rouse, the provost of Eton. With him, among others, were associated Owen, Goodwin, Caryl, and Lockyer, Cromwell's favourite preachers; Hugh Peters, Philip Nye, Peter Sterry, Marshal, Manton, and Major-general Goffe. They were empowered to examine the qualifications of such as should be named to benefices, as well as of such as had been presented since a certain recent date. The ordinance for ejecting scandalous and ignorant ministers was, however, infinitely more extensive, and projected a thorough purgation of the Church Establishment of insufficient and unworthy clergy, at whatever period they might have been inducted into their livings. It appointed commissioners, from fifteen to thirty in each county,‡ to carry the ordinance into execution; to hear complaints against all clergy; and to deprive such as should be proved guilty of maintaining the principles condemned in the act against atheistical, blasphemous, and execrable opinions; or of profane cursing and swearing, and perjury; or of adultery, fornication, drunkenness, common haunting of taverns and alehouses, and frequent playing at

* Thurloe's papers give a variety of rumours of this kind.

† "His highness is not yet come to Whitehall; £200,000 is settled upon him yearly; he is choosing officers of state. It is thought that the lords will be sent for to attend him at court, to acknowledge and submit to the government; and we hear that players are goinge up againe, and that things had beene cominge to the old rode."—Thurloe, vol. ii., p. 8.

‡ It provokes only laughter and contempt when we observe, from the order-book of the Protector and his council, that when they passed bills, the forms were exactly copied that were used in the two Houses of Parliament! Every bill is read twice; then referred to a committee, which committee ordinarily consists of three persons, of whom two are a quorum; afterward read a third time; and lastly presented to the Protector as the advice of the council, and by him passed for a law, and ordered to be printed and published. Yet the council, when full, only amounted to fourteen, as Fleetwood continued in Ireland. What a mean and base inculcation of hypocrisy is here!

§ I may mention that Ashley Cooper had made an unsuccessful effort to effect this in the Barbours Parliament. On the 20th of October, 1653, a bill was brought into that Parliament from a committee, and presented by Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, for annulling the engagement, but was rejected. An act for taking away one of the penalties on non-subscribers was, with some difficulty, substituted in its room.

* From this grace were excepted nine earls, two viscounts, and five barons. † See ante, p. 555, and p. 559.

‡ From those commissioners, at the same time, though the majority were tools of Cromwell, it was found impossible to exclude various men, the most distinguished in their counties, who had opposed the usurpation of Cromwell. I find, among other names, those of Lord Fairfax, Lord Wharton, Lord Say, Samuel Browne, Thomas Scott, Sir Arthur Hazlerig, Sir Robert Harley, and Robert Blake, together with those of most of the members of the council, Henry Lawrence, Viscount Lisle, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Charles Wolseley, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Lambert, Skippon, Sydenham, and Major. The names of Richard lord Cromwell and Henry lord Cromwell, sons of the Protector, were also in the commission. The ordinance named eight or ten clergy besides for every county, who were to be joined to the lay commissioners in all questions of ignorance and insufficiency. The principal of these was Owen. The celebrated Richard Baxter, the Presbyterian, was likewise included.

cards or dice; also to incapacitate such as should publicly and profanely scoff at the profession or professors of religion and godliness, or should encourage and countenance. Whitsun-ales, wakes, morris-dances, May-poles, and stage plays; such as should hold or maintain popish doctrines, or frequently and publicly read the Book of Common Prayer, or should have declared by writing, preaching, or otherwise, their disaffection to the present government; and such as should be non-resident, or should be accounted negligent, and omit the duties of praying and preaching. These ordinances worked as Cromwell wished. Some good was done by them, and much evil. Among the most celebrated men who suffered under them, and were with difficulty restored, may be named the most learned man of the day, Pocock, the Oxford professor of Hebrew and Arabic; and Fuller, the famous Church historian.*

By such means, before the possibility of interference on the part of any Parliament, Cromwell proceeded to settle himself firmly in his new seat of power. He had not been careless, meanwhile, of his old enthusiasts for a visionary republic, his foremost friends and dupes of the saints' reign. Within a few days after his inauguration, he sent to ask Harrison if he would own, and act under, the new power; and, on that honest fanatic's refusal, his major-general's commission was at once stripped from him. Messrs. Christopher Feakes and Vavasor Powell† shared a similar fate. At the first Blackfriars' meeting after the 16th of December, these headlong zealots had devoted special denunciations against Cromwell, calling him, by name, a perjured villain, and desiring that, if any of his friends were present, they would go to him, and tell him in their name that his reign would be short, and his end more tragical than that of the great tyrant, the last Lord Protector of England‡. The message was delivered, and as promptly answered.

* I quote from a letter of Oliver to Secretary Thurloe (vol. viii., p. 281). "There are," he writes, "in Berkshire some few men of mean quality and condition, rash, heady, enemies of titles, who are commissioners for the ejecting of ministers. These alone sit and act, and are at this time casting out, on slight and trivial pretences, very worthy men; one in especial they intend the next week to eject, whose name is Pocock, a man of as unblameable conversation as any that I know living, of repute for learning throughout the whole world, being the professor of Hebrew and Arabic in our University; so that they do exceedingly exasperate all men, and provoke them to the height." Nor was Owen content with making this complaint. He went before the commissioners themselves, took three eminent divines with him (Wilkins, Wallis, and Ward, afterward Bishop of Salisbury), and expostulated with so much warmth, indignation, and success, that Pocock was restored. The case of Fuller was of the same character, and is told thus by his biographer. He received sudden notice that he should be cited before the commissioners, and in this emergency applied to his friend, John Howe, chaplain to Cromwell, and one of the most eloquent writers of his time, to know how he should conduct himself. "You must have observed," said Fuller, "that I am a pretty corpulent man, and I am to go through a passage that is very strait; I beg that you will be so kind as to give me a shove, and help me through." Howe accordingly suggested to him the most suitable advice; and when the commissioners came to propose the question, which formed the pith of their examinations, "Whether he had at any time experienced a work of grace on his soul?" Fuller replied, "That he could appeal to the Great Searcher of hearts that he had on all occasions made conscience of his very thoughts;" with which answer the commissioners expressed themselves satisfied.

† See ante, p. 562.

‡ Richard III.

Feakes and Powell were flung into the Tower, first, and afterward sent prisoners to Windsor Castle. One of their colleagues, named Sympson, imprisoned at the same time, was only released on making submission. Harrison was also sent, by peremptory mandate from the council board, into a watched retirement in his native county of Stafford.

The same vigorous measures were pursued in every quarter where there was reason to fear resistance. Cromwell everywhere transferred the chief army commands to men in whom he could best confide, and quartered troops most effectively against the various chances of insurrection. As an additional security, he sent his son Henry into Ireland, and Monk into Scotland, to deal upon the spot with any sudden defections.

Henry Cromwell had inherited the largest share of his father's genius dispensed to his children. He had risen rapidly to the rank of a colonel, by purely honourable service in the Irish campaign; acquitted himself with great ability in the "little" Parliament; and was generally supposed to have no mean share in his father's confidence and counsel. A special part of his instructions on the present mission appears to have been, to observe in the various counties through which he travelled from London to Holyhead, as well as in Ireland, how the people, and the army in particular, stood affected to the present government.* When he arrived in Dublin, he found Fleetwood in some anxiety and alarm; and but for his sudden appearance, the enthusiasm with which he was received, and the courteous address, singular skilfulness, and admirable good sense with which he treated all parties he found, it is more than doubtful whether the Protectorate could have been quietly established there. When, about a month before, it had been put to the vote, at a meeting of the commissioners of government, with three or four principal officers of the army, whether they should proceed without delay to proclaim the Lord Protector, it was only carried in the affirmative by a single voice.† From that time, Ludlow informs us in his memoirs, he entirely withdrew himself from the civil government, and continued to act in his military capacity alone.‡

* Several Proceedings, p. 149, 162.

† Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii., p. 482.

‡ Yet Henry Cromwell produced even a considerable effect on this sturly Republican. Their interview, as recorded by himself, has various very interesting points in it, characteristic of the artifices of the Lord Protector, and also of the honest and sincere distinctions that were wisely drawn by such men as Ludlow between the power of the sword before and after the death of Charles the First. "He sent," says Ludlow, "his second son, Col. Henry Cromwell, into Ireland, to feel the pulse of the officers there touching his coming over to command in that nation, where he arrived, attended only by one servant; and landing near my country house, I sent him my coach to receive him; and to bring him thither, where he stayed till Lieut.-gen. Fleetwood, with several officers, came with coaches to conduct him to Dublin. Having made what observations he could of persons and things in Ireland, he resolved upon his return; of which having given me advice, I desired him to take my house in his way, and to that end dined with him on the day of his departure, at the lieutenant-general's in the castle. After dinner, we went together to my house at Monctown, where, after a short collation, walking in the garden, I acquainted him with the grounds of my dissatisfaction with the present state of affairs in England, which I assured him was no sort personal, but would be the same were my own father alive and in the place of his. He told me that his father looked upon me to be dissatisfied, upon a

Everything was quiet, however, and promised to continue so, when Henry Cromwell, after a sojourn of three weeks, returned to England.

Monk's mission to Scotland was not less successful. He vanquished the Royalist movement under Middleton; removed Robert Lilburne, an honest Republican, from his command; superseded three anti-Protectorate zealots, Okey, Overton, and Alured; and administered correction to the regiments of Harrison and Pride, at this time quartered in Scotland, though their leaders were in the south. Overton was Milton's friend, and the great poet, though personally attached to Cromwell, was so far from deserting him in his disgrace, that he selected that very time for the offer of his most affectionate tribute. "Te Overtone," wrote the generous Milton, dragging his name into a mention of Cromwell's council to which Overton did not belong, "mihi multis abhinc annis, et studiorum similitudine, et morum suavitatem, concordiam plusquam fraternam conjunctissime; te Marstonensi prelio illo memorabili, pulso sinistro cornu nostro, respectantes in fugam duces stantem cum tuo pedite, et hostium impetus propulsantem inter densas untrunque cædes videre; Scotico deinde bello, ut primum Cromwelli auspiciis, tuo Marte occupata Fife littora, et patefactus ultra Sterlinium aditus est; te Scoti occidentales, te Boreales humanissimum hostem, te Arcades extremæ domitorem fatentur."

Cromwell had, meanwhile, a comparatively *distinct account from most men in the three nations, and thereupon affirmed that he knew it to be his resolution to carry himself with all tenderness towards me. I told him I ought to have so much charity for his father to believe that he apprehended his late undertaking to have been absolutely necessary, being well assured that he was not so weak a man to decline his former station, wherein his power was as great, and his wealth as much, as any rational man could wish, to procure to himself nothing but envy and trouble. I supposed he would have agreed with me in these sentiments; but he, instead of that, acknowledged the ambition of his father in these words: 'You that are here may think he had power, but they made a very kick-shaw of him at London.' I replied that if it were so, they did ill; for he had deserved much from them. Then I proceeded to acquaint him with my resolution not to act in my civil employment, and my expectation not to be permitted to continue in my military command; to which he answered, that he was confident I should receive no interruption therein. I told him I could not foresee what his father would do, but inclined to think that no other man in his case would permit it. To this I added, that the reason of my drawing a sword in this war was to remove those obstructions that the civil magistrate met with in the discharge of his duty, which being now accomplished, I could not but think that all things ought for the future to run in their proper and genuine channel; for as this extraordinary remedy is not to be used till the ordinary fail to work its proper effect, so ought it to be continued no longer than the necessity of using it subsists; whether as this they called a government had no other means to preserve itself but such as were violent, which not being natural, could not be lasting. 'Would you, then,' said he, 'have the sword laid down? I cannot but think you believe it to be as much your interest to have it kept up as any man!' I confessed I had been of that opinion while I was persuaded there was a necessity for it, which seemed to me to be now over. I accounted it to be much more my interest to see it well laid down, there being a vast difference between using the sword to restore the people to their rights and privileges, and the keeping it up for the robbing and despoiling of them of the same. But company coming in, and the time for his going on board approaching, we could not be permitted to continue our discourse; so, after we had taken leave of each other, he departed from Ireland, and upon his arrival at Chester, was attended by many of the late king's party, and among others by Col. Moslon, who inquiring of him how he left affairs in Ireland, he answered, very well, only that some who were in love with their power must be removed."—Memoirs, vol. ii., p. 490-492.*

easy task at home, for the chief portion of the people in and near London were still content to wait in a kind of patient indifference what the future would bring forth.* The Presbyterians, who always numbered thickly in the city, he had in some sort conciliated by placing certain members of their body on his commission for the approval of preachers, and Bishop Burnet tells us all that we need farther know concerning the bargain by which this sordid set consented to be duped. "As for the Presbyterians," says the bishop, indulging, in his usual coarse fashion, at once the falsehood and the truth, "they were so apprehensive of the fury of the Commonwealth party, that they thought it a deliverance to be rescued out of their hands; many of the Republicans began to profess deism; and almost all of them were for destroying all clergymen, and for breaking everything that looked like the union of a national church. They were for pulling down the churches, for discharging the tithes, and for leaving religion free, as they called it, without either encouragement or restraint. Cromwell assured the Presbyterians he would maintain a public ministry with all due encouragement; and he joined them in a commission with some Independents, to be the triers of all those who were to be admitted to benefices. These disposed also of all the churches that were in the gift of the crown, of the bishops, and of the cathedral churches: so this softened them."

More respectable dupes of a different class were represented by John Goodwin, who, with an infinite and almost boundless trust in the lord-generalship, was troubled with thickcoming fancies about the Protectorate, and feared it might one day intercept the Millennium. Bishop Burnet has still more aptly described Cromwell's masterly manner of cajoling John Goodwin. He it was, the bishop tells us, "who first brought in Arminianism among the sectaries, for he was for liberty of all sorts. Cromwell hated that doctrine; for his beloved notion was, that once a child of God was always a child of God. Now he had led a very strict life for above eight years together before the war; so he comforted himself much with his reflections on that time, and on the certainty of perseverance. But none of the preachers were so thorough-paced for him, as to temporal matters, as Goodwin was; for he not only justified the putting the king to death, but magnified it as the most glorious action men were capable of. He filled all people with such expectation of a glorious thousand years speedily to begin, that it looked like a madness possessing them. It was no easy thing for Cromwell to satisfy those, when he took the power into his own hands ; since that looked like a step to kingship, which Goodwin had long represented as the great anti-Christ that hindered Christ being set on his throne. To these he said, and, as some have told me, with many tears, that he would rather have taken a shepherd's staff than the Protectorship, since nothing was more contrary to his genius than a show of greatness ; but he saw it was necessary at that time to keep the nation from falling into extreme disorder, and from becoming open to the common enemy, and therefore he only stepped in between the living and the dead, as he phrased it, in that interval, till God should direct them on what bottom they ought to settle ; and he assured them that then he would surrender the heavy load lying upon him with a joy equal to the sorrow with which he was affected while under that show of dignity. To men of this stamp he would enter into the terms of their old equality, shutting the door, and making them sit down, covered, by him, to let them see how little he valued those distances that for form sake he was bound to keep up with others. These discourses commonly ended in a long prayer."

* The peculiar feelings which lay at the bottom of this indifference, or patience, have been thus described by an actor in the events of the time: "That which disposed the minds of the people to abstain from a present protestation against this government, besides the agony of the late confusions, and the astonishment upon the new wonderful alteration, was, that it was but temporary, and that limited to a very short time: a free Parliament was to be called within so many months, which was entirely to consider and settle the government of the kingdom, and to remove all those obstructions which hinder the peace and happiness of the nation, and to restore it to that tranquillity and quiet it had been so long deprived of; and the Protector was sworn to a due observation of all those articles which he had himself prescribed for his own rules and bounds, and therefore the more hope that he would be contented to be limited by them."—Letter from a member of the late Parliament to one of his highness's council.

With Royalists, again, Cromwell held a different way, concerning which the bishop is able to proffer some information also. In proportion as a single life seemed alone to stand between them and power, he knew that assassination would become more and more their policy.* He declared, therefore, in quarters from which he was aware it would speedily be repeated in their places of chief resort, "he declared," according to the bishop, "often and openly, that in a war it was necessary to return upon any side all the violent things that any of the one side did to the other. This was done for preventing greater mischief, and for bringing men to fair war ; therefore, he said, assassinations were such detestable things, that he would never begin them ; but if any of the king's party should endeavour to assassinate him, and fail in it, he would make an assassinating war of it, and destroy the whole family ; and he pretended he had instruments to execute it, whensoever he should give order for it. The terror of this was a better security to him than his guards."

To such of the Royalists, at the same time, as in any way proffered him allegiance, he had nothing but courtesy and favour, while from such as were at all detected in plots against his government or person, he would not consent to avert the law's heaviest arm. He had judged rightly in ascribing the first place in Royalist hopes and resolves to schemes of assassination. Within a brief space after the declarations recorded by Burnet, a project of this kind, unparalleled for its shameless atrocity, had been set on foot in Paris.

In Paris Charles Stuart still lived, in the mimic state of a king, with his Lord-keeper

* He had, in point of fact, already had experience of this. Within a fortnight of his inauguration a plot came before his council. The conspirators were all Royalists. It was a wild and foolish scheme, but its groundwork was supposed to be the feasibility of assassinating Cromwell as he went into the city. Eleven of the plotters were arrested at a tavern in the Old Bailey, the most distinguished of whom were a Mr. Thomas Dutton and a son of Bunce, who was one of the four aldermen impeached by the Independents in 1647, and was now in exile with Charles Stuart. They were sent to the Tower, and kept imprisoned there.

Ormond, his Chancellor of the Exchequer Hyde, his privy councillors and officers of household. It will naturally be supposed that Hyde had a sinecure in his office. This pitiful court was in truth in a villainous condition of beggary. A clean shirt was a rarity, and a good dinner a thing long remembered.* Surrounded by such sordid wants, Charles Stuart yet spent his monthly allowance of six thousand francs from the French king with a profligate and reckless profusion while it lasted, in which no beggar or pensioner has before or since excelled him. But suddenly the rise of the Protectorate—of the renewed government by a single person—shed rays of unaccustomed hope upon his ragged courtiers, and he was induced to turn aside for a time from the embraces of Lucy Walters, to listen to the lively project of a general muster of murderers from Ormond and Hyde.

In a short space, a proclamation had obtained extensive circulation through private channels in Paris and London, which began thus : "By the king, Charles the Second, by the grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, to all our good and loving subjects, peace and prosperity. Whereas a certain mechanic fellow, by name Oliver Cromwell, hath, by most wicked and accursed ways and means, against all laws, both divine and human, most tyrannically and traitorously usurped the supreme power over our said kingdoms. . . . these are in our name to give freedom and liberty to any man whomsoever, within any of our three kingdoms, by pistol, sword, or poison, or by any other ways or means whatsoever, to destroy the life of the said Oliver Cromwell, wherein they will do an act acceptable to God and good men." The proclamation farther promised, "in the faith of a Christian king," to the perpetrators and his heirs, a reward of five hundred pounds a year forever, and the honour of knighthood ; and "if he is a soldier, the office of a colonel, with such other honourable employment as may render him capable of attaining to farther preferment corresponding to his merit."† Copies of this infamous proclamation, which has been attributed,‡ on excellent authority, to the ready pen of Sir Edward Hyde, were speedily, as I have said, and very largely circulated ; but solemn secrecy was at the same time preserved, and they were, of course, communicated to none but those from whom good faith, perhaps engagement in the purposed enterprise, was thought beyond question sure.

But what is good faith among assassins ! Cromwell had already began a system of espionage, which kept in nearly every Royalist or fanatic circle "a servant feed." The very

* There is not a particle of exaggeration in this. "I do not know," says one of them (Clarendon's State Papers, vol. iii., p. 174), in a letter dated the 27th of June, 1653, "I do not know that any man is yet dead for want of bread, which really I wonder at. I am sure the king owes for all he hath eaten since April, and I am not acquainted with one servant of his who hath a pistole in his pocket. Five or six of us eat together one meal a day for a pistole a week ; but all of us owe, for God knows how many weeks, to the poor woman that feeds us." In another letter, of the date of the 3d of April, 1654, we find this passage : "I want shoes and shirts, and the Marquis of Ormond is in no better condition. What help, then, can we give our friends ?" Many similar proofs might be quoted.

† Thurloe, vol. ii., p. 248-9.

‡ See Godwin's Commonwealth, vol. iv.

agents whom Charles Stuart employed were most frequently the men who betrayed his secrets;* the assassins on whose daggers he most relied were generally men who seduced his wretched adherents into imaginary plots, that by opportune discovery they might curry favour with the Lord Protector. A man of this class was a Major Henshaw. On the appearance of the proclamation he repaired to Paris, in company with an enthusiastic young Royalist named Gerard.† Here a conspiracy was organized, and Gérard and Henshaw returned to England to complete it. The Lord Protector was to be murdered on the road as he passed from Whitehall to Hampton Court—the guards at the former place were to be suddenly disarmed—the town surprised—and Charles II. proclaimed. In this plot a number of men engaged, and it was given in evidence on the trial that Cromwell received notice of the design but a few hours before it was to have been executed, and was only able to render it abortive by crossing the water at Putney, and thus avoiding the ambush. But this was merely to conceal the treachery of Henshaw, who, having disclosed everything in time to the council, suddenly vanished from the whole affair, and was seen in it no more.‡ The truth was, that the chief conspirators were taken the night before the appointed day; some of them, as Gerard, were dragged out of their beds to prison; and a variety of others, on little or no pretence whatever, were seized in the character of accessories.§

A high court of justice was instantly erected by ordinance, and the three leading conspirators, Gerard, Vowel, and Fox, were at once placed upon their trial.|| Fox pleaded guilty, in furtherance of a secret arrangement, to corroborate in that way the secret evidence of Henshaw, and earned and obtained his pardon. Vowel and Gerard defended themselves gallantly, but unavailingly.¶ A scaffold was now erected still more rapidly than the high court of justice, and Vowel died upon it with the glowing sense of martyrdom; and Gerard, after avowals of enthusiastic royalty, mingled with protestations not less earnest that the murder of the Lord Protector formed no part of what he meant to have done, perished there also.*

But a still more memorable act of justice was performed an hour later on the same scaffold, which struck still wider terror into the enemies of authority in England. Among the brilliant legacies of foreign supremacy left to Cromwell by the statesmen were the adjusted preliminaries of a treaty between the Commonwealth and the Portuguese. These, however, during the recent changes of state authority, had not yet been signed, though circumstances† had only increased a desire to have them ratified on the part of the Lisbon court. Meanwhile, an extraordinary incident had occurred to the Portuguese embassy. About a fortnight before the dispersion of the little Parliament, a sudden dispute, as if by some strange fatality, arose in the new Exchange in the Strand, between Don Pantaleon Sa, brother to the Portuguese ambassador, and this very Gerard, whose execution we have just witnessed. A scuffle followed, but the combatants were separated. The next evening, however, Pantaleon repaired to the same place with a body of armed companions, and assaulted and killed a person named Greenway, quite unconcerned in the dispute, whom he mistook for Gerard. His purpose, as he believed, being effected, he took refuge in the house of the ambassador; but that minister, after having in vain pleaded his privilege, was obliged to surrender the assassin and his accomplices, who were at once committed to Newgate. Their trial followed within a few months after Cromwell's elevation, amid unprecedented excitement in behalf of the accused on the part of foreign courts and their ministers, and on the part of the London populace against them.‡ Pantaleon was con-

* The same system followed Charles closely when he left France for Cologne. On one occasion the letters were opened at the postoffice, and a despatch was found from a retainer in Charles's service, named Manning, to Thurloe. Being questioned before Charles, Manning confessed that he received an ample maintenance from the Protector, but defended himself on the ground that he was careful to communicate nothing but what was false. That his plea was true, appeared from his despatch, which was filled with a detailed account of a fictitious debate in the council; but even the falsehoods which he had sent to England had occasioned the arrest and imprisonment of several Royalists, and Manning was shot as a traitor at Dunsinwald, in the territory of the Duke of Neuburg. Lingard's England, vol. ii. Clar., iii., 563-9. Whitelocke, 633. Thurloe, iv., 293.

† Colonel John Gerard, only twenty two years of age, first cousin to Charles Gerard, created a baron by Charles the First, in 1645, and afterward, in 1679, made Earl of Macclesfield.

‡ It was pretended on the part of the prosecution that he had escaped. Thurloe discloses to us, however, that he was safe in the Tower.

§ Cromwell appears to have merely seized the occasion as a good one for taking some eminent persons into custody, among whom were Sir Gilbert Gerard, brother to the colonel, the Earl of Oxford, Sir Richard Willis, and the two Ashburnhams; done upon the poorest pretence of suspecting that they were concerned in the conspiracy. The prisoners altogether exceeded forty in number.

|| Commissioner Lisle sat as its president. The other judges were Aske and Nicholas of the upper bench, Atkins of the Exchequer, Steele recorder, seven aldermen, and twenty other persons.

¶ Vowel's first demand was a more equitable form of trial—a trial by jury of peers, according to the sixth article of the Government of the Commonwealth. The court answered that they were his peers, and that he might see that the individuals on the bench exceeded twelve in number! Glyn affirmed, moreover, that the ordinance, though made only by the Protector and council, was undoubtedly in force till the Parliament should repeal it. He added that, in the old law of treason, king signified merely supreme governor, that it had been so construed in the case of a queen, and that it equally extended to a Lord Protector.

* Nor did Cromwell's retaliation on Charles and his assassins close here. He ordered a "True Account of the late Bloody Conspiracy" to be published as by special authority, in which Charles Stuart is expressly described as a man bedabbled in all the blood that had been shed in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and naturally a nullifidian in all points of civil honesty, as well as religion. "His demeanour, therefore," the writer adds, "being well weighed, we need say little concerning his faith, as supposing not many will fall in love with him for that, which he seems not much to love; but if we consider his education, and his alliances with relations and dependencies upon foreign papists, we may easily conclude what religion he is of, if any: so that, whether we call to mind the fate and wretchedness of his family, or his own personal qualifications, we conceive it hardly imaginable that any pious, honest, and sober-minded man would contribute so much as a thought, much less embroil his country in blood, for the restoring so blood-guilty, perfidious, and infamous a house and person."

† It was supposed that Cromwell already contemplated hostilities against Spain, a prospect hailed with natural delight by the enemies of that power.

‡ One of the foreign ministers distinctly declares that Pantaleon was sacrificed to the clamours of the people. But had he, or had he not, committed the murder? His friends said it was a mistake—an accident—a matter of self-defence; but the friends of murderers are fond of that argument. On the trial it was pleaded for Pantaleon, 1st. That demned with four of his accomplices, and though three of the latter were pardoned,* no influence or argument, no threat or inducement, could prevail with Cromwell in favour of the chief offender. To demonstrate still more openly to the world of Europe the fearlessness and power of the new authority in England, he so arranged that the morning of the day appointed for the execution of Pantaleon should he fixed for the final settlement of the Portuguese treaty. Within a few hours after the ambassador had signed that treaty,† his brother's head fell for the crime of murder upon a public scaffold—the same scaffold on which had perished, one hour before, that very Gerard, in connexion with whom the crime may be said to have begun—amid the approving shouts of an immense crowd, who had gathered to witness the scene of terrible retribution.‡

The statesmen had already taught habits of respect and fear to the foreign powers of Europe, and Cromwell thus early showed that he would improve upon that lesson. It is certain that the wily Mazarin, then prime minister of France, had been induced at its commencement to favour Gerard's plot in Paris,§ and that one of

he was an ambassador, and therefore answerable to no one but his master; and, 2d. That he was a person attached to the embassy, and therefore covered by the privilege of his principal. But the instrument which he produced in proof of the first allegation was no more than a written promise that he should succeed his brother in office; and in reply to the second, it was maintained that the privilege of an ambassador, whatever it might be, was personal, and did not extend to the individuals in his suite. At the bar, after several refusals, he was induced, by the threat of the peine forte et dure, to plead no guilty; and his demand of counsel, on account of his ignorance of English law, was rejected on the ground that the court was "of counsel equal to the prisoner and the Commonwealth."

* The fourth was Pantaleon's immediate retainer, who was proved to have been foremost in the deed. He was hanged by Tyburn on the day of his master's execution.

† I can adduce an eminent authority in praise of this treaty, which was, as I have said, the work of the statesmen. No less a person than Lord-chancellor Hyde, in his speech to both Houses, May 8, 1661, calls it "in very many respects the most advantageous treaty to this nation that ever was entered into with any prince or people." And again, in the same speech, he says, "Every article in it but one [a liberty given to Portugal to make levies of ten thousand men for their service] was entirely for the benefit of this nation, for the extraordinary advancement of trade, for the good of religion, and for the honour of the crown."—Lives of the Lord-chancellors, vol. ii., p. 172.

‡ I grieve to have to subjoin that, by an execution of a different kind some short time before, Cromwell had sought, and not unsuccessfully, to propitiate the Presbyterians: I was not acquainted with the circumstances till I saw them described in Dr. Lingard's History. Colonel Worsley had apprehended in his bed a Catholic clergyman of the name of Southworth, who, thirty-seven years before, had been convicted at Lancaster, and sent into banishment. The old man (he had passed his seventy-second year), at his arraignment, pleaded that he had taken orders in the Church of Rome, but was innocent of any treason. The recorder advised him to withdraw his plea, and gave him four hours for consideration. But Southworth still simply owned that he was a Catholic and in orders. Judgment of death was pronounced; and Cromwell, notwithstanding the urgent solicitations of the French and Spanish ambassadors, resolved that he should suffer. It was not that the new Protector approved of sanguinary punishments in matters of religion, but that he had no objection to purchase the good will of the fierce, sordid Presbyterians by shedding the blood of a priest. Whether it were through curiosity or respect, two hundred carriages and a crowd of horsemen followed the hurdle on which Southworth was drawn to the place of execution. On the scaffold he spoke with satisfaction of the manner of his death, but at the same time pointed out the inconsistency of the men who pretended to have taken up arms for liberty of conscience, and yet shed the blood of those who differed from them in religious opinions. He suffered the usual punishment of traitors.—Lingard, vol. ii., p. 211, 212.

§ This was in his doubt as to the real condition of things his confidential emissaries, De Baas, had favoured it in London; but the execution of Gerard, and the as ignominious return of De Baas, convinced the cardinal of his error, and nothing hereafter checked the servile desire of favour with which "all the kings of the earth prostrated themselves before this idol."* Ambassadors and envoys from most of the princes of Europe crowded to the court of the Protectorate, and the anterooms of its palace were filled with their hopes and fears. In receiving them he abridged no jot of the state of a sovereign. He had now removed all his family†—including his aged and excellent mother, who passed her few remaining days and nights in continual alarm for her dear son's safety; his wife, "who seemed at first unwilling to remove thither, though afterward she became better satisfied with her grandeur;"‡ and his favourite daughter Claypole, whom, though married, he could not bear to see separated from his side; his gentle and even handsome likeness of himself, Mary; and his mirthful youngest Frances—from their old apartments in the Cockpit, to share the splendours of his palace at Whitehall. The latter had been newly furnished for their reception in a most costly and magnificent style; and in the banqueting-room was placed a chair of state on a platform, raised by three steps above the floor. Here the Protector stood to receive the ambassadors. They were instructed to make three reveren-in England—a doubt for which even the crafty Italian may be well excused. The Royalists told him, it would seem, and naturally enough, that nothing could be more precarious and uncertain than the government of the Protector; that he was almost without friends; that the Anabaptists had deserted him; that the Republicans hated him; and that even the army was divided respecting him; while, on the other hand, the bulk of the English nation, the old Royalists, and the Presbyterians, looked with earnest impatience for the restoration of the house of Stuart. Mazarin, startled at last into some belief of this, despatched an emissary named De Baas, ostensibly to assist Bordenaux in his negotiations for a treaty, but in reality to confer with the Gerard conspirators, to inquire into the malecontents, and, if he found the schemes that were in contemplation feasible, to favour them to the extent of his power. But all this, as soon as conceived by Mazarin, was known to Cromwell, and shortly after De Baas's arrival in London, Cromwell sent for him, confronted him with one of the conspirators, and having heard him fully in his own vindication, overwhelmed him with indignation, his employer with scorn, and so dismissed him. Bordenaux, at the same time, lost no favour; he had not known anything of the plots, but continued admirably affected to the Protector.

* Wicquelin, Ambassador and his Functions, p. 17.

† It is very strange, that about the only really illiberal passage to be found in Mrs. Hutchinson's delightful memoirs has relation to Cromwell's family. Had the woman's jealousy against woman—of which as little as ever lodged in heart may confidently be attributed to Lucy Hutchinson—anything to do with this? This is her remark: "His wife and children were setting up for principality, which suited no better with any of them than scarlet on the ape; only, to speak the truth of himself, he had much natural greatness, and well became the place he had usurped." His daughter Fleetwood was humbled, and not exalted with these things; but the rest were insolent fools. Claypole, who married his daughter, and his son Henry, were two debauched, ugly Cavaliers. Richard was a peasant in his nature, yet gentle and virtuous, but became not greatness. His court was full of sin and vanity, and the more abominable, because they had not yet quite cast away the name of God, but profaned it by taking it in vain upon them. True religion was now almost lost even among the religious party, and hypocrisy became an epidemic disease, to the sad grief of Col. Hutchinson, and all true-hearted Christians and Englishmen." There is great power, and a most melancholy truth, in the last observation. I may subjoin, from a minute in the council-book, that the quarterly expenditure of the Protector's household amounted to £35,000. See entry of March 14, 1655.

‡ Ludlow, vol. ii., p. 488.

ces, one at the entrance, the second in the mid-way, and the third at the lower step, to each of which Cromwell answered by a slight inclination of the head. When they had delivered their speeches, and received the reply of the Protector, the same ceremonial was repeated at their departure. On one occasion he was requested to permit the gentlemen attached to the embassy to kiss his hand; but he advanced to the upper step, bowed to each in succession, waved his hand, and withdrew.*

This was that kind of regal state which even the most discontented of the English people could best endure to see assumed by Cromwell. In the glory of their common country they forgot their own gravest and most fatal dissensions. Whatever quarrels they had among each other, they always kept cordial agreement in this—that foreigners should not fool them. It became, therefore, matter of common rejoicing, that here the Lord Protector went hand and heart with Leveller, with Anabaptist, with Presbyterian, with Republican. They saw him often claim, indeed, far more than the common exactions of old regal ceremony for the honour of his Commonwealth; and the more he exacted, the more they rejoiced. In the complaints of insulted ministers they might have even heard their poet's lines reversed—

"This is a Turkish, not an English court:
An Amurath an Amurath succeeds, Not Harry Harry"— and would still have thought themselves only the more exalted. This it was, beyond a doubt, which made many well-intentioned men too prone to pardon the sins of Cromwell's domestic rule; and there was in it a mixture of good and evil, though in such circumstances the evil greatly preponderated. When we rejoice in the feeling of what looks like tyranny practised against another country than ours, we may begin to doubt the perfect freedom of our own. The one is little better than a secret set-off against the other. It is the effort to conceal a degrading truth by the glare of a miserable vanity. The John Goodwins, who were allowed to wear their hats in Cromwell's presence, and, as it were, to "hob and nob" with my Lord Protector, were for that reason better contented to go home slaves. So an insult to Portugal, or a kick to Spain, was found, in the end, the most consolatory prescription for a new wound to liberty at home; and though it was quite true that Cromwell realized his boast of making the name of an Englishman as great with foreign countries "as ever that of a Roman had been," not less certain and melancholy must be our addition, that he branded upon the name of an Englishman a stamp of domestic slavery as debased as ever in its worst days that of a Roman suffered.

Bishop Burnet only describes the excellent and just side of this English feeling when he observes, in the history of his times, that "Cromwell's maintaining the honour of the nation in all foreign countries gratified the vanity which is very natural to Englishmen; of which he was so careful, that though he was not a crowned head, yet his ambassadors had all the respect paid them which our kings' ambassadors ever had. He said the dignity of the crown was upon the account of the nation, of which the king was only the representative head; so the nation being still the same, he would have the same regard paid to his ministers."† There cannot be a doubt that the only pleasing part of the writer's duty who would fairly describe the Protectorate must begin and end with his description of such passages in its foreign policy.

And yet it must not be admitted that, in the treaty of peace with the Dutch, which was now signed, after a ten months' tedious negotiation, Cromwell secured those great advantages which the statesmen had proposed by their large expenditure of blood and treasure. The reverse is, indeed, the fact. There cannot be a question that the lofty pretensions set forth by the statesmen in their conduct of the war were silently abandoned in this treaty: and Cromwell's motives were obvious and pressing. Monk, after ceasing to become his creature, explained them in the remark, that it was "a base treachery in Cromwell to make a sudden peace with the Dutch, and betray all the advantages of the war, that he might go up to the throne with more peace and satisfaction." Peace had at the moment become necessary for the consolidation of the new authority, and it is obvious, from the nature of the concessions Cromwell claimed in lieu of those surrendered, that the mere selfish thought of his own convenience and safety actuated the settlement of the terms of it. They made no mention of indemnity for the past, or security for the future; of the incorporation of the two states; of the claim of search; of the tenth herring; or even of the exclusion of the Prince of Orange from the office of stadtholder. To these conditions the pride of the states had refused to submit; and Cromwell was content to accept two other articles, which, while they appeared equally to affect the two nations, were in reality directed against the Stuart family and its adherents.*

* In the same passage the bishop goes on to relate a most amusing and characteristic anecdote. Still speaking of Cromwell, he adds, "The States of Holland were in such dread of him, that they took care to give him no sort of umbrage; and when at any time the king or his brothers came to see their sister, the princess royal, within a day or two after they used to send a deputation to let them know that Cromwell had required of the States that they should give them no harbour. King Charles, when he was seeking for colours for the war with the Dutch in the year 1672, urged it for one, that they suffered some of his rebels to live in their provinces. Borel, then their ambassador, answered, that it was a maxim of long standing among them, not to inquire upon what account strangers came to live in their country, but to receive them all, unless they had been concerned in conspiracies against the persons of princes. The king told him, upon that, how they had used both himself and his brother. Borel, in great simplicity, answered, 'Ha! sire, c'étoit une autre chose: Cromwell étoit un grand homme, et il se faisoit craindre et par terre et par mer.' This was very rough. The king's answer was, 'Je me ferai craindre aussi à mon tour:' but he was scarce as good as his word."

† Lingard, vol. ii., p. 224. In one of the abandoned articles of the treaty Cromwell had already betrayed his motives, which were, as far as possible, to distress his rival, Charles Stuart, by stripping him of all hope of foreign support. From the Prince of Orange, so nearly allied to the royal family, Cromwell had little to fear during his minority; and, to render him incapable of benefiting the royal cause in his more mature age, he attempted to exclude him by the treaty from succeeding to those high offices which might almost be considered as hereditary in his family. The determined refusal of the States induced him to with-

* See Lingard, vol. ii., p. 217; the Clarendon Papers, vol. iii. p. 240; and various passages in the first volume of Thuroloze.

It was stipulated that neither commonwealth should harbour or aid the enemies, rebels, or exiles of the other; but that either, being previously required, should order such enemies, rebels, or exiles to leave its territory, under the penalty of death, before the expiration of twenty-eight days. The main provisions of the treaty belong to history, and I need only here relate the other article to which I have referred. This was, that the same respect which had been paid to the flag of the king should be paid to that of the Commonwealth. The Dutch did not object, and the majority of the English people, not so thoroughly understanding the points surrendered as this which they had achieved, were loud in their rejoicings at this close of so long and terrible a war.

Peace was proclaimed with great solemnity, and "that same day, at night," says one of the Dutch ambassadors, Jongestall, in an interesting despatch to Frederic of Nassau, the "guns went off at the Tower, and aboard the ships three times, and bonfires made, according to the customs of the country, before Whitehall, and up and down the city. We did the like on the back side of our house, towards the river, and burned near eighty pitch barrels, and we had trumpeters and others to play all the while. The river was so full of boats that there was hardly any water to be seen; at the same time, several lords and ladies of quality came to see us, whom we treated. In sum, all things were done here in great solemnity. Yesterday, at noon, we were invited to dinner to his royal highness the Lord Protector, where we were nobly entertained. Mr. Strickland and the master of the ceremonies came to fetch us in two coaches of his highness, about half an hour past one, and brought us to Whitehall, where twelve trumpeters were ready sounding against our coming. My Lady Nieuport and my wife were brought to his highness presently, the one by Mr. Strickland, and the other by the master of the ceremonies, who received us with great demonstrations of amity. After we stayed a little we were conducted into another room, where we found a table ready covered. His highness sat on one side of it, ALONE; my Lord Beverningk, Nieuport, and myself, at the upper end; and the Lord-president Lawrence, and others, next us. There was in the same room another table covered for other lords of the council and others. At the table of my Lady Protectrice dined my Lady Nieuport, my wife, my Lady Lambert, my Lord Protector's daughter, and mine. The music played all the while we were at dinner. The Lord Protector had us into another room, where the Lady Protectrice and others came to us, where we had also music and voices, and a psalm sung, which his highness gave us, and told us that it was yet the best paper draw the demand; but he still intrigued, through the agency of Beverningk, with the leaders of the Louvestein faction, and obtained a secret article, by which the States of Holland and West Friesland promised never to elect the Prince of Orange for their stadtholder, nor suffer him to have the chief command of the army and navy. But the secret transpired; the other States highly resented this clandestine negotiation; complaints and remonstrances were answered by apologies and vindications; an open schism was declared between the provinces, and every day added to the exasperation of the two parties. The ultimate result was decidedly to strengthen the claims of the young Prince of Orange, and to baffle Cromwell.

that had been exchanged between us. And from thence we were had into a gallery next the river, where we walked with his highness about half an hour, and then took our leaves, and were conducted back again to our houses, after the same manner as we were brought. My Lord Protector showed a great deal of kindness to my wife and daughter in particular." This is certainly a pleasing picture of Cromwell's courteous habits, and the at once dignified and graceful conduct of his household.

Nor did the muses refuse to give their aid to the dinners, the trumpets, and the pitch-barrels, in celebration of this peace. Cambridge and Oxford combined their choicest flowers of Greek and Latin verse into one rich garland for the brow of the Protector. The Cambridge vice-chancellor, Seaman, led the way; Arrow-smith, Tuckery, and Horton, men who were famous then; Whicheote and Cudworth, men famous still, followed after him.* The elder and more venerable school of Oxford supplied names and tributes more memorable still. Doctor Owen, Doctor Zouch, Professor Harmer, Doctor Bathurst, Leonard Lichfield, and Doctor Busby, joined one chorus of praise to Cromwell for his deeds in war and peace, and his generous patronage of learning.† It proved a good rehearsal for Charles II. Then a more modest voice from a greater than these, John Locke, at that time an accomplished student of Oxford, arose to dignify the theme.‡ Passing them with this allusion merely, I have been unable to pass one name which occurs towards the close of the list, subscribed to verses which transcend all the rest in a vile extravagance of praise. "Tu Dux," exclaims this fervent flatterer, in very pitiful phrases,

"Tu dux pariter Terra Dumitorq; profundi,
Compenant laudes cuncta elementa tuas.
Cui mens alta subest pelago; profundior ipso,
Cujus fama sonat, quam procul unda sonat.

Tu poteris solus motos componere fluctus,
Solus Neptunum sub tua vincla dare.
Magna simul fortis viciisti et multa: Tropheis
Ut mare, sic pariter cedit arena tuis.
Namine pacifico gestas insignia pacis, Blandaq; per titulos script Oliva tuas;"

and the flatterer was Doctor South, who afterward earned a bishopric by calling Cromwell a bankrupt beggarly fellow, of threadbare coat and greasy hat!§

* Other names of eminence in their day are also found among the authors of the Cambridge tributes, which were published with the title of "Oliva Pacis. Ad Illustrissimum Celsissimumque Oliverum, Reipub. Angliæ, Scotiæ, et Hiberniæ Dominum Protectorem; de Pace cum Fœderatis Belgis feliciter sancita, Carmen Cantabrigiense."

† The Oxford men styled their effusions thus: "Musarum Oxoniensium 'ΕΒΑΛΙΟΦΟΡΙΑ. Sive, ob Fœdera, Auspiciis Serenissimæ Oliveri Reipub. Ang. Scot. et Hiber. Domini Protectoris, inter Rempub. Britannicam et Ordines Fœderatos Belgii Feliciter Stabilita, Gentis Togatæ ad vada Isidis Celestina Metricum."

‡ The reader may be interested to see this early poetical effusion of the young philosopher and lover of toleration and liberty. Here it is:

"Pax regit Augusti; quem vicit Julius orbem:
Ille sagæ factus clarior, ille togæ.
Hos sua Roma vocat magnos et numina credit,
Hic quod sit mundi victor, et ille quies.
Tu bellum et pacem populis des, unus utriusq;
Major es; ipse orbem vincis, et ipse regis.
Non hominem è celo missum Te credimus; unus
Sic poteris binos qui superare deos!"

§ In another discourse he called him "a lively picture of Jeroboam;" and had the impudence to say of the leading ecclesiastics of the University in Cromwell's time (the time

But the new Lord Protector of England had a nobler congratulation, and in better Latin, addressed to him at this period, with a name attached to it, which, though humble then, and kept down by the pressure of the world, has now risen higher than his own, or than that whole world itself, into the clearer region of immortality. Milton published his "Defensio Secunda," and thus addressed him. The Latin is noble, but it translates into still nobler English.

"Consider frequently," said this wise but too partial counsellor, "in thy inmost thoughts, how dear a pledge, from how dear a parent recommended and intrusted (the gift liberty, the giver thy country), thou hast received into thy keeping. Revere the hope that is entertained of thee, the confident expectation of England; call to mind the features and the wounds of all the brave men who under thy command have contended for this inestimable prize; call to mind the ashes and the image of those who fell in the bloody strife; respect the apprehension and the discourse that is held of us by foreign nations, how much it is they look for in the recollection of our liberty so bravely achieved, of our Commonwealth so gloriously constructed; which if it shall be in so short a time subverted, nothing can be imagined more shameful and dishonourable: last of all, REVERE THYSELF, so deeply bound, that that liberty, in securing which thou hast encountered such mighty hardships, and faced such fearful perils, shall, while in thy custody, neither be violated by thee, nor any way broken in upon by others. Recollect that thou thyself canst not be free unless we are so; for it is fully so provided in the nature of things, that he who conquers another's liberty, in the very act loses his own; he becomes, and justly, the foremost slave. But, indeed, if he, the patron of our liberty, and (if I may so speak) its tutelar divinity—if he, of whom we have held that no mortal was ever more just, more saintlike and unspotted, should undermine the freedom which he had but so lately built up, this would prove not only deadly and destructive to his own fame, but to the entire and universal cause of religion and virtue. The very substance of piety and honour will be seen to have evaporated, and the most sacred ties and engagements will cease to have any value with our posterity, than which a more grievous wound could not be inflicted on human interests and happiness since the fall of the first father of our race. Thou hast taken on thyself a task which will probe thee to the very vitals, and disclose to the eyes of all how much is thy courage, thy firmness, and thy fortitude; whether that piety, perseverance, moderation, and justice really exist in thee, in consideration of which we have believed that God hath given thee the supreme dignity over thy fellows. To govern three mighty states by thy counsels, to recall the people from their corrupt institutions to a purer and nobler discipline, to extend thy thoughts and send out thy mind to our remotest shores, to foresee all and to provide for all, to shrink from no labour, to trample under foot and tear to pieces all the snares of pleasure, and all the entangling seducements of wealth and power—these are matters so arduous, that in comparison of them the perils of war are but the sports of children. These will winnow thy faculties, and search thee to the very soul; they require a man sustained by a strength that is more than human, and whose meditations and whose thoughts shall be in perpetual commerce with his Maker."

Admitting the premises on which this counsel is founded, as freely as though under the immediate influence and persuasiveness of Cromwell himself, to which alone, on the sacred lips of such a man as Milton, they are fairly attributable, the time now approaches in which a test will be applied to it, and to the faith it rests upon, at once final and irrevocable. The Instrument of Government had fixed the 3d of December for the meeting of the first Parliament of the Protectorate, but in the writs now issued Cromwell inserted the 3d of September instead. That was his FORTUNATE DAY, his day of Dunbar and Worcester; and with a sense of how much good fortune he needed in the battle he was about to fight, he selected the 3d of September for his first meeting with this formidable enemy!

Meanwhile Whitelocke returned from Sweden with the ratification of a most favourable treaty of commerce between England and that country, and a prohibition of protection and favour to the enemies of either. It detached Sweden from the interest of France, and engaged it to maintain the liberty of trade in the Baltic against Denmark, which was in the interest of Holland. The news of Christina's extraordinary resignation of her crown followed hard upon his return, but her successor, Charles X., at once confirmed the treaty.* This was no

* Whitelocke has given so interesting and graphic a mention of Cromwell's style of receiving the ambassador who brought the confirmation and assent of Charles the Tenth, that the reader will thank me for inserting it here. "His (the ambassador's) people," says the memorialist, "went all bare, two and two before him in order, according to their qualities; the best men last; the master of the ceremonies next before him; I on his right hand, and Strickland on his left hand. They made a handsome show in this equipage, and so went up to the council chamber, where the ambassador reposed himself about a quarter of an hour, and then word being brought that the Protector was ready in the Banqueting House, he came down into the court again, and in the same order they went up into the Banqueting House. Whitehall court was full of soldiers in good order, the stairs and doors were kept by the Protector's guards in their livery coats, with halberds; the rooms and passages in very handsome order; the Banqueting House was richly hung with arras, multitudes of gentlemen in it, and of ladies in the galleries. The ambassador's people were all admitted into the room, and made a lane within the rails in the midst of the room. At the upper end, upon a foot-pace and carpet, stood the Protector, with a chair of state behind him, and divers of his council and servants about him. The master of the ceremonies went before the ambassador on the left side; the ambassador in the middle, betwixt me and Strickland, went up in the open lane of the room. As soon as they came within the room, at the lower end of the lane, they put off their hats: the ambassador a little while after the rest; and when he was uncovered, the Protector also put off his hat, and answered the ambassador's three salutations in his coming up to him, and on the foot-pace they saluted each other as usually friends do; and when the Protector put on his hat, the ambassador put on his as soon as the other. After a little pause, the ambassador put off his hat, and began to speak, and then put it on again; and whosoever in his speech he named the king his master, or Sweden, or the Protector, or England, he moved his hat, especially if he mentioned anything of God, when this poem was printed), that "Latin was with them a mortal crime, and Greek, instead of being owned for the language of the Holy Ghost (as in the New Testament it is), was looked upon as the sin against it; so that, in a word, they had all the confusions of Babel among them without the diversity of tongues."

sooner done than the King of Denmark hastened to conciliate Cromwell also, and entered at once into a treaty that the English traders should pay no other customs or dues than the Dutch, and that thus they should be enabled to import on the same terms those naval stores which before, on account of the heavy duties, they had been content to buy at second-hand of the Dutch. Thus had the Lord Protector already signed four treaties favourable to England, on the part of four great countries to which she had been opposed, while France and Spain, held to have been the two proudest nations of the earth, inveterate foes to each other, were struggling in a mean rivalry as to which should first obtain his favour.

"Each knew that side must conquer he would own,
And for him fiercely, as for empire, strove."

It is yet singular to observe, in one of his private letters of the time, that he puts on to his most confidential associates an appearance of infinite humility, a regret for his poverty of resources, and a reluctance to provoke too much of the attention of men to his personal and private doings. It is an answer to a request from the father of Richard Cromwell's wife, apparently a request for co-operation in some design of bestowing a new establishment on Richard and his wife, becoming their new rank as eldest son and daughter to the Lord Protector. But the Lord Protector is still the lord-general, and shows equal caution and care. "DEERE BROTHER,—I received your loving letter, for which I thanke you; and surely were it fitt to proceed in that businesse, you should not in the least have beene putt upon anything butt the trouble, for indeed the land in Essex, with some monie in my hand, and some other remnants, should have gone towards it. Butt indeed I am so unwilling to be a Seeker after the World, having had so much favour from the Lorde in givinge me so much without seekinge, and soe unwilling that Men should think me soe, which they will though you only appear in it (for they will by one meanes or other knowe it), that indeed I dare not meddle, nor proceed therein. Thus I have told you my or the good of Christendom, he put off his hat very low; and the Protector still answered him in the like postures of civility. The ambassador spoke in the Swedish language, and after he had done, being but short, his secretary did interpret it in Latin. After his interpreter had done, the Protector stood still a pretty while, and putting off his hat to the ambassador, with a carriage full of gravity and state, he answered him in English." This simultaneous compliment to the language of each country, unusual in these conferences, was thought highly striking at the time, and a new proof of Cromwell's affection and respect for Sweden. From another source, I present the speech of our Lord Protector, at once simple, direct, and happily turned. It is about the briefest and best specimen on record of Cromwell's eloquence in the Protectorate. "My lord ambassador, I have great reason to acknowledge with thankfulness the respects and good affection of the king your master towards this Commonwealth, and towards myself in particular, whereof I shall always retain a very grateful memory, and shall be ready upon all occasions to manifest the high sense and value I have of his majesty's friendship and alliance. My lord, you are very welcome into England, and during your abode here, you shall find all due regard and respect to be given to your person, and to the business about which you come. I am very willing to enter into a nearer and more strict alliance and friendship with the King of Swedland, as that which in my judgment will tend much to the honour and commodity of both nations, and to the general advantage of the Protestant interest. I shall nominate some persons to meet and treat with your lordship upon such particulars as you shall communicate to them."

plain thoughts. My heartie love-I present to you and my Sister, and my blessinge and love to deere Doll and the little one, with love to all. I rest your loving brother, OLIVER, P.*

Such letters may prove to us what things widely separate and apart were the private and public professions of this extraordinary man. In public he was clearly to be held as merely the organ of a higher power. Nothing was done by his "seekinge" there. It was God who spoke out in him; who elevated men or depressed them; who "rained snares" upon his enemies or blessings on his friends; who made him, Oliver Cromwell, a prince, whether he would or no, and was alone responsible for it!

"For yet dominion was not his design,

We owe that blessing not to him, but heaven,

Which to fair acts unsought rewards did join;

Rewards, that less to him than us were given."†

In private it was another matter. It became him to reflect on his humility there, and do nothing that should provoke the remarks of men. He was dust, and would return to dust; and in relation to that melancholy element which merely composed himself, had only to be patient and suffer. It was the extreme rebound from this state of feeling which gave birth to his worst actions. God had taken him by the hand and given him permission to walk, when, "to show how he could walk, he strode."‡ Every new

* It is addressed, "For my loving brother, Richard Major, Esq., at Horsley, in Hampshire." † Dryden.

‡ This is the expression of Walter Savage Landor, who says finer things, in better English, than any other writer of our time. It will be the honour and happiness of a succeeding age to discover the priceless value of his books. He has made allusions to Cromwell very lately, and though far from agreeing in all his remarks, they should find insertion not the less in every notice of our English Lord Protector. "Cromwell," says Mr. Landor, "was destitute of all those elegances which adorned the Roman dictator, but he alone possessed in an equal degree all those which ensure the constancy of fortune. . . . And was Cromwell, then, sincere and pure? Certainly not; but he began in sincerity; and he believed to the last that every accession of power was an especial manifestation of God's mercy. Fanaticism hath always drawn to herself such conclusions from the Bible. Power made him less pious, but more confident. God had taken him by the hand at first, and had now let him walk by himself. To show how he could walk, he strode. Religion, in the exercise of power, is more arbitrary, more intolerant, and more cruel than monarchy; and the sordid arrogance of Presbyterianism succeeded to the splendid tyranny of Episcopacy. The crossier of Laud was unbroken: those who had been the first in cursing it, seized and exercised it: it was to fall in pieces under the sword of Cromwell. To him alone are we indebted for the establishment of religious liberty. If a Vane and a Milton have acknowledged the obligation, how feeble were the voices of all men living if the voices of all men living were raised against it. Cromwell did indeed shed blood, but the blood he shed was solely for his country, although without it he never would have risen to the Protectorate." Mr. Landor, then, contrasting Cromwell with Napoleon, thus proceeds: "A king should never be struck unless in a vital part. Cromwell, with many scruples, committed not this mistake: Bonaparte, with none, committed it. The shadow of Cromwell's name overawed the most confident and haughty. He intimidated Holland, he humiliated Spain, and he twisted the supple Mazarin, the ruler of France, about his finger. All those nations had then attained the summit of their prosperity; all were unfriendly to the rising power of England; all trembled at the authority of that single man, who coerced at once her aristocracy, her priesthood, and her factions. No agent of equal potency and equal moderation had appeared upon earth before. He walked into a den of lions, and scourged them growling out: Bonaparte was pushed into a menagerie of monkeys, and fainted at their grimaces. . . . Rudeness, falsehood, malignity, and revenge, have belonged in common to many great conquerors, but never to one great man. Cromwell had indulged in the least vile of these; but on his assumption of power, he recollected that he was a gentleman. No burst of rage, no rally of ribaldry, no expression of contemptuousness, was ever heard from the Lord Protector. He could subdue, or accession to his power was, in other words, a new manifestation of God's mercy, and the very extravagance of his ways at last became only the fullest demonstration of his and of God's uncontrollable sovereignty! It is not hard to say what term we should apply to this, in any other case than that of Cromwell. Meanwhile, we see the disadvantages under which it placed his immediate associates, relatives, dependants, and followers, who had the man they knew in private to contrast with the man the public knew.

Between the issue of the writs and the meeting of Parliament, the Lord Protector was entertained in the city. Attended by his council, the principal officers of the army, and many persons of quality, he paraded in the midst of his life-guards from Whitehall to Temple Bar. Here the lord-mayor and aldermen were waiting for him, when the former, advancing to his coach, presented the city sword. This being returned, the recorder, in an inflated city speech, pronounced the compliments which are usually paid to sovereigns, to "which learned harangue the Lord Protector returned for answer 'that he was greatly obliged to the city of London for this and all former testimonies of respect,' and then, mounting his horse of state, rode in a kind of triumph through the principal streets, the several companies, in their livery gowns, being placed on each side thereof, in scaffolds erected for that purpose; the lord-mayor carrying the sword bareheaded before him to Grocers' Hall, where a most magnificent entertainment was provided. After dinner his highness knighted the lord-mayor, and made him a present of his own sword from his side, which was the first instance of the Protector's assuming this piece of regal grandeur. The bells rang all the day; the Tower guns were fired at his highness's taking leave of the city; and, about seven in the evening, he and his attendants returned back to Whitehall in their coaches."* Ludlow has a striking remark, in his memoirs, on the result of this city visit. The exhibition, he says, was contrived to let the world see how good a "correspondence" prevailed between the Protector and the capital, but among discerning men it had a contrary effect. It was perceived to be an act of force rather than of choice. This appeared in the great silence and little respect that was given to the Lord Protector in his passage through the streets, although he, to invite such respect, rode bareheaded the greatest part of the way.

conciliate, or spell-bind the master-spirits of his age; but it is a genius of a far different order that is to seize and hold futurity: it must be such a genius as Shakspeare's or Milton's. No sooner was Cromwell in his grave than all he had won for himself and his country vanished. If we must admire the successful, however brief and hollow the advantages of their success, our admiration is not due to those whose resources were almost inexhaustible, and which nothing but prodigate imprudence could exhaust, but to those who resisted great forces with small means, such as Kosciuszko and Hofer, Hannibal and Sertorius, Alexander and Cæsar, Charles of Sweden and Frederic of Prussia. Above all these, and above all princes, stands high Gustavus Adolphus, one of whose armies, in the space of six weeks, had seen the estuary of the Elbe and the steeples of Vienna; another, if a fever had not wasted it on the Lake of Como, would, within less time, have chanted Luther's hymn in St. Peter's. . . . Signal as were Cromwell's earlier services to his country," ends Mr. Landor, with a terrible and indisputable truth, "he lived a hypocrite, and died a traitor."

* Parliamentary History, vol. xx., p. 274.

"Some of his creatures had placed themselves at the entrance of Cheapside, and began to shout; yet it took not at all with the people." The people had not, in truth, in any way recovered their indifference, notwithstanding all the efforts of the last twelve months to propitiate and excite them. It remained to be seen what a Parliament would do.

At last arrived the eventful 3d of September. It happened to be Sunday, but Cromwell still adhered to his resolve that the new members returned to serve in Parliament should meet that day. Many things were strong in him, but none so strong, with all his earnest submission to the hand of God in human affairs, as a superstitious sense of destiny and fortune. Upward of three hundred representatives of the people met accordingly, on Sunday afternoon, in the abbey church of Westminster, and thence repaired to the House of Commons at about four o'clock. Here a message was sent, that the Lord Protector awaited them in the Painted Chamber, where he had arrived by water from Whitehall. Thither they went accordingly to his highness, who, "standing bare, upon a pedestal erected for that purpose," told them that, having met, he desired they would now adjourn, since he had things to communicate to them "not so fit to be delivered that day," and would, if they so pleased, meet them on the morning of the day following, in the abbey church of Westminster. The members bowed obedience, returned to their House, and formally adjourned.*

It must have heavily taxed Cromwell's faith in his fortunate day to withhold from sad forebodings as he returned that evening to his palace. He could have little hope from those three hundred English representatives, among whom he had seen steadily gazing upon him, as he spoke in the Painted Chamber, the well-remembered faces of Scot, of Hazlerig, and Bradshaw! Still Vane was not among them,† nor Harry Marten, nor Algernon Sidney, nor Edmund Ludlow. There was in that no indifferent consolation. He had also succeeded in his efforts to exclude some few of the more fierce Republican officers, for all the power of his government had been put forth to influence the elections; and, not content with this, the various returns had been officially examined by a committee of his council, under pretext of seeing that the provisions of the "Instrument" were observed. It was this pretext which sufficed to exclude Major Wildman, Lord Grey of Groby, and a few others, while Harrison and the more violent Anabaptists were again placed under positive restraint. He had also secured the election of all his council, his principal officers, and his household, excepting the Lord-viscount Lisle. His sons Richard and Henry were returned, and Fairfax and Blake. Many of the nobility had been rejected, but the Earl of Stamford, the Earl of Salisbury, and a few others, had secured seats. Judges Hale and Thorpe, Sergeant Glyn, and the Oxford vice-chancellor Owen, sat also in this celebrated assembly, than which no authoritative body, with greater claims to respect and attention, had sat down in England since November, 1640. Returned, for the most part, under a fair working of many admirable provisions out of Vane's reform bill, it represented, beyond a doubt, the sense of at least one large and most respectable portion of the influential English people. The small boroughs, the places most exposed to influence and corruption, had been disfranchised. Of the four hundred members of which the Parliament consisted, two hundred and fifty-one had been chosen by the counties, and the rest by London and the more considerable corporations. The meanest of the people, too, had been excluded from the elective franchise, a property of two hundred pounds having been required to qualify any one to vote. One most considerable limitation had, indeed, been placed on all this freedom, which was, that the plan of electing the sixty members who were to represent Scotland and Ireland not being thoroughly fixed, they were in a particular degree subject to the influence of the court. In addition to this, it is only needful to observe, that all persons who had in any way aided and assisted in the civil war against the Parliament, together with their sons, were disqualified to vote. The Lord Protector had at least no pretence to say that out of factious hatred to all authority save their own, Royalists, Republicans, and Presbyterians had, for once, consented to act together.

* Parl. Hist., vol. xx., p. 317.

† Vane's motives for withholding from public exertions at this crisis have sufficiently been touched on in his memoir, with the other incidents which marked his career in and after the Protectorate.

At ten o'clock on the morning of Monday, the 4th of September, Cromwell proceeded in great state from Whitehall to the Abbey of Westminster. He was preceded by two troops of life-guards; then rode some hundreds of gentlemen and officers, bareheaded, and in splendid apparel; immediately before the state carriage walked the pages and lackeys of the Protector in rich liveries, and on each side a captain of the guard; behind it came Claypole, master of the horse, leading a charger magnificently caparisoned; and Claypole was followed by the great officers of state and the members of the council. All eyes were fixed on Cromwell himself, a striking and proud contrast to the gorgeous parade of the procession. He was dressed in a plain suit, after the simple fashion of a country gentleman; but he wore his hat, while Lambert, who occupied the opposite seat of the carriage, sat splendidly attired, and bareheaded. After sermon, all the members hurried over to the Painted Chamber, and seated themselves uncovered, on benches ranged around the walls. The Lord Protector then entered, and took his place in the chair of state, from which he soon afterward rose, removed his hat, and addressed the assembly in a speech which lasted three hours.

This speech was at once artful and able: very forcibly and simply expressed where he had any case to lodge against the policy of his adversaries; most involved, obscure, and villainously verbose where he affected to disclose his own purposes: it was profound in its various points of craft and dissimulation; pious and fervently enthusiastic to the saints; modest and lowly to the Republicans.

He began by telling them that they were met on the greatest occasion their country had ever witnessed. He dwelt on those evils with which England had lately been menaced; he craftily referred to the dangerous principles of the Levellers, striking, as he said, at the root of all property; and, safe in the sympathy of his audience on that head, he denounced the wild spirit of the various sects of Fifth Monarchy men, which, he asseverated, aimed at directly extirpating the very existence of the clerical order, on the pretence that it was Babylonish and anti-Christian. Alluding, then, with a cold and deliberate hypocrisy, to the proceedings of the Barbone Convention, he asserted that projects and conspiracies had been extensively formed among its members for the subversion of all those laws which had been produced by the revolution of property and the manners of our ancestors, and for substituting in their stead the law of Moses. He next, with a view to propitiate the Independents and Republicans who listened to him, threw out subtle allusions to the difference between liberty of conscience as that convention would have established it, to the overthrow of all government and ministry, and the liberty of conscience he would substitute in its stead. "Such considerations and pretensions," he observed, "of liberty of conscience and liberty of subjects, two as glorious things to be contended for as any God has given us; yet both these also abused for the patronising of villanies, in so much as that it hath been an ordinary thing to say, and in dispute to affirm, that it was not in the magistrate's power; he had nothing to do with it; not so much as the printing a Bible in the nation for the use of the people, lest it be imposed on the consciences of men; for they must receive the same traditionally and implicitly from the power of the magistrate, if thus received. The aforementioned abominations did thus swell to this height among us. The axe was thus laid to the root of the ministry: it was anti-Christian—it was Babylonish. It suffered under such a judgment, that the truth of it is, as the extremity was great on that, I wish it prove not so on this hand. The extremity was, that no man having a good testimony, having received gifts from Christ, might preach, if not ordained. So now, many on the other hand affirm, that he who is ordained hath a nullity or anti-Christianism stamped upon his calling, so that he ought not to preach, or not be heard. I wish it may not too justly be said that there was severity and sharpness—yea, too much of an imposing spirit in matters of conscience; a spirit unchristian enough in any times, most unfit for these; denying liberty to those who have earned it with their blood—who have gained civil liberty, and religious also, for those who would thus impose upon them."

In a still more artful passage of most accomplished dissimulation, Cromwell managed to associate the Fifth Monarchy men with the practices of the Jesuits, attributing to the latter much of the confusion that had risen. "Notions," he said, "will hurt none but them that have them; but when they come to such practices as to tell us that liberty and property are not the badges of the kingdom of Christ, and tell us that, instead of regulating laws, laws are to be abrogated, indeed subverted, and perhaps would bring in the Judaical law instead of our known laws settled among us—this is worthy of every magistrate's consideration, especially where every stone is turned to bring confusion.

While these things were in the midst of us, and the nation rent and torn, in spirit and principle, from one end to another, after this sort and manner I have now told you, family against family, husband against wife, parents against children, and nothing in the hearts and minds of men but 'overturn, overturn, overturn' (a Scripture phrase very much abused, and applied to justify unpeaceable practices by all men of discontented spirits), the common adversary in the mean time sleeps not; and our adversaries, in civil and spiritual respects, did take advantage of these divisions and distractions, and did practise accordingly in the three nations. We know very well that emissaries of the Jesuits never came in those swarms as they have done since these things were set on foot."

He then resumed his general view of affairs. To add to our miseries, he said, we had been at war with all our neighbours. Contest with Holland had absorbed all the pecuniary resources, while a commercial war with France and Portugal cramped the industry of the nation. He bade them contrast this picture with the existing state of things. At last, everything having been driven to the worst, and a remedy having become indispensable, that remedy had been found; namely, the government which was instituted in the preceding December. That government had effected a happy peace with all Protestant states, with Holland, with Sweden, and with Denmark, and so had relieved us from an accumulation of ruinous expenses, and opened many salutary channels for our trade. A treaty had been signed with Portugal, also, which would place the British trader beyond the reach of the Inquisition, and another was in progress with the ambassador of the French monarch. Nor had the government been inattentive to internal advantages: they had made considerable progress in a plan for the reformation of the law, which would in due time be laid before Parliament; they had placed the administration of justice in the hands of men of known integrity and ability; they had reformed the Court of Chancery; they had taken proper measures for establishing the clerical functions in men of piety, soberness, morality, and learning, and "a stop had been put to that heady way, for every man who pleased to become a preacher." A passage from this portion of the speech will show the simplicity and plainness with which Cromwell expressed himself on the few occasions when he dared to do so.

"It hath," he said, speaking still of his government, "had some things in desire, and it hath done some things actually. It hath desired to reform the laws—I say, to reform them; and, for that end, it hath called together persons (without reflection) of as great ability and as great integrity as are in these nations, to consider how the laws might be made plain and short, and less chargeable to the people; how to lessen expense for the good of the nation; and those things are in preparation, and bills prepared, which in due time, I make no question, will be tendered to you. There hath been care taken to put the administration of the laws into the hands of just men—men of the most known integrity and ability. . . . The Chancery hath been reformed, and, I hope, to the just satisfaction of all good men; and, for the things depending there, which made the burden and work of the honourable persons intrusted in those services beyond their ability, it hath referred many of them to those places where Englishmen love to have their rights tried, the courts of law at Westminster."

The last assertion made by the Lord Protector on behalf of his authority on this memorable occasion was afterward remembered to his bitter disadvantage. Not the least, he said, did it rank in their claims to public gratitude that they had been instrumental in bringing together this free Parliament. They had thus brought the three nations by hasty strides towards the land of promise; it was for that Parliament to introduce them into it. The prospect was bright before them; let them not look back to the onions and fleshpots of Egypt. He entreated of the persons there assembled to put the top-stone to the work which they had so auspiciously begun, and make the nation happy. He said that their task was that of composing all understandings and jealousies, and he professed to them that, if this meeting did not prove healing, he was at a loss to decide what was next most advisable to be done. He spoke not as their lord, he protested, but as their fellow-servant—their fellow-labourer with them in the same good work, and would, therefore, detain them no longer, but desire them to repair to their own House and choose their speaker. This elaborate speech, we are told by its reporter, was followed by tokens of satisfaction, and hums of approbation, from various parts of the assembly.

The approbation lasted but a little time, however; for when, on the return of the members to their own House, the court officers rose and proposed Lenthal as the speaker, the opposition immediately named a rival candidate in the formidable person of Bradshaw. They did not care, however, to press the election to the vote. They did not so much object to Lenthal, as they desired to show the independent and free spirit with which they had there assembled: so Lenthal was elected; the one party glad, because they had secured in him a timid and time-serving tool; the other not sorry, because in him they saw a remnant of their old Long Parliament, and could even suppose his present election one step towards a revival of the great assembly in which he had so long presided. But no one of the court party dared propose to offer him, according to ancient custom, to the acceptance of the chief magistrate, and so, in the presence of this Parliament, for the first time since his inauguration, tumbled down the Lord Protector's claim to all the privileges of royalty.

A more significant movement followed. On the second day, Bradshaw, to the amazement and alarm of the court, moved that they should form themselves into a committee of the whole House, to deliberate on the question whether the House should approve of the system of government by a single person and a Parliament. A fierce debate followed, in which it was repeatedly asked why the members of the Long Parliament then present should not resume the authority of which they had been illegally deprived by force, and by what right but that of the sword, one man presumed to "command his commanders;" and, ultimately, the motion was carried by a majority of five. Cromwell's excitement became extreme. He was but little composed by the assurance that many of those who voted in the majority had not objected to the authority of the Protector, but to the source from which it emanated—a written instrument, the author of which was unknown; and rather wished it to be settled on him by act of Parliament.*

Bradshaw and his friends, meanwhile, moved forward unflinchingly. For four successive days, the 7th, the 8th, the 9th, and the 11th of September, the committee remained in discussion on this question; the debates were in the highest degree animated; and the House sat late each day. Bradshaw, Hazlerig, and Scot eminently, on all these days, distinguished themselves, and, Ludlow informs us, "were very instrumental in opening the eyes of many young members, who had never before heard the public interest so clearly stated and asserted, so that the Commonwealth party increased every day, and that of the sword lost ground proportionally." One "noble gentleman," we farther ascertain, made a speech, in which he said that the snares that were laid to entrap the liberties of the people were such as it was impossible to mistake; but that, for his own part, as God had made him instrumental in cutting down tyranny in one person, so he could not endure to see the nation's rights ready to be shackled by another, whose claim to the government could be measured no otherwise than by the length of his sword.

The arguments on both sides in this very famous discussion have been happily preserved for us in the rough heads of Goddard's diary,† and may be briefly arranged and summed up thus. The Protector's party insisted that the government of the Commonwealth was to be admitted entire, such as it had been established in the preceding December; and the other party asserted the paramount authority of the Parliament, and that nothing was to be admitted as of validity that had not the sanction of the national representatives. The court retorted, under the instructions of their master, that, since it had been approved by the people, the only real source of power, it could not be subject to revision by the representatives of the people! Not so, rejoined even the most moderate members in opposition. Waving the question of ascendancy, and Cromwell's title to assume it, they still objected to the language of the Instrument, and said that, instead of affirming that "the supreme legislative authority shall be in one person, and the people assembled in Parliament," it ought to be, "in the Parliament of the people of England, and a single person qualified with such instructions as that assembly should authorize." Upon this the court fled from the "right" and took up the "expedient." They obscurely threatened. With whatever fair speeches, they said, the Protector had opened the Parliament, it could not be expected that he would divest himself of his authority, and that it would therefore be their wisdom cheerfully to yield what it was not in their power to withhold. They added, that the co-ordinate power of legislation given him by the Instrument was merely a negative pro tempore, extending to a term of twenty days only; and that a milder prerogative than this it was impossible to devise. They dwelt with emphatical commendation upon the article which limited the sitting of Parliament to a period of five months, and indulged in terms of bitter reproach against that feature of the government of the Long Parliament, in which they had shown themselves disposed to prolong their authority without limitation. Such a usurpation should be carefully provided against in future!*

While the argument rested thus, Judge Matthew Hale went down to the House on the fourth day to endeavour to effect a compromise.† He proposed that the legislative authority should be affirmed to be in the Parliament of the people of England, and a single person qualified with such instructions as that assembly should authorize in the manner suggested by the Republicans. But, to render this palatable to the executive magistrate, and practicable under the circumstances, he recommended that the military power for the present should be unequivocally given to the Protector; and, to avoid the perpetuity of Parliament, and other exorbitances in their claims of supremacy, that that officer should be allowed such a co-ordination as might serve for a check in those points.

The conduct of the Republicans at this crisis deserves especial attention: it is their final and ample vindication from the favourite charges with which history is so rife against them. They had chosen, on the issue of writs for this Parliament, to depart from the sterner principle of their great associate, Sir Henry Vane—who refused even to answer to the authority of the Protectorate as a thing under which no good could be achieved for liberty—and to offer themselves for selection by the people. The electors of Buckinghamshire at once returned Scot; those of Cheshire, Bradshaw; those of Newcastle on Tyne, Sir Arthur Hazlerig; and those of Durham, Robert Lilburne. These were all large and eminent constituencies, and altogether by such indeed were the chief portion of the Republicans returned. Having taken this step, they resolved to work it out fairly to its results. They showed themselves neither headlong nor pragmatical, but able and most practical politicians. Waiving their sense of the superior force and virtue of a republic, they conceded the argument of the court that power might be delegated profitably to a single person. But if this is so, they said, we must control his resources for mischief, and make him indeed the servant of the people and the laws. We are not here now for the support of our own visionary theories, but we stand for the substance of solid justice, and we will have it. Fair play to the Protectorate must imply fair play to the people, or it is based upon a lie. We will make any concessions on that principle, in the faith that so long as the popular voice is heard, and its influence acknowl-

* Thurloe, vol. ii., p. 606.

† See the Burton Diary—Introduction.

* Godwin, vol. iv., p. 118.

† This was first disclosed in Goddard's Diary (introduction to Burton's); and see also Godwin, vol. iv., p. 119, 120.

edged, the people will eventually be able to right themselves and their cause. They agreed to the compromise proposed by Hale, and stripped off the last pretence from Cromwell. The course now taken by the Lord Protector sets the final stamp of reprobation on his political career.

On the morning of the 12th of September, having on the previous evening rejected Hale's proposition with scorn, he commanded Lenthall to attend him in Whitehall with the mace; he at the same time ordered Harrison, whose partisans were in motion for the Parliament, to be again taken into close custody;* he sent for the lord-mayor, and despatched three regiments to occupy the principal posts in the city; he ordered the doors of the House in which the Parliament had assembled since its meeting to be locked, and filled the avenues in Palace Yard and Scotland Yard with four companies of foot. At eight o'clock all this had been done! The members in succession repaired to the place of their sitting, but found themselves excluded, and were told that the Protector would speedily arrive at the Painted Chamber, where he proposed to receive them.

Here he received them accordingly; and laying aside at once his modesty and his mysticism, addressed them in a vigorous speech. "Gentlemen," he said, "it is not long since I met you in this place, upon an occasion which gave much more content and comfort than this doth. That which I have to say to you now will need no preamble to let me into my discourse, for the occasion of this meeting is plain enough. I could have wished, with all my heart, there had been no cause for it. At that meeting I did acquaint you what the first rise was of this government which hath called you hither, and in the authority of which you came hither. Among other things that I told you of then, I said you were a free Parliament; and so you are, while you own the government and authority that called you hither; for certainly that word implied a reciprocation, or implied nothing at all. Indeed, there was a reciprocation implied and expressed, and I think your actions and carriages ought to be suitable; but I see it will be necessary for me now a little to magnify my office, which I have not been apt to do. I have been of this mind, I have been always of this mind, since first I entered upon it, that if God will not bear it up, let it sink. But if a duty be incumbent upon me to bear my testimony unto it (which in modesty I have hitherto forborne), I am in some measure now necessitated thereunto, and therefore that will be the prologue to my discourse."

He now proceeded to declare frankly, as the grounds on which he made this most extraordinary claim of reciprocation, that his calling was from God, his testimony from the people, and that no one but God and the people should ever take his office from him. It was not of his seeking: God knew that it was his utmost ambition to lead the life of a country gentleman; but imperious circumstances had imposed it upon him. I cannot forbear to quote these extraordinary passages, in which he rapidly, and in language of very passionate clearness, reviewed the circumstances of his life, and pushed to its very uttermost extreme what seems to have been the most fatal doctrine of his whole career: that since God had chosen him to be the successful champion of his holy cause, the very honour of the divinity himself had become identified with his own personal advancement, and, safe in his first condition of grace, any falsehood or hypocrisy would be pardoned him for the sake of the ulterior advantages which, by their means, he would achieve. There is possibly some distinction from ordinary and mean falsehood in this, so far as a pollution of the mind and heart is implied in it, but there is no distinction in its wicked results upon the world. It is entitled to consideration as a metaphysical subtlety, and in some explanation of the fact that Oliver Cromwell is very nearly, if not quite, a solitary specimen of a great man who was not also a true one.

* He was released after a week's detention.

"I called not myself to this place—I say again, I called not myself to this place; of that God is witness; and I have many witnesses who, I do believe, could readily lay down their lives to bear witness to the truth of that—that is to say, that I called not myself to this place; and being in it, I bear not witness to myself, but God and the people of these nations have borne testimony to it also. If my calling be from God, and my testimony from the people, God and the people shall take it from me, else I will not part with it. I should be false to the trust that God hath placed in me, and to the interest of the people of these nations, if I should. That I called not myself to this place, is my first assertion. That I bear not witness to myself, but have many witnesses, is my second. These are the two things I shall take the liberty to speak more fully to you of. To make plain and clear that which I have said, I must take the liberty to look back. I was by birth a gentleman, living neither in any considerable height, nor yet in obscurity. I have been called to several employments in the nation—to serve in Parliament; and, because I would not be over-tedious, I did endeavour to discharge the duty of an honest man in those services, to God and his people's interest, and of the Commonwealth, having, when time was, a competent acceptance in the hearts of men, and some evidences thereof. I resolve not to recite the times, and occasions, and opportunities that have been appointed me by God to serve him in, nor the presence and blessings of God then bearing testimony to me. Having had some occasions to see (together with my brethren and countrymen) a happy period put to our sharp wars and contests with the then common enemy, I hoped, in a private capacity, to have reaped the fruit and benefit, together with my brethren, of our hard labours and hazards; to wit, the enjoyment of peace and liberty, and the privileges of a Christian and of a man, in some equality with others, according as it should please the Lord to dispense unto me. And when, I say, God had put an end to our wars—at least, brought them to a very hopeful issue, very near an end—after Worcester fight, I came up to London to pay my service and duty to the Parliament that then sat; and hoping that all minds would have been disposed to answer that which seemed to be the mind of God, viz., to give peace and rest to his people, and especially to those who had bled more than others in the carrying on of the military affairs, I was much disappointed of my expectation, for the issue did not prove so. Whatever may be boasted or misrepresented, it was not so, not so. I can say, in the simplicity of my soul, I love not, I love not (I declined it in my former speech), I say, I love not to rake into sores, or to discover nakednesses; that which I drive at is this: I say to you, I hoped to have had leave to have retired to a private life: I begged to be dismissed of my charge; I begged it again and again; and God be judge between me and all men if I lie in this matter. That I lie not in matter of fact, is known to very many; but whether I tell a lie in my heart, as labouring to represent to you that which was not upon my heart, I say the Lord be judge! let uncharitable men, that measure others by themselves, judge as they please. As to the matter of fact, I say it is true. As to the ingenuity and integrity of my heart in that desire, I do appeal, as before, upon the truth of that also. But I could not obtain what my soul longed for; and the plain truth is, I did afterward apprehend that some did think (my judgment not suiting with theirs) that it could not well be. But this, I say to you, was between God and my soul—between me and that assembly.

"I confess I am in some strait to say what I could say, and what is true of what then followed. I pressed the Parliament, as a member, to period themselves, once, and again, and again, and ten, nay, twenty times over. I told them (for I knew it better than any one man in the Parliament could know it, because of my manner of life, which was to run up and down the nation, and so might see and know the temper and spirits of all men, the best of men) that the nation loathed their sitting: I knew it; and, so far as I could discern, when they were dissolved, there was not so much as the barking of a dog, or any general and visible repining at it. You are not a few here present that can assert this as well as myself; and that there was high cause for their dissolution, is most evident, not only in regard there was a just fear of that Parliament's perpetuating themselves, but because it was their design; and had not their heels been trod upon by importunities from abroad, even to threats, I believe there would never have been thoughts of rising, or of going out of that room, to the world's end! I myself was sounded, and by no mean persons tempted, and addresses were made to me to that very end, that it might have been thus perpetuated: that the vacant places might be supplied by new elections, and so continue from generation to generation. I have declined, I have declined very much, to open these things to you; yet, having proceeded thus far, I must tell you, that poor men, under this arbitrary power, were driven like flocks of sheep, by forty in a morning, to the confiscation of goods and estates, without any man being able to give a reason that two of them had deserved to forfeit a shilling. I tell you the truth, and my soul; and many persons whose faces I see in this place were exceedingly grieved at these things, and knew not which way to help it but by their mournings, and giving their negatives when occasions served. I have given you but a taste of miscarriages. I am confident you have had opportunities to hear much more of them, for nothing is more obvious. 'Tis true this will be said, that there was a remedy to put an end to this perpetual Parliament endeavoured, by having a future representative. How it was gotten, and by what importunities that was obtained, and how unwillingly yielded unto, is well known. What was this remedy? It was a seeming willingness to have successive Parliaments. What was that succession? It was, that when one Parliament had left their seat, another was to sit down immediately in the room thereof, without any caution to avoid that which was the danger, viz., perpetuating of the same Parliaments; which is a sore now that will ever be running, so long as men are ambitious and troublesome, if a due remedy be not found. So, then, what was the business? It was a conversion from a Parliament that should have been, and was perpetual, to a legislative power always sitting; and so the liberties, and interests, and lives of people, not judged by any certain known laws and power, but by an arbitrary power, which is incident and necessary to Parliaments; by an arbitrary power, I say, to make men's estates liable to confiscation, and their persons to imprisonments; sometimes by laws made after the fact committed; often by taking the judgment, both in capital and criminal things, to themselves, who, in former times, were not known to exercise such a judicature."

And thus, he now proceeded to assert, as the Long Parliament brought their dissolution upon themselves by despotism, so the little Parliament by imbecility. On each occasion, he added, he had found himself invested in absolute power with the military, and through them over the three nations. He described what they proposed to do at the dissolution of the Barbones Convention, and then continued thus: "I denied it again and again, as God and those persons know: not complimentingly, as they also know; and as God knows. I confess, after many arguments, and after the letting of me know that I did not receive anything that put me into any higher capacity than I was in before; but that it limited me, and bound my hands to act nothing to the prejudice of these nations without consent of a council, until the Parliament, and then limited by the Parliament, as the Act of Government expresseth; I did accept it. I might repeat this again to you, if it were needful; but I think I need not. I was arbitrary in power, having the armies in the three nations under my command; and truly not very ill-beloved by them, nor very ill-beloved then by the people, by the good people; and I believe I should have been more beloved if they had known the truth, as things were before God and in themselves, and before divers of those gentlemen whom I but now mentioned unto you." But this arbitrary power, he continued, he always desired to be freed from; and if he had acquiesced in the "Instrument" of the Protectorate, it was because it made the Parliament a check on the Protector, and the Protector on the Parliament! "The next thing I promised you, wherein I hope I shall not be so long (though I am sure this occasion does require plainness and freedom), is, that I brought not myself into this condition, as in my own apprehension I did not;* and that I did not, the things being true which I have told you, I submit it to your judgment, and there shall I leave it, let God do what he pleaseth. The other things, I say, that I am to speak to you of, are, that I have not, nor do not bear witness to myself. I am far from alluding to Him that said so; yet truth concerning a member of his He will own, though men do not. But I think, if I mistake not, I have a cloud of witnesses: I think so, let men be as forward as they will. I have witness within, without, and above."

These witnesses he then summoned forth in order. He had, he said, God for a witness above, and his own conscience for a witness within. Then, for his "cloud of witnesses" without, he had all those who attended when he took the oath of fidelity to the "Instrument;" he had the officers in the army in the three nations, who testified their approbation by their signatures; the city of London, which feasted him; the counties, cities, and boroughs, that had sent him addresses; the judges, magistrates, and sheriffs, who acted by his commission; and the very men who now stood before him, for they came there in obedience to his writ, and under the express condition that "the persons so chosen should not have power to change the government as settled in one single person and the Parliament." He averred to them, finally, that he would not dispute that they were "a free Parliament;" free to deliberate for the general welfare; but added, that there were some things fundamental, from which they were not at liberty to depart. These were four: the government by a single person and a Parliament; that Parliaments should be successive, and not attempt to make themselves perpetual; liberty of conscience, and the vesting of the power of the sword and of the militia in the single person and the Parliament. And here he paused for an instant, with a remark on one of these fundamentals, only to show the more clear-sighted of his listeners, though in reality designed to throw dust in their eyes, what little chance there was, in his thorough knowledge of what was right, that he would ever, by any mistake, diverge into it. "Is not liberty of conscience in religion a fundamental? So long as there is liberty of conscience for the supreme magistrate to exercise his conscience in erecting what form of church government he is satisfied he should set up, why should he not give it to others? Liberty of conscience is a natural right; and he that would have it, ought to give it, having liberty to settle what he likes for the public. Indeed, that hath been one of the vanities of our contest. Every sect saith, Oh! give me liberty. But give him it, and, to his power, he will not yield it to anybody else. Where is our ingenuity! Truly that is a thing ought to be very reciprocal."

These fundamentals, he added in conclusion, he had thought so plain, that he had not conceived it necessary that he should require of the members the owning of their call, and the authority which had brought them together, previously to their entering the place of their deliberations. But they had obliged him to come to another conclusion; and he had accordingly put a stop to their entrance into the Parliament House, and caused a recognition of the government to be prepared, which it would be necessary for every member to sign in the lobby before he would be allowed to advance farther. The recognition was a simple engagement to be true and faithful to the Lord Protector and Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and not to consent to an alteration of the government, as it was settled in one person and a Parliament.

The members left the Painted Chamber confusedly, and again repaired to the door of their own House. They found a guard of soldiers stationed there, and on a table in the adjoining lobby a parchment lying for signatures. An officer of the army had been appointed to take their subscriptions; and, one by one, as they conformed themselves to this requisition, they were to be allowed to enter. Lenthall, the speaker, at once advanced and signed. Bradshaw, Scot, and Hazlerig, with an indignant protest of defiance and scorn, turned their backs on the degrading scene, and were followed by about a hundred men. The rest, either on the spot, or after some days' inducement from the army and the court, consented to sign the recognition. These amounted to nearly three hundred. Subsequent events showed, however, that they had signed it with a mental reservation.

This Parliament now loses its claim to our respect, but, as the reader will find, not altogether to our interest. Before it resumed its deliberations, an ominous occurrence had befallen Cromwell. Among the presents he had received from foreign princes were six handsome gray Friesland coach-horses, from the Duke of Oldenburgh. The humour took him

* I have quoted this passage that I may subjoin in a note the admirable and most powerful remarks that are made with evident reference to it by the poet Cowley, in his famous Vision: "Are we then," asks Cowley—supposing Cromwell's assertion believed that he had become, by his office in the army, arbitrary in power—"are we so unhappy as to be conquered by the person whom we hired at a daily rate, like a labourer, to conquer others for us? Did we furnish him with arms only to draw and try upon our enemies, and keep them forever sheathed in the bowels of his friends? Did we fight for liberty against our prince, that we might become slaves to our servant? The right of conquest can only be exercised upon those against whom the war is declared and the victory obtained; so that no whole nation can be said to be conquered but by a foreign force. In all civil wars, men are so far from stating the quarrel against their country, that they do it only against a person or party which they really believe, or at least pretend, to be pernicious to it; neither can there be any just cause for the destruction of a part of the body, but when it is done for the preservation and safety of the whole. 'Tis our country that raises men in the quarrel, our country that arms, our country that pays them, our country that authorizes the undertaking, and that distinguishes it from rapine and murder. Lastly, 'tis our country that directs and commands the army, and is indeed their general; so that to say in civil wars that the prevailing party conquers their country, is to say the country conquers itself; and if the general only of that party be the conqueror, the army by which he is made so is no less conquered than the army which is beaten, and have as little reason to triumph in that victory, by which they lose both their honour and liberty; so that if Cromwell conquered any party, it was only that against which he was sent; and what that was must appear by his commission." As powerfully and conclusively, though in support of unsound views, does the vigorous hand of Cowley shatter the pretences which Cromwell founds throughout this speech, on the circumstance of authority having fallen to pieces, when he was requested to reunite it. "The government was broke: who broke it? It was dissolved: who dissolved it? It was extinguished: who was it but Cromwell, who not only put out the light, but cast away even the very snuff of it? As if a man should murder a whole family, and then possess himself of the whole house, because 'tis better that he, than that only rats, should live there!"

one day to dine with Thurloe under the shade of the park, and afterward to try, with his own hand, the mettle of these horses, "not doubting," observes Ludlow, with bitter sarcasm, "but the three pair of animals he was about to drive would prove as tame as the three nations which were ridden by him." The result was curious, and will be best related in the language of the time.

The Dutch ambassadors thus write to their States-General: "After the sending away of our letters of last Friday, we were acquainted the next morning, which we heard nothing of the night before, that about that time a mischance happened to the Lord Protector, which might have been, in all likelihood, very fatal unto him, if God had not wonderfully preserved him. As we are informed, the manner of it was thus: his highness, only accompanied with Secretary Thurloe and some few of his gentlemen and servants, went to take the air in Hyde Park, where he caused some dishes of meat to be brought, where he made his dinner, and afterward had a desire to drive the coach himself, having put only the secretary into it, being those six horses which the Earl of Oldenburgh had presented unto his highness, who drove pretty handsomely for some time; but at last, provoking those horses too much with the whip, they grew unruly, and ran so fast that the postillion could not hold them in, whereby his highness was flung out of the coach-box upon the pole, upon which he lay with his body, and afterward fell upon the ground. His foot getting hold in the tackling, he was carried away a good while in that posture, during which a pistol went off in his pocket; but at last he got his foot clear, and so came to escape, the coach passing away without hurting him. He was presently brought home, and let blood; and, after some rest taken, he is now pretty well again. The secretary, being hurt on his ankle with leaping out of the coach, hath been forced to keep his chamber hitherto, and been unfit for any business; so that we have not been able to further or expedite any business this week."

A second description, from another of the ambassadors now waiting in London the pleasure of the Lord Protector, shows the suspicion of falsehood which had begun to attach to whatever Thurloe and the Lord Protector were concerned in! "I have not yet anything to write unto you of my negotiation. It was referred six days ago, under pretence of an accident happened to the Lord Protector and the secretary of state, in a promenade, wherein the first took the place of his coachman; and, his horses running away with him, he was flung out of the box among the horses; and, if his shoe had not broken or slipped off, the misfortune had been entire. He got off only with some bruises, and was likewise no ways hurt with a pistol that went off in his pocket. During this disorder the secretary of state sat in the coach, who, endeavouring to get out, sprained his foot, which was all the harm that happened to him. Both of them do not forbear to keep their beds, nor to busy themselves also." A third ambassador seems infected with the same mysterious doubts. "No doubt you have heard of the accident happened to the Protector, who, being in the park in his coach, got up into the box; and, his horses being unruly, they flung him out of his throne, and he had like to have been racked alive. This doth afford matter of speculation to some, and discourses to others. His enemies speak him to be very ill, and his friends, in health."

Finally, a mention of the circumstance in two letters of Paris Royalists to Charles's court shows the bitter hopes it had awakened there. One prophesies that as the new Protector's first fall had been from a coach, so his second would be from a cart! And a second writes more moderately thus: "We hear of a misfortune befallen the Lord Protector for playing the coachman. He had better have sat in his chair in the Painted Chamber to govern the Parliament, which is more pliable to his pleasure, than in the coach-box to govern his coach-horses, which have more courage to put him out of the box than the three hundred members of Parliament have to put him out of his chair. 'Est malum omen, et ab animalibus forsitan discent exemplum; qui sedit, videat ne cadat.'"

To the general mass of the English people this accident neither taught a jest nor a prophecy, but revealed a fact of melancholy significance. The explosion of the pistol in Cromwell's pocket betrayed the dangers which beset him in the midst of all his glory—the haunting sense of insecurity which follows inordinate ambition.† In the incident itself, too, they might have seen at once the headlong desire to purchase relief from overburdened thoughts, and the fantastical tricks he would play to assume the mere power of doing anything. Cromwell had now forfeited all old claims to envy.

Even his broken Parliament—the Parliament he had forced under the muskets of his soldiery, the fragment of the free assembly he had welcomed on his fortunate day—had found strength to turn once more against him. If it showed in this, as his partisans asserted, the meanness of the worm, it at least showed no less its desperate vitality! The first thing it did on reassembling was to come to a resolution that the "recognition" did not comprehend the whole of the instrument of the 16th of December, but simply the government of the Commonwealth by a single person and successive Parliaments. Then, a few days after, with a somewhat absurd attempt to maintain what they called the dignity of the House, they converted the whole of Cromwell's base transaction into a proceeding of their own, coming to a resolution that "all persons who shall be returned to serve in this Parliament shall, before they are admitted to sit, subscribe the recognition of government!" Next we find them in committee voting that the supreme legislative authority should reside in a Lord Protector and Parliament; and, the day following, with a most ridiculous affectation of independence, that Cromwell should be the Protector. Then, having determined that essential point, they proceeded to analyze the instrument itself, article by article, and occupied themselves in committee on this business to the 8th of November! One day they had the important question to vote whether the Protectorship was to be hereditary, or for life only, and in what manner, and by what authority, a new Protector was to be named; on another day, whether any law could be made, or tax imposed, for the future, except in Parliament, and in what hands the power of declaring war and making peace was to be vested! The former question, I should add, had originated chiefly in the accident just described, and which naturally led to a consideration of the probable consequences of the death of Cromwell.

* These various letters will be found in the second volume of Thurloe, p. 652, 653, 674, &c. The court newspapers never alluded to the accident.

† At a subsequent date I find one of the numberless spies employed by Thurloe thus writing to that wily secretary. He is describing one of the Presbyterian plots against the Protector. "He told me a story, which, if you were a fowler, might be of some use to you. We two, discoursing concerning the murdering of his highness, and I urging the difficulty of it, he told me it was true, indeed, he wore a private coat, as he was informed by a Presbyterian minister; but they had a way to pierce it, which was this: To take some grains of pepper (white the best), and steep them twenty-four hours in the strongest aqua vitæ, and then mix three or four grains with the powder, wherewith a pistoll is charged; and that pistoll will carry level twice as far as before, and therefore, by consequence, pierce twice as deep. This minister preached before his highness at Hampton Court; and, being invited to hear his highness exercise, he asked the boy, that waited on him in his chamber for accommodation, what was the reason his highness did sweat so much. The boy answered, that he had a close coat under his other clothes, which was the reason his highness did sweat so much."—Thurloe, vol. i., p. 708.

The court party first started the point, and Cromwell had so managed to cajole Lambert with some secret understanding, as is supposed, for a special exception or reservation in his favour, that on the morning of the day appointed for the debate, when all the court dependants had mustered their utmost force, to the amazement of every one, who supposed it the secret aim of Lambert to strike for the Protectorate on Cromwell's death, that officer rose, and having detailed in a long and elaborate speech the miseries of an elective, and the merits of an hereditary succession, moved that the office of Protector should be limited to the family of Oliver Cromwell, according to the known law of inheritance. A long and very vivid debate followed, and closed, to the alarm and confusion of the court, in a division of two hundred for the elective chief magistracy, and only sixty for the hereditary. It was resolved, at the same time, that, on the death of the Protector, his successor should be chosen by the Parliament, if it were sitting, and by the council in the absence of Parliament.

It is clear that Cromwell, the instant after this vote, took the resolution on which he acted some three months later. He showed no sign of impatience or interference, smiled when the vote was officially communicated to him, and said that the Parliament should proceed.

They proceeded accordingly. Cromwell had insisted, the reader will recollect, on four fundamentals, and required that on these a final negative on the acts of the Legislature should be reserved to him; on all others, his power, under his own instrument of government, extended no farther than to suspend for twenty days their decrees from being acknowledged as law. The article concerning these negatives was the next matter taken up, and upon a point which, in its result at least, seemed to realize a farce of much ado about nothing. The opposition party insisted that the bills upon which the Protector should be entitled to this prerogative should be of a sort, containing in them something "contrary to such matters wherein the Parliament shall think fit to give a negative to the Protector." The court party urged as an amendment that the words should be, "contrary to such matters wherein the single person and the Parliament shall declare a negative to be in the single person." The debate was ardently conducted on both sides, and closed with a majority on the side of the opposition, the numbers being 109 to 85.

Nothing could exceed the apparent distress of the court party in the House at this vote.† It had, they swore, as far as a vote could do it, deposed the executive magistrate from his office. Lord Broghill declared it was so mortal a wound to the government, that he would willingly have redeemed it with a pound of his blood. Then followed dark threats about the necessity of a dissolution, and at these the majority quailed. Next day the amendment of the court party was carried without a division! and, most ridiculous to add, three days after, the negatives were taken into farther consideration; the friends of the Protector were twice left in a minority upon questions of the same import as in the former instance; and again, on the day following these, a second amendment was carried, reversing a second time the obnoxious vote.

Their subsequent proceedings, which had about as much dignity and as much annoyance in them, may be briefly described.‡ Having brought their discussions on the Act of Settlement to a close at last, it was moved by the court party that, before the Act of Settlement was engrossed, a conference should be had with the Protector on the subject; but it was carried against them by a majority of 107 to 95. Then, with a new start of courage, they voted that this bill should be a law, without needing the Protector's consent. Next day, however, they became convinced that they had gone too far, and directed that it should be engrossed, in order to its being presented to him for his consideration and consent. As a sort of set-off to this, it was at the same time decided, that unless the Protector and Parliament should agree to the whole and every part of the bill, it should be void and of no effect.

Void and of no effect the Protector had already resolved it should be! He only waited a good opportunity for the movement he had already projected, and it soon came.

Having passed various resolutions in revision of the ordinances promulgated before they met—having canvassed in a most troublesome spirit sundry arrangements of the executive—having interfered with several assessments which had been thought by Cromwell essential to the public service, they manifested a decidedly res-

* Godwin, vol. ii., p. 137.

† It may be explained, in some sort, by keeping in mind the doctrine of Cromwell himself, that he was, whatever concessions he might consent to make, solely and exclusively the fountain of all the government that existed, and that the Parliament derived its privileges from him and his writ. Taken in this sense, the otherwise very fine distinction between the negative "which the Parliament might think fit to give," and that "which the single person and the Parliament should declare to be already in existence," becomes clear enough.

‡ In the midst of them, it may be worth while to mention, the death of the famous Selden created much interest among those who recollected and appreciated his noble services to the cause.

uff spirit in the matter of supplies. This was the opportunity for which Cromwell alone had waited. He summoned the House once more to meet him in the Painted Chamber. This was on the 22d of January, and not till twelve days later could the term of five months' existence, secured to the Parliament under the Protectorate, possibly expire. The members went up to the Painted Chamber, therefore, in the natural expectation of an angry remonstrance, but the still paramount security, that till the 3d of February, at least, they should remain a Parliament.

Cromwell, having saluted them with an expression of displeasure and contempt, at once began his address, which was conceived in the most masterly and subtle spirit of praise and flattery to the people, and of scorn and defiance to them. "GENTLEMEN,—I perceive you are here as the House of Parliament, by your speaker, whom I see here, and by your faces, which are, in a great measure, known to me. When I first met you in this room, it was, to my apprehension, the hopefulest day that ever mine eyes saw, as to considerations of this world; for I did look at (as wrapped up in you, together with myself) the hopes and the happiness of (though not the greatest, yet a very great, and) the best people in the world; and truly and unfeignedly I thought so: a people that have the highest and the clearest profession among them of the greatest glory, viz., religion; a people that have been, like other nations, sometimes up and sometimes down in our honour in the world, but yet never so low but we might measure with other nations; a people that have had a stamp upon them from God! God having, as it were, summed up all our former glory and honour, in the things that are of glory to nations, in an epitome, within these ten or twelve years last past, so that we knew one another at home, and are well known abroad."

What, he then asked, had they done as a Parliament? He never had played, he never would play, the orator, and therefore, he would tell them frankly, they had done nothing. For five months they had passed no bill, had made no address, had held no communication with him. As far as concerned them, he had nothing to do but to pray that God would enlighten their minds, and give a blessing to their labours. But had they then done nothing? Yes: they had encouraged the Cavaliers to plot against the Commonwealth, and the Levellers to intrigue with the Cavaliers. By their dissensions they had aided the fanatics to throw the nation into confusion, and by the slowness of their proceedings had compelled the soldiers to live at free quarters on the country. The result he thus forcibly and eloquently described.

"There be some trees that will not grow under the shadow of other trees; there be some that choose (a man may say so by way of illusion) to thrive under the shadow of other trees. I will tell you what hath thriven—I will not say what you have cherished—under your shadow; that were too hard. Instead of peace and settlement, instead of mercy and truth being brought together, righteousness and peace kissing each other, by reconciling the honest people of these nations, and settling the woful distempers that are among us, which had been glorious things, and worthy of Christians to have proposed—weeds and nettles, briars and thorns, have thriven under your shadow. Dissettlement and division, discontent and dissatisfaction, together with real dangers to the whole, have been more multiplied within those five months of your sitting than in some years before. Foundations have been also laid for the future renewing the troubles of these nations, by all the enemies of it abroad and at home. Let not these words seem too sharp, for they are true as any mathematical demonstrations are or can be. I say, the enemies of the peace of these nations, abroad and at home; the discontented humours throughout these nations, which I think no man will grudge to call by that name, or to make to allude to briars and thorns—they have nourished themselves under your shadow."

He next referred to the question of the Protectorship, and said they supposed, no doubt, that he had sought to make it hereditary. With unblushing effrontery, and a faith in his powers of delusion, which constituted in itself a perfect miracle, he told them that this was not true!

"I will not presage what you have been about or doing in all this time, nor do I love to make conjectures; but I must tell you this, that as I undertake this government in the simplicity of my heart, and as before God, and to do the part of an honest man, and to be true to the interest which, in my conscience, is dear to many of you (though it is not always understood what God in his wisdom may hide from us as to peace and settlement), so I can say that no particular interest, either of myself, estate, honour, or family, are, or have been, prevalent with me to this undertaking; for if you had, upon the old government, offered to me this one, this one thing (I speak as thus advised, and before God, as having been to this day of this opinion; and this hath been my constant judgment, well known to many that hear me speak)—if this one thing had been inserted—this one thing, that the government should have been placed in my family hereditarily, I would have rejected it! and I could have done no other, according to my present conscience and light. I will tell you my reason, though I cannot tell what God will do with me, nor you, nor the nation, for throwing away precious opportunities committed to us. This hath been my principle, and I liked it when this government came first to be proposed to me, that it puts us off that hereditary way; well looking that as God had declared what government he had delivered over to the Jews, and placed it upon such persons as had been instrumental for the conduct and deliverance of his people, and considering that promise in Isaiah, that God would give rulers as at the first, and judges as at the beginning, I did not know but that God might begin; and though at present with a most unworthy person, yet, as to the future, it might be, after that manner; and I thought this might usher it in. I am speaking as to my judgment against making it hereditary; to have men chosen for their love to God, and to truth and justice, and not to have it hereditary; for as it is in Ecclesiastes, who knoweth whether he may beget a fool or a wise man, honest or not? Whatever they be, they must come in on that account, because the government is made a patrimony."

The motive for these desperate assertions was to enable him, after that day's action, to keep a fair appearance before the country, and their sole justification was the end he hoped one day to accomplish in behalf of God and God's people. Hence he did not scruple to add, in an expression I may not venture to characterize, that he spoke in the fear of the Lord who would not be mocked, and with the satisfaction that his conscience did not belie his assertion. The different revolutions which had happened, he then observed, were attributed to his cunning. How blind were men, who would not see the hand of Providence in its merciful dispensations! men, who even ridiculed as visions of enthusiasm, observations "made by the quickening and teaching Spirit!" After this, he went at once to the object for which he had summoned the members before them, and to the amazement of his hearers, deliberately argued on the consequences of an immediate dissolution of their authority!

It might be thought, forsooth, that without the aid of Parliament, the Protectorate could not raise money. He knew better. "I did think, also, for myself, that I am like to meet with difficulties; and that this nation will not, as it is fit it should not, be deluded with pretexts of necessity in that great business of raising of money; and were it not that I can make some dilemmas, upon which to resolve some things of my conscience, judgment, and actions, I should sink at the very prospect of my encounters. Some of them are general, some are more special. Supposing this cause or this business must be carried on, it is either of God or of man; if it be of man, I would I had never touched it with a finger. If I had not had a hope fixed in me that this cause and this business is of God, I would many years ago have run from it; if it be of God, he will bear it up; if it be of man, it will tumble, as everything that hath been of man since the world began hath done. And what are all our histories, and other traditions of actions in former times, but God manifesting himself, that he hath shaken, and tumbled down, and trampled upon, everything that he hath not planted! And as this is, so the all-wise God deal with it. If this be of human structure and invention, and if it be an old plotting and contrivance to bring things to this issue, and that they are not the births of Providence, then they will tumble; but if the Lord take pleasure in England, and if he will do us good, he is able to bear us up. Let the difficulties be whatsoever they will, we shall, in his strength, be able to encounter with them; and, bless God, I have been injured to difficulties, and I never found God failing when I trusted in him: I can laugh and sing in my heart when I speak of these things to you, or elsewhere. And though some may think it is a hard thing, without Parliamentary authority, to raise money upon this nation, yet I have another argument to the good people of this nation, if they would be safe and have no better principle, whether they prefer the having of their will, though it be their destruction, rather than comply with things of NECESSITY! That will excuse me; but I should wrong my native country to suppose this."

Necessity—that was his plea; and if it were answered that the necessity was of his own creation, he should answer, No, it was of God! It was the consequence of God's providence! No marvel was it, he added, if men who lived on their masses and service-books, their dead and carnal worship, were strangers to the works of God; but for those who had been instructed by the Spirit of God, to adopt the same language, and say that men were the cause of these things, when God had done them—this, this, he solemnly warned them, was more than the Lord would bear! But now he had simply to communicate his determination. They had sat long enough, he thought, for the benefit of England, and now, therefore, he declared them dissolved!

For everything but this his listeners were prepared. They claimed their term of five months by the Lord Protector's own law. They were answered that that term was meant to be counted as in the arrangements of military service, by calendar and not lunar months; and that, as the soldiers were paid, so should their existence be measured out. They had no reply to make to this deliberate artifice, but at once to go sullenly to their several homes, and leave their country once again to the absolute despotism of Cromwell.

And an absolute despotism he at once established. The opportune and most natural occurrence of several conspiracies against him after this third dissolution, formed what he thought would seem to be a sufficient motive, and most certainly prove a more than sufficient defence!

The conspiracies exploded from two different quarters, the Republican sections of the army, and the Royalists of the northern and western counties. The first embraced projects for the surprisal of Cromwell's person, and for the seizure of the Castle of Edinburgh, of Hull, Portsmouth, and other places of strength. But spies, paid by Thurloe, were in every regiment; and no movement occurred that was not previously known to Cromwell. All officers of doubtful fidelity were at once dismissed; every regiment was purged of its questionable men; Colonel Wildman was surprised in the very act of dictating to his secretary a declaration against the government of a most hostile and inflammatory tendency; and Lord Grey of Groby, Colonels Alured, Overton, and others, were arrested, of whom some remained long in severe and infamous confinement, while others were permitted to go at large on giving security for their peaceable behaviour. The tyrant did not yet dare to bring to the scaffold his old associates of Naseby and Marston Moor.

The Royalist plot, though more extensive, proved to be still more harmless. It was headed by Wilmot, just then created Earl of Rochester, Sir Henry Slingsby, Sir Richard Moleverer, and Colonel Penruddock; and, after a moment's occupation of Salisbury, was dispersed by a captain with only a few companies of infantry. The mass of the people were still, as I have before described them, indifferent.

It is, at the same time, recorded of the inhabitants of Salisbury, in particular, that they were disgusted with the brutal purpose of the Royalists (during the momentary occupation) to hang the judges of assize whom they surprised in the town. Of the prisoners, the most distinguished were executed, though they had surrendered the town under regular articles of war. The remainder were sold for slaves to Barbadoes, a favourite policy with Cromwell, pursued first in his Irish campaigns, and carried on through the whole of the Protectorate.*

And now followed a regular and elaborate project of despotism, deliberately planned and resolutely executed. It was heralded by a few precautionary measures, which served to prepare the way for it. These were to forbid all ejected and sequestered clergymen of the Church of England to teach as schoolmasters or tutors, or to preach or use the church service as ministers either in public or private; to order all priests belonging to the Church of Rome to quit the kingdom under pain of death; to banish all Cavaliers and Catholics to the distance of twenty miles from the metropolis; to prohibit the publication in print of any news or intelligence without permission from the secretary of state;† and to place in confinement most of the nobility and principal gentry in England, till they could produce bail for their good behaviour and future appearance! Among the first who were apprehended were the Earl of Newport; Lord Willoughby, of Parham, brother-in-law of Whitelocke; and Geoffry Palmer, at once one of the most eminent and eccentric of the Royalist lawyers still residing in England, and whom the Restoration afterward revived. They were committed to the Tower. The Earl of Lindsey and Lord Lovelace were imprisoned at Banbury. Then followed the arrest of the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Northampton, Viscount Falkland, the Lords St. John, Petre, Coventry, Maynard, and Lucas, and above fifty commoners. The names of Earl Rivers and the Earl of Peterborough were subsequently added.

All this occurred within a few weeks, and was specially and openly designed by Cromwell to break the spirits of men, and to prepare them for what he had in reserve; for against the majority of the Royalists arrested thus, he did not scruple to confess afterward that he had no specific charge to make. The first part of the great despotic scheme followed rapidly,

* The following sad and significant extract is from a Paris letter of this date: "Here is nothing more now, but many Irish come from Ireland daily, into the service of Prince Condé, with the most sad stories of the English usage to the natives that ever I heard of: parents taken from their wives and children, and sent into the English plantations; the children starve in wildernesses, and some knocked to death. If all be true, it cannot be the Protector will leave it unpunished."—Thurloe, vol. ii., p. 160.

† Up to this time, as has been already stated, there were eight weekly newspapers, the majority in favour of the government, but two of them, in a certain degree, hostile to the measures now pursued. "They expressed their opposition, however," as Mr. Godwin very properly remarks, "for the most part in a very subdued style, and had by no means lately broken out into great intemperance." After this ordinance, which destroyed what remained of the liberty of the press, only the Mercurius Politicus, by Marchmont Needham, and a new one now started, called the Public Intelligencer, by the same writer, appear to have been published. It is, indeed, not easy to conceive a measure of a more infamous character.

in the shape of an ordinance, solely levelled against the adherents of the Stuarts. It declared that "all who had ever borne arms for the king, or declared themselves to be of the royal party, should be decimated; that is, pay a tenth part of all the income or estate which they had left, to support the charge which the Commonwealth was put to by the unquietness of their temper, and the just cause of jealousy which they had administered." This was an infamous violation of every provision in the Act of Oblivion, passed with Cromwell's own most strenuous assistance by the statesmen, and an outrage upon every larger provision of natural equity or justice. But it was only the beginning of an end more terrible.

This declared itself, within a few weeks after, by a most comprehensive completion of the scheme of tyranny. While brooding over it, and all the desperate cruelty and injustice it involved, the Lord Protector found it necessary to vent what he fancied was the real lowliness and submissiveness of his honest and affectionate heart, to his son-in-law Fleetwood. He sent him, accordingly, to his government in Ireland, the following most characteristic letter. "DEERE CHARLES,—I write not often. At once I desier thee to knowe I most dearly love thee, and indeed my harte is plaine to thee as thy harte can well desier; lett nothinge shake thee in this.' The wretched jealousies that are amongst us, and the spirit of calumny, turn all into gall and wormwood. My harte is for the people of God; that the Lorde knows, and I trust will (in due time) manifest; yett thence are my wounds, which, though it grieves me, yett (through the Grace of God) doth not discourage me totally. Many good men are repynninge at everythinge, though indeed very many good, well satisfied and satisfyng daily. The will of the Lorde will bring forth good in due time. . . It's reported that you are to be sent for, and Harry to be Deputy, which truly never entred into my harte. The Lorde knowes, my desier was for him and his Brother to have lived private lives in the Country; and Harry knows this very well, and how difficultly I was perswaded to give him his Commission for his present place. This I say was from a simple and sincere harte. The noyse of my beinge crowned, &c., are like malicious figments. . . . Use this bearer, Mr. Brewster, kindly; lett him be nere you; indeed, he is a very holy, able man; trust me you will find him soe. He was a bosome Friend of Mr. Tillinghurst; ask him of him; you will thereby know Mr. Tillinghurst's spirit. This Gentleman brought him to me a little before he died, and Mr. Cradock, Mr. Throughton, a Godly Minister, beinge by, with himselfe, who cried shame. Deere Charles, my deere love to thee and to my deere Biddie, who is a joy to my harte, for what I hear of the Lorde in her. Bid her be cheerefull and rejoyce in the Lorde once and again; if she knows the Covenant thoroughly, she cannot butt doe; for that transaction is, without her, sure and stedfast between the Father and the Mediator in his Blood; therefore leaninge upon the Sonn, or lookinge to him, thirstinge after him, imbracinge him, wee are his seed, and the covenant is sure to all the seed; the compact is for the seed; God is bound in faithfulness to Christ, and in him to us. The covenant is without us—a transaction between God and Christ—look up to it! God ingageth in it to pardon us, to write his law on our heart, to plant his fear, that wee shall never depart from him. Wee under all our sins and infirmities can dayly offer a perfect Christ, and thus wee have peace, and safety, and apprehension of love, from a Father in Covenant, who cannot deny himselfe: and truly in this is all my Salvation, and this helps me to bear my great burthens. . . . If you have a mind to come over with your deere Wife, &c., take your best opportunite for the good of the publike and your own convenience. The Lorde bless you all. Pray for me, that the Lorde would direct and keep me his servant. I bless the Lorde I am not my own, but my condition to flesh and blood is very hard. Pray for me; I do for you all; comend me to all friends. I rest, your lovinge Father,

OLIVER, P."

Fleetwood accepted the invitation, came over to London, and never returned to his Irish government. His wily father-in-law had merely wished to see him, to effect, by his powers of persuasion, what Fleetwood would have resented with scorn and indignation if attempted in any other way. The real truth was, that Cromwell had already positively resolved that his son Henry should be Irish deputy—an office for which Fleetwood had proved himself incapable—and shortly after Fleetwood's return, Henry proceeded to Ireland!

The consummate ability with which he there administered the government of the Protectorate is not a subject for discussion in these pages. As I shall not again return to it, however, it may be as well to show, in a private letter from the Protector to his son, the relation of assistance and advice which from this period till Oliver's death subsisted between them. Shortly after his departure, the following letter was despatched to him. It refers to the disaffected, and imbodyes excellent advice—"moderation and love" to Ludlow and the Republicans, caution and detention in the case of Mervin and the Royalists.

"SONN,—I have seen y^r letter writt unto Mr Secretary Thurloe, and doe finde thereby that you are very apprehensive of the carriage of some persons with you towards yo^rself and the publike affaires. I doe believe there may be some peticular persons who are not very well pleased wth the present condition of thinges, and may be apt to show their discontents as they have oportunitie; but this should not make too great impressions in you. Time and patience may worke them to a better frame of spirit, and bring them to see that w^{ch} for the present seemes to be hid from them; especially if they shall see yo^r moderation and love towards them, whilst they are found in other ways towards you; which I earnestly desier you to studie and endeavour all that lyes in you, whereof both you and I too shall have the comfort, whatsoever the issue and event thereof be. . . . For what you write of more help, I have long endeavoured it, and shall not be wanting to send you some further addition to the Councell, as some as Men can be found out who are fitt for y^r trust. I am alsoe thinkinge of sendinge over to you a fitt person who may comand the north of Ireland, w^{ch} I believe stands in great need of one. And I am of y^r opinion that Trev^r and Col. Mervin are very dangerous persons, and may be made the heads of a new Rebellion; and therefore I would have you move the Councell that they be secured in some very safe place, and the farther out of their own Counties the better. I comend you to the Lorde, and rest your aff^r father, OLIVER, P."

The ex-governor Fleetwood meanwhile presented himself, with Desborough, as ready tools for the Protector's purpose in his great despotic plan. He laid the base of it in the already subsisting old English militia arrangements. It was feasible, by their means, he saw, to divide England and Wales, with little trouble, into ten or twelve districts, and to place over the militia of each of these districts an officer with the name of major-general. This plan was carried on with the utmost secrecy for more than two months, and only openly declared when ripe for execution. It was then announced, by a vote of the Protector's council, that the command of militia, in ten districts that were named, should be intrusted to Fleetwood, Desborough, Lambert, Whaley, Goffe, Skippon, Colonel James Berry, Colonel Thomas Kelsey, Colonel William Boteler, and Major Charles Worsley. To these were afterward added Barkstead, lieutenant of the Tower, and Admiral Dawkins. The districts were, by another vote, apportioned in detail. Fleetwood had the counties of Oxford, Bucks, Hertford, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Cambridge, being permitted to appoint Colonel Henry Haines as his deputy for the last four. Lambert, having received the north of England into his charge, was allowed, as a still greater man than Fleetwood, to appoint Colonel Richard Lilburne for the counties of York and Durham, and Colonel Charles Howard, afterward Earl of Carlisle, for Cumberland, Westmorland, and Northumberland. His own name was merely reserved to give ornament and dignity to the affair. Whaley had the command of the militia of the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Warwick, and Leicester; Goffe, of Sussex, Hants, and Berks; Skippon, of London; Berry, of Worcester, Hereford, Salop, and North Wales; Kelsey, of Kent and Surrey; Boteler, of Northampton, Bedford, Huntingdon, and Rutland; Worsley, of Chester, Lancaster, and Stafford; Barkstead, of Westminster and Middlesex; and Dawkins, of Monmouthshire and South Wales.

And what were the ostensible duties of these formidable major-generals? I will first give the substance of their official instructions, and then exhibit their powers in action. They were, according to the former,* first, to endeavour to suppress all tumults, insurrections, rebellions, and all other unlawful assemblies; and for this purpose, to draw together their forces and troops, and march them to such places as they should judge convenient. Secondly, to take care and give orders that all papists, and others who had been in arms against the Parliament, as well as all who were found dangerous to the peace of the nation, should be deprived of their arms, which should be secured in some neighbouring garrison, or otherwise disposed of. Thirdly, every master of a family, or householder, who was considered as disaffected, was to be required to give security, by his bond, for the good behaviour of all his menial servants, the servants being liable to be called to appear before the major-general, or his deputy, at such time and place as either should appoint. Fourthly, an office of register was to be set up in London, where the names of all persons thus giving security were to be entered, together with their residence; and as often as they changed their abode, this was also to be punctually recorded, and the notice communicated to the major-general of each district, as the case might require. Fifthly, every person, whether foreigner or otherwise, who came from beyond sea, was required, within twenty-four hours after his landing, to appear before the person whom the major-general of the district should appoint in the different ports for that purpose, to deliver his name, and an account of the place from whence he came and to which he intended to go; as also, if he came to London, to appear before the registrar there, and give an account of his lodging and his purpose; all his removals from place to place being to be reciprocally communicated between the registrar in London and the major-generals in the different districts. Sixthly, the major-generals were to take an account of what had been done in execution of the ordinance against insufficient and scandalous ministers and school-masters, to the end that no disaffected persons might be allowed in public teaching, or in the education of youth. To these were added certain articles, with which the instructions were concluded, as to high roads and robberies; the execution of the laws against drunkenness and blasphemy, and gaming-houses, and houses of ill fame, as well as respecting idle and loose persons, who had no visible means of subsistence; and they granted not only the power to apprehend thieves and robbers, but also to permit no horse-races, cock-fightings, bear-baiting, or stage-plays, within the several counties.

* The paper was officially published as "Instructions and orders to the major-generals for preserving the peace of the Commonwealth." See Godwin, vol. iv.

Such was the tenour of the instructions, as openly published in the papers of the time, and designed to convey the idea, as far as it was possible, of a kind of general rural police and civil regulation. Appended to the commission of each, however, were these ominous words, with Cromwell's signature: "And you are to observe and follow such directions as you shall from time to time receive from myself." The most essential portion of their instructions was, in truth, altogether secret; and in their subsequent correspondence with the government, as we find it in Thurloe, can we alone discover the whole extent and object of this atrocious despotism.

There we ascertain the plan of assessment by means of these tools of tyranny, and the parties on whom it was imposed. They were empowered to summon before them any persons whom they should consider as disaffected to the government, or who had no calling or visible means of subsistence, and require them to give an account of themselves and their property, which they then assessed to the state. They were at the same time authorized to receive information from any other quarters, and by that means to correct any attempted misrepresen-tations of principles. Any disobedience to the major-generals made the offender liable to imprisonment at the pleasure of the Protector and council. The Royalists, terrified at the extensive arrests and imprisonments which took place among their brethren, and awed by the military preparations which were made to subdue resistance, appear, from all the accounts that are preserved, to have promptly obeyed the summons of these armed justices, and for the most part yielded quietly to assessments which were imposed upon them. There was, indeed, no hope of redress in any case. The sole appeal was reserved to the Protector in council, and all privilege or appeal to the laws was forever barred and stopped. The major-generals, therefore, summoned whomsoever they pleased to appear before them as delinquents; and it was fatal to slight their commands. They inquired into every man's estate and income, and assessed it to a tenth of its annual value; if any one endeavoured to clear himself of delinquency, they assumed the privilege of pronouncing upon the validity of his defence. They sent whom they pleased to prison, and confined them where they pleased; and it has been remarked by Mr. Godwin, as one of the general characteristics of Cromwell's government, that those who were judged to be disaffected never succeeded in their endeavours to be set at large in due course of law.*

But one or two individual cases will at once express the general iniquity. Worsley, for example, thus writes to Thurloe from Stafford: "Yesterday we had a meeting at this town, and I have made a good progress in our business. We have assessed diverse, and the rest must expect it with all speed. I hope we shall pay our county troop out of what we have done already, and provide you a considerable sum for other uses. We have sent out warrants to give notice to the whole county of our day of meeting, when we shall sit upon the ordinance for the ejecting of scandalous ministers. We have disarmed the disaffected in this county. We shall fall of snapping some of our old blades that will not let us be quiet. We have found an estate of Penruddock's that was executed, and have ordered it to be sequestrated. I hope shortly to give you a good account of the rest of the counties." Desborough writes in equal spirits with his infamous work. "Yesterday we proceeded upon taxing seven or eight of this county, among whom was Sir James Thynn, who was at first a little averse, and did plead as much innocence as my Lord Seymour hath done; but at last, having no refuge, was constrained to comply; and I think of those eight that we have already dealt withal, the sum will amount to six or seven hundred pounds per annum. There are four more to appear this morning, and then I intend for Blandford, to attend the Dorsetshire gentlemen, and so to Marlborough, where there are twenty more to be summoned."

The case of Cleaveland, the Royalist poet, has been already referred to in this work.† He had offended Cromwell in early years, and was one of the first victims to the power of the major-generals in Norwich. Cleaveland was a man of masterly talents, and one of the most popular writers of his time. His works had passed ten editions in about twenty years. He was now living in great poverty, but yet cheerfully submitting to the reverses that had fallen on him only in common with the cause to which his talents had been devoted. He was plotting against no one, harming no one, not even libelling any one; and yet we find in Thurloe's papers the following abominable despatch, with the signature of Haynes and the other commissioners. In "observance to the orders of his highness and council sent unto us, we have this day sent to the garrison of Yarmouth one John Cleaveland, of Norwich, late judge-advocate at Newark, whom we have deemed to be comprised within the second head. The reasons of judgment are, 1. He confesseth that about a year since he came from London to the city of Norwich, and giveth no account of any business he hath there, only he pretends that Edward Cooke, Esquire, maketh use of him to help him in his studies. 2. Mr. Cleaveland confesseth that he hath lived in the said Mr. Cooke's house ever since he came to the said city, and that he but seldom went into the city, and never but once into the country; indeed, his privacy hath been such, that none or but few save papists and Cavaliers did know that there was any such person resident in these parts. 3. For that the place of the said Mr. Cleaveland his abode, viz., the said Mr. Cooke's, is a family of notorious disorder, and where papists, delinquents, and other disaffected persons of the late king's party do often resort more than to any family in the said city or county of Norfolk, as is commonly reported. 4. Mr. Cleaveland liveth in a genteel garb; yet he confesseth that he hath no estate but £20 per annum, allowed by two gentlemen, and £30 per annum by the said Mr. Cooke. 5. Mr. Cleaveland is a person of great abilities, and so able to do the greater disservice; all which we humbly submit."

* See Godwin, vol. iv., p. 236, et seq.

† See anté, p. 412.

At about the same period, Jeremy Taylor, a more illustrious name, suffered the fate of Cleaveland for his talents, his poverty, and his attachment to royalty. He was flung into prison at Chepstow Castle, in the county of Monmouth. With these cases may close our description, since they will serve to express many hundred others of equal or superior iniquity.

To this condition, then, England was now reduced. After the gallantest fight for liberty that had ever been fought by any nation in the world, she found herself trampled under foot by a military despot. All the vices of old kingly rule were nothing to what was now imposed upon her. Some restraint had still been kept on the worst of her preceding sovereigns; now she found herself hopeless and helpless, her faith in all that she once held noblest broken, and her spirits unequal to any farther struggle. Besides this, there was stealing upon her, in gradual but certain progress, a vile hypocrisy and habit of falsehood, which even good men found it necessary to sanction and endure, that some semblance of the mere pretences of a better nature might still be left to them, were it only to redeem the name of their sad degradation. Let royalty revisit them as speedily as it would, it could bring nothing back for which they might not gladly exchange all that they now endured. What was the innocent and partial tax of ship-money to an all but universal decimation? What were agonies and mutilations by the Star Chamber to wholesale murders and executions by high courts of justice? What was an open profligacy worse than a secret lie? What the arrest of five members of the House of Commons to the utter violation and destruction of every privilege Parliament possessed, and even of the very form and name of its rights and its immunities? The true cause of the death of Charles I. was his resistance to the sacred principle of popular representation. He laid down his head upon the block because he broke violently, and in succession, three English Parliaments. Oliver Cromwell had now merited, far more richly, that self-same doom, for he had committed, in circumstances of greater atrocity, the self-same sin. But Charles was weak, and Cromwell strong; and the people had undergone that worst and most sad recoil from a virtuous and quick-spirited enthusiasm, to the debasing sense of failure, depression, and indifference. Even this last, however, had more hope in it than another sense to which they were now and then roused to give way. This was when they admired their tyrant. Vildest degradation of all was that! He flung some foreign victory among them as a rattle or a toy, and the whimpering ceased, and they recollected what a great man their Lord Protector was, and sent up an ill-sung song of praise!

"The sea's our own! and now all nations greet,
With bending sails, each vessel of our fleet:
Our power extends as far as winds can blow,
Or swelling sails upon the globe may go."

There may have been some consolation in the fact that the sea was their own, but it would have been a much superior advantage to have had their souls their own. A bad thing becomes worse when covered or gilded thus; and far better is it to keep the mean and imbecile rapacity of a Stuart to its naked and natural meanness, than suffer it to be overshadowed or adorned by the gorgeous tyranny of a Tudor.

I turn, with no feeling of relief or pride, to such brief mention as may become this work, of the foreign policy of the Protectorate. France and Spain had continued for some time to rival each other in their mean prostration before the power of Cromwell,* that power which he had inherited from the foreign victories of the statesmen, and which had thrown into his hands the balance of Europe. The first question started in these negotiations was the manner in which Cromwell should be addressed. No objection was offered by Spain to the regal claims of the Lord Protector, but France showed a slight

* So monstrous did this become, that it gave occasion to the most ribald jests in every other part of Europe. The Dutch absolutely struck a medal with the bust of Cromwell and his titles on one side, Britannia on the other, Cromwell thrusting his head in her bosom, with the opposite part of his person ludicrously exposed; while, as the Spanish ambassador stoops to offer it homage, the French ambassador holds him by the arm, and says, "Get you back! the honour belongs to the king my master!" This medal is still preserved in many Dutch cabinets. Even in Paris pictures were circulated, wherein the English Lord Protector was sitting in an attitude the most ludicrously gross, with the King of Spain on the one side, and the King of France on the other, offering him paper. And Mazarin received still graver reproaches. See advice to him at the end of the Memoirs of De Retz.—(The reader will be much amused by consulting Kippis's Biographia Britannica, vol. iv., p. 401, at note DD.—C.)

restiffness. Louis's first letter was addressed "To his most serene highness, Oliver, Lord Protector, &c., &c." This was rejected. Then "Mon Cousin" was offered. This also was refused. The ordinary address between sovereigns, "To our Dear Brother Oliver, &c., &c." was at last formally demanded. "What!" said Louis to Mazarin, "shall I call such a fellow my brother?" "Ay!" rejoined the crafty Italian, "or your father, to gain your ends." Louis then submitted.*

And it must be confessed, though not for that immediate reason, he gained his ends.†

* Many letters will be found in Thuroloz, referring to this diplomatic dispute. I may quote one or two. De Bordeaux (the ambassador) thus opens the subject to De Brieenne, the French secretary of state: "J'ai reçu les deux lettres que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'écrire les 21 et 25 du mois passé, avec celle du roi, dans lesquelles je vois qu'il plaît à S. M. me confier la négociation du traité entre la France et l'Angleterre, avec la qualité d'ambassadeur. J'ai demandé audience au secrétaire du conseil, sous prétexte de lui en faire part, afin de découvrir avec quels termes Monsieur le Protecteur désireroit que S. M. le traitât. Il ne veut point s'expliquer autrement, si non que son altesse avoit l'autorité souveraine, et aussi grande que les rois, et que c'étoit à nous d'en user comme nous jugerions à propos. Depuis cette conversation un homme, qui se mêle d'intrigue, m'est venu trouver, et m'a voulu faire entendre, que le terme de frère seroit bien agréable. J'ai donné ordre à mon secrétaire, si l'on lui témoigne desirer le titre de frère, qu'il responde de soi-même, que les pouvoirs m'ont été envoyés, à fin d'avoir un prétexte pour me dispenser de donner cette qualité. Toutes les résolutions d'ici dans les rencontres de la moindre importance se prennent avec grand secret, et la politique est de surprendre."—Thuroloz, vol. ii., p. 106. In a subsequent letter he says, "J'infère que S. A. n'est pas contente de ce que je ne suis pas qualifié ambassadeur pres d'elle, and de n'être pas traité de frère le maître des ceremonies ayant averti l'ambassadeur de Portugal de lui donner ce titre."—Thuroloz, vol. ii., p. 143. A Paris letter to London shows that the matter was generally discussed and talked of. "The cardinal said yesterday that your Protector is angry that the King of France called him not mon frère, brother. He rallied much upon it, and demanded whether his father was ever in France? I hope our Protector will make him sing another song before summer be past."—Thuroloz, vol. ii., p. 159. The Protector did make him sing another song, though he seems, by the following extract, to have consented in one interval to a compromise: "Vous trouverez bon que je vous éclaircisse du doute que je croisis avoir levé par quelque'une de mes précédentes touchant la suscription des lettres du roy à M. le Protecteur. Il a refusé le titre de cousin, et s'est contenté, dans toutes les deux dépêches de celui de Monsieur le Protecteur de la République d'Angleterre, d'Ecosse, et d'Irlande. Celui de frère est été bien plus agréable."—Thuroloz, vol. ii., p. 228. Shortly after, the more agreeable "brother" was demanded and conceded.

† Slingsby Bethel, in his World's Mistake, in Oliver Cromwell, makes this part of his foreign policy a grave charge of objection to him, and has been followed by Hume and others. "Cromwell," he says, "contrary to our interest, made an unjust war with Spain, and an impolitic league with France, bringing the first thereby under, and making the latter too great for, Christendom, and by that means broke the balance betwixt the two crowns of Spain and France, which his predecessors, the Long Parliament, had always wisely preserved. In this dishonest war with Spain, he pretended and endeavoured to impose a belief on the world that he had nothing in his eye but the advancement of the Protestant cause and the honour of the nation; but his pretences were either fraudulent, or he was ignorant in foreign affairs (as I am apt to think that he was not guilty of too much knowledge in them); for he that had known anything of the temper of the popish prelacy and the French court policies, could not but see that the way to increase or preserve the Reformed interest in France was by rendering the Protestants of necessary use to their king; for, that longer than they were so, they could not be free from persecution, and that the way to render them so was by keeping the balance betwixt Spain and France even, as that which would consequently make them useful to their king; but by overthrowing the balance in his war with Spain, and joining with France, he freed the French king from his fears of Spain, enabled him to subdue all factions at home, and thereby to bring himself into a condition of not standing in need of any of them; and from thence hath proceeded the persecution that hath since been, and still is, in that Cromwell, after a protracted negotiation, abruptly broke with the Spanish envoy, Don Alonzo Cardenas, who demanded and obtained his passports. Don Alonzo's bait had been the reconquest of Calais; Mazarin's, the counter temptation of the capture of Dunkirk. It is scarcely probable that Cromwell much cared for either. But it was more convenient to him, and to the safety of his personal power, to be on good terms with so near a neighbour as France, who had already, to oblige him, dismissed from Paris his rival Charles Stuart. And in the colonial possessions of Spain in the New World, he saw an opportunity to make large accessions to the maritime power of England; at the same moment, to dazzle and distract his oppressed countrymen by brilliant episodes of distant conquests, and get conveniently dismissed upon that service officers whose influence and whose principles he feared. The illustrious Blake was the chief of these.

His first demonstration of his policy was accordingly to equip and send out two large armaments, one under Pen and Venables, the nation against the Reformed there; so that Oliver, instead of advancing the Reformed interest, hath, by an error in his politics, been the author of destroying it. The honour and advantage he propounded to this nation in his pulling down of Spain, had as ill a foundation; for if true, as was said, that we were to have had Ostend and Newport, as well as Dunkirk (when we could get them), they bore no proportion, in any kind, to all the rest of the King of Spain's European dominions, which must necessarily have fallen to the French king's share, because of their joining and nearness to him, and remoteness from us; and the increasing the greatness of so near a neighbour must have increased our future dangers." But all this was surely to have anticipated a little too rapidly the power and conquests of Louis the Fourteenth, and the maturity of our William the Third. Lord Bolingbroke followed up the charge. "Cromwell either did not discern," says he, "this turn of the balance of power (from Spain to France), or, discerning it, he was induced, by reasons of private interest, to act against the general interest of Europe. Cromwell joined with France against Spain; and though he got Jamaica and Dunkirk, he drove the Spaniards into a necessity of making a peace with France, that has disturbed the peace of the world almost fourscore years, and the consequences of which have wellnigh beggared in our times the nation he enslaved in his. There is a tradition—I have heard it from persons who lived in those days, and I believe it came from Thuroloz—that Cromwell was in treaty with Spain, and ready to turn his arms against France, when he died. If this fact was certain, as little as I honour his memory, I should have some regret that he died so soon. But, whatever his intentions were, we must charge the Pyrenean treaty, and the fatal consequences of it, in great measure to his account. The Spaniards abhorred the thought of marrying their Infanta to Louis the Fourteenth. It was on this point that they broke the negotiation Lionne had begun; and if they resumed it afterward, and offered the marriage they had before rejected, Cromwell's league with France was a principal inducement to this alteration of their resolution." But I may close this note with a subtle remark of Bishop Warburton, who, in hitting much closer to the truth, unconsciously exposes, at the same time, what was undoubtedly the vice of the Protector's foreign as well as domestic policy, namely, the pursuit of temporary expedients of the brilliant and dashing sort, rather than general principles of the sober and enduring. Thus says the bishop: "Some modern politicians have affected to think contemptuously of Cromwell's capacity, as if he knew not that true policy required that he should have thrown himself into the lighter balance, which was that of Spain; or as if he did not know which was become the lighter. But this is talking as if Cromwell had been a lawful hereditary monarch, whom true policy would have thus directed. But true policy required that the usurper should first take care of himself, before he busied himself in adjusting the balance of Europe. Now France, by its vicinity, was the most dangerous power to disoblige, as well as by the near relationship of the two royal families of France and England; so that, though Cromwell gave out that which of the two states would give most for his friendship should have it, in order to raise the price, he was certainly determined in himself that France should have it."

other in command of Blake, with the professed purpose of restoring the natural dominion of England on the sea, but whose real and secret destination was to invade the American colonies, and surprise the Plate fleet of Spain, till then supposed by all men to be, and to be held, the most faithful ally of the Commonwealth.* The bait took, and the most extraordinary excitement and pleasure was produced in various quarters of England. Preachers declared from their pulpits that the Protector intended to destroy Babylon; nothing less than the pope was, abroad, avowed to be his quarry; and Innocent X., expecting to be attacked in Rome, ordered fortifications to be built round the Church of our Lady of Loretto, the rich offerings in which were presumed to be the chief object of the heretic adventure!

Meanwhile Pen's fleet, carrying upward of 4000 soldiers, had arrived at Barbadoes, where they were instructed to open their sealed orders; and, opening them, there found instructions to take at once Cuba and Hispaniola. Re-enforcements of upward of 6000 additional troops awaited them for that purpose, and they instantly set forth. They had scarcely landed at Hispaniola, however, when they fell into an ambuscade, and were obliged to re-embark defeated. They made a subsequent descent on the island of Jamaica with better success. This great gain was yet held insufficient to balance the first defeat; and on the return of Pen and Venables, they were both committed to the Tower.

I may pause for an instant here to notice a sound example of Cromwell's far-seeing sagacity. Though men scouted in that day the acquisition of Jamaica, he saw its value in itself, and its importance in relation to future attempts on the continent of America. Exerting the inhuman power of a despot—occasionally, as hurricanes and other horrors, necessary for the purification of the world—he ordered his son Henry to seize on a thousand young girls in Ireland, and send them over to Jamaica,† for the purpose of increasing population there. A year later, and while the Italian Sagredo was in London, he issued an order that all females of disorderly lives should be arrested and shipped for Barbadoes for the like purpose. Twelve hundred were accordingly sent in three ships.

* It afterward appeared to have been argued by Cromwell in his council, to justify the measure, that since America was not named in the treaties of 1604 and 1630, hostilities in America would be no infraction of those treaties (!); that the Spaniards had committed depredations on the English commerce in the West Indies, and were consequently liable to reprisals; that they had gained possession of these countries by force, against the will of the natives, and might, therefore, be justly dispossessed by force; and, lastly, that the conquest of these transatlantic territories would contribute to spread the light of the Gospel among the Indians, and to cramp the resources of poverty in Europe. These were but shallow pretexts for concealment of more substantial personal aims.

† I quote from Henry Cromwell's answer to Thurloe: "Sir,—I understand by your last letter that the transportation of a thousand Irish girls, and the like number of boys, is resolved on by the council, but as touching what you write for the charges you will be at to putt them in an equipage fit to be sent (havinge advised with some persons heer), I know not well what answer to return you to it; but it's thought most adviseable to provide their clothes for them in London, which we thinke you may doe better and at cheaper rates than wee can heer. Wee shall have, upon the receipt of his highness his pleasure, the number you propound, and more if you think fit."—Thurloe, vol. iv., p. 87.

"Ho veduto prima," says Sagredo, "del mio partire piu squadre di soldati andar per Londra cercando donne di allegra vita, imbarcandone 1200 sopra tre vascelli per tragittarle all' isola, a fine di far propagazione."*

This subject may now be left with the following most able and characteristic letter from Cromwell to Major-general Fortescue, whom Venables had left in command of the newly-won island, in which the Lord Protector forcibly explains his views of the proper policy for security and improvement of the conquest.

"Sir,—You will herewith receive instructions for the better carryinge on of your buisnes, which is not of small account here, although our discouragements have been many, for which we desier to humble ourselves before the Lorde, who hath sorely chastened us. I doe commend, in the midst of others' miscarriages, your constancy and faithfulness to your trust, in everywhere you are, and takinge care of a company of poore sheepe left by their shepherds; and be assured, that as that which you have done hath been good in itself, and becominge an honest man, soe it hath a very good savour here with all good Christians and all true Englishmen, and will not be forgotten by me, as oportunitie shall serve. I hope you have long before this time received that good supplye which went from hence in July last, whereby you will perceive that you have not been forgotten heer. I hope alsoe the ships sent for New England are before this time with you; and lett me tell you—as an incouragement to you and those with you to improve the utmost diligence, and to excite your courage in this buisnes, though not to occasion any negligence in presentinge that affair, nor to give occasion to slacken any improvement of what the place may afford—that you will be followed with what necessary supplies, as well for comfortable subsistence as for your security against the Spaniard, this place may afford or you want. And therefore study first your securitie by fortifyinge; and although you have not monies for the present wherewith to doe it in such quantities as were to be wished, yet your case beinge as that of a marchinge army, wherein every soldier, out of principles of nature, and accordinge to the practice of all discipline, ought to be at the pains to secure the common quarter, wee hope no man among you will be soe wantinge to himself, consideringe food is provided for you, as not to be willinge to help to the uttermost therein; and therefore I require you and all with you, for the safetie of the whole, that this be made your principal intention. The doinge of this will require that you be verie careful not to scatter till you have begun a securitie in some one place. Next I desier you that you would consider how to form such a body of good horse as may, if the Spaniard should attempt upon you at the next cominge into the Indies with his gallions, be in a readiness to march to hinder his landinge, who will hardly land upon a body of horse; and if he shall land, be in a posture to keep the provisions of the country from him, or him from the provisions, if he shall endeavour to march towards you. Wee trust wee shall furnish you with bridles, saddles, and horse-shoes, and other things necessary for that worke, desiringe you to the uttermost to improve what you have already of those sorts. Should it be knowne that you had 500 horse well appointed, ready to march upon all occasions in that island, even that alone might deterre the Spaniard from attempting anythinge upon you. Wee have sent commissioners and instructions into New England to trye what people may be drawn thence. Wee have done the like to the English windward islands, and both in England, Scotland, and Ireland you will have what men and women wee can well transport. Wee thinke, and it is much designed amongst us, to strive with the Spaniard for the mastery of all those seas; and therefore wee could hartlie wish that the island of Providence were in our hands againe, believing that it lyes so advantageously in reference to the Mayne, and especially for the hindrance of the Peru trade and Cartagena, that you would not only have great advantage thereby of intelligence and surprize, but even blocke up the same. It is discoursed here, that if the Spaniard doe attempt you, it is most likely it will be on the east end of the island, towards Cuba; as also Cuba upon Cuba is a place easily attempted, and hath in it a very rich copper mine. It would be good for the first, as you have oportunitie, to informe yourself, and if there be need, to make a good worke thereupon, to prevent them; and for the other, and all thinges of that kinde, wee must leave them to your judgement upon the place, to doe therein as you shall see cause. To conclude, as wee have cause to be humbled for the reproof God gave us at St. Domingo upon the account of our owne sins, as well as others, soe truly upon the reports brought hither to us of the extreame avarice, pride, and confidence, disorders and debauchedness, profaneness and wickedness, commonly practised amongst the army, wee can not onlie bewail the same, butt desier that all with you may doe soe, and that a very special regard may be had soe to governe for time to come as that all manner of vice may be thoroughly discountenanced and severely punished, and that such a frame of government may be exercised, that virtue and godlinesse may receive due encouragement."

* A manuscript quoted by Dr. Lingard, vol. ii., p. 260.

Meanwhile Blake had triumphantly swept the Mediterranean, cleared that sea of pirates, and successively chastised the deys of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli. He forced from the Grand-duke of Tuscany a compensation for having some years before countenanced in his port the sale of unlawful English prizes by Prince Rupert, and was able to send home, as reparation to the English owners whose goods had been thus sold by his permission, the sum of £60,000 in sixteen vessels. The Republic of Genoa thanked the Protector by a special embassy for having thus afforded protection and safety to maritime commerce; the Vaivode of Transylvania solicited his aid against the Turks; the King of Poland requested his succour against the growing power of Russia; and the canton of Zurich appealed to him as the natural guardian of Protestant states.

This was followed by other triumphs immediately connected with Cromwell's hypocritical pretences, and therefore of the greater service to him.* It would not be becoming in this work to enter into any detail of the massacre of the Vaudois in the valleys of Piedmont, or of that general feeling of sympathy aroused in England, and forever impressed on history by the sublime voice of Milton.

"Avenge, O Lord! thy slaughter'd saints, whose bones
Lie scatter'd on the Alpine mountains cold;
Ev'n them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worship'd stocks and stones,
Forget not! in thy book record their groans
Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
Slain by the bloody Piedmontese, that roll'd
Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
The vales redouble to the hills, and they
To heaven!"

Cromwell saw at once what a noble policy it would be to avenge these moans, and he did it in a manner which was worthy of the justice and sacredness of the cause. Milton conducted the negotiation. He refused to sign the French treaty with Mazarin, long and painfully protracted as it had been, till he had received what he quietly termed the "opinion" of Louis on the subject of the troubles in Piedmont. In vain Bordeaux remonstrated against this new pretext for delay; in vain maintained that the question bore no relation to the matter of the treaty; in vain protested that the King of France would never interfere with the internal administration of an independent state; and still more vainly held that the Duke of Savoy had as good a right to make laws for his Protestant subjects as the English government for the Catholics of the three kingdoms, and that the Vaudois were in reality rebels who had justly incurred the resentment of their sovereign. Cromwell stood unmoved. Bordeaux applied for an audience to take leave; still the Lord Protector abated no jot of his demand. The perplexity was ended by sudden intelligence that the Duke of Savoy, at the request of the King of France, had granted an amnesty to the Vaudois, and confirmed all their ancient privileges; that the boon had been gratefully received; and that the natives of the valleys, Protestants and Catholics, had met, embraced each other with tears, and sworn to live in perpetual amity together.

Projects respecting the Jews occupied at this period also the mind of Cromwell, but of which it will not be necessary to say more in this work than that, having appointed an assembly of men of various professions, divines, lawyers, and merchants, to take into consideration the expediency of permitting them to trade in England (leave for which had been supplicated by Manasseh Ben Israel, one of their chief rabbis), the general prejudices were discovered to be as yet too strong against that people to allow of their obtaining the liberty desired, or other privileges which Cromwell would gladly have granted them.*

critic, and certainly his interference on behalf of the persecuted Piedmontese affords no evidence. This interference was in keeping with his religious life and entire character. —C.]

* Thurloe thus writes to Henry Cromwell: "Wee have had very many disputations concerning the admittance of the Jewes to dwell in this Commonwealth, they havinge made an earnest desire to his highnesse to be admitted, whereupon he hath bene pleased to advise with some of the judges, merchants, and divines. The point of conscience hath bene only controverted yet, viz., whether it be lawfull to admit the Jewes now out of England to returne againe into it. The divines doe very much differ in their judgements about it, some beinge for their admittance upon fittinge cautions, others are in expresse termes against

* [It is by no means proved that Cromwell was a hypo-

The treaty with France was signed shortly after the submission of Savoy. It was drawn up in Latin; and on its being observed that Louis styled himself Rex Gallia, since there was no longer an English king to claim the silly title, Cromwell objected, insisted on Rex Gallorum, and Mazarin at length complied. The chief conditions of this treaty were, that France should indemnify English merchants for injuries to their commerce; that the conquest of Dunkirk should be made for England by their joint forces; and that Charles II., his family, and his court, should be forever excluded from the French territory. Of the Stuarts, the Duke of York only was then in France; and Cromwell, at the request of Mazarin, consented to his being allowed to remain there.* The duke repaid Cromwell for this concession by sending his brother, within a few days after, a deliberate proposition for the murder of the Lord Protector, accompanied by the last court burlesque. The letter was caught by the ever-watchful Thurloe.

"There is a proposition has been made to me which is too long to put in a letter; so that I will, as short as I can, lett you know the heads of them. There are fower Roman Catholics that have bound themselves in a solemn oath to kill Cromwell, and then to raise all the Catholics in the City and the Army, which they pretend to be a number so considerable as may give a rise for your recovery, they beinge all warn'd to be ready for somethinge that is to be done, without knowinge what it is. They demand ten thousand livres in hand; and when the businesse is ended, some recompence for themselves according to their severall qualities, and the same liberty for Catholics in England as the Protestants have in France. I thought nott fit to reject this proposition, butt to acquainte you with it, becaus the first parte of the desine seems to me to be better layd and resolved on than any I have knowen of that kind; and for the defects of the second, it may be supply'd by some desines you may have to join to it. If you approve of it, one of the fower, intrusted by the rest, will repaire to you, his charges being borne, and give you a full account of the whole matter. In the mean time, he desires, in his owne name and theirs, that you would lett butt one or two, whome you most trust, know it, and enjoyne them secrecy. This is all I can say of it at this time. I have not much more to say at present, theire beinge no certaine newse of the treaty with Cromwell, though it is much reported that it is agreed on, though not sign'd. For my owne businesse, my Lord Jermine, who comes now from speaking with the it upon any termes whatsoever. The like difference I finde in the councill, and soe amongst all Christians abroad. The matter is debated with great candour and ingenuitie, and without any heat. What the issue thereof will be I am not able to tell you, butt am apt to thinke that nothing will be done therein."—Thurloe, vol. iv., p. 321.

* Lockhart was sent ambassador to France, where he was treated with peculiar favour. A Paris letter of a later date may describe this: "They do caress here the Lord Protector very much; also Colonel Lockhart was well dismissed. The lord-cardinal presented to him four exceeding fine horses, for the saddle, for the Lord Protector. The said Colonel Lockhart told me himself he never saw such fine horses, and that the lord his master would be mightily pleased with them. He told me likewise that this court had given him good content in all things, so that he went from hence very well satisfied, and thinks to return hither again shortly."—Thurloe, vol. v., p. 655.

Cardinal, will give you an account of it, soe that I need not trouble you with it, or the other newes of this place; only this, that it is soe hot wether, that I have been a swimming this afternoon, and never found the Water warmer. I send you some songs of the last bullett inclosed with the Gazette burlesque. This is all I have to trouble you with at present."

Spain had now, of course, taken measures of extreme hostility, and had even sanctioned a most unnatural plot against the person of the English Protector, in connexion with a fierce Fifth-Monarchy Republican, Colonel Sexby, and the exiled Charles Stuart. The war between the two nations, however, proceeded languidly, without much sympathy on the part of the people generally, and with the decided opposition of the London merchants, whose trade it so seriously interfered with. One incident then suddenly occurred to give to it a temporary brilliancy. Blake (whose stern Republicanism always kept Cromwell in fear) had been joined in the command by Montague, and sent in second pursuit of the Spanish Plate fleet. Without military force, however, they found they could not strike the necessary blow at Cadiz or Gibraltar, and therefore, abandoning the attempt, they sailed to Lisbon; completed the old treaty by forcing from Don John a stipulated payment of £50,000; returned to Cadiz; passed the Straits; insulted the Spaniards in Malaga, the Moors in Sallee; and after a fruitless cruise of more than two months, anchored a second time in the Tagus. Here it most opportunely and fortunately happened that one of their captains, Stayner, with a squadron of frigates, fell in with a Spanish fleet of eight sail from America. Of these he destroyed four and captured two, one of which was laden with golden ingots and other treasure. Montague was at once sent home with the prize, valued in his despatch at £200,000. The Protectorate prints raised the amount to two millions; and the friends of Cromwell hailed the event "as a renewed testimony of God's presence, and some witness of his acceptance of the engagement against Spain." To his more servile flatterers it suggested what they knew would be far more welcome to the Lord Protector. "And now," said Waller,

"Returns victorious Montague,
With laurels in his hand, and half Peru.
Let the brave generals divide that bough,
Our great Protector hath such wreaths enough;
His conquering head has no more room for bays,
Then let it be as the glad nation prays;
Let the rich ore be forthwith melted down,
And the state fixed, by making him a crown;
With ermine clad, and purple, let him hold
A royal sceptre, made of Spanish gold."

The same thought was already working in the brain of Cromwell, and might have worked more profitably there had there been more of this Spanish gold. But the truth was, that his treasury, notwithstanding these grateful supplies, notwithstanding all his infamous extortions, was at this instant wellnigh exhausted. The equipments of the various fleets had run it out, and, having been forced into contests for the right of levying taxes with some few spirited individuals* in his own courts of law, even he durst not exercise his power of levying while the question was still under judgment. The most famous case of this sort was that of a merchant named Cony, who narrowly escaped the glory of another Hampden. He refused the payment of certain custom duties, on the ground of their not being levied by authority of Parliament; referred to the opposition of Rolls, Valentine, and Chambers, in a similar case, to Charles I., and recalled to the memory of Cromwell his own expression in the Long Parliament, "that the subject who submits to an illegal impost is more the enemy of his country than the tyrant who imposes it." Cromwell answered this by committing him to prison for contempt. He claimed his writ of habeas corpus, and retained three of the most eminent lawyers at the bar, Maynard, Twisden, and Wadham Windham, to plead it for him. They did so, and are said to have urged such arguments, and enforced them with such vigour, that, if ceded to, they would have shaken the Protectorate to its base. Maynard and his fellow-pleaders were accordingly, the day after these arguments, sent to the Tower, on the charge of having held language destructive to the existing government.

* Besides Cony, Sir Peter Wentworth and others had resisted his assessments in the country.

But the case did not end here. The day following, Cony, unsupported by counsel, presented himself at the bar of the Upper Bench, and urged his own cause with so much power, that Rolle, who presided in the court, was either moved very far towards conviction, or suffered very heavily from shame. He delayed the case for a term on some formal pretence, gave in his resignation in the interim, and was at once succeeded by Glyn in the chair of the chief-justice. Maynard, Twisden, and Windham, on their submission, were discharged from confinement; and Cony was prevailed upon, by some secret means, which must forever dishonour a memory that had so nearly become illustrious, to bring his cause no more before the court.

Cromwell was still left, however, in a most difficult position; a position from which the name and the forms of some Parliamentary authority could alone, he saw at last, by any possibility rescue him. So hard he found it, even with such resources as he had called into existence, to subdue utterly a nation which had once been free. Writs were issued for a Parliament to meet on the 17th of December, 1656.

Before I proceed to sketch the incidents of that Parliament, it may be interesting to supply from the page of Lord Clarendon's history a view of the power and position of Cromwell, as it now appeared to the view of the Royalists. It marks an emphatic lesson in the life of the Lord Protector, that with all this show of influence and glory, which cannot be altogether in fairness disputed, his real resources should have been to the last degree mean, crippled, and low. There was, indeed, a ghastly skeleton under the painted face.

"After he was confirmed and invested Protector by the humble Petition and Advice, he consulted with very few upon any action of importance, nor communicated any enterprise he resolved upon with more than those who were to have principal parts in the execution of it; nor with them sooner than was absolutely necessary. What he once resolved, in which he was not rash, he would not be dissuaded from, nor endure any contradiction of his power and authority, but extorted obedience from them who were not willing to yield it.

"When he had laid some very extraordinary tax upon the city, one Cony, an eminent fanatic, and one who had heretofore served him very notably, positively refused to pay his part, and loudly dissuaded others from submitting to it, 'as an imposition notoriously against the law and the property of the subject, which all honest men were bound to defend.' Cromwell sent for him, and cajoled him with the memory of 'the old kindness and friendship that had been between them; and that, of all men, he did not expect this opposition from him, in a matter that was so necessary for the good of the Commonwealth.' But it was always his fortune to meet with the most rude and obstinate behaviour from those who had formerly been absolutely governed by him; and they commonly put him in mind of some expressions and sayings of his own in cases of the like nature: so this man remembered him how great an enemy he had expressed himself to such grievances, and had declared 'that all who submitted to them, and paid illegal taxes, were more to blame, and greater enemies to their country, than they who had imposed them; and that the tyranny of princes could never be grievous but by the tameness and stupidity of the people.' When Cromwell saw that he could not convert him, he told him that 'he had a will as stubborn as his, and he would try which of them two should be master.' Thereupon, with some terms of reproach and contempt, he committed the man to prison; whose courage was nothing abated by it, but, as soon as the term came, he brought his habeas corpus in the King's Bench, which they then called the Upper Bench. Maynard, who was of counsel with the prisoner, demanded his liberty with great confidence, both upon the illegality of the commitment, and the illegality of the imposition, as being laid without any lawful authority. The judges could not maintain or defend either, and enough declared what their sentence would be; and therefore the Protector's attorney required a farther delay, to answer what had been urged. Before that day Maynard was committed to the Tower for presuming to question or make doubt of his authority, and the judges were sent for and severely reprehended for suffering that license. When they, with all humility, mentioned the law and Magna Charta, Cromwell told them, 'their magna f... should not control his actions, which he knew were for the safety of the Commonwealth.' He asked them, 'Who made them judges? Whether they had any authority to sit there but what he gave them? and, if his authority were at an end, they knew well enough what would become of themselves, and therefore advised them to be more tender of that which could only preserve them,' and so dismissed them with caution that they should not suffer the lawyers 'to prate what it would not become them to hear.'

"Thus he subdued a spirit that had been often troublesome to the most sovereign power, and made Westminster Hall as obedient and subservient to his commands as any of the rest of his quarters. In all other matters, which did not concern the life of his jurisdiction, he seemed to have great reverence for the law, rarely interposing between party and party. As he proceeded with this kind of indignation and haughtiness with those who were refractory, and dared to civilly contend with his greatness, so towards all who complied with his good pleasure and courted his protection, he used a wonderful generosity and bounty.

"To reduce three nations, which perfectly hated him, to an entire obedience to all his dictates; to awe and govern those nations by an army that was undevoted to him and wished his ruin, was an instance of a very prodigious address. But his greatness at home was but a shadow of the glory he had abroad. It was hard to discover which feared him most, France, Spain, or the Low Countries, where his friendship was current at the value he put upon it. As they did all sacrifice their honour and their interest to his pleasure, so there is nothing he could have demanded that either of them would have denied him; to manifest which there needs only two instances: the first is, when those of the Valley of Lucerne had unwarily rebelled against the Duke of Savoy, which gave occasion to the pope, and the neighbour princes of Italy, to call and solicit for their extirpation, and their prince positively resolved upon it. Cromwell sent his agent to the Duke of Savoy, a prince with whom he had no correspondence or commerce, and so engaged the cardinal, and even terrified the pope himself, without so much as doing any grace to the English Roman Catholics (nothing being more usual than his saying 'that his ships in the Mediterranean should visit Civita Vecchia, and that the sound of his cannon should be heard in Rome'), that the Duke of Savoy thought it necessary to restore all that he had taken from them, and did renew all those privileges they had formerly enjoyed and newly forfeited.

"The other instance of his authority was yet greater and more incredible. In the city of Nismes, which is one of the fairest in the province of Languedoc, and where those of the religion do most abound, there was a great faction at that season, when consuls, who are the chief magistrates, were to be chosen. Those of the Reformed religion had the confidence to set up one of themselves for that magistracy, which they of the Roman religion resolved to oppose with all their power. The dissension between them made so much noise, that the intendant of the province, who is the supreme minister in all civil affairs throughout the whole province, went thither to prevent any disorder that might happen. When the day of election came, those of the Reformed religion possessed themselves, with many armed men, of the town-house, where the election was to be made. The magistrates sent to know what their meaning was; to which they answered, 'They were there to give their voices for the choice of the new consuls, and to be sure that the election should be fairly made.' The bishop of the city, the intendant of the province, with all the officers of the Church, and the present magistrates of the town, went together in their robes to be present at the election, without any suspicion that there would be any force used. When they came near the gate of the town-house, which was shut, and they supposed would be opened when they came, they within poured out a volley of musket-shot upon them, by which the dean of the church, and two or three of the magistrates of the town, were killed upon the place, and very many others wounded, whereof some died shortly after. In this confusion, the magistrates put themselves into as good a posture to defend themselves as they could, without any purpose of offending the other till they should be better provided; in order to which, they sent an express to the court, with a plain relation of the whole matter of fact, 'and that there appeared to be no manner of combination with those of the Reformed religion in other places of the province, but that it was an insolence in those of the place, upon the presumption of their great numbers, which were little inferior to those of the Catholics.' The court was glad of the occasion, and resolved that this provocation, in which other places were not involved, and which nobody could excuse, should warrant all kind of severity in that city, even to the pulling down their temples, and expelling many of them forever out of the city; which, with the execution and forfeiture of many of the principal persons, would be a general mortification to all of the religion in France, with whom they were heartily offended; and a part of the army was forthwith ordered to march towards Nismes, to see this executed with the utmost rigour.

"Those of the religion in the town were quickly sensible into what condition they had brought themselves, and sent, with all possible submission, to the magistrates to excuse themselves, and to impute what had been done to the rashness of particular men, who had no order for what they did. The magistrates answered 'that they were glad they were sensible of their miscarriage, but they could say nothing upon the subject till the king's pleasure should be known, to whom they had sent a full relation of all that had passed.' The others very well knew what the king's pleasure would be, and forthwith sent an express, one Moulins, a Scotchman, who had lived many years in that place and in Montpellier, to Cromwell, to desire his protection and interposition. The express made so much haste, and found so good a reception the first hour he came, that Cromwell, after he had received the whole account, bade him 'refresh himself after so long a journey, and he would take such care of his business that, by the time he came to Paris, he should find it despatched;' and that night sent away another messenger to his ambassador Lockhart, who, by the time Moulins came thither, had so far prevailed with the cardinal, that orders were sent to stop the troops which were upon their march towards Nismes; and, within a few days after, Moulins returned with a full pardon and amnesty from the king, under the great seal of France, so fully confirmed with all circumstances that there was never farther mention made of it, but all things passed as if there had never been any such thing, so that nobody can wonder that his memory remains still in those parts, and with those people, in great veneration.

"He would never suffer himself to be denied anything he ever asked of the cardinal, alleging 'that the people would not be otherwise satisfied,' which the cardinal bore very heavily, and complained of to those with whom he would be free. One day he visited Madame Turenne, and when he took his leave of her, she, according to her custom, besought him to continue gracious to the churches; whereupon the cardinal told her 'that he knew not how to behave himself: if he advised the king to punish and suppress their insolence, Cromwell threatened him to join with the Spaniard; and if he showed any favour to them, at Rome they accounted him a heretic.'

The excitement at the election for the Parliament now summoned exceeded that of any previous occasion. It has been described in this work,* and requires very brief allusion here. Vane reappeared upon the agitated scene by the publication of his "Healing Question." He was summoned before the council, and committed to Carisbrook. Bradshaw, Ludlow, and Rich were also, on various pretences, arrested. Bradshaw was removed from his office of chief-justice of Chester; Rich was incarcerated in Windsor Castle; and Ludlow, after some detention, discharged on his reluctant concession of bail.† Colonel Okey and Vice-admiral Law-

* In the Memoir of Vane.

† Ludlow has characteristically described his interview with Cromwell and his military satellites on this occasion: "The next Wednesday after my arrival, about eight in the evening, Cromwell sent a gentleman, one Mr. Tenwick, to let me know that he would speak with me. I found him in his bedchamber at Whitehall, and with him Major-general Lambert, Col. Sydenham, Mr. Walter Strickland, Col. Montague, and soon after came in Lieutenant-general Fleetwood. . . . He asked me wherefore I would not engage not to act against the present government, telling me that if Nero were in power, it would be my duty to submit. To which I replied, that I was ready to submit, and could truly say that I knew not of any design against him. But, said I, if Providence open a way, and give an opportunity of appearing in behalf of the people, I cannot consent to tie my own hands beforehand, and oblige myself not to lay hold on it. However, said he, it is not reasonable to suffer one that I distrust to come within my house till he assure me he will do me no mischief. I told him I was not accustomed to go to any house unless I expected to be welcome; neither had I come hither but upon a message from him; and that I desired nothing but a little liberty to breathe in the air, to which I conceived I had an equal right with other men. . . . Then beginning to carry himself more calmly, he said that he had been always ready to do me what good offices he could, and that he wished me as well as he did any one of his council, desiring me to make choice of some place to be in where I might have good air. I assured him that my dissatisfactions were not grounded upon any animosity against his person, and that, if my own father were alive and in his place, they would, I doubted not, be altogether as great. He acknowledged that I had always carried myself fairly and openly to him, and protested that he had never given me just cause to act otherwise. . . . Major-general Lambert then desired to know from me why I could not own this as a lawful government. Because, said I, it seems to me to be in substance a re-establishment of that which we all engaged against, and had with a great expense of blood and treasure abolished. What then, said he, would you account to be a sufficient warrant for you to act against the present authority? I answered, when I might rationally hope to be supported by an authority equal or superior to this, and could be persuaded that the said authority would employ its power for the good of mankind. But who shall be judge of that? said he; for all are ready to say that they do so, and we ourselves think we use the best of our endeavours to that end. I replied that if they did so, their crime was the less, because every man stands obliged to govern himself by the light of his own reason, which rule, with the assistance of God, I was determined to observe. Col. Sydenham said we might be mistaken in judging that to be a power giving us a just and rational call to act, which may not be so. I told him that we ought to be very careful and circumspect in that particular, and at least be assured of very probable grounds to believe the power under which we engage to be sufficiently able to protect us in our undertaking, otherwise I should account rence were also arrested, and Harrison was sent, with a strong escort, into Pendennis Castle in Cornwall. The chiefs of the Royalists who had shown the smallest activity were at the same time flung into the Tower. But all was in vain: the returns showed Cromwell and his council the bitter truth, that the constituencies had once more decided against him. Among the members were Scot and Hazlerig; Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, who had quarrelled with the Protector, and resigned his seat in the council; Maynard, who had resisted him in the case of Cony; Thorpe, one of the judges who had resigned his authority; Chaloner, Chute, Popham, and other decided Republicans; Sir Henry Milding, and Lord Salisbury. Cromwell took the desperate resolution at once of excluding these and others. The Instrument of Government vested in the council the power of verifying the regularity of the elections; and Cromwell, extending it into a right to cancel the returns, however regular, at his mere personal discretion, supplied a list of nearly a hundred members immediately obnoxious to him, and including all those I have named, to be excluded for "immorality" or "delinquency!"

Unconscious of this, the new Parliament met the Protector on the 17th, in the Painted Chamber, when he addressed them in a long, obscure, but most artful speech. It was clear from the first that his sole object was to procure money; and with this view he sought to excite their alarm and to interest their religious antipathies. He enumerated the enemies of the nation. The first was the Spaniard, the natural adversary of England, because he was the slave of the pope, a child of darkness, and consequently hostile to the light; blinded by superstition, and anxious to put down the things of God; one with whom it was impossible to be at peace, and to whom, in relation to this country, might be applied the words of Scripture, "I will put enmity between thy seed and her seed." There was also Charles Stuart, who, with the aid of the Spaniard and the Duke of Nieburg, had raised a formidable army for the invasion of the island. There were the Papists and Cavaliers, who had already risen, and were again ready to rise, in favour of Charles Stuart. He mentioned a plot for surprising himself, as he lay in his bed at Whitehall, and another for blowing up the apartment in which he slept, but expressed himself respecting them with contempt. He next assailed the Levellers, who had sent an agent to the court of Madrid (Colonel Sexby), and the Fifth-Monarchy men, who sought a union with the Levellers against him, "a reconciliation between Herod and Pilate, that Christ might be put to death." He afterward eulogized the good effects which had arisen from his appointment of the major-generals, which, he said, had been greatly successful, first, in suppressing vice and profligacy, and next, in establishing an unusual internal tranquillity! He was earnest in recommending the toleration of all conscientious Christians, Presbyterians, Independents, Anabaptists, however they might differ in inferior matters; ap-myself not only guilty of my own blood, but also, in some measure, of the ruin and destruction of all those that I should induce to engage with me, though the cause were never so just."

plauded the measures that had been adopted for removing scandalous ministers; urged the public maintenance of a preaching ministry by tithes, or some less exceptionable method; and a reform of the law, particularly of the criminal law, comprehending a reduction of the number of offences to which capital punishment was awarded. He referred to the prisoners detained in the Isle of Wight, Cornwall, and other places, and said that their detention had been found necessary for the public safety. He then came to the subject of remedies, and, after much circumlocution, he at last stated them to be to prosecute the war abroad, and strengthen the hands of the government at home; to lose no time in questions of inferior moment or less urgent necessity, but to inquire into the state of the revenue, and to raise ample supplies. In conclusion, he explained the eighty-fifth psalm, exclaiming, "If pope, and Spaniard, and devil, and all set themselves against us, though they should compass us about like bees, yet in the name of the Lord we shall destroy them. The Lord of Hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge."

But, having explained the purpose of this most remarkable harangue, which to an ordinary reader would not by any means appear upon its surface, I will present a few of the more striking passages it contained. They possess additional interest from the circumstance of the speech not having found a place in the compilation of our Parliamentary histories. They are in many points expressed with startling force and boldness, in others with unusual obscurity, a kind of unfathomable effort of significance. It is especially curious to mark, however, with what dexterity the few peculiar merits of his government are brought up to the surface, to the depression and concealment, not only of their own notorious abuse, but of the fearful accessories by which even their best use was perverted into tyranny. They need no introduction, after the general abstract I have given of the purpose of the speaker.

"Truly when this insurrection was, & we saw it, in all the roots and grounds of it, we did find out a little from invention, which I hear has been much regretted. I say, there was a little thing invented, which was the erecting of your Major-Generals to have a little inspection upon the people, thus divided, thus discontented, thus dissatisfied, in divers interests, by the Popish party—the Lord Taffe and others; the most, consisting of natural Irish Rebels, and all those Men you have fought against in Ireland, and expelled from thence, as having had a hand in that bloody massacre of those that were under his power: they should have joined in this excellent business of insurrection. And, upon such rising as that was, truly, I think, if ever anything was justifiable to necessity, and honest in every respect, this was; and I could as soon venture my life with it as anything I ever undertook. We did find out—I mean myself and the Council—that if there were need to have greater forces to carry on this work, it was a most righteous thing to put the charge upon that party which was the cause of it, and if there be any Man that hath a face looking averse to this, I dare pronounce him to be a man against the interest of England. Upon this account, and upon this ground of necessity, when we saw what game they were upon, and knew individual persons, and of the greatest rank, not a few, engaged in this business (I knew one man that laid down his life for it, and by letters intercepted, which made it as clear as the day), we did think it our duty to make them that were in the combination of men, as evident as anything in the world, equally to bear that share of the Charge, one with another, for the raising of the forces that were so necessary to defend us against those designs. And truly, if any man be angry at it, I am plain, and shall use an homely expression, Let him turn the Buckle of his Girdle behind him. If this were to be done again, I would do it. . . . How the Major-Generals have behaved themselves in that Work? I hope they are men, as to their persons, of known integrity and fidelity, and Men that have freely adventured their blood and lives for that Good Cause (if it be thought so, and it was well stated, against all the humours and fancies of men). And truly, England doth yet receive one day more of lengthening out its tranquillity by that occasion. . . .

"You see where your war is: it is with the Spaniard. You have peace with all nations, or the most of them, Swede, Dane, Dutch. At present, I say it is well it is at present so; and so with Portugal, France, the Mediterranean Sea—both those states, both Christian and profane—the Mahometans, you have peace with them all. Only with Spain, I say, you have a difference, you have a war. I pray consider it. Do I come to tell you that I would tie you to this war? No. As you shall find your spirits and reasons grounded in what hath been said, so let you & me join in the prosecution of that War, as we are satisfied, and as the cause will appear to our consciences in the sight of the Lord; but if you can come to prosecute it, prosecute it vigorously, or do not do it at all. . . .

"I have had Petitions, and acknowledgments, and professions from whole counties, as from Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, and other counties; acknowledgments that they do but desire they may have liberty and protection in the worshipping of God according to their own Judgments, for the parging of their congregations, and the labouring to attain more purity of faith and repentance; that in their outward profession they will not strain themselves beyond their own line. I have had those; I have them to show; and I confess, I look at that as the blesseddest thing which hath been since the adventuring upon this Government, that these times produce. . . . For my part, I should think I were very treacherous if I should take away tithes till I see the legislative power to settle maintenance to them another way; but whoever they be that shall contend to destroy them, that doth as really cut their throats, as it is a drift to take them away before a way of preparation or other maintenance be had. Truly, I think all such practices and proceedings should be discountenanced. I have heard it from as gracious a Minister as any is in England—I have had it professed that it would be a far greater satisfaction to them to have it another way, if the State will provide it. . . .

"In my conscience it was a shame to be a Christian within these fifteen, sixteen, or seventeen years in this nation, either in Cæsar's house or elsewhere. It was a shame, it was a reproach to a Man; and the badge of Puritan was put upon it. We would keep up the Nobility and Gentry; and the way to keep them up is, not to suffer them to be Patronizers, nor Countenancers of debauchery or disorders. And you will hereby be as Labourers in the Work; and a Man may tell us plainly as can be what becomes us, by our indifferency or lukewarmness, under I know not what weak pretensions, if it lives in us. Therefore, I say, if it be in the General, it is a thing, I am confident, that the liberty and prosperity of this nation depends upon reformation. Make it a shame to see men to be bold in sin and profaneness, and God will bless you. You will be a blessing to the nation; and by this, be more Repairers of breaches than anything in the World. Truly, these things do respect the souls of Men, and the spirits which are the Men. The mind is the Man. If that be kept pure, a man signifies somewhat; if not, I would very fain see what difference there is betwixt him and a beast. He hath only some activity to do some more mischief. . . .

"There are some things which respect the Estates of men, and there is one general grievance in the Nation: it is the law. Not that the laws are a grievance, but there are laws that are a grievance, and the great grievance lies in the execution and administration. I think I may say it, I have as eminent Judges in this land as have been had, or that the Nation has had for these many years. . . . Truly I could be particular as to the executive part, to the administration, but that would trouble you. But the truth of it is, there are wicked and abominable laws, that will be in your power to alter. To hang a man for 6s. 3d.! I know not what! To hang for a trifle, and pardon murder, it is the ministration of the law, through the ill framing of it. I have known, in my experience, abominable murders quitted, and seen Men lose their lives for petty matters! This is a thing that God will reckon for, and I wish it may not lie upon this nation a day longer than you have an opportunity to give a remedy, and I hope I shall cheerfully join with you in it. This hath been a great grief to many honest hearts and conscientious people, and I hope it is in all your Hearts to rectify it. . . .

"I say it again, the endeavours have been, by those that have been appointed, by those that have been Major-Generals, I can repeat them with comfort, that it hath been effectual for the preservation of your peace. It hath been more effectual towards the discountenancing of vice and settling religion, than anything done these fifty years. I will abide it, notwithstanding the envy and slander of foolish men. But I say there hath been a design! I confess I speak that to you with a little vehemency. But you had not that peace two months together. I profess, I believe it as much as ever I did anything in the World, and how instrumental they have been to your peace, and for your preservation, by such means, which we say was necessity, than from all instituted things in the world. . . . If you would make Laws against the things that God may dispose, to meet with everything that may happen, why, then, make a law in the face of God, and tell God you will meet his dispensations, and you will stay things, whether he will or no. But if you make laws of good government, that Men may know how to obey and do, for Government, you may make laws that have frailty and weakness, ay, and good laws observed; but if nothing should be done but what is according to law, the throat of the nation may be cut till we send for some to make a law. Therefore, certainly, it is a pitiful, beastly notion to think, THAT THOUGH IT BE FOR ORDINARY GOVERNMENT TO LIVE BY LAW AND RULE, YET—Yet to be clamoured at, and blotted at! When matters of necessity come, inviolably, then what extraordinary remedies may not be applied? Who can be so pitiful a person? . . . I must say, I do not know one action, no, not one, but it hath been in order to the peace and safety of the nation; and the keeping of some in Prison hath been upon such clear and just grounds, that no Man can except against it. I know there are some imprisoned in the Isle of Wight, Cornwall, and elsewhere, and the cause of their imprisonment was, they were all found acting things that tended to the disturbance of the peace of the nation. . . .

"I beseech you, do not dispute of unnecessary and unprofitable things, that may divert you from carrying on so glorious a work as this is. I think every objection that ariseth is not to be answered, nor have I time for it. I say, look up to God; have peace amongst yourselves. Know assuredly, that if I have interest, I am by the voice of the people the Supreme Magistrate, and, it may be, know somewhat, that may satisfy my conscience if I stood in doubt. But it is a union, really it is a union, between you and me, and both of us united in faith and love to Jesus Christ, and to his peculiar interest in the World, that must ground this work; and in that, if I have any peculiar interest that is personal to myself, that is not subservient to the public end, it were no extravagant thing for me to curse myself, because I know God will curse me, if I have."

When the Lord Protector had closed, the members returned to their own House, where they found the door guarded by soldiers, with orders to admit none but such as were provided with a certificate of the approbation of the council, signed by the clerk of the Commonwealth. Upward of a hundred members were thus, to their amazement and indignation, at once excluded. The rest entered, and elected Widdrington as their speaker. The first business urged on the following day was that of the excluded members. They had, the previous evening, drawn up and signed a letter of remonstrance, addressed to the speaker, who read it to the House. It set forth that they whose names were subscribed, having been duly returned to serve with them in Parliament, were kept back in the lobby by soldiers; and they now demanded admission to discharge their trust. Upon the reading of this letter, a motion of adjournment was negatived by a majority of 115 to 80; a resolution that the driven out members be referred for redress to the council, and that the House do proceed with the great affairs of the nation, was carried by a majority of 125 to 29. Upon this, several members, to show their disapprobation, voluntarily seceded, and those who had been driven out by force published an appeal to the people of England, which showed, in the eloquent language of just indignation, for what excellent reasons such men had been excluded from the subservient and servile business for which the tyrant of England had summoned what he called a Parliament. It is more the business of this work to supply the substance of that noble appeal, than to trace the repulsive track of the mean and spiritless members who continued to crawl before the feet of their master and lord.

It stated—and it bore the signature of a hundred educated and wealthy Englishmen—that when our ancestors in Parliament had found oppression and tyranny too strong for them to subdue, they had often made their protestations, and forewarned the people of their danger. The remonstrators referred particularly to a protestation of the third Parliament of the late king (March, 1629), in which they had declared, that whoever should advise him to levy tonnage and poundage, not being granted by Parliament, should be accounted a capital enemy; and whoever paid the tax, a betrayer of the liberties of England. They go on to say, that the rumour has doubtless gone through the nation, that a considerable number of the members, chosen by the people to represent them in Parliament, have, by force of arms, been excluded from the place of their sitting; but they express their fear that the slavery, rapines, cruelties, murders, and confusion comprehended in that one horrid fact have not been so sensibly discerned, and so much laid to heart, as the case required; and they doubt not but, as the manner of the man had been, that the name of God and religion, and formal fasts and prayers, will be made use of to colour over the blackness of the deed.

They proceed, therefore, to remonstrate, that, by the fundamental rights of the nation, the people ought not to be bound by any laws but such as have been freely consented to by their deputies in Parliament, and that by preserving this principle, the good people of England have, beyond the memory of any record, retained their estates, their families, and their lives, which had else been destroyed at the will of every tyrant. They add, that the Parliaments of England, consisting of the people's chosen deputies, have always been, and ought to be, the ordainers and creators of dignities, offices, and authorities within this nation, and have of right exercised the power of disposing even of the kingly office, and of enlarging or restraining the kingly power; and have questioned, censured, and judged even the persons of our kings themselves, who have acknowledged their power to be only intrusted to them for the nation's welfare. English kings had feared the people's complaints in Parliament, well aware that it was their custom to choose for their deputies the most known champions for their liberties; and none of the kings, in their highest attempts at tyranny, had ever dared to throw aside by force as many of the chosen members as they thought would not serve their ends, till the time of the present Protector. But, they observe, the chief magistrate now in office declares that his proclamations shall have the force of laws, and takes upon himself to be above the people of England, and to censure the whole or any part, by no other rule than his own pleasure. Doubtless, if he had conquered the nation, he yet could not but know that the right of the people's deputies in Parliament would remain good against him, as against a public enemy, unless, by some agreement with the people in Parliament, he were admitted to some sort of governing power; nor could he be discharged from the character of a public enemy by any agreement with a part of the people's deputies, while he shut out another part.

These gallant and high-spirited men conclude, therefore, with protesting, first, that whoever had advised or assisted the Protector in excluding a part of the people's deputies, was a capital enemy of the Commonwealth; and they quote the instance of Judge Tresilian, under Richard II., who was executed at Tyburn for advising the king to dissolve the Parliament. Secondly, that all such members as should sit, act, and vote in the name of a Parliament, while other legal members were shut out, were to be accounted betrayers of the liberties of England, and adherents to the capital enemies of the Commonwealth.

Nor did these at all belie the description. They had at once passed a resolution declaratory of the justice and policy of the war against Spain, and two acts, by one of which were annulled all claims of Charles Stuart and his family to the crown, while by the other additional safeguards were provided for the person of their chief governor, Oliver Cromwell. With the same unanimity a supply of £400,000 had been voted; but when the means of raising the money came under consideration, a great diversity of opinion prevailed, and upon this question even these poor tools of the Protectorate did not dare to commit themselves with the country, subdued and distracted as it was beneath the hope of effectual resistance. Some proposed to inquire into the conduct of the treasury; some to adopt improvements in the collection of the revenue; others recommended an augmentation of the excise; and others a more economical system of expenditure. In the discussion of these questions and of private bills, week after week, and month after month, were most unprofitably consumed; though the time limited by the Instrument was passed, still the money-bill had made no progress; and, to add to the impatience of Cromwell—who, though he had an important matter of his own to engage him meanwhile, still showed himself impatient—they commenced a series of infamous cruelties and tortures against Fox, Naylor, Biddle, the Quakers, the Unitarians, the Muggletonians, and other strange religious sects that had recently started up.

All this, however, while it added to the Protector's impatience, was secretly advancing his design, which, with his more private creatures, had been in discussion and deliberation ever since this Parliament assembled. This was no less than the expediency of venturing on a revival of kingship, and assuming for himself the crown. The strongest effect he was yet called on to encounter had been wrought against the Protectorate by the gallant remonstrance he had just provoked: everywhere around him were symptoms of dissolution and change, which it would speedily require some bold and novel course of policy to gather up for even common safety; his major-generals were hated universally; the system he had hoped to establish was confessedly a failure; that very system, however, had prepared the way for any change as some relief; and some change there must be, sooner or later, since all the designs he held once, in connexion with the Protectorate, had either been thwarted or had utterly failed. He now saw, in addition, that the Presbyterian and sectarian measures of this Parliament—repulsive to the general body of the people—would give him for the moment a fictitious consideration for superior wisdom and gentleness. Having satisfied himself, in any case, that now was the fit time to strike the blow, he suffered not the delay of another instant.

The first idea he had was to seize the occasion of propitiating the people, still more than in a disapproval of the sectarian cruelties of the Parliament, by effecting a dissolution of the powers of the major-generals! He, therefore, who had called that body into existence—who, at the opening of the Parliament, had been eloquent in their praise—he who had declared that, after his experience of their utility, "if the thing were undone, he would do it again"—he now not only abandoned them himself, but instructed those over whom he had the greatest influence in the House, to conduct the opposition against them! He overreached himself in this, as he afterward discovered, most egregiously.

The subject was opened in the House on the question of the legal confirmation of the major-generals, according to a previous wily scheme, by the Protector's son-in-law Claypole, who said he did but start the game, and must leave it to others more experienced than he to follow in the chase. He should, therefore, only say, that to violate the Act of Oblivion, as the major-generals and their instructions had invariably done, was a proceeding that should not have his approbation. He had believed that, in the situation in which the nation then stood, the commission and measures of the major-generals were necessary, and they ought, therefore, to be indemnified; but to turn such proceedings into a law was an affair of a very different sort; nor could he admit that the authority which had been given to these officers was fit any longer to be continued. The debate which followed was unusually long and obstinate. It continued for ten successive days. Lambert and the major-generals were strenuous in supporting the measure, and Broghill, another close creature of Cromwell's, as strenuously opposed it, and spoke for the instant dispersion of the major-generals. So did Whitelocke. At length the Protector's desire was even more directly declared. In one of the later debates, a lively youth, Colonel Henry Cromwell, grandson of old Sir Oliver Cromwell, and, of course, nephew to the Protector, rose, after Boteler, one of the major-generals, had finished his speech in favour of the bill, and replied with great smartness. He observed, that the last speaker, as well as several that had gone before him, had argued that, because some of the Cavaliers had done amiss, all ought to be punished. "By the same rule," said this stripling, "I may infer that, because some of the major-generals have done ill, of which I offer to produce proofs, all of them ought to be visited with the censure of this House." Major-general Kelsey, who probably held himself to be particularly aimed at, immediately called the speaker to order, and insisted that he should name the persons whom he charged as offenders. The colonel declared his entire readiness to do so, and that he seconded the proposition of the major-general. It was, however, determined to put off this question till the end of the debate, that the main business might not be interrupted. A similar scene passed with another member on the following morning, when the major-generals were flattered with comparisons to a set of Turkish bashaws.

Meanwhile it was intimated to young Cromwell that he should repent the attack he had made, and that he would find the Protector, his kinsman, greatly offended with his forwardness. The colonel, we are told, thus rebuked, immediately repaired to his highness, and avowed what he had said, holding forth documents in his hands to justify his assertions. Cromwell, in return, reproached him, between jest and earnest, with the rashness of his conduct; and, at the close of the interview, pulled off a rich scarlet cloak he happened to wear, and presented it, with his gloves, to the youth. The next day Henry Cromwell came down to the House, wearing these tokens of his triumph, to the great satisfaction and delight of some, to the trouble of others,* and to the special mortification of the major-generals, who, by the desertion of Cromwell, found themselves subsequently exposed to actions at law for the exercise of those powers which they had accepted in obedience to his command. The result of the debate was to disallow their authority by a majority of 124 to 88. Lambert and Cromwell never afterward spoke to each other.

The explosion of the Sexby and Syndercombe plot against Cromwell's life now happened so opportunely in furtherance of Cromwell's designs, that it became the general belief afterward that it had been purposely forced on by Thurloe's spies. A casual mention of the policy of re-establishing "kingship" followed immediately in the House, and was succeeded by a more deliberate and explicit recommendation of it from Mr. Ashe, who, in a brief discussion on the Syndercombe plot, and measures for the greater safety of his highness's person, remarked boldly, "I would have something else added, which, in my opinion, would tend very much to the preservation of himself and us, and to the quieting of all the designs of our enemies—that his highness would be pleased to take upon him the government according to the ancient Constitution, so that the hopes of our enemies and their plots would be at an end."

This suggestion was made on the 19th of January, 1657, and seems to have been tolerably well received by several of the members. One of them, indeed, remarked, that he did not know what was meant by the "ancient Constitution," if it were not the interest of Charles Stuart, whom he hoped that they did not intend to call back again. He had no wish that Cromwell should be appointed the viceroy of the exiled king, or any such thing. But another, Mr. Robinson, replied, that it was not a matter of merriment: on the contrary, it was one which ought to be seriously weighed. "When," said he, "men pull down their houses that are ruinous, they try a while by setting up shrouds; but, finding them drop in, they build their houses again. I cannot propound a better expedient for the preservation both of his highness and the people, than by establishing the government upon the old and tried foundation, as was moved to you by a grave and well-experienced person." Still there was some startling resistance. One of the orators exclaimed, "Will you make the Protector the greatest hypocrite in the world?" Yet most serviceable had the hint and its preliminary skirmish proved, since it marked the relative quarters of favour and opposition.

* Godwin, vol. iv., p. 329-330. Thurloe, vol. vi., p. 20.

The next incidents in the comedy were an address of congratulation to Cromwell on his escape from assassination, and his own princely entertainment to the various members given at Whitehall. As soon as ever they reassembled, the grand scheme was fairly broached. Whitelocke had been asked to do it, but warily refused. He readily promised, at the same time, to support it with all his power.

The day was the 23d of February, and as soon as the members were seated, Sir Christopher Pack, an alderman, and representative of London, who had been lord-mayor,* called the attention of the House to the unsettled state of the nation; suggested that, as the best remedy, "the Lord Protector might be desired to assume the title of king, as the best known and most agreeable kind of government to the English;" and proposed that a bill which he held in his hand should be read. So extraordinary was the sensation when the word king declared itself at last, that many members rose simultaneously from their seats, and poor Pack was violently borne down to the bar;† but, on the restoration of order, he found himself supported by Broghill, Whitelocke, and Glyn, and, with them, by the whole body of the lawyers and the dependants of the court. The paper was ultimately read, after a division on that question, in which the party of the Protector gained a triumph, carrying with them a majority of 144 to 54. It was entitled, "An humble Address and Remonstrance." It protested against the existing form of government, which depended for security on the odious institution of major-generals; and it provided, in a series of eighteen articles, that the Protector should assume a higher title, and govern, as had been done in times past, with the advice of two Houses of Parliament. After some resolute opposition from the Republican officers, among whom Lambert, Desborough, and Fleetwood made themselves most prominent, a motion that it should be discussed paragraph by paragraph was carried by 100 to 44. Successive debates at once began.

The opposition of Fleetwood and Desborough occasioned great surprise, but it was accounted for by their natural timidity, and still more, perhaps, by Cromwell's desertion of them in their unpopular and ill-requested service of major-generalship. Lambert's resistance was little wondered at, since Pack's proposition would have raised a lasting barrier between his own notorious ambition, and the means which, with a special promise, as it was said, of assistance from Cromwell himself, he still looked for achieving it. The fact of such an important matter having been put forth without either co-operation or consent from such men as these—the most essential members of Cromwell's own council—shows not only a most passionate desire for it in the breast of the Lord Protector, but proves that (as the proceedings on the major-generals had led men to suspect) many of the most weighty consultations of the government of the Protectorate were not held in the council chamber.

The great author of the plot at the same time professed utter ignorance and unconcern about it! Strengthened by the opposition of such men as Lambert and Fleetwood, it would seem that on the second or third day of the debate, which was regularly continued on each section of the proposed bill, one hundred of the inferior officers waited on the Protector, to entreat him that he would not listen to the idea of administering the executive government under the proposed new title, suggesting that it would not be pleasing to the army, nor to the godly and pious members of the community; that it would be hazardous to his own person, and dangerous to the nation; and was calculated, in the result, to make way for the restoration of the exiled family. In answer to this, while he affected to ridicule or be careless of the title of kingship, he yet disclosed the deep purpose of his soul: he retorted back upon these soldiers many of the vilest passages of their own policy; he directed their attention to the sort of Parliament that had assembled, and asked them if there ought not to be, in the government they had themselves erected, more liberty of control. There was a time when they felt no objection to the title of king, for the army had offered it to him with the original Instrument of Government. He had rejected it then, and had no greater love for it now. He had always been the "drudge" of the officers, had done the work which they imposed on him, and had sacrificed his opinion to theirs. If the present Parliament had been called, it was in opposition to his individual judgment; if the bill which proved so injurious to the major-generals had been brought into the House, it was contrary to his advice. But the officers had overrated their own strength; the country called for an end to all arbitrary proceedings; the punishment of Naylor proved the necessity of a check on the judicial proceedings of the Parliament, and that check could only be procured by investing the Protector with additional authority! This speech, however, which has only been recovered within the last eight years, is so remarkable, that I here present it to the reader as it stands in the diary of one who was present.

"His highness returned answer presently to this effect: that the first man that told him of it was he, the mouth of the officers then present (meaning Colonel Mills); that, for his part, he had never been at any cabal about the same (hinting, by that, the frequent cabals that were against kingship by certain officers). He said, the time was when they boggled not at the word (king), for the Instrument by which the government now stands was presented to his highness with the title (king) in it, as some there present could witness, pointing at a principal officer, then in his eye, and he refused to accept of the title. But how it comes to pass that they now startle at that title, they best know. That, for his part, he loved the title, a feather in a hat, as little as they did. That they had made him their drudge upon all occasions: to dissolve the Long Parliament, who had contracted evil enough by long sitting; to call a Parliament, or convention of their naming, who met; and what did they? Fly at liberty and property! insomuch as if one man had twelve cows, they held another that wanted cows ought to take share with his neighbour! Who could have said anything was their own if they had gone on! After their dissolution, how was I pressed by you (said he) for the rooting out of the ministry; nay, rather than fail, to starve them out! A Parliament was afterward called; they sat five months: it is true, we hardly heard of them in all that time. They took the Instrument into debate, and they must needs be dissolved; and yet stood not the Instrument in need of mending! Was not the case hard with me, to be put upon to swear to that which was so hard to be kept? Some time after that, you thought it was necessary to have major-generals, and the first rise to that motion (which was the late general insurrections) was justifiable; and you, major-generals, did your parts well. You might have gone on. Who bid you to go to the House with a bill, and there receive a foil? After you had exercised this power a while, impatient were you till a Parliament was called. I gave my vote against it, but you [were] confident, by your own strength and interest, to get men chosen to your heart's desire. How you have failed therein, and how much the country hath been disobliged, is well known. That it is time to come to a settlement, and lay aside arbitrary proceedings, so unacceptable to the nation; and by the proceedings of this Parliament, you see they stand in need of a check, or balancing power [meaning the House of Lords, or a house so constituted], for the case of James Naylor might happen to be your own case. By their judicial power they fall upon life and member, and doth the Instrument enable me to control it?"*

* And is accused, I may subjoin, in Heath's Chronicle, with the guilt of embezzling a charitable fund of which he was commissioner, and with having earned his pardon from Cromwell by the present service. He was afterward made one of his lords!

† Ludlow.

* Sloane MSS. Additions to Ascough. It is now appended to the Diary of Banton. One of Cromwell's most remarkable accomplishments in the art of dissimulation was this power he had, as in the present speech, of accommodating his craft, whether of cajolery, expostulation, or threat, to the various manners and nicest habits of thinking of his various victims or dupes. Thus, too, when even the young Quaker must denounce to him the iniquity of war and its upholders, he would be answered with, "It is very good; it is truth: if THOU and I were but an hour of a day together, we should be nearer one to the other." I am reminded of this anecdote by its quotation in the last volume of the "History of the Colonization of the United States," by George Bancroft: "a work of the deepest interest to any student of the times to which these memoirs have been devoted, and executed in a manner, whether its style or opinions are regarded, that must elevate in general esteem the national literature of America."

This extraordinary harangue, in which we may discover the Lord Protector's most peculiar and striking mode of dealing with his old brethren in arms, was in a great degree successful. Several of the officers at once "discovered a leaning" to the recommendation of their old general. In conclusion, an arrangement was made, in pursuance of which the measure was allowed to proceed. It was agreed that the question of the title under which the executive government was to be exercised should be postponed till the last, and that the Parliament should come to vote that no provision in the bill should be regarded as binding till the whole had been gone through. In return for these concessions on the part of the Protector, the officers consented that that particular proposition should pass in virtue of which the present chief magistrate should be authorized to name his successor, and the other also, which was in favour of the Parliament consisting of two Houses. The issue of this conference confirmed Cromwell in his resolution of pursuing his purpose to the last.

The officers fulfilled their pledge, and their part of the compact was executed to the letter. The first article of the remonstrance consisted of two propositions: the first, praying that Cromwell would hold the office of chief magistrate with the title of king; the second, that he would please, during his lifetime, to name the person who should succeed him. The first was postponed; the second was immediately adopted. The second article was, that there should be Parliaments once in three years at farthest, to consist of two Houses, constituted in such a manner as should hereafter be agreed on and declared. This was voted without a division. The third article prescribed that the ancient and undoubted privileges of Parliament should be preserved and maintained, and that the chief magistrate should not break or interrupt them, nor suffer them to be broken or interrupted; and, in particular, that those persons who were legally chosen to represent the people in Parliament should not be excluded from sitting but by the judgment and consent of that house of which they were members. This was in a like manner voted, and imposed the necessity on Cromwell, if he continued the present House of Commons under the act, to restore the excluded Republicans. The fourth article related to the qualifications, either in point of loyalty, or of religion and morality, which should be required of members of the House of Commons, and to the number and distribution of members of which that House should consist. The fifth article directed that the members of the other House should be in number not fewer than forty, nor more than seventy; that they should be named by the chief magistrate, and approved by Parliament; and that, upon the decease of any one of them, no new member should be admitted to sit but by the consent of the house of which he was to be a member. The sixth article ordered that no new law should be made, nor old one altered, suspended, or repealed, but by consent of Parliament. The seventh article directed that there should be an annual revenue of one million for the maintenance of the army and navy, and of three hundred thousand pounds for the support of government ; that this should not be altered but by consent of Parliament ; that such other temporary supplies should be granted as the Commons might judge necessary ; that there should be no land-tax ; and that no charge or impost should be laid on the people but by consent of Parliament. The eighth article related to the privy council. The ninth article related that the great officers of state should be approved by Parliament. The tenth and eleventh articles related to religion and toleration, and provided that no persons who acknowledged the doctrine of the Trinity, and the Scriptures to be the word of God, should be molested in the freedom of their worship. This liberty was not to be extended to popery and prelacy. There were seven other articles of less importance, on minor matters of detail. All were passed.

The grand article was then discussed, and after two days' debate was carried, that Cromwell should be desired to take on him the government with the title of King. The numbers were 123 to 62. The day following this, it was resolved to change the title of this Instrument from Address and Remonstrance to that of Petition and Advice ; and it was farther determined that, unless the Lord Protector should be satisfied to give his unreserved consent to the whole, no part of the Instrument should be deemed to be of force.

They now took it up to Cromwell in a body, and to their amazement were received with doubts, and uncertainties, and most delicate scruples. Widdrington, as speaker, addressed him in a long speech in commendation of the measure, after which the "Petition and Advice" was read by the clerk of the House. In reply, the Protector observed, that of all the things that had befallen him in his public life, the present offer struck him as being of the greatest magnitude, and most worthy of deliberation ; and he therefore demanded from them some short time, to ask counsel of God and of his own heart, lest his answer should savour more of the flesh, proceed from lust, arise from arguments of self, than from those momentous considerations by which he desired to be governed on such an occasion. The time was granted. Three days after, Cromwell addressed a letter to the speaker, requesting to be attended by a committee of the House, which accordingly waited upon him the next day at Whitehall. To them he explained himself in faint and unwilling terms, saying that he had not been able to find it his duty to God and the Parliament to undertake the proposed charge under the title assigned. His partisans immediately understood the secret of his disclaimer, and moved that the House adhere to the Petition and Advice they had presented. This resolution was carried immediately after the report of Cromwell's declining the honour intended him. With this vote, they presented themselves once more on the following day, and received this formal answer.

"That no man could put a greater value than he did, and always should do, upon the desires and advice of the Parliament, readily acknowledging that it was the advice of the Parliament of these three nations.

"That he looked upon the things advised to, in the general notion of them, as tending to the settlement of the chiefest things that could fall into the hearts of men to desire or endeavour after ; and this, at such a time, when the nation was big with expectation of anything that might add to their better being ; and, therefore, that he must needs put a very high esteem upon, and have a very reverend opinion of, anything that came from them ; and that so he hath had of that Instrument presented to him, as he had already expressed himself ; and that what he expressed had been from an honest heart towards the Parliament and public, which (he said) he spake not to compliment them, being past all consideration of that kind, seeing both himself and the Parliament must be real now, if ever.

"That in this business they laid a burden upon a man conscious of his own infirmities and disabilities, and therefore he hoped that it would be no evil in him to measure their advice and his own infirmities, seeing these would have some influence upon conscience ; conscience in him that receives talents, to know how he might answer the trust of them ; that he hath had, and still hath, such a conscience ; and therefore, that when he thought he had had an opportunity, lately, to make an answer, he made that answer, being a person that had been before, and then, and since, lifting up his heart to God, to know what might be his duty at such a time as this, and upon such an occasion and trial as this was to him.

"That he knew great place, great authority, to be a great burden, and that he knew a man who was convinced, in his conscience, that nothing less would enable him to the discharge of it than assistance from above ; and that it concerned such a person, so convinced and so persuaded, to be right with the Lord in such an undertaking ; and that if he undertook anything not in faith, he might serve them in his own unbelief, and so be the unprofitablest servant that ever a people or a nation had.

"That he desired leave, therefore, to ask counsel, being ready to render a reason of his own apprehension, which, haply, might be overruled by better apprehensions : that as to the point of liberty, he acknowledged they had made provisions for it, both spiritual and civil—the greatest provision that ever was made ; that himself desired liberty to vent his own doubts, and his own fears and scruples, though haply, in such cases as these were, the world had judged that a man's conscience ought to know no scruple ; but that his did, and that he durst not dissemble ; and therefore they who were knowing in the ground of their own actions would best be able to measure advice to others.

"That there were many things in that Instrument besides that one of the name and title of king, which required much information as to his judgment ; and that it was they, and none but they, that could capacitate him to receive satisfaction in them ; that otherwise he must say he was not informed, and so not acted, as he knew they intended he should be, and as every man in the nation should be.

"That he could not tell what other return to make to them than this, that he was ready to give them a reason if they would capacitate him to give it, and themselves to receive it, and to do that in the other things, if they would inform him a little more particularly than the vote passed yesterday, and now read to him; and that he hoped, when he understood the grounds of those things, the whole being not so much for their good and his own as for the good of the nation, there would be no doubt but that they might, even in those particulars, find out such things as might answer their duty, his own, and all their duties, to those whom they both served.

"That this was what, with a great deal of affection, honour, and respect, he offered then unto them."

The information he here asked it was at once resolved should be granted. A committee of the House was named for conference, and to solve the apparent doubts of the Protector. This committee consisted of ninety-nine persons who had voted for the title of king, or were known to be favourable in that essential point to the tenour of the Petition and Advice. The list included Whaley, Goffe, and Berry, from among the major-generals; and the name of Waller, who first, as we have seen, publicly suggested the thing, is very properly to be found there too. The speakers in the conference were Glyn, Whitelocke, Fiennes, Lisle, Lenthall, Colonel Jones, Sir Charles Wolseley, Sir Richard Onslow, and Lord Broghill. The tenour of their arguments, which were inordinately lengthy, and in which Cromwell himself was perhaps the most lengthy and the most able of all, may be thus given.

Cromwell proposed to argue the question on the ground of expedience. If the power were the same under a Protector, where, he asked, could be the use of a king? The title would offend men who, by their former services, had earned the right to have even their prejudices respected. Neither was he sure that the re-establishment of royalty might not be a falling off from that cause in which they had engaged, and from that Providence by which they had been so marvellously supported. It was true that the Scripture sanctioned the dignity of king, but to the testimony of Scripture might be opposed "the visible hand of God," who, in the late contest, "had eradicated kingship." It was gravely replied that Protector was a new, king an ancient title; the first had no definite meaning, the latter was interwoven with all our laws and institutions; the powers of the one were unknown and liable to alteration, those of the other ascertained and limited by the law of custom and the statute law. The abolition of royalty did not originally enter into the contemplation of Parliament—the objection was to the person, not to the office—it was afterward effected by a portion only of the representative body; whereas, its restoration was now sought by a greater authority—the whole Parliament of the three kingdoms! That restoration was indeed necessary, both for his security and theirs, as by law all the acts of a king in possession, but only of a king, were good and valid. Some there were who pretended that king and chief magistrate were synonymous; but no one had yet ventured to substitute one word for the other in the Scriptures, where so many covenants, promises, and precepts are annexed to the title of king. Neither could the "visible hand of God" be alleged in the present case; for the visible hand of God had eradicated the government by a single person as clearly as that by a king. Cromwell promised to give due attention to these arguments; to his confidential friends he owned that his objections were removed; and, at the same time, to enlighten the ignorance of the public, he ordered a report of the conferences to be published.*

Several days had meanwhile passed, and yet Cromwell still deferred his final and public decision. For the first time, perhaps, in his life, he did not dare to seize what lay within his reach, and was the first and foremost object of his desire. The resolute withdrawal of Lambert he had been prepared for, and would not care to have contested, but the continued aversion of Fleetwood and Desborough to his grand design held him fairly at bay. He employed the interval with many of these recusant officers in all his profoundest, his most careless, his most deliberate arts, of laughter, of serious argument, of obscure intimidation, and of most accomplished cajolery. He mixed up with exquisite skill in the various efforts certain casual but powerful arguments deduced from another extensive conspiracy against his life and present power, in which Harrison, Venner, and the Fifth-Monarchy men had been just engaged. Whitelocke has related to us the style of these strange scenes in a curious passage of his memorials. "The Protector," he says, "often advised about this and other great businesses, with Lord Broghill, Pierrepont, Sir Charles Wolseley, Thurloe, and myself, and would be very cheerful with us, and laying aside his greatness, would be exceeding familiar with us, and, by way of diversion, would make verses with us; and every one must try his fancy. He would commonly call for tobacco, pipes, and a candle, and now and then would take tobacco himself. Then he would fall again to his serious and great business, and advise with us in those affairs; and this he did often with us."

A not less characteristic passage from the memoirs of Ludlow will show the nature of his attempts to overthrow, or moderate, or thrust aside, the scruples of Fleetwood and Desborough. "Knowing that Lieut.-general Fleetwood and Colonel Desborough were particularly averse to it, he invited himself to dine personally with the colonel, and carried the lieutenant-general with him, where he began to droll with them about monarchy, and speaking slightly of it, said it was but a feather in a man's cap, and therefore wondered that men would not please the children, and permit them to enjoy their rattle. But he received from them, as Colonel Desborough since told me, such an answer as was not at all suitable to his expectations or desires; for they assured him that there was more in this matter than he perceived; that those who put him upon it were no enemies to Charles Stuart; and that, if he accepted of it, he would infallibly draw ruin on himself and friends.

* Published they accordingly were, in a very thick volume, out of which Dr. Lingard has conveyed the abstract I have availed myself of in the text. The book was called "Monarchy asserted to be the most ancient and legal form of government." At the close of the third day's conference, the Protector declared, both to Whitelocke and others, that his scruples were entirely over.

Having thus sounded their inclinations, that he might conclude in the manner he had begun, he told them they were a couple of scrupulous fellows, and so departed. The next day he sent a message to the House to require their attendance in the Painted Chamber the next morning, designing, as all men believed, *there to declare his acceptance of the crown but in the mean time meeting with Colonel Desborough in the great walk of the Park, and acquainting him with his resolution, the colonel made answer that he then gave up the cause, and Cromwell's family also, for lost; adding, that though he was resolved never to act against him, yet he would not act for him after that time; so, after some other discourse upon the same subject, Desborough went home, and there found Colonel Pride, whom Cromwell had knighted with a fagot stick; and having imparted to him the design of Cromwell to accept the crown, Pride answered, 'He shall not.' 'Why?' said the colonel; 'how wilt thou hinder it?' To which Pride replied, 'Get me a petition drawn, and I will prevent it.' Whereupon they both went to Dr. Owen, and having acquainted him with what had happened, they persuaded him to draw a petition according to their desires. While this was doing, Cromwell, having reflected on his discourse with Colonel Desborough, and being informed that Lambert and divers other officers were dissatisfied with his design, sent a message to put off the meeting in the Painted Chamber, and to desire that the House would send a committee to confer with him about the great business that was then depending, intending thereby to gain time, in which he might be fitting the officers for his design. But the House being risen before his message arrived, and so out of a capacity to appoint any to come to him, the old committee that had been formerly appointed to that end thought fit, by virtue of their general instructions, to wait on him to know his pleasure. Accordingly they came to Whitehall, where they attended about two hours, and then a Barbary horse being brought into the garden for him to see, gave him an occasion to pass through the room where the committee was attending. As he was passing by without taking the least notice of them, one of the messengers put him in mind that they had attended very long, which he slightly excusing, told them that he thought the Houses, being risen before his message came to them, had not empowered any persons to him. It was answered that they came to him upon the general instructions which they had formerly received from the House; upon which he told them he would send to them some other time."

Beneath these careless delays and apparently indifferent movements of Cromwell, there then lay, could the truth have been unfolded, a bitter agony of pride and mortification of heart beyond any that his worst enemy or victim could have desired to see working within him. A mean and spiritless slave to the vilest passions of overwrought ambition, he stood there within sight of the glittering bawble* for which he had perilled so much, and yet dared not affect to see it, but would stand gazing on his Barbary horse, or talk of a toy, or sneer about a rattle, or laugh at a feather in a man's cap, or do anything to cover the fever of that imbecile passion, incapable of its own desire, which raged in his heart. So to the last he trifled; and at the last, the Republican officers, taking courage from his cowardice, ventured one bold step, and dashed down his hopes forever.

On the very morning of the occurrence Ludlow has last described, Desborough rose in his place, and announced that certain officers of the army attended with a petition. The House voted their admission to the bar, and it was presented by Colonel Mason. Cromwell's majority were prepared for a petition in favour of his views. To their surprise and consternation, it set forth, "that the petitioners had hazarded their lives against monarchy, and were still ready to do so; that they observed some men endeavouring to bring the nation under the old servitude, by pressing their general to take upon him the title of king; that they humbly desired the House would continue steady to the good old cause, in defence of which they (the petitioners), for their parts, were ready to lay down their lives."

The good old cause! When Cromwell heard this, he felt that his hope was gone, and made what merit he could to surrender it with some show of dignity. At once sending for Fleetwood, he expressed much surprise at his not preventing the presentation of such a petition, especially as, he said, he must know the crown would never have been accepted by him against the inclinations of the army; and he therefore desired him to hasten to the House, and prevent any proceedings upon the petition. This office Fleetwood readily undertook, and without difficulty convinced the members of the impropriety of considering the prayer of the officers until they had received the Protector's answer. A message then arrived from Cromwell, desiring the members, instead of repairing to the Painted Chamber, to meet him in the Banqueting House. They did so; and there, on the 12th of May, 1657, this comedy—a farce it might be better called, save for its length—closed with a speech of "much embarrassment" from Cromwell, in which he said many things with a reach of hypocrisy that might well embarrass even him.† This is that memorable speech.

* Nor, it was said, did this exist in imagination only! Welwood asserts that a crown was actually made and brought to Whitehall.

† Dr. Johnson, in his Life of Waller, asserts that "Cromwell, after a long conference with a deputation of Parliament that was sent to invite him to the crown, refused it,

* This is confirmed by very many authorities. White Locke states explicitly that the Protector was satisfied in his private judgment that it was expedient for him to assume the name and authority of king; but, he adds, "by solicitation of the Commonwealth's men, and fearing a mutiny and defection of a great body of the army in case he should take that title and office, his mind changed; and many of the officers of the army gave out high threatenings against him if he should do it." The same view of the case is given in a letter, dated at Whitehall, on the 27th of April, and addressed by Sir Francis Russell to his son-in-law, the Lord Henry Cromwell. "I do in this (letter) desire to take leave of your lordship, for my next is likely to be to the Duke of York. Your father begins to come out of the clouds, and it appears to us that he will take the kingly power upon him. That great noise which was made about this business not long since is almost over, and I cannot think there will be the least combustion about it. This day I have had some discourse with your father about this great business. He is very cheerful, and his troubled thoughts seem to be over. I was told the other day by Colonel Pride, that I was for a king, because I hoped that the next would be Henry's turn." Many other letters from Thurloe to Henry express the same thing.

"MR. SPEAKER,—I come hither to answer that which was in your last paper to the committee you sent to me, which was in relation to the desires which were offered to me by the House in what they called their Petition.

"I confess that business hath put the House, the Parliament, to a great deal of trouble, and spent much time.

"I am very sorry for that ! It hath cost me some, and some thoughts ; and because I have been the unhappy occasion of the expense of so much time, I shall spend little of it now.

"I have, the best I can, resolved the whole business in my thoughts ; and I have said so much already in testimony to the whole, that I think I shall not need to repeat anything that I have said. I think it is a government that, in the aims of it, seeks the settling the nation on a good foot, in relation to civil rights and liberties, which are the rights of the nation ; and I hope I shall never be found to be one of them that shall go about to rob the nation of those rights, but serve them what I can to the attaining of them.

"It is also exceeding well provided there, for the safety and security of honest men, in that great, natural, and religious liberty, which is liberty of conscience. These are the great fundamentals ; and I must bear my testimony to them, as I have and shall do still, so long as God lets me live in this world, that the intentions and the things are very honourable and honest, and the product worthy of a Parliament ; I have only had the unhappiness, both in my conferences with your committees, and in the best thoughts I could take to myself, not to be convinced of the necessity of that thing that hath been so often insisted on by you—to wit, the title of king, as in itself so necessary as it seems to be apprehended by you.

"And yet I do, with all honour and respect to the judgment of a Parliament, testify that (ceteris paribus) no private judgment is to lie in the balance with the judgment of Parliament ; but, in things that respect particular persons, every man that is to give an account to God of his actions must in some measure be able to prove his own work, and to have an approbation in his own conscience of that that he is to do, or to forbear ; and while you are granting others their liberties, surely you will not deny me this, it being not only a liberty, but a duty (and such a duty as I cannot, without sinning, forbear), to examine in my own heart, and thoughts, and judgment, in every work which I am to set my hand to, or to appear in or for.

"I must confess, therefore, that though I do acknowledge all the other, yet I must be a little confident in this. That what with the circumstances that accompany human actions, whether they be circumstances of times or persons, or whether circumstances that relate to the whole, or private, or particular circumstances, that compass any person that is to render an account of his own actions, I have truly thought, and do still think, that if I should, at the best, do anything on this account to answer your expectation, at the best I should do it doubtfully ; and, certainly, what is so is not of faith ; and whatsoever is not so, whatsoever but is said to have fainted in his coach when he parted from them." I cannot find any authority for this.

is not of faith, is sin to him that doth it, whether it be with relation to the substance of the action about which the consideration is conversant, or whether to circumstances about it which make all indifferent actions good or evil : I say circumstances ; and truly I mean good or evil to him that doth it.

"I, lying under this consideration, think it my duty, only I could have wished I had done it sooner, for the sake of the House, who hath laid so infinite obligations on me—I wish I had done it sooner, for your sake, and saving time and trouble, and, indeed, for the committee's sake, to whom I must acknowledge publicly I have been unreasonably troublesome—I say I could have wished I had given it sooner ; but truly this is my answer, that (although I think the government doth consist of very excellent parts, in all but in that one thing, the title, as to me) I should not be an honest man if I should not tell you that I cannot accept of the government, nor undertake the trouble and charge of it. I have a little more experimented than everybody what troubles and difficulties do befall men under such trusts and in such undertakings. I say I am persuaded to return this answer to you, that I cannot undertake the government with the title of king ; and that is my answer to this great and weighty business."

All that could now be achieved was to pass the Petition and Advice without the title of king. This was done, and, with a few other unimportant amendments, received the Protector's sanction. The House at the same time adjourned for six months, to allow the Lord Protector opportunity for the formation of the other House, constituted by this new act. A new and solemn inauguration followed. On a platform, raised at the upper end of Westminster Hall, and in front of a magnificent chair of state, stood the Protector, while the speaker, with his assistants, invested him with a purple mantle lined with ermine, presented to him a Bible superbly gilt and embossed, girt a sword by his side, and placed a sceptre of massive gold in his hand. As soon as the oath had been administered, Manton, his chaplain, pronounced a long and fervent prayer for a blessing on the Protector, the Parliament, and the people. Rising from prayer, Cromwell seated himself on the right ; at some distance sat the French, on the left the Dutch ambassador ; on one side stood the Earl of Warwick, with the sword of the Commonwealth ; on the other, the lord-mayor, with that of the city ; and behind arranged themselves the members of the Protector's family, the lords of the council, and Lisle, Whitelocke, and Montague, each of the three bearing a drawn sword. At a signal given, the trumpets sounded, the heralds proclaimed the style of the new sovereign, and the spectators shouted, "Long live his highness ! God save the Lord Protector !" He rose immediately, bowed to the ambassadors, and walked in state through the Hall to his carriage.*

* Dr. Lingard, from Whitelocke's Memorials. But a detailed account, with many points of vivacity and interest, will be seen in Appendix K. I have also given, from the same official hand (Appendix L.), the account (with some interpolations inserted after the Restoration) of the Lord Protector's funeral.

From this ceremony, apparently so grand and so imposing, may be dated Cromwell's downfall. He had failed, and the sole charm which seemed to have sustained him hitherto perished in those words. He had declared, in a manner not to be mistaken, that he thought monarchy the best form of government, and yet he was not suffered to become that monarch. He held the chair of another. Many of his oldest friends, and fellow-comrades too, had withdrawn from his side, and he had to look for the familiar faces of Naseby, Dunbar, Marston Moor, and Worcester, in the ranks of men who were banded against his life, or—more bitter contemplation—had entered an immortal judgment with posterity against his fame. His mother, whom he deeply venerated, had perished some short time before, unable to live in her continual terror that his life would be taken by assassins.* His most beloved daughter Claypole is said to have already estranged herself from his side, where he would have always had her present, on account of the attachment she bore to truth, not less than to many of his political enemies. His son Richard, to whom he desired to leave the power for which he had sacrificed so many blessings, was incapable, he feared too well, to hold it for a day. Nor did it seem that he could hope to leave it, for such a feeble hand, better organized than it already was, for his own health was known to be declining. The prospect before this great and most mistaken man, after his second most gorgeous inauguration, was a dreary one indeed. Had the old story of his enemies been true, it could scarcely have left to him fewer hopes of redemption†

* Ludlow tells us that "his mother, who, by reason of her great age, was not so easily flattered with temptations, very much mistrusted the issue of affairs, and would be often afraid, when she heard the noise of a musket, that her son was shot, being exceedingly dissatisfied unless she might see him once a day at least; but she, shortly after dying, left him the possession of what she held in jointure, which was reported not to exceed sixty pounds by year, though he out of the public purse expended much more at her interment in the abbey at Westminster, and, among other needless ceremonies, caused many hundred torches to be carried with the bier, though she was buried by daylight." Instead of this, she had prayed of her son a humble village burial-place.

† Echard builds up this most ridiculous story from the romantic fictions of Clement Walker and others, which is yet worth quoting, to show the feeling which was encouraged respecting Cromwell until within the last century. "We have a strange story in the last part of the History of Independency, which the author says he received from a person of quality, viz., 'It was believ'd, and that not without some good cause, that Cromwell, the same morning that he defeated the king's army at Worcester, had conference personally with the devil, with whom he made a contract, that to have his will then, and in all things else for seven years, from that day, he should, at the expiration of the said years, have him at his command, to do at his pleasure, both with his soul and body.' This is also related in other printed books; but we have receiv'd a more full account, never yet published, which is here inserted as a thing more wonderful than probable, and therefore more for the diversion than satisfaction of the reader. It is a relation or narrative of a valiant officer call'd Lindsey, an intimate friend of Cromwell's, the first captain of his regiment, and therefore commonly call'd Colonel Lindsey, which is to this effect: On the 3d of September, in the morning, Cromwell took this officer to a wood-side, not far from the army, and bid him alight and follow him into that wood, and to take particular notice of what he saw and heard. After they had both alighted and secur'd their horses, and walked some small way into the wood, Lindsey began to turn pale, and to be seiz'd with horror from some unknown cause, upon which Cromwell ask'd him how he did, or how he felt himself. He answer'd, that he was in such a trembling and consternation, that he never felt the like in all the conflicts

Yet he made a rally in his foreign administration, where his genius, which had there a theatre for its exercise unencumbered with his follies or his crimes, still shone supreme.* The and battels he had been engag'd in; but whether it proceed'd from the gloominess of the place, or the temperament of his body, he knew not. 'How now?' said Cromwell; 'what! troubl'd with vapours? Come forwards, man!' They had not gone above twenty yards, before Lindsey on a sudden stood still, and cry'd out, by all that's good, he was seiz'd with such unaccountable terror and astonishment, that it was impossible for him to stir one step further. Upon which Cromwell call'd him faint-hearted fool, and bid him stand there and observe, or be witness; and then advancing to some distance from him, he met with a grave elderly man, with a roll of parchment in his hand, who deliver'd it to Cromwell, who eagerly perus'd it. Lindsey, a little recover'd from his fear, heard several loud words between them; particularly Cromwell said, 'This is but for seven years; I was to have had it for one-and-twenty, and it must and shall be so.' The other told him positively it could not be for above seven; upon which Cromwell cry'd with great fierceness it should, however, be for fourteen years. But the other peremptorily declar'd 'it could not possibly be for any longer time; and if he would not take it so, there were others who would accept of it.' Upon which Cromwell at last took the parchment, and returning to Lindsey with great joy in his countenance, he cry'd, 'Now, Lindsey, the battel is our own! I long to be engag'd.' Returning out of the wood, they rode to the army, Cromwell with a resolution to engage as soon as possible, and the other with a design of leaving the army as soon. After the first charge, Lindsey deserted his post, and rode away, with all possible speed, day and night, till he came into the county of Norfolk, to the house of an intimate friend, one Mr. Thorowgood, minister of the parish of Grimstone. Cromwell, as soon as he miss'd him, sent all ways after him, with a promise of a great reward to any that should bring him alive or dead.† Thus far the narrative of Lindsey himself; but something further is to be remember'd, to complete and confirm the story. When Mr. Thorowgood saw his friend Lindsey come into his yard, his horse and himself just tired, in a sort of maze, said, 'How now, colonel! we hear there is like to be a battel shortly. What! fled from your colours?' 'A battel!' said the other; 'yes, there has been a battel, and I am sure the king is beaten; but if ever I strike a stroak for Cromwell, may I perish eternally; for I am sure he has made a league with the devil, and the devil will have him in due time.' Then desiring his protection from Cromwell's inquisitors, he went in, and related the whole story, and all the circumstances, concluding with these remarkable words: 'That Cromwell would certainly dye that day seven years that the battel was fought.' The strangeness of the relation caus'd Mr. Thorowgood to order his son John, then about twelve years of age, to write it in full length in his common-place book, and to take it from Lindsey's own mouth. This common-place book, and likewise the same story, written in other books, I am assur'd is still preserv'd in the family of the Thorowgoods, but how far Lindsey is to be believ'd, and how far the story is to be accounted incredible, is left to the reader's faith and judgment, and not to any determination of our own.—Echard's History of England, p. 691. I will subjoin to this a piece of admirable wit and satire, for which it is even worth while to preserve such a story. Dr. Nettleton, an accomplished physician of the last century, was in company one day with several gentlemen, one of whom was laying great stress on the popular account I have just quoted, even then rife with well-educated persons, of Cromwell's selling himself to the devil before the battle of Worcester, affirming that the bargain was intended to be for twenty-one years, but that the devil had put a trick upon Oliver by changing the 21 into 12; and then, turning hastily to the doctor, the gentleman asked him, "What could be the devil's motive for so doing?" The doctor answered, "That he could not tell what was his motive, unless he was in a hurry about the Restoration."

* Mr. Wallace gives, in his most able history of England, the following anecdote of this date, in illustration of the ascendancy of Cromwell over Mazarin: "An English merchant vessel was unjustly confiscated on the coast of France, and the owner, an honest Quaker, applied to Cromwell for redress. The Protector asking him whether he would make a journey to Paris with a letter, was answered in the affirmative, and despatched the Quaker with a letter to Cardinal Mazarin, demanding redress within three days, at the expiration of which he peremptorily ordered the Quaker to return. He obeyed, and presented himself to Cromwell. 'Well, friend, hast thou thy money?' said the Protector. The Quaker said, 'No.' Cromwell desired him to take no farther trouble, as he should take the matter into his own hands. He accordingly seized and sold the first two French details belong to general history ; but I may be allowed to glance so far at them as to state that Mardyke was now delivered to him under a new and larger treaty with Mazarin, as a security for Dunkirk, and that, on the subsequent meeting of the troops of the two nations at the siege, Louis XIV. made a journey expressly to see those of Cromwell. It is farther recorded that Lockhart paid him this compliment at the review—that Cromwell had enjoined both officers and soldiers to display the same zeal in the service of the French king as in his own ; and that Louis replied, he was transported to receive so noble a testimony of the affection of a prince, whom he had always considered as the greatest and happiest in Europe. Anticipating the events of a few months later, I may add that, after the surrender of Dunkirk to Lockhart and an English garrison, Louis XIV. and the cardinal having taken up their quarters at Calais, Cromwell seized the occasion to send Lord Faulconberg, his son-in-law, with a splendid equipage and a numerous retinue, to compliment the king on his near approach to the shores of Britain. Here Faulconberg was entertained with every possible distinction. Louis not only received him uncovered at his public audiences, but also at a private visit, which he requested from the Protector's son-in-law, when they talked for two hours in the garden. The cardinal was equally ceremonious. He came from his apartment to meet the ambassador, and, after an hour's discourse, conducted him again to his carriage, a condescension he was accustomed to dispense with, not only to all others, but to the king himself. After a stay of five days, Faulconberg left, charged with all honour and affection for the great Protector from Mazarin and Louis.

I leave this redeeming subject of foreign policy with two rare and memorable missives. The first is a remonstrance to the Grand Seigneur, respecting the unjust surprisal of an English ship.

“ Oliver, by the grace of God Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereto belonging, to the high and mighty emperor, Sultan Mahomet Han, chief lord and commander of the Mussulman kingdome, sole and supreme monarch of the Eastern empire, greeting. . . . Most high and mighty prince. . . . We doubt not but you have found by your owne experience, as well as by information of such as have bin of counsell with your royall predecesors, that the amity and traffique soe long continued betweene both nations hath bin of great advantage and benefit in many respects ; to the disturbance whereof we should be very unwilling that any occasion should be offered on our part, who desire nothing more than a continuance and increase of that friendship which hath bin established. But it falleth out that the same hath bin too frequently interrupted by such as exercise pyracie and spoile at sea, who, though they are enemies to all entercoursse and civill society, and dishonorable to princes and states, yet find places of retreat and succor in some part of your dominions. An instance whereof (to omit many others) appeareth in the late surprizall of an English ship called the Resolution, which being laden with cloth, tyne, lead, and money (to the value of two hundred thousand dollars), and bound for your owne port of Scanderone, was yet in her passage (nere Candy) assaulted by seven ships of Tripoly (part of your Majesty's flectes, and then actually in your service), and by them carried to Rhodes, another of your majesty's ports, where we are informed the capitaine bassa hath bin soe farr from disowning the action, that he hath, in scorn and contempt of the capitulation, secured the ship and goods, as also the master, mariners, and passengers, who had not a rag left to cover them ; which barbarous act, soe repugnant to the imperiall capitulations (which ought to be held inviolate), soe injurious to trade, and soe dishonorable to your majesty, we cannot pass over without a due consideration and representation to you, as a manifest breach of peace ; and therefore we doe presume soe much of your wisdome and justice, that you will not only command a to-tall and compleate restitution to be made of the ship, goods, and money, and releasement of the men, but also for your owne honor take course for suppressing those pyrates, and prohibiting their retreat into places, and receiving favour and succor from persons under your obedience, as also for punishing such as countenance or abett them, and for a generall redress of all former injuries too commonly practiced on our people, both to our dishonor and their irreparable loss. In all which we have given order to our ambassador residing at your high port to informe you more particularly, desiring to understand your resolution herein, that upon knowledge thereof we may take such course as shall be agreeable to justice and to the good of our people, whom we are bound to protect in their lawfull courses of trade. And soe we wish you health and true felicity. Given at our pallace at Westminster, this 11th day of the month of August, 1657.”

The second is addressed, with the date of the same day, to the high and excellent lord, the Vizier Azem. “ Oliver, by the grace of God Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereto belonging, to the high and excellent lord, the Vizier Azem. . . . High and excellent lord. . . . As we have now done to the Grand Seigneur your lord and master, soe doe we also to you, complaine of an act of violence and injustice exercised towards divers merchants of this Commonwealth, interested in an English ship called the Resolution, which being laden with cloth, tyne, and money, and bound for the Grand Seigneur's owne port of Scanderone, in a peaceable course of trading, was (notwithstanding) in her way (nere Candy) assaulted by seven Tripoly men of warr actually ingaged in the Grand Seigneur's service, and by them carried to Rhodes, where the capitaine bassa hath secured the ship and her lading, and imprisoned the master, mariners, and passenships within his reach, indemnified the Quaker out of the proceeds, and paid over the surplus to the French ambassador, who submitted to this very summary proceeding.” I cannot transcribe this passage from the history by Mr. Wallace, without an expression of deep and heartfelt regret at the melancholy event which has removed so suddenly from among us that excellent person, in whom the public have lost a writer of very great and various accomplishments, and his more intimate friends an adviser and companion whose place they will vainly seek to supply.

gers, being in number forty-five persons; which act, soe contrary to the emperiall capitulations, and to the very essence of commerce, being an absolute breach of the peace between both nations, we cannot but judge will be held very dishonorable to the Grand Seigneur, and accordingly to be resented by him, even to the severe punishment of the captain bassa, who soe readily owned the action, and of those others, enemies of humane society, who are guilty of an attempt soe foule and disgracefull to a monarch pretending justice. And we shall not doubt but, as an intimation of his justice, he will command compleate restitution of ship and goods, and releasement of the persons, otherwise you must shortly expect a ruine and dissolution of all trade, besides the confusion and danger that may grow to your owne state; and therefore we presume you will (though for noe other respect than your owne interest and safety) be instrumentall to procure reparation in this particular, and an utter extirpation of those sea rovers, that soe peace and the effects thereof, which have bin found soe advantageous to both nations, may be preserved, to the mutual good of each. In all which we desire you to give care and credit to our ambassador there, and to procure such speedy answer and returne from his emperiall majesty as may stand with equity and with the continuance of that amity which hath bin settled between both nations, and which we shall not willingly give the least occasion to disturbe without some great provocation. Given at our pallace at Westminster, this 11th day of the month of August, in the year 1657."

Lord Faulconberg, I have intimated, was now the son-in-law of Cromwell. He had married the Lady Mary Cromwell some short period after the prorogation of the Parliament. Some few days earlier, the Protector's youngest daughter, Lady Frances,* had been also mar-

* This is the lady of whom is told a singularly well-attested story of a proposal of marriage from Charles the Second. It is related by Morrice, chaplain to Lord Broghill, in his life of that nobleman, and by Burnet (History of his Own Times), who states that he had it from Broghill's lips. It runs thus, being said to belong to the year 1653, the period in which Cromwell had all power in his own hands, and before he had openly assumed the office of chief magistrate. Lord Broghill was the author of the proposition. Having, as we are told, opportunities, by a secret correspondence with some about the king, he sounded Charles's inclinations, as to how he would feel respecting a proposition to restore him to his hereditary dominions by means of such a marriage. The royal exile received the proposition with avidity. Its author next stated it to the mother and daughter. Neither of them showed any aversion to the suggestion. Having succeeded thus far, the next business was to break the proposal to Cromwell himself. This Broghill took an opportunity of doing in the following manner: Being one day returned from the city, and waiting upon Cromwell in his closet, one of the first questions with which he was accosted was, whether there was any news? "In truth there is," said Broghill, "and very strange news." "What is it?" "It is in everybody's mouth," answered the courtier; "but I dare not mention it to your excellency, lest you should be offended." Cromwell told him to speak out. To which Broghill rejoined, "All the news in the city is, that you are going to marry your daughter Frances to the Pretender." The general was struck with the suggestion, and paced up and down the room two or three times in silence. "And what do people say to the tale?" "I assure you it is received with decided approbation by the majority. Consider, sir, that by it you would extricate yourself from your present precarious situation, would become father-in-law to a prince who would owe everything to your interference, might retain the command of the army, and would, in all probability, become progenitor to a race of kings." "No," said Cromwell, after a pause, "it is impossible: he would never forgive me the death of his father."

ried, and her bridegroom was another member of the old aristocracy, Mr. Rich, grandson of the Earl of Warwick.* In thus effecting these alliances, Cromwell betrayed the melancholy weakness with which his life was doomed to close. Deprived of the title of king, he had fixed his affections on the creation of the other House, granted him by the Petition and Advice. It occupied all his thoughts, and was clung to, till his life had passed, with, for such a man, a kind of imbecile fondness. These noble alliances, it is admitted by his friends and courtiers, were designed to aid him in the scheme.

The marriage of Lady Frances with Mr. Rich would seem to have been a love-match too. I ascertain this from a curious letter written by her sister Mary to Henry Cromwell, and which proves also that somewhat similar difficulties to those which so long obstructed Richard's marriage with Miss Majort had occurred here also. Not the less does it prove the Lord Protector's fatherly affection stronger than any politic consideration, and illustrate generally the close ties of love which, in the midst of all their grandeur, still held this family together.

* For the extraordinary festivities at this marriage, see ante, p. 452; see also Appendix H., COURT CIRCULAR.

† Mr. Rich died a few months after the marriage; and I may quote a letter from his venerated grandfather to Cromwell, in fairness and justice to the every-way honourable testimony it bears to the latter. "My pen and my heart were ever your lordship's servants; now they are become your debtors. This paper cannot enough confess my obligations, and much less discharge it, for your reasonable and sympathizing letters, which (because the value they derive from so worthy a hand) express such faithful affections, and administer such Christian advice, as renders them beyond measure welcome and dear to me; and although my heaviness and distraction of thoughts persuade me rather to peruse those excellent lines than to answer them, and to take relief from them rather than make a return to them, yet I must not be so indulgent to mine own sorrows as to lose this opportunity of being thankful to your lordship for so great a favour. My lord, I dare not be insensible of that hand which hath laid a very sharp and awaking affliction upon me; but we may not be so presumptuous as to make choice of our own rod, or so much as in thought to detract from or diminish the justice, and wisdom, and goodness of God, in those hard events which must all stand inviolable, when millions of such worms as I am are gone to dust. I must needs say, I have lost a dear and comfortable relation, one in whom I had much determined my affections and lodged my hopes, are now rebuked and withered by a hasty and early death; but my property in him was inferior to his who hath taken him, and I must rest my heart in his proceedings, making it my care and suit that those evils which cannot be averted may be sanctified. In order to which I desire, from this one sad instance, to argue the whole world of vanity and variableness. Alas! what a staff of reed are these things, which have no stay in themselves, and therefore can give none to us. They witness their own impotency, and themselves admonish us to pitch our rest above this sphere of changeable mortality, and to cast anchor in heaven, while we can find no hold at all on earth. Assuredly he that will have and hold a right tranquillity must find it in a sweet fruition of God, which whosoever wants may be secure, but cannot be quiet. My lord, all this is but a broken echo of your pious counsel, which gives such ease to my oppressed mind, that I can scarce forbid my pen being tedious. Only it remembers your lordship's many weighty and noble employments, which, together with your prudent, heroic, and honourable managery of them, I do here congratulate, as well as my grief will give me leave. Others' goodness is their own; yours is a whole country's—yea, three kingdoms; for which you justly possess interest and renown with wise and good men; virtue is a thousand escutcheons. Go on, my lord, go on happily, to love religion, to exemplify it. May your lordship long continue an instrument of use, a pattern of virtue, and a precedent of glory! This is the inward and affectionate prayer of, my lord, your lordship's most affectionate servant, WARWICK."

‡ See ante, p. 472, et seq.

"Deare Brother,—Your kind letters do so much engag my hart towards you, that I can never tell how to expres in writing the true affection and value I have of you, who, truly, I think, non that knows you but you may justly claim it from. I must confes myself in a great fault in the omiteing of writing to you and your deare wif so long a time; but I suppos you canot be ignorant of the reason, which truly has ben the only caus, which is this bisnes of my sester Franes and mr. Rich. Truly I can truly say it, for thes three months, I think our famly, and myself in peticular, have ben in the gratest confusion and trouble as ever poor famly can be in; the Lord tell us his . . . in it, and setel us, and mak us what he would hav us to be. I suppos you hard of the breaking of the bisnes, and according to your deser in your last letter, as well as I can, I will give you a full account of it, which is thes. After a quarter of a year's admitons, my father and my lord Warwick begon to tret about the estate; and it sems my lord did ofer that that my father expected. I ned not nam peticulars, for I suppos you may hav had it from beter hands; but, if I may say the truth, I think it was not so much estat as som private reons that my father discovered to non but my sester Franes and his own famly, which was a dislik to the young person, which he had from som reports of his being a visious man, given to play, and such lik things, which ofis was done by some that had a mind to brak of the match. My sester hearing these things, was resolv'd to know the truth of it; and truly, dued find all the reports to be fals that wer raisd of him; and to tell you the truth, they ver so much engag in affection before this, that she could not think of breaking of it of; so that my sester engagd me and all the frinds she had, who truly wer very few, to spek in her behalf to my father, which we deid, but could not be hard to any purpos; only this, my father promised, that if he wer satisfied as to the report, the estat should not brak it of, which she was satisfied with. But after this ther was a second tret, and my lord Warwick deserd my father to nam what it was he demanded more, and to his utmost he would satisfy him; so my father, upon this, mad new propositions, which my lord Warwick has answered as much as he can; but it seems there is fiv hundred pounds a year in my lord Riche's hands which he has power to sell, and ther are some people that persuad his highnes that it would be desonerable for him to conclud of it without thes fiv hundred pounds a year be settled upon mr. Rich after his father's deth, and my lord Rich having no esteem at all of his son, becos he is not so bad as himself, will not agre to it; and thes people, upon this, persuad my father it would be a desoner to him to yald upon thes terms—it would shew that he was mad a fool on by my lord Riche; which the truth is, how it should be, I cant understand, nor very few els; and truly, I must tell you privatelie, that they ar so far engagd as the match cannot be brok of. She acquainted non of her frends with her resolution when she did it. Deare brother, this is as far as I can tell the stat of the bisnes. The Lord dereet them what to do; and all I think ought to beg of God to pardon her in her dowing of this thing, which I must say truly she was put upon by the . . . of things. Deare, let me beg my excuses to my sester for not writing my best respects to her. Pardon this trouble, and belev me, that I shall ever striv to approv myself, deare brother, your affectionate sester and servant,

"MARY CROMWELL."

This Lady Mary would seem to have been the family counsellor and referee in all their casual misunderstandings with each other. It is somewhat interesting to find her, at a little earlier date, remonstrating with this same great and able brother Henry in a tone which would appear to countenance Mrs. Hutchinson's worst scandal against him. "DEARE BROTHER,—I cannot be any longer without begging an excus for my so long silens. You canot but hear of my sester's ilnes, which inded has ben the only caus of it. You might justly tak it ill otherwis, and think ther wer want of that affection I owe unto you. Inded, deare brother, it was a grat deal of trouble to me to think I should giv you any ocaation to think amis of me; for I can truly say it, you are very deare to me, and it is a grat trouble to me to think of the destans we ar from on another, and would be mor if I ded not think you ar doing the Lord's sarvis; and truly that ought to satisfy us, for whil we ar hear, we canot expect but that we must be seprated. Deare Brother, the Lord direct you in his ways, and kep your hart clos unto himself; and I am sur therin you will hav tru comfort, and that that will last when all this world shall pass away. I canot but giv you some item of won that is with you, which is so much feared by your frinds that lov you, is som deshonor to you and my deare sester, if you hav not a grat ear; for it is reported hear that she ruls much in your family; and truly it is feared she is a descoutenanser of the godly people. Therfor, deare brother, tak it not ill that I giv you an item of her; for truly, if I did not dearly lov you both and your oner, I would not giv you notis of her. Therfor I hope you will not tak it ill that I hav delt thus plainly with you. I supos you know who it is I mean; therfor I deser to be excus'd for not naming of her. I deser not to be sen in it, and therfor deser you that you would not tak the lest notis of my writing to you about it, becos I was deser'd not to spek of it; nor should I, but that I know you will not tak it amis from your poor sester that loves you. Deare Brother, I tak my leev to rest. Your Sister and Servant, MARY CROMWELL. . . . Her Highnes deseres to hav her love to you and my Sester, and my Sester Franke her respects to you both."

Our attention is now called to the last great public action of the life of the Lord Protector Cromwell. On the 28th of January, 1658, the prorogued Parliament reassembled, with its re-enforcement (by stipulation of the Petition and Advice) of upward of a hundred of the excluded Republicans, and its addition of the other House. This other House consisted of sixty-one members, and comprised his two sons, Richard and Henry, eight peers of royal creation, several members of his council, some gentlemen of fortune and family, with a due proportion of lawyers and officers, and a very scanty sprinkling of persons known to be disaffected to his government. Of the ancient peers, two only attended, the Lords Eure and Faulconberg; Lords Warwick, Manchester, Mulgrave, and Wharton did not appear. Even old Warwick, who was, as we have seen, Cromwell's very good friend, declared that "he could not sit in the same assembly with Colonel Hewson, who had been a shoemaker, and Colonel Pride, who had been a drayman; but had they driven no worse trade," adds Ludlow, "I know not why any good man should refuse to act with them." They had, however, driven a worse trade; and they only now assembled as members of a new nobility, to be covered, in conjunction with their creator, with contempt and scorn. Whitelocke, I should add, was also one of these lords, with Lisle, Glyn, Widdrington, Desborough, Jones, Fleetwood, Claypole, and others of that class.* Old Francis Rouse had been rewarded with one of the sinecure titles for his services in the days of Barbone, and the ex-Lord-mayor Pack had become as real a Lord Pack as Cromwell could make him. Our old friend Lenthall, too, received a writ of summons, which is said to have delighted him so much that the coach in which he rode through the Strand next day could hardly contain him. Men might well grieve when they saw the illustrious name of Hampden in such a list, and think it pity that he should not have "inherited his father's noble principles, though he doth his lands." The sturdy name of Hazle-rig was also there, but only that his formidable opposition in the lower House might be cut off. He contemptuously refused to obey the writ, and presented himself, with his old friend Scot, among the commoners, who had taken their station in what was now called the House of Lords, to witness and to ridicule that new and miserable imitation of the ancient forms of monarchy!

Called by the "usher of the black rod," they had found his highness the Lord Protector seated under a canopy of state. His speech began with the ancient address: "My lords, and gentlemen of the House of Commons." It was short, a circumstance he prayed them to excuse in consequence of the state of his health, but full of piety; and after an exposition of the eighty-fifth Psalm, he referred his two Houses for other particulars to Fiennes, his lord-keeper, who, in a long and tedious harangue, praised and defended the new institutions under which they had met.

A few words will describe the brief career of this wretched absurdity. Scot and Hazle-rig, backed by a formidable majority, whom they influenced by their eloquence and talents, flatly refused to acknowledge the new House as a House of Lords. They asked who had made its members lords, and who had the privilege of restoring the authority of the ancient peerage. The reply that the Protector had called them lords, and that it was the object of the Petition and Advice to re-establish the second estate, was no reply for Scot or Hazle-rig. Whenever the Lords sent a message to the Commons, the latter refused to give an answer until they had determined by what name they were to address the others, and to what extent they were to admit their right to interfere with the deliberations of a body to whom they, in fact, owed their existence. Were they to have the privileges of the ancient peerage? Were they to be empowered to negative the acts of that House to which they owed their existence? Was it to be borne that the children should assume the superiority over their parents? that the nominees of the Protector should control the representatives of the people, the depositaries of the supreme power of the nation? The idea was scouted with a hiss whenever it was broached anew.

Cromwell, in an unprecedented state of anger and excitement, went to the House to remonstrate. The character of his address may be judged from one of its opening passages. "I look on this to be the great duty of my place, at being set on a watch-tower, to see what may be for the good of these nations, and what may be for the preventing of evil, that so, by the advice of so great and wise a Council as this is (that hath in it the life and spirit of these nations), that Good may be attained, and that evil (whatever it is) may be obviated. We shall hardly set our shoulders to this work, unless it shall please God to work some conviction upon our hearts that there is need of our most serious and best Counsels at such a time as this is. . . . I have not prepared any such matter and rule of speech to deliver myself unto you as perhaps might have been more fit for me to have done, and more serviceable for you to understand me in, but shall only speak plainly and honestly to you, out of such Conceptions as it hath pleased God to set upon me. . . . We have not been now four years and upward in this Government, to be totally ignorant of the things that may be of the greatest concernment to us. Your dangers (for that is the head of my speech), they are either with respect had to affairs abroad and their difficulties, or to affairs at home and their difficulties. . . . You come, as I may say so now, in the end of as great difficulties and straits as, I think, ever nation was engaged in. . . . I had in my thoughts to have made this the method of my speech: to wit, to have let you see the things that hazard your being and your well-being; but when I came seriously to consider better of it, I thought (as your affairs stand) that all things would resolve themselves into very being. You are not a nation, you will not be a nation, if God strengthen you not to meet with these evils that are upon us."

He then proceeded to lecture them on the benefit—the necessity of unanimity. Let them look abroad. The Papists threatened to swallow up all the Protestants of Europe. England was the only stay, the last hope of religion. Let them look at home. The Cavaliers and the Levellers were combined to overthrow the Constitution; Charles Stuart was preparing an invasion, and the Dutch had ungratefully sold him certain vessels for that purpose. Dissension would inevitably draw down ruin on themselves, their liberties, and their religion. For himself, he called God, angels, and men to witness that he sought not the office he held. It was forced upon him; but he had sworn to execute its duties, and he would perform what he had sworn, by preserving to every class of men their just rights, whether civil or religious.

* See Appendix I. for some curious extracts from the many descriptions that were published of them at the time, for the pleasure of the indignant people who despised them.

These gross falsehoods had now also spent out their day. No one among the Republicans cared for them one jot. Accordingly, when he had left the chamber, over and over again were messages renewed "from the Lords to the Commons," and as often received by the latter with the contemptuous intimation that "that House would return an answer by messengers of their own." Instead of returning the promised answers, however, they spent their whole time in debating what title and what rights ought to belong to the "other House," and whether, indeed, they deserved to have rights or title at all.

Cromwell seems to have been goaded by the nature of this opposition—its contempt, its carelessness, its quiet and collected defiance—into a state approaching to insanity.* His health, as he himself told the House some days before, had evidently broken much. Nothing now remained to his distempered thoughts but a dissolution; and, having taken that resolve, he rushed, with the headlong phrensy of a man who dares not pause to think what he must do, to put it into instant execution. He would not wait for his carriage. He suddenly snatched up his hat, waved to half a dozen of his guards to follow him, flung himself into a hackney-coach he saw standing near Whitehall, and drove to the door of his "House of Lords." His appearance when he entered bespoke the concern of his son-in-law Fleetwood, who hastily ran up to him. Cromwell told him abruptly what he had come to do. Fleetwood tried to dissuade him; but "he clapped," continues Ludlow, from whom I take this account, "his hand on his breast, and swore by the living God he would do it." He sent the usher of the black rod to summon the Commons to attend him in the House of Lords. They were still engaged in discussing the title of the "other House" when the usher appeared, and they adjourned the question to their return, unconscious of what awaited them.

Oliver Cromwell then delivered, to the last assemblage of men he was doomed to meet within those walls, his last speech. It was brief and passionate, but with a touch of occasional humility, which may here, at least, in the circumstances of miserable failure that surrounded him, be taken as most sincere. They are proportionately touching.

"I had very comfortable expectations that God would make the meeting of this Parliament a blessing; and the Lord be my witness, I desired the carrying on the affairs of the nation to these ends: the blessing which I mean, and which we ever climbed at, was mercy, truth, righteousness, and peace, which I desire may be improved. . . .

"That which brought me into the capacity I now stand in was the Petition and Advice given me by you, who, in reference to the ancient Constitution, did draw me to accept of the place of Protector. There is not a man living can say I sought it—no, not a man, nor woman treading upon English ground; but, contem- plating the sad condition of these nations, relieved from an intestine war unto a six or seven years' peace, I did think the nation happy therein. But to be petitioned thereunto, and advised by you to undertake such a government—a burden too heavy for any creature—and this to be done by the House that then had the legislative capacity, I did look that the same men that made the frame should make it good unto me. I can say, in the presence of God, in comparison of whom we are but like poor creeping ants upon the earth, I would have been glad to have lived under my wood side, to have kept a flock of sheep, rather than undertook such a government as this is! but, undertaking it by the advice and petition of you, I did look that you that had offered it unto me should make it good.

"I did tell you at a conference concerning it, that I would not undertake it unless there might be some other persons that might interpose between me and the House of Commons, who then had the power, to prevent tumultuary and popular spirits; and it was granted I should name another House. I named it of men that shall meet you wheresoever you go, and shake hands with you, and tell you it is not titles, nor lords, nor party that they value, but a Christian and an English interest; men of your own rank and quality, who will not only be a balance unto you, but to themselves, while you love England and religion.

"Having proceeded upon these terms, and finding such a spirit as is too much predominant, everything being too high or too low when virtue, honesty, piety, and justice are omitted, I thought I had been doing that which was my duty, and thought it would have satisfied you; but if everything must be too high or too low, you are not to be satisfied.

"Again, I would not have accepted of the government unless I knew there would be a just accord between the governor and the governed; unless they would take an oath to make good what the Parliament's Petition and Advice advised me unto. Upon that I took an oath, and they took another oath upon their part answerable to mine; and did not every one know upon what condition they swore? God knows, I took it upon the conditions expressed in the Government; and I did think we had been upon a foundation and upon a bottom, and thereupon I thought myself bound to take it, and to be advised by the two Houses of Parliament; and we standing unsettled till we were arrived at that, the consequences would necessarily have been confusion if that had not been settled. Yet there are not constituted hereditary lords nor hereditary kings, the power consisting in the two Houses and myself. I do not say that was the meaning of your oath to you; that were to go against my own principles to enter upon another man's conscience. God will judge between me and you: if there had been in you any intention of settlement, you would have settled upon this basis, and have offered your judgment and opinion.

"God is my witness, I speak it; it is evident to all the world and people living, that a new business hath been seeking in the army against this actual settlement made by your consent. I do not speak to these gentlemen, or lords [pointing to his right hand], or whatsoever you will call them—I speak not this to them, but to you. You advised me to run into this place, to be in a capacity by your advice; yet, instead of owning a thing taken for granted, some must have I know what; and you have not only disjoined yourselves, but the whole nation, which is in likelihood of running into more confusion in these fifteen or sixteen days that you have sat, than it hath been from the rising of the last session to this day, through the intention of devising a Commonwealth again, that some of the people might be the men that might rule all; and they are endeavouring to engage the army to carry that thing. And hath that man been true to this nation, whosoever he be, especially that hath taken an oath, thus to prevaricate? These designs have been among the army, to break and divide us. I speak this in the presence of some of the army, that these things have not been according to God nor according to truth, pretend what you will. These things tend to nothing else but the playing the King of Scots' game, if I may so call him; and I think myself bound, before God, to do what I can to prevent that.

* "Something happening that morning that put the Protector into a rage and passion near unto madness, as those at Whitehall can witness."—Second Narrative, p. 8.

"That which I told you in the Banqueting House was true, that there were preparations of force to invade us; God is my witness, it hath been confirmed to me since within a day, that the King of Scots hath an army at the water side ready to be shipped for England. I have it from those who have been eye-witnesses of it; and while it is doing, there are endeavours from some, who are not far from this place, to stir up the people of this town into a tumulting—what if I said into a rebellion? And I hope I shall make it appear to be no better, if God assist me. It hath been not only your endeavour to pervert the army while you have been sitting, and to draw them to state the question about a commonwealth, but some of you have been listing of persons, by commission of Charles Stuart, to join with any insurrection that may be made: and what is like to come upon this, the enemy being ready to invade us, but even present blood and confusion? And if this be so, I do assign to this cause your not assenting to what you did invite me to by the Petition and Advice, as that which might be the settlement of the nation; and if this be the end of your sitting, and this be your carriage, I think it high time that an end be put unto your sitting, and I do dissolve this Parliament; and let God judge between me and you."

At this last solemn appeal, Scot called out aloud, AMEN! and was echoed, with a sad significance, by other members that surrounded him. Can there be a doubt for whom the judgment has passed?

A flock of sheep by a wood side would indeed have been a preferable fortune to the thoughts with which Cromwell must that day have returned to Whitehall. Every political expedient he had tried in his domestic government of England had failed. His treasury was empty; and he had just broken, with violence, the only resource that could safely have replenished it. His English army was five months in arrear, and his Irish seven. Petitions were on foot in the city and elsewhere against what was left to him of his power, and he stood in the very midst of muskets and daggers that were aimed against his life. Killing had been declared No Murder against him; and a pamphlet with that terrible title, circulated in England within the last two months by thousands, had imbittered days and nights with the uncertain sense that each moment was to prove his last. For several nights, indeed, preceding that very day, he had made the round of the posts at Whitehall in person, for even his own body-guard he could trust no longer. "The Protector's own muster-roll," said that awful writing, which seemed to face him continually, "contains the names of those who aspire to the honour of delivering their country; his highness is not secure at his table or in his bed; death is at his heels wherever he moves; and though his head reaches the clouds, he shall perish like his own dung, and they that have seen him shall exclaim, Where is he?"

Melancholy duties awaited him next day. With this haunting sense of danger, which now pressed in upon him to the exclusion of nearly every other thought, he was obliged to cashier many of the favourite officers in his own favourite regiment. "I that had served him," says Colonel Hacker, a brave and single-hearted soldier, "fourteen years, ever since he was captain of a troop of horse till he came to this power, and had commanded a regiment seven years without any trial or appeal—with the breath of his nostrils I was ousted, and lost not only my place, but a dear friend to boot. Five captains under my command, all of integrity, courage, and valour, were ousted with me, because they could not say that that was a House of Lords."

Still no greater safety was achieved. The flood that was so soon to bear him down rolled heavily and uninterruptedly on. It would be idle to attempt to describe the conspiracies that surrounded him, even the more terrible because he knew them all.* The system of espionage that had been organized by Thurloe was by far the most extraordinary that had been known in those days, or perhaps in later; and it was said that even Thurloe knew not all that the Lord Protector knew.† The letters

* Some little relief there is in an occurrence the Marquis of Ormond was engaged in. The marquis came secretly to London during the sitting of Parliament, passed three weeks in conspiring with the Royalists, and intriguing with the Republicans, and returned unmolested to Charles II., then at Bruges. But Cromwell was fully apprized of his presence and his proceedings. He asked Broghill whether he was aware of the presence of an old friend. Broghill asked who it was; he was told by Cromwell it was the Marquis of Ormond, and professed his entire ignorance of the fact. "I know it well," said Cromwell; "and I will tell you where he is, in order that you may save your old acquaintance." No one had greater magnanimity than Cromwell, where the question was one of a purely personal kind.

† From many rumoured scenes and incidents by which I might illustrate the popular notion of this formidable secretary, and his still more formidable chief, I present the following: "Thurloe was wont to tell that he was commanded by Cromwell to go at a certain hour to Gray's Inn, and at such a place deliver a bill of £20,000 to a man he should find walking in such a habit and posture as he describ'd him, which accordingly Thurloe did, and never knew to the day of his death either the person or the occasion. At another time, the Protector coming late at night into Thurloe's office, which he kept in the last staircase in Lincoln's Inn, towards Holborn, that has a way down into the garden, made on purpose for Cromwell's coming to him unobserv'd, the Protector began to discourse with his secretary about an affair of the last importance; but seeing Moreland, one of the clerks, afterward Sir Samuel More that were interchanged between the members of his family were expressions of alarm at a most dear father or husband's imminent danger, or of congratulation at his marvellous escape. I present to the reader perhaps one of the last letters, if not the last, that the Lady Elizabeth ever wrote. It is to her sister-in-law, the wife of Henry Cromwell, and bears the date of the 12th of June.

"DEARE SISTER,—I must beg your pardon that I doe not right to you see oft ase I would doe; but, in earnest, I have bin soe extremely sickly of late, that it has made mee unfit for anything, thoye there is nothing that can please mee more than wherein I maye expres my true love and respekt to you; which I am suer non has more resen than myself, both for your former fafers, and the cens you have of anything which arises to mee of happnes. I will aiusuer you, nothing of that can bee to mee, wherein I have not power to express how really I love and honor you. Truly, the Lord has bin very gratus to us, in doeing for us abowe what we could exspekt; and now has shod himself more extraordinary in delevering my father out of the hands of his enymise, which wee have all reson to bee sensible of in a very pertikellar manner; for sertingly not ondy his famely would have bin ruined, but in all probabilliyti the hol nation would have bin invold in blood. The Lord grant it maye never bee forgot by us, but, that it may cose us to depend upon him, from hom wee have reserved all good, and that it may cose us to se the mutableness of thise things, and to yuse them accordingly; I am suer wee have nede to bage that sperrit from God. Hary is vary well; I hope you will se him this sommer. Truly, there is nothing I desier more than to enjoy you with us. I wis you may laye your grat bely here. I bag my true affiektion to your letel wons. Deare sister, I am your most affiektionate sister and servant,

E. CLAYPOLE."

The plot referred to by Lady Elizabeth was what is called the Slingsby and Hewet plot; and to avert the fate of Hewet, an Episcopal clergyman, whose ministry she was attached to, even this favourite and best-beloved daughter of Cromwell exerted herself in vain. Both Slingsby and Hewet perished on the scaffold. The health of the Lady Elizabeth, which was always delicate, and had been of late extremely so, seemed after this incident to wear still faster away; but whether that incident was at all connected with its more rapid decline, may be doubted. Be that as it may, it was at least watched with a more than father's anxiety by Cromwell. Even during all the disputes and anxieties that beset him at the opening of his last Parliament, nothing set aside that private sorrow. I find in one of Thurloe's letters this passage: "His highnesse, findinge he can have noe advise from those he most expected it from, sayth he will take his owne resolutions, and that he cannot any longer satisfye himselfe to sitt still, and make himselfe guilty of the losse of all the honest partye, and of the nation itselfe; and truly I have long wished that his highnesse would proceede accordinge to his owne satisfaction, and not soe much consider others, who truly are to be indulged in everything but where the beinge of the nation is concerned. His highnesse is now at Hampton Court, and will continue there for some tyme, as well for his own health as to be neare my Lady Elizabeth, who hath bene of late very daungerously ill, but now is somewhat better."

But the sorrows and anxieties of both father and daughter were now, happily for them, hastening to a rapid close. Public necessities pressed fearfully on the Protector. He had contracted enormous debts; his exchequer was frequently drained to the last shilling; and his ministers were compelled "to go a begging," as Thurloe tells us, for the temporary loan of a few thousand pounds, with the cheerless anticipation of a refusal. There, too, was the army, the greater part of which he had quartered in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, as his chief—his only—support against his enemies; and while the soldiers were comfortably clothed and fed, he might, perhaps, with confidence rely on their attachment; but now that their pay was in arrear, might not discontent induce them to listen to the suggestions of those officers who sought to subvert his power? He had once imposed taxes by his own authority: he dared not attempt it now. He strove to get up a loan in the city: the merchants, impoverished by the failure of their Spanish trade, eluded all his efforts. Thurloe himself gave way to despair at last. It was only, he said, when he looked up to heaven that he discovered a gleam of hope, in the persuasion that the God who had befriended Cromwell through life would not desert him at its close. Thurloe should have rather wished that life to close as it was. It could be stretched out no longer with profit or with honour. If the Lord Protector had indeed a FORTUNATE DAY, it became his friends to anticipate with no ungenerous hope that that might be his DEATH DAY. His errors were irretrievable. He could not then recall the "game of the King of Scots," which he had played so well. His arts were utterly exhausted; and what but mischief could there be in the farther retention of a life that was powerless and valueless without them?

A Parliament was nevertheless thought of once more! Urged by Thurloe's entreaties, he appointed a committee to consider of the means of defeating the Republicans. The committee sat and deliberated, and deliberated and sat, but nothing very ingenious did they hit upon; and Cromwell's last public action was to dissolve them. Thurloe lifted hands and eyes to heaven, and said no more. Cromwell redoubled his precautions for personal safety. He multiplied every means of defence he had. As if apprehensive of some attack upon his palace, he selected from different regiments of cavalry a hundred and sixty "brave fellows," in whom land, was in the office, whom he had not seen before, tho' he pretended to be asleep upon his desk, and fearing he might have overheard them, he drew out a dagger which he always carried under his coat, and was going to dispatch Moreland on the spot, if Thurloe had not, with great intreaties, prevail'd upon him to desist, assuring him Moreland had sat up two nights together, and was certainly fast asleep. Probably this incident gave rise to the fictions of Moreland and Henshaw, and Moreland and Willis; but no question Moreland did betray his master, when he found things were like to take another turn, and, indeed, I never heard much of his integrity or merit."—Oldmixon's History, p. 424.

* Lingard, vol. ii., p. 347.

he could repose the utmost confidence, and to whom he gave the pay and appointments of officers. He divided them into eight troops of twenty men each, and directed that two of these bodies, in rotation, should always be on duty near his person. He wore a coat of mail, or steel shirt, as it was called, under his clothes; he carried loaded pistols in his pockets; he sought to remain in privacy; and, when he found it necessary to give audience, he "sternly watched the eyes and gestures of those who addressed him." He was careful that his own motions should not be known beforehand. His carriage was filled with attendants; a numerous escort accompanied him; and he proceeded at full speed, "frequently diverging from the road to the right or left, and generally returning by a different route." In his palace he often inspected the nightly watch; changed his bedchamber; and was careful that, besides the principal door, there should be some other egress for the facility of escape. And this was the Cromwell who had almost singly turned the enemy's line at Marston Moor—the Cromwell of Naseby, of Worcester, of Newbury, of Dunbar! But what spirit can fight against shadows—those most terrible shadows that spring up from the grave of virtue? This hero passed his nights in a state of feverish anxiety; sleep had fled from his pillow; and for more than a year before his death, the absence of rest is always found assigned as either the cause which produced, or the circumstances which aggravated, his numerous ailments.*

But now they were all forgotten in the sudden and most dangerous relapse of his dearest daughter. It was announced to him that she was dying. Public affairs, private dangers, his own bodily pains—all were thrust aside for the greater love and the more unselfish sorrow, and he hurried to Hampton Court to watch by her bedside her slightest wish; to alleviate, or console, or share her dying thoughts and sufferings. The Lord Protector of three great kingdoms became the protector of his child alone; and that deathbed, if it had its dark pangs of grief, had surely its tender rays of sunshine too. Such griefs to such a man must have brought back with them some of nature's kindest memories.

On the 4th of August the Lady Elizabeth Claypole died, and on the 17th Thurloe wrote to Henry Cromwell. Having described "my Lady Elizabeth's funeral," the secretary thus proceeded: "Your lordship is a very sensible judge how great an affliction this was to both their highnesses, and how sadd a familye she left behinde her, which sadness was truly very much increased by the sicknesses of his highnesse, who at the same time lay very ill of the gout, and other distempers, contracted by the long sicknesses of my Lady Elizabeth, which made great impression upon him; and since that, wheither it were the retringe of the gout out of his foot into his body, or from some other cause, I am not able to say, he hath beene very dangerously sicke, the violence whereof lasted 4 or 5 days; but, blessed be God, he is now reasonable well recovered, and this day he went abroad for an houre, and findes himselfe much refreshed by it, soe that this recovery of his highnesse doth much allay the sorrow for my Lady Elizabeth's death. Your excellencye will easily imagine what an alarume his highnesse's sicknesses gave us, beinge in the posture wee are now in."

A slow fever, however, still lurked about the Lord Protector, and on the 24th he was again confined to his room. The fever was pronounced to be a bastard tertian. One of his physicians, as they stood in his chamber that day, whispered to another that his pulse was intermittent. The words caught the ears of the great soldier: he turned pale; a cold perspiration covered his face; and, requesting to be placed in bed, he executed his private will. The next morning he had recovered his usual composure; and, when he received the visit of his physician, ordering all to quit the room but his wife, whom he held by the hand, he said to the physician, "Do not think that I shall die; I am sure that I shall not." Then, observing the surprise which these words excited, he continued, "Don't think that I am mad; I tell you the truth; I know it from better authority than any which you can have from Galen or Hippocrates. It is the answer of God himself to our prayers; not to mine alone, but to those of others, who have a more intimate interest in him than I have."* The same communication was made to Thurloe, and to the different members of the Protector's family; nor did it fail to obtain credit among men who believed that "in other instances he had been favoured with similar assurances, and they had never deceived him." Hence his chaplain, Goodwin, exclaimed, "O Lord, we pray not for his recovery—that thou hast granted already: what we now beg is his speedy recovery."†

All of them seem to have forgotten (and himself, alas! the first) that nine days later would be his FORTUNATE DAY.

Having been moved for change of air to Whitehall till the palace of St. James's could be prepared for him, his strength rapidly wasted, and his fever became a double tertian. On the 25th of August Thurloe thus wrote to Henry Cromwell: "May it please your excellencye, I gave you some account by Doctor Worth of His Highnesse's condition, as it then was; but least he should delay his journey, or miscarry in it, I thought it necessary to send this expresse, to the end your excellencye may fully understand how it is with his Highnesse.

* Bates's Elenchi, pars secunda, p. 215. I subjoin the original passage: "Post prandium autem accedentibus ad eum quinque quos habebat medicis, quidam ex tactu pulsus intermisisse pronunciat: quo, audito ille subito conternatur ore pallet, sudatiniunculas patitur, et ferè deliquium, jubetque se ad lectulum deportari; atque ibi cardiacis refoecillatus, supremum condidit testamentum, sed de rebus privatis et domesticis. Manè summo, cum unus ex cæteris visitatum veniret, percontatur, quare vultus ei adeo tristis. Cùmque responderet, ità oportere, si cui vitæ ac salutis ejus pondus incumbere; Vos (inquit) medicis me creditis intermoriturum: dein cæteris amotis (tuxorem manu complectens) ita hunc affatur. Tibi pronuncio, non esse mihi hoc morbo moriendum; hujus enim certus sum. Et quia intenter aspectantem oculo ad ista verba cerneret, Tu me (inquit) nē credas insanire; verba veritatis eloquor, certioribus innixus quàm vobis Galenus aut Hippocrates vester suppediat rationibus. Deus ipse hoc responsum precibus dedit non meis unius, verum et eorum quibus arctius cum illo commercium et major familiaritas. Pergite alacres, excussa penitus à vultu tristitia, nèque instar servuli tractate. Pollere vobis licet prudentia rerum; plus tamen valet natura quàm medicum simul omnes; Deus autem naturam longiori superat intervallo."

† Lingard, vol. ii., p. 353.

* Lingard, vol. ii., p. 350.

This is the 13th day since his Ague took him, havinge been sicke a fortnight before of a generall distemper of body. It continued a good while to be a tertian ague, and the burninge fitts very violent. Upon Saturday it fell to a double tertian, havinge two fitts in 24 houres, one upon the heeles of another, which doe extreamely weaken him, and endauger his life. And truly since Saturday morninge he hath scarce beene perfectly out of his fitts. The Doctors are yett hopefull that he may struggle through it, though their hopes are mingled with much feare. But truly wee have cause to put our hope in the Lord, and to expect mercy from him in this case, he havinge stirred up the saints to pray for him in all places. Never was there a greater stocke of prayers goinge for any man than is now goinge for him; and truly there is a generall consternation upon the spirits of all men, good and bad, fearinge what may be the event of it, should it please God to take his highnesse at this tyme: and God havinge prepared the heart to pray, I trust he will encline his eare to heare. And that which is some ground of hope is, that the Lorde, as in some former occasions, hath given to himselfe a peticular assurance that he shall yett live to serve him, and to carry on the worke he hath put into his handes. . . . I doe not yett finde that there are any great stirrings yett upon this occasion, though the Cavaliers doe begin to listen after it, and hope their day is cominge, or indeed come, if his Highnesse dye. And truly, my Lord, wee have cause to feare that it may goe very ill with us if the Lord should take away his Highnesse in this conjuncture. Not that I thinke Charles Stewart's interest is soe great, or his partye soe powerfull in themselves; but I feare our own divisions, which may be great enough if his Highnesse should not settle and fix his successor before he dyes, which truly I beleeve he hath not yett done. He did by himselfe declare one in a paper before he was installed by the Parliament, and sealed it up in the forme of a letter, directinge it to me, but kept both the name of the person and the paper to himselfe. After he fell sicke at Hampton Court, he sent Mr. John Barrington to London for it, tellinge him it lay upon his study table at Whitehall; but it was not to be found there, nor elsewhere, though it hath been very narrowly looked for. And in this condition matters stand, his highnesse havinge beene too ill to be troubled with a buisnesse of this importance. This day he hath had some discourse about it, but his illness disenabled him to conclude it fully; and if it should please the Lord not to give him tyme to settle his succession before his death, the judgement would be the soarer, and our condition the more daungerous; but I trust he will have compassion on us, and not leave us as a prey to our enemies, or to one another. All persons here are very reserved as to what they will doe in case his Highnesse should not declare his Successor before he dyes, not beinge willinge to enterteyne any discourse of it, either because it is a matter too grievous to be thought of, or because they would not discover any opinion which might crosse his highnesse's thoughts in his life tyme. And this, my Lord, is the whole account I am able to give, your Lordship of this sadd buisnesse, which I am sure will occasion much trouble and sorrow to you; but I could not omit my duty, judginge it absolutely necessary that your Excellency should understand all that passes or falls out upon this subject, that you may the better knowe how to direct your prayers and counsells, and stirre up others alsoe to pray for his highnesse and three nations in this day of distresse. And as anythinge further occurs (which I beseech the Lord may be for good) I shall suddenly despatch it away to you, and be ready to answer such Commands as your Excellency shall lay upon me, beinge Your Excellency's most humble, faithfull, and obedient servant, Jo. THURLOE. Whitehall, 30 Aug., 1658, 9 o'clock at night. . . . The Kinge of Sweden and the Kinge of Dennimark are againe in open hostility; the Kinge of Sweden landed an army upon his island of Zealand, and is like to possesse himselfe of his Capitall City, Copenhagen, and the Sound. The cause of this new quarrel I cannot now acquaint your excellencye, beinge not informed myselfe. . . . That about the Succession is an absolute secret: I beseech your Excellencye keepe it soe."

This despatch suggests thoughts with which this work has nothing now to do. The final scene approached fast. On the second of September, Cromwell, who had been delirious, had a lucid interval of some duration. He called on one of his chaplains to read a certain text to him out of the Bible. They read what he directed from St. Paul to the Philippians: "Not that I speak in respect of want; for I have learned, in whatever state I am, therewith to be content. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me. Notwithstanding, ye have well done that ye did communicate with my affliction." As this fell upon his ear, he murmured brokenly forth these inexpressibly touching words. "This scripture did once save my life when my eldest son . . . died, which went as a dagger to my heart: . . . indeed it did."*

Then, as they stood around his bed, he suddenly lifted himself up, and, with what energy remained, "Tell me," said he to Sterry, one of his chaplains, "is it possible to fall from grace?" "It is not possible," replied the minister. "Then," exclaimed the dying man, "I am safe; for I know that I was once in grace." So, reassuring himself even then with the most fatal doctrine of his life, he turned round and prayed, not for himself, but for God's people.† "Lord," he said, "although I am a miserable and wretched creature, I am in covenant with thee through grace, and I may, I will come to thee for thy people. Thou hast made me (though very unworthy) a mean instrument to do them some good and thee service; and many of them have set too high a value upon me, though others

* Collection of Passages concerning his late Highness in Time of his Sickness, p. 12. The author was Underwood, groom of the bedchamber, and was present at the scene.

† (Respecting his alleged beloved notion of final perseverance, that once a child of God always so, and his supposed question whether a man could fall from grace, and the supposed answers of Goodwin and Sterry, such a conversation might or might not pass, but is conceived to mean no more than Cromwell's belief of the doctrine of predestination and election, which many wise and good persons of the then and present times, both in and out of the Church, have believed and do believe to be contained in the Articles of the English Church. See Memoirs of the Protector, vol. ii., p. 409.—C.J.)

wish and would be glad of my death; but, Lord, however thou dost dispose of me, continue and go on to do good for them; give them consistency of judgment, one heart, and mutual love, and go on to deliver them; and with the work of reformation; and make the name of Christ glorious in the world; teach those who look too much upon thy instruments to depend more upon thyself; pardon such as desire to trample upon the dust of a poor worm, for they are thy people too; and pardon the folly of this short prayer, even for Jesus Christ's sake, and give us a good night, if it be thy pleasure."

He went into a kind of stupor after this, but revived a little as the night closed in, and began to murmur half-audible words. An eye-witness* describes the affecting scene: "'Truly God is good; indeed he is . . . he will not—' There his speech failed him; but, as I apprehended, it was, 'He will not leave me.' This saying that God was good he frequently used all along, and would speak it with much cheerfulness and fervour of spirit in the midst of his pain. Again he said, 'I would be willing to live to be further serviceable to God and his people, but my work is done; yet God will be with his people.' He was very restless most part of the night, speaking often to himself; and there being something to drink offered him, he was desired to take the same, and endeavour to sleep; unto which he answered, 'It is not my design to drink or to sleep, but my design is to make what haste I can to be gone.'"

The morning of the next day dawned from a sky of terrible storm. It was the 3d of September. Cromwell had relapsed into a state of utter insensibility, but he lived until four o'clock in the afternoon, when, unconscious still, he breathed heavily, and his chaplains looking closely into the bed, found that his great spirit had passed away.† All the attendants who were present, and who had lost at that instant one of the kindest, the gentlest, and most affectionate of masters, wept and groaned aloud. "Cease to weep," exclaimed the enthusiastic and most confident Sterry; "you have more reason to rejoice. He was your protector here; he will prove a still more powerful protector, now that he is with Christ at the right hand of the Father!"

Thurloe at once announced the event to Henry Cromwell in this earnest and mournful despatch: "May it please your excellency, I did by an expresse upon Munday give your excellency an account of his highnesse's sicknesse and the daunger he was in; since that, it hath pleased God to put an end to his dayes. He died yesterday, about four of the clocke in the afternoone. I am not able to speake or write. This stroke is soe soare, soe unexpected, the providence of God in it soe stupendious, consideringe the person that is fallen, the tyme and season wherein God tooke him away, with other circumstances, I can doe nothinge but put my mouthe in the dust, and say, 'It is the Lord!' And though his wayes be not always knowne, yet they are always righteous, and wee must submit to his will, and resigne up ourselves to him with all our concernements. . . . His highnesse was pleased before his death to declare my Lord Richard successor. He did it upon Munday; and the Lord hath soe ordered it, that the councill and army hath received him with all manner of affection. He is this day proclaymed; and hitherto there seems a great face of peace: the Lord continue it! . . . It is not to be sayd what affection the army and all people shew to his late highnesse; his name is already precious. Never was there any man soe pray'd for as he was during his sicknesse—solemne assemblies meetinge every day to beseech the Lord for the continuance of his life—soe that he is gone to heaven, embalmed with the teares of his people, and upon the winges of the prayers of the saints. He lived desired and dyed lamented; every body bemoaning themselves, and sayinge, 'A great man is fallen in Israel!' The Lord double his spirit upon his successor and upon your excellencye, that you both may be famous in your generation, and be helped by God, with one heart and shoulder, to carry on that worke, the foundation whereof your most renowned father layd, and for which posteritie will blesse him! The councill hath given your excellencye an account of what is done as to the proclayminge his highnesse your brother. I only herewith send the voet of the councill; and, though I know not what will be my portion or condition here, yett I shall alwayes be your excellencye's most humble and obedient servant, Jo. THURLOE." . . . His highnesse (Richard) intends to send a gentleman to your excellencye in the beginninge of the next weeke, to let you understand fully the state of all thinges here and of your family, and commanded me to desire you to excuse his not writinge by this messenger. The truth is, his highnesse's death is soe soare a stroke unto him, and he is soe sensible of it, that he is in noe condition to write or doe yett. Here is a sadd family on all hands: the Lord support them!"

The great storm of the night of the 2d of September, 1658, reached to the coasts of the Mediterranean. It was such a night in London as had rarely been passed by dwellers in crowded streets. Trees were torn from their roots in the park, chimneys blown down, and houses unroofed in the city. The various accounts which writers as various have handed down to us, would seem to realize the night of Duncan's murder.

"As they say,
Lamentings heard i' the air; strange screams of death
And prophesying, with accents terrible,
Of dire combustion, and confused events,
New hatch'd to the woful time. The obscure bird Clamour'd the live-long night."

It was, indeed, a night which prophesied a woful time to England, but to Cromwell it proved a night of happiness. It ushered in for him, far more surely than at Worcester or Dunbar, his FORTUNATE DAY.*

* Underwood.

† A most touching account of the death-scene is contained in the closing pages of Carlyle's second volume, p. 406-12.—C.]

* [Since this work has been in press, the production of Monsieur Guizot on Charles I. and Cromwell has appeared. It is marked by great ability. It will be consulted by all who are interested in the character of the Lord Protector. It is published by the Messrs. Appletton, New-York.—C.]

APPENDIX

TO THE

LIFE OF CROMWELL.

A.

THE industry of Mr. Noble has finally settled the point of Oliver Cromwell's relationship to Charles I. by the mother's side. The result may be shortly stated thus. He carries back the lineage of William Steward, Esq., the father of Mrs. Robert Cromwell, to Alexander, the lord-high-steward of Scotland, from whose third son, Andrew, he proves him to have sprung. John Steward, the grandson of this Andrew, had accompanied the suite of the young prince James of Scotland, when, on his way to France, to avoid his uncle's ambition, he was driven on the English coast, and detained prisoner by Henry IV. More fortunate than his royal master, John Steward became one of the English king's favourites; received knighthood from him at a tournament held at Smithfield in the tenth year of his reign, and thenceforward settled in England. The pedigree, connecting him and his descendants with royalty, stands thus:

ALEXANDER, LORD-HIGH-STEWARD OF SCOTLAND.

James, lord high-steward of Scotland.

Walter, lord high-steward = Marjory, sister and heiress of David II., king of Scotland.

Robert II., king of Scotland.

Robert III.

James I.

James II.

James III.

James IV.

James V.

Queen Mary.

James VI. and I. of England.

CHARLES I.

It may be mentioned here, that the lord-high-steward's second son, John, gave birth to the noble family of Lennox, which was subsequently "ingrafted into the royal stem" by the ill-omened marriage of Lord Darnley with Mary Stuart.

Andrew Steward, Esq.

Sir Alexander Steward.

[This knight was surnamed the Fierce. In the presence of Charles VI. of France, he encountered a furious lion with his sword; and that breaking, seized a stick, and with it killed the enraged creature. For this feat the delighted monarch gave him an instant addition to his arms—a lion rampant gules, over all a bend reguled or.]

Sir John Steward.

[The English settler. Knighted by Henry IV.]

Sir John Steward.

[Knighted by Henry V.]

Thomas Steward, Esq.

Richard Steward, Esq.

Archibald Steward, Esq.

Archibald Steward, Esq.

William Steward, Esq.

Elizabeth Steward = Robert Cromwell, Esq.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

Sir Thomas Steward.

[The only brother of Mrs. Robert Cromwell, knighted by King James I., at Windsor, in 1604. He left his fortune to his illustrious nephew.]

From this, the reader will observe, Charles I. and Cromwell's mother were eighth cousins; James I. and Oliver himself ninth cousins; Oliver and Charles I. ninth cousins one remove; and the Protector Richard, Oliver's second son, tenth cousin to the ill-fated English king. Mr. Noble has not failed to direct attention to the fact, that "the royal line so constantly marrying at a very early age, had got one descent of the younger branch, from whom Mrs. Cromwell, Oliver's mother, derived her birth; a thing very common, owing to a cause too obvious to be mentioned."

These details, I may add, were not so satisfactorily made out during the life of the Protector as they have since been. His mother's modest character forbade such assumptions on her part, and he was himself too proud of his self-achieved authority to set up the miserable shadow of a fantastic family claim, which, if it established any thing, should have bespoken pity for the kinsman he had sent to the block. His more servile admirers and dependants, however, did not fail to press for him his hereditary pretensions on the royal score; but the way in which they urged it showed on how obscure a tradition it rested then. One "H. Daubeney" published, the year after Cromwell's death, a duodecimo volume of 300 pages, entitled "Historie and Policies Reviewed, in the Heroic Transactions of his Most Serene Highnesse, Oliver, late Lord-Protector, from his Cradle to his Tomb: declaring his steps to princely perfection; as they are drawn in lively parallels to the ascents of the great patriarch Moses, in thirty degrees to the height of Honour." In which Mosaic parallel we find this remark: "I cannot say his late highnesse was extracted from so princely a family [as Moses], but altogether as princely, being lineally descended from the loynes of our most ancient British princes, and ty'd in near alliances to the blood of our later kings, as by that thrice noble family of the Barringtons, and divers others; which to make a petegree of would take up more paper than we intend for our volume, and make me appear more a herald than an historian. Nay, indeed, should I but go about to prove his highnesse's most illustrious house noble, I should commit a sacrilege in the temple of honour, and onely violate his most glorious family with a more solemn infamy. His highnesse is unquestionably known to have descended from such a stem of princely antecessors, that whole ages, which waste rocks and wear out elements, have never altered to lessen, but rather advance, the honour of his great house. He was derived from such a family, that we may better say of it than what was of the other, ex qua nascit aliquid mediocre nasci, from whence nothing ordinary can proceed; as is likewise made notoriously evident in those other most eminent persons of honour, now living, who are blest with a share of his incomparable blood; who have spread their glory abroad, so well as at home, and built themselves such trophies, in the hearts of their very enemies, that eternity itself must celebrate; so no time can ever be able to demolish, or reduce into oblivion. And that I may not be thought to flatter so great a truth, I will be bold to hasten, and abruptly conclude this first point of our Mosaic parallel, with saying onely, that this sublime person, his late most serene highnesse, our second, as the first great Moses, came into the world like a princely pearl, and made it appear, by the quality of his orient, that if nature pleased to equal his birth to the best of noblemen upon earth, he would equal his virtues to his extraction; as we shall see more plainly, when we mount a little higher upon our Mosaic ascents and parallels."

From all which it appears that Mr. Daubeany knew nothing of the real pedigree, but guessed it out from tradition, assisted by his hero's old Welsh origin and his relationship to his uncle, Sir Francis Barrington, who could trace his pedigree up to the Norman Conquest. Lord Hailes was nearer the mark, when, in his Annals, he observed, that "at the fatal battle of Halidon, two Stuarts fought under the banner of their chief; the one, Alan of Dreghorn, the paternal ancestor of Charles I., and the other, James of Rosyth, the maternal ancestor of Oliver Cromwell."

B.
OLIVER CROMWELL.

Had nine children, of whom only two sons and three daughters survived him. One daughter and two sons (Robert and James) died in extreme youth; his second son, Oliver, a captain in the service of the Parliament, fell in battle in July, 1648. The following table enumerates only the families of the male descendants, of whom such as had male issue continuing the name are enclosed in lines:

C.

The Protecting Brewer.

A brewer may be a Burgess grave,
And carry the matter so fine and so brave,
That he the better may play the knave,
Which nobody can deny.

A brewer may be a Parliament-man,
For there the knavery first began,
And brew most cunning plots he can,
Which nobody can deny.

A brewer may put on a Nabal face,
And march to the wars with such a grace,
That he may get a captain's place,
Which nobody can deny.

A brewer may speak so wondrous well,
That he may rise (strange things to tell),
And so be made a colonel,
Which nobody can deny.

A brewer may make his foes to flee,
And raise his fortunes so that he
Lieutenant-general may be,
Which nobody can deny.

A brewer may be all in all,
And raise his powers both great and small,
That he may be a lord-general,
Which nobody can deny.

A brewer may be like a fox in a cub,
And teach a lecture out of a tub,
And give the wicked world a rub,
Which nobody can deny.

A brewer by his excise and rate
Will promise his army he knows not what,
And set upon the college gate,
Which nobody can deny.

Methinks I hear one say to me,
Pray why may not a brewer be
Lord-chancellor o' th' University?
Which nobody can deny.

A brewer may be as bold as Hector,
When he had drank his cup of nectar;
And a brewer may be a lord-protector,
Which nobody can deny.

Now here remains the strangest thing,
How this brewer about his liquor did bring
To be an emperor, or a king,
Which nobody can deny.

A brewer may do what he will,
And rob the Church and State, to sell
His soul unto the d—l in h—ll,
Which nobody can deny.

D.

SIR OLIVER CROMWELL.

SIR OLIVER CROMWELL, a wealthy and respectable old knight, and a staunch Cavalier, claims some notice from the biographer of his illustrious nephew. He had succeeded to the enormous estates of Sir Henry, and chiefly resided, of course, at the splendid family seat of Hinchinbrook. "Sir Oliver Cromwell," says Noble, "eldest son and heir of Sir Henry, was a most popular and beloved character in his own county of Huntingdon, for which he was returned one of the members in the Parliaments called in the 31st, 35th, 39th, and 43d years of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and had the honour to receive knighthood from her majesty in 1598, in which year he was sheriff of the counties of Huntingdon and Cambridge."

Immediately after the latter date, some enormous accessions appear to have fallen into his rent-rolls; but Sir Oliver was a true Cavalier, fond of the present, careless of the future, and with every new accession of fortune more recklessly profuse of the old. His love of display was carried at all times to ridiculous excess; but it was not till the death of Elizabeth that the brilliant thought of his life occurred to him, namely, that, as the new king must pass through Huntingdon in his journey from Edinburgh to London, it would reflect eternal glory on the Cromwells if a magnificent entertainment at Hinchinbrook awaited the passage of the new sovereign. Poor Sir Oliver little knew what other and different glories an infant Oliver was then providing for the Cromwells—what other and different entertainments for that Scotch dynasty of English kings!

The knight's duteous invitation having been accepted by royalty, it became his next care to show off as much as possible the family claims of the Cromwells, and so, according to Noble, "he hastily made such improvements in his house as he judged most proper; and at this time he built that very elegant bow window to the dining-room, in which are two shields of arms of his family impaling, the one his first, the other his second lady's, painted upon the glass, with many quarterings; and surrounded by a prodigious number of other shields Cromwellian. All preparations complete, King James arrived at Hinchinbrook on the 27th of April, 1603, Lord Southampton carrying before him the sword which the mayor of Huntingdon had offered to the new sovereign. Sir Oliver received James at the gate of the great court, and conducted him up a walk, that then immediately led to the principal entrance of the house.

"His majesty," we learn from various accounts, "here met with a more magnificent reception than he had ever done since his leaving his paternal kingdom, both for the plenty and variety of the meats and wines. It is inconceivable with what pleasure the English received the king: all strove to please, every one to see the new sovereign, who was to unite two jarring and valiant kingdoms, and to be the common monarch of both. Sir Oliver gratified them to the full. His doors were thrown wide open to receive all that chose to pay their respects to the new king, or even to see him; and each individual was welcomed with the choicest viands and most costly wines: even the populace had free access to the cellars during the whole of his majesty's stay. While the king was at Hinchinbrook, he received the heads of the University of Cambridge in their robes, to congratulate him upon his accession to the English throne, which they did in a long Latin oration. His majesty remained with Sir Oliver until he had breakfasted on April 29. At his leaving Hinchinbrook, he was pleased to express the obligations he had received from him and his lady; to the former he said at parting, as he passed through the court, in his broad Scotch manner, 'Murry mon, thou hast treated me better than any one since I left Edinburgh;' and it is more than probable, than ever that prince was entertained before or after; for it is said, Sir Oliver at this time gave the greatest feast that had been given to a king by a subject. His loyalty and regard to his prince seems almost unbounded; for when his majesty left Hinchinbrook, he was presented by him with many things of great value; among others, a large, elegant, wrought standing cup of gold, goodly horses, deep-mouthed hounds, divers hawks of excellent wing; and, at the remove, gave fifty pounds among the royal officers. So many and such great proofs of attachment, and those in a manner peculiarly agreeable to the taste of the prince, gained his regard, which he took an early opportunity of expressing, by creating him, with fifty-nine others, a knight of the Bath, prior to his coronation. This ceremony was performed on Sunday, July 24, following; upon which day he, with the other gentlemen designed for that honour, rode in state from St. James's to the court, and so, with their esquires and pages, about the tilyard, and from thence to St. James's Park, where, alighting from their horses, and going in a body to the presence-gallery, they received their knighthood from his majesty."

Happy Sir Oliver! We hardly recover breath after this description to glance rapidly at his remaining fortunes.

He was, we find, a conspicuous member of the House of Commons from 1604 to 1610, and also in 1614, 1623, and 1624, during which years he is perhaps oftener named upon committees than any other man. He is always a staunch courtier, and once or twice styled Queen Anne's attorney in the journals of the House; but he did not hold that place long, probably not many months. It is probable that he succeeded Sir Lawrence Tansfield in the office in or about the year 1604. On the 10th of May, 1605, he, with others, signed a certificate to the privy council, that the work of draining the fens in Lincolnshire, &c., was feasible, and without any peril to any haven or county. In this letter Robert joined him; and in 1606 he was named in the act or bill for draining of the fens; and was one of the adventurers who subscribed towards planting and cultivating Virginia. His majesty, King James I., we also find, gave Sir Oliver, in 1608, £6000 for his relinquishing a grant of £200, issuing yearly out of the royal lands, given to him as a free gift; and the family records tell us, that on May 2, 1622, he gave a grant in fee of certain lands in the manor of Warbois to his son and heir Henry, out of his affection to him, and for his better maintenance and living: the seizure was witnessed by Sir Phil. Cromwell and others. Meanwhile, we may add, he had made enormous gaps in his fortune by his gorgeous style of living, and the royal entertainments he persisted in giving at intervals to the king, which he continued even after the accession of Charles to the throne.

Sir Oliver, Mr. Noble tells us, "was in no less favour with King Charles I. than he had been with the late sovereign; his name occurs in a committee in the first Parliament of this reign; Aug. 12 in this year, and Feb. 23 following, he is named, among others, in a special commission directed to them, for 'ruling, governing, demising, and disposing of our assenssane, and customary lands within our dutchie of Cornwall;' he was also named one in the commission of peace by King Charles I. in 1625, and for the loan-money for the county of Huntingdon in the following year."

It is not necessary here to pursue his fortunes in detail, as they are alluded to in the life of his nephew. "He was not," says the cautious Mr. Noble, "an idle spectator in the dreadful civil war which the tyranny of King Charles I. and the ambition of the popular leaders of the House of Commons had involved this nation in; but remembering the many obligations he and his ancestors lay under to the crown, he determined to support the royal cause. For this purpose, he not only (at a very heavy expense) raised men, and gave large sums of money, but obliged his sons to take up arms, and go with the royal army; and he was of greater use to his majesty than any person in that part of the kingdom, by which he rendered himself particularly obnoxious to the Parliament."

Of his nephew's visit to him at Ramsey mention is elsewhere made. No claim or favour of relationship, no consideration for his sinking and nearly squandered fortunes, could avail to move his faith. "Nothing," pursues our authority, "was able to shake Sir Oliver's loyalty; he supported the royal party to the last; for which, like many others, he was sentenced to have all his estates, both real and personal, sequestered; but they were saved through the interposition, and for the sake of his nephew Oliver, then lieutenant-general; and the Parliament, April 17, 1648, took off the sequestration, in which he is styled 'Sir Oliver Cromwell, of Ramsey Moore, in the county of Huntingdon, Knight of the Bath.' During the whole of the usurpation, as well by the Commonwealth as under the government of his relation Oliver, he followed the example of the grande Loyalists in courtier privacy and retirement; and it is pretty singular that the colours which he and his sons took from the Parliament forces continued displayed in Ramsey Church during the whole of the Grand Rebellion, and remained there until within these fifty years. This fortitude in not courting the favour of the Protector is the more observable and praiseworthy, as from the repeated losses he had sustained from his loyalty, his numerous family, and want of economy in both himself and his sons, the evening of his life was rendered very disagreeable upon pecuniary accounts, he dying oppressed with a load of debts, although he had parted not only with most of his estates in Huntingdonshire (to whom I know not), but of his other valuable manors, since none of these came to his heirs, to whom it is reasonable to conjecture he resigned up the whole of what he had left: for in the decree of chancery for dividing the fens, passed in 1652, his name is not mentioned; and his eldest son and heir-apparent is called lord of the manor of Ramsey, of which he was actual owner at that time. His death happened Aug. 28, 1655, in the ninety-third year of his age: he was buried the same night (to prevent, it is said, his body being seized by his creditors) in the Church of Ramsey; but there is no memorial of him or of his family, nor does there seem ever to have been any in that church; but, upon sounding, I discovered that there is a vault just entering into the chancel, where the Cromwells are said to be buried."

Fuller sketches, in his own quaint style, the character of Sir Oliver as one of the worthies of Huntingdonshire, and tells us he is remarkable to posterity on a fourfold account: "First, for his hospitality, and prodigious entertainment of King James and his court; secondly, for his upright dealings in bargain and sale with all chapmen, so that no man whosoever that purchased land of him was put to the charge of three pence to make his title; yet he sold excellent pennyworths, inasmuch that Sir John Leaman (once lord-mayor of London), who bought the fair manor of Warbois, in this county, of him, affirmed, that it was the cheapest land that ever he bought, and yet the dearest that ever Sir Oliver Cromwell sold; thirdly, for his loyalty, always beholding the usurpation and tyranny of his nephew, godson, and namesake with hatred and contempt; lastly, for his vivacity, who survived to be the oldest knight who was a gentleman, seeing Sir George Dalston, younger in years (yet still alive), was knighted some days before him."

It will be only necessary to add that Sir Oliver married twice: first, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Thomas Bromley, lord-chancellor of England, upon whom was settled Ramsey, Warbois, Hinchinbrook, Higney, Broughton alias Broncton, and Little Raveley. After her death he married, July 7, 1601 (at Baberham, in Cambridgeshire, the place of her late husband's residence), Ann, daughter of Egidius Hootman, a gentleman of Antwerp, and widow of Sir Horatio Palavicini, a noble Genoise. Upon this latter lady he settled the manors of Ramsey, Heigmongrove, Bury, Upwood, and Wistow Meers, except the rectories in each of them, and the parishes called the old and new parishes, and the lands lying in those parishes, viz., Ramsey and the Chase, and the ground called Wyewood. She died at Hinchinbrook, and was buried at All Saints' Church, in Huntingdon, April 26, 1626. By Lady Elizabeth Sir Oliver had six children, and by Lady Ann four.

E.
CROMWELL AND CHRISTINA.

INTRODUCTION.

AFTER the dissolution of the Long Parliament, and on the eve of the seizure of the Protectorate, Cromwell resolved to send Whitelocke as ambassador extraordinary to Sweden, to arrange a treaty with Queen Christina. Viscount Lisle, the other lord-commissioner of the great seal, had been named for the office, but Lisle's presence promised to prove as available to Cromwell in the designs he now held, as the absence of the cautious and circumspect Whitelocke, who had, as in every other great event of the time, objected to the dissolution of the Parliament before it occurred, and acquiesced in it afterward. Whitelocke, therefore, he was determined should go; and his conduct in achieving his point was eminently characteristic.

Whitelocke had grave reasons for declining the service, and many long and tearful conversations passed with his wife (the third who had helped to increase his family), in which those reasons are earnestly given. The voyage was a danger—the repulsive climate of Sweden was a danger—the health of Lady Whitelocke, then on the eve of confinement, an imminent danger; but worst and most dangerous of all had it been to disobey the lord-general. His wife, with a woman's ready wit, endeavoured, by a sort of half-deserved compliment, to infuse some spirit of resistance into him: “The lord-general means no good to you,” she said, “but would be rid of you.” “Why,” answered Whitelocke, “should he desire to be rid of me, when I may be serviceable to him here?” The wife readily retorted: “Though you are serviceable in some things, yet you are not thorough-paced for them in all things, which they would have you to do; you refused to act in the great business; you opposed the breaking of the Parliament, and other unjust things.” “But what further designs,” afterward asks the same lawyer, “can he have? He exercises more power than any king of England ever had or claimed.” “His ambition,” answers his wife, “is higher than we can imagine; and you have often declared yourself for the law and rights of the people, which, if they stand in his way, he will lay them, or you, or anything aside.” Similar language to this, but with a different purpose, was held to the perplexed Whitelocke by one of his tenants at his seat in Bucks, “an ancient, sober, discreet, and faithful servant to Whitelocke and his father above forty years.” This old countryman advised his master to go, because the “GREAT MAN,” as he calls Cromwell, desires him to go. Whitelocke rejoins, that that is true; but he is not “bound to obey” Cromwell. “I am deceived,” says the shrewd old servant, “if he will not be obeyed in what he hath a mind to.” “I am not under his command,” retorts Whitelocke; “what can he do to me?” “What can he do?” exclaims the experienced William Cooke; “what can he not do? Don't we all see he does what he list? We poor countrymen are forced to obey him to our cost; and if he have a mind to punish us or you, it's an old proverb that it is an easy thing to find a staffe to beat a dogge; and I would not have you to anger him lest you bring danger, and trouble too, upon you and your family and state: that's the truth on't.”

Let us next view Whitelocke in conversation with the lord-general. He had received a very simple and short note, signed by Cromwell and Pickering (as of the council of state), but “all written with Cromwell's own hand,” intimating the office he was expected to discharge. Next morning he called on Pickering, told his wife's condition, and his reluctance to leave England, and implored his intercession with the lord-general. Together they proceeded to the latter, and Whitelocke made his appeal. “I am very sorry,” quietly remarked Cromwell, “that the letter came no sooner to you.” “I confess,” interposed Sir Gilbert Pickering, “it was my fault.” “Sir Gilbert,” characteristically resumed Cromwell, “would needs write a very fine letter; and when he had done, did not like it himself. I then took the pen and ink, and straightway wrote that letter to you. And the business is of exceeding great importance to the Commonwealth, as any can be; that it is: and there is no prince or state in Christendom, with whom there is any probability for us to have a friendship, but only the Queen of Sweden. She hath sent several times to us, but we have returned no embassy to her, only a letter by a young gentleman. She expects an ambassador from us; and if we should not send a man of eminency to her, she would thinke herself slighted by us: and she is a lady of great honour, and stands much upon ceremonies.”

Poor Whitelocke, somewhat softened against his will, yet found strength enough to renew his importunities of release on the ground of various incapacities he alleged himself to labour under. “The council,” retorted Cromwell, concealing his own private and determined will under a torrent of persuasion and entreaty, “the council have pitched upon you unanimously, as the fittest man in the nation for this service; we know your abilities, having long conversed with you; we know you have languages, and have travelled, and understand the interest of Christendome; and I have known you in the army, to endure hardships, and to be healthful and strong, and of mettle, discretion, and parts most fit for this employment: you are so indeed; really, no man is so fit for it as you are. We know you to be a gentleman of a good family, related to persons of honour; and your present office of commissioner of the seals will make you the more acceptable to her. I do earnestly desire you to undertake it; wherein you will do an act of great merit and advantage to the Commonwealth, as great as any one member of it can performe, and which will be as well accepted by them. The business is very honourable, and exceeding likely to have good success. Her publike ministers heer have already agreed upon most of the materiall and maine points of the buisness; if it had not been such an employment, we would not have putt you upon it: the buisness of trade, and of the funds, and touching the Dutch, are such as there cannot be any of greater consequence.”

With the little spirit remaining to him, Whitelocke interposed once more the condition of his wife for at least a little delay. “I know,” replied Cromwell, “my lady is a good woman, and a religious woman, and will be contented to suffer a little absence of her husband for the publike good; and for the time of the year, really the life of the buisness consists in the despatch of it att this time; the Dutch are tampering with the queen, but she holds them off, expecting to hear from us.” The interview ended with the grant of a week's consideration to the ambassador malgré lui.

At the week's end, Whitelocke again presented himself at the chamber of the lord-general—again to implore of him a release from the embassy. “There is no one in England,” quietly observed Cromwell, “so fit for it as you.” Silent to Whitelocke's redoubted pleas of incapacity, the lord-general obstinately resumed, “I know your education, travayle, and language, and experience have fitted you for it; you know the affaires of Christendome as well as most men, and of England as well as any man, and can give as good an account of them. I think no man can serve his country more than you may herein; indeed I think so; and therefore I make it my particular suit and earnest request to you to undertake it, and I hope you will show a little regard to me in it; and I assure you that you shall have no cause to repent it.” Wonderful indeed was Cromwell's power of persuasion! but the uxorious Whitelocke hesitated still. “My lord, I am very ready to testify my duty to your excellency; I acknowledge your many favours to me, and myselfe an officer under your command, and to owe you obedience. Butt your excellency will not expect it from me in that wherein I am not capable to serve you; and therefore I make it my most humble suit to be excused from this service.” Humble but vain! “For your abilities,” Cromwell reiterated, as though Whitelocke had not meanwhile spoken, “I am satisfied; I know no man so fit for it as yourself; and if you should decline it (as I hope you will not), the Commonwealth would suffer extremely by it, your own profession might suffer likewise, and the Protestant interest would suffer by it. Indeed, you cannot be excused. The hearts of all the good people in this nation (?) are set upon it, to have you undertake this service; and if you should waive it, being thus, and att such a time when your going may be the most likely means to settle our buisness with the Dutch and Danes, and all matters of trade (and none, I say again, can do it better than you), the Commonwealth would be at an extreme prejudice by your refusal. Butt I hope you will hearken to my request, and lett me prevayle with you to undertake it: neither you nor yours, I hope, shall ever have any cause to wish you had not done it.”

Whitelocke wavers sensibly at last, and observes cautiously and inquiringly, “My lord, when a man is out of sight, he is out of mind. Though your excellency be just and honourable, yett your greater affaires calling you off, those to whom matters of correspondence and supplies must be referred will perhaps forget one who is afare off, and not be so sensible of extremities in a foreign country as those who suffer under them.” “I will engage to take,” at once answered Cromwell, “particular care of those matters myselfe, and that you shall neither want supplies, nor any thing that is fit for you: you shall be sett out with as much honour as ever any ambassador was from England. I shall hold myself particularly obliged to you if you will undertake it, and will stick as close to you as your skin is to your flesh. You shall want nothing either for your honour and equipage, or for power and trust to be reposed in you, or for correspondence and supplies when you are abroad: I promise you, my lord, you shall not; I will make it my business to see it done. The Parliament and council, as well as myself, will take it very well and thankfully from you to accept of this employment; and all people, especially the good people of the nation, will be much satisfied with it; and therefore, my lord, I make it againe my earnest request to you to accept this honourable employment."

* Here, no doubt, allusion is made to the execution of Charles; and the remark which Whitelocke instantly makes in the original dialogue betrays a simple point in his character, and leaves it in much doubt whether his only motive in opposing that great deed was not simply to facilitate a courtship. “Had I not done so,” he remarks, “you and I had not met together.” Lady Whitelocke loses no time in corroborating this. “It was the first thing I inquired of you,” she gravely rejoins; “my first husband nor you were engaged; if you had, I should not have been engaged to you. I believe you lost by it much of the general's favour; and he would take this occasion to lay you aside, that you might be no hindrance to his further designs.”

A pause now followed, and Whitelocke consented to go. Then, in proportion to his quiet determination to take no refusal, was the abundance of Cromwell's protestations of gratitude at not having received one! Nothing can more strikingly illustrate the man. "My lord, I doe most heartily thanke you for accepting the employment, whereby you have testified a very great respect and favour to me, and affection to the Commonwealth, which will be very well taken by them. And I assure you, that it is so grateful to me, who, upon my particular request, have prevailed with you, that I shall never forgett this favour, but endeavour to requite it to you and yours. Really, my lord, I shall. And I will acquaint the council with it, that we may desire further conference with you."

Happily does this interview end with Whitelocke's remark of himself, that "he went away well pleased;" nor was his pleasure diminished by a messenger from Cromwell, who arrived a few days after at his house in Chelsea. "Cromwell sent one of his gentlemen with a present to Whitelocke—a sword, and a payre of spurs, richly inlaid with gould, of a noble work and fashion." All the care he had now was to quiet his wife as well as he could, and to this end he exerted himself with reasonable success.

The interview of leave took place on the 30th of October, 1653. Cromwell repeated all his assurances to him with redoubled earnestness, gave him various hints of policy and conduct in the management of the treaty and its objects, and granted him every request he asked of personal favour. Whitelocke then finally implored him never to "give credit to whisperings, or officious words, or letters of pickthanks behind my backe." "I shall not easily give believe," Cromwell assured him, "to such backbiters. I hate them. And what I shall be informed of your actions abroad will hardly create in me an ill opinion of them before I be certified from yourselfe." "It may be your excellency will heare," pursued the wily lawyer, "that I am great with some cavaliers when I am abroad, and that I make much of them; and truly that may well be. I love a civility to all, especially to persons of condition, though enemies; and have ever used it, and perhaps may use it more than ordinary when I am abroad, and to those of the king's party; and by them I may be the better enabled to secure myselfe, and to understand their designs, which will be no disadvantage to your affairs; nor shall I ever betray those, or any persons by whom I am trusted." "I thinke such a carriage towards them," earnestly answered Cromwell, "will be prudent, and fit for you to use; and it will never occasion in me, nor I hope in any other sober men, the least jealousy of your faithfulness, but it may tend to your security and to the good of your business." "I have butt one thing more," concluded the ambassador, "to trouble your excellency with; that is, my humble thanks for all your favours, and particularly for the noble present I received from your hand." "I pray, my lord," answered the lord-general, kindly, "doe not speake of so poore a thing; if there were opportunity for me to doe honour to your lordship, I assure you that very few should goe before you."

It will have been observed throughout these interviews, that, though Cromwell was still, to all appearance, only a private individual, with no other charge than as lord-general of the army and a member of the council of state, his authority and power were already single and absolute, in fact. His earnest anxiety for this treaty with Sweden was not, let us add, assumed, though many of his protestations to Whitelocke were. The importance of Sweden, in the great division of the European governments into Catholic and Protestant, as the most considerable of the Protestant monarchies, whose alliance the Republic claimed, need not be pointed out to the well-informed historical reader; and the motive to a perfect alliance with Sweden had been strongly increased by the sympathies awakened in Cromwell's mind, when the frank and masculine spirit of the young queen who then held the Swedish throne stood out boldly from the other feeble and vacillating crowned heads of Europe, and at once, with daring resolution, acknowledged the English Republic.

Christina, queen of Sweden, was now not twenty-seven years old. She was the daughter of a hero, Gustavus Adolphus, and had inherited the spirit of a hero. Her eccentricities are matter of history. Among them—for in a crowned head this is an eccentricity indeed—should be named, first, her passionate encouragement of literature and learned men, inspired, it should be added, by her own great talents and acknowledged learning. When the great work against the leaders of the English Commonwealth, written by Salmasius, at the suggestion of Charles the Second's court, had been finished, that famous controversialist went, for his best reward, to the court of Christina. He was received there with the greatest distinction. The cold climate of Stockholm, however, proved too much for his health, and the young queen herself is said to have spent hours with him alone by his bedside, and to have performed for him all the functions which are necessary to a valetudinarian. Fatally for Salmasius, however, Milton's "Defensio" reached Stockholm in the very midst of these ultra courtesies from royalty. Christina read the immortal treatise of the English writer—"devoured it," as was said, and proclaimed everywhere in the circles of her capital that glory should belong to the name of Milton. Salmasius could not but hear this, and yet the queen was "too humane and considerate to reverse the treatment with which she had honoured him." The delicacy of the defeated scholar then rose equal to her own. He proposed, for his health's sake, removal to a milder climate, and Christina dismissed him with honour.

For the court of this queen it was that Whitelocke, on the 5th of November, 1653, with a magnificent suite of officers and attendants, set sail as ambassador to the English Commonwealth. And at this court it was that several delightful scenes and dialogues occurred, which not only illustrate the character and influence of the great subject of this memoir in a novel and interesting manner, but also disclose, better than any records else, the more sterling as well as charming aspects of the character of Christina. Whitelocke arrived in Stockholm only a few months before she astonished Europe by the resignation of her crown, at a time when no one disputed it, and all her people loved her.

WHITELOCKE FIRST SEES CHRISTINA IN HER MAGNIFICENT PALACE, AND IS NOT AFRAID.

As soon as he came within this room, he putt off his hatt, and then the queen putt off her cappe, after the fashion of men, and came two or three steppes forward upon the foot carpet. This, and her being covered, and rising from her seate, caused Whitelocke to know her to be the queen, which otherwise had not bin easy to be discerned: her habit being of plaine gray stuffe, her petticoate reached to the ground; over that a jacket, such as men weare, of the same stuffe, reaching to her knees; on her left side, tyed with crimson ribbon, she wore the jewell of the order of Amarantha; her cuffs ruffled à la mode; no gorgett or band, butt a blacke scarfe about her neck, tyed before with a blacke ribbon, as soldiers and mariners sometimes use to weare; her hayre was breaded, and hung loose upon her head; she wore a blacke yelvet cappe lined with sables, and turned up, after the fashion of the cuntry, which she used to putt off and on as men doe their hattes. Her countenance was sprightly, but somewhat pale; she had much of majesty in her demeanour, and though her person were of the smaller size, yett her mienne and carriage was very noble. [Here Whitelocke describes his kissing her hand, "which ceremony all ambassadors used to this queen," and other matters.] The queene was very attentive whilst he spake, and coming up close to him, by her looks and gestures (as was supposed) would have daunted him; but those who have bin conversant in the late great affaires in England are not so soon as others appalled with the presence of a young lady and her servants.

CHRISTINA TELLS WHITELOCKE, AT THEIR FIRST PRIVATE INTERVIEW, HER OPINION OF CROMWELL, AND INQUIRES IF IT IS REALLY TRUE THAT HE PRAYS AND PREACHES.

WH. [The queen having read his Latin instructions.] I see your majesty understands the Latin perfectly, and will find heer sufficient authority given me for this business.

QU. I have Latin enough to serve my turne, and the authority given to you is very full. Upon what particulars will the Parlement thinke fitt to ground the alliance between the two nations?

WH. If your majesty please, I shall present you with the particulars in writing, in French or Latin, as you shall command.

QU. It will be best in Latin, because I shall take advice in it.

WH. I shall doe it as your majesty directs.

QU. Your generall is one of the gallantest men in the world; never were such things done as by the English in your late war. Your generall hath done the greatest things of any man in the world; the Prince of Condé is next to him, butt short of him. I have as great a respect and honour for your generall as for any man alive; and I pray, lett him know as much from me.

WH. My generall is indeed a very brave man; his actions show it; and I shall not fayle to signify to him the great honour of your majesty's respects to him; and I assure your majesty, he hath as high honour for you as for any prince in Christendome.

QU. I have bin told that many officers of your army will themselves pray and preach to their soldiers; is that true?

WH. Yes, madame, it is very true. When ther enemies are swearing, or debauching, or pillaging, the officers and soldiers of the Parliament's army use to be encouraging and exhorting one another out of the Word of God, and praying together to the Lord of Hosts for his blessing to be with them; who hath showed his approbation of this military preaching by the successes he hath given them.

Qu. That's well. Doe you use to doe soe too?

Wh. Yes; upon some occasions, in my own family; and think it as proper for me, being the master of it, to admonish and speake to my people when there is cause, as to be beholding to another to doe it for me, which sometimes brings the chaplain into more credit than his lord.

Qu. Doth your generall and other great officers doe so?

Wh. Yes, madame, very often, and very well. Nevertheless, they maintain chaplains and ministers in their houses and regiments; and such as are godly and worthy ministers have as much respect, and as good provision in England, as in any place of Christendome. Yet 'tis the opinion of many good men with us, that a long cassake, with a silke girdle, and a great beard, do not make a learned or good preacher, without gifts of the Spirit of God and labouring in his vineyard; and whosoever studies the Holy Scripture, and is enabled to doe good to the souls of others, and indevours the same, is nowhere forbidden by that Word, nor is it blameable. The officers and soldiers of the Parliament held it not unlawful, when they carried their lives in their hands, and were going to adventure them in the high places of the field, to encourage one another out of His Word who commands over all; and this had more weight and impression with it than any other word could have, and was never denied to be made use of butt by the popish prelates, who by no means would admit lay people (as they call them) to gather from thence that instruction and comfort which can nowhere else be found.

Qu. Methinks you preach very well, and have now made a good sermon. I assure you I like it very well.

Wh. Madame, I shall account it a great happiness if any of my words may please you.

Qu. Indeed, sir, these words of yours doe very much please me; and I shall be glad to hear you oftener on this strayne. Butt I pray tell me, where did your generall, and you his officers, learne this way of praying and preaching yourselves?

Wh. We learnt it from a neer friend of your majesty, whose memory all the Protestant interest hath cause to honour.

Qu. My friend! Who was that?

Wh. It was your father, the great king Gustavus Adolphus, who, upon his first landing in Germany (as many then present have testified), did himselfe, in person, upon the shoare, on his knees, give thanks to God for his safe landing, and before his soldiers himselfe prayed to God for his blessing upon that undertaking; and he would frequently exhort his people out of God's Word; and God testified his great liking thereof by the wonderful successes he was pleased to vouchsafe to that gallant king.

CHRISTINA, STRUCK BY WHITELOCKE'S PRUDENCE IN A LONG CONFERENCE OF STATE, BECOMETH CONFIDENTIAL AT ITS CLOSE.

Qu. You speake very fully and truly of the interest of the severall princes and states of Europe. I doe extremely like the busines, and will prepare a memoire of some proposalls concerning it, and give it to you to send into England; butt speed, and vigour, and secrecy are requisite heerin. And I must injoyne you to acquainte nobody with this discourse, butt only your generall Cromwell, whose word I shall relye upon: butt I would not have this matter made knowne to any other whatsoever; and I desire you not to speake of it to any of my own ministers, nor of anything else relating to your negotiation, butt what I shall give way unto.

Wh. Madame, I shall faithfully obey your majesty's commands, and not reveale any tittle of these matters without your permission.

Qu. Have you heard in England that I was to marry the King of Scots?

Wh. It hath bin reported so in England, and that letters have passed between your majesty and him for that purpose; and that your majesty had a good affection for the King of Scots.

Qu. I confesse that letters have past between us; butt this I will assure you, that I will not marry that king: He is a young man, and in a condition sad enough; though I respect him very much, yett I shall never marry him, you may be well assured. Butt I shall tell you, under secrecy, that the King of Scots lately sent a letter to the Prince Palatin, my cousen, and with it the order of a Knight of the Garter to the prince; butt the messenger had the witt to bring it first to me; and when I saw it and had read the letter, I threw it into the fire, and would not suffer the George to be delivered to my cousen.

WHITELOCKE'S DEVICE IN WRITING PRIVATELY TO CROMWELL; ALSO HIS DEVICE IN DELIVERING PRESENTS FROM MR. HUGH PETERS TO CHRISTINA.

Wh. I leave with my generall, or with the secretary of the councill, two glasses of water, which I make: with the one of the waters I write my letters, having two like glasses of waters with myselfe. The letter thus written no man can possibly reade, no more than if it were written with fayre water; butt wash over this letter with the water in the other glasse, and it turns it to blacke, and just as if it had bin written with inke.

Qu. That is a curious way indeed: and have you of those waters heer?

Wh. Yes, madame, I make them myselfe, and have left one of them with my generall; so that no creature can reade his or my letters without them.

Qu. What huge dogge is this?

Wh. It is an English mastiffe, which I brought with me, and it seems as broke loose and followed me even to this place.

Qu. Is he gentle and well conditioned?

Wh. The more courage they have, the more gentle they are; this is both. Your majesty may stroke him.

Qu. I have heard of the fierceness of these dogges; this is very gentle.

Wh. They are very gentle, unlesse provoked, and of a generous kind; no creature hath more mettle or faithfulness than they have.

Qu. Is it your dogge?

Wh. I cannot tell; some of my people told me that one Mr. Peters sent it for a present to the queen.

Qu. Who is that Mr. Peters?

Wh. A minister, and great servant to the Parlement.

Qu. That Mr. Peters sent me a letter?

Wh. He is a great admirer of your majesty; butt to presume to send a letter, or a dogge, for a present to a queen, I thought above him, and not fit to be named to your majesty.

Qu. I have many letters from private persons: his letter and the dogge doe belong to me, and are my goods; and I will have them.

Wh. Your majesty commands in chiefe, and all ought to obey you, and so will I; not only as to the letter and dogge, butt likewise as to another part of his present, a great English cheese of his country making.

Qu. I doe kindly accept them from him; and see that you send my goods to me.

Wh. I will not fayle to obey your majesty.

The queen was pleased to take notice herselfe, and to promise to give order for supply, of some accommodations which were heer wanting to Whitelocke and his company; and so they parted in much drollery.

CHRISTINA INTERESTS HERSELF IN THE DOMESTIC AFFAIRS OF CROMWELL—PROPHESIETH HIS DESIRE TO BE KING, SIMPLE LORD-GENERAL AS HE IS—AND STARTLETH WHITELOCKE WITH SOME DELICATE QUESTIONS, AS ALSO WITH A PIECE OF PLAIN SPEAKING

Qu. Hath your generall a wife and children?

Wh. He hath a wife and five children.

Qu. What family were he and his wife of?

Wh. He was of the family of a baron,* and his wife the like from Bouchiers.

Qu. Of what parts are his children?

Wh. His two sons and three daughters are all of good parts and liberal education.

Qu. Some unworthy mention and mistakes have been made to me of them.

Wh. Your majesty knows that to be frequent; butt from me you shall have nothing butt truth.

Qu. Much of the story of your generall hath some parallel with that of my ancestor, Gustavus the First, who, from a private gentleman of a noble family, was advanced to the title of Marshall of Sweden, because he had risen up and rescued his country from the bondage and oppression which the King of Denmarke had putt upon them, and expelled that king; and for his reward, he was at last elected King of Sweden; and I believe that your generall will be King of England in conclusion.

Wh. Pardon me, madame, that cannot be, because England is resolved into a Commonwealth; and my generall hath already sufficient power and greatness, as generall of all their forces both by sea and land, which may content him.

Qu. Resolve what you will, I believe he resolves to be king; and hardly can any power or greatness be called sufficient, when the nature of man is so prone (as in these dayes) to all ambition.

Wh. I find no such nature in my generall. (!)

Qu. It may easily be concealed till an opportunity serve, and then it will show itselfe.

Wh. All are mortal men, subject to affections.

Qu. How many wives have you had?

Wh. I have had three wives.

Qu. Have you had children by all of them?

Wh. Yes, by every one of them.

* This and knighthood were often confused in that day.

QU. *Par Dieu, vous estes incorrigible !

WH. Madame, I have bin a true servant to your sexe ; and as it was my duty to be kind to my wives, so I count it my happiness, and riches, and strength to have many children.

QU. You have done well ; and if children doe prove well, it is no small nor usuall blessing.

[Much more discourse her majesty moved of private matters, whereby she made experiment if the truth would be told her ; it appearing that the particulars were known to her before, and that she had good intelligence. She was pleased with some earnestness to say].

QU. You are hypocrites and dissemblers.

WH. For myselfe, I can have little of design (especially in your country) to dissemble ; I always hated hypocrisy as a thing unworthy a Christian or a gentleman ; and my generall hath not bin charged with that odious crime.

QU. I do not meane either your generall or yourselfe ; but I think that in England there are many who make profession of more holyness than is in them, hoping for advantage by it.

THE WISE OXENSTIERNE INTERESTED IN CROMWELL.

At this meeting the chanceller inquired much of White-locke concerning Cromwell's age, health, children, family, temper, &c., and said that Cromwell was one of the gallant-men that this age had brought forth, and the things which he had done argued as much courage and wisdom in him as any actions that the world had seen for many years. In which discourse Whitelocke did not omit to doe right to the generall and to the Parlement, and informed the chanceller fully of their courses, actions, counsell, and successes.

NEWS OF CROMWELL'S USURPATION REACHETH STOCKHOLM.

QU. Par Dieu, I beare the same respect, and more, to your generall and to you than I did before ; and I had rather have to doe with one than with many.

WH. I may very well believe it ; and returne thanks to your majesty for the continuance of your respects to England, and to my generall, and to his servant ; your majesty understands he hath a new title, butt his power was not meane before.

QU. It was very great before, and I thinke it greater now, and therefore better for England, butt subject to envy ; and I tell you, under secrecy, that my chanceller would formerly have bin so in Sweden when I was young, but could not attaine it ; butt if he was my enemy, yett I should say that he is a wise and a gallant man ; and if your generall were the greatest enemy I have, yett I should give him his due, that he is a wise and brave man, and hath done the greatest things of any man alive. I much desire his friendship, and am heartily glad of his present condition.

CHRISTINA'S OPINION OF THE PROTECTORATE, AND HER WISE ADVICE.

QU. Sir, you are welcome still to me ; and, if possible, more than before the change.

WH. Madame, it is your goodness and favour to a gentleman, a stranger in your country, who truly honours your majesty ; and you are pleased to show much respect to my generall.

QU. Your generall is a gallant man, and you are fitt to serve any prince in Christendome.

WH. I may without vanity thinke the better of him, and of myselfe, because of your majesty's judgement.

QU. My judgement is, that your affaires in England are much amended, and better established, by this change than before.

WH. We hope that our God will give us a settlement ; and we have found much of his favour therein already, and doubt not of the continuance thereof to us.

QU. Is your new government by a Protector different from what it was before as to monarchy, or is the alteration in all points ?

WH. The government is to be the same as formerly, by successive representatives of the people in Parlement ; only the Protector is the head or chiefe magistrate of the Commonwealth.

QU. He is a gallant man ; and I pray lett him know that no person hath a greater esteem and respect for him than I have.

WH. I presume, then, that his letters to your majesty will not be unwellcome ?

QU. They shall be most wellcome to me.

WH. I then present these new credentials to your majesty from his highnes my lord-protector.

QU. What is the reason that the Protector's name is putt first in the letters ?

WH. The Protector's name, signed by himselfe, is at the bottome of the letter ; and the naming of him first is because he writes to your majesty, and is the constant forme in England used to all other princes and states.

QU. If it be used to other princes, I am satisfied, and expect no other. What is the substance of your new government ?

WH. I shall shew your majesty the instrument of our new government, whereof a copy is sent me ; and I shall reade such parts of it to your majesty in French as may satisfy you.

[Then Whitelocke read unto the queen some parts of the Instrument of Government ; and when he came to the title, she said].

QU. Why is the title protector, when the power is kingly ? WH. I cannot satisfy your majesty of the reasons of this title, being att so great a distance from the inventors of it.

QU. New titles, with sovereign power, proved prejudiciall to the state of Rome.

WH. One of your majesty's ancestors was not permitted to keep the title of Marshall of Sweden.

QU. He was afterwards king, and that will be next for your protector.

WH. That will not be so consonant to our commonwealth as it was to your crown.

QU. It is an honour to our nation that you have looked into the story of it.

WH. It is the duty of an ambassador to study the history of that crown to which he is employed.

QU. It becomes you well ; butt why is your new government so severe against the Roman Catholics ?

WH. It is not more severe against them than it was formerly, and in some things lesse.

QU. Methinks that you, who stand so much for liberty, should allow it to them, as well as to others, in a tolleration of them.

WH. Their principles are held contrary to the peace of the nation, and therefore they are not tolerated the publique exercise of those principles : they hold your majesty's profession and ours to be heretical, and a foreigne power to be above you and above our commonwealth.

QU. Those among them who understand themselves are of another opinion, and it is pittie they should be persecuted for their conscience sake.

WH. We are not for persecution in any point of conscience ; butt we expect a submission to the civil magistrate, and nothing to be done to the disturbance of our peace.

QU. That is fitt to be preserved with all care. Is your protector sacred as other kings are ?

WH. He is not anointed and crowned : those ceremonies were not used to him.

QU. His power is the same with that of king, and why should not his title have been the same ?

WH. It is the power which makes the title, and not the title the power ; our protector thinks he hath enough of both.

QU. He is hardly a mortall man then ; butt he hath brought his buisnes notably to passe, and hath done great things. I give you my hand for it that I have a great value for him.

THE SWEDISH CHANCELLOR OXENSTIERNE DISCUSSETH CROMWELL'S USURPATION WITH WHITELOCKE—SOME HOME TRUTHS EVADED BY THE LAWYER-AMBASSADOR.

CHAN. I doe like your settlement the better, because the power of the Protector is limited by your lawe ; there remains nothing for him now to do butt to gett him a back and breast of Steele.

WH. Without limitation in the power of a chiefe magistrate, it will be hard to distinguish him from a tyrant ; butt what meaneth my father by a back and breast of Steele ?

CHAN. I meane the confirmation of his being Protector to be made by your Parlement, which will be his best and greatest strength.

WH. For your farther satisfaction of the settlednes of government, I have caused the writing or instrument agreed upon in our last change to be translated into Latin, that you may peruse it.

CHAN. Is the Protector and the people bound to an observation of this instrument ?

WH. This is agreed upon as to the rule of government, to oblige both the people to obey it, and the Protector to govern according to it.

CHAN. From whom is this power derived, and given to the Protector ; and who had power to ordaine it to be binding to the people ?

WH. The Parlemtent, then sitting, found the peace of the Commonwealth in danger to be againe disturbed, and the many divisions in the nation hardly to be cured ; they thereupon judged it the best and most expedient way, to prevent the mischiefs threatened, to make choise of a head of the Commonwealth, and the generall to be the fittest and worthiest person for that office and trust ; and therefore

* So Charles II. thought, in a bon mot he seems to have borrowed from the notes Christina. It is related of him that, when the obsequious Whitelocke waited on his majesty at the Restoration to beg his pardon for all he had transacted against him, Charles laughed and said, "Go, go, good Whitelocke, go and live in the country, and take care of your wife and one-and-thirty children!"—Big. Bric, vii, 423.

they, by a solemn writing, did resigne their power and authority into the hands of the generall, and desired him to accept of the government as chiefe magistrate, under the title of Protector; (!) and to this, the officers and soldiers of the armies and navies, the magistrates of London, the principall judges of England, and divers noblemen, gentlemen, and persons of quality and faithfulness to the common interest and peace of the nation, did assent, and were present in a solemne meeting, where he was sworne to observe this instrument; and the people generally, by their acclamations, testified their agreement therunto. (!!!)

CHAN. This seems to be an election by the sword, and prevailling party of the nation; and such precedents in other countries have proved dangerous and not durable.

WH. God hath thus ordered it; and I heare there is a general acquiescence and submission to it, (!) and the supreme law of salus populi seemed to require this change: and though he were the generall that is chosen to be the head, yett the soldiers were not sole, butt joint actors in this designation.

CHAN. Such military elections of the Roman emperors, and in other nations, proved fatal to the publique peace and liberty.

WH. I hope this may prove a means for the conservation of our peace and freedom.

CHAN. Doe you hold this to be an election, or rather a military imposition, of your chiefe governor?

WH. It is certainly a very general agreement of persons in power and authority, and of principall interest in the nation, to sett up this government, and therefore may be hoped to continue as firme as those elections of kings by a few great men only, which was used in yours and the neighbour countries by the senators.

CHAN. Those elections by the senators, formerly made, rayzed great factions, and occasioned much civil tear and misery; therefore our Ricksdagh judged it necessary to alter that course of elections of our kings, and to settle the crown in an hereditary succession, which proves more peacefull and prosperous than those elections.

WH. This was a great change, yett foreign treatyes were still kept with you. I was borne under hereditary kings, and do not disprove of that government; yett I hope our commonwealth, as now constituted, will also flourish, and afford liberty and advantage to the people under it, and be as fixed as any other; and if you (my noble father) have as good an opinion thereof as I have, our treaty will have the better issue.

CHAN. The great doubt will be of the permanency thereof, you being so much subject to changes; and then, how will our treatyes be observed?

WH. I suppose that the treatyes which you made with other states in the names of your elective kings doe yett remaine good, and are observed in the time of your hereditary queen. I come not to treat with you concerning the interest of my generall, now Protector, but concerning the interest of England, and on the behalfe of the Commonwealth and people of England to treat with the crown of Sweden, and on the behalfe of the people of Sweden; and whether the head of either people be called king or queen, or protector, and the nation be called a commonwealth or a kingdom, yett the people's interest is the same, and of equall force att one time or another.

CHAN. Son, I am satisfied with your reasons, and convinced that we may safely proceed in a treaty with you.

CHRISTINA AND HER LADIES AT WHITELOCKE'S MAY-DAY ENTERTAINMENT.

Her majesty, to expresse her contentment in this collation, was full of pleassantes and gayty of spirit, both in supper-time and afterwards: among other frolickes, she commanded Whitelocke to teache her ladies the English salutation; which, after some pretty defences, their lips obeyed, and Whitelocke most readily.

WHITELOCKE STANDETH UP FOR THE HONOUR OF ENGLAND.

[The master of the ceremonies came to Whitelocke from the queen, to desire his company this evening att a masque; and they had this discourse]:

WH. Present my thanks to her majesty, and tell her I will wait upon her.

MR. What would your excellency expect in matter of precedence, as in case you should meet with any other ambassador att the masque?

WH. I shall expect that which belongs to me as ambassador from the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and I know no other ambassador now in this court besides myselfe, except the ambassador of the King of Denmark, who I suppose hath no thoughts of precedence before the English ambassador, who is resolved not to give it him if he should expect it.

MR. Perhaps it may be insisted on, that he of Denmark is not ambassador to the Protector, a new name, and not sucree.

WH. Whosoever shall insist on that distinction will be mistaken; and I understand no difference of power between king and protector, or anointed or not anointed; and ambassadors are the same publique ministers to a protector or commonwealth, as to a prince or sultan.

MR. There hath always been a difference observed between the publique ministers of kings and of commonwealths or princes of inferior titles.

WH. The title of Protector (as to a sovereign title) hath not yett bin determined in the world as to superiority or inferiority to other titles; butt I am sure that the nation of England hath ever bin determined superior to that of Denmark. I represent the nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Protector, who is chiefe of them; and the honour of these nations ought to be in the same consideration now as it hath bin formerly; and I must not suffer any diminution of that honour by my person to please any whatsoever.

MR. I shall propose an expedient to you, that you may take your places as you come; he who comes first, the first place, and he who comes last the lower place.

WH. I shall hardly take a place below the Danish ambassador, though I come into the roome after him.

MR. Butt when you come into the roome, and find the Danish ambassador sett, you cannot help it, though he have the upper place.

WH. I shall endeavour to help it, rather than sit below the Danish ambassador.

MR. I presume you will not use force in the queen's presence.

WH. Master, it is impossible for me, if it were in the presence of all the queens and kings in Christendome, to forbear to use any means to hinder the dishonour of my nation in my person.

MR. I believe the Danish ambassador would not be so high as you are.

WH. There is no reason why he should: he knows his nation never pretended to have the precedence of England; and you, being master of the ceremonies, cannot be ignorant of it.

MR. I confesse your nation alwayes had the precedence of Denmark when you were under a king.

WH. I should never give it from them, though they were under a constable.

MR. If you insist upon it, the Danish ambassador must be uninvited againe, for I perceive that you two must not meet.

WH. I suppose the gentleman would not expect precedence of me.

MR. I can assure you he doth.

WH. I can assure you he shall never have it, if I can help it; butt I pray, master, tell me whether her majesty takes notice of this question of precedence, or did she wish to conferre with me about it?

MR. The queen commandeth me to speake with you about it, hoping that the question might be so composed that she might have the company of you both att her intertainment.

WH. I shall stay at home rather than interrupt her majesty's pleasure, which I should doe by meeting the Danish ambassador, to whom I shall not give precedence, unlesse he be stronger than I.

MR. The queen makes this masque chiefly for your excellence's intertainment, therefore you must not be absent, butt rather the Danish ambassador must be uninvited; and I shall presently goe about it.

[In the evening, according to the invitation from the queen, Whitelocke went to court to the masque, where he did not find the Danish ambassador; butt some of the court tooke notice of the discourse which had bin between the master of the ceremonies and Whitelocke, touching precedence, and they all approved Whitelocke's resolution, and told him that the queen highly commended him for it, and said that he was a stout and faithfull servant to the Protector and to his nation, and that she should love him the better for it; nor was the contest the lesse pleasing, because with the Dane in Sweden.]

WHITELOCKE DANCETH WITH CHRISTINA—A CURIOUS REMARK AFTERWARD.

[After they had done dauncing, and Whitelocke had waited upon the queen to her chayre of state, she sayd to him],

QU. Par Dieu! these Hollanders are lying fellows.

WH. I wonder how the Hollanders should come into your mind upon such an occasion as this is, who are not usually thought upon in such solemnities, nor much acquainted with them.

QU. I will tell you all. The Hollanders reported to me a great while since, that all the noblesse of England were of the king's party, and none butt mechanicks of the Parlement party, and not a gentleman among them; now I thought to trye you, and to shame you if you could not daunce; butt I see that you are a gentleman, and have been bred a gentleman; and that makes me say the Hollanders are lying fellows, to report that there was not a gentleman of the Parlement's party, when I see by you chiefly, and by many of your company, that you are gentlemen.

WH. Truly, madame, in this they told a great untruth to your majesty, as I believe they have done in severall other particulars; I doe confesse that the greatest part of our nobility and gentry were of the king's party, butt many of them likewise were of the Parlement's party; and I, who am sent to waite upon your majesty, can (without vanity) derive to myselfe an antient pedigree of a gentleman.

THE CHANCELLOR OXENSTIERNE TRANSMITTETH ADVICE TO CROMWELL BY HIS AMBASSADOR, WHICH THE AMBASSADOR FORGETTETH TO DELIVER.

CHAN. I shall advise you, att your returne home, to putt the Protector in mind of some particulars, which in my judgement require his speciall care.

WH. I shall faithfully doe it, and I know they will be received with much the more regard, coming from you; and I pray doe me the favour to lett me know them.

CHAN. I would cunnell the Protector to take heed of those dangerous opinions, in matters of religion, which daily increase among you, and, if not prevented and curbed, will cause new troubles; they never resting till themselves may domineer in chief.

WH. Will not the best way to curb them be to slight them, and so they will fall of themselves?

CHAN. I doubt they have taken too much roots to fall so easily; butt if they be not countenanced with preferments, they will the sooner wither and decay.

WH. That will surely lessen them.

CHAN. The Protector must also be carefull to provide money and employment for his soldiers, else he will hardly keep them in order.

WH. That is very requisite; and for money there is good provision already made.

CHAN. He must likewise be watchfull of the king's party, who will be buisy att worke, especially upon the new change.

WH. The care thereof is the life of our affayres, and his highnes is most vigilant.

CHAN. It behoves him to be so, for they that could not vanquish him by armes, will endeavour to doe it by craft, and treachery* of your own party, which you must looke to.

WH. He hath good intelligence of their plots.

CHAN. It will also be prudence in him to lett the people see that he intends not to rule them with an iron scepter, nor to govern them by an army, butt to give them such a liberty and enjoyment of the benefitt of their lawes, that the continuance of his government may become their interest, and that they may have no cause to desire a change; else, though they must beare the yoke for a time, yett as soon as they meet with an opportunity they will shake it off againe.

WH. This is counsell proper to come from such a mind and judgement as yours is, and I shall not fayle to report it to his highnes; and your excellence hath rightly stated the disposition of my countrymen, who love peace and liberty, and will hardly brooke slavery longer than they are forced to it by necessity; and the best way to govern them is, to lett them enjoy their lawes and rights, which will rule them better than an iron scepter.

CHAN. It is the disposition of all generous and free people, as the English are, whom I truly respect, and him that is their head, that gallant person, the Protector.

A YOUTHFUL QUEEN, PROSPEROUS AS SHE IS BELOVED, GROWS TIRED OF STATE AND RESIGNS HER CROWN—THE LORD-AMBASSADOR WHITELOCKE'S WONDERMENT—HE RECOLLECTS THAT CROMWELL ONCE INTENDED TO RETIRE.

[After this discourse, she drew her stooles close to White-locke, and this discourse passed.]

QU. I shall surprise you with something which I intend to communicate to you; butt it must be under secrecy.

WH. Madame, we, that have bin versed in the affayres of England, doe not use to be surprized with the discourse of a young lady; whatsoever your majesty shall thinke fitt to impart to me, and commaund to be under secrecy, shall be faithfully obeyed by me.

QU. I have great confidence of your honour and judgement, and therefore, though you are a stranger, I shall acquaint you with a busines of the greatest consequence to me in the world, and which I have not communicated to any creature; nor would I have you tell any one of it, no, not your generall, till you come to see him; and in this busines I desire your counsell.

WH. Your majesty doth me in this the greatest honour imaginable, and your confidence in me I shall not (through the help of God) deceive in the least measure, nor relate to any person (except my generall) what you shall impart to me; and wherein your majesty shall judge my counsell worthy your receiving, I shall give it you with all sincerity, and according to the best of my poore capacity.

QU. Sir, this it is: I have it in my thoughts and resolution to quitt the crowne of Sweden, and to retire myselfe unto a private life, as much more suitable to my contentment than the great cares and troubles attending upon the government of my kingdome: and what think you of this resolution?

WH. I am sorry to heare your majesty calle it a resolution; and if any thing would surprise a man, to heare such a resolution from a lady of your parts, power, and judgement, would doe it; butt I suppose your majesty is pleased only to drolle with your humble servant.

QU. I speake to you the truth of my intentions; and had it not bin for your coming hither, which caused me to deferre that resolution, probably it might have bin done before this time.

WH. I beseech your majesty deferre that resolution still, or rather wholly exclude it from your thoughts, as unfit to receive any intertainment in your royall breast; and give me your pardon if I speake my poore opinion with all duty and plainnes to you, since you are pleased to require it: can any reason enter into a mind, so full of reason as yours is, to cause such a resolution from your majesty?

QU. I take your plainnes in very good part, and desire you to use freedom with me in this matter. The reasons which conduct me to such a resolution are, because I am a woman, and therefore the more unfit to govern, and subject to the greater inconveniences; that the heavy cares of government doe outweigh the glories and pleasures of it, and are not to be imbraced in comparison of that contentment which a private retirement brings with it.

WH. As I am a stranger, I have an advantage to speake the more freely to your majesty, especially in this great busines; and as I am one who have bin acquainted with a retired life, I can judge of that; butt as to the cares of a crowne, none butt those that weare it can judge of them; only this I can say, that the higher your station is, the more opportunity you have of doing service to God, and good to the world.

QU. I desire that more service to God, and more good to the world may be done, than I, being a woman, am capable to performe; and as soon as I can settle some affayres for the good and advantage of my people, I think I may, without scandall, quitt myselfe of my continuall cares, and enjoy the pleasure of a privacy and retirement.

WH. Butt, madame, you that enjoy the kingdome by right of descent, you that have the full affections and obedience of all sorts of your subjects, why should you be discouraged to continue the reines in your own hands? How can you forsake those who testify so much love to you and liking of your government?

QU. It is my love to the people which causeth me to thinke of providing a better governor for them than a poor woman can be, and it is somewhat of love to myselfe, to please my own fancy, by my private retirement.

WH. Madame, God hath called you to this eminent place and power of queen: doe not act contrary to this call, and disable yourselfe from doing Him service, for which end we are all heer; and your majesty, as queen, hath farre greater opportunities than you can have as a private person, to bring honour to Him.

QU. If another person who may succeed me have capacity and better opportunity, by reason of his sexe and parts, to doe God and his countrey service than I can have, then my quitting the government and putting it into better hands doth fully answer this objection.

WH. I confesse my ignorance of better hands than your owne in which the government may be placed.

QU. My cousen, the Prince Palatin, is a person of excellent parts and abilities for government, besides his valour and knowledge in military affayres; him I have caused to be declared my successor: it was I only that did it. Perhaps you may have heard of the passages between him and me; butt I am resolved never to marry. It will be much more for the advantage of the people that the crowne be on his head than on mine; none fitter than he for it.

WH. I doe believe his royall highnes to be a person of exceeding great honour and abilities for government: you have caused him to be declared your successor, and it will be no injury to him to stay his time; I am sure it may be to your majesty to be perswaded (perhaps designedly) to give up your right to him whilst you live and ought to enjoy it.

QU. It is no designe, butt my owne voluntary act, and he being more active and fitt for the government than I am, the sooner he is putt into it the better.

WH. The better for him indeed. With your majesty's leave, I shall tell you a story of an old English gentleman, who had an active young man to his son, that perswaded the father to give up the management of the estate to the son, who could make greater advantage by it than his father did: he consented, writings were prepared, and friends mett to see the agreement executed to quitt all to the son, reserving only a pension to the father. Whilst this was doing, the father (as is much used) was taking tobacco in the better roome, the parlour, where his rheum caused him to spitt much, which offended the son; and because there was much company, he desired his father to take the tobacco in the kitchen, and to spitt there, which he obeyed. All things being ready, the son calls his father to come and seale the writings: the father said his mind was chauged: the son wondered at it, and asking the reason, the wise old man said the reason was, because he was resolved to spitt in the parlour as long as he lived; and so I hope will a wise young lady. (!)

* Here used by the chancellor as another word for just discontent.

Qu. Your story is very apt to our purpose, and the application proper, to keep the crowne upon my head as long as I live: but to be quitt of it, rather than to keep it, I shall think to be to spitt in the parlour.

Wh. What your majesty likes best is best to you; butt doe you not thinke that Charles V. had as great hopes of contentment by his abdication as your majesty hath, and yett repented it the same day he did it.

Qu. That was by reason of his son's unworthines; butt many other princes have happily, and with all contentment, retired themselves to a private condition; and I am confident that my cousen, the prince, will see that I shall be duely paid what I reserve for my owne maintenance.

Wh. Madame, lett me humbly advise you, if any such thing should be (as I hope it will not), to reserve that countray in your possession out of which your reserved revenue shall be issued; for when money is to be paid out of a prince's treasury, it is not always ready and certaine.

Qu. The Prince Palatin is full of justice and honour; butt I like your counsell well, and shall follow it, and advise further with you in it.

Wh. Madame, I shall be alwayes ready to serve you in any of your commaunds, butt more unwillingly in this than any other. Suppose, madame (as the worst must be cast), that by some exigencies or troubles, your lessened revenue should not be answered and payd, to supply your own occasions; you that have bin mistress of the whole revenue of this crowne, and of so noble and bountifull a heart as you have, how can you beare the abridging of it, or, it may be, the necessary supplies for yourselfe and servants to be wanting to your quality?

Qu. In case of such exigencies, notwithstanding my quality, I am content myselfe with very little; and for servants, with a lacy and a chambermaid.

Wh. This is good philosophy, butt hard to practice. Give me leave, madame, to make another objection: you now are queen and soveraigne lady of all the nations subject to your crowne and person, whose word the stoutest and greatest among them doe obey, and strive to cringe to you: butt when you shall have divested yourselfe of all power, the same persons who now fawne upon you will be then apt to putt affronts and scornes upon you; and how can your generous and royall spirit brooke them, and to be despised by those whom you have raysed and so much obliged?

Qu. I looke upon such things as these as the course of this world, and shall expect such scornes, and be prepared to contemne them.

Wh. These answers are strong arguments of your excellent temper and fittes to continue in your power and government; and such resolutions will advance your majesty above any earthly crowne. Such a spirit as this shewes how much you are above other women, and most men in the world, and, as such a woman, you have the more advantage for government; and without disparagement to the prince, not inferior to him, or any other man, to have the trust of it.

Qu. What opinion have they in England of the Prince Palatin?

Wh. They have a very honourable opinion of him, butt have not heard so much of him as of your majesty, of whom is great discourse, full of respect and honour to your person and to your government.

Qu. I hope I shall testify my respects to your commonwealth in the buisnes of the treaty between us, and that it shall be brought to a good issue, and give satisfaction to us both.

Wh. That doth wholly rest in your majesty's power, to whom I hope to have the favour to offer my reasons in any points wherein there is a difference of opinion between your chanceller and me; and I shall much depend upon your majesty's judgement and good inclinations to my superiors.

Qu. I shall not be wanting in my expressions thereof, and doe hope that the Protector will afford me his assistance for the gaining of a good occasion and place for my intended retirement.

Wh. You will find his highnes full of civility and respects and readines to serve your majesty.

Qu. I shall never desire any thing butt what may stand with the good of both nations; and what doe you judge the best means to procure free navigation through the Sundt?

Wh. I know no other means butt force, the King of Denmarke denying it.

Qu. That is the way indeed; butt what shall then be done with the castles upon the Sundt, and the King of Denmarke's land there?

Wh. If it shall please God to give a blessing to the designe, the castles must either be razed, or they and the island putt into good hands, such as both may trust.

Qu. That is to the purpose; but doe you thinke that England will assist to that end?

Wh. I thinke they will, upon such reasonable conditions as shall be accorded; butt, in such actions, speedy and vigorous prosecution is necessary. The spring should not be lost, against which time preparations are to be made, and your majesty must be pleased to give me your proposals for that buisnes; nor is the present treaty upon my articles to be delayed, they being the foundation of the whole designe.

Qu. You may assure yourselfe that the alliance between the two nations is as good as concluded, and will be done; and I will give you my proposals concerning the Sundt: and if Zeland could be taken from the Dane, and the Protector agree to my living there, it should be the place of my retirement; I would quitt the crowne of Sweden and retire there.

Wh. Your majesty would have the worst part of the bargain; I hope you would then bestow upon your servant the command of one of the castles there.

Qu. With all my heart; butt I believe you doe butt drolle. I will promise you more, that if this buisnes be brought to effect, I shall be willing, if England will consent to it, that you shall have the command of all the island, and of all such Swedish and English forces as shall be placed there; and I should not be willing to putt that trust into the hand of any other stranger whatsoever, so much confidence I have of your worth and honour.

Wh. Your majesty is pleased to putt an exceeding great obligation upon me, and I hope (by the assistance of God) I should approve my faithfulness in any trust reposed in me. I believe my lord-protector would as soon putt this great trust in me as in any other of his servants, and I shall acquaint his highnes with what your majesty mentions.

Qu. I pray doe so; and I shall give you my proposals.

Wh. This discourse putt me in mind of a passage of my generall before I came out of England: he told me he had a mind to quitt his charge, and presently followed an addition of honour to him: the like may be to your majesty, though not in title, yet in good successes.

Qu. All the addition I desire is to be lesse than I am, by a private retirement.

WHITELOCKE RETURNED.—HE RECOUNTS TO CROMWELL, LORD-PROTECTOR OF THE COMMONWEALTH, THE ADVENTURES OF HIS EMBASSY TO CHRISTINA—THE LORD-PROTECTOR'S REMARKS THEREON.

[White Locke came to Whitehall about nine o'clock this morning,* where he visited Mr. Secretary Thurloe, who brought him to the Protector; and he received White Locke with great demonstration of affection, and carried him into his cabinet, where they were together about an hower, and had this among other discourses:]

Pro. How have you enjoyed your health in your long journey, both by sea and land; and how could you endure those hardships you were putt unto in that barren and cold country?

Wh. Indeed, sir, I have endured many hardships for an old craggy carcase as mine is; butt God was pleased to shew much mercy to me in my support under them, and vouchsafing me competent health and strength to endure them.

Pro. I have heard of your quarters and lodging in strawe, and of your diet in your journey: we were not so hardly nor so often putt to it in our service in the army.

Wh. Both my company and myselfe did cheerfully endure all our hardships and wants, being in the service of our God and of our country.

Pro. That was also our support in our hardships in the army; and it is the best support; indeed it is: and you found it so in the very great preservations you have had from daungers.

Wh. Your highnes hath had great experience of the goodnes of God to you; and the same hand hath appeared wonderfully in the preservation of my company and myself from many imminent and great daungers both by sea and land.

Pro. The greatest of all others, I heare, was in your return home upon our coast.

Wh. That indeed, sir, was very miraculous.

Pro. I am glad to see you safe and well after it.

Wh. I have cause to blesse God with all thankfulness for it as long as I live.

Pro. I pray, my lord, tell me the particulars of that great deliverance.

[Therupon White Locke gave a particular account of the passages of that wonderful preservation: then the Protector said,]

Pro. Really these passages are full of wonder and mercy; and I have cause to join with you in acknowledgement of the goodnes of the Lord heerein.

Wh. Your highnes testifies a true sence thereof, and your favour to your servant.

PRO. I hope I shall never forgett the one or the other; indeed, I hope I shall not: butt, I pray, tell me, is the queen a lady of such rare parts as is reported of her?

WH. Truly, sir, she is a lady excellently qualified, of rare abilities of mind, perfect in many languages, and most sorts of learning, especially history, and beyond compare with any person whom I have knowne, understanding the affaires and interest of all the states and princes of Christendome.

PRO. That is very much: butt what are her principles in matters of religion?

WH. They are not such as I could wish they were; they are too much inclined to the manner of that countrey, and to some persuasions from men not well inclined to those matters, who have had too much power with her.

PRO. That is a great deale of pitty; indeed, I have heard of some passages of her, not well relishing with those that feare God; and this is too generall an evil among those people, who are not so well principled in matters of religion as were to be wished.

WH. That is too true; butt many sober men and good Christians among them doe hope, that in time there may be a reformation of those things; and I took the boldnes to putt the queen and the present king in mind of the duty incumbent upon them in that buisnes; and this I did with becoming freedome, and it was well taken.

PRO. I thinke you did very well to informe them of that great duty, which now lyes upon the king; and did he give care to it?

WH. Yes, truly, sir, and told me that he did acknowledge it to be his duty, which he resolved to pursue as opportunity could be had of it; butt he said, it must be done by degrees with a boisterous people, so long accustomed to the contrary; and the like answer I had from the Archbishop of Upsale, and from the chancellor, when I spake to them upon the same subject, which I did plainly.

PRO. I am glad you did so. Is the archbishop a man of good abilities?

WH. He is a very reverend person, learned, and seems very pious.

PRO. The chancellor is the great wise man?

WH. He is the wisest man that ever I conversed with ABROADE, (!) and his abilities are fully answerable to the report of him.

PRO. What character do you give of the present king?

WH. I had the honour divers times to be with his majesty, who did that extraordinary honour to me as to visit me att my house: he is a person of great worth, honour, and abilities, and not inferior to any in courage and military conduct.

PRO. That was an exceeding high favour to come to you in person.

WH. He never did the like to any publike minister; butt this, and all other honour done to me, was butt to testify their respects to your highnes, the which, indeed, was very great, both there and where I past in Germany.

PRO. I am obliged to them for their very great civility.

WH. Both the queen, and the king, and his brother, and the archbishop, and the chancellor, and most of the grantees, gave testimony of very great respect to your highnes, and that not only by their words, butt by their actions likewise.

PRO. I shall be ready to acknowledge their respects upon any occasion.

WH. The like respects were testified to your highnes in Germany, especially by the town of Hambourgh, where I in-deavoured, in your highnes's name, to confirme the privileges of the English merchants, who, with your resident there, showed much kindness to me and my company.

PRO. I shall heartily thanke them for it. Is the court of Sweden gallant and full of resort to it?

WH. They are extreme gallant for their clothes; and for company, most of the nobility, and the civill and military officers, make their constant residence where the court is, and many repaire thither on all occasions.

PRO. Is their administration of justice speedy; and have they many law suits?

WH. They have justice in a speedier way than with us, butt more arbitrary, and fewer causes, in regard that the bores dare not contend with their lords, and they have butt few contracts, because they have butt little trade; and there is small use of conveyances or questions of titles, because the law distributes every man's estate after his death among his children, which they cannot alter, and therefore have the fewer contentions.

PRO. That is like our gavel-kind.

WH. It is the same thing; and in many particulars of our lawes, in cases of private right and of the publike government (especially in their Parlements), there is a strange resemblance between their law and ours.

PRO. Perhaps ours might, some of them, be brought from thence!

WH. Doubtless they were, when the Goths and Saxons, and those northerne people, planted themselves heer

PRO. You met with a barren countrey, and very colde?

WH. The remoter parts of it from the court are extreme barren; butt att Stockholme and Upsale, and most of the great townes, they have store of provisions: butt fatt beeffe and mutton in the winter time is not so plentifull with them as in the countreys more southerly; and their hott weather in summer as much exceeds ours, as their colde doth in winter.

PRO. That is somewhat troublesome to indure; butt how could you passe over their very long winter nights?

WH. I kept my people together, and in action and recreation; by having music in my house, and encouraging that and the exercise of dauncing, which held them by the ears and eyes, and gave them diversion without any offence. And I caused the gentlemen to have disputations in Latine, and declamations upon words which I gave them.

PRO. Those were very good diversions, and made your house a little academy.

WH. I thought these little recreations better than gaming for money, or going forth to places of debauchery.

PRO. It was much better; and I am glad you had so good an issue of your treaty.

WH. I besse God for it, and shall be ready to give your highnes a particular account of it when you shall appoint a time for it.

PRO. I thinke that Thursday next, in the morning, will be a good time for you to come to the councill, and to make your report of the transactions of your negotiations; and you and I must have many discourses upon these arguments.

WH. I shall attend your highnes and the councill.

The treaty thus successfully concluded by Whitelocke is matter of history, and will find mention in the notice of the Protectorate. It was a treaty of commerce between the two countreys, and a prohibition of protection and favour to the enemies of either.

It is pleasant to be able to close these interesting scenes with a happy piece of gallantry on the part of Cromwell. Soon after Whitelocke's return, he sent over his portrait to Queen Christina, inscribed with a Latin epigram, for which the hand of Milton had been right cheerfully employed, and which ran to this effect. "Virgin, powerful in war, queen of the frozen north, bright star of the pole, you see what furrows the toils of the field have traced in my brow, while, already old in appearance, I still retain the energies of a soldier, and pursue the untrod paths of fate, executing the heroic behests of that country with whose welfare I am intrusted. Yet to you I willingly smooth the sternness of my feature; nor shall the royal Christina find that I at all times regard the possessor of a throne with severity."

This portrait, I should add, was seen a century afterward at the court of Stockholm by one of the ambassadors to that court, Isaac Le Heup, Esq., who described it to several gentlemen in this country. It was by Walker, and represented Cromwell in his warrior garb, butt (in delicate compliment to Christina) with a double gold chain (her gift) hanging down his neck to his breast, and pendent from it three crowns, with, below them, a white pearl. These were the arms of Sweden, which, with the gold chain, and a private missive from Christina, imagined in her wildest and most fantastic humour, were said to have rapidly followed Whitelocke to England. The missive was to the effect that, supposing a marriage practicable, she should not hesitate, in Cromwell's favour, to forego her objections to the drudgery of it, since she thought it possible that between them they might get a race of Alexanders. Our notices of Cromwell and Christina may not inaptly close with this characteristic incident, which the grave reader will not indignantly reject altogether as a piece of wild romance, until he shall have read the following extract of a "letter of intelligence" from one of Thurloe's most trustworthy spies stationed at the Hague, and who thus conveys what was the gossip of almost every court at the time:

"Vois doutes, si la Hollande soit cordialement encliné à la paix; mais icy on a plus de sujet de douter, si les

* The original runs thus:

"Bellipotens virgo, septem regna trionum,
Christina, Arctoi lucida stella poli!
Cernis, quas merui ducere sub casside rugas,
Utque -enex, arma impiger, ora tero;
Invia latorum dum per vestigia nitro.
Exequor et populi fortia jussa manu.
At tibi submittit frontem reverenter umbram;
Nec sunt hi vultus regibus usque truces."

Of which, should the reader desire to see an indifferant poetical translation, he has it from Toland:

"Bright martial maid, queen of the frozen zone!
The northern pole supports thy shining throne:
Behold what furrows age and steel can plow;
The helmet's weight oppresses this wrinkled brow.
Through fate's untrodden paths I move; my hands
Still act my freeborn people's bold commands:
Yet this stern shade to you submit its frowns;
Nor are these looks always severe to crowns."

Cromwell
Anglois on 130 soyent voutablement enclins à la paix. Les Orange party Royalists Cromwell
145 and 146 icy soustiennent fort et ferme, que 130 af-Scotland
fecte le droit de 138. L'on en raille, disant que l'effigie de
Queen of Sweden
141 pend en sa chambre : que la femme de 130 en soit ja-
Cromwell
loux ; auroit dit 130 voudroit bien, que je fusse morte ; cars
Queen of Sweden
alors nussy tost il espousera cette 141."

F.

A New Ballad to the Tune of Cock-Lorrell.

Will you hear a strange thing ne'er heard of before,
A ballad without any lies :

A Parliament that is turn'd out of door,
And a council of state likewise ?

*Brave Oliver came to the House like a sprite,
His fiery look struck the speaker dumb :*
" You must be gone hence, " quoth he ; " by this light,
Do y' intend to sit here till doomsday come ? "

With that the speaker look'd pale for fear,
As if he had been with the nightmare rid,
In so much that some did think that were there
That he ev'n did as the alderman did.

But Oliver, though he be doctor of law,
Yet seem'd to play the physician here,
Whose physic so wrought in the speaker's maw,
That it gave him a stool instead of his chair.

Sir Arthur thought Oliver wond'rous bold,
I mean that knight that was one of the five,
For he was loth to lose his freehold ;
But needs must he go whom the devil doth drive.

And gone he is for the north country,
In hope thereabout to make some stir ;
But in the mean time pray take it from me,
Brave Arthur must yield to brave Oliver.

Harry Martin wonder'd to see such a thing
Done by a knight of such high degree,
An art which he could not expect from a king,
Much less from such a John Doria as he.

But Oliver, laying his hand on his sword,
Upbraided him with his adultery.
Then Martin gave him never a word,
But humbly thank'd his majesty.

Allen the coppersmith was in great fear,
He did us much harm since the war begun,
A broken cit was he many a year,
And now he's a broken Parliament-man.

Bold Oliver told him what he had been,
And him a cheating knave did call,
Which put him into a fit of the spleen,
For now he must give an account for all.

It went to the heart of Sir Harry Vane
To think what a terrible fall he should have,
For he that did once in the Parliament reign
Was call'd, as I hear, a dissembling knave.

Bradshaw, that president, bold as a pope,
Who loves upon kings and princes to trample ;
Now the House is dissolved, I cannot but hope
To see such a president make an example.

Now room for the speaker without the mace,
And room for the rest of the rabble rout :
My masters, methinks it's a pitiful case,
Like the snuff of a candle thus to go out.

Some like this change, and some like it not ;
For they say they are sure it was done in due season :
Some say it was the Jesuits' plot,
Because it resembled the gunpowder treason.

*Some think that Cromwell with Charles is agreed,
And say 'twere good policy if it were so,*
Lest the Hollander, French, the Dane, and the Swede,
Do bring him in whether he will or no.

And now I would gladly conclude my song
With a prayer, as ballads are wont to do ;
But yet I'll forbear, for I think, ere 't be long,
We may have a king and a Parliament too.
July 13, 1653.

G.

A Sketch of the Civil Wars to the Protectorate of Richard Cromwell, in a Letter from Maidstone, of Oliver's Household, to John Winthrop, Esq., Governor of the Colony of Connecticut in New-England.

SIR,—Your kind remembrance of mee in Mr. Hooke's letter covered mee with no small shame, that I have neglected a person of soe signal worth, as all reportes I meet with present you in, especially when it is attended with the consideration of the obligations your father's memorie hath left upon me.

Yet may I not be soe injurious to myselfe as to acknowledge that the long omission of writing to you proceeded from forgetfulness. The frequent discourse I have made of your selfe and honoured father have created testimony sufficient to vindicate mee from such ingratitude. But the perpetual hurry of distressing affaires, wherein for some yeares I have been exercised, deprived mee of gaining a fit opportunity of conveying letters. And this is briefly and truly the cause of soe long an intermission. For mee now to present you with a relation of the unheard of dealing of God towards his people in these nations, is not my designe ; partly because I believe you have heard much of it, but principally because such a worke would better become a voluminous chronicle than a short epistle. For it would weary the wings of an eagle to measure out the wayes wherein God hath walked, with all the turnings and intricacys that are found in them. The quarrel, at first commenced betwixt king and Parliament, was grounded upon a civil foundation : the king accusing them of invading his prerogative, and the House charging him with the breach of their priviledges, and consequently the invassalaging the people represented by them. When this argument had for some time been agitated by as hot and bloody a war as this latter age hath seen, it fell at last to be managed (on the Parliament side) by instruments religiously principled, in whose hand it received so many evident testimonies of God's extraordinary presence and conduct, that in conclusion a period was put to it, the king made a prisoner, and all his expectation of rescue utterly defeated and cut off. While the matter stood in this posture, great debates, solicitous consultations and cabals are held, in order to settlement ; for these transactions (according to the constant product of all such things) had created factions and divisions betwixt persons of equal worth in point of parts, and (as themselves thought) of ballancing merit, to receive the reward of soe great and hazardous an undertaking as they had gone thorow. The parties instantly dividyd themselves (or rather did appeare dividyd, for they had been soe before) under the heales of Presbtery and independency. The former had the advantage in number, the ministry generally adhering to them ; the latter in having been the active instrument by whose valour and conduct the king was brought from a pallace to a prison, and thereby were possess of the militarie power of the nation ; by helpe whereof, and having many friends in the House of Commons against the minde of the major part, they first secluded them, and then set aside the House of Lords ; and by a co-operation with the House of Commons then sitting (whom they owned as the supreme power of the nation), the king was brought to tryall before an high court of justice (consisting of members of Parliament, officers of the army, and others), and proceeded against to execution.

This act was highly displeasing to many, who with equal zeal and forwardness had assisted in the war, inasmuch that the difference which the king's party put between them that fought with him and those that take away his life, they exprest in this proverb : that the Presbyterians held him by the hays, till Independants cut off his head. Yet have the former struggled hard ever since to doe something that might render them under a better character as to their covenant and loyalty to the king. The peace of the nation being thus settled, and the king's family and offspring departed into foreign places, his eldest son, the Prince of Wales, travelled into the Netherlands, where (after some short time) application was made to him by the most serious and prudent party of Scotland (amongst whom I know some to be as choyce men as most I have been acquainted with for wisdom and true holynesse, for soe it becomes mee to judge), who presented to him the consideration of the stupendous judgments of God upon him and his (father's) house, and prest upon him the sense of it, endeavouring to reduce him to Scotland, in order to restore him to his dominions, upon hope that he might be instrumental to honour God, and re-establish publique peace. To this he gave very fayre returns, and in a short time shipt himself for Scotland, and arrived there, where he was honourably entertained by that which is called the Kirk party, and is, indeed, the religious party of that nation ; by them he was crowned King of Scotland, and soe brought into a capacity of action.

The Kirk party had now the command of him and the nation ; but another party had a greater roome in his heart, having been constant to his father when the other had raysed war against him. These dividyd under two heades, called Resolutioners and Protesters.

The Parliament of England by this time grew awakened, foreseeing that this whole action was calculated to the perfect capacity of Scotland, imposing a king upon England, of which they were evinced by more than probable arguments ; to obviate which they resolve to send a potent army, under the command of General Cromwell (the Lord Fairfax refusing that service, upon the influence of Presbyterians, as was said), that Scotland might be rendered the seat of war, and soe made less able to annoy England. This accordingly was done; an invasion made from England; Scotland put into armes to resist it, whereby they wearied and wasted the English army, and forced it (in a miserable condition) to retreat for England, had they not, at Dunbar, out of pure necessity, enforced an engagement to their own destruction; for the defeat then given to the Scotch army was as signal as any thing in the whole war. The advantage of number and men fit for fight was very great, but that which is most observable is the quality of the persons; for Presbiterie being the golden ball that day, I am credibly informed that thousands lost their lives for it (after many meetings, debates, and appeals to God betwixt our English officers and them), of as holy, praying people as this island or the world affordes.

The Lord-general Cromwell was a person of too great activity and sagacity to lose the advantage of such a victory, and therefore marcht his army to Edinburgh, and possest himself of that place, lay'd siege to the strong castle in it, and distrest it till it submitted, being soe situated as not to be enter'd by onslaught, nor undermined, by reason of the rocke on which it is built. There he spent the winter, but was not idle, for in that time many strong places became subject to him: by this means the young king had opportunity to fall in with his beloved party called the Resolutioners. His interest likewise wrought here in England, caried on by the Presbyterian party; and in this quarrel, honest Mr. Love, who doubtless was a godly man, though indiscreet, lost his head, and many of his brethren were endangered, being detained prisoners till General Cromwell came home and procured their release. But before that, his continuance in Scotland was a time of great action, wherein he soe distressed the king, as he enforced him to march with all the force he could make for England; but being close pursued by the English horse, under the command of General Lambert (a prudent, valiant commander, and a man of gallant conduct), and resisted by force rayed in England, he was compelled to make a halt at Worcester city, till the lord-general, with a body of the army, advanced thither, and after a short time totally defeated his army, himselfe escaping very hardly, and afterwards (with great difficulty) conveyed himselfe beyond the seas. The idea of the stocks of honour which General Cromwell came invested with to London, after this crowning victorie (superadded to what God had before clothed him with, not only by his achievements in England, but those in Scotland, which I pretermitted, because, being grounded on those barbarous massacres, the habitable world sounded with the noise of them), will in my silence present itself to your imagination. He had not long continued here before it was strongly impress upon him by those to whom he had no reason to be utterly incredulous, and strengthened by his own observation, that the persons then called the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, as from whom he had derived his authority, and by virtue whereof he had fought soe many holy men in Scotland into their graves, were not such as were spirited to carry the good interest to an end, wherein he and they had jeopardied all that was of concern to them in this world; and I wish cordially that there had not been too great a ground for those allegations. The result of them, after many debates betwixt the members then sitting and the general, with some who joyined with him, was the dissolution of that Parliament by a military force, since called by a softer word, interruption. Great dissatisfaction sprung from this action, and such as is not yet forgotten amongst good men; for let the reasons and end be never so good upon which the general acted this part, yet, say they, 'twas high breach of trust in him to overthrow that authority, in defence of which God had appeared, and made him soe significant an instrument; yet factum valet, say others, who were not well satisfied neither; and now care is used to settle fluctuating Britain.

In order to which, the lord-general, by his authority (which was but military), summons one hundred persons out of all parts of the nation (with competent indifferency and equality) to represent the nation, and invests them with legislative authority. They meet and accept it, assume the title of Parliament, and sit in the House of Commons, and enact sundry lawes; but in a short time made it appear to all considering and unprejudiced men that they were hinc negotio impares, non obstante their godliness; of which the more judicious of them being sensible, contrived the matter soe as to dissolve themselves by an act of their owne, and resolve their authority, whence they first derived it, upon the general. It was not long before he was advised to assume the government of this nation in his single capacity, limited with such restrictions as were drawne up in an instrument of government framed to that purpose. This he accepted of, and (being by it with due ceremonie in Westminster Hall inaugurated) he assumed it accordingly. According to one of the articles in it, he summoned a House of Commons at Westminster the September following, of which House I had the honour to be a member. The House, consisting of many disobliged persons (some upon the king's account, and others upon a pretence of right to sit upon the former foundation, as not being legally, though forcibly dissolved; and others judging that the powers given by the instrument of government to the Protector were too large, professing that though they were willing to trust him, yet they would not trust his successors with soe large a jurisdiction), fell into high animosities, and after five months spent in framing another instrument instead of the former [which they said they could not swallow without chewing], they were by the Protector dissolved.

This was ungrateful to English spirits, who deify their representatives; but the Protector's parts and interest enabled him to stemme this tyde. Yet the weight of government incumbent too heavily upon him, before many years passed he summoned another Parliament, and his experience guided him to concur with them in a new instrument to governe by. In it they would have changed his title, and made him king, and I thinke he had closed with them in it, not out of lust to that title [I am perswaded], but out of an apprehension that it would have secured [in a better way] the nation's settlement; but the party to whom the Protector ever professed to owe himself [being the generality of his standing friends] rose so high in opposition to it (by reason of the scandal that thereby would fall upon his person and profession), as it diverted him, and occasioned him to take investiture in his government, though from them, yet under his former title of Protector.

As in former cases, this found acceptance with many, but was dissatisfactory to a greater number.

The instrument of government made in this Parliament, and to which the Protector tooke his oath, was called the humble Petition and Advice.

In it provision was made for another House of Parliament instead of the old Lords, that this might be a screen or balance betwixt the Protector and Commons, as the former Lords had been betwixt the king and them.

Thes to consist of seventy persons, all at first to be nominated by the Protector, and after as any one dyed, a new one to be nominated by him and his successors, and assented to by themselves, or without that consent not to sit: twenty of them was a quorum. It was noe small taske for the Protector to finde idoneous men for this place, because the future security of the honest interest seemed [under God] to be layd up in them; for by a mortal generation (if they were well chosen at first), like foundationals in the gathering of a church, they would propagate their owne kinde when the single person could not, and the Commons (who represented the nation) would not, having in them, for the most part, the spirit of those they represent, which hath little affinity with or respect to the cause of God. And indeed, to speake freely, soe barren was the island of persons of quality spirited for such a service, as they were not to be found, according to that of the apostle, 1 Cor., i. 26: "Yee see your calling, not many wise, nor noble," &c. This forced him to make it up of men of meane ranke, and consequently of lesse interest, and upon tryall too light for ballance, too thin for a screen, and upon the point ineffectual to answer the designe, being made a scorn by the nobility and gentry, and generality of the people; the House of Commons continually spurning at their power, and spending large debates in controverting their title, till at length the Protector (finding the distempers which grew in his government, and the dangers of the publique peace thereby) dissolved the Parliament, and soe silenced that controversy for that time. And that was the last that sat during his life, he being compelled to wrestle with the difficulties of his place, soe well as he could, without Parliamentary assistance, and in it met with soe great a burthen, as [I doubt not to say] it dranke up his spirits, of which his natural constitution yielded a vast stocke, and brought him to his grave; his interment being the seed-time of his glory, and England's calamity. Before I passe further, pardon mee in troubling you with the character of his person, which, by reason of my nearnesse to him, I had opportunity well to observe.

His body was well compact and strong, his stature under 6 foote [I believe about two inches]. his head soe shaped as you might see it a storehouse and shop both; a vast treasury of natural parts. His temper exceeding fiery, as I have known, but the flame of it kept downe for the most part, or soon allayed with those moral indowments he had. He was naturally compassionate towards objects in distresse, even to an effeminate measure; though God had made him a heart wherein was left little room for any fear but what was due to himselfe, of which there was a large proportion, yet did he exceed in tendernes towards sufferers. A larger soul, I thinke, hath seldom dwelt in a house of clay than his was. I doe believe, if his story were impartially transmitted, and the unprejudiced world well possest with it, she would adde him to her nine worthies, and make up that number a decemviri. He lived and dyed in comfortable communion with God, as judicious persons near him well observed. He was that Mordcai that sought the welfare of his people, and spake peace to his seed; yet were his temptations such as it appeared frequently that he that hath grace enough for many men may have too little for himself; the treasure he had being but in an earthen vessel, and that equally defiled with original sin, as any other man's nature is. He left successor in the Protectorship his eldest son, a worthy person indeed, of an obliging nature and religious disposition, giving great respect to the best of persons, both ministers and others, and having to his lady a prudent, godly, practical Christian. His entrance into the government was with general satisfaction, having acceptance with all sorts of people, and addresses from them, importing so much. It was an amazing consideration to me [who, out of the experience I had of the spirits of people, did fear confusion would be famous Oliver's successor] to see my fears so confuted, though, alas! the sin of England soon shewed that they were not vain fears; for in a short time some achings in the army appeared, tending to debase the Protector of the power of it. This bred some jealousy and unkindness betwixt him and the officers of it; but it was allayed, and things looked fayre again. About this time writs were sent out to summons a Parliament, which accordingly sat down, in March following. The power of the Protector and that of the other House was instantly controverted in the House of Commons, which House consisted of a tripartite interest, viz., the Protector's, the Commonwealth's [as it was so called by some, though groundlessly enough], and Charles the King of Scots; each party striving to carry an end their own design, syding one whyle with one, another whyle with another obstructed settlement, and acted nothing but what tended to leave religion and sobriety naked of protection. The vigilant army observed this, and disposed themselves to prevent this growing evil: in order to it, keep general counsellors, publish remonstrances, and make addresses. The Parliament, fearing the co-ordinacy [at least] of a military power with the civil, forbid the meetings of the army. The army resent this soe ill, as by a violent impression they prevayle with the Protector to dissolve the Parliament. This he did animo tam reluctant, that he could not conceal his repentance of it, but it broke out upon all occasions. The army, observing it, reflected on him as a person true to the civil interest, and not fixed to them; and the officers, keeping general counsellors, in a few days resolve to depose him, and restore the members of Parliament dissolved by the first Protector, in the year 53, to the exercise of their government again, in order [as they ridiculously stiled it] to the settling of a commonwealth. The nation resented this act of the army exceedingly ill, the godly party being generally much dissatisfied with it, in regard the persons brought together were for the most part disobliging to anything of reason or sobriety, soe that they inslaved the people to the lusts of a few men, as it soon appeared from this the officers of the army and all in civil power derived their authority, and they seemed to have brought all under perfect subjection. But their deportment waxed too swelling for the army to bear long; for upon an insurrection rayed in the west by Sir George Booth, a secluded member, in behalf of a free Parliament, forces were sent against him under General Lambert, by whom Sir George was soone reduced and made a prisoner. This so elevated the ruling men in Parliament, as they began to increase the thickness of their fingers. The army, fearing they would not rest till they had brought them to Rehoboth's scantling, make complaint to them by way of remonstrance, out of which egg a bird sprang, that made new division, or, rather, renewed the old betwixt them, till it came to another interruption. This put us into so great distemper, as one regiment marcht against another, some for the Parliament, others against them, and drew up near Westminster Hall, even to push of pike, but God in mercy kept them from ingaging, soe that noe blood was spilt. The House, thus disturbed, used its interest to reditigate its power: members meet in private cabals about it. They send into Scotland to General Monke, who was placed there by the old Protector, commander-in-chiefe of the force of that nation. To him they claime of the breach of trust by the army here, and by them of the violence offered to Parliament. This Monke resents ill, and declares for the Parliament against the army. The army in England meet in counsell; they choose the Lord Fleetwood captain-general of all the forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland; send letters to Monke for accommodation; appoint a committee of safety for the publique peace, made up of many chief officers of the army, and others of the best quality they could get; declare a resolution to call a new Parliament; appoint a committee to draw a platforme of government for the three nations. Whyle this was acting, the nations grew into a flame, greatly bating any government introduced by the sword; soe the officers of the army, and committee of safety, and all begun to draw heavily, and in a few weeks, by the revolt of the soldiery, which began first at Portsmouth, was seconded by the fleet, and generally false in with by the private soldiers, their wheeles fell off, and left them on the ground. The members of Parliament returned to sit, all the officers that were looked upon as having a hand in their interruption set aside, though to other things indemnified. Thus far was Jotham's parable in the case of Abimelech and the men of Shechem realized in this matter also. General Monke advances now to London, and is there honourably entertained: he is invited into London, courted and careeced there, upon hope he would introduce the King of Scots, whose interest grew all this whyle, and the generality of the people exprest intenesse upon it, abuse the Parliament, and affront (to violence) the speaker at his lodgings, and the members walking in the streets.

In this interim the House dismisses Sir Henry Vane from sitting in it, as a person that had not been constant to Parliament privileges; and Major Salaway, a person of great parts, and Sir Henry Vane's second in most things, with some others who acted in the committee of safety. Yet were they greatly prest by declarations from the people, who, though they were pleased with the dishonour put on Sir Henry Vane [he being unhappy in lying under the most catholique prejudice of any man I know], yet, partly dissatisfied with the seclusion of the members of 48, and partly thirsting after their liberties in free Parliament, were restless and impetuous.

General Monke is now earnestly applied to by the greatest part of the citizens of London, and the members of Parliament, who were secluded in the year 48, to restore them to the exercise of their trust. In that capacity, after some debate of some of the then sitting members concerning this matter, without further consent obtained from the then sitting members, and without their privy, they were by the general brought into the House. They sat not three weekes before they by act of Parliament dissolved themselves, and made provision for a succeeding Parliament, which is to sit down the 25th day of the next month. In this time they made sundry acts: one about the ministry, to the advantage of Presbiterie; another, in which they settled a militia distinct from that of the army, put into such commissioners' hands, for the most part, as are for the king's interest. They likewise settled a counsell of state, consisting of one-and-thirty very prudent and sober men, and of good interest as to civil concerns.

But to draw to a period, and trouble you no longer with this discourse: the interest of religion lyes dreadfully on the dust; for the eminent professors of it having achieved formerly great victories in the war, and thereby great power in the army, made use of it to make variety of changes in the government; and every of those changes hazardous and pernicious, and dissatisfactory in one considerable respect or other.

They were all charged upon the principles of the authors of them, who, being Congregational men, have not only made men of that persuasion cheape, but rendered them odious to the generality of the nation; and that the rather, because General Fleetwood, who married the Protector's daughter, and the Lord Desborow, who married his sister, were principal instruments [as is apprehended, though I thinke not truly of Fleetwood] in overthrowing the family from which they had their preferment and so many signal kindnesses. It is not to be exprest what reproach it brought upon profession of religion by this means, and what a foundation layd to persecute it out of England, if that party prevayles; for demonstration is made by experience, that professors were not more troublesome and factious in times of peace, before the wars of England began, and the great instruments of them, than they have been imperious, self-seeking, trust-breaking, and covenant-violating since they were invested with power. And whether this scandal will goe, or what the effects of it will be, the Lord knows; but to be sure, as Solomon says, he that breaks a hedge, a serpent will bite him; and this is fulfilled upon them, who have been the greatest hedge-breakers that I have known. And as there is a woe pronounced to the world by our Saviour because of offences, soe there is a redundant woe to them by whom those offences come.

I have cause to believe that you have met with most of what I have here communicated to you, in a better dresse, from some other hand; if soe, I entreat the pardon of your stomake for my crambe bis coctum. I also entreat your advice by the next opportunity, concerning friends here, what encouragement persons may have, if times press them, to transport their families into New-England, with some general directions of doeing to the best advantage.

I doe promise myselfe this fruit of my writing, that as it may renew our intercourse, and kindle the former coales of love, soe it will provoke you with greatest fervency to lay the sad state of our affaires here before the Lord, whose name is greatly ingaged in them; for the rage of the enemy is swelled to an intollerable height, and his mouth set against the heavens. God hath great cause now to feare the enemy and the avenger. And this is our last refuge, for we have fortified all to the utmost. I pray present me to my cousin your wife, under the character of a person ready, though unable to serve her. Accept of the like tender from, sir, your real servant and unworthy kinsman,

Jo. MAIDSTONE.

Westminster, March 24, 1659.

If you shall give yourself the trouble at any time of honouring mee with a letter, you may please to direct it to Pond House, at Boxted, in Essex, where my father lived: it is three miles from Colchester.

These for his honourable friend and kinsman, John Winthorpe, Esq., governor of the colonie of Connecticut, in New-England.

H.

Specimens of the Court Circular in Cromwell's Protectorate.

"Nov. 11. This day the most illustrious lady, the Lady Frances Cromwell, youngest daughter of his highness the Lord Protector, was married to the most noble gentleman, Mr. Robert Rich, son of the Lord Rich, grandchild of the Earl of Warwick, and of the Countess Dowager of Devonshire, in the presence of their highnesses, and of his grandfather and father, and the said countess, with many other persons of high honour and quality. The solemnities of the happy nuptials were continued and ended with much honour."
—Merc. Pol., Nov. 5 to 12, 1657.

"Nov. 19. Yesterday afternoon, his highness went to Hampton Court, and this day the most illustrious lady, the Lady Mary Cromwell, third daughter of his highness the Lord Protector, was there married to the most noble lord, the Lord Faulconbridge, in the presence of their highnesses, and many noble persons. Friday, 20. Their highnesses, with the said lord and lady, returned from Hampton Court."
—Merc. Pol., Nov. 19 to 26, 1657.

I.

Some Extracts from a Description of Cromwell's Lords.

RICHARD CROMWELL, eldest son of the Protector (so called), a person of great worth and merit, and well skilled in hawking, hunting, horse-racing, with other sports and pastimes; one whose undertakings, hazards, and services for the cause cannot well be numbered or set forth, unless the drinking of King Charles's, or, as is so commonly spoken, his father's landlord's health; whose abilities in praying and preaching, and love to the sectaries, being much like his cousin Dick Ingoldsby's, and being so very likely to be his father's successor, and to inherit his noble virtues, in being the light of the eyes, and breath of the nostrils of the old heathenish popish laws and customs of the nation, especially among the learned, the University of Oxford have therefore thought fit, he being also no very good scholar, to choose him their chancellor.

Henry Lawrence, a gentleman of a courtly breed and a good trencher-man, who, when the bishops ruffled in their pride and tyranny, went over to Holland, afterward came back, and became a member of the Long Parliament; fell off at the beheading of the late king and change of the government, for which the Protector, then lieutenant-general, with great zeal declared, "That a neutral spirit was more to be abhorred than a Cavalier spirit, and that such men as he were not fit to be used in such a day as that, when God was cutting down kingship root and branch;" yet came in play again, upon design, in the Little Parliament, and contributed much to the dissolving of them, as also setting up the Protector, and settling the Instrument of Government and a single person, affirming, "That other foundation could no man lay." For which worthy services, and as a snare or bait to win over, or at least quiet the baptized people, himself being under that ordinance, he was made and continued president of the Protector's council, where he hath signed many an arbitrary and illegal warrant for the carrying of honest, faithful men to prisons and exile without cause, unless their not apostatizing with them from just and honest principles. His merits are great and many, being every way thorough-paced, and a great adorer of kingship: so as he deserveth, no doubt, and is every way fit, to be taken out of the Parliament, to have the third place of honour, and negative voice in the other House over the people of these lands.

Colonel Desborough, a gentleman or yeoman of about sixty or seventy pounds per annum at the beginning of the wars, who, being allied to the Protector by marriage of his sister, he cast away his spade and took a sword, and rose with him in the wars, and in like manner, upon the principles of justice and freedom, advanced his interest very much; if he were not of the Long Parliament, he was of the little one, which he helped to break. Being grown considerable, he cast away the principles by which he rose, and took on principles of violence and tyranny, and helped to set up the Protector, for which he was made one of his council, and one of the generals at sea, and hath a princely command at land, being major-general of divers counties in the west, as also one of the lords of the Cinque Ports.

Lord-viscount Lisle, eldest son of the Earl of Leicester, was of the Long Parliament to the last, and at the change of government, and making laws of treason against a single person's rule, and, no question, concurred with the rest therein; he was also of the Little Parliament, and of all the Parliaments since; was all along of the Protector's council, and was never to seek; who having learned so much by changing with every change, and keeping still like his father-in-law, the Earl of Salisbury, and Peter Sterry, on that side which hath proved trump, nothing need farther be said of his fitness, being such a man of principles, to be taken out of the Parliament to have a settled negative voice in the other House over all the good people of these lands, he being a lord of the old stamp already, and, in time, so likely to become a peer.

Sir Gilbert Pickering, knight of the old stamp, and of a considerable revenue in Northamptonshire, one of the Long Parliament, and a great stickler in the change of the government from kingly to that of a commonwealth; helped to make those laws of treason against kingship; hath also changed with all changes that have been since; he was one of the Little Parliament, and helped to break it, as also of all the Parliaments since; is one of the Protector's council; and, as if he had been pinned to his sleeve, was never to seek; is become high-steward of Westminster; and, being so finical, spruce, and like an old courtier, is made lord-chamberlain of the Protector's household or court, so that he may well be counted fit and worthy to be taken out of the House to have a negative voice in the other House, though he helped to destroy it in the king and Lords. There are more besides him, that make themselves transgressors, by building again the things which they once destroyed.

Walter Strickland, some time agent or ambassador to the Dutch in the Low Countries from the Long Parliament, and a good friend of theirs, at length became a member of that Parliament; was also of the Little Parliament, which he helped to break; was of the Parliament since, and is now of the Protector's council. He is one that can serve a commonwealth, and also a prince, so he may serve himself and his own ends by it; who, having so greatly profited by attending the Hogan Mogans, and become so expert in the ceremony postures, and thereby so apt like an ape, with his brother Sir Gilbert and the president, to imitate or act the part of an old courtier in the new court, was made captain-general of the Protector's magpye, or gray-coated foot-guard in Whitehall, as the Earl of Holland formerly to the king; who, being every way of such worth and merits, no question can be made or exception had against his fitness to be taken out of the Parliament to exercise a negative voice in the other House over the people of this Commonwealth.

Sir Charles Ouseley, a gentleman who came something late into play on this side, being converted from a Cavalier in a good hour. He became one of the Little Parliament, which he helped to break, and to set the Protector on the throne; for which worthy service, he was, as he well deserved, taken in to be one of his council; was also of the Parliaments since; a man of constancy and certainty in his principles much like the wind; and, although he hath done nothing for the cause whereby to merit, yet is he counted of that worth as to be every way fit to be taken out of the Parliament to have a negative voice in the other House over such as have done most and merited highest in the cause, the Protector and his fellow-negative men excepted, and over all the Commonwealth besides.

Mr. Rouse, one of the Long Parliament, and by them made provost or master of Eton College; he abode in that Parliament, and helped to change the government into a commonwealth, and to destroy the negative voice in the king and Lords; was also of the Little Parliament, and their speaker; who, when the good things came to be done which were formerly declared, and for not doing of which the old Parliament was prettily dissolved, being an old bottle, and so not fit to bear that new wine, without putting it to the question, left the chair, and went with his fellow old bottles to Whitehall, to surrender their power to the general, which he as speaker, and they by signing a parchment or paper, pretended to do. The colourable foundation for this apostacy, upon the monarchical foundation being thus laid, and the general himself, as Protector, seated thereon, he became one of his council, good old man, and well he deserved it, for he ventured hard. He was also of the Parliaments since, and, being an aged, venerable man, all exceptions set aside, may be counted worthy to be taken out of the House to have a negative voice in the other House over all that shall question him for what he hath done, and over all the people of these lands besides, though he would not suffer it in the king and Lords.

Colonel Sydenham, a gentleman of not very much per annum at the beginning of the wars, was made governor of Malcomb Regis, in the west; became one of the Long Parliament, and hath augmented his revenue to some purpose; he helped, no question, to change the government, and make those laws of treason against kingship; was also of the Little Parliament, and of those that were since; one also of the Protector's council, hath a princely command in the Isle of Wight, is one of the commissioners of the treasury, by all which he is grown very great and considerable.

Colonel Montague, a gentleman of Huntingdonshire, of a fair estate, a colonel formerly in the association army under the Earl of Manchester, where he for some time appeared, while Colonel Pickering lived, to be a sectary, and for laymen's preaching, as also a lover of the rights and freedoms of the people, rather than of the principle he now acts by; but, that honest colonel dying, some other things also coming between, he became of another mind. He gave off being a soldier about the time of the new model, it is likely upon the same account with Colonel Russell; did not greatly approve of beheading the king, or change of the government, or the army's last march into Scotland, as the Protector, then general, may witness; yet, after the war was ended at Worcester, and the old Parliament dissolved, he was taken in, though no change appearing from what he was before, to be of the Little Parliament, which he helped to break, and to set up monarchy anew in the Protector, which he designedly was called to do; for which worthy service he was made one of the council, a commissioner of the treasury, and one of the generals at sea. He was of the Parliaments since; all which considered, none need question his fitness to be a lord, and to be taken out of the House to have a negative voice in the other House, not only over the treasury and seamen, but all the good people of these lands besides.

Commissioner Lisle, some time a counsellor in the Temple; one of the Long Parliament, where he improved his interest to purpose, and bought state lands good cheap; afterward became a commissioner of the great seal, and helped in Parliament to change the government from king to Parliamentary, or of a commonwealth; changed again to king, or of a single person; and did swear the Protector at his first installing chief magistrate, to the hazard of his neck, contrary to four acts of Parliament, which he helped to make, with others, that make it treason so to do. He hath lately retired for sanctuary into Mr. Rowe's church, and is still commissioner of the seal; and being so very considerable in worth and merit, is also fit to be taken out of the House to have a negative voice in the other House over the good people, and all such who shall any way question him. He is since made president of the high court, so called, of justice.

Treason never prospers: what's the reason?
For, when it prospers, none dare call it treason.

Chief-justice Glyn, some time a counsellor at law, and steward of the court at Westminster, formerly one of the Long Parliament, and that helped to bait the Earl of Strafford and bring him to the block, was recorder of London, and one of the eleven members impeached by the army of treason, and by that Parliament committed to the Tower; the Protector, through apostasy, assuming the government, took him up and made him a judge, and, finding him so fit for his turn, did also make him chief-justice of England; so that, of a little man, he is grown up into great bulk and interest, and of complying principles to the life; who, being so very useful to advance and uphold the Protector's great negative voice, is thereby unquestionless, in his sense, fit to be taken out of the House, and to have a negative voice himself in the other House, not only over the people, but over the law he is to be chief judge of, and in a capacity to hinder that no good law, for the future, be made for the ease of the people, or to hurt of the lawyers' trade.

Bulstrode Whitelocke, formerly a counsellor at law, one of the Long Parliament, profited there, and advanced his interest very greatly; became one of the commissioners of the great seal, one that helped to change the government, and make laws against a single person's rule. In the time of the Little Parliament, he went ambassador to Sweden in great state; that Parliament being dissolved, he agitated there for the Protector, then came over; and, when some alteration and pretended reformation was made in the chancery, he stood off from being any longer a commissioner of the seal, and became one of the supervisors of the treasury at one thousand pounds per annum salary. He is one who is guided more by policy than by conscience, and being, on that account, the more fit for the Protector's service, there is no question to be made of his worth and merit to be taken out of the House to have a negative voice in the other House over the people there, though he helped to put it down in the king and Lords.

Mr. Claypole, son of Mr. Claypole in Northamptonshire, now Lord Claypole. He long since married the Protector's daughter; a person, whose qualifications not answering those honest principles, formerly so pretended to, of putting none but godly men into places of trust, was a long time kept out; but, since the apostasy from those principles, as also the practice brake in, and his father-in-law (the head thereof) came to be Protector, he was then judged good enough for that dispensation, and so taken in to be master of his horse, as Duke Hamilton to the king. Much need not be said of him; his relation, as son-in-law to the Protector, is sufficient to bespeak him every way fit to be taken out of the House and made a lord; and, having so long time had a negative voice over his wife, Spring Garden, the ducks, deer, horses, and asses in James's Park, is the better skilled how to exercise it again in the other House over the good people of these nations, without any gainsaying or dispute.

Colonel Pride, then Sir Thomas, now Lord Pride, some time an honest brewer in London, went out a captain upon the account of the cause, fought on, and in time became a colonel; did good service in England and Scotland, for which he was well rewarded by the Parliament; with cheap debentures of his soldiers and others, he bought good lands at easy rates; gave the Long Parliament a purge, fought against the king and his negative voice, and was against the negative voice of his brethren, the lords spiritual and temporal, being unwilling to have any in the land; but hath now changed his mind and principles with the times, and will fight for a negative voice in the Protector, and also have one himself, and be a lord, for he is a knight of the new order already, and grown very bulky and considerable. It is hard to say how the people will like it. However, his worth and merits, rightly measured, will, no question, render him fit to be taken out of the House to be one of the other House, and to have a negative voice, not only over the bears, but all the people of these lands, though he did formerly so oppose and fight against it; and the noble lawyers will be glad of his company and friendship, for there is now no fear of his hanging up their gowns by the Scottish colours in Westminster Hall, as he formerly so greatly boasted and threatened to do.

Colonel Hewson, then Sir John, now Lord Hewson, some time an honest shoemaker or cobbler in London, went out a captain upon the account of the cause, was very zealous, fought on stoutly, and in time became a colonel; did good service both in England and Ireland; was made governor of Dublin, became one of the Little Parliament, and of all the Parliaments since; a knight also of the new stamp. The world long so well amended with him, and the sole so well stitoned to the upper leather, having gotten so considerable an interest and means, he may well be counted fit to be taken out of the House to be a lord, and to have a negative voice in the other House, over all of the gentle craft, and cordwainers company in London, if they please. But, though he be so considerable, and of such merit in the Protector's, as also in his own esteem, not only to be a knight, but also a lord, yet it will hardly pass for current with the good people of these lands if being so far beyond the last; neither will they think him fit (saving the Protector's pleasure) to have a negative voice over them, though he formerly fought so stiffly against it in the king and Lords, in order to set them free.

Colonel Barkstead, then Sir John, now Lord Barkstead, some time a goldsmith in the Strand of no great rank, went out a captain to Windsor Castle, was some time governor of Reading, got at length to be a colonel, then made lieutenant of the Tower by the old Parliament. The Protector (so called), finding him fit for his turn, continued him there, and also made him major-general of Middlesex in the decimating business, and assistant to Major-general Skippon in London. He is one to the life to fulfil the Protector's desires, whether right or wrong, for he will dispute no commands, nor make the least demur, but, in an officious way, will rather do more than his share. His principles for all arbitrary things whatsoever being so very thorough, let friends or foes come to his den, they come not amiss, so he gets by it; yea, rather than fail, he will send out his armed men to break open other men's houses, and seize their persons, and bring them to his jail, and then, at his pleasure, turn them out. He hath erected a principality in the Tower, and made laws of his own, and executes them, in a martial way, over all comers, so that he hath great command, and makes men know his power. He was of the latter Parliaments; is one of the commissioners, like the bishop's pander's in the king's days, for suppressing truth in the printing presses, an oppression once the army so greatly complained of; is, for sanctuary, gotten in to be a member of Mr. Griffith's church; is also knighted after the new order, and, the better to carry on the Protector's interest among the ear-bored slavish citizens, is lately become an alderman, so that he hath advanced his interest and revenue to purpose. His titles and capacities, emblazoned, will sufficiently argue his worth and merits, and speak him out fully to be a man of the times, and every way deserving to be yet greater, and, Haman-like, to be set higher: all which considered, it would seem a wrong not to have taken him out of the House, and made him a lord of the other House.

Colonel Ingoldsby, a gentleman of Buckinghamshire, allied to the Protector. He betook himself to the wars on the right side, as it happened, and in time became a colonel. A gentleman of courage and valour, but not very famous for any great exploits, unless for beating the honest inkeeper of Aylesbury in Whitehall, for which the Protector committed him to the Tower, but was soon released. No great friend of the sectaries (so called), or the cause of freedom then fought for, as several of his then and now officers and soldiers can witness; and, although it be well known, and commonly reported, that he can neither pray nor preach, yet, complying so kindly with new court, and being in his principles of kingship, as also a colonel of horse, and the Protector's kinsman, he may well be reckoned fit to be taken out of the House and made a lord.

Colonel Whaley, formerly a woollen draper, a petty merchant in London, whose shop being out of sorts, and his cash empty, not having wherewithal to satisfy his creditors, he fled into Scotland for refuge till the wars began; then took on him to be a soldier, whereby he hath profited greatly; was no great zealot for the cause, but, happening on the right side, he kept there, and at length was made commissary-general of the horse. He was of these latter Parliaments, and, being so very useful and complying to promote the Protector's designs, was made major-general of two or three companies. He is for a king, or protector, or what you will, so it be liked at court; is, with his little brother Glyn, grown a great man, and very considerable, and wiser, as the Protector saith, than Major-general Lambert; who having, with his fellow-lords, Claypole and Howard, so excellent a spirit of government over his wife and family, being also a member of Thomas Goodwin's church, no question need be made of his merit of being every way fit to be a lord, and to be taken out of the House to have a negative voice in the other House over the people, for that he "never, as he saith, fought against any such thing as a negative voice."

Colonel Goffe, now Lord Goffe that would be, some time Colonel Vaughan's brother's apprentice (a salter in London), whose time being near or newly out, betook himself to be a soldier instead of setting up his trade; went out a quartermaster of foot, and continued in the wars till he forgot what he fought for; in time became a colonel, and, in the outward appearance, very zealous and frequent in praying, preaching, and pressing for righteousness and freedom, and highly esteemed in the army on that account, when honesty was in fashion; yet having, at the same time, like his general, an evil tincture of that spirit that loved and sought after the favour and praise of man more than that of God (as, by woful experience in both of them, hath since appeared), he could not further believe or persevere upon that account, but by degrees fell off. And this was he who, with Colonel White, brought musketeers, and turned the honest members, left behind in the Little Parliament, out of the House. Complying thus kindly with the Protector's designs and interest, he was made major-general of Hampshire and Sussex; was of the late Parliament; hath advanced his interest greatly, and is in so great esteem and favour at court, that he is judged the only fit man to have Major-general Lambert's place and command as major-general of the army; and, having so far advanced, is in a fair way to the Protectorship hereafter, if he be not served as Lambert was. He, being so very considerable a person, and of such great worth, there is no question of his deserts and fitness to be taken out of the House to be a lord, and to have a negative voice in the other House; the rather, for that he "never, in all his life, as he saith, fought against any such thing as a single person or a negative voice, but only to put down Charles and set up Oliver," and hath his end.

Colonel Berry. His original was from the iron-works, as a clerk or overseer; betook himself to the wars on the Parliament side; profited greatly in his undertaking, and advanced his interest very far; who, though he wore not the jester's coat, yet, being so ready to act his part and please his general, in time he became a colonel of horse in the army, afterward a major-general of divers counties, a command fit for a prince, whereof he might learn to lord it in an arbitrary way beforehand at his pleasure.

Colonel Cooper, some time a shopkeeper, or salter, in Southwark, a member of Thomas Goodwin's church, one formerly of very high principles for common justice and freedom, like his brother Tichborn. The army, then in Scotland, sending into England for faithful, praying men to make officers of, the honest people in the borough recommended him to the general in order to have a command; who accordingly went down, but left his principles behind him, and espoused others; was made colonel at the first dash, and, though he began late, yet hath so well improved his interest, that he hath already gotten as many hundreds per annum as he had hundred pounds when he left his trade. He hath a regiment of foot in Scotland, and another in Ireland, where he is major-general of the North, in Venable's room, and governor of Carrickfergus, so as he is in a very hopeful way to be a great man indeed.

Alderman Pack, then Sir Christopher, now Lord Pack. His rise formerly was by dealing in cloth; near the beginning of the Long Parliament was made an alderman; was then very discreet, and meddled little, more like a neuter or close malignant than a zealot for the cause; was a commissioner of the customs, also sheriff and lord-mayor of London, next after Alderman Viner. The Protector taking on him the government, the sunshine of the new court pleased him, and brought him in full compliance. He was one of the last Parliament, and zealous to re-establish kingship in the person of the Protector, and judged the only meet man to bring the petition into the House, praying him to accept of and take it upon him, which, though he then refused, yet, as is reported, hath since repented his then refusal.

Alderman Tichborn, then Sir Robert, knight of the new stamp, now Lord Tichborn. At the beginning of the Long Parliament, when a great spirit was stirring for liberty and justice, many worthy petitions and complaints were made against patentees, the bishops, and the Earl of Strafford. He being the son of a citizen, and young, fell in and espoused the good cause and principles then on foot, and thereby became very popular, and was greatly cried up by the good people of the city, &c. His rise was first in the military way, where he soon became a colonel, and by the Parliament made lieutenant of the Tower of London; and, though he was a colonel, yet never went out to fight, but became an alderman very timely, and then soon began to cool and lose his former zeal and principles, and left off preaching, as his pastor, Mr. Lockyer, did the church, to his brother George Cockain. He was afterward sheriff and lord-mayor in his turn; was also of the committees for the sale of state lands, whereby he advanced his interest and revenue considerably. Out of zeal to the public, he offered the Parliament to serve them freely as a commissioner of the customs, whereby he supplanted another, and planted himself in his room, and then, with the rest of his brethren, petitioned the committee of the navy for a salary, and had it; notwithstanding he was so well rewarded for his pains, after he had pretended to serve them for nothing, yet, with his brother, Colonel Harvey, and Captain Langham, came off bluely in the end. He was of the Little Parliament, and helped to dissolve it; one of the late Parliament also. He hath, by degrees, sadly lost his principles, and forgotten the good old cause, and espoused and taken up another; being so very officious for the new court interest, and such a stickler for them, he is become a great favourite; it is not hard to read his change, it being in so great letters. All things considered, he is, no question, fit to be called Lord Tichborn.

Sir Francis Russel, knight baronet of the old stamp, a gentleman of Cambridgeshire, of a considerable revenue. In the beginning of the wars was first for the king, then for the Parliament, and a colonel of foot under the Earl of Manchester; a man, like William Sedgwick, high flown, but not serious or substantial in his principles. He continued in his command till the new model, then took offence, and fell off or was laid aside by them; no great zealot in the cause, therefore not judged honest, serious, or wise enough to be of the Little Parliament, yet was of these latter Parliaments: is also chamberlain of Chester, at about £500 per annum. He married his eldest daughter to Henry Cromwell, second son of the Protector, then colonel of horse, now lord-deputy, so called, of Ireland; another to Colonel Reyoulds, a new knight, and general of the English army in France, under Cardinal Mazarin, since, with Colonel White and others, cast away coming from Mardike. There is no question but his principles are for kingship and the new court, being so greatly concerned therein; wherefore it were great pity if he should not also be taken out of the House to be a lord of the other House, his son-in-law being so great a lord, and have a negative voice over Cambridgeshire, and all the people of these lands besides.

Sir William Strickland, knight of the old stamp, a gentleman of Yorkshire, and brother to Walter Strickland; was of the Parliament a long time, but hath now, it seems, forgotten the cause of fighting with, and cutting off the late king's head, and suppressing the Lords their House, and negative voice. He was of these latter Parliaments, and of good compliance, no question, with the new court, and settling the Protector anew in all those things for which the king was cut off; wherefore he is fit, no doubt, to be taken out of the House and made a lord; the rather, for that his younger brother, Walter, is so great a lord, and by whom, in all likelihood, he will be steered to use his negative voice in the other House over Yorkshire, and the people of these lands, to the interest of the court.

Sir Richard Onslow, knight of the old stamp, a gentleman of Surrey, of good parts, and a considerable revenue. He was of the Long Parliament, and with much ado, through his policy, steered his course between the two rocks of king and Parliament, and weathered some sore storms. Was not his man taken in his company, by the guard of Southwark, with commissions of array in his pocket from the king, and scurrilous songs against the Roundheads? Yet, by his interest, rode it out till Colonel Pride came with his purge, then suffered loss, and came no more in-play till about Worcester fight; when, by the help of some friends in Parliament, he was empowered to raise, and lead as colonel, a regiment of Surrey-men against the Scots and their king, but came too late to fight, it being over. Being popular in Surrey, he was of the latter Parliaments, is fully for kingship, and was never otherwise, and stickled much among the seventy kinglings to that end ; and, seeing he cannot have young Charles, old Oliver will serve his turn, so he have one ; so that he is very fit to be Lord Onslow, and to be taken out of the House to have a negative voice in the other House over Surrey, if they please, and all the people of these lands besides, whether they please or not.

Mr. John Fiennes, son of the Lord Say, and brother to Commissioner Fiennes ; brought in, it is likely, for one upon his score, is, in a kind, such a one as they call a secretary, but no great stickler ; therefore, not being redeemed from the fear and favour of man, will, it is probable, follow his brother, who is, as it is thought, much steered by old subtlety, his father, that lies in his den, as Thurloe by his Mr. St. John, and will say No with the rest when anything opposes the interest of the new court, their power, and greatness, and may therefore pass for one to be a lord.

Sir John Hubbard, knight baronet of the old stamp, a gentleman of Norfolk, of a considerable estate, part whereof came lately to him by the death of a kinsman. He was of these later Parliaments, but not of the former ; had meddled very little, if at all, in throwing down kingship, but hath stickled very much in helping to re-establish and build it up again ; and a great stickler among the late kinglings, who petitioned the Protector to be king. His principles being so right for kingship and tyranny, he is in great favour at court, as well as Dick Ingoldsby, and, no question, deserves to be a lord.

Sir Thomas Honeywood, knight of the old stamp, a gentleman of Essex, of a considerable revenue. He was a committee-man in the time of the Long Parliament, and also a military man, and led, as colonel, a regiment of Essex-men to the fight at Worcester ; came in good time, and fought well against kingship and tyranny in the house of the Stewarts ; was of the last Parliament. He is not so wise as Solomon, or so substantial and thorough in his principles for righteousness and freedom as Job (chap. xxix.), but rather soft in his spirit, and too easy, like a nose of wax, to be turned on that side where the greatest strength is. Being, therefore, of so hopeful principles for the new court interest, and so likely to comply with their will and pleasure, no doubt need be made of his fitness to be a lord.

Mr. Hampden, now Lord Hampden, a young gentleman of Buckinghamshire, son of the late Colonel Hampden, that noble patriot and defender of the rights and liberties of the English nation, of famous memory, never to be forgotten, for withstanding the king in the case of ship-money ; being also one of the five impeached members which the said king endeavoured to have pulled out of the Parliament, whereupon followed such feud, war, and shedding of blood. This young gentleman, Mr. Hampden, was the last of sixty-two, which were added singly by the Protector, after the choice of sixty together ; it is very likely that Colonel Ingoldsby, or some other friend at court, got a cardinal's hat for him, thereby to settle and secure him to the interest of the new court, and wholly take him off from the thoughts of ever following his father's steps, or inheriting his noble virtues ; as likewise, that the honest men in Buckinghamshire, and all others that are lovers of freedom and justice, that cleaved so cordially to, and went so cheerfully along with his father in the beginning of the late war, might be out of all hopes of him, and give him over for lost to the good old cause, and inheriting his father's noble spirit and principles, though he doth his lands. He was of the latter Parliament, and found right, saving in the design upon which he was made a lord after the rest, and the Protector's pleasure. It is very hard to say how fit he is to be a lord, and how well a negative voice over the good people of this land, and his father's friends in particular, will become the son of such a father, and how well the aforesaid good people, now called secretaries, will like of it ; but, seeing it is as it is, let him pass for one as fit to be taken out of the House, with the rest, to have a negative voice, and let him exercise it in the other House over the good people for a season.

K.

Procession, with ceremony of the Investiture and Installation of His Highness Oliver Cromwell, as by the Parliament appointed to be performed in Westminster Hall, on June 26, 1657, written by me, Edmund Prestwick, of the city of London, an eye and ear witness to all that passed on this glorious occasion. Now set forth by me, John Prestwick, Esq.

In Westminster Hall, at the upper or south end thereof, there was built an ascent, whereon was placed the chair of Scotland, brought for this purpose out of Westminster Abbey, and here set under a prince-like canopy of state. Before his highness, and below him, was set a table covered with pink-coloured velvet of Genoa, fringed with fringe of gold. On this table, besides the Bible, sword, and sceptre of the Commonwealth, were pens, ink, paper, sand, wax, &c., &c.

Before this table, on a chair, sat Sir Thomas Widdrington, the speaker to his highness and the Parliament. At some distance were seats built scaffold-wise, like a theatrum, where, on both sides, sat the members of his highness's Parliament, and below were places for the aldermen of London and the like.

After all things were thus ordered, the Protector came forth out of the council-room adjoining to the Lords' House, and in the order following proceeded into the Hall :

First went his highness's gentlemen, two and two.

A herald.

Aldermen of London, two and two.

A herald.

Edmund Prideaux, his highness's attorney-general.

The judges following of both benches.

John Glyn, lord-chief-justice.

Peter Warburton and Richard Nudigate.

Justices of the Upper Bench.

Barons of his highness's Exchequer.

Robert Nicholas.

John Parker.

Roger Hill.

Norroy king-at-arms.

Commissioners of the Treasury.

Commissioners of the Great Seal of the Commonwealth, and their officers, viz. :

Commissioner Nathaniel lord Fiennes, carrying the Great Seal.

Commissioner John lord Lisle.

William Lenthal, master of the Rolls.

Officers attending, viz. :

Henry Middleton, sergeant-at-arms.

Mr. Brown and Mr. Dove.

Garter king-at-arms.

Before the Protector came, first,

Robert earl of Warwick, with the sword of the Commonwealth, bare-headed, on the right hand ; and on the left, the lord-mayor, Tichborn, carrying the sword of the city of London, bare-headed.

His highness, OLIVER CROMWELL, richly dressed, habited with a costly mantle of estate, lined with ermines, and girt with a sword of great value ; his highness's train supported by three generals, bare-headed, and armed with drawn swords.

Close to his highness followed the members or lords of the other House, i. e., House of Lords, in order, two and two.

In like manner, in order, two and two, were the members of the Parliament, as knights of the counties, citizens of the cities, and burgesses of the boroughs and towns, and barons of the Cinque Ports, of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland ; of which first came those of England, the county of Middlesex, and the northern counties leading the way, as Yorkshire, Lancashire, Northumberland, and so in like manner.

Besides these were many persons of distinction, and no small number of Scotch and Irish nobles.

INSTALLATION OF HIS HIGHNESS.

The Protector, with loud acclamation, was enthroned, being seated in the chair of state ; on the left hand thereof stood the lord-mayor, Tichborn, and the Dutch ambassador ; the French ambassador, and Robert earl of Warwick, on the right.

Behind the Protector stood his son, Lord Richard Cromwell ; Charles lord Fleetwood, lieutenant-general of the army ; John lord Claypole, master of the horse to his highness ; and the privy council, of whom, as of the nobility, were the Earl of Manchester, Lord Wharton, and Lord Mulgrave, the rest being very much their inferiors. Upon a lower descent stood the Lord-viscount Lisle, Lords Montague and Whitelocke, with drawn swords.

The heralds, in the name of his highness and the Commonwealth, commanding silence, then the speaker (Sir Thomas Widdrington), in the name of the Parliament, presented to his highness, Oliver Cromwell, a rich and costly robe of purple velvet, lined with ermines ; a Bible, ornamented with bosses and clasps, richly gilt ; a rich and costly sword ; and a sceptre of massy gold. At the delivery of these things, the speaker made a short comment upon them, and on the ceremonies thereof, which he addressed to the Protector, dividing them into four parts, viz. :

" First, the robe of purple ; this is an emblem of magistracy, and imports righteousness and justice. When you have put on this vestment, I may say you are a gownman. This robe is of a mixed colour, to show the mixture of justice and mercy. Indeed, a magistrate must have two hands, plectentem et amplexentem, to cherish and to punish.

" Second, the Bible is a book that contains the Holy Scriptures, in which you have the happiness to be well versed. This Book of Life consists of two Testaments, the Old and New. The first shows Christum velatum ; the second, Christum revelatum : Christ veiled and revealed. It is a book of books, and doth contain both precepts and examples for good government.

"Third, here is a sceptre, not unlike a staff, for you to be a staff to the weak and poor. It is of ancient use in this kind. It is said in Scripture that 'the sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shilo come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.'!! It was of the like use in other kingdoms. Homer, the Greek poet, calls kings and princes sceptre-bearers.

"Fourth, the last is a sword; not a military, but a civil sword. It is a sword rather of defence than offence; not to defend yourself only, but your people also. If I might presume to fix a motto upon this sword, as the valiant Lord Talbot had upon his, it should be thus: Ego sum Domini Protectoris, ad protegendum Populum meum; I am the Lord Protector's, to protect my people."

This comment or speech being ended, the speaker, Sir Thomas Widdrington, took the Bible, and gave the Protector his oath.

After the administration of the oath, Mr. Manton, who for this purpose was appointed, made and delivered a prayer, wherein he recommended the Protector, Parliament, council, the forces by land and sea, government and people of the three nations, to the protection of God; which being ended, the heralds, by loud sound of trumpet, proclaimed his highness, Oliver Cromwell, Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, commanding and requiring all persons to yield him due obedience. Then did the trumpets again sound, and the people with loud shouts cried, "Long live his highness! long live his highness! long live his highness! huzza, huzza, huzza!"

Silence being commanded, and his highness being respectfully saluted, he rose from the chair of state, and descending, proceeded as follows, himself leading the way.

The Protector;

His train carried up by the Lord Sherard, Warwick's nephew, and Lord Roberts, his eldest son. After followed those who had before marched in the first of the procession; the Protector and these returning in the same posture to the great gate or entrance of the Hall, without which was a state coach to receive his highness.

The Protector being now seated in his coach; with him, sitting opposite at one end, was Robert earl of Warwick, Lord Richard Cromwell, his son, and Bulstrode lord Whitelocke, in one, and Philip lord-viscount Lisle and Lord Montague in the other boot, with swords drawn; and the Lord Claypole, master of the horse, led a horse of honour in rich caparisons to Whitehall. The members, two and two, proceeded to the Parliament House, where they prorogued their sitting to the 20th of January.

At night were great proclamings of joy and gladness, both in London, Westminster, and the surrounding towns, villages, and hamlets. On this occasion, for his highness and the Parliament, were ensigns armorial of their power; which signs or tokens of honour were commanded to be engraven and cut on seals for the sealing and stamping all public writings.

The great seal of the Commonwealth was a large circle, having thereon the Protector bareheaded, mounted on mareback, attired in a short coat or jacket of mail, over which was a military sash, placed over his right shoulder and under his left arm, tied behind; pendant to his left side, a large and broad sword, his right hand grasping the head of a truncheon, which he holds before him, one end resting on the pommel of the saddle, his left hand holding the bridle. Behind, on the space on the sinister side, and near the top, was a civic shield, with four quarters: the first and fourth, with the cross of St. George, for England; 2d, the saltire, or cross of St. Andrew, for Scotland; and, third, the harp of King David, for Ireland. On the margin of this side the seal, these words, Oliverius. Dei. Gra. Reip. Anglia. Scotia. et Hibernia. &c. Protector. On the other side of the broad seal, the like arms as that for proclamations, as before described, only with this difference, the mantling lambequin'd with four doublings or folds: on the margin of this side, Magnvm. Signillum. Reipub. Anglia. Scotia. et Hibernia.

L.

The Death, Funeral Order, and Procession of His Highness the Most Serene and Most Illustrious Oliver Cromwell, late Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging. The whole of this faithfully copied from the MS. of the Rev. John Prestwidge, Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford.

His highness's first illness was at Hampton Court, where he sickened of a bastard tertian, of which he grew very ill, insomuch that after a week's time his disease began to show very desperate symptoms, whereupon he was removed to Whitehall, Westminster, near London, where his chaplains, and others of his family, kept private meetings and fastings for his recovery. Continuing in this condition, his highness died on Friday, the third of September, at three of the clock in the afternoon, in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred and fifty-eight. His body, presently after his expiration, was washed and laid out; and being opened, was embalmed, and wrapped in a sere cloth six double, and put into an inner sheet of lead, enclosed in an elegant coffin of the choicest wood. Owing to the disease he died of, which, by-the-by, appeared to be that of poison, his body, although thus bound up and laid in the coffin, swelled and burst, from whence came such filth, that raised such a deadly and noisome stink, that it was found prudent to bury him immediately, which was done in as private a manner as possible. For the solemnization of the funeral, no less than the sum of sixty thousands pounds was allotted to defray the expense.

The corpse being thus quickly buried, by reason of the great stench thereof, a rich coffin of state was, on the 26th of September, about ten at night, privately removed from Whitehall, in a mourning hearse, attended by his domestic servants, to Somerset House, in the Strand, where it remained in private for some days, till all things were prepared for public view; which being accomplished, the effigy of his highness was, with great state and magnificence, exposed openly, multitudes daily crowding to see this glorious but mournful sight, which appeared in the order following.

FUNERAL ORDER.

First. The first room where the spectators entered was wholly hung and covered with black; and at the upper end of this room was placed a cloth and chair of state.

In the like manner of the first room were two others, namely, the second and third, all having funeral escutcheons very thick upon the walls; and guards of partisans were placed in each room for people to pass through.

The fourth room was completely hung with black velvet, the ceiling being of the same. Here lay the effigy of his highness, with a large canopy of black velvet-fringed, which hung over it. The effigy was of wax, fashioned like the Protector, and placed lying upon its back: it was apparelled in a rich and costly suit of velvet, robed in a little robe of purple velvet, laced with a rich gold lace, furled with ermine. Upon the kirtle was a large robe of purple velvet, laced and furled as the former, with strings and tassels of gold. The kirtle was girt with a rich embroidered belt, wherein was a sword richly gilt, and hatched with gold, which hung by the side of this effigy. In the right hand was a sceptre; in the left, a globe. Upon his head was placed a purple velvet cap, furled with ermines suitable to the robes. Behind the head was placed a rich chair of tissue gold, whereon was placed an imperial crown, which lay high, that the people might behold it.

BED OF STATE.

The bed of state whereon he lay was covered with a large pall of black velvet, under which was a Holland sheet, borne up by six stools covered with cloth of gold. About the bed was placed a complete suit of arms; and at the feet of the effigy stood his crest. This bed had fixed about it an ascent of two steps. A little from thence stood eight silver candlesticks about five feet high, with white wax tapers standing in them of three feet long. All these things were environed with rails and balusters, four square, covered with velvet; at each corner whereof there was erected an apright pillar, which bore on their tops lions and dragons, who held in their paws streamers crowned. On both sides of the bed were set up, in sockets, four great standards of the Protector's arms, with banners and bannets in war, painted upon taffeta. About the bed stood men in mourning, holding in their hands black wands, and also standing bareheaded; and without the rails stood others, in like manner, whose office it was to receive people in, and turn them out again.

When this public wake or funeral had been kept for many weeks together, so that all strangers, &c., had seen it fully, then did the following change take place, and the whole scene became altered. The effigies being removed into another inner room, it was there set up, placed upon an ascent, under a cloth of state, being vested as it was before lying, only now his purple velvet was changed for a crown. In the same manner (as formerly) were men waiting upon him bareheaded. In this manner he continued until the 23d of November, which day was appointed to carry him with all solemnity to Westminster Abbey.

THE FUNERAL PROCESSION

This great funeral was performed with very great majesty, in this manner following. All things being in readiness, the waxen effigies of the Protector, with a crown on his head, a sword by his side, a globe and sceptre in his hands, was taken down from his standings, and laid in an open chariot, covered all over with black velvet. The streets, from Somerset House to Westminster Abbey, were guarded by soldiers, placed without a railing, and clad in new red coats, with black buttons, with their ensigns wrapped in cypress. These made a lane, to keep off spectators from crowding the procession.

The PROCEEDING to the Funeral of the most noble and puissant Oliver, Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, from Somerset House in the Strand, unto the Abbey Church of Westminster, on Thursday, the 23d of November, 1658.

Colonel Biscoe, knight marshal, on horseback, with his black truncheon, tipped at both ends with gold.

Richard Gerald, deputy marshal, on horseback, with his black truncheon, tipped with silver.

Marshal's men, 13, on horseback, with the knight marshal. Two conductors of the poor men of Westminster, with black staves.

Poor men of Westminster, two and two, in mourning gowns and hoods.

Two conductors more, with black staves.

Poor men in gowns, two and two, in number 82.

Two conductors more, with black staves, in cloaks.

Servants to gentlemen, esquires, knights, baronets, two and two.

Two porters of the gate, with their staves.

Six drums, with the arms of Ireland.

Six trumpets, with banners of Ireland.

The standard of Ireland, borne by Colonel Le Hunt and Major Crooke, close mourners.

One in a cloak, to bear up the train of the standard.

A horse, covered with black cloth, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by Mr. Tenant, equerry, in a cloak, and a groom in a coat to attend and lead away the horse.

Inferior servants.

The household kitchen, 8; his highness's kitchen, 7; hall-place, 5; scullery, 1.

Door-keepers. James's Park. Committee of the Army. Committee of the Admiralty. The Compting-house. Under-keepers of parks, 2; watermen, 28; Richard Nutt, master of the barge; fire-makers, 5; pastry, 2; larder, 2; pantry, 1; buttery, 5; great beer-cellar, 1; wine-cellar, 1; privy cellar, 2; bake-house, 4; porters, 2; ale-brewers; cooper; under-grooms of the chamber, 5; inferior waiters at the cofferer's table, 2; inferior waiters at the comptroller's table, 3.

Three drums, with escutcheons of the arms of Scotland.

Three trumpets, with banners of the same.

The standard of Scotland, borne by Major Dawbroun and Major Bashington. Assistant close mourners.

One in a cloak, to bear up the train of the standard.

A horse, covered with black cloth, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by Mr. Bergawny, an equerry, in a cloak, and a groom in a coat to attend, &c.

Inferior officers of the lord-mayor, 70.

Marshal's men, 6.

Servants relating to the surveyor's office, 12.

Servants in his highness's wardrobe, 4.

Three drums, with escutcheons of the standard of the Dragon.

Three trumpets, with banners of the same.

The standard of the Dragon, borne by Colonel Goodrick; and Major Cambridge, assistant. Close mourners.

One in a cloak, to bear the train of the standard.

A horse, covered with black cloth, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by Mr. Wilcocks, equerry, in a cloak, and a groom in a coat to attend, &c.

Officers of better sort. Scullery, 3; larder, 1; hall-place, 2; deputy-sewer, 1; kitchen, 1; slaughter-house, 1; spicery, 1; cellar, 1; ale-brewers, 2; falconers, 2; huntsman; key-keeper; gardeners, 3; park-keepers, 8; bird-keeper; chapel-keepers, 4.

Messengers of the committee of the army, 4; of the committee of the Admiralty, 2.

Keepers of the Council Chamber and privy lodgings, 5; messengers of the Council Chamber, 15.

Sergeant Denny's men, 3; grooms of the chamber, 7; waiters on the cofferer's table, 2; chafe-wax and sealer of the Chancery, 2; tally-cutter; usher of the hall; usher of the Council Chamber; butler to the comptroller.

Household kitchen, 3 cooks; his highness's kitchen, 1 cook; gunsmith, shoemaker, hatter, tailor, upholsterer, measurers of cloth, 3; master carpenter, master joiner, master carver, master mason.

Three drums, with escutcheons of the standard of England. Three trumpets, with banners of the same.

The standard of the Lion of England, borne by Major Creed and Major Grove; close mourners.

One in a cloak, to bear up the train of the standard.

A horse, covered with black cloth, adorned with plumes, garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by Mr. Wallen, equerry, in a cloak, and a groom in a coat to attend, &c.

Gentlemen, attendants on public ministers.

Barons, viscounts', earls' servants.

Gentlemen, attendants upon ambassadors.

Clerks in the surveyor's office, 2; the wardrobe, 2.

Under-clerks to the commissioners of the Admiralty, 2.

Clerk of the accounts of the army.

Clerk for the affairs of the ordnance.

Clerk of the commissioners of the navy.

Clerk to the committee of the army.

Mr. Malin's clerks, 2.

Clerks under the clerks of the council, 10.

Cash-keeper.

Printers, Mr. Henry Hill, Mr. John Field.

Gentlemen that wait at the comptroller's table.

Officers of the lord-mayor, in gowns.

Young men, 6; yeomen of the water-side, 4; sergeants of the chamber, 3; carvers, 3; esquires, belonging to the lord-mayor, 4; water-bailiff; common crier; common hunt; sword-bearer.

Three drums, with escutcheons of the Guidon.

Three trumpets, with banners of the same.

The Guidon, borne by Major Knight and Sir John Blackamore.

A horse, covered with black velvet, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by Mr. Bagg and Mr. Nelson, two equeries, in cloaks, and one groom in a coat to attend, &c.

The poor knights of Windsor, Mr. Richard Pratt, Captain Fanshaw, Cornet Stephens, Captain Beale, Lieutenant Parker, Cornet Olmer, Lieutenant Mayns, Major Wallinger, Lieutenant Banks, Mr. Grosvener, Captain Roe, Colonel Herbert, Mr. Day, Captain Cooper, Major Leventhorp, David Hatfield, Captain Burges, Mr. Cary, Colonel Whichote.

Two lads brought up to music.

Musicians. Mr. John Rogers, Mr. Thomas Mallard, Mr. William Howe, Mr. David Mell, Mr. Thomas Blagrave, Mr. William Gregory, Mr. Richard Hudson, Mr. Hinckston, master of the Music.

Apothecaries. Mr. Webb, Mr. Phelps, Mr. William Baghurst.

Chirurgeons. Mr. Fothergill, Mr. Trapham, Mr. Harris. Her highness's butler.

His highness's butler.

Pantry, 2; great beer-cellar, 1; privy cellar, 1; scullery, 1; wood-yard, 2; pastry, 2; caterer, 1; bake-house, 2; larder, 3; slaughter-house, 1.

Three drums, with escutcheons of the White Lion.

Three trumpets, with banners of the same.

The banner of the Lion, borne by Colonel Pretty and Colonel Gibbon.

A horse, covered with black velvet, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by two equeries in cloaks, and a groom in a coat to attend, &c.

Surveyor of Westminster Abbey.

Head bailiff of Westminster, Mr. Jenkin.

Merchant of timber to his highness.

Clerk of the surveys.

Assistant to the keeper of the wardrobe.

Mewes-keeper.

Clerks of the stables, the aviary, the spicery, wine-cellar. Purveyor of wine.

Clerks of the household kitchen. His highness's kitchen, 2.

Master of Westminster School, Mr. Busby.

Usher of the Exchequer, Mr. Bowyer.

Deputy-chamberlain of the Exchequer.

Mr. Edward Faulconbridge and Mr. Scipio le Squire.

Clerk for approbation of ministers, Mr. John Nye, Jun.

Solicitor of the Admiralty, Mr. Dorislans.

Solicitor of the treasury, Mr. William Swan.

Secretary of the army, Captain Kingdom.

Secretary to the general at sea, Mr. Richard Creed.

Secretary to the commissioners of the Admiralty, Mr. Blackborne.

Marshal of the Admiralty, Solomon Smith.

His highness's proctor in the Admiralty Court, Mr. David Bud.

Secretary to the lords commissioners of the treasury, Mr. Sherwin.

Secretary to the lords-keepers, Mr. Dove.

Register of the Admiralty, Mr. Rushworth.

Master shipwrights, Mr. John Taylor, Mr. Christopher Pett, Mr. Tippet.

Masters attendants, Mr. Thomas Scott, Mr. Charles Thoro good, Mr. William Badley, Mr. Thomas Arkonstall.

Officers of the Ordnance, Mr. Billers, Major Browne, Mr. Lewis Audley, Mr. John Faulkner, Mr. Wollaston, Mr. Elias Palmer.

Officers of the Mint, Mr. Thomas Symond, chief graver, Mr. James Hoar, clerk for his highness; Mr. John Reynolds, under assay-master; Mr. Thomas Birch, weigher and teller; Mr. Richard Pitt, surveyor and clerk of the irons. Mr. Samuel Bartlett, assay-master; Mr. Thomas Barnardiston, comptroller; Doctor Aaron Gurdon, master of the Mint.

Clerk of the papers, Mr. Ambrose Randolph.

Surveyor of the works, Mr. Embree.
Keeper of the wardrobe at Whitehall, Mr. Clement Kinnersley.

The Post-house, Mr. Clarke.
Tellers of the Exchequer, Mr. Nicholas Bragg, Mr. George Downing, Mr. Christopher Lyster, Mr. John Stone.

Auditors of the revenue of his highness's Exchequer, Mr. William Hill, Mr. Augustin Wingfield, Mr. Henry Broad, Mr. John Brockett, Mr. John Edwards, Mr. Richard Sadler.
Auditor of the impress, Mr. Bartholomew Beale.

Counsel attending the lords commissioners of the treasury, Mr. Brereton, Mr. Manby.

Three drums, with escutcheons of the arms of the Union.
Three trumpets, with banners of the same.

The banner of Union, borne by Colonel Grosvener and Colonel Ashfield.

A horse, covered with black velvet, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by two equerries in cloaks, and a groom in a coat to attend, &c.

Officers of the fleet, Captains Ming, Newburg, Nixon, Howard, Earning, Robert Sanders, Eustace Smith, Robert Blague, Whitthorne Whetstone, Tittman, Blague, With-eridge, Poole, John Copping, Lambert, Anthony Young, Harman, Clark, Cuttawie. Judge-advocate Fowler, Sir Richard Staheer, Captain Stoaks.

Officers of the army, Mr. Nathaniel Eldred, commissary of provisions in Scotland; Mr. Simon White, apothecary; Mr. Rossington, chirurgeon; Mr. Samuel Barton, physician in Scotland; Mr. Knight, commissary of ammunition; Mr. Thomas Margetts, deputy advocate; Mr. Malin, chief secretary to the army.

Captains of horse and foot, Captains Henry Creer, Henry Creer, Jun.

Commissioners for regulation of the excise, Mr. Adam Bains, Mr. Price, Mr. Bockett, Mr. John Stone.

Committee of the navy, Mr. Henry Hatsell, Mr. George Pater, Mr. Peter Pett, Major Nathaniel Bourne, Mr. Richard Hutchenson, Mr. Wright, Mr. Willoughby, Major Robert Thomson.

Commissioners of the army, Mr. John Phillips, Mr. John Hildeley, Mr. Gervais Bennett, Mr. Richard Lucy.
Mr. Pierce, lecturer of Margaret's.
Mr. Sangar, minister of Martin's.

Ministers of Westminster, Mr. John Rowe, Mr. Seth Wood.
Commissioners for approbation of public preachers, Mr. Holbeach, Mr. John Turner, Mr. Daniel Dyke, Mr. Samuel Fairclough, Mr. John Tombs, Mr. Samuel Slater, Mr. William Greenhill, Mr. Joseph Caryl, Mr. William Jessey, Mr. George Griffith, Mr. Thomas Valentine, Mr. Walter Cradock, Mr. William Cooper, Mr. Thomas Maston, Mr. Philip Nye, Mr. Thankful Owen, Dr. Horton, Dr. Arrow-smith, Dr. Thomas Goodwin, Dr. Tuckney, Dr. John Owen.
Chaplains at Whitehall, Mr. White, Mr. Sterry, Mr. Hooke, Mr. Howe, Mr. Lockyer, Mr. Peters.

Three drums, with escutcheons of the arms of Ireland.
Three trumpets, with banners of the same.

The banner of Ireland, borne by Colonel Clarke and Colonel Salmon.

A horse, covered with black velvet, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by two equerries, Mr. Thompson, Mr. Ireland, in cloaks, and a groom in a coat to attend &c.

Treasurer of the contingencies, Mr. Gaultier Frost.
Council's solicitor, Mr. Beck.

Secretaries of the French and Latin-tongues, Mr. Dradon, Mr. Marvel, Mr. Sterry, Mr. John Milton, Mr. Hartlibbe, Sen.

Clerks of the signet, Mr. Samuel Moreland, Mr. James Nutley.

Clerks of the Privy-seal, Mr. Richard Whitehead, Mr. Miles Fleetwood.

Clerk of the Council, Mr. Jessop.
Clerk of the House of Commons, Mr. Smith.

Clerk of the House of Lords, Mr. Scobell.
Clerk of the Commonwealth, formerly clerk of the crown, Mr. Nathaniel Taylor.

His highness's gentlemen.

Majors John Chamberlain, William Farley, Nathaniel Cadwell, John Hill, Eaton, Robert Swallow, Holmes, Creed, John Pittman, Nicholas Andrews, John Grime, Peter Crisp, Abraham Holmes, Craufield, Greenleaf, Elleatson.

Lieutenant-colonels John Miller, Richard Mope, Henry Flower, William Stile, Francis Allen, Dennis Pepper, William Gough, John Pierson, John Needler, Stevenson, John Clawberry, Arthur Young, Clement Keen.

Adjutant-general for Scotland, Jeremiah Smith.
Adjutants-general for England, Captain John Melthorpe, Major George Sedasene.

Doctors of physic, Dr. Clarke, Dr. Goddard, Dr. Prujean, Dr. Simcocks, Dr. Bates, Dr. Glisson, Dr. Bathurst.

Advocate-general for Ireland, Dr. Cartwright.
His highness's advocate, Dr. Walter Walker.

Clerk comptroller, Mr. Ewer.
Clerk of the green cloth, Mr. Barrington.

Steward of the lands, Mr. Waterhouse.
Cofferer, Mr. Maidstone.

Head officers of the army. Lieutenant-colonel Elton, of foot, to the lord-general. Treasurers of the army, Captains Blackwell, Dean, Colonels Smith, Barry, Bridges, Rogers, William Mitchell, Fitch; Dr. William Staides, commissary-general of musters.

Chief officers of the fleet. Rear-admiral Bourne, Vice-admiral Goodson.

Knights bachelors.
Three drums, with escutcheons of the arms of Scotland.

Three trumpets, with banners of the same.
The banner of Scotland, borne by Lord Berry and Lord Cooper.

A horse, covered with black velvet, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by two equerries in cloaks, and a groom in a coat to attend, &c.

The chief officers and aldermen of London. Solicitor, auditor, remembrancer, comptroller, town clerk, common sergeant, chamberlain, judge of the Sheriff's Court, recorder, Sir Lislebone Long; Aldermen, 20.

Attorney-general of South Wales, Mr. Jones.

Judges of South and North Wales. Mr. Corbett, Mr. Hagatt, Mr. Bulstrode, Mr. Foxwist, Mr. Hoskins, Sergeant Seys, Sergeant Barnard.

Masters of the Chancery, 9.

Mr. Pell, Mr. Bradshaw, Major-general Jephson.
His highness's learned counsel. Attorney of the duchy, Mr. Nicholas Lechmere; Solicitor-general, Sir William Ellis; Attorney-general, Sir Edmund Prideaux; His highness's sergeants, Sergeant Maynard, Sergeant Earle.

Judges of the Admiralty. Colonel Charles George Cock, Dr. Godolphin.

Masters of requests. Mr. Francis Bacon, Mr. Nathaniel Bacon.

Gentlemen of the bedchamber. Mr. Charles Harvey, Mr. Underwood.

Master of the ceremonies, Sir Oliver Fleming.
Chief-justice of Chester, Lord Bradshaw.

Barons of the Exchequer, Richard Tomlins, John Parker, Roger Hill, Edmund Nicholas.

Judges of both benches, Hugh Wyndham, Edward Atkins, Peter Warburton, Matthew Hale, Richard Newdigate.

Lord-chief-baron, Sir Thomas Widdington.
Lord-mayor of London, Sir John Ireton.

Four drums, with escutcheons of the banner of England.
Four trumpets, with banners of the same.

The banner of England, borne by Lords Tomlinson and Hewson.

A horse, covered with black velvet, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a cheveron, and escutcheons of the same, led by two equerries in cloaks, and a groom to attend, &c.

Relations. Lord Dunch, Sir Robert Pye, Jun., Thomas Bouchier, John Bouchier, Esquires, John Dunch, Esq., Captain Fox, Thomas Cromwell, Esq., Captain Whetstone, Mr. Philip Loo, Mr. Edward Fleming, Mr. Edward Hooper, Mr. Edmund Phillips, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Thomas Cromwell, Mr. Hughes, Captain Hierome Ingoldsbay, Captain Ingoldsbay, Mr. John Whaley, Mr. Henry Whaley, Major Horseman.

Public ministers of foreign states, commonwealths, princes, and kings.

The Black Rod.

Colonel Willoughby, gentlemen usher of the House of Peers, in a cloak, with an usher on his right hand, bare-headed.

Mr. Secretary Thurloe, one of his highness's privy council.

Peers.

William lord Goffe, Edmund lord Thomas, John lord Hughson, John lord Barkstead, Robert lord Tichborn, Christopher lord Pack, Archibald lord Johnson, William lord Roberts, Thomas lord Honeywood, William lord Lockhart, Alexander lord Popham, William lord Strickland, Richard lord Onslow, Sir Arthur Hazlerig, Philip lord Jones, comptroller of his highness's household, Francis lord Rouse, Philip lord Skippon, Charles lord Wolseley, William Steel, lord-chamberlain of Ireland, William lord Lenthall, master of the Rolls, John lord Glyn, chief-justice of the Upper Bench, George Monke, general in Scotland, Edward lord Montague, Lord John Disbrowe, Roger lord Broghill, George lord Eure, William lord viscount Say and Sele, Earl of Cassilis, Edward earl of Manchester, Henry lord Lawrence, president of the council: all their trains borne.

The seal-bearer, supported by a gentleman usher, bare-headed, and a sergeant-at-arms, Sergeant Middleton.

The lords-commissioners of the Great Seal, John lord Lisle, Nathaniel lord Fiennes: trains borne.

Ambassadors of foreign states, princes, and kings.
Six drums, with escutcheons of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, &c.

Six trumpets, with banners of the same.

Sergeants-at-arms, Birkhead, Dendy.

Rouge Dragon, poursuivant-at-arms.

The great banner, borne by John lord Fiennes, Francis lord Russel, George lord Fleetwood, close mourners: their trains borne.

Cheval de Deuil.

or the chief horse of mourning, covered with black velvet, adorned with plumes, and garnished with a chevron of the same, led by two equerries in cloaks, and a groom in a coat to attend, &c Helm and crest, spurs, Lancaster. Gauntlet, York. Target, Somerset. Sword, Nurroy king of arms.

Coat of arms. Clarenceux king of arms, supported on each side by a gentleman usher, bareheaded.

The lord-chamberlain, in close mourning, with his staff: his train borne.

Carter principal king of arms; on each side a gentleman usher, bareheaded.

Charles lord Fleetwood, chief mourner.

Philip lord-viscount Lisle, Lord-viscount Faulconberg, supporters to the chief mourner, their trains borne. Chief mourner's train borne by Luke Skippon, Fiennes, Samuel Disbrowe, James Disbrowe, Gilbert Pickering, Esquires.

Assistants to the chief mourner, fourteen in number.

Horse of honour, ornamented in very rich trappings, embroidered on crimson velvet, and adorned with white, red, and yellow plumes, led by the master of the horse; equerries and grooms to attend.

The Guard of Halberdiers, two and two Gentlemen porters of the Tower, warders of the Tower.

The effigy in this manner being brought to the west gate of the Abbey Church of Westminster, it was taken from the chariot by ten gentlemen, who carried it to the east end of the church, and there placed with the wax effigies of the Protector, in a most magnificent structure, built in the same form as one before had been on the like occasion for King James, but much more stately and expensive, as the expenses attending the funeral amounted to upward of sixty thousand pounds.

This funeral procession was the last ceremony of honour to the most serene and most illustrious OLIVER CROMWELL, Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging; to whom less could not be performed, to the memory of him to whom posterity will pay (when Envy is laid asleep by Time) more honour than I am able to express. But, alas! how true are the words of the wise king, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity;" seeing that, after all this funeral pomp and grandeur, his dead body was lastly, by the counsel of these men whom his power had raised to greatness—I say, by their counsel to CHARLES the Second, he was taken out of his grave and hanged for a traitor. O tempora! O mores! JOHN PRESTWICK, F. A. S. C., Oxford Inscription over the Bed of State.

OLIVER CROMWELL,

Lord Protector of England, Scotland and Ireland;

Born at Huntingdon,

Of the name of Williams, of Glamorgan, and by

King Henry VIII. changed into Cromwell;

Was educated in Cambridge, afterward of Lincoln's Inn.

At the beginning of the wars, captain of a troop of horse, raised at his own charge;

And by the Parliament made commander-in-chief.

He reduced Ireland and South Wales,

Overthrew Duke Hamilton's army, the Kirk's army, at Dunbar;

Reduced all Scotland;

Defeated Charles Stuart's army at Worcester.

He had two sons,

Lord Richard, Protector in his father's room,

Lord Henry, now lord-deputy of Ireland;

And four daughters,

Lady Bridget, first married Lord Ireton, afterward

Lieutenant-general Fleetwood;

Lady Elizabeth, married Lord Claypole;

Lady Mary, married Lord-viscount Faulconberg;

Lady Frances, married the Honourable Robert Rich, Grandchild to the Right Honourable the Earl of Warwick.

He was declared Lord Protector of England,

Scotland and Ireland, Dec. 16, 1653;

Died September 3, 1658, after fourteen days' sickness, of

An ague, with great assurance and serenity of mind,

Peaceably in his bed.

Natus April 15, 1599.

Dunkirk, in Flanders, surrendered to him, June 20, 1658.

INDEX.

A.

ABBOT, archbishop of Canterbury, page 139.
Acton, sheriff of London, 31.
Archy, the famous jester of Charles I., 161.

B.

Baas, De, 573.
Bacon, Lord-chancellor, 138.
Baltimore, Lord, his letter to the Earl of Strafford, 68.
Barbone, 547.
Barbone's Parliament, list of the members of, 538. Committees appointed by, 547. Their measures of reform, 555.
Bates, a Turkish merchant, his case, 58.
Baxter, Richard, his account of Cromwell's troops, 420.
Beaumont, Sir Richard, his letter to Strafford, 65.
"Bedford Level," 411.
Bellasis, Henry, 78.
Berkeley, Sir Robert, 179.
Blake, Admiral, 312. His successes, 595. Sent in pursuit of the Spanish Plate fleet, 596.
Bordeaux, M. de, French ambassador, 535, 547.
Boston, controversy of the Antinomians at, 271.
Bouchier, Sir James, 402.
Bouchier, Elizabeth, her marriage with Oliver Cromwell, 402. Her character, 403.
Bradshaw appointed president of the Council of State, 306.
Chosen president of the Court of Commissioners, 372.
His character, 373. His address to Charles I. on his trial, 374. Pronounces sentence on Charles I., 375. Amount of lands settled on him by the government, 380. His answer to Cromwell on the latter coming to dissolve the executive council, 382. His motion whether the House should approve of the system of government by a single person and a Parliament, 580.
Brooke, Lord, his address to his soldiers, 256. His death, 258.
Buckingham, Duke of, 11. Impeachment of, 14. Commands an expedition for the relief of Rochelle, 19. A remonstrance voted against certain of his proceedings, 28. Assassination of, 29.
Burnet, Bishop, extract from, 422.
Butler, Sir Francis, 358.
Byron, Lord, besieges Nantwich in Cheshire, 433.

C.

Calvert, Sir George, 64, 142.
Cambridge College, 432.
Carleton, Sir Dudley, vice-chancellor to Charles I., his memorable expostulation to the House of Commons, 16.
Carlile, Lucy Percy, Countess of, her character, 203. Participates in Goring's army plot, 204.
Carlisle, siege of, 459.
Chambers, Richard, 155.
Chalgrave Field, battle of, 259.
Charles I., his first Parliament, 5. Dissolves the Parliament, 9. His insolent message to the House of Commons concerning Buckingham, 13. His rage on hearing of Eliot's speech against Buckingham, 15. His "new councils," 16. Executes a forced loan, 17. His famous third Parliament, 19. Attempts to get hold of the subsidies, 20. His message to the House of Commons, threatening to end the session, 22. His answer to the Petition of Rights, 23. His message to the House, acquainting them that the session would end in six days, 27. His speech to the Commons, 28. Measures adopted towards him by the House of Commons, 28. His speech on proroguing Parliament, 29. Dissolves the Parliament, 34. His letter to the Earl of Strafford during his imprisonment, 124. His letter to the Lords on the condemnation of Strafford, 128. The duties of tonnage and poundage rigorously extorted by him, 155. Dissolves the Parliament, 174. His imbecile measures, 176. His perfidy, 182. His cold and laconic remark on hearing of the Irish rebellion, 206. The grand remonstrance presented to him at Hampton Court, 209. His entrance into the House of Commons to accuse Pym and the four other members of high treason, 213. Enters the city in search of these five members, 214. His speech denouncing Sir John a traitor, 219. Denounces the militia ordinance as illegal, 221. Erects his standard at Nottingham, 222. His address to his officers at the battle of Edge Hill, 256. His spirit of intrigue, 318. Signs a secret treaty with the Scots commissioners, 366. Charges brought against him, 371. His trial, 374. His last appearance in Westminster Hall, 374. His execution, 376. His character, 376, 438, 459, 461, 469.

Charles II., 469, 571.

Clare, Lord, his letter to Lord Strafford, 64.
Clarendon, Lord, extracts from his works, 163, 205, 443.
Claypole, son-in-law of Cromwell, proposes the question on the legal confirmation of the major-generals, 603.
Cleveland, John, opposes Cromwell in the election for Cambridge, 412. His imprisonment, 412. His definition of Protector, 413.
Clifford, Lord, 68.
Coke, Solicitor, counsel for the prosecution of Charles I., 374.
Conisby, Sir Thomas, 423.
Cony, a merchant, his case, 597.
Cooke, Secretary, 12.
Cottington, Lord, his letter to the Earl of Strafford, 79.
Cotton, Mr., minister of the Boston church, 274.
Cowley, the poet, extract from his "Vision," 441.
Cowell, Dr., 58.
Crew, Mr., 174.
Cromwell, Oliver, ancestry of, 392. His parents, 394. Character of his mother, 394. Anecdotes of his childhood, 396. His school days, 397. Enters Cambridge College, 398. Milton's address to him, 399. Death of his father, 400. Enters Lincoln's Inn, 400. His irregularities, 400. His marriage, 402. Character of his wife, 403. Attaches himself to the Non-conformists, 403. Returned member of Parliament for Huntingdon, 404. His letter to Mr. Downtell, inviting him to stand sponsor for his child, 405. His first entrance into Westminster Hall—description of his person, 405. His religious exercises, 407. Appointed justice of peace for Huntingdon, 407. Removes to St. Ives, 407. His influence, 408. His letter to Mr. Storie, 408. Removes to Ely, 409. His letter to Mrs. St. John, 410. Takes part in the question on the Bedford Level, 411. Returned member for Cambridge, 412. Takes part in the debate on the "Remonstrance," 419. His exertions for forming his famous regiment of Ironsides, 420. Accepts the commission of colonel of a troop, 420. His military discipline, 421. His address to his soldiers, 422. His victory at Grantham, 425. Defeats Colonel Cavendish at Gainsborough, 425. His first acquaintance with Ireton, 426. Appointed Lieutenant-governor of the Isle of Ely, 432. His letter to his brother-in-law after the battle of Marston Moor, 437. His defeat at Dennington, 439. His letter to the Governor of Edinburgh Castle, 447. His letter to Lord Wharton, 449. His letter to Bridget Ireton, 450. Anecdotes of him, 451. Appointed lieutenant-general of horse, 459. His letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons after the battle of Naseby, 461. Defeats Goring at Taunton, 462. His action with the Clubmen, 462. His account of the siege of Bristol, 463. His letter giving an account of the siege of Basing, 464. Takes Langford House, 465. Fights Lord Wentworth at Bovey Tracy, 465. His strict military honour, 465. £2500 a year settled on him by Parliament, 465. His letter to Colonel Robert Hammond, 468. His measure to hinder the reduction of the army, 469. Marches into Wales, and reduces Pembroke, 469. His bold and successful measures with the disaffected portion of his troops, 469. His letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons, after the battle of Preston, 470. Marches into Scotland, 471. His reception in Edinburgh, 472. Negotiates a marriage for his son Richard with the daughter of Mr. Major, 472. Anecdotes of him at the time of the execution of Charles I., 477. Made Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 478. His letters to Mr. Major from Bristol, 478. Arrives in Dublin, 479. Takes Drogheda, 480. Invests Wexford, 481. Breaks up the siege of Waterford, 481. Re-opens the campaign, 481. Takes Clonmel, 481. Appoints Ireton deputy, and sails for England, 481. Appointed general-in-chief of the army, 484. Defeats the Scots at Musselburgh, 484. Gains the victory of Dunbar, 486. Occupies Glasgow and Edinburgh, 489. Attacked with ague, 489. Gains the victory of Worcester, 490. His exultation, 491. £4000 a year voted to him, and a royal residence ordered to be prepared for him, 493. Commissioners sent to congratulate him on his arrival at Aylesbury, 493. Takes his seat in Parliament, 493. Forces the House to pass a bill of amnesty, 495. Holds a meeting at the speaker's house, 495. Whitelocke's account of this conference, 496. Holds a council of officers at Whitehall to petition against military retrenchment, 498. His conference with Lord-commissioner Whitelocke whether he should take the title of king, 500. Description of the meetings and dissensions of his military cabal, 504. Proposes the "Council of Forty," 508. Enters Westminster with his soldiers, and forcibly dissolves the Parliament, 510. His address to the House, 510. His address to the Council of State, 512. His "Declaration of the grounds and reasons for dissolving the Parliament," 513. Establishes a new Council of State, 533. Form of the summons issued for the Barons Parliament, 537. His memorable address to his first Parliament, 540. A deputation sent to him from Parliament to become one of their members, 545. His transport on hearing of the victory of the English fleet over the Dutch, 548. His repulsive treatment of the Dutch ambassadors, 549. His gratitude to the English admirals, 551. His measures for establishing a high court of justice, 553. His letter to his son-in-law Fleetwood, 554. Opposes the vote for abolishing the Court of Chancery, 559. Receives the resignation of Parliament, 564. Solemnly inaugurated, in Westminster Hall, Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Ireland, and Scotland, 566. Revives the forms of monarchy, 566. His various ordinances, 568. Conciliates the Presbytery, 570. Cajoles the Arminians, 570. His manner of treating with the Royalists, 571. Plot for his assassination, 572. Erects a high court of justice for the trial of the leading conspirators, 572. The regal state which he assumes, 573. His treaty with the Dutch, 574. Congratulatory addresses presented to him, 575. An entertainment given to him in the city, 578. His speech on the opening of Parliament, 579. His excitement on the debate on Bradshaw's motion, 581. His remonstrance with the House of Commons on their refusing to acknowledge the House of Lords, 582. His address to the members who waited on him in the Painted Chamber, 583. An ominous occurrence befalls him, 584. Summons the Parliament to meet him in the Painted Chamber, 587. His address to them, 587. His instructions to the major-generals, 590. Equips and sends an army for the invasion of the American colonies, 594. His sagacity, 594. His letter to Major-general Fortesque, 594. Signs a treaty with France, 595. His projects concerning the Jews, 595. Summons another Parliament, 597. His interview with his military satellites, 599. His address to the members of the new Parliament, 599. Disannuls the title of Charles Stuart, 602. Provides additional safeguards for his person, 602. His measures to conciliate the people, 603. The Sexby and Syndercombe plot against his life, 603. His answer to the officers that waited on him, entreating him not to accept the title of king, 604. Refuses to take the title of king, 606. His memorable speech refusing to take the title of king, 609. Solemnly inaugurated Lord Protector for life, with power to name his successor, 609. His remonstrance to the Grand Seigneur respecting the unjust surprisal of an English ship, 611. Establishes a House of Peers, 613. Forcibly dissolves the House of Commons, 616. His fears for his personal safety, 616. His domestic sorrows, 617. Redoubles his precautions for his personal safety, 617. His grief for the death of his daughter, Lady Elizabeth Claypole, 618. His death, 620.

Cromwell, Richard, birth of, 405. Proclaimed Lord Protector, 620.

Cromwell, Colonel Henry, nephew to the Protector, 603.

Cromwell, Henry, son of the Protector, 569.

D.

Dean, Admiral, 548.

Dering, Sir Edward, 221.

De Witt, Admiral, his address to the States-General of Holland, 549.

Digges, Sir Dudley, 14.

"Discovery of Mysteries," 253.

D'Israeli, Mr., 3, 11.

Down, Braddock, battle of, 426.

Dunbar, battle of, 486.

Dutch War, the, 311.

E.

Edge Hill, battle of, 256.

Echard, Archdeacon, 1. Extracts from his history, 4.

Eliot, Sir John, his descent, 1. His birth, 1. His quarrel with Mr. Moyle, 1. His letters to Mr. Moyle, 2. Becomes a barrister, 3. Visits the Continent, 3. Returns home, 3. Made Vice-admiral of Devonshire, 4. Receives the honour of knighthood, 4. His letter to the Duke of Buckingham, 5. Returned member for the Borough of Newport, 6. His first speech, 6. Again returned for Newport, 9. His motion on the adjournment of Parliament to Oxford, 10. His public honesty illustrated, 11. His address to the House of Commons to prevent farther supplies to the French king, 12. Appointed one of the secret managers to prepare an impeachment of Buckingham, 12. Returned member for Cornwall, 13. His speech in the House of Commons, 6th of February, 1626, 13. His speech on the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham, 14. Committed to the Tower, 15. His reappearance in the House of Commons, to answer the charges brought against him, 16. Cleared from every imputation, 16. His imprisonment in the Gatehouse, 18. His release and return for Cornwall, 19. His rebuke of Secretary Cooke, 20. His speech on the proposed shortness of the session, 22. His speech on the king's answer to the Petition of Rights, 24. His protest, 27. His letter to Sir Robert Cotton, 29. His reply to Sir Robert Philips, on the seizure of the goods of Mr. Rolles, 30. His speech on the alteration of the Articles of Religion, 31. His remonstrance concerning tonnage and poundage, 33. His speech against the Bishop of Winchester and Lord-treasurer Weston, 33. Summoned before the council table, 34. His committal, 34. His rigorous imprisonment, 35. His letter to Hampden, 36. His letters to his sons, 36. His letter to Sir Oliver Luke complaining of his imprisonment, 38. His letter to his kinsman Knightley, 38. His letter to Hampden on his illness, 38. His letter to Hampden complaining of increasing restrictions, 39. His likeness to Sir Walter Raleigh, 39. His portrait, 40. His death, 41. Philosophical treatise written by him during his imprisonment, 43.

England, ecclesiastical constitution of, 185.

Essex, Earl of, his letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons after the battle of Chalgrove, 261. Extract from his life, 428.

Ewer, his evidence, 376.

Exeter, Earl of, his letter to Lord Strafford, 90.

F.

Fairfax made Constable of the Tower, 304. His victory at Selby, 433. Appointed lord-general of the army, 457.

Falkland, Lord, 82.

Faulconberg, Lord, 611.

Feakes, Mr. Christopher, 569.

Fitz-Geoffry, Charles, dedicates his sermon on the death of Lady Rous to Pym, 135.

Fleetwood, his marriage with Bridget Ireton, 504. His opposition to Sir Christopher Pack's motion, 604.

Forster, Chief Justice, 334.

Foulis, Sir David, deputy-lieutenant and member of the Council of York, 78. Information exhibited in the Star Chamber against him by the Earl of Strafford, 78. Sentence of the court on him and his son, 79.

Fox, James Charles, extracts from his "Fragment of History," 377.

G.

Garrard, Mr., extracts from his letters, 155, 158.

Gerard, Colonel, execution of, 572.

Godwin, Mr., extracts from his History of the Commonwealth, 296, 307.

Goodwin, Arthur, 256.

Greenwood, Mr., tutor to the Earl of Strafford, 55.

Grenville, Sir Bevil, declares himself for Charles, 423.

Publishes a commission of array, 423. His correspondence with his wife, 424, 427.

Grey, Lord, of Groby, 585.

H.

Hale, Judge Matthew, 581.

Hampden, John, his birth, 241. Early education of, 241. Enters Oxford College, 242. His marriage, 242. Takes his seat as member for Grampound, 242. His memorable words on refusing the loan to Charles I., 243. Returned member for Wendover, 243. Associated with Pym, St. John, Seiden, and Coke, on the Committee of Bills, 243. His letters to Eliot concerning the children of the latter, 244. His letter to Richard Eliot, 245. His letter to Eliot containing his criticism on the "Monarchy of Man," 245. Death of his wife, 247. Signs the protest against ship-money, 247. Description of his residence at Hampden, 248. Clarendon's account of him, 248. Declines pleading for Archbishop Williams, 249. His second marriage, 249. Clarendon's statement of his real opinions on the anti-episcopal measure, 251. His speech on the impeachment of the five members, 251. Returns to Buckinghamshire, 253. Publishes an ordinance to martial the militia, 253. Accepts the commission of colonel, 253. Musters his levies on the field of Chalgrove, 254. Engaged in the battle of Reading, 257. His domestic sorrows, 257. Receives his death wound at the battle of Chalgrove, 259. Lord Nugent's account of him, 262. His death, 262. Clarendon's character of him, 264.

Houghton, Lord, 68.

Henderson, Sir John, 431.

Henrietta, Queen, 199.

Herbert, Attorney-general, 210.

Heylin, Dr., 253.

Hollis, Denzil, his letters to Wentworth, 69. His scheme for the preservation of the Earl of Strafford, 128.

Hotham, Sir John, 174.

Hutchinson, Mrs., her character, 272. Her controversy with the Colony of Massachusetts, 272. Accused of heresy, 272. Her doctrines, 273, 523.

I.

Independents, the, 293.

Ingram, Sir Arthur, his letter to the Earl of Strafford, 66.
Ireland, the Court of High Commission introduced into, 100.
A mint erected in, 104. The linen trade first established in, 105.

Ipsdon, his character, 426. His attack on the outposts of Charles, 460. His death, 495. His funeral, 495.
Isle of Wight, treaty of, 304.

J.

Jamaica, taking of, by Pen, 594.

James I. remonstrates with Parliament on the impeachment of Lord Middleton, 9. His first interview with his English counsellors, 56. His impositions on imports and exports, 58. Refuses to abolish purveyance, 58. An amusing anecdote of him, 64. His letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons, on receiving a copy of the "Remonstrance," 140. Assembles his privy council at Whitehall, 143. Dissolves the Parliament by proclamation, 143.

Jenkins, Judge, accused of high treason against the House of Commons, 358. His answer to the speaker, 358. His intended speech at the place of execution, 359.

Jongestall, Dutch ambassador, his interesting despatch to Frederic of Nassau, 575.

K.

Kirke, Colonel, 257.

L.

Lambert, Colonel, rejects the appointment of Governor of Ireland unaccompanied by the title of lord-deputy, 503. His opposition to Sir Christopher Pack's motion, 604.

Laud, Archbishop, his celebrated schedule of ecclesiastics, 10. His letter to Wentworth on his marriage, 88. His levities, 89. His personal appearance, 89. His letter to the Earl of Exeter, 89. His letter to Lord Strafford on the general affairs of church and state, 99. Accused of high treason, 179; and committed to the Tower, 179.

Lawrence, Colonel Henry, president of the council under the protectorate, 567.

Leicester, Earl of, his account of Cromwell dissolving the Long Parliament, 314.

Lenthall elected speaker, 580.

Leslie, David, commander-in-chief of the Scottish army, his success over Cromwell at Dunbar, 494.

Lilburne, John, 358. Promotes dissent in the army—Committed to the Tower, 379. Banishment of, 551. His proposal for the murder of Cromwell and destruction of the council of state, 551. His letter to Cromwell offering his allegiance, 551. Committed to Newgate, 551. Arraigned on the capital charge of violating the statute of his banishment, 552. His trial and acquittal, 553.

Lindsey, Lord, 256.

Ludlow, extracts from, concerning the designs of Cromwell, 443, 445, 523.

Loftus, Sir Adam, 93, 114.

Loudon, hackney-coaches first introduced into, 156.

Louis, Charles, Prince, elector of the palatinate—His correspondence with his mother, 415.

Lunsford, Colonel, 209.

M.

Manchester, Earl of, 455.

Mainwaring, Dr., his case, 150. His sentence, 154.

Marshall, Dr., his sermon on the death of Pym, 231.

Marston Moor, battle of, 435.

Marten, Henry, his birth and parentage, 353. His marriage, 353. Returned member for Berkshire, 353. Anecdote of him, 353. Another anecdote of him, 354. Appointed one of the "Committee of Safety," 355. Made Governor of Reading, 355. Anecdote of him, 356. Expelled the House and committed to the Tower, 357. His reinstatement, 358. Anecdote of him, 358. His successful interference in behalf of Judge Jenkins, 358. Preserves the life of the author of Gondibert, 359. His answer to the Scotch Commissioners, 360. Draws up a resolution declaring "that they would offer no farther addresses or applications to the king," 366. Joins Fairfax in his capacity of colonel—Assists Ireton in his famous papers and representations to the House of Commons, 267, 268. Takes part in the deliberation against the king, 371. Carries the report of the committee into the House of Commons for the construction of a new great seal, 372. Anecdote of him, 372. Associated with others in preparing the "draught" for the penal sentence against King Charles, 374. An extraordinary scene between him and Cromwell on the signing of the warrant for Charles's execution, 376. Takes a prominent part in the debate for the abolition of kingship, 378. Takes his seat in the Council of State, 378. Proposes the repeal of the statute of banishment against the Jews, 378. His interference in behalf of John Lilburne, 380. Amount of property settled on him in consequence of the losses he sustained in the public service, 380. His suspicions of Cromwell's designs, 380. Excluded from the Council of State, 381. A few instances of his humour, 381. His trial at the Old Bailey, 387. His address to the Court, 389. Summoned before the Lords, 390. His sentence, 390. His imprisonment, 390. Anecdote of him, 390. His death, 391.

Mason, Colonel, with other officers, presents a petition to Parliament against Cromwell taking the title of king, 608.

Meadows, Philip, secretary for the Latin tongue, 567.

Mercurius Aulicus, 223.

Mercurius Britannicus, 223.

Milton, his letter to Cromwell, 317. Made secretary to the council for foreign tongues, 378. His congratulatory address to Cromwell on the conclusion of peace with the Dutch, 576. Conducts the negotiations with the Duke of Savoy, 596.

Monk, Admiral, replaces Blake in the command of the navy, 547. Issues a memorable and characteristic order through his ships, 550. Gains a decisive victory over the Dutch, 550. His mission to Scotland, 570.

Montague, Dr., his case, 145.

Montjoy, Lord, 82.

Mountnorris, Lord, vice-treasurer of Ireland, 56. Accused of an attempt to stir up mutiny, 108. A charge brought against him by the Earl of Strafford—His trial, 108. His sentence, 108. Intercession of his wife, 108. His pardon, 109.

Muggletonians, 602.

N.

Nelson, Dr., 253.

Naseby, battle of, 297.

Neal, extract from his "History of the Puritans," 527.

Newbury, battle of, 428.

Newcastle, Marquis of, 437.

Newport, Lord, 215.

Nicholas, Sir Edward, his letter to the king at the time of Goring's army plot, 204. His letter to the king detailing the attempts on Pym's life, 207.

P.

Pack, Sir Christopher, 604.

Palmer, Sir Geoffrey, 334.

Pantaleon Sa, Don, 547.

Pantaleon, trial and execution of, 573.

"Parliament of Saints," 555.

Parsons, Sir William, 93.

"Pell Records," 416.

Pen commands a fleet for the invasion of the American colonies, 593, 594. His defeat, 594.

Pennyman, William, intrusted with the care of Lord Strafford's children, 80.

Philips, Sir Robert, his capture and imprisonment, 143.

Pocock, professor of Hebrew and Arabic, 569.

Port Eliot, 1.

Pory, his letter to Sir Robert Packering, giving an account of the proceedings of Sir John Eliot to obtain his liberty, 40.

Powell, Vavasor, 569.

Poyning, Sir Edward, 82.

Pride, Colonel, 370, 608.

Prideaux, Mr., his bill for yearly Parliaments, 183.

Prideaux, Sir Edmund, 525.

Presbyterians, 293.

Preston, battle of, 470.

Pym, John, his birth, 135. His descent, 135. His marriage—Death of his wife, 135. Returned member for Calne, 137. Deputed, with eleven others, to bring the declaration and petition of the Commons to the king at Newmarket, 141. Returned member for Tavistock, 144. His proceedings against Dr. Montague, 145. His speech on the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham, 146. His imprisonment and release, 148. His exertions during the progress of the Petition of Rights, 149. His speech in the case of Dr. Mainwaring, 150. Takes part in the debate on Arminianism, 154. His acute feeling on the desertion of Wentworth, 154. Appointed leader in the House of Commons, 162. Petitioning Parliament first organized as a system by him, 163. The bearer of an address from the Commons to the Lords—His memorable words, 173. His correspondence with the Scotch Commissioners, 175. Presents a petition for a Parliament to the king at York, 176. Anecdote of him, 177. His speech on the impeachment of Lord Strafford, 177. Appears at the bar of the House of Lords to accuse Lord Strafford, 179. His views respecting church government, 180. His speech on presenting the articles of impeachment against the Earl of Strafford, 183. Extracts from his speeches on the trial of Lord Strafford, 185, 186, 192. Chosen by the Commons to justify the impeachment of Laud, 195. Remarks on his frequent recurrence to the phraseology of Scripture, 198. Disclosures made by his committee of conspiracies against the Parliament and people, 199. His speech on delivering a charge against Lord Digby, 201. Conducts a conference with the Lords "concerning the security of the kingdom and Parliament," 205. Counsels the reintroduction of the bill against the bishops, 205. His personal danger, 207. Presents the grand remonstrance, 208. Resolutions proposed by him to the House of Lords on the king's answer to the bill for raising soldiers by impressment, 209. His address to the speaker of the House of Commons on the articles of impeachment, 211. Petition and defence drawn up by his friends, 214. His triumphant return to the House of Commons, 215. His speech on presenting the London petition to the House of Lords, 215. His motion for disposing of the militia, 221. His speech in the case of Sir Edward Dering, 221. His address to the authorities at Guildhall, 223. His speech on the manifesto of Charles I., 225. His speech on Waller's Plot (vide Appendix), 227. Impeaches the queen, 227. His "declaration and vindication" (vide Appendix), 228. His illness, 228. His death, 229. Respect shown to his memory by the House of Commons, 230. His family and estates, 232.

R.

Radcliffe, Sir George, 87. Extract from his Essay, 90.
Raynal, Abbé, extract from his "History of the Parliament of England," 524.
Reading, battle of, 257.
Retz, Cardinal, extract from his Memoirs, 534.
Rich, Mr., 612.
Richelieu, Cardinal, 30.
Rolles, John, 30.
Rouse, Lady Philippa, mother of Pym, 135.
Rupert, Prince, 428. Takes Stockport, Bolton, and Liverpool, and raises the siege of Latham House 435. Retreat after the battle of Marston Moor, 437.
Rushworth, 213.
Ruthven, Earl of Brentford, 433.

S.

St. John, Oliver, 465.
Sandys, Sir Edwyn, 140.
Savile, Sir George, 61.
Savile, Sir John, 61.
Scott, his speech refusing to recognise Cromwell's House of Lords, 383.
Scotland, union of, with England, 310.
Selden, 530.
"Self-denying Ordinance," 456, 457.
Sexby, Colonel, 596.
Sheffield, Lord, president of the north, his letter to Ellesmere, 61.
Skippon, Major-general, 215, 256.
Slingsby and Hewet, plot of, 617.
Strafford, Thomas Wentworth, Earl of, 55. His birth, 55. Ancestry of, 55. Education of, 55. Obtains the honour of knighthood, 55. His marriage, 56. Returned as a member for Yorkshire, 59. His letter to Mr. Greenwood, 60. Appointed to the office of custos rotulorum for the West Riding, 61. His letter to his brother-in-law, Lord Clifford, alluding to Parliaments, 63. His letter to Sir Edward Conway in behalf of his brother Michael, 63. His letter to Sir George Calvert, 64. Deprived of his office of custos rotulorum, 67. His letter to Sir William Weston, 67. Receives the privy seal, 68. Committed to the Marshalsea, 69. Removed to Dartford in Kent, 69. His speeches on the discussion of the general question of grievances, 69. Created baron of Wentworth, 69. His letter to his nephew, Sir W. Savile, 73. His letters to Thomas Gower and other friends on his election of knight of the shire of York, 73. His letter to Sir Thomas Fairfax, 74. Created viscount and president of the north, 76. Claims for himself the most absolute reverence and respect as the representative of royalty, 78. His letter to Lord Cottington concerning the trial of Sir David Foulis, 79. Death of his second wife, 80. His letter to Sir Edward Stanhope, 80. Intrigues against him, 81. His letter to Weston, 81. Appointed governor of Ireland, 83. His despatches from York, 83. Arrives in London, 84. His letter to the lords justices of Ireland, 84. His stipulations, 85. His supplementary private propositions, 85. His letter to Lord Mountnorris, 87. His third marriage, 88. Arrives in Dublin, 92. His first despatch, 92. His letter to the lord-marshal, 93. His privy council, 93. His elaborate despatch to the secretary for the consideration of the king, 95. Issues writs for a Parliament to be held in Dublin, 96. His speech to the privy council, 96. His first speech in the Irish House of Commons, 97. His management of the convocation of the clergy, 98. His account of the proceedings in the Irish House of Lords, 98. Introduces the Court of High Commission into Ireland, 100. Success of his measures for reducing the people of Ireland to conformity in religion, 102. Presses a personal suit on the king, 102. His care of the army, 103. His increasing reputation, 103. His objections to take the office of lord-treasurer, 104. His struggles to rescue the trade of Ireland from restrictions and monopolies, 104. His project for establishing the linen trade in Ireland, 105. His letter to Mr. Greenwood respecting his estates in Wentworth Woodhouse, 105. Reduces Connaught, 107. Opposition which he meets with, 107. The enmity which he provokes by his prosecution of Lord Mountnorris, 109. Appears at the English court—Details the measures by which he consolidated the government of Ireland, 109. His letter from York to the king, 110. Again entreats for an earldom, and is again refused, 111. Returns to Ireland, 111. His financial measures, 111. His letter to the king on the conduct of Lord Holland, 112. His castle at Naas, 112. Magnificence of his mode of living, 113. His private habits, 113. His advice concerning the commotions in Scotland, 114. Puts down the commotions of the Scotch settlers in Ulster, 114. His despatches on the "Antrim negotiations," 115. His letter to Lady Clare when sending her his daughters, 115. Arrives in England, 117. Declares for a war with Scotland, 117. Invested with the dignity of Earl of Strafford, 117. And Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 117. His letter to the king previous to his return to England, 118. Extract from his despatch, relating an extraordinary incident which occurred on his journey, 118. His letter to Wudebanke, 119. Arrives in London, 120. Takes his seat in the House of Lords, 120. Commands an expedition against the Scots, 120. Intrigues against him, 120. His success against the Scots, 120. His impeachment, 121. His arrest, 121. His letter to Lady Strafford, 121. Summary of the charges brought against him, 122. His address to the Lords, 124. His trial, 125. His personal defence, 125. Bill of attainder passed against him, 127. His letter of final instructions to his son, 130. His execution, 131.

"Strafford Papers," 59.
Sydenham, Colonel, 563

T.

Taylor, Jeremy, 592.
Temple, Sir Peter, 247.
Temple, Sir Purbeck, 388.
Thurloe, secretary of state, his letters to Henry Cromwell, giving an account of the illness and death of Oliver Cromwell, 620.
Tromp, Van, 312, 550.

U.

Urrie, Colonel, 257, 259.
Uxbridge, treaty of, 294.

V.

Vane, Henry, the elder, 265.
Vane, Sir Henry, the younger, his birth, 265. His parentage, 265. Early education of, 266. Enters Magdalen College, Oxford, 266. His disaffection in matters of religion, 266. Causes which moved him to a voluntary exile, 267. Characteristic circumstances which awaited him on board the passage ship, 267. Arrives at Boston, 267. Made governor of Massachusetts, 268. His administration, 268. The incidents which led to the hostilities against him, 269. Passages from Sykes attributed to him, 270. His influence with the people of the colony, 271. His entrance into Salem, 271. His return to Boston, 271. His religious essays, 275. Advocates the cause of Mrs. Hutchinson, 276. His answer to Winthrop, 277. Departs from America, 278. His marriage, 280. Returned member for Kingston-upon-Hull, 280. United with Sir William Russell as treasurer of the navy, 280. His evidence against the Earl of Strafford, 281. Distinguishes himself in all matters of religious reform, 282. Appointed sole treasurer of the navy, 283. His embassy to Scotland, 284. Foils the treacherous intrigues of the Duke of Hamilton, 285. Signs the Solemn League and Covenant proposed to be adopted in England, 286. Extract from his work entitled the "Retired Man's Meditations," 287. His definition of what a civil magistrate's authority should be restricted to, 292. His policy in the matter of the Self-denying Ordinance and the New Model, 294. His essay on government, 300. His treatise, "The People's Case stated," 300. Appointed one of the chief commissioners to represent the Republican party at the treaty in the Isle of Wright, 304. His speech on the question of a Monarchy or a Republic, 304. His retirement to Raby Castle, 305. Refuses to take the oath presented to him by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, 306. Placed at the head of the affairs of the army and navy, 306. His uneasiness respecting the dissolution of the first Parliament of the Commonwealth, 308. His administration of the naval affairs, 309. His speech for the exclusion of Scotch nominees, 310. His unparalleled ef- forts to increase the navy, 312. Milton's famous sonnet to him, 312. His exertions to avert the despotism of Cromwell, 313. His last effort to sustain the Republic, 315. Provisions of the bill on which he and Cromwell disagreed, 316. Retires to Raby Castle, 317. His political treatise, entitled "A Healing Question," 318. "England's Remembrancer" ascribed to him, 320. Summoned before the council, 320. His answer to the order issued against him, 320. His arrest and imprisonment, 321. His liberation, 321. Returned member for Whitechurch in Hampshire, in Richard Cromwell's Parliament, 322. His speech on the debate upon the question of a recognition of Richard Cromwell, 322. His speech on the proposition of Secretary Thurloe on going into details connected with the war, 325. His speech on the petition of the Barbadoes prisoners, 328. Heads of his bill for the settlement of government, 330. His imprisonment in one of the isles of Scilly, 330. His meditations on death, 331. His letter to his wife, 332. His removal to the Tower, 333. His arraignment, 333. His address to his judges, 333. His trial, 334. His appeal on the last day of his trial, 339. His exhortations and prayers previous to his execution, 339. His address to the people, 341. His execution, 342.

- Vaudois, massacre, the, 595.
- W.
- Waisby Field, battle of, 431.
 Waller's plot, 226.
 Warwick, Earl of, 306.
 Warwick, Sir Philip, 414, 422.
 "Weekly Account," 363.
 "Weekly Intelligencer," 362.
 Weston, Lord-treasurer, 30, 103.
 Whitelocke, his description of the troops raised by Cromwell, 303. His embassy to the Queen of Sweden, 554, 576.
 Wildman, Colonel, 588.
 Williams, Archbishop of York, 138, 209.
 Wilson, Mr., minister of the Boston church, 274.
 Winthrop, Governor of Boston, 276.
 Worcester, battle of, 490.
- Y.
- York, siege of, 433, 439.

THE END.

Name of the Person	Description of the Property
John Smith	A large lot of land in the town of...
Mary Jones	A small lot of land in the town of...
Robert Brown	A large lot of land in the town of...
Elizabeth White	A small lot of land in the town of...
James Green	A large lot of land in the town of...
Sarah Black	A small lot of land in the town of...
Thomas Grey	A large lot of land in the town of...
Ann Gold	A small lot of land in the town of...
William Silver	A large lot of land in the town of...
Elizabeth Copper	A small lot of land in the town of...

...

...

...

...

...

...

...

...

...

...

...

...

...

...

VALUABLE STANDARD WORKS

IN THE SEVERAL DEPARTMENTS OF LITERATURE,

PUBLISHED BY

Harper and Brothers, New York.

Agriculture, Domestic Economy, &c.

ARMSTRONG'S TREATISE ON AGRICULTURE: edited by BUEL, 50 cents.
BEECHER'S (Miss C. E.) DOMESTIC ECONOMY, 75 cents.
HOUSEKEEPER'S RECEIPT-BOOK, 75 cents.
BROWNE'S TREES OF AMERICA, $5 00.
BUEL'S (JESSE) FARMER'S INSTRUCTOR, $1 00.
FARMER'S COMPANION.
CHAPTAL'S CHEMISTRY APPLIED TO AGRICULTURE, 50 cents.
COCK'S AMERICAN POULTRY BOOK, 35 cents.
GARDNER'S FARMER'S DICTIONARY. Engravings, $1 50.
GAYLORD AND TUCKER'S AMERICAN HUSBANDRY, $1 00.
KITCHINER'S COOK'S ORACLE AND HOUSEKEEPER'S MANUAL, 67½ cents.
MORRELL'S AMERICAN SHEPHERD. Plates. Paper, 75 cents. Muslin, 90 cents.
PARKES'S DOMESTIC DUTIES, FOR MARRIED LADIES, 75 cents.
SMITH'S (Mrs.) MODERN AMERICAN COOKERY, 40 cents.
WEBSTER AND PARKES'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF DOMESTIC ECONOMY. Nearly 1000 Engravings. Muslin, $3 50. Sheep extra, $3 75.

Biblical and Theological.

ABERCROMBIE'S MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS, 37½ cents.
BAIRD'S (Dr.) VIEW OF RELIGION IN AMERICA, 62½ cents.
BARNES'S (ALBERT) NOTES ON THE NEW TESTAMENT, 9 vols., each volume sold separately, 75 cents.
QUESTIONS on the above, 6 vols., each 15 cents.
BELL'S (Sir CHARLES) MECHANISM OF THE HAND, 60 cents.
BIBLICAL LEGENDS OF THE MUSSULMANS, 50 cents.
BLAIR'S SERMONS, $1 50.
BONNECHOSE'S HISTORY OF THE EARLY REFORMERS, 40 cents.
BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, corrected Standard Edition, in about 30 varieties of size and binding.
BROWN'S DICTIONARY OF THE HOLY BIBLE, $1 75.
POCKET CONCORDANCE TO THE HOLY BIBLE, 37½ cents.
BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS, 75 cents.
BUTLER'S ANALOGY OF NATURAL AND REVEALED RELIGION, 35 cents.
CHALMERS ON THE POWER, WISDOM, AND GOODNESS OF GOD IN THE CREATION 60 cents.
CHURCH (THE) INDEPENDENT OF THE STATE, 90 cents.
COLTON ON THE RELIGIOUS STATE OF THE COUNTRY, 60 cents.
COMFORTER (THE); OR, CONSOLATIONS FOR MOURNERS, 45 cents.
D'AUBIGNE'S DISCOURSES AND ESSAYS, 75 cents.
DAYS (THE) OF QUEEN MARY, 25 cents.
DICK'S SIDEREAL HEAVENS, 45 cents.
CELESTIAL SCENERY; OR, PLANETARY SYSTEM, 45 cents.
DWIGHT'S (Rev. Dr.) THEOLOGY EXPLAINED AND DEFENDED, 4 vols., 8vo, $6 00.
GLEIG'S HISTORY OF THE BIBLE, 2 vols., 60 cents.
HALL'S (Rev. ROBERT) COMPLETE WORKS, 4 vols., $6 00.
HAWKS'S HISTORY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN VIRGINIA, $1 75.
HOLY COAT (THE) OF TREVES, 37½ cents.
HUNTER'S BIOGRAPHY OF THE PATRIARCHS, THE SAVIOR, &c., $1 75.
ILLUMINATED AND PICTORIAL BIBLE, 1600 Engravings, $22 50.
JARVIS'S (Rev. S. F.) CHRONOLOGICAL INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF THE Church, $3 00.
JAY'S (Rev. WILLIAM) COMPLETE WORKS, 3 vols., $5 00.
KEITH'S LAND OF ISRAEL, $1 25.
DEMONSTRATION OF CHRISTIANITY, $1 37½.
ON THE PROPHECIES, 60 cents.
LE BAS'S LIFE OF WICLIF, 50 cents.
LIFE OF ARCHBISHOP CRANMER, $1 00.
MALAN. "CAN I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME WHILE MY RULE OF FAITH IS THE Bible?" 25 cents.
MASON'S ZION'S SONGSTER, 25 cents.
M'LVAINE'S (Bishop) EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY, $1 00.
ON THE DANGERS OF THE CHURCH, 10 cents.
MILMAN'S (Rev. H. H.) HISTORY OF THE JEWS, 3 vols., $1 20.
HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY, $1 90.
MOSHEIM'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, by MURDOCK, $7 50.
The same Work, by MACLAINE, $3 50.
NEAL'S HISTORY OF THE PURITANS, 2 vols., $3 50.
PALLEY'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY, 37½ cents.
NATURAL THEOLOGY: edited by BROUGHAM, 90 cents.
PARKER'S (Rev. J.) INVITATIONS TO TRUE HAPPINESS, 37½ cents.
PISE'S (Rev. Dr.) LETTERS TO ADA, 45 cents.
PRIDEAUX'S CONNECTION OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS, $3 75.

PROTESTANT JESUITISM, by a Protestant, 90 cents.
 SANDFORD'S (Rev. P. F.) HELP TO FAITH, 75 cents.
 SAURIN'S SERMONS: edited by Bishop HENSHAW, $3 75.
 SCOTT'S (Rev. JOHN) LUTHER AND THE REFORMATION, $1 00.
 SHOBERL'S HISTORY OF THE PERSECUTIONS OF POPEERY, 20 cents.
 SHUTTLEWORTH'S CONSISTENCY OF REVELATION, 45 cents.
 SMEDLEY'S REFORMED RELIGION IN FRANCE, $1 40.
 SMITH (Rev. Hugh) ON THE HEART DELINEATED, 45 cents.
 SMITH AND ANTHON'S STATEMENT OF FACTS, 12½ cents.
 STEINMETZ'S NOVITIATE, 50 cents.
 STONE'S (Rev. JOHN S.) MYSTERIES OPENED, $1 00.
 SUFFERINGS (THE) OF CHRIST, by a Layman, $1 00.
 SUMMERFIELD'S (Rev. JOHN) SERMONS, $1 75.
 TRUE ISSUE SUSTAINED, 12½ cents.
 TURNER'S (Rev. S. H.) ESSAY ON THE DISCOURSE AT CAPERNAUM, 75 cents.
 TURNER'S (S.) SACRED HISTORY OF THE WORLD, 3 vols., $1 35.
 UNCLE PHILIP'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY, 35 cents.
 WADDINGTON'S HISTORY OF THE CHURCH, $1 75.
 WAINWRIGHT. "NO CHURCH WITHOUT A BISHOP," 25 cents.
 WHATELEY (Archbishop). CHRISTIANITY INDEPENDENT OF THE CIVIL GOVERNMENT 90 cents.
 WHEWELL'S ASTRONOMY AND GENERAL PHYSICS, 50 cents.

Biography.

APOSTLES AND EARLY MARTYRS OF THE CHURCH, 25 cents.
 BARROW'S (JOHN) LIFE OF PETER THE GREAT, 45 cents.
 BANGS'S LIFE OF JAMES ARMINIUS, D.D., 50 cents.
 BELKNAP'S (JEREMY) AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY, 3 vols., $1 35.
 BELL'S (H. G.) LIFE OF MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, 85 cents.
 BELL'S (ROBERT) LIFE OF RT. HON. GEORGE CANNING, 50 cents.
 BONAPARTE (LUCIEN), MEMOIRS OF, 30 cents.
 BONAPARTE (NAPOLEON), COURT AND CAMP OF, 45 cents.
 BOSWELL'S LIFE OF SAMUEL JOHNSON.
 BREWSTER'S LIFE OF SIR ISAAC NEWTON, 45 cents.
 ——— LIVES OF GALILEO, TYCHO BRAHE, &c., 45 cents.
 BURR (AARON), PRIVATE JOURNAL OF, $4 50.
 BUSH'S LIFE OF MOHAMMED, 45 cents.
 CALHOUN'S LIFE AND SPEECHES, $1 12½.
 ——— LIFE, 12½ cents.
 CAMPBELL'S LIFE OF MRS. SIDDONS, 70 cents.
 COBBETT'S LIFE OF GENERAL JACKSON, 40 cents.
 COOLEY'S LIFE OF HAYNES: edited by SPRAGUE, 90 cents.
 CORNWALL'S (BARRY) LIFE OF EDMUND KEAN, 65 cents.
 COWELL'S LIFE, by HIMSELF, 25 cents.
 CROCKETT, SKETCHES OF THE LIFE OF, 50 cents.
 CROLY'S LIFE OF GEORGE IV., 45 cents.
 CUNNINGHAM'S (ALLAN) LIVES OF EMINENT PAINTERS, $2 10.
 D'ABRANTES (DUCHESS), MEMOIRS OF, $1 37½.
 DAVIS'S MEMOIRS OF AARON BURR, $3 80.
 DISTINGUISHED MEN OF MODERN TIMES (LIVES OF), 90 cents.
 DISTINGUISHED FEMALES (LIVES OF), 35 cents.
 DOVER'S (LORD) LIFE OF FREDERIC THE GREAT, 90 cents.
 DREW (SAMUEL), LIFE OF, by his SON, 75 cents.
 DWIGHT'S LIVES OF THE SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, 90 cts.
 EMINENT INDIVIDUALS. LIVES OF, 3 vols.
 FENELON'S LIVES OF ANCIENT PHILOSOPHERS, 45 cents.
 FORSTER'S STATESMEN OF THE ENGLISH COMMONWEALTH.
 FORSYTH'S (Dr.) LIFE OF Dr. PROUDFIT, 75 cents.
 FRANKLIN (Dr.), LIFE OF, by HIMSELF, 2 vols., 90 cents.
 GALT'S (JOHN) LIFE OF LORD BYRON, 40 cents.
 GLASS'S LIFE OF WASHINGTON: in Latin, $1 12½.
 GODWIN'S LIVES OF THE NECROMANCERS, 65 cents.
 HEAD'S LIFE OF BRUCE, the African Traveler, 45 cents.
 HOGG'S ANECDOTES OF SIR WALTER SCOTT, 60 cents.
 HOLDICH'S LIFE OF REV. DR. WILLBUR FISK, $2 00.
 HOLMES'S LIFE OF MOZART, 50 cents.
 HORNE'S NEW SPIRIT OF THE AGE, 25 cents.
 HUNTER'S SACRED BIOGRAPHY, $1 75.
 IRVING'S LIFE OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH, 90 cents.
 ——— LIFE OF COLUMBUS.
 JAMES'S LIFE OF CHARLEMAGNE, 45 cents.
 JAMESON'S MEMOIRS OF CELEBRATED FEMALE SOVEREIGNS, 80 cents.
 JAY'S (JOHN) LIFE, by his SON, $5 00.
 JOHNSON'S (Dr.) LIFE, AND SELECT WORKS, 90 cents.
 KENDALL'S (AMOS) LIFE OF GENERAL JACKSON.
 LEE'S (Mrs.) LIFE OF BARON CUVIER, 50 cents.
 LE BAS'S (C. W.) LIFE OF WICLIF, 50 cents.
 ——— LIFE OF CRANMER, 2 vols., $1 00.
 LIVES OF EMINENT MECHANICS.
 LOCKHART'S LIFE OF NAPOLEON, 2 vols., 90 cents.
 MACKENZIE'S (A. SLIDELL) LIFE OF PAUL JONES, $1 00.
 ——— LIFE OF Com. O. H. PERRY, 90 cents.
 MEMES'S MEMOIRS OF THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE, 45 cents.
 M'GUIRE'S OPINIONS AND CHARACTER OF WASHINGTON, $1 12½.

- MOORE'S (THOMAS) LIFE, LETTERS, &c., OF BYRON, $2 75.
 LIFE OF LORD EDWARD FITZGERALD, $1 00.
 NAVIGATORS (EARLY), LIVES OF, 45 cents.
 PARK'S (MONDO) LIFE AND TRAVELS, 45 cents.
 PAULDING'S (J. K.) LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, 90 cents.
 PELLICO'S (SILVIO) MEMOIRS AND IMPRISONMENTS, 50 cents.
 PLUTARCH'S LIVES: translated by LANGHORNE, $2 00.
 The same Work in 4 vols., $3 50.
 RENWICK'S LIFE OF DE WITT CLINTON, 45 cents.
 LIVES OF JOHN JAY AND ALEXANDER HAMILTON, 45 cents
 ROBERTS'S LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF H. MORE, $1 50.
 RUSSELL'S LIFE OF OLIVER CROMWELL, 90 cents.
 SCOTT'S (REV. JOHN) LIFE OF LUTHER, $1 00.
 SEDGWICK'S (T.) LIFE AND LETTERS OF W. LIVINGSTON, $2 00
 SOUTHEY'S (ROBERT) LIFE OF LORD NELSON, 45 cents.
 SPARKS'S (JARED) WRITINGS OF WASHINGTON, 12 vols., $18 00.
 AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY, 10 vols., $7 50.
 The Volumes sold separately, if desired, 75 cents each.
 STEWART'S ADVENTURES IN CAPTURING MURRELL, 90 cents.
 STILLING'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY, 25 cents.
 STONE'S LIFE OF BRANT, THE INDIAN CHIEF, 90 cents.
 LIFE OF MATTHIAS THE IMPOSTOR, 62½ cents.
 ST. JOHN'S LIVES OF CELEBRATED TRAVELERS, $1 25.
 TAYLOR'S (JOHN) "RECORDS OF MY LIFE," $1 50.
 TAYLOR'S (W. C.) MODERN BRITISH PLUTARCH, 50 cents.
 THATCHER'S BIOGRAPHY OF DISTINGUISHED INDIANS, 90 cents
 TYLER'S (JOHN) LIFE AND SPEECHES, 50 cents.
 HISTORY, CHARACTER, AND POSITION, 12½ cents.
 WILLIAMS'S LIFE OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT, 45 cents.
 WILSON'S LIVES OF ECCENTRIC AND WONDERFUL CHARACTERS, $1 90

History, Ancient and Modern.

- ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE FROM 1789 TO 1815, $5 00.
 BONNECHOSE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMERS BEFORE LUTHER, 40 cents.
 BUCKE'S RUINS OF ANCIENT CITIES, 90 cents.
 BULWER'S (SIR E. L.) ATHENS, ITS RISE AND FALL, $1 20.
 BUNNER'S HISTORY OF LOUISIANA TO THE PRESENT TIME, 45 cents.
 CÆSAR'S COMMENTARIES: translated by WILLIAM DUNCAN, 90 cents.
 CRICHTON'S HISTORY OF ARABIA, ANCIENT AND MODERN, 90 cents.
 CRICHTON AND WHEATON'S DENMARK, NORWAY, AND SWEDEN, 90 cents.
 CROWE'S HISTORY OF FRANCE, 3 vols., $1 75.
 DAVIS'S HISTORY OF CHINA, 90 cents.
 DUNHAM'S HISTORY OF SPAIN AND PORTUGAL, $2 50.
 DUNLAP'S HISTORY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, 90 cents.
 HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN THEATER, $1 75.
 DWIGHT'S HISTORY OF CONNECTICUT, 45 cents.
 FERGUSON'S HISTORY OF THE ROMAN REPUBLIC, 45 cents.
 FLETCHER'S HISTORY OF POLAND, 45 cents.
 FLORIAN'S HISTORY OF THE MOORS IN SPAIN, 45 cents.
 FRASER'S HISTORY OF MESOPOTAMIA AND ASSYRIA, 45 cents.
 HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE ACCOUNT OF PERSIA, 45 cents.
 GIBBON'S HISTORY OF ROME, with Notes, by MILMAN, $5 00.
 GLEIG'S HISTORY OF THE BIBLE, 80 cents.
 GOLDSMITH'S HISTORY OF ROME: abridged, 45 cents.
 HISTORY OF GREECE: abridged, 45 cents.
 GRANT'S HISTORY OF THE NESTORIANS, OR LOST TRIBES, $1 00.
 GRATTAN'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS TO THE REVOLUTION OF 1830, 60 cents.
 HALE'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES TO 1817, 2 vols., 90 cents.
 HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND, $2 00.
 VIEW OF EUROPE DURING THE MIDDLE AGES, $2 00.
 INTRODUCTION TO THE LITERATURE OF EUROPE, $3 75.
 HAWKS'S HISTORY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN VIRGINIA, $1 75.
 HENRY'S HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY, 2 vols., 90 cents.
 HERODOTUS'S GENERAL HISTORY; by Rev. W. BELOZ, $1 35.
 HOWITT'S HISTORY OF PRIESTCRAFT IN ALL AGES, 60 cents.
 ICELAND, GREENLAND, AND THE FAROE ISLANDS, 45 cents.
 JAMES'S HISTORY OF CHIVALRY AND THE CRUSADES, 45 cents.
 JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE, 45 cents.
 JARVIS'S CHRONOLOGICAL INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH, $3 00
 KEIGHTLEY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND TO 1839, 5 vols., $2 25.
 LANMAN'S HISTORY OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN, 45 cents.
 LIEBER'S GREAT EVENTS.
 LIVY'S HISTORY OF ROME: translated by BAKER, 5 vols., $2 25.
 LOSSING'S HISTORY OF THE FINE ARTS, 45 cents.
 MACKINTOSH'S ENGLAND TO THE 17th CENTURY, $1 50.
 MICHELET'S ELEMENTS OF MODERN HISTORY, 45 cents.
 MILMAN'S HISTORY OF THE JEWS, 3 vols., $1 20.
 HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY, $1 90.
 MONETTE'S HISTORY OF THE VALLEY OF THE MISSISSIPPI.
 MOSHEIM'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY: MACLAINE'S Edition, $3 50.
 MORDOCK'S Edition of the same Work, $7 50.
 MULLER'S (BARON VON) HISTORY OF THE WORLD.
 MURRAY'S HISTORICAL ACCOUNT OF BRITISH AMERICA, 90 cts.
 HISTORICAL ACCOUNT OF BRITISH INDIA, $1 35.

VALUABLE NEW AND STANDARD WORKS

- NEAL'S HISTORY OF THE PURITANS, $3 50.
 PICTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND TO THE REIGN OF GEORGE III., profusely Illustrated
 PRESCOTT'S HISTORY OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO, 3 vols., $6 00.
 _____ HISTORY OF FERDINAND AND ISABELLA, 2 vols., $6 00.
 PRIDEAUX'S CONNECTION OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS, $3 75.
 ROBERTSON'S HISTORICAL WORKS, 3 vols., 8vo, Maps, $5 00.
 _____ HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES V., $1 75. Abridged, 45 cents
 _____ HISTORY OF AMERICA, $1 75. Abridged, 45 cents.
 _____ HISTORY OF SCOTLAND AND ANCIENT INDIA, $1 75.
 ROBINS'S (Mrs.) TALES FROM AMERICAN HISTORY, 3 vols., $1 00.
 ROLLIN'S ANCIENT HISTORY, WITH A LIFE OF THE AUTHOR, $3 75.
 RUSSELL AND JONES'S HISTORY OF MODERN EUROPE, $5 00.
 RUSSELL'S (MICHAEL) HISTORY OF EGYPT, 45 cents.
 _____ HISTORY OF NUBIA AND ABYSSINIA, 45 cents.
 _____ HISTORY OF THE BARBARY STATES, 45 cents.
 _____ HISTORY OF POLYNESIA, 45 cents.
 _____ HISTORY OF PALESTINE, 45 cents.
 SALE'S (Lady) JOURNAL OF DISASTERS IN AFGHANISTAN, 12½ cents.
 SALLUST'S HISTORY: translated by ROSE, 40 cents.
 SCHILLER'S HISTORY OF THE THIRTY YEARS' WAR.
 SCOTT'S (Sir W.) HISTORY OF SCOTLAND, $1 20.
 _____ HISTORY OF DEMONOLOGY, 40 cents.
 SCOTT'S (Rev. JOHN) LUTHERAN REFORMATION, $1 00.
 SEGUR'S HISTORY OF NAPOLEON'S RUSSIAN CAMPAIGN, 90 cents.
 SFORZOSI'S HISTORY OF ITALY, 45 cents.
 SILK, COTTON, LINEN, WOOL, (HISTORY OF), $3 00.
 SISMONDI'S HISTORY OF THE ITALIAN REPUBLICS, 60 cents.
 SMEDLEY'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION IN FRANCE, $1 40
 _____ SKETCHES FROM VENETIAN HISTORY, 90 cents.
 SMITH'S (H.) HISTORY OF FESTIVALS, GAMES, &c., 45 cents.
 SMITH'S (H. J.) HISTORY OF EDUCATION, 45 cents.
 SPALDING'S HISTORY OF ITALY AND THE ITALIAN ISLANDS, $1 35.
 STONE'S BORDER WARS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION, 90 cents.
 SWITZERLAND, HISTORY OF, 60 cents.
 TAYLOR'S HISTORY OF IRELAND, 90 cents.
 THATCHER'S HISTORY OF THE BOSTON TEA-PARTY, 62½ cents.
 THATCHER'S TALES OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION, 35 cents.
 THIRLWALL'S HISTORY OF GREECE, 2 vols., $3 50.
 THUCYDIDES' GENERAL HISTORY: translated by SMITH, 90 cents.
 TURNER'S SACRED HISTORY OF THE WORLD, $1 35.
 TYTLER'S UNIVERSAL HISTORY, 6 vols., $2 70.
 UNCLE PHILIP'S HISTORY OF VIRGINIA, 35 cents.
 _____ HISTORY OF NEW YORK, 2 vols., 70 cents.
 _____ HISTORY OF LOST GREENLAND, 35 cents.
 _____ HISTORY OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, 2 vols., 70 cents.
 _____ HISTORY OF MASSACHUSETTS, 2 vols., 70 cents
 WADDINGTON'S HISTORY OF THE CHURCH, $1 75.
 XENOPHON'S HISTORY: translated by SPELMAN, 55 cents.

College & School Books.

- ABERCROMBIE'S ESSAY ON THE INTELLECTUAL POWERS, 45 cents.
 _____ PHILOSOPHY OF THE MORAL FEELINGS, 40 cents.
 ALBION'S ESSAYS ON THE NATURE AND PRINCIPLES OF TASTE, 75 cents.
 ANTHON'S (CHARLES) LATIN LESSONS, 90 cents.
 _____ LATIN PROSE COMPOSITION, 90 cents.
 _____ LATIN PROSODY AND METRE, 90 cents.
 _____ LATIN VERSIFICATION, 90 cents.
 _____ KEY TO LATIN VERSIFICATION, 50 cents.
 _____ ZUMPT'S LATIN GRAMMAR, 90 cents.
 _____ COMMENTARIES OF CÆSAR, $1 40.
 _____ ÆNEID OF VIRGIL. English Notes, $2 00.
 _____ ECLOGUES AND GEORGICS OF VIRGIL, $1 50.
 _____ CICERO'S SELECT ORATIONS, $1 20.
 _____ SALLUST. With English Notes, 87½ cents.
 _____ HORACE. With English Notes, $1 75.
 _____ FIRST GREEK LESSONS, 90 cents.
 _____ GREEK PROSE COMPOSITION, 90 cents.
 _____ GREEK PROSODY AND METRE, 90 cents.
 _____ GREEK GRAMMAR, 90 cents.
 _____ NEW GREEK GRAMMAR, 90 cents.
 _____ HOMER. With English Notes, $1 50.
 _____ GREEK READER, FROM THE GERMAN OF JACOBS, $1 75.
 _____ ANABASIS OF XENOPHON.
 _____ CLASSICAL DICTIONARY, $4 75.
 _____ SMITH'S DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES, $1 75
 The same work, abridged, $1 25.
 BENNETT'S SYSTEM OF BOOK-KEEPING, $1 50.
 BOUCHARLAT'S ELEMENTARY TREATISE ON MECHANICS, $2 25.
 BOYD'S ELEMENTS OF RHETORIC, 50 cents.
 BURKE'S ESSAY ON THE SUBLIME AND BEAUTIFUL, 75 cents.
 CAMPBELL'S PHILOSOPHY OF RHETORIC, $1 25.
 CLARK'S ELEMENTS OF ALGEBRA, $1 00.
 DRAPER'S TEXT-BOOK ON CHEMISTRY, $1 75
 EDWARDS'S BOOK-KEEPER'S ATLAS, $2 00

3/27 3
Madison Lm. Eulogium on

asx

202 Main Library

2

3

4

5

6

Books may be Renewed by calling 642-3405

DUE AS STAMPED BELOW

REC MOFFITT

JUN

$$\overline{08} \overline{96}$$

FORM NO. DD6

© 1998

LD 21-95m-7,'37

U. C. BERKELEY LIBRARIES

C052174225

71742

DA377
F6

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY

